The Talmudists say that "the waters of the Jordan are not fit to sprinkle the unclean, because they are mixed waters;" meaning, mixed with the waters of other rivers and brooks, which empty themselves into it. The reader will compare with this the opinion of Naaman the Syrian, (2 Kings v. 11, 12.) who probably had received the same notion. Perhaps, too, this their inferiority was well understood, and not forgotten by the prophet of Israel.

The regular passages over the Jordan were, (1.) Jacob's bridge, between the lakes Merom and Gennesareth, said to be the place where Jacob met his brother Esau, and where he wrestled with an angel.—(2.) A bridge at Chammath, at the issue of the river from the lake of Gennesareth.—(3.) A ferry at Beth-abara, 2 Sam. xix. 18; 2 Kings ii. 8.—(4.) It is probable that there was another at Bethshan, or Scythopolis.

The phrase "beyond Jordan," in the early books of Moses and in Joshua, sometimes means the west of the river; but subsequently, that is, when the Hebrews had taken possession of the country, the term has the opposite meaning, denoting the country east of the river.

I. JOSEPH, son of Jacob and Rachel, was born in Mesopotamia. He was favored by God, in his youth, with prophetic dreams, and his father, Jacob, loved him tenderly, and gave him a coat of many colors; or rather a long robe, as a mark of partial paternal affection. His brothers became jealous of these marks of affection; and Joseph unconsciously increased the evil disposition in them, by accusing them of some crime, or by reporting to his father their wicked discourses; but, above all, by relating to them certain dreams, in one of which he had seen twelve sheaves, belonging to them, bow before his sheaf, which stood upright in the field. His father heard the relation without remark; but his brethren could not bear the allusion. Being sent by his father to visit his brethren, they conspired against him, and would have slain him; but Reuben opposing this, they threw him into an old well, which had no water; and soon after, perceiving a caravan of Midianite merchants going into Egypt, they sold him, and deceived Jacob into a belief of his destruction by a wild beast.

The merchants carried Joseph into Egypt, and sold him as a slave to Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh, whose confidence he soon obtained, and was by him made steward of his house, and director of all his domestic affairs, Gen. xxxix. But Potiphar's wife, conceiving a criminal passion for him, solicited him to gratify her desires; and at last pressed him so closely, that he could only escape by leaving his cloak in her possession. Seeing herself thus deepised, she cried out, and complained that the young Hebrew had offered her violence, showing his cloak as evidence against him. Potiphar, believing him to be guilty, threw Joseph into prison, where by his conduct he soon obtained the confidence of the warden, and was made overseer. It so happened that two of the king's officers, his butler and baker, having incurred his displeasure, were put into the same prison with Joseph. Each of them had a dream in reference to himself, which Joseph explained, and his interpretation of both was fulfilled. The butler was restored to his dignity, but did not remember Joseph. Two years after this event, Pharaoh had dreams by which he was perplexed, but which none of his wise men were able to explain. His butler at length remembered Joseph, whom Pharaoh commanded to be brought into his presence. The king related his dreams, and Joseph interpreted them; foretelling a prodigious plenty, which would be succeeded by exhausting famine; to guard against the consequences of which he recommended that a prudent man should be appointed to lay up stores, during the season of plenty. His counsel was approved by Pharaoh, and himself appointed to the office. The king also put his own ring on Joseph's finger, clothed him in fine linen, or cotton, put a chain of gold about his neck, made him ride in the chariot next to his own, and gave orders to proclaim him governor of all Egypt. He changed his name to Zaphnath-paaneah, which in Egyptian signifies "Saviour of the world," a high-sounding title, like those given to oriental princes at the present day. Joseph married Asenath, daughter of Potipherah, priest of On, or Heliopolis, by whom he had two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim.

During the famine which had been foretold, and which extended to Canaan, Jacob, reduced to extremities, sent his sons into Egypt to purchase corn, retaining only Benjamin, his beloved one, at home. On their arrival they were introduced to Joseph, and stated the nature of their errand. Joseph immediately recognized his brethren, but being desirous to obtain from them an artless statement of their family circumstances, and especially an account of his father Jacob and his brother Benjamin, he assumed a great sternness of manners, affected to doubt the truth of their story, and accused them of being spies. This had the desired effect; the sons of Jacob prostrated themselves before him, and related their artless tale. Joseph, however, detained them three days in custody, probably to observe them more narrowly, or to awaken in them a proper sense of the misconduct which had marked their past lives, and then consented that they should, with the exception of Simeon, return to their father, and bring back Benjamin. Feelings of remorse were now awakened in their minds, and they exclaimed with one voice, "We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul, when he besought us, and we would not hear; therefore is this distress come upon us." Jacob was greatly afflicted at the command to send Benjamin into Egypt, the reason for which he could not comprehend, but after a severe struggle with his feelings, consented that he should depart with his brothers. They again arrived in Egypt, and were introduced into the presence of Joseph, who, scarcely able to conceal the yearnings of his affection towards Benjamin, ordered a dinner to be prepared. After this they were sent off on their journey, but an expedient was resorted to by Joseph again to bring them back. Their corn was loaded, and in Benjamin's sack was concealed, by Joseph's orders, his silver cup. Scarcely had they left the city, therefore, when they were pursued, charged with robbery, and brought back trembling into the presence of their brother. The time had now arrived for the discovery to be made. The hearts of his brethren had been fully laid bare before Joseph, and he felt convinced that they had deeply bewailed and deprecated their former cruel demeanor towards him. He threw off his disguise, embraced them with all the ardor of genuine affection, and such a scene ensued as only the pen of inspiration could portray. (See Gen. xliii. xlv. xlv.) Joseph immediately, with the approbation of Pharaoh, sent for his father, and the land of Goshen was appropriated for the residence of the family.

But we must glance at the affairs of Egypt during this period, in relation to Joseph's administration. During the years of famine the Egyptians necessarily purchased their supplies of corn from the royal granaries; and in order to obtain these they parted first with their money, next with their cattle, and then with their lands and persons. Their lands and cattle were restored, on condition of the payment of a fifth part of their crops to the king.

Joseph attended the death-bed of his venerable parent, who gave to the two children of his favorite son—Ephraim and Manasseh—portions among the tribes, and assured Joseph that the Lord would again bring his family into the land of his fathers. At this time Joseph was about 56 years of age; he is supposed to have lived 54 years afterwards, and then died in Egypt, "by faith making mention of the departing of the children of Israel, and giving commandment concerning his bones"—i. e. that his brethren should carry them up into Canaan when they departed thence, Heb. xi. 22; Gen. xlv. 1. After his death, his body was put into a stone coffin, and was carried away at the exodus, Exod. xiii. 19. The tribe of Ephraim buried it near Shechem, in the field which Jacob had given to Joseph, Josh. xxiv. 32.

There are one or two incidents in the life of Joseph that seem to require further notice than we could give them in this brief narrative.

A difficulty has suggested itself to the minds of some persons with reference to Joseph's cup, mentioned in Gen. xlv. 5. In our translation it is said, not only that it was the cup out of which he drank, but the one also "whereby he divineth." Now, as divination is by no means a study which reflects honor on the character of Joseph, interpreters, who are jealous of the patriarch's piety, give another rendering to the passage—"and for which he would search accurately." So ver. 5, instead of "know you not that such a man as I can certainly divine?" they render, "I would search carefully;" i. e. for the cup. Without disputing these ideas, Mr. Taylor proposes a different import of the passage. Dining one day, he remarks, with a relation, he took particular notice of a SILVER CUP, used as a salt-cellar, which was a present from a friend, who had received it from a governor of Madras. This cup was three inches long, and two inches and a third wide at the brim; which at bottom was diminished to an inch and three quarters long, and an inch and one third wide. It had two handles, one at each end; and was ornamented with compartments, filled with flowers, &c. in relief, on the sides. The centre compartments contained Arabic inscriptions, in relief also. It was an inch and a half in depth; and was cut off oblique-ly at the corners. It was the custom, it seems, for the town of Madras (probably not the European part of it) to make every new governor, as a token of respect, a present of a similar cup, out of which to drink his arrack after dinner. The governor's name and titles, with those of the parties who presented it, compose, probably, the Arabic inscriptions upon it. Now such was, as he thinks, Joseph's cup; i. e. like this, small, fit for the hand to cover and slip away; (turned bottom upward, it exactly fills the hand; thereby rendering Benjamin's theft plausible; it was a cup used at table, in the cheerful hours of drinking, after the meal was ended; so that Benjamin was charged with having abused the hospitality and confidence of Joseph; it was a cup of privilege, such as the town could not be supposed to furnish the fellow of; so that Benjamin could not pretend he had bought it; but all the citizens must have been witnesses, that this was their present (properly inscribed) to their governor, and must have been interested accordingly. [But there is no necessity for this far-fetched attempt at illustration. The Hebrew word נחש, nachash, translated to divine, has this meaning also in the intellectual sense, i. e. to conjecture, guess out, e. g. divine that some one would take the cup, or who had got the cup. R.

This view of the subject absolves Joseph from the crime and folly of divination. The following extract, however, may serve to show that, at any rate, a particular cup, annexed to his office by way of distinction, was neither peculiar to the ancient governor of the Egyptian metropolis, nor to the modern governor of Madras: "One day, Ras Michael, [who was governor of the province of Tigré, and prime-minister of the kingdom,] dining with Kasnati Gita, the queen's brother, who was governor of Samen, and drinking out of a common glass decanter, called Brullé, when it is the privilege and custom of the governor of Tigré to use a gold cup; being asked why he did not claim his privilege, he said, 'All the gold he had was in heaven;' alluding to the name of the mountain Samayat, where his gold was surrendered, which word signifies heaven. The king, who liked this kind of jests, of which Michael was full, on hearing this, sent him a gold cup, with a note written, and placed within it, 'Happy are they who place their riches in heaven;' which Michael directed to be engraved by one of the Greeks upon the cup itself. What became of it, I know not; I saw it the first day he dined after coming from council, at his return from Tigré, after the execution of Abba Salamana; but I never observed it at Serbraxos, nor since. I heard, indeed, a Greek say, he had sent it as a present to a church of Saint Michael, in Tigré." (Bruce's Travels, vol. ii. p. 657.) The reader will notice the engraving, the inscription, on this cup of privilege.

Joseph has been severely censured by some writers for his method of procuring, for the king of Egypt, the property and persons of the inhabitants in exchange for food; but it should not be overlooked, that the thought seemed to originate with the people themselves, and that probably it was not uncommon in those times. The subjoined extract from the Gentoo Laws, (p. 140.) will support this idea, and inform us, further, on what terms the slave might regain that liberty which he had been induced to pledge, in the hour of distress. This institute certainly differs in this respect from that of Joseph, who laid a perpetual land-tax of four shillings in the pound on the Egyptians, but suffered them to retain the use of their property. "Whoever, having received his victuals from a person during the time of a famine, hath become his slave, upon giving to his provider whatever he received from him during the time of the famine, and also two head of cattle, may become free from his servitude, according to the ordination of Pâchesputtee Misr.—Approved. Chendusar upon this head speaks thus: 'that he who has received victuals during a famine, and hath, by those means, become a slave, on giving two head of cattle to his provider, may become free.' Whoever, having been given up as a pledge for money lent, performs service to the creditor, recovers his liberty whenever the debtor discharges the debt; if the debtor neglects to pay the creditor his money, and takes no thought of the person whom he left as a pledge, that person becomes the purchased slave of the creditor. Whoever, being unable to pay his creditor a debt, hath borrowed a sum of money from another person, and paid his former creditor therewith, and hath thus become a slave to the second creditor; or who, to silence the importunities of his creditor's demands, hath yielded himself a slave to that creditor, such kind of slaves shall not be released from servitude, until payment of the debts.

May not these principles suggest some sort of reason why Pharaoh retained the Israelites in bondage? i. e. that their fathers had originally been supported in Egypt, and their lives preserved in time of famine, by Egyptian benevolence? It is true, the Pharaohs of the former dynasty might have considered the sustaining of Israel as a small return for advantages derived by Egypt from the wisdom of Joseph; but this Pharaoh "knew not Joseph;" he either was wilfully ignorant of past events, or disregarded, disacknowledged Joseph; or was of a new race, from a distant country, and treated as a fable the services that "Saviour of the Egyptian world" had formerly rendered the kingdom. That the Israelites were considered in the light of bondmen is openly acknowledged, "Thou shalt say to thy son, We were Pharaoh's bondmen, in Egypt;" "Thou shalt remember thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt, and יהוה, thy God, redeemed thee;" Deut. vi. 21; xv. 15. That bondmen were taken for debt appears from the fears of Jacob's sons: (Gen. xliii. 18.) "Because of the money that was in our sacks—he may take us for bondmen." So (chap. xlv. 33.) Judah offers himself to be a bondman, instead of Benjamin; and that this custom continued long after, we learn from 2 Kings iv. 1, where the prophet's widow complains, "the creditor may take my children for bond-slaves, we being unable to pay him;" and from Matt. xviii. 25: "But, whereas, he had not property to pay with, his lord commanded him to be sold, his wife, and his children, and all that he had."

But another consideration presents itself in looking at the payment imposed on the Egyptians by Joseph. Was this the only tax they paid to Pharaoh in support of his government? If it were, it is much more easily vindicated than some have thought; it being evident that the nation could not repay what they had received, in kind; or, indeed, in any mode, except by their productive labor, which operated as an annuity in favor of Pharaoh.

II. JOSEPH, son of Jacob, and grandson of Matthan, husband of Mary, and foster-father of Christ, Matt. i. 15, 16. His age, and other circumstances of his life, excepting what are related in the Gospels, are uncertain. Many of the ancients believed that before his marriage with the Virgin, he had a wife, named Escha, or Mary, by whom he had James the Less, and those who are called in Scripture, "brethren" of our Lord. But this opinion is not maintainable, since Mary the mother of James was living at the time of our Saviour's passion, and it is not probable that she had been divorced by Joseph, to marry the Virgin, or that he was married at the same time to two sisters; which is contrary to the law, Lev. xviii. 18. Joseph (Matt. i. 19.) was a just man; (see ANNUNCIATION;) his ordinary abode was at Nazareth, particularly after his marriage; and he lived by labor, at a trade, (Matt. xiii. 55, οὐχ ὄντως ἰστίη ὁ τοῦ τεκτόνος υἱός,) which has been generally thought to be that of a carpenter. It is thought that he died before Jesus entered upon his public ministry.

III. JOSEPH BARSABAS, the Just, who was proposed to fill up the traitor Judas's place, Acts i. 23.

IV. JOSEPH of Arimathea was a Jewish senator, and privately a disciple of Christ, John xix. 38. He did not consent to the acts of the Sanhedrim, who condemned Jesus; and when our Saviour was dead, he went boldly to Pilate and desired the body, that he might bury it, which he did, in his own tomb, Mark xv. 43; John xix. 38, &c.

I. JOSES, son of Mary and Cleophas, was brother of James the Less, and nearly related to our Lord, being son of the Virgin's sister, and of Cleophas, Joseph's brother, Mark xv. 40, 47.

II. JOSES, see BARNABAS.

I. JOSHUA, son of Nun, by the Greeks called Jesus, son of Navé, was of the tribe of Ephraim; and is commonly called the servant of Moses. His first name was Oshea, (Numb. xiii. 8, 16.) which some believe Moses changed, by adding that of God to it. Oshea signifies saviour; JEHOSHUA, the salvation of God, or he will save. In the New Testament he is called JESUS, which signifies the same, Acts vii. 45; Heb. iv. 8. Joshua displayed his valor against the Amalekites, and routed their whole army. When Moses went up mount Sinai, to receive the law, and remained there forty days and forty nights, Joshua abode with him, though in all probability not in the same place, nor with the same abstinence; and when Moses descended from the mountain, Joshua heard the noise of the people, shouting about the golden calf, and thought it was the cry of battle, Exod. xxxii. 17.

Joshua was very constant at the tabernacle of the congregation; of which he had the care and custody, (Exod. xxxiii. 11.) and seems to have dwelt in or near it. When the people came to Kadesh-Barnea, he, with others, was deputed to survey the land of Canaan; and when these deputies returned, and represented the difficulties of conquering the country as extremely great, Joshua and Caleb maintained, that the conquest was easy, if the Lord were with them. The murmurers were all excluded from the land of promise; but God promised Joshua and Caleb that they should enter and possess it.

When Moses was near his end, God commanded him to lay his hands on Joshua, to communicate to him part of his spirit, and his glory, that the people might obey him. After the death of Moses, he took the command of the Israelites; and after leading them into the promised land, subduing their enemies, and dividing the country among the tribes, he called them together, recapitulated the favors they had received from God, and exhorted them to continue faithful. He then made a covenant on the part of God with them, and the people reciprocally engaged to serve the Lord. Joshua wrote it in the book of the law of the Lord; and to preserve the memory of this transaction, he erected a very large stone, under the oak, near Shechem. He died, aged a hundred and ten, A. M. 2570.

II. JOSHUA, a high-priest, see JESHUA.

III. JOSHUA, THE BOOK OF, is generally attributed to the person whose name it bears, though it contains certain terms, names of places, and particular circumstances, which do not agree with his time. These are accounted for, by supposing that the book has been revised, and that additions and corrections were made by Ezra in his edition.

The Samaritans have a copy of this book, which they preserve with respect, and use in support of their pretensions against the Jews. It contains forty-seven chapters, filled with fables and childish stories, commencing where Moses chooses Joshua to succeed him. It relates the history of Balaam; of the war of Moses against the Midianites, with the occasion of it; of Balaam's death; of the death of Moses, and the lamentation made for him. It relates the passage of the river Jordan at large; the taking of Jericho; and adds a great number of miracles which are not in the genuine book of Joshua. It describes a certain war which it mentions to have been carried on against Saubec, son of Heman, king of Persia, with the addition of a thousand fabulous circumstances. After the death of Joshua, it names one Terfico, of the tribe of Ephraim, for his successor. There are some other apocryphal works ascribed to Joshua; but they carry their own refutation.

Upon the miracle wrought at the word of Joshua, recorded in Josh. x. 12—14, much has been written. Objectors have urged that the language of Joshua, in correspondence with which the miracle is said to have occurred, is not in accordance with the ascertained economy of the universe; and that if even this objection could be disposed of, an unanswerable one against the fact would remain, because such an occurrence must have involved the whole system in a common ruin. To these objections it has been replied, (1.) that the Hebrew general expressed himself in popular language, as, indeed, he was compelled to do, unless he would have incurred the charge of insanity; and, (2.) that the miracle consisted in an extraordinary refraction of the solar and lunar rays, and did not imply any cessation of the motion of the heavenly bodies. In support of this view of the transaction, Mr. Taylor has an essay, the close of which we lay before the reader.

It must be granted, that Joshua saw the objects respecting which he spake. E. g. that looking toward the sun, he beheld the place of that luminary, and its rays shining abroad; then turning towards the place of the moon in the heavens, he beheld that luminary also; so that both luminaries were above the horizon (therefore visible) at the time when he uttered these words: "Thou sun—thou moon." This supposition is reasonable enough, and, indeed, undeniable; but its consequences are important, and influence the whole history. It shows, (1.) that the time of the year was about midsummer, when the sun is at its highest northern station; (2.) that it was at nearly full moon, because then the moon would be visible in the heavens at the close of the day; yet would shine all night till the next morning; (3.) that it was toward the close of day, because before the evening of the day, there was no occasion for the desire of prolonged light.

Now, if the light of the moon were wanted, she could dispense that while pursuing her course; so that there was no need for her standing still, in order to shine on any supposed spot, whether Ajalon, or elsewhere. If the light of the sun were wanted, his rays might be so inflected as to enlighten parts much more south than they otherwise would have done; and their motion might accompany that of his orb along the horizon. Consequently, there was no need for keeping him standing still, in order to his shining on any particular spot, whether Gibeon, or elsewhere. At London the length of the longest day, and those adjacent to it, is sixteen hours and a half; and the twilight (not night) is only seven hours and a half:—if we transfer this idea from the latitude of London, 52 deg. 30 min. to that of Judea, 35 deg. 30 min. we shall find that the longest day at Jerusalem is about fifteen hours: to this add a twilight of an hour and a half; which doubled for evening and morning, makes three hours; in all eighteen hours of natural light:—so that, to maintain the solar light, during the remaining six hours, until it would naturally have risen again in the morning, would answer the nature and the purposes of the miracle. Having adverted to the natural annual situation and effect of the sun at midsummer, in the latitude of London, we may now perceive, that what was a miracle of protracted light in Judea, would have been a much less (a shorter) miracle at London; since, had the solar light by any means been elevated ten or fifteen degrees, during an hour or two, it would have shone all night upon London. Advancing, therefore, toward the pole, if at the north of Scotland, or the Shetland islands, the light had been elevated half that quantity, and during half that time, it would have shone all night there; as at Iceland, Norway, Sweden, &c. without any unusual elevation, it actually does shine all night at the midsummer time of the year. This fact does not rest on astronomical calculations only; there are hundreds of witnesses of it; any person who has been a Greenland voyage is sufficient evidence, and will confirm it; he will describe the course of the sun as circulating all round the horizon, but not sinking below it; not merely during one night, but during a whole month, or two months; making perpetual day, and being constantly visible.

It is well known that the chief, if not the only, objection, to this miracle is, that it disturbed the whole progress of nature; if it stopped the sun in his course, it must, it is said, have made a double day to a whole hemisphere; and a double night to the other hemisphere; with all their attendant effects. So, if it delayed the moon in her course, it must have made this month (or lunar revolution) longer than any other; must have kept the tides stationary, or have increased them so exceedingly where it was high tide, that great inundations must have ensued; while the want of water would have been equally felt where it was low water. The object of this reasoning, then, is to show that the lunar orb was not stopped one moment, but kept on her course; yet maintaining her brightest beams on the valley of Ajalon, and the country adjacent, where the enemy were flying;—for the history itself expresses that they did not stay all night in the valley of Ajalon, or on any other spot, but fled to a great distance; consequently, when they were gone, the moon's light might be spared from the valley. On the same principle is suggested, the perfect indifference to Joshua, whether the solar light were fixed in one point, or whether it kept moving along the horizon; provided it gave him light, that was all he wanted; and this it would equally do, in motion, as at rest.

This statement of the subject answers, in Mr. Taylor's opinion, every objection respecting the injury done, by disturbing the progress of nature, since it shows that, in fact, the progress of nature was neither delayed nor accelerated, but maintained its regular proceeding. The moon was not delayed in her course; neither was the sun, but his light kept moving along the horizon that night, in Judea, as it does now annually in the Shetland islands, or at Tornea, in Lapland; where the body of the sun (which is not necessary in this miracle) is visible at midnight, before and after the solstice.

JOSIAH, son of Amon, king of Judah, and Jedidah, daughter of Adaiah, of Boscath, (2 Kings xxii.) began to reign when eight years of age, ante A. D. 641. He did right in the sight of the Lord, and walked in the ways of David. He began to seek after God from the eighth year of his reign, which was the sixteenth year of his age; and in the twelfth year of his reign, he cleared Judah and Jerusalem from high places, groves, idols, and superstitious images; and visited, for the same purpose, the cities of Ephraim, Manasseh, Simeon, and Naphtali, which he is thought to have held under the kings of Chaldea. He next proceeded to repair the temple of the Lord, which in the preceding reigns had been neglected. As the workmen were removing the money which had been offered by the Israelites at the temple, the high-priest Hilkiah found in the treasury-chamber "a book of the law of the Lord given by Moses," which is thought to have been the ORIGINAL of the law, found either in some wall, or chest,—for it appears, that the ark was not then in the sanctuary, since Josiah commands the priests to restore it to its place, and forbids them to carry it about any more. Josiah, having heard this book read, rent his clothes, and sent to Huldah the prophetess for advice; after which he convened the elders of Judah and Jerusalem, and went up with them to the temple of the Lord. Here he read to them the book lately found, and made a covenant with God, engaging to walk in his ways, and to observe his precepts and ordinances; and he made the assembly promise the same. He afterwards ordered the destruction of all the remains of superstitious and idolatrous monuments in Jerusalem and Judah: he cut off the soothsayers, those who worshipped the stars, and the sodomites; and enjoined those priests who had offered sacrifices on the high places, to desist. He defiled Tophet and the valley of Hinnom, and profaned all places which had been consecrated to superstition and idolatry, filling them with dead men's bones, and breaking down the statues which were in them. He demolished the altar erected by Jeroboam at Bethel, and dug up the bones of the false prophets and priests of the golden calves, but spared the sepulchre of the prophet whom the Lord had sent to prophesy against Jeroboam, 1 Kings xiii. 31, 32. Josiah afterwards commanded all his people to keep the passover according to the law, and Scripture says, that from the time of the judges, and during the reigns of all the kings, no passover had been kept like this; and that no king before Josiah turned as he did to the Lord with all his heart, with all his soul, and with all his strength.

Some years afterwards, Pharaoh Necho, king of Egypt, desiring to pass through Judea, to attack the city of Carchennish on the Euphrates, Josiah opposed his passage at Megiddo, at the foot of Carmel, and was mortally wounded; he died at Jerusalem, ante A. D. 610. The people mourned very much for his death, and Jeremiah composed an elegy on the occasion. Josiah was buried with the kings his predecessors at Jerusalem, and the people made Jehoahaz, or Shallum, one of his sons, king in his stead. Jesus, the son of Sirach, speaks highly of king Josiah, Eccles. xlix. 1, &c.

There were several prophets in Judah while Josiah reigned; Jeremiah and Baruch, Joel and Zephaniah; as also the prophetess Huldah. Some critics have been of opinion, that the Lamentations of Jeremiah, which are now extant, were composed on the death of Josiah; and that these are the Lamentations mentioned in 2 Chron. xxxv. 24, 25, which were so celebrated, that they continued to be sung long after. But this opinion is certainly wrong. The mourning of the people on the death of this prince, passed, as it were, into a proverb; and the prophet Zechariah, (xii. 11.) speaking of the lamentation of future ages at the death of the Messiah, alludes to that of Josiah, as "the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddo."

JOTBATHAH, an encampment of Israel, in the wilderness, between Gidgad and Ebronah, Numb. xxxiii. 34. See Exodus.

I. JOTHAM, Gideon's youngest son, escaped the slaughter which the inhabitants of Ophrah made of his seventy brethren, Judg. ix. 5. The men and soldiers of Shechem, having made Abimelech, who had executed this bloody deed, king because he was their countryman, Jotham went up to the top of mount Gerizim, whence he addressed them in the famous fable of the trees, and then fled to Beer. We know not what became of him after this, but his prediction against Shechem and Abimelech was soon accomplished, Judg. ix. 5, &c.

II. JOTHAM, son and successor of Uzziah, or Azariah, king of Judah, who having been smitten with a leprosy for attempting to offer incense, (2 Chron. xxvi. 16, 17.) the government was committed to Jotham his son, ante A. D. 783. After having governed twenty-five years he assumed the title of king, and reigned alone sixteen years, to ante A. D. 742; so that he governed Judah forty-one years. He did right in the sight of the Lord, and imitated the piety of his father Uzziah, but did not destroy the high places. He built the great gate of the temple, and other works on the walls of Jerusalem, in Ophel, and also caused forts and castles to be erected in the mountains and in the forests of Judah. The Ammonites, who had been brought into subjection by Uzziah his father, having attempted to revolt, he defeated them, and imposed on them a tribute of a hundred talents of silver, and ten thousand measures of wheat, with as many of barley. Towards the end of his reign, the Lord sent Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel, against him; and it appears from Isa. i. that Judah was in a very melancholy condition in the beginning of the reign of Ahaz, his son and successor.

JUBAL, son of Lamech and Adah, and the inventor of musical instruments, Gen. iv. 21.

JUBILEE, a Hebrew festival, celebrated in the fiftieth year which occurred after seven weeks of years, or seven times seven years, Lev. xxv. 10. Several commentators, however, maintain that it was celebrated in the forty-ninth year, the last year of the seventh week of years, and Lev. xxv. 8, favors this opinion: "Thou shalt number seven sabbaths of years, seven times seven years, and the space of seven sabbaths of years shall be unto thee forty and nine years." It is also remarked, that it would have involved many inconveniences to have celebrated the jubilee in the fiftieth year, after the sabbatical rest of the forty-ninth year. Our limits will not permit of entering into this controversy, which, after all, involves no question of moment.

If we were certain that the civil year began at a different time from the ecclesiastical year, that would solve the difficulty; that is, the fiftieth year, by one account, might begin before the forty-ninth year, by the other account, was fully completed. Besides, we know that any part of a year was reckoned as a whole year, by the Hebrews, as it commonly is in the East.

The jubilee year began on the first day of Tizri, (the first month of the civil year,) and about the autumnal equinox. During the year no one either sowed or reaped; but all were satisfied with what the earth and the trees produced spontaneously. Each resumed possession of his inheritance, whether it were sold, mortgaged, or alienated; and Hebrew slaves of every description were set free, with their wives and children, Lev. xxv. The first nine days were spent in festivity, during which no one worked, and every one put a crown on his head. On the tenth day, which was the day of solemn expiation, the Sanhedrim ordered the trumpets to sound, and instantly the slaves were declared free, and the lands returned to their hereditary owners. This law was mercifully designed to prevent the rich from oppressing the poor, and reducing them to perpetual slavery; and also to prevent their getting possession of all the lands by purchase, mortgage, or usurpation; that debts should not be multiplied too much; and that slaves should not continue, with their wives and children, in perpetual bondage. Besides, Moses intended to preserve, as much as possible, the liberty of persons, a due proportion of fortunes, and the order of families; as well as that the people should be bound to their country, their lands, and inheritances; and that they should cherish an affection for them, as estates descended from their ancestors, and to be transmitted to their posterity.

There were several privileges belonging to the jubilee year, which did not belong to the sabbatical year; though the latter had some advantage above the former. The sabbatical year annulled debts, which the jubilee did not; but the jubilee restored slaves to their liberty, and lands to their owners; besides which, it made restitution of the lands immediately on the beginning of the jubilee; whereas, in the sabbatical year, debts were not discharged till its close. Houses and other edifices built in walled towns did not return to the proprietor in the jubilee year.

After the captivity of Babylon, the Jews continued to observe the sabbatical, but not the jubilee, year. Alexander the Great granted the Jews an exemption from tribute every seventh year, by reason of the rest which they then observed. But as the jubilee was instituted only to prevent the utter destruction of the partition made by Joshua, and the confusion of tribes and families, it was no longer practicable as before the dispersion of the tribes; those which returned from the captivity settling as they could, and where they could, while a great number of families, and perhaps whole tribes, continued in the place of their captivity. Usher places the first jubilee after the promulgation of the law by Moses, A. M. 2609; the second, A. M. 2658; the third, A. M. 2707.

JUDAH, or JEHUDA, the fourth son of Jacob and Leah, was born in Mesopotamia, A. M. 2249. He advised his brethren to sell Joseph to the Ishmaelite merchants, rather than to imbrue their hands in his blood. He married Shuah, daughter of a Canaanite, named Hirah, and had three sons by her, Er, Onan, and Shelah, Gen. xxxvii. 26. He married Er to a young woman named Tamar; but Er died prematurely. Judah required Onan his second son to marry his brother's widow, and to raise up seed to him; but Onan eluded the purpose of his father, and the law, and was punished with death. Judah, being afraid to give Shelah his third son to Tamar, amused her with promises, till at length she disguised herself, and taking her seat in a way by which Judah was to pass, she imposed upon his ignorance, and obtained two children by him. See TAMAR.

Judah was always considered as the chief of Jacob's children, and his tribe was the most powerful and numerous. The blessing given by Jacob on his death-bed to Judah was as follows: "Judah, thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise, thy hand shall be on the neck of thine enemies, thy father's children shall bow down before thee. Judah is a lion's whelp; from the prey, my son, thou art gone up: he stooped down, he couched as a lion, and as an old lion, who shall rouse him up? The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come, and unto him shall the gathering of the people be." This seems to imply a transfer of the birth-right to Judah, Reuben having forfeited it; and it also includes a promise that the regal power should not go out of his family, and that the Messiah should derive his birth from him. See SHILOH.

The southern part of Palestine fell to the lot of Judah. (See CANAAN.) His tribe was at the exodus composed of 74,600 men capable of bearing arms. After the return from the captivity, this tribe in some sort united in itself the whole Hebrew nation, who from that time were known only as Judæi, Jews, descendants of Judah. Judah, when named in contradistinction to Israel, or the kingdom of the ten tribes, or Samaria, denotes that of Judah, and of David's descendants. One of the principal prerogatives of this tribe was, that it preserved the true religion, and the public exercise of the priesthood, with the legal ceremonies in the temple at Jerusalem; while the ten tribes gave themselves up to idolatry, and the worship of the golden calves.

I. JUDAS MACCABÆUS, son of Mattathias, succeeded his father as captain of the people during the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, 1 Mac. iii. 1. He gave numberless proofs of his valor, and of his zeal for God's law, by opposing those who forsook the Lord, and sacrificed to idols; and at last fell nobly in battle while opposing the Syrian army, under Bacchides. Calmet thinks that this great man was one of the figures of the Messiah, the true Saviour of Israel; and in his opinion, the prediction of Isaiah prophetically referred to him, as a figure of Christ: (chap. lxxiii.) "Who is he that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah?" &c.

II. JUDAS ISCARIOT, being chosen by Christ as one of his apostles, and appointed their treasurer, was so wicked as to betray his Lord into the hands of his enemies, for thirty shekels, about fifteen dollars.

It has been disputed whether Judas partook of the eucharist in the last supper. The affirmative of this opinion is the most general, but it is not recommended by considerations of propriety or convenience. That the feet of Judas were washed by our Lord is clear; and it is equally clear that our Lord marks him as an exception, by saying, "Ye are clean; but not all." This action was in the introductory part of the supper. Subsequently, our Lord observes, "I speak not of you all;—but he that eateth bread with me, hath lift up his heel against me." The traitor was still more distinctly pointed at, when, as they reclined during the supper, the hand of Judas happened to be placed on the table, at the same time as our Lord's hand was so placed; and to John he was personally marked by the sop given to him, which sop was dipped in the sauce composed of bitter herbs, that accompanied the paschal lamb. A moment after, he was discovered to all the company, by the answer to his question, "Lord, is it I?" This was so instant on his receiving the sop, that the evangelist John observes, "Jesus said to him, What you do, do directly;" and "he, having received the sop, went immediately out." It is therefore evident, that Judas went out during the paschal supper, but the eucharist was not instituted till after the paschal supper had been concluded; and the last action of that supper was what gave opportunity to the institution of the new rite. To suppose that Jesus would give to Judas the sacramental cup in token of his blood "shed for the remission of sins,"—of sins which Judas had traitorously committed, or which he designed traitorously to commit,—is to trifle with this most solemn of subjects; and, indeed, is a contradiction to the evangelist, who says, "When he (Judas) was gone out, Jesus said, Now is the Son of man glorified," &c. He then gave warning to Peter of his frailty; and to all his disciples of their instability. Some of the fathers seem to speak favorably of Judas's repentance; others think it absolutely defective and unprofitable, since he despaired of mercy. Origen and Theophylact, writing on Matthew, say, that Judas, seeing his master was condemned, and that he could not obtain pardon from him in this life, made haste to get the start of him, and wait for him in the other world, in order to beg mercy of him there.

There are some difficulties concerning the manner in which Judas died. Matthew says, simply, that he hanged himself; whereas Luke (Acts i. 18.) says, further, that "falling headlong, he burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out." This apparent discrepancy has occasioned much controversy, and various solutions have been offered. Mr. Hewlett, we think, has hit upon the true one. He considers the narrative of Luke to be supplemental to that of Matthew's, and to state an additional fact. Matthew having related that Judas departed, and went and hanged himself, Luke had not the least doubt respecting the fact, but knew that all suicides, who hang themselves, are cut down sooner or later by those who find them. It is at this point that Mr. Hewlett supposes the short, supplementary narrative in the Acts to begin. The rope being cut, or untied, (τορρὴς γενομένης) "falling headlong," or rather, "falling on his face, he burst asunder," &c. It was perfectly natural for Luke, on this occasion, if not as an evangelist, yet as a physician, to relate, by way of parenthesis, the pathological fact here recorded; which is so far from being incredible, that it is very natural, and not unlikely to happen. A skilful physician informed Mr. Hewlett, that in cases of violent and painful death there is usually an effusion of lymph, or lymph mixed with blood, into the cavities of the chest and abdomen. If the body be kept till putrescence takes place, a gas is evolved from the fluid in such quantity as to distend enormously, and sometimes to rupture, the peritonæum and abdominal muscles: this effect has been observed in bodies hung on gibbets in England; and it would take place much more readily in warmer climates.

III. JUDAS, or JUDE, surnamed Barsabas, was sent from Jerusalem, with Paul and Barnabas, to the church at Antioch, to report the resolution of the apostles at Jerusalem, concerning the non-observance of the law by the Gentiles, Acts xv. 22, 23. A. D. 54. Some think, that this Judas was the brother of Joseph, surnamed also Barsabas, who was proposed, with Matthias, to fill up the place of the traitor Judas, Acts i. 23. Luke says that Judas Barsabas was a prophet, and one of the chief among the brethren; and it is also believed that he was one of the seventy disciples.

IV. JUDAS, or JUDE, surnamed Thaddeus, or Lebbeus, or the Zealot, is called the Lord's brother, (Matt. xii. 55.) because he was, as is believed, son of Mary, sister to the Virgin, and brother to James the Less. In the last supper he asked Jesus "how he could manifest himself to his apostles, and not to the world?" Paulinus says, that he preached in Libya, and seems to say, that his body remained there. Jerome affirms, that after the ascension, he was sent to Edessa, to king Abgarus; and the modern Greeks say that he preached in that city, and throughout Mesopotamia; and in Judea, Samaria, Idumea, Syria, and principally in Armenia, and Persia. But we know no particulars of his life.

We have a canonical EPISTLE written by Jude, addressed to all the saints who are beloved by the Father, and called by the Son, our Lord. It appears by the 17th verse, where he cites the Second Epistle of Peter, and throughout the letter, in which he intimates that the expressions of that apostle were already known to those whom he writes to, that he had principally in view the converted Jews, who were scattered throughout the East, in Asia Minor, and beyond the Euphrates. He contends against false teachers, the Gnostics, Nicolaitans, and Simonians, who corrupted the doctrine, and disturbed the peace of the church. The date of the Epistle is uncertain; but Jude speaks of the apostles as of persons who had been some time dead. He quotes the Second Epistle of Peter, and alludes to Paul's Second Epistle to Timothy; whence it appears, that it was not written till after the death of these apostles, and consequently after A. D. 66. It is credible that he did not write it till after the destruction of Jerusalem. (Comp. Jude 17, with 2 Pet. ii. &c.; and 2 Tim. iii. 1. with Jude 18.)

V. JUDAS GAULANITIS, or the GAULANITE, opposed the enrolment of the people made by Cyrenius in Judea; (see CYRENIUS;) and raised a very great rebellion, pretending that the Jews, being free, ought to acknowledge no dominion besides that of God. His followers chose rather to suffer extreme torments than to call any power on earth lord or master. The same Judas is named Judas the Galilean, (Acts v. 37.) because he was a native of the city of Gamala in the Gaulanitis, which was comprised in Galilee. Calmet believes that the Herodians were the followers of Judas.

JUDEA, see JUDAS IV.

JUDEA, a province of Asia, successively called Canaan, Palestine, the Land of Promise, the Land of Israel, and Judea after the Jews returned from the Babylonish captivity; because then the tribe of Judah was the principal; the territories belonging to the other tribes being possessed by the Samaritans, Idumeans, Arabians, and Philistines. The Jews, when returned from the captivity, settled about Jerusalem, and in Judah, from whence they spread over the whole country.

Judea may be considered as divided into four parts: (1.) the western district, Palestine, inhabited by the Philistines; on the east of this, (2.) the mountainous district, called the hill country, (Josh. xxi. 11; Luke i. 39.) which the rabbins affect to call the king's mountain; whether because on the northern part of this ridge Jerusalem is situated, or for any other reason, is not known. East of these mountains was, (3.) the wilderness of Judea, along the shore of the Dead sea: (4.) the valleys, &c. west of Jerusalem, towards the Mediterranean. Judea, no doubt, derived its name from Judah, which tribe was settled in the south of the land, and maintained its kingdom after the northern tribes had been expatriated. This circumstance, together with that of Judah being principally peopled with Israelites after the return from the captivity, and being first settled, on account of the temple being established in it, accounts for the general name of Jews being given to the Hebrew nation. Judea was one of the principal divisions of the Holy Land in the days of Christ: it included from the Mediterranean sea west, to the Dead sea east, and was bounded north by Samaria, and south by Edom, or the Desert. It is extremely mountainous in some parts, as from Hebron to Jerusalem. West of these mountains is the principal extent of country; but this has many hills. East of them, running along the western shore of the Dead sea, is a wilderness, viz.

THE WILDERNESS OF JUDEA. Here John Baptist first taught, (Matt. iii. 1.) and Christ was tempted; probably towards the north of it, not far from Jericho. Some parts of it were not absolutely barren or uninhabited; of other parts the following descriptions are, we believe, very accurate. Dr. Carlyle, who visited the monastery of St. Saba, which stands in this wilderness, says, "The valley of St. Saba is an immense chasm in a rifted mountain of marble. It is not only destitute of trees, but of every other species of vegetation; and its sole inhabitants, except the wretched monks in the convent, are eagles, tigers, and wild Arabs." Chateaubriand describes it in truly melancholy terms: "I doubt whether any convent can be situated in a more dreary and desolate spot than the monastery of St. Saba. . . . As we advanced, the aspect of the mountains continued the same—that is, white, dusty, without shade, without tree, without herbage, without moss." Mr. Buckingham says, "Nothing can be more forbidding than the aspect of the hills; not a blade of verdure is to be seen over their whole surface, and not the sound of any living being is to be heard throughout their whole extent." What a scene surrounded the Saviour when he dwelt in this wilderness, with the wild beasts! Matt. iv; Luke iv. See CANAAN.

There are several medals of Judea extant, representing a woman (the daughter of Zion) sitting under a palm-tree, in a mournful attitude, and having around her a heap of arms, shields, &c. on which she is seated. The legend is JUDEA CAPTA. S. C. This may remind us of the captives in Babylon, who "sat down and wept." "But what is more remarkable," says Mr. Addison, "we find Judea represented as a woman in sorrow, sitting on the ground, in a passage of the prophet which foretells the very captivity recorded on these medals." (See Isa. iii. 26; xlvii. 1.)

[The name Judea was applied in different ages either to the whole or to a part of Palestine. In the time of David it denoted that portion of the country which belonged to the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, Josh. xi. 21; comp. verse 16; 2 Sam. v. 5; 1 Chron. xxi. 5. After the secession of the ten tribes, the territory of the kingdom of Judah was called Judea, including the tracts belonging to Judah and Benjamin, and also part of that which appertained to the tribes of Dan and Simeon. Hence it became at length a general name for the southern part of Palestine, while the northern part was called Galilee, and the middle Samaria. After the captivity, as most of those who returned were of the kingdom of Judah, the name Judea was applied generally to the whole of Palestine, Hag. i. 1, 14; ii. 3. When the whole country fell into the power of the Romans, the former division into Galilee, Samaria, and Judea, seems to have again become current. Josephus describes Judea in his day as bounded north by Samaria, its northern extremity being the village of Anouath, east by the Jordan, west by the Mediterranean, and south by the territory of the Arabs. These boundaries would seem to include a part at least of Idumæa. Judea in this extent constituted part of the kingdom of Herod the Great, and afterwards belonged to his son Archelaus. When the latter was banished for his cruelties, Judea was reduced to the form of a Roman province, annexed to the proconsulate of Syria, and governed by procurators, until it was at length given as part of his kingdom to Herod Agrippa II. During all this time the boundaries of the province were often varied, by the addition or abstraction of different towns and cities. See Jos. B. J. iii. 3. 5, et passim. Relandi Palest. p. 31, 174, 178 ff. Jahn § 25. § 13 ff. R.]

JUDGES (שופטים, shophetim) governed the Israelites from Joshua to Saul. The Carthaginians, a colony of the Tyrians, had likewise governors, whom they called Suffetes, or Sopherim, with authority like those of the Hebrews, almost equal to that of kings. Some are of opinion, that the archontes among the Athenians, and dictators among the Romans, were similar to the judges among the Hebrews. Grotius compares the government of the Hebrews, under the judges, to that of Gaul, Germany, and Britain, before the Romans changed it. This office was not hereditary among the Israelites; they were no more than God's vicegerents. When the Hebrews desired a king, God said to Samuel, "They have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them," 1 Sam. viii. 7. (See also Judg. viii. 23.)

The dignity of judge was for life, but the succession was not always constant. There were anarchies, or intervals, during which the commonwealth was without rulers. There were likewise long intervals of servitude and oppression, under which the Hebrews groaned, and were without either judges or governors. Although God only did regularly appoint the judges, yet the people, on some occasions, chose that individual who appeared to them most proper to deliver them from oppression; and as it often happened, that the oppressions which occasioned recourse to the election of a judge, were not felt over all Israel, the power of such judge extended only over that province which he had delivered. We do not find that Jephthah exercised his authority on this side Jordan; nor that Barak extended his beyond it. The authority of judges was not inferior to that of kings: it extended to peace and war: they decided causes with absolute authority; but had no power to make new laws, or to impose new burdens on the people. They were protectors of the laws, defenders of religion, and avengers of crimes, particularly of idolatry: they were without pomp or splendor; and without guards, train, or equipage, unless their own wealth might enable them to appear answerable to their dignity. Their revenue consisted in presents exclusively.—The time of the judges from Joshua to Saul is 399 years. For their succession see the CHRONOLOGICAL TABLES. See also TRIBUNALS.

JUDGES, THE BOOK OF, is by some ascribed to Phinehas, by others to Ezra, or to Hezekiah, and by others to Samuel, or to all the judges, who wrote each the history of his time and judicature. But it appears to be the work of one author, who lived after the time of the judges; and he is generally thought to be Samuel, for the following reasons:—(1.) The author lived at a time when the Jebusites were masters of Jerusalem, and consequently before David, Judg. i. 21. (2.) It appears that the Hebrew commonwealth was then governed by kings, since the author observes, in several places, that at such a time, there was no king in Israel.

There are considerable difficulties, however, against this opinion, as Judg. xviii. 30, 31: "And the children of Dan made Jonathan and his sons priests in the tribe of Dan, until the day of the captivity of the land. And they set them up Mical's graven image, which he made, all the time that the house of God was in Shiloh." Now, the tabernacle or house of God was not at Shiloh till about the time of Samuel's first appearance as a prophet; for then it was brought from Shiloh and carried to the camp, where it was taken by the Philistines; and after this time it was sent back to Kirjath-jearim, 1 Sam. iv. 4, 5, &c.; vi. 21. As to the captivity of the tribe of Dan, it can scarcely, one would think, be understood of any other than that under Tiglath-pileser, many hundred years after Samuel, and, consequently, he could not write this book; unless it be supposed that this passage has been added since.

JUDGMENT is taken (1.) for the power of judging absolutely; (Deut. i. 17; John v. 27.) (2.) for rectitude, equity, and the other good qualities of a judge; (Ps. lxxii. 1; xcix. 4; lxxxix. 14.) (3.) the vindictive justice and rigor of God's judgment. For example, Exod. xii. 12; Ps. cxix. 84; Isa. xxvi. 9. (4.) To do judgment and justice denotes the exercise of all virtues—justice, equity, truth, and fidelity, Gen. xviii. 19; Ps. cxix. 121; Isa. v. 7. (5.) Judgment is often put for the laws of God, and particularly for judicial laws, Exod. xxi. 1; xxiv. 3; Ps. cxlvii. 20. (6.) For a court of justice. See TRIBUNALS.

It is not improbable, that the decisions given from the oracle, or by the priests, in cases of difficulty, which had been brought to Jerusalem, according to the law, formed, in process of time, a body of judgments, distinguished as being divine : hence, in the Psalms, we frequently read of the judgment of God being according to truth, to justice, to equity ; meaning, not his judgment, in the sense of punishment inflicted on individuals, or on nations ; but his legal or discriminative decisions. On the other hand, care should be taken not to confound the divine judgments in the sense of punishments—evils inflicted—with those decisions which were merely judicial and administrative.

JUDGMENT is taken for the last judgment. "It is appointed that all men should die, and that judgment should follow," Heb. ix. 27. In Joel iii. 2, the Lord says, "that he will gather together all the nations in the valley of Jehoshaphat, and will enter into judgment with them, to avenge his people, whom they have oppressed." (See also Ecclus. xi. 9 ; Ps. cxliii. 2.)

JUDGMENT OF ZEAL. The Jews affirm, that under particular circumstances, when any one saw a Jew offending against God, or violating the law, or even if any one saw a heathen, who would engage the people in irregularities, in idolatry, or in the breach of God's laws, they might with impunity kill him ; and, without any form of justice, remove this scandal from the people. They cite the example of Phinehas, son of Eleazar, who, having seen an Israelite enter the tent of a Midianitish woman, took a javelin, followed them, and killed them both, (Numb. xxv. 6, &c.) and also the example of Mattathias, the father of the Maccabees, who, in his transport of zeal, killed an Israelite while he was sacrificing to false gods, 1 Mac. ii. 24, 25. But the inconveniences of this sort of judgment are very evident : an inconsiderate multitude, a provoked Israelite, or a fanatic, might believe themselves allowed to kill any man whom they wildly fancy to be an enemy to the interests of God and religion. With this mistaken zeal the Jews stoned Stephen, they laid hands on Paul, determined on his death, and more than forty men made a vow, neither to eat nor drink till they had killed him. James, bishop of Jerusalem, was executed in this manner ; and Christ had not escaped death in the temple, when they imagined he uttered blasphemy, had he not retired, John viii. 59.

JUDGMENT, FOUNTAIN OF, is the same as the Fountain of Kadesh, south of the land of promise, the waters of which were called the Waters of Strife, because Moses was here contradicted and provoked by the murmurs of the Israelites. It was also called the Fountain of Judgment, as here God displayed his displeasure against his prophet, and warned him that he should not enter the promised land, because he had not honored him in the eyes of Israel. Engl. version, EN-MISHPAL.

JUDITH, of Reuben, daughter of Merari, and widow of Manasseh, is celebrated for her beauty, and for the deliverance of Bethulia, when besieged by Holofernes. Being informed that Ozias had promised to deliver the town up, within five days, to Holofernes, she sent for Chabris and Carnis, elders of the people, and informed them of her purpose, but without explaining the mode by which it was to be effected. She then prayed, dressed herself in her best apparel, and pretending to have fled from the city, went over to the camp of Holofernes, and prostrated herself before him. As soon as he saw her, he was captivated, and, ordering her to be raised, assured her of protection.

of going out of the camp at night. On the fourth day, he sent Bagoas, his eunuch, to invite her to pass the night with him. Judith went, decorated with all her ornaments, and Holofernes was so transported, that he indulged largely in wine. In the evening, his servants retired, and Bagoas shut the chamber doors and departed. Holofernes, being overcome with drink, slept very soundly. Judith, therefore, placed her maid on the watch, and having put up her prayer to God, took down the general's sabre, and, having severed his head from his body, wrapped him up in the curtains of his bed, and, giving the head to her maid, directed her steps to Bethulia. The head of Holofernes being exhibited on the walls of the city, his army was seized with dismay ; and their defeat was so extraordinary, that the whole country was enriched with their spoils. The high-priest Jehoikim came from Jerusalem to Bethulia, to compliment Judith ; and every thing belonging to Holofernes was presented to her, and afterwards consecrated to the Lord. Having lived 105 years at Bethulia, and made her maid free, she died ; and was buried with her husband. All the people lamented for her seven days, and the day on which the victory was obtained was placed among the Hebrew festivals.

There is great difficulty relating to the time of this history. The Greek and Syriac seem to decide, that it was after the captivity of Babylon ; but the Vulgate may be explained as referring to a time preceding that captivity. To remove all difficulties, and answer all objections, seems impossible. Those who maintain that the history of Judith passed before the captivity, and in Manasseh's time, think it sufficient to demonstrate, that there is nothing in the narrative repugnant to this assertion. They suppose the Nabuchodonozor in the text to be the Saosduchius in Ptolemy ; that Arphaxad is the Phraortes of Herodotus ; that these two princes made war with one another in the twelfth year of Saosduchius ; that Arphaxad being overcome, Saosduchius sent Holofernes to reduce by force those who refused to acknowledge him for sovereign ; and that at this time Manasseh, then recently delivered from captivity, in Babylon, now dwelt at Jerusalem, concerning himself little with the government, but leaving it mostly to Joachim, or Eliakim, the high-priest. Supposing all this, there is nothing in it against the laws of history or chronology. The war between Nabuchodonozor and Arphaxad is placed A. M. 3347, the expedition and death of Holofernes in 3348. Manasseh was carried to Babylon in 3329. He returned some years afterwards, and died in 3361.

The opinion which places the history of Judith after the captivity of Babylon is founded principally on the authority of the Greek copy, which is certainly very ancient. This translation says in chap. iv. 2, "that the Israelites were newly returned from the captivity, and all the people of Judea were lately gathered together, and the vessels, and the altar, and the house, were sanctified after the profanation." Achior, general of the Ammonites, says the same to Holofernes : "They were destroyed in many battles very sore, and were led captives into a land that was not theirs ; but now they are returned to their God, and are come up from the places where they were scattered, and have possessed Jerusalem, where their sanctuary is." This last passage is taken from the Vulgate ; but the Greek adds, "And the temple of their God was overthrown ;" literally, reduced to the pavement, or trampled under foot, "and their cities were taken by the enemies, and they dwell again in the mountains which were not inhabited." It is in vain to endeavor to correct the sense of these passages; the bare reading of them naturally leads us to say, that this history was translated after the return from the captivity; and thus almost all the ancients, and many of the moderns, have believed. Eusebius places it in the reign of Cambyses; Syncellus in that of Xerxes; Sulpitius Severus in that of Ochus; others under Antiochus Epiphanes, and in the time of the Maccabees.

The last opinion, Calmet thinks, is the most easy to maintain. Grotius, and other learned writers, are of opinion that this book is rather a parabolical than a real history; (Praefatio ad Annotationes in Librum Judith;) and Prideaux almost gives up its authenticity, in consequence of the historical difficulties it involves.

JULIA, a female Christian, mentioned Rom. xvi. 15.

JULIAS, a name given by Philip to Bethsaida, in honor of Augustus's wife. See BETHSAIDA.

I. JULIUS CÆSAR, the first Roman emperor, had some connection with Jewish affairs, although he is not mentioned in the New Testament. He was the son of Lucius Cæsar and Aurelia, daughter of Cotta, and born in the year of Rome 654; 98 years before Jesus Christ. After having passed through the offices of tribune, quæstor, ædile, high-priest, and prætor or governor of Spain, he obtained the consulship in the year of Rome 695, and chose the government of Gaul, which he reduced into the form of a province, after nine or ten years of government. After the death of his daughter Julia, he went to war with Pompey, but when he entered Italy with his victorious army, he so terrified his enemies, that they fled. He set at liberty Aristobulus, king of Judea, and sent him with two legions to support his interests in Syria, Phœnicia, and Arabia. But Pompey's party found means to poison him by the way. Alexander, son of Aristobulus, had already levied troops in Syria, to join his father, but Pompey sent orders to Scipio in Syria, to have him killed, which was done. Passing into Egypt, Cæsar was shut up in Alexandria, with some troops, where he was very much embarrassed, and pressed by the Egyptian army. He therefore sent Mithridates into Syria and Cilicia, to procure succors; and Antipater, father of Herod the Great, who governed the high-priest Hircanus, prince of the Jews, engaged assistance for him. He himself marched into Egypt with 3000 men, and, joining Mithridates, they together attacked Pelusium, which they carried; and afterwards advanced towards Alexandria, where Antipater induced the Jews in the canton of Onion, to open the passages, and declare for Cæsar, who obtained a complete victory, and thus became master of Egypt. Cæsar always preserved a grateful recollection of the important service which Antipater had rendered him. He confirmed all the privileges of the Jews in Egypt, and caused a pillar to be erected, on which he ordered them all to be engraved, with the decree which confirmed them. As he passed through Palestine, Antigonus, son of Aristobulus, threw himself at his feet, and represented to him in a very affecting manner the death of his father and brother. The first had been poisoned, and the second beheaded, for supporting his interests. He desired to be restored to his father's principality, and also complained of the wrong done him by Antipater and Hircanus. Antipater, however, who was still in Cæsar's retinue, justified their conduct. In his fifth and last consulship, Cæsar permitted Hircanus to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, which Pompey had demolished. He was killed March 15, ante A.D. 54.

II. JULIUS, a centurion of the cohort of Augustus, to whom Festus, governor of Judea, committed Paul, to be conveyed to Rome. Julius had great regard for Paul, Acts xxvii. 1, &c. He suffered him to land at Sidon, and to visit his friends there; and in a subsequent part of the voyage he opposed the violence of the soldiers directed against the prisoners, generally, in order to save the apostle. When he delivered his charge to the custody of the chief captain of the guard, there can be no doubt but that his favorable report of the apostle contributed essentially to the indulgences he afterwards met with, and by which his imprisonment was greatly moderated.

JUNIA, or, as some copies read, JULIA, is joined with Andronicus, in Rom. xvi. 7, "Salute Andronicus and Junia, my kinsmen and fellow-prisoners, who are of note among the apostles."

JUSTICE is generally put for goodness, equity; that virtue which renders to every man his due. Sometimes for virtue and piety in general; or for the conjunction of all those virtues which make a good man, Ezek. xviii. 5—9. It branches out into so many significations, and is applied so differently to men and things, that it deserves peculiar and even anxious investigation. In general, it seems to refer to some rule, law, or standard, by which a quality, an intention, or an action, may be estimated. So Xenophon speaks of a car as being just, meaning, what it ought to be, fit for the use intended: and Pollux calls good and fertile land just, and barren land unjust. The same idea may be transferred to man. Hence one who fulfils the law is a just man; he answers the intention of the lawgiver. Cicero says, justice is used for conduct as it regards man, but piety is the proper term as referring to God; whence we may learn that the heathen acknowledged the impotence of man to equal what God had a right to expect; though man might be just toward his fellow man. Still, those who "hunger and thirst after righteousness;" who earnestly desire complete rectitude of heart and life; who endeavor after perfect conformity with the rule of action, as well in the sight of God as men, are pronounced blessed.

As parts of righteousness, or justice, due from man to man, single virtues are sometimes put for the whole; as truth, clemency, integrity, &c. So alms are a species of righteousness, that is, from man to man; so kindness and moderation, not pushing to the utmost, whether of strictness or severity, those demands which we have a right to make on others; or not pressing them unseasonably, or at all events; and in these respects, and the like, it may well be, that our Lord insists on the righteousness of his disciples surpassing that of the scribes and Pharisees, whom he frequently brands with the appellation of hypocrites.

It requires considerable skill in the Greek language to trace the correct import of this word in the several places where it occurs, either in its direct forms, or in collateral phraseology; and to distinguish when it is used in a more classical or in a more Hebraical sense:—not omitting its sacerdotal application, in various parts of holy writ.

We ought not to pass over a personification of the justice of God, rendered "vengeance" in our public version, but properly importing the power commissioned by the Deity to punish malefactors, the divine nemesis. The barbarians said among themselves, when they saw the viper fasten on the hand of Paul,

"No doubt this man is a murderer, whom, though he hath escaped the sea, yet justice, divine justice, suffereth not to live," Acts xxviii. 4; a sentiment which was founded in the nature of things, and in a deep sense of the divine government, and which was expressed in terms the evangelist has not scrupled to repeat.

JUSTIFICATION is a term which implies that the party has been, or is, charged with some matter of complaint, from which he vindicates himself, or is vindicated by another, either by producing proofs of his innocence, or of his having already suffered the penalty of that transgression; (autrefois acquit, of our lawyers;) or referring to some other person who has allegations on his behalf, which will effect his justification. Justification, then, is a law term, that was used in ancient times, and is greatly analogous to our term acquitted. When sinners are charged with their sins before God, they cannot in any wise prove their innocence, since they are accused of only bonâ fide crimes. They cannot say they have been formerly acquitted, in any other sense than by reference to an expected pardon through God's grace, and his proposals of mercy. Though some sins are evidently punished in this life, all are not, as is equally evident; but the allegations which may be offered by a mediator-party remain in full force. When an Israelite had transgressed against any divine law, he acknowledged his transgression, brought his sacrifice to the altar, confessed over it his fault, thereby symbolically transferring his guilt; and the victim was the substituted sufferer, which being sacrificially offered, the offerer had complied with the appointments of the law; so that should he be afterwards charged with that crime, he might plead autrefois acquit. But sacrifices were not in their nature capable of making absolute reconciliation between God and man; they could only refer to a nobler blood, which should accomplish that perfectly which they did imperfectly, should effectually vindicate the guilty from the consequences of their guilt, and should justify, when appealed to, from accusations of conscience, of the world, of human laws, or of the divine law, through the gracious acceptance of the divine Lawgiver.

I. JUSTUS, surnamed Barsabas, see JOSEPH.

II. JUSTUS, a Jew, who was at Rome with Paul (A. D. 62.) when he wrote to the Colossians. The apostle says that Jesus, called Justus, and Marcus, were his only fellow-workers unto the kingdom of God, Col. iv. 11.

JUTTAH, a city of Judah, (Josh. xv. 55.) which Calmet takes to be the Ithnam of Josh. xv. 23. Eusebius places it eight miles from Hebron, east.

K A T

KABZEEL, a city in the southern part of Judah, (Josh. xv. 21.) called Jekabseel, Neh. xi. 25.

KADESH, or KADESH-BARNEA, or EN-MISHPAT, (Gen. xiv. 7.) a city and desert around it, in the south-eastern border of the promised land, Numb. xxxiv. 4; Josh. xv. 3. Here Miriam died; (Numb. xx. 1.) and here Moses and Aaron, distrusting God's power, when they smote the rock at the waters of strife, were appointed to die without the satisfaction of entering the promised land, Numb. xxvii. 14. The king of Kadesh was killed by Joshua, (Josh. xii. 22.) and the city given to Judah. The situation of Kadesh has been fully treated of in the article EXODUS, p. 419.

KADMONITES, (Gen. xv. 19.) a tribe of people who inhabited the promised land east of the Jordan, about mount Hermon. They were descended from Canaan the son of Ham. Cadmus, the founder of Thebes in Bœotia, has been conjectured to have been originally a Kadmonite, and his wife Hermione to have been so named from mount Hermon. The Kadmonites, says Calmet, were Hivites: the word Hivites is derived from a root which signifies a serpent; and fable says, that Cadmus sowed serpents' teeth, from which sprung up armed men; because he settled at Thebes, his Hivites, or Kadmonites, who were valiant and martial.

I. KANAH, a brook on the borders of Ephraim and Manassah, (Josh. xvi. 8; xvii. 9.) which falls into the Mediterranean, a few miles south of Cesarea.

II. KANAH, a city of Asher, Josh. xix. 28.

KARKAA, a town on the southern confines of the tribe of Judah, Josh. xv. 3.

KATTATH, the limit of the tribe of Zebulun, (Josh. xix. 15.) in Judg. i. 39, called Kithron, which is the same in sense. The Vulgate, LXX, Syriac, and Arabic, render these names, which are from the same root, by small, trifling, insignificant things: the Chaldee to the same effect; whence the name of this city, perhaps, might be analogous to our name little-town, Littleton.

I. KEDAR, a region in the desert of the Agarenes, Gen. xxv. 13; 1 Chron. i. 29.

II. KEDAR, a city, as some think, called by Josephus, Camala, Isa. xlii. 11; lx. 7; Ezek. xxvii. 21; Ps. cxx. 5; Jer. ii. 10; xlix. 28.

III. KEDAR, a son of Ishmael, (Gen. xxv. 13.) the father of the Kedarenians, Cedrei, mentioned by Pliny, (H. N. v. 11.) who dwelt in the neighborhood of the Nabatheans, in Arabia Deserta. These people living in tents, it is not possible to show the place of their habitation, because they often changed it. Arabia Deserta is sometimes called Kedar; but the Kedarenians dwelt principally in the south of Arabia Deserta, or in the north of Arabia Petrea: there were some as far as the Red sea, Cant. i. 5; Isa. xlii. 11.

KEDEM, see EAST.

KEDEMAH, Ishmael's youngest son, who dwelt, as did his brethren, east of the mountains of Gilead, Gen. xxv. 15. The town of Kedemoth might at first, perhaps, belong to his descendants; but we cannot consider him as father of the Kadmonites; (Gen. xv. 19.) for these were ancient inhabitants of Canaan, and already powerful in the time of Abraham.

KEDEMOTH, a town of Reuben, east of the brook Arnon, (Josh. xiii. 18.) and one of the stations of the Hebrews in the wilderness; (Deut. ii. 26.) given to the sons of Merari, the Levite, 1 Chron. vi. 79. The name also included the desert around it.

I. KEDESH, a city in Judah, Josh. xv. 23.

II. KEDESH, a city in Naphtali, Josh. xii. 22; xix. 37; xxi. 32; Judg. iv. 6, 9; 1 Chron. vi. 76.

III. KEDESH, a city in Issachar, 1 Chron. vi. 72; called Kishion, Josh. xix. 20; xxi. 28.

IV. KEDESII NAPHITALI, called by Josephus Cadesa, or Cædesa, and in the Greek of Tobit (i. 2.) Cadis, lay in Upper Galilee, above Naasson, having Saphet to the north. It was given to Naphtali, and afterwards ceded to the Levites of Gershom's family, (Josh. xix. 37.) and became a city of refuge, Josh. xx. 7.

KEDRON, see KIDRON.

KEHELATHAH, an encampment of Israel in the wilderness, Numb. xxxiii. 22. As it appears to denote "the place of assembly," some have thought the gathering and revolt of Korah, Dathan and Abiram happened here.

KEILAH, a town of Judah, (Josh. xv. 44.) which Eusebius places seventeen miles from Eleutheropolis, on the side of Hebron; and Jerome eight miles from the late city. It is said that the prophet Habakkuk's tomb was shown there.

KEMUEL, the third son of Nahor, and father of the Syrians; or rather of Aram, Gen. xxii. 21. He had a son surnamed "the Syrian," or "the Aramite;" for the Syrians were really derived from Aram, a son of Shem. Kemuel may have given name to the Kamilites, a people of Syria lying west of the Euphrates.

KENATH, a town of Manasseh, beyond Jordan, (Numb. xxxii. 42.) named Nobah, after Nobah, an Israelite, had conquered it. Eusebius places it in the Trachonitis, about Bozra; and Pliny in the Decapolis, lib. v. cap. 18.

I. KENAZ, father of Othniel and Caleb, Josh. xv. 17; Judg. i. 13; iii. 9, &c.

II. KENAZ, the fourth son of Eliphaz, a duke, or chief, of Edom, Gen. xxxvi. 15.

KENI, a region of the Philistine country, 1 Sam. xxvii. 10; Judg. i. 16. "The children of the Kenite," should be, according to the LXX, "of Jethro, the Kenite."

KENITES, a people who dwelt west of the Dead sea, and extended themselves far into Arabia Petraea. Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, was a Kenite, and out of regard to him all of this tribe who submitted to the Hebrews were suffered to live in their own country. The rest fled, in all probability, to the Edomites and Amalekites. (See 1 Sam. xv. 6.) The lands of the Kenites were in Judah's lot. Balaam, when invited by Balak to curse Israel, stood on a mountain, whence, addressing himself to the Kenites, he said, "Strong is thy dwelling-place, and thou puttest thy nest in a rock; nevertheless the Kenite shall be wasted until Ashur shall carry thee away captive," Numb. xxiv. 21. They were carried into captivity by Nebuchadnezzar.

KENIZZITES, an ancient people of Canaan, whose land God promised to the descendants of Abraham, (Gen. xv. 19.) and who dwelt, it is thought, in Idumæa. Kenaz, son of Eliphaz, probably took his name from the Kenizzites, among whom he settled.

KETURAH, Abraham's second wife, (Gen. xxv. 1, 2.) is thought by the Jews to be the same as Hagar. We know nothing of her, except as the mother of Zimran, Jokshan, Medan, Midian, Ishbak, and Shuah. Abraham gave presents to these, and sent them east into Arabia Deserta.

KEY, an instrument frequently mentioned in Scripture, as well in a natural as in a figurative sense. The keys of the ancients were very different from ours; because their doors and trunks were generally closed with bands, and the key served only to loosen or fasten those bands. Chardin says, that a lock in the East is like a little harrow, which enters half way into a wooden staple, and that the key is a wooden handle, with points at the end of it, which are pushed into the staple, and so raise this little harrow. A key was a symbol of power or authority. Isa. xxii. 22, "And the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder: he shall open and none shall shut; he shall shut and none shall open," i. e. he shall be grand master and principal officer of his prince's house. Christ gives Peter authority in his church, (Matt. xvi. 19.) the key of the kingdom of heaven, the power of binding and loosing; that is, of opening and shutting; for this frequently consisted only, as we have said, in tying and untying. Isaiah remarks, that Eliakim should wear his key upon his shoulder, as a mark of office, of his power to open and shut with authority. Callimachus says, that Ceres carried a key upon her shoulder; a custom which appears very strange to us; but the ancients had large keys in the form of a sickle, and which, from their weight and shape, could not otherwise be carried conveniently.

Christ reproaches the scribes and Pharisees with having taken away the key of knowledge; (Luke xi. 52.) that is, with reading and studying the Scriptures, without advantage to themselves, and without discovering to others the truth; which in some sort they held captive in unrighteousness, Rom. i. 18. He also says (Rev. i. 18.) that he has the key of death and hell; that is, power to bring to the grave, or to deliver from it; to appoint to life or to death. The rabbins say, that God has reserved to himself four keys; the key of rain, the key of the grave, the key of fruitfulness, and the key of barrenness.

KEZIZ, a valley, and perhaps a city, in Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 21.

KIBEROTH-AVAH, or KIBEROTH-HATTA'AVAH, the graves of lust, was one of the encampments of Israel in the wilderness, where they desired of God flesh for their sustenance, declaring they were tired of manna, Numb. xi. 34, 35. Quails were sent in great quantities, but while the meat was in their mouths, (Ps. lxxviii. 30.) God smote so great a number of them, that the place was called the graves of those who lusted.

KIBZAIM, a city of Ephraim, (Josh. xxi. 22.) but as the name is in the dual form, it is probable there were two cities comprehended under it, adjoining each other.

KID, see LAMB.

KIDRON, a brook in the valley east of Jerusalem, between the city and the mount of Olives, and which discharges itself along the valley of Jehoshaphat, and winding between rugged and desolate hills through the wilderness of St. Saba, into the Dead sea. It has generally but little water, and often none; but after storms, or heavy rains, it swells, and runs with much impetuosity. A branch of the valley of Kidron was the sink of Jerusalem, and here Asa, Hezekiah, and Josiah burnt the idols and abominations of the apostate Jews, 2 Kings xxiii. 4. (See GEHENNA.) The blood poured out at the foot of the altar in the temple, as well as other filth, ran by a drain into the brook Kidron; a fact which confutes the notion, that virtue was imparted to the pool of Bethesda from the blood of the sacrifices, as some have supposed. (Babyl. Jom. 58. 2.)

KINAH, a town of Judah, Josh. xv. 22.

KINGDOM OF HEAVEN is an expression used in the New Testament, to signify the reign, dispenation, or administration, of Jesus Christ. The ancient prophets, when describing the characters of the Messiah, scarcely ever failed to use the name of king or deliverer; so that when they spoke of his humiliations and sufferings, they interspersed hints of his power, his reign, and his divinity. Thus Zachariah, foretelling his entry into Jerusalem, says, "Behold, thy King cometh unto thee. He is just, and having salvation, lowly and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass." The Jews and the apostles, accustomed to this way of speaking, expected the kingdom of the Messiah to resemble that of a temporal king, exercising power on his enemies, restoring the Hebrew monarchy, and the throne of David to all its splendor; subduing the nations, and rewarding his friends and faithful servants, in proportion to their fidelity and services. Hence the contests among the apostles about precedence in his kingdom; and hence the sons of Zebedee desired the two chief places in it. Jesus, to prove that he was the true Messiah, often declared, that the kingdom of heaven was at hand, or was come; and when he spoke of what was to happen after his resurrection, he said, such a thing would be seen in the kingdom of heaven. He frequently began his parables, "The kingdom of heaven is like unto—a rich man—a father of a family—a treasure," &c.

"The kingdom of heaven" sometimes denotes eternal bliss, (Matt. vii. 21; xix. 14.) and sometimes, and more frequently, the church of Christ, Matt. xiii. 47, 48. [Our Saviour designates usually by the phrase kingdom of heaven, the community of those, who, united through his Spirit under him, as their Head, rejoice in the truth, and enjoy a holy and blissful life, in communion with him. R.]

THE KINGDOM OF GOD is often synonymous with the kingdom of heaven; but in the Old Testament the kingdom, or reign, of God, signifies his infinite power, or, more properly, his sovereign authority over all creatures, kingdoms, and hearts. Wisdom says, (x. 10.) God showed his kingdom to Jacob; i. e. he opened the kingdom of heaven to him in showing him the mystic ladder by which the angels ascended and descended; and Ecclesiasticus (xlvii. 13.) says, God gave to David the covenant assurance, or promise of the kingdom, for himself and his successors.

KING. The Israelites had no kings till Saul; having been governed, first, by elders, as in Egypt; then by rulers of God's appointment, as Moses and Joshua; then by judges, as Othniel, Ehud, Shamgar, Gideon, Jephthah, Samson, Eli, Samuel; and lastly, by kings, as Saul, David, Solomon. For the succession of the kings, see the CHRONOLOGICAL TABLES.

After their return from captivity, (A. M. 3468,) the Jews lived under the dominion of the Persians 140 years, till Alexander the Great, who came to Jerusalem, 3672. After his death, (3681,) Judea submitted to the kings of Egypt, and then to the kings of Syria; but Antiochus Epiphanes having forced them to take arms for the defence of their religion, in 3836, the Maccabees recovered by degrees their ancient liberty, and lived independent, from the government of John Hircanus, in 3874, till Judea was reduced into a province by the Romans.

In Scripture, the word king does not always imply the same degree of power, or importance; neither does it imply the magnitude of the dominion or territory of this national officer. Many persons are called kings in Scripture, whom we should rather denominate chiefs or leaders; and many single towns, or towns with their adjacent villages, are said to have had kings. Being unaware of this lower sense of the word king, many persons have been embarrassed by the passage, Deut. xxxiii. 4, 5, "Moses commanded us a law—he was king in Jeslurun," or king among the upright; i. e. he was the principal among the assembly of the heads of the Israelites. He was the chief, the leader, the guide of his people, fulfilling the duties of a king, though not king in the same sense as David or Solomon. This also explains Gen. xxxiv. 31, "These kings reigned in Edom, before there reigned any king over the children of Israel: for Moses, though he was king in an inferior sense, yet did not reign, in the higher sense, over the children of Israel," the constitution not being monarchical under him. These remarks will remove the surprise which some persons have felt, at seeing that so small a country as Canaan contained thirty-one kings, who were conquered, (Josh. xii. 9—24.) beside many who, no doubt, escaped the arms of Joshua. Adonizedek, himself no very powerful king, mentions seventy kings, whom he had subdued and mutilated. (See also 1 Kings iv. 20.)

Idolatrous nations, and even the Hebrews, sometimes called their gods kings; thus, Moloch, Milchom, Adramelech, and Anamelech, are names of deities importing the title of king. The words of Isaiah, (xxxvii. 13.) "Where is the king of Hamath, and the king of Arphad, and the king of the city of Sepharvaim, Henah, and Ivah?" seem parallel to those of chap. xxxvi. 19, "Where are the gods of Hamath and Arphad? Where are the gods of Sepharvaim?" In Amos i. 15, God threatens Milchom, the god of the Moabites, with sending him and his princes into captivity. In Scripture, God is called in every page almost, the king of the Hebrews. See HEBREWS (government.)

KING is used metaphorically by Job, (chap. xviii. 14.) "the king of terrors;" i. e. death; the ruler, the supreme of terrors. So chap. xli. 34, "The Leviathan is king; i. e. chief, principal, superior over all the children of pride;" those who most pride themselves on their stations, or qualities, are nevertheless compelled to acknowledge, that the Leviathan is their superior; and to refrain from comparing, or equaling, their powers to those of that tyrant of the waters. The word is also used figuratively by our Lord: (John xviii. 37.) Pilate said, "Art thou a king then?" Jesus answered, "Thou sayest," thou exprest what is the fact; I am a king, but not of this world. Accordingly, in Rev. i. 15, we read of Jesus Christ the prince of the kings of the earth, i. e. superior to all earthly monarchs;—and in 1 Tim. i. 17, of "The King eternal, immortal;" and again, (vi. 15.) "Our Lord Jesus Christ, the blessed and only potentate: King of kings and Lord of lords." See also Rev. xvii. 14. This application of the title "king" to our Saviour, subjected the primitive Christians to many inconveniences; as appears, among other places, from Acts xvii. 7, where they are accused of acting, "contrary to the decree of Cæsar, saying, there is another king, one Jesus."

KING sometimes signifies government, such as a king usually exercises; even though it be not conducted under one person. Rev. xvii. 10, "There are (rather, have been) seven kings—forms of government; five are fallen, one is; the other is not come;" so ver. 12.

We may now proceed to give an account of the person and office, with other circumstances connected with the Hebrew kings.

It appears to have been a maxim of the Hebrew law, that the person of the king was inviolable, whatever his character may have been, 1 Sam. xxiv. 5—8; 2 Sam. i. 14. We have already seen, that by the law of Moses the Israelitish monarchy was to be hereditary, and the history of the Jews shows that this law was strictly attended to. Nevertheless, it appears from the history of David, that the succession did not necessarily go by the right of primogeniture, for he appointed Solomon as his successor, in preference to Adonijah, his elder brother. In this the people yielded to the will of the king; and that the subjects really considered the right as inherent in him, appears the more clearly from the circumstance, that David at the time he caused Solomon to be anointed, was scarcely more than nominally king, while Adonijah, his eldest son, had Joab, the commander-in-chief of the army, on his side. No sooner, however, was the king's mandate made known, than it was obeyed, and Solomon seated on the throne. This right, exercised by David in a matter undetermined by the Mosaic laws, and which he probably derived from a capitulation, wherein the Israelites, from their great partiality to him, acceded to his wishes, in order to have rather the best than the eldest of his sons for their king, seems to have been the great cause of all the commotions which arose during his reign. His first-born son was Amnon, whom Absalom despatched, probably not so much to revenge the disgrace of his beloved sister, Tamar, as to become eldest son himself. As soon as he was so, and had regained his father's favor, he set on foot a rebellion; because he saw that he had otherwise no chance of succeeding to the throne, from the preference his father gave to Solomon. He was slain in battle: and then the eldest son, Adonijah, formed in his father's old age a fresh conspiracy, in order to become king. From all this it is plain, that such a despotic right as allows a king thus to determine his successor arbitrarily, and not according to an invariable law, is extremely prejudicial to his own curiosity, as well as to the peace of the state. After David's time, we find none of the kings exercising it; because probably it had been altered, from an observation of its unhappy effects.

The inauguration of the king next demands our attention. The first thing in this pompous ceremony was the anointing. Godwyn, following the Talmudical rabbins, asserts, that all kings were not anointed, but those only in whom the succession was broken; and then the first of the family was anointed for his successors, except in cases of dissension, where there was required a renewed unction, for the confirmation of his authority. There can be little doubt, however, that all the kings were anointed; hence, king and anointed seem to have been used as synonymous terms, 1 Sam. ii. 10; 2 Sam. i. 14, 21. This anointing was sometimes performed privately by a prophet, (1 Sam. x. 1; xvi. 1—13; 1 Kings xix. 16; 2 Kings ix. 1—6.) and was a symbolical prediction that the person so anointed would, at some future period, ascend the throne. After the monarchy was established, this unction was performed by a priest, (1 Kings i. 39.) at first in some public place, (1 Kings i. 32—34.) and afterwards, in the temple, the monarch elect being surrounded by his guards, 2 Kings xi. 12, 13; 2 Chron. xiii. Some are of opinion that he was at the same time girded with a sword, Ps. xlv. 3. The manner of performing this ceremony appears to have been by pouring the oil upon the head, 1 Sam. x. 1; 2 Kings ix. 6. From these passages it appears probable, that the kings were anointed in the same plentiful manner, at their coronation, as the priests were; the ointment, or oil, was poured upon the head in such a quantity, as to run down upon the beard, and even to the skirts of the garment, Ps. cxxxiii. 2. The next step was to place the diadem, or crown, upon the sovereign's head, and the sceptre in his hand. To the former of these there is an allusion in Ps. xxi. 3, "Thou preventest him (the king) with the blessings of thy goodness; thou settest a crown of pure gold on his head;" and also in Ezek. xxi. 26, and to the latter in Ps. xlv. 6, "Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever; the sceptre of thy kingdom is a right sceptre." It appears to have been the custom of the Jewish kings, as well as those of the neighboring nations, to wear the crown constantly when they were dressed. Saul had a crown or diadem when slain at the battle of Gilboa, (2 Sam. i. 10,) as also the king of the Ammonites, when he headed his army in battle, 2 Sam. xii. 30. When the diadem was placed on the head of the monarch, he entered into a solemn covenant with his subjects, that he would govern according to the law; (2 Sam. v. 3; 1 Chron. xi. 3.) after which the nobles pledged themselves to obedience, and confirmed the pledge with the kiss of homage, or, as the Jews call it, the kiss of majesty, 1 Sam. x. 1. This ceremony is probably alluded to in the following passage of the psalmist, "Kiss the Son, lest he be angry," &c. (Ps. ii. 12.) that is, acknowledge him as your king, pay him homage, and yield him subjection. Loud acclamations, accompanied with music, then followed, after which the king entered the city, 1 Kings i. 39, 40; 2 Kings xi. 12, 19; 2 Chron. xxiii. 11. To this practice there are numerous allusions both in the Old Testament (Ps. xlvii. 2—9; xcvii. 1; xcix. 9, &c.) as well as in the New; (Matt. xxi. 9, 10; Mark xi. 9, 10; Luke xix. 35, 38.) in which last cited passages the Jews, by welcoming our Saviour in the same manner as their kings were formerly, manifestly acknowledged him to be the Messiah whom they expected.

The ceremonies attending the inauguration of a king among the Abyssinians have evidently been derived from the Hebrews. Of one considerable part of this ceremony, however, we find no direct mention made as forming part of the installation of Hebrew monarchs, although there certainly appears to be some allusions to such a practice in Psalm xxiv. and xlv.

"On the 18th of March, (according to their account, the day of our Saviour's first coming to Jerusalem,) this festival began. All the great officers, all the officers of state, and the court, then present, were every one dressed in the richest and gayest manner, nor was the other sex behind-hand in the splendor of their appearance. The king, dressed in crimson damask, with a great chain of gold about his neck, his head bare, mounted on a horse richly caparisoned, advanced at the head of his nobility, passed the outer court, and came to the paved way before the church. Here he was met by a number of young girls, daughters of the Umbares, or supreme judges, together with many noble virgins standing on the right and left of the court. Two of the noblest of these held in their hands a crimson cord of silk, somewhat thicker than a common whipeord, but of a looser texture, stretched across from one company to another, as if to shut up the road by which the king was approaching the church. When this cord was prepared and drawn tight, about breast-high, by the girls, the king entered, advancing at a moderate pace, curveting, and showing the management of his horse. He was stopped by the tension of the string, while the damsels on each side, asking who he was, were answered, 'I am your king, the king of Ethiopia.' To which they replied, with one voice, 'You shall not pass, you are not our king.' The king then retires some paces, and then presents himself as to pass, and the cord is again drawn across this way by the young women, so as to prevent him; and the question again repeated, 'Who are you?' The king answered, 'I am your king, the king of Israel.' But the damsels resolved, even on this second attack, not to surrender but upon their own terms: they again answer, 'You shall not pass; you are not our king.' The third time, after retiring, the king advances with a pace and air more determined; and the cruel virgins, again presenting the cord, and asking who he is, he answers, 'I am your king, the king of Sion;' and drawing his sword, cuts the silk asunder. Immediately upon this, the young women cry, 'It is a truth, you are our king; truly you are the king of Sion.' Upon which they begin to sing Hallelujah, and in this they are joined by the court and army on the plain; fire-arms are discharged, drums and trumpets sound; and the king, amidst these acclamations and rejoicings, advances to the foot of the stair of the church, where he dismounts, and there sits down upon a stone, which, by its remains, was apparently an altar of Anubis, or the dog-star. At his feet there is a large slab of freestone, on which is the inscription mentioned by Poulet.

"The king is first anointed, then crowned, and is accompanied half up the steps by the singing priests, called Dipteras, chanting hymns and psalms. Here he stops at a hole, made for the purpose, in one of the steps, and there is fumigated with incense and myrrh, aloe and cassia: divine service is then celebrated; and, after receiving the sacrament, he returns to the camp, where fourteen days should be regularly spent in feasting, and all manner of rejoicing, and military exercise. After the king comes the Norbit, or keeper of the book of the law in Axum, supposed to represent Azarias, the son of Zadock; then the twelve Umbares, or supreme judges, who, with Azarias, accompany Menilek, the son of Solomon, when he brought the book of the law from Jerusalem, and these are supposed to represent the twelve tribes. After these follow the Albuna at the head of the priests, and the Itcheque at the head of the monks; then the whole court, who pass through the aperture made by the division of the silk which remains still upon the ground. The king then gives and receives presents, according to established custom and value; of which a list is kept." (Bruce.)

This extract will, if we mistake not, serve to illustrate the forty-fifth Psalm, where the writer speaks of things "touching the king." He is thus represented as in great splendor, magnificently dressed, his sword girded on his thigh, mounted on horseback, equipped with the bow, &c. anointed with the oil of gladness above his fellows, his garments smelling with myrrh, aloe, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces, (curious inlaid boxes of ivory,) the virgins—"kings' daughters," on his one side, and his consort on the other, the rich and honorable presenting gifts, and the acclamations and rejoicing of the people.

The apparel of the Jewish monarchs was rich and splendid. Hence our Saviour, speaking of the beauty which God had imparted to the lilies of the field, remarks, "Even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." Josephus and the rabbins assert, that the robes of the Jewish kings were white; this, however, wants better support than their criticisms upon the word λευκός, which is applied by the Greek writers to any gay color. Xenophon applies the word to such as are clothed in purples, or who are adorned with bracelets and jewels, and splendidly dressed. It is much more probable that the king's robes were made of purple and fine white linen, Esth. viii. 15; Luke xvi. 19. The royal diadem was made most probably of gold, the shape of which resembled those worn by the ancient Romans, and was inlaid with precious stones, 2 Sam. xii. 30; Zech. vi. 11. Nor was the throne less magnificent. That of Solomon was made of ivory, overlaid with fine gold, raised on six steps, and adorned with the images of lions, 1 Kings xi. 18—20. In noticing the state and grandeur of the Jewish monarchs, we must not omit mentioning their attendants and guards; particularly the Cherethites and Pelethites, of whom there is frequent mention in the histories of David and Solomon. That they were soldiers, appears from their making part of David's army, when he marched out of Jerusalem on occasion of Absalom's rebellion; (2 Sam. xv. 18.) and likewise when they were sent against the rebel, Sheba the son of Bichri, chap. xx. 7. That they were a distinct class from the common soldiers, is evident from their having a peculiar commander, and not being under Joab the general of the army, 2 Sam. viii. 16, 18. They seem, therefore, to have been the king's body-guard, like the prætorian band among the Romans. These guards appear to have been skilful archers. The Chaldee paraphrase every where calls them archers and slingers. Their number may probably be gathered from the targets and shields of gold, which Solomon made for his guards; which were five hundred, 1 Kings x. 16, 17, compared with 2 Chron. xii. 9—11.

The eastern monarchs, and indeed the whole of their great men, were never approached but with presents. This is particularly noticed by Solomon: "A man's gift maketh room for him, and bringeth him before great men," Prov. xviii. 16. Thus the sons of Jacob were instructed to carry a present to Joseph when they went down to Egypt, to buy food, (Gen. xliii. 11, 26.) and in like manner, the Magi who came from the East to worship Christ, brought him gold, frankincense, and myrrh, Matt. ii. 11. It was also usual to pay them the most marked respect, by prostrations to the ground, Gen. xxxvii. 10; 1 Sam. xxiv. 8; 2 Sam. xiv. 4. Morier informs us, that a similar practice obtains amongst the Persians at the present day: "As soon as we approached the throne of the Christian emperor," says Brands, "we were obliged to kneel down, and slowly to bow our heads to the ground." Ovington tells us that "the mark of respect which is paid to the kings in the East approaches very near to adoration. The manner of saluting the great mogul is, to touch with the hand first the earth, then the heart, and then to lift it above, which is repeated three times in succession as you approach him." The last honors paid the king were at his death. The royal corpse, it is said, was carried by nobles to the sepulchre, though it were at a considerable distance. However this be, we read of public mourning observed for good kings, 2 Chron. xxxv. 24; Jer. xxii. 18; xxxiv. 5. Yet, notwithstanding all this royal state and grandeur, they were only God's viceroys, bound to govern according to the statute-law of the land, which they, as well as their subjects, were required to obey.

The king was forbidden keeping a large body of cavalry, or an immoderate number of horses. These were unnecessary for the defence of Palestine, being a mountainous country, and could only be resorted to for the purpose of conquest, than which nothing could be more opposed to the views of the divine Lawgiver. The king is forbidden "multiplying wives to himself, that his heart turn not away," (Deut. xvii. 17.) but no law was less observed than this. (See 2 Sam. iii. 2—8; v. 13; ii. 8; xv. 16, &c.) He was likewise forbidden "greatly to multiply to himself silver and gold," (Deut. xvii. 17.) lest he should make himself absolute and despotic. This prohibition, however, did not extend to the formation of a public treasury, or of one appropriated to the service of the sanctuary and tabernacle. It only lay against the king amassing treasures for his own use alone, lest he should employ them as engines of despotism, and for crushing the liberties of the people. In order that the monarch might not be ignorant of religion and of the Israelitish law, he was commanded to have by him a copy of the law carefully taken from the Levitical exemplars, and to read it daily, Deut. xvii. 18. Nor was a knowledge of the law enough; he was to govern by it, (Deut. xvii. 19, also 1 Kings xxi. 1—16.) and to rule his subjects with lenity and kindness, not as slaves but as brethren, Deut. xvii. 20.

Besides this original and fundamental law, a special capitulation was sworn to by the kings of Israel, 1 Sam. x. 25; 2 Sam. v. 3. Their power had, nevertheless, a tendency to despotism. They had the right of making war and concluding peace; they had not only the power of life and death, but could, on particular occasions, put criminals to death, without the formalities of justice, (1 Sam. xxi. 11—19; xxii. 17, 18; 2 Sam. i. 5—15, &c.) though they generally administered judges, duly constituted, to hear and determine causes in their name, 1 Chron. xxiii. 4; xxvi. 29—32. In Jerusalem there might probably be superior courts, wherein David's sons presided, (see Ps. exxii. 5.) but no mention is made of a supreme tribunal erected in that city earlier than the reign of Jehoshaphat, 2 Chron. xix. 8—11. It was composed of priests and heads of families, and had two presidents, one in the person of the high-priest, and another who sat in the name of the king. Although the kings enjoyed the privilege of granting pardons to offenders at their pleasure, and in ecclesiastical affairs exercised great power, sometimes deposing or condemning to death even the high-priest himself; (1 Sam. xxii. 17, 18; 1 Kings ii. 26, 27.) and at other times reforming great abuses in religion; yet this power was enjoyed by them not as absolute sovereigns in their own right, but as the viceroys of Jehovah, who was the sole Legislator of Israel.

Concerning the royal revenues, Moses left no ordinances, having appointed no king; the following particulars may be collected as the sources of these revenues from the writings of the Old Testament:—(1.) Voluntary offerings, or presents, which were made conformably to the oriental custom, Gen. xxiii. 11—25; 1 Sam. ix. 27; xvi. 20. This was the most ancient source of the king's revenue, and was probably abolished by David. (2.) One tenth part of all the produce of all the fields and vineyards, was given to the king. There is an allusion in Mal. i. 8, and Neh. v. 18, to the custom of paying dues in kind to government, which obtains to this day in Abyssinia. (3.) The produce of the royal demesnes, consisting of arable lands, vineyards, olive and sycamore grounds, &c. which had originally been unenclosed and uncultivated, or were the property of state criminals confiscated to the sovereign; these demesnes were cultivated by bondsmen, and perhaps also by the people of conquered countries, (1 Chron. xxvii. 26—31; 2 Chron. xxvi. 10.) and it appears from 1 Sam. viii. 14; xxii. 7. and Ezek. xlvi. 17, that the kings assigned part of their domains to their servants in lieu of salary. (4.) To the cultivation of their demesnes, the kings must have required bond services; and accordingly we find these mentioned by Samuel among the royal rights established by use among the neighboring nations, 1 Sam. viii. 12, 16. These services seem to have been increased by Solomon, (1 Kings v. 17, 18.) and it was probably Rehoboam's having refused to lessen them that gave occasion first to the complaints, and then to the rebellion, of the ten tribes against him. (5.) Another source of the king's revenue was the produce of the royal flocks. The Arabian deserts being common to the king and his subjects, for the pasturage of cattle, they did not neglect to take advantage of this privilege, but kept large herds of oxen, sheep, goats, asses and camels there, 1 Chron. xxxvii. 29—31. (6.) Michaëlis is of opinion that a passage in Amos (viii. 1.) refers to a royal right of mowing the pastures. If this be correct, the kings must have arrogated, at this time, the right of cutting the first and best grass of the public pastures, leaving only the after-growth to the Israelitish herdsmen. (7.) Not only did the most considerable part of the plunder of the conquered nations flow into the royal treasury, (2 Sam. viii.) but the latter also paid tributes, which were imposed on them partly in money and partly in agricultural produce, 1 Kings iv. 21; Ps. lxxii. 10. It is probable, from 1 Kings x. 14, that the Israelites also paid a tax in money. (8.) Lastly, Solomon discovered a source of revenue entirely new to the Israelitish monarchs, and which must have been very productive. As the Mosaic law did not encourage foreign commerce for the subject, it became an object of attention to the crown. Michaëlis is of opinion that Africa was circumnavigated by Solomon's fleets; be this as it may, it is certain that he carried on a most extensive and lucrative trade in gold, silver, Egyptian horses, and the byssus or fine linen of Egypt, 1 Kings x. 22, 28, 29. The foreign merchants, who carried on other branches of trade, and passed through the dominions of Solomon, paid him customs, which afforded a considerable revenue to that monarch, 1 Kings x. 15.

KINGS, BOOKS OF. The Vulgate has four books under this name, viz. the two Books of Samuel and those of Kings, as they stand in the English version, and also in the Hebrew Bibles. Under this name the Greeks cite them all four as the Books of Kingdoms, the Latins as the Books of Kings.

The First Book of Kings, i. e. the First Book of Samuel, in the English Bible, contains the history of 100 years: from the birth of Samuel, A. M. 2849, to the death of Saul, in 2949. It comprises an account of the birth of Samuel, the war between the Philistines and Hebrews, in which the ark of the Lord was taken; the death of Eli, the high-priest, and of his sons Hophni and Phinehas; the restoration of the ark by the Philistines; Samuel's being acknowledged judge of Israel; Saul's election to be king, his successful beginning, his wars and victories; his rejection; the anointing of David, his valor, his misfortunes, his flight; the war between the Philistines and Saul, with the death of that prince.

of Samuel in the English Bible, contains the history of 39 years; from the second anointing of David at Hebron, A. M. 2949, to 2988, in which David appointed Solomon to be his successor, two years before his death, in 2990. It includes an account of David's being acknowledged king by the tribe of Judah, while the other tribes of Israel obeyed Ishbosheth, son of Saul. Ishbosheth being killed seven years afterwards, (2956,) David was acknowledged king of all Israel. He received the royal unction a third time; took Jerusalem from the Jebusites; brought back the ark from Kirjath-jearim to the city of David, and defeated the Philistines, Moabites, Syrians, and Edomites, on several occasions. Hanun, king of the Ammonites, having insulted David's ambassadors, he made war on Hanun's country, and subjected it. During this war David lived with Bathsheba, and procured the murder of Uriah; Nathan reproved him for his adultery and murder; David repented; but God punished him by the rebellion of Absalom. After this contest, in which his unnatural son perished miserably, David, being quiet in his dominions, ordered the people to be numbered. The Lord punished his curiosity with a plague. Lastly, David prepared every thing necessary for the erection of the temple.

The Third Book of Kings, or the First in the English Bible, comprises the history of 126 years, from Solomon's anointing, A. M. 2989, to the death of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, in 3115. It gives an account of Adonijah's aiming at the crown, of Solomon's association with David in the throne, of David's death, of the deaths of Adonijah, Joab, and Shimei; of the building the temple by Solomon; of his riches, wisdom, reputation, fall, and death; of his son Rehoboam's alienating the minds of the Israelites; of the separation of the ten tribes, and of their choice of Jeroboam for their king; of Rehoboam's successors, Abijah, Asa, and Jehoshaphat, who died A. M. 3115; and of Jeroboam's successors, Nadab, Baasha, Elah, Zimri, Omri, Tibni, Ahab, and Ahaziah, who died in 3108.

The Fourth Book of Kings, or the Second in the English Bible, includes the history of 227 years; from the death of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, and the beginning of Jehoram in 3115, to the beginning of the reign of Evilmerodach, king of Babylon, who delivered Jehoniah out of prison in 3443.

In the kingdom of Judah we find a few pious princes among many who were corrupt. Jehoshaphat was succeeded by Jehoram, Ahaziah, Athaliah, Joash, Amaziah, Uzziah, or Azariah, Jotham, Ahaz, Hezekiah, Manasseh, Amon, Josiah, Jehoahaz, Eliakim, or Jehoiakim, Jehoniah, or Jehoiachin, Mattaniah, or Zedekiah, in whose reign Jerusalem was taken by the Chaldeans, the temple burnt, and the people carried to Babylon, A. M. 3416. After this we read of the sad death of Gedaliah, whom the Chaldeans had left in the country to govern the remains of the people; of their retreat into Egypt, and the favor shown by Evilmerodach, king of Babylon, to Jehoiachin, or Jehoniah, king of Judah, whom he took out of prison, and placed in his palace. In the interval God raised up many prophets in Judah; as Iddo, Ahijah, Shemaiah, Hanani, Azariah, Jehu, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Zephaniah, Huldah, Micah, Joel, &c. The fourth book of Kings has preserved several particulars of the lives of these great men, as well as of the prophets who lived at the same time in the kingdom of Israel, or the ten tribes. This book presents a long succession of wicked princes in the kingdom of Israel—Ahaziah, Jehoram son of Ahab Jehu, Jehoahaz, Joash, Jeroboam, Zachariah, Shallum, Menahem, Pekaiah, Pekah, Hosea son of Elah, in whose reign Samaria was taken by Salmanezzer, and the ten tribes carried captive into Assyria. Several eminent prophets are named during this interval in the kingdom of the ten tribes; as Iddo, Oded, Ahijah, Elisha, Hosea, Amos, Jonah, &c.

As to the author or authors of the four books of Kings, critics are not agreed. Many ascribe the first two to Samuel, whose name we find in their titles in the Hebrew. The Jews assign him only twenty-seven chapters in the first book, which include the history of his life, and a recital of the actions of Saul and David, while Samuel was living; the rest they believe was continued by Gad and Nathan, according to 1 Chron. xxix. 29. This opinion is very probable; notwithstanding that we find certain remarks, which do not properly belong to the time of Samuel, or the time of Nathan: e. g. it is said, 1 Sam. iii. 1. that while Samuel was living, "prophecy was rare in Israel;" which intimates, that when the author wrote, it was more frequent. 1 Sam. xiv. 23, Bethel is called Bethaven, or "the House of Iniquity;" a name not given to it till Jeroboam had set up one of his golden calves there. The author observes also on David's invading the Geshurites and Gezrites, that "this country of old was well peopled, from Shur even unto the land of Egypt;" (1 Sam. xxvii. 8.) that is, it was so in David's time, but not when the author was living. In 1 Sam. ix. 9, they who formerly were called seers, were in his time termed nabi, or prophets. Now in Samuel's time the name of seer was common; the author, therefore, of these books is later than that prophet. He speaks of Samuel as of a person dead long before, and praises him, 1 Sam. xxviii. 3. He observes that the city of Ziklag belonged to the kings of Judah, ever since the cession of it by Achish to David; (1 Sam. xxvii. 6.) which remark must have been made after the separation of the kingdoms of Judah and Israel; and shows the writer to have lived not only after Samuel, but after David and Solomon.

From several other observations of this nature, some have concluded, that David, Hezekiah, Jeremiah, or Ezra, compiled these books from memoirs composed in the time of Samuel and the prophets, of David and Solomon; and if we compare the different characters of the books, we shall on one side see that circumstances, facts, and remarks, are mostly the same; while the uniformity of the style, and the course of the narration, prove that they both had one author, who was contemporary with the persons of whom he speaks. On the other side, however, there are circumstances which support the opinion, that a later writer revised them, and added some particulars, and certain terms, intended to explain what the distance of time had rendered obscure. Now, if we suppose that Ezra, an inspired author, had in his hands original writings of Samuel, and the ancient writers of Saul and David's times, that he digested them into order, and connected them, all difficulties are easily solved, and the seeming contradictions are reconciled. That these works are authentic and canonical it is not disputed: both the Jewish and the Christian church unanimously receive them as inspired Scripture; and Christ quotes them in the Gospel, Matt. xii. 3; Mark ii. 25; Luke vi. 3. There are much the same remarks to be made with relation to the third and fourth books of Kings. Some have imagined that David, Solomon and Hezekiah wrote the history of their own reigns. Others, that the prophets who lived under their government, in Israel and Judah, took this office upon them; as Isaiah and Jeremiah, Gad and Nathan. We know that several of the prophets wrote the lives of those kings who reigned in their times; and the names and writings of these prophets are mentioned in several places of the books of Kings and Chronicles. Besides, the memoirs and annals of the kings of Judah and Israel are cited in almost every chapter, and these included the particulars of those princes' actions, of which the sacred books have handed down only summaries and abridgments.

It must be admitted, therefore, that two descriptions of writers were concerned in the books of Kings. (1.) Those original, primitive and contemporary authors, who wrote the annals, journals and memoirs of their own times; from which the matter and substance of our sacred history has been formed; and from which the authors who came afterwards have taken what they record. (See SEER.) These ancient memoirs have not descended down to us, but were certainly in the hands of those sacred penmen, whose writings are in our possession, since they cite them, and refer to them: but (2.) Who compiled and digested these ancient writings? and when did they live? It is generally believed that Ezra is the editor of the books of Kings and Chronicles, as we have them at present; and the proofs are these: (1.) The author lived after the captivity of Babylon. At the end of the fourth book of Kings he speaks of the return from that captivity, 2 Kings xxv. 22, 23, &c. (2.) He describes the ten tribes as still captive in Assyria, whither they were carried as a punishment for their sins. (3.) In the seventeenth chapter of the fourth book of Kings, he introduces reflections on the calamities of Judah and Israel, which demonstrate that he wrote after the event. (4.) He refers almost every where to ancient memoirs, which he had before him, and abridged. (5.) The author, as far as we are able to judge, was a priest, and much attached to the house of David. All these marks agree well with Ezra, a learned and very inquisitive priest, who lived during the captivity, and after it; who might have collected a great number of documents, of which time and the persecutions suffered by the Jews, have deprived us. See EZRA.

There are a few particulars in these books which do not seem to agree with the time of Ezra: he says, that in his time the ark of the covenant was still in the temple, (1 Kings viii. 8.) that the kingdoms of Judah and Israel were still subsisting, (chap. xii. 19.) he speaks of the months Sif and Bul, (vi. 1, 37, 38.) names which in the time of Ezra were no longer in use. He also expresses himself throughout as a contemporary and as a writer who had witnessed what he wrote. But these discrepancies may be easily removed. Ezra generally transcribes word for word the memoirs which he had in his possession; and this is a proof of his fidelity and honesty. In other places, he inserts reflections or illustrations, which naturally arise from his subject; and this shows that he was master of the subject on which he was engaged, and that, being inspired, he was not afraid of intermixing his own words with those of the prophets, whose writings lay before him.

KING'S MOTHER. Nothing is more agreeable than to establish the conjectures of learning and ingenuity; and a favorable opportunity for this purpose, combining illustrations of a passage of Scripture, is afforded by the learned work of Mr. Raphael Baruh, who thus expresses his sentiments on the passage, 1 Kings xv. 1, 2, 7, 8, collated with the same facts in 2 Chron. xiii. 1, 2: "There is a very remarkable variation in this collation, in the name of king Abijah's (or Abijah's) mother: in the book of Kings she is called Maaca, the daughter of Absalom; and even in Chronicles, (chap. ix. 20.) she is also called by this same name; but in this passage, Chronicles calls her by the name of Micayau, the daughter of Uriel, of Gibeon. To solve this difficulty, I beg leave to offer, that the title אִם הַמֶּלֶךְ, (am ham-melek), king's mother; and that of הַגְּבִירָה, (hag-gebirah), translated queen, (2 Kings x. 13; 2 Chron. xv. 16.) describe one and the same thing: I mean, that the phrase, "And his mother's name was," &c. when expressed on a king's accession to the throne, at the beginning of his history, does not always imply, that the lady whose name is then mentioned was the king's [natural] mother; I apprehend, that (גַּזַּר) 'the king's mother,' when so introduced, is only a title of honor and dignity enjoyed by one lady, solely, of the royal family at a time, denoting her to be the first in rank, chief sultana, or queen dowager, whether she happened to be the king's [natural] mother or not. This remark seems to be corroborated by the history of king Asa, (1 Kings xv. 10, and 2 Chron. xv. 16.) who was Abijah's son. In the book of Kings, at his accession, this same Maaca, Absalom's daughter, is said to be his mother, and Asa afterwards deprived her of the dignity of גְּבִירָה, (gebirah), or chiefest in rank, on account of her idolatrous proceedings. But it is certain that Maaca was his grandmother, and not his mother, as here described; therefore, if we look upon the expression of the King's Mother to be only a title of dignity, all the difficulty will cease: for this Maaca was really Abijah's mother, the dearly beloved wife of his father Rehoboam, who, for her sake, appointed her son, Abijah, to be his successor to the throne; but when Abijah came to be king, that dignity of the king's mother, or the first in rank of the royal family, was, for some reason, perhaps for seniority, given to Micayau, the daughter of Uriel of Gibeon; and afterwards, on the death of Micayau, that dignity devolved to Maaca, and she enjoyed it at the accession of Asa, her grandson, who afterwards degraded her for her idolatry. This I submit as a rational way of reconciling all these passages, which seem so contradictory and repugnant to each other. The better to prove this assertion, let it be observed, that in 2 Kings xxiv. 12, it is said, 'And Jehoiachim, the king of Judah, went out to the king of Babylon, he and his mother, and his servants, and his princes, and his officers; and the king of Babylon took him,' &c.; and, verse 15, 'and he carried away Jehoiachim to Babylon, and the king's mother, and the king's wives, and his officers,' &c. Jeremial, (xxix. 2.) mentioning the same circumstances, says, 'After that, Jeconial the king, and the queen, and the eunuchs, the princes of Judah, &c. departed from Jerusalem.' Now it is evident, that the queen, in this verse, cannot mean the king's wife, as it would seem, by the translators' rendering always the word הַגְּבִירָה, (hag-gebirah), queen; but means the lady that is invested with that dignity, of being called the king's mother; the phrase הַגְּבִירָה, (hag-gebirah), in Jeremial, corresponding with אִם הַמֶּלֶךְ, (am ham-melek), the king's mother; and אִמּוֹ, his mother, in Kings. The Vulgate translates the word גְּבִירָה (gebirah) (1 Kings xi. 19, and 2 Kings x. 13.) Regina, (1 Kings xv. 13.) Princess, (2 Chron. xv. 16.) Deponit Imperio, (Jer. xxix. 2.) Domana, (ibid. xiii. 18.) Dominatrici;—and the English translators always render it queen. That 'king's mother' was a title of dignity is obvious by I Kings ii. 19: 'Bathsheba, therefore, went in to king Solomon, to speak unto him for Adonijah; and the king rose to meet her, and bowed himself unto her, and sat down on his throne, and caused a seat to be set for the king's mother, and she sat on his right hand;' for it was better to say, 'and caused a seat to be set for her;' but he says, 'for the king's mother;' and, perhaps, it was on this occasion that Bathsheba was first invested with the honor of that dignity." These conjectures of Mr. Baruh are established beyond any reasonable doubt, by the following extracts: "The Oloo Kani is not governess of the Crimea. This title, the literal translation of which is 'GREAT QUEEN,' simply denotes a dignity in the harem, which the khan usually confers on one of his sisters; or, if he has none, on one of his daughters, or relations. To this dignity are attached the revenues arising from several villages, and other rights." (Baron du Tott, vol. ii. p. 64.) "On this occasion, the king crowned his mother Malacotavit; conferring upon her the dignity and title of ITEGHE, the consequence of which station I have often described:—i. e. as king's mother, regent, governess of the king when under age." (Bruce's Travels, vol. ii. p. 531.) "Gusho had confiscated, in the name of the king, all the queen's [i. e. the ITEGHE] or king's mother's villages, which made her believe, that this offer of the king to bring her to Gondar was an insidious one. In order to make the breach the wider, he had also prevailed upon the king's [natural] mother to come to Gondar, and insist with her son to be crowned, and take the title and estate of ITEGHE. The king was prevailed upon to gratify his [natural] mother, under pretence that the ITEGHE had refused to come upon his invitation; but this, as it was a pretence only, so it was expressly a violation of the law of the land, which permits of but ONE ITEGHE, and never allows the nomination of a new one, while the former is in life, HOWEVER DISTANT A RELATION she may be to the then reigning king. In consequence of this new coronation, two large villages, Tshemmera and Tocussa, which belonged to the Iteghé, as appendages of her royalty, of course devolved upon the king's own mother, newly crowned, who sending her people to take possession, the inhabitants not only refused to admit her officers, but forcibly drove them away, declaring they would acknowledge no other mistress but their old one, to whom they were bound by the laws of the land." (Ibid. vol. iv. p. 244.)

From these extracts, we perceive, (1.) that the title and place of "King's mother" is of great consequence; and, in reading Bruce, we find the Iteghé interfering much in public affairs, keeping a separate palace and court, possessing great influence and authority; (2.) that while any Iteghé is living, it is contrary to law to crown another; which accounts at once for Asa's Iteghé, or king's mother, being his grandmother, the same person as held that dignity before he came to the crown; (3.) that this title occurs also in other parts of the East; and is given without consideration of natural maternity. (4.) It should seem, that "Queen," in our sense of the word, is a title and station unknown in the royal harem throughout the East. If it be taken at all, it is by that wife who brings a son after the king's coronation; such son being presumptive heir to the crown, his mother is sometimes entitled "Sultana Queen," or "prince Sultaness;" but not with our English ideas annexed to the title queen. (5.) That this person is called indifferently, "Queen," or "Iteghé," or

"King's Mother," even by Bruce; whence arises the very same ambiguity in our extracts from him, as has been remarked in Scripture. This illustration also sets in its proper light the interference of the "queen," in the story of Belshazzar; (Dan. v. 10.) who, by her reference to former events, appears not to have been any of the wives of Belshazzar; neither, indeed, could any of his wives have come to that banquet, (see Esther iv. 16.) or have appeared there under those circumstances, even had such a one been acquainted with the powers and talents of Daniel, as a prophet, or as a public man, or servant of the king; or, if intelligence of what passed at the banquet had been carried into the harem, both of which ideas are very unlikely. Whereas, the queen evidently speaks with much influence, if not authority; and was a proper person to be informed, and consulted also, on any emergency. Besides, as her palace was separate and distant from the king's, (though it might be within the circuit of Babylon, and certainly was, at this time, as Babylon was now under siege,) it allows for the interval of confusion, conjecture, introduction of the wise men, &c. before the queen's coming. Accounts must have been carried to her, and her coming from her own palace to the king's must have taken up time. In order, therefore, to determine who was this "queen," which has been a desideratum among learned men, it is not enough to know, who might be Belshazzar's wife, or wives, at the time; but also who was Iteghé, or king's mother, before he came to the crown; and who, therefore, being well acquainted with former events, and continuing in the same dignity, might naturally allude to them on this occasion. Had inquiry into this matter been conducted on these principles, in all probability, it had been more conformable to the manners of the East, and had superseded many ineffectual conjectures.

I. KIR, a city of Moab, probably the modern KEREK, Isa. xv. 1.

II. KIR, part of Media, where the river Kyrus, or Cyrus, flows, 2 Kings xvi. 9; Isa. xxii. 6; Amos i. 5; ix. 7.

KIR-HARESHETH, probably the same with KIR. See Ar.

I. KIRIATH, a city in Judah, Josh. xv. 25.

II. KIRIATH, a city of Moab, Jer. xlviii. 24, 41; Amos ii. 2.

III. KIRIATH, a city of Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 28.

KIRIATHAIM, a town beyond Jordan, ten miles from Medaba, west, Josh. xiii. 19.

I. KIRJATHAIM, a city of Naphtali, 1 Chron. vi. 76. Thought to be the Karthan of Josh. xxi. 32.

II. KIRJATHAIM, a city of Moab, or partly in the lot of Reuben, Gen. xiv. 5; Numb. xxxii. 37; Josh. xiii. 19; Jer. xlviii. 1, 23; Ezek. xxv. 9.

KIRJATH-ARBA, or HEBRON, a city of Judah, (Josh. xv. 13,) so called from its founder, Arba. See HEBRON.

KIRJATH-BAL, a city in Judah, called also Kirjath-jearim, (Josh. xv. 60; xviii. 14; Jer. xxvi. 20.) and also Baalath.

KIRJATH-HUZOTH, the city of squares, was the royal seat of Balak, king of Moab; and therefore may well be supposed to have had handsome streets, &c. Numb. xxii. 39.

KIRJATH-JEARIM, a city of the Gibeonites, afterwards given to Judah. It was on the confines of Benjamin, (Josh. xv. 9.) about nine miles from Jerusalem, in the way to Lydda. Here the ark was lodged for many years in the house of Abinadab; till David removed it to Jerusalem, 1 Chron. xiii.

KIRJATH-SANNAH, a city of Judah, Joshua xv. 49.

KIRJATH-SEEPHER, the city of books, otherwise Debir, Kirjath-debir, the city of words, a city in the tribe of Judah, afterwards given to Caleb. It was taken by Othniel, to whom Caleb for his reward gave his daughter Achsah in marriage, Josh. xv. 15; Judg. i. 11, &c. This city was so called long before Moses; at least it would seem so by the manner of mentioning it, which proves that books were known before that legislator, and that he is not the oldest writer, as the fathers have asserted; a character which, it is to be observed, he never assumes. It is possible that the Canaanites might lodge their records in this city, and those few monuments of antiquity which they had preserved; or it might be something like the cities of the priests in Israel, the residence of the learned; a kind of college. This idea receives confirmation from its other name Debir, which designates an oracle; and seems to hint at a seat of learning; an establishment, probably, of priests, for the purpose of educating the younger members of their body. The circumstance is very remarkable, because it occurs so early as the days of Joshua; and is evidently an establishment by the Canaanites, previous to the Hebrew invasion. It contributes, therefore, greatly to prove that the origin of letters was not the revelation of them to Moses on mount Sinai, as some have imagined; since, beside the silence of Moses on that matter, we find indications of their being already in use elsewhere. See DEBIR.

I. KISH, son of Abi Gibeon and Maachah, 1 Chron. viii. 30.

II. KISH, son of Ner, and father of king Saul, 1 Sam. ix. 1; 1 Chron. viii. 33; ix. 38, 39.

III. KISH, son of Abdi, a Levite of Merari's family, 2 Chron. xxix. 12.

KISHION, a city of the tribe of Issachar, yielded to the Levites of Gershon's family, Josh. xix. 20. It is the same with KEDESH III.

KISHON, a brook which rises in the plain of Jezreel, near the foot of mount Tabor. After passing through the great plain and receiving the waters of various smaller streams, it passes along the foot of mount Carmel, and discharges itself into the Mediterranean, a short distance south of Acco, or Acre, Judges v. 21. (See CARMEI II.) For a more particular account of the Kishon, see the Biblical Repository, vol. i. p. 601. R.

KISS. There are in the language of Scripture, kisses of friendship, adoration, homage, and respect; kisses of peace and reconciliation. Paul speaks frequently of the kiss of peace, used among believers, and given by them to one another, as a token of love and union, publicly in their religious assemblies, Rom. xvi. 16. See ADORE.

Pharaoh tells Joseph, "Thou shalt be over my house; and upon thy mouth shall all my people kiss;" our translation reads, "according to thy word shall all my people be ruled;" but places in the margin, "at thy word shall all my people kiss." We read in Prov. xxiv. 26, "The lips shall be kissed that give right words in answer;" and as this seems to express the same action as is referred to Joseph, it may be proper to examine the import of the phrase. It is probable that it refers, ultimately, to the mode of kissing the roll of a decree, or writing, which contains the orders of a sovereign prince, as is still the custom in the East, that is, the written orders of Joseph should be treated with the same respect, by inferior officers, as those of the king. The passage in Proverbs is rendered by the LXX, "Lips shall kiss those things that answer to right words;"—that is, those writings, those decrees, which correspond to principles of equity and justice, shall be treated with the utmost reverence, even to kissing. The mode of honoring a writing from a sovereign in the East, is by kissing it, and then putting it up to the forehead. See LETTERS.

It deserves notice, that various parts of the person were occasionally, and still are, kissed in the East; probably according to the degree of intimacy of the parties, or to their relative stations—as the lips, the hands, the feet, the garments, the earth where the feet had trodden, &c. and in many instances, things sent by a superior to an inferior. So Isaac says to his son, "Come near and kiss me;" (Gen. xxvii. 26.) so Joseph fell on his father's face, and kissed it; (Gen. l. 1,) so Joab took Anasa by the beard, to kiss it; (2 Sam. xx. 9.) and so the woman kissed the feet of Christ, Luke vii. 45. We should remark, also, that not only men who were related kissed each other, as Laban and Jacob, (Gen. xxix. 14.) Esau and Jacob, (Gen. xxxiii. 4.) and Joseph and his brethren; but Samuel kissed Saul, (1 Sam. x. 1.) as a token of respect to the king elect; in like manner, when the Son is declared king, (Ps. ii. 12.) the kings and judges of the earth are directed to kiss him; no doubt to show their submission, veneration and affection. Jonathan and David kissed each other, (1 Sam. xx. 41.) and "Absalom kissed any man—of whatever rank, or situation—that came near to him," 2 Sam. xv. 5. This custom long continued, for "the brethren fell on Paul's neck, and kissed him," Acts xv. 37. This accounts, very naturally, for the custom of the "kiss of peace," among the primitive Christians; which, however it might seem to us to be inadvisable, was in those days esteemed merely as a mode of expressing affectionate honor. It should be remembered, too, that the sexes sat apart in Jewish and in Christian places of worship; though the heathen took occasion from the use of this salutation, to raise reports injurious to Christian purity. It did not long continue to be practised in public assemblies, being probably gradually relinquished. There is some reason, however, to think that it continued among several of the sects denominated heretics; where it gave occasion to the same reports of promiscuous embraces, as it had done when in general use among Christians.

KITE, a bird of prey, and therefore placed by Moses among the unclean birds, Lev. xi. 14. See BIRDS.

KITHLISH, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 40.

KITRON, a city of Zebulun, which that tribe could not take from the Canaanites, Judg. i. 30. Kitron is Sippor, (Sepphoris,) says Bab. Megill. (fol. 6. 1.) a very strong place, and the largest city in Galilee. It is noted in the Talmuds for being a university; in which taught rabbi Judah the Holy, who died here.

KITTIM, son of Javan, and grandson of Noah, Gen. x. 4. See CHITIM.

KNEADING-TROUGHS. In the description of the departure of the Israelites from Egypt, (Exod. xii. 34.) we read that "the people took their dough before it was leavened, their kneading-troughs being bound up in their clothes upon their shoulders." Persons who know how cumbersome our kneading-troughs are, and how much less important they are than many other utensils, may wonder at this statement, and find a difficulty in accounting for it. But this wonder will cease, when it is understood that the vessels which the Arabs make use of, for kneading the unleavened cakes they prepare for those who travel in the very desert through which Israel passed, are only small wooden bowls; and that they seem to use no other in their own tents for that purpose or any other; these bowls being used by them for kneading their bread, and serving up their provisions when cooked. It will appear, that nothing could be more convenient than kneading-troughs of this sort for the Israelites in their journey. Mr. Harmer, however, expresses himself as being a little doubtful, whether these were the things that Moses meant, since it seems that the Israelites had made a provision of corn sufficient for their consumption for about a month, which they were preparing to bake all at once; but which their own little wooden bowls, used to knead the bread in they wanted for a single day, could not contain, nor yet well carry a number of those things they had borrowed of the Egyptians. Besides, he adds, Dr. Pococke informs us, that the Arabs actually carry their dough in something else; for, after having spoken of their copper dishes put one within another, and their wooden bowls, in which they make their bread, and which make up all the kitchen furniture of an Arab, even where he is settled; he gives us a description of a round leather coverlet, which they lay on the ground, and which serves them to eat from. This piece of furniture has, he says, rings round it, by which it is drawn together with a chain, that has a hook to it, to hang it by. It is drawn together, and in this manner they bring it full of bread, and when the repast is over, carry it away at once, with all that is left. (Vol. i. p. 182.) Whether this utensil is rather to be understood by the word translated kneading-troughs, than the Arab wooden bowl, Mr. Harmer does not positively determine; but he remarks that there is nothing, in the other three places in which the word occurs, to contradict this explanation. These places are Exod. viii. 3; Deut. xxviii. 5 and 17. in the two last of which places it is translated store. See also under CARAVANSERAI.

Niebuhr's description of this travelling equipage, in which we find a piece of furniture of the same nature as that just spoken of, and suitable, not only for the same purpose, but for others also, may be useful. We observe, that this is usually slung on the camels, in travelling; which accounts for the remark of the Israelite writer, that the people "carried their kneading-bags on their shoulders" knapsack-fashion, bound up, that is, drawn close; which may be ascribed to two coincident causes, (1.) they had not camels sufficient to transport the baggage of such a numerous host; (2.) they were sent away with speed, and had no time allowed them to procure travelling animals for general accommodation; they must either carry their food themselves, or relinquish it. "In the deserts through which we were to travel, (says Niebuhr,) a tent and beds were indispensably necessary. We had a neat collection of kitchen utensils made of copper, and tinned without and within. Instead of glasses, which are so liable to be broken, we used also copper bowls completely tinned. A bottle of thick leather served us as a caraffe. Our butter we put up in a leathern jar. In a wooden box, covered with leather, and parted out into shelves, we stored our sperics of all sorts; and in another similar box we laid our caudles; in the lid of the latter, we fixed an iron socket which served us for a candlestick. We had large lanterns of folded linen, with the lid and bottom of tin. For a table, with table linen, we had a round piece of leather, with iron rings at certain distances round it, through which cords were passed, after our meals; and the table hung, in the form of a purse, upon one of our camels. But we imprudently put our wine into great flasks, called in the East damasjanas, and large enough, each of them, to contain twenty ordinary bottles. These vases are very liable to be broken by the jolting of the camels, as we found by the loss of a part of our wine. It is much better to put your wine, when you are to carry it upon camels, into goat-skin bottles. This species of vessels may at first appear little suitable for the purpose; but they communicate no bad taste to the liquor, if the skins have been properly dressed. The same vessels answer best to carry the store of water that is requisite in travelling through dry and desert countries." (Vol. i. p. 163. Eng. edit.) The reader may now have a much clearer idea of the article designed by the Hebrew historian, than was possible for him to conceive from the rendering of the English version—kneading-trough. The notion of a kneading-trough, and that of an open leather cover, forming a bag, are so dissimilar, that it seems absolutely necessary, were it only to avoid that ridicule to which scepticism is ever prompt, that a different word should be substituted; a word more expressive of the subject and utensil intended, and also of its state, as "bound up." In fact, if proper terms were selected to particularize, if not to describe, the utensils of the East, as well domestic as others, with which we are now much more intimately acquainted than our worthy and venerable translators were, many of the sneers that pass for wit, while they are nothing better than sheer ignorance, would lose even that shadow of support to their profaneness at which they catch, for want of more correct information.

KNOWLEDGE. To consider this word fully, would make a very extensive article; a few remarks must suffice. (1.) It imports, to understand—to have acquired information respecting a subject. (2.) It implies discernment, judgment, discretion; the power of discrimination. It may be partial; we see but in part, we know but in part, 1 Cor. xiii. 9. (3.) To have ascertained by experiment, Gen. xxii. 12. (4.) It implies discovery, detection; by the law is the knowledge of sin, Rom. iii. 20.

Natural knowledge is acquired by the senses, by sight, hearing, feeling, &c.; by reflection; by the proper use of our reasoning powers; by natural genius; dexterity improved by assiduity and cultivation into great skill. So of husbandry, (Isa. xxviii. 36.) of art and elegance, (Exod. xxxv. 31.) in the instance of Bezaleel. Spiritual knowledge is the gift of God; but may be improved by study, consideration, &c.

The priests' lips should keep knowledge; (Mal. ii. 7.) not keep it to themselves, but keep it in store for others; to communicate knowledge is the way to preserve it.

Knowledge is spoken of as an emblematical person, as riches, and treasures, as excellency, and as the gift of God.

"Knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth; (1 Cor. viii. 1.) i. e. the knowledge of speculative and useless things, which tend only to gratify curiosity and vanity, which contribute neither to our own salvation nor to our neighbor's, neither to the public good, nor to God's glory; such knowledge is much more dangerous than profitable. The true science is that of salvation; the best employment of our knowledge is in sanctifying ourselves, in glorifying God, and in edifying our neighbor: this is the only sound knowledge.

God is the source and fountain of knowledge; He knows all things, at all times, and in all places. Jesus Christ is possessed of universal knowledge; knows the heart of man, and whatever appertains to his mediatorial kingdom. Men know progressively; and ought to follow on to know the Lord; what we know not now we may know hereafter. Holy angels know in a manner much superior to man; and, occasionally, reveal part of their knowledge to him. Unholy angels may know many things, of which man is ignorant. The great discretion of life and of godliness is, to discern what is desirable to be known, and what is best unknown; lest the knowledge of "good lost and evil got," as in the case of our first parents, should prove the lamentable source of innumerable evils.

Knowledge of God is indispensable, self-knowledge is important, knowledge of others is desirable; to be too knowing in worldly matters is often accessory to sinful knowledge; the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ is a mean of escaping the pollutions which are in the world. Workers of iniquity have no knowledge; no proper conviction of the divine presence. Some men are brutish in their knowledge; e. g. he who knows that a wooden image is but a shapely-formed stump of a tree, yet worships it; he boasts of his deity, which, in fact, is an instance of his want of discernment, degrading even to brutality. Some are wicked in their knowledge, "knowing the depths of Satan, as they speak," Rev. ii. 20. Strange indeed! that men should boast of what is to their detriment, and pride themselves on knowing that the absence of which were their greatest felicity!

KOHATH, son of Levi, and father of Amram, Jehar, Hebron, and Uzziel, Gen. xlvi. 11. Kohath's family was appointed to carry the ark and sacred vessels of the tabernacle, while Israel marched through the wilderness, Exod. vi. 18; Numb. iv. 4—6, &c.

I. KORAH, son of Esau and Aholibamah, succeeded Kenaz in part of the kingdom of Edom, Gen. xxxvi. 15, 16.

II. KORAH, a son of Jehar, and head of the Korites, a celebrated family among the Levites. Korah being dissatisfied with the rank he held among the sons of Levi, and envying the authority of Moses and Aaron, formed a party against them; in which he engaged Dathan, Abiram, and On, with 250 of the principal Levites, Numb. xvi. 1—3, &c. At the head of these rebels, Korah complained to Moses and Aaron, that they arrogated to themselves all authority over the people of the Lord. Moses, falling with his face upon the earth, answered them, "Let every one of you take his censer, and to-morrow he shall put incense into it; and offer it before the Lord; and he shall be acknowledged priest whom the Lord shall choose and approve." The next day Korah, with 250 of his faction, presenting themselves with their censers, the glory of the Lord appeared visibly over the tabernacle; and a voice was heard, "Separate yourselves from among this congregation, that I may consume them in a moment." Moses and Aaron, hereupon, falling with their faces to the ground, interceded for the people; and the Lord commanded them all to depart from about the tents of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. When the people were retired, Moses said, "If these men die the common death of all men, then the Lord hath not sent me; but if the earth open and swallow them up alive, then ye shall know that they have blasphemed the Lord." As soon as he had spoken, the earth opened and swallowed the rebels up, with all that belonged to them. One thing which added to this surprising occurrence was, that when Korah was swallowed up in the earth, his sons were preserved. David appointed them their office in the temple, to guard the doors, and to sing praises. Several psalms are inscribed to them, under the name of Korah; as the 42, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, and the 84, 85, 87, 88.

L A I

LABAN, son of Bethuel, and grandson of Nahor, brother to Rebekah, and father to Rachel and Leah. See JACOB.

LABOR is sometimes taken for the fruit of labor, Ps. cv. 44, "And they inherited the labor of the people." And elsewhere, "Let strangers spoil his labor, and the first-fruits of their labors;" that is, what they have acquired by their labor.

LACHISH, a city in the south of Judah, Josh. x. 23; xv. 39. It was rebuilt and fortified by Rehoboam, 2 Chron. xi. 9. Sennacherib besieged but did not take it, 2 Kings xviii. 17; xix. 8; 2 Chron. xxxii. 9.

LAISH, a city in the northern border of Palestine, acquired by the tribe of Dan, from whom it was subsequently called Dan, Judg. xviii. 7, 29. (See DAN.) The Laish mentioned Isa. x. 30. may, or may not, be the Laish of Dan. The prophet commands the daughter of Gallim to lift up her voice, so that it may be heard to a distance; but whether to so great a distance as Dan, may be doubted. Indeed, it does not appear for what purpose her screams should be heard so far off; but if this Laish were a town nearer to Geba, Gibeah, and the other places mentioned, then this alarm might be intended to reach Laish, for the purpose of inducing its inhabitants to join in the general flight.

LAKE, a confluence of waters. The principal lakes in Judea were the lake Asphaltites, or Dead sea, the lake of Tiberias, and the lake Semechon, or Merom. See the respective articles.

LAMB, the young of a sheep; but in Scripture it sometimes comprehends the kid; the Hebrews at the passover were at liberty to choose either for a victim. The original, sch, in general signifies a youngling, whether of a goat or ewe. "A lamb of a year old," may be interpreted a lamb of the year, born in the year, but which does not suck; for to sacrifice the paschal lamb while it used the teat, or to seethe it in the milk of its dam, was prohibited, Exod. xii. 5; Lev. xxiii. 12. On other occasions the law required, that the young should be left eight days with its dam before it was offered, Exod. xxii. 30; Lev. xxii. 27. The prophets represent the Messiah, in meekness, like a lamb which is sheared, or carried to the altar, without complaint, Isa. liii. 7; Jer. xi. 19. In the Revelation our Saviour is symbolized as a lamb that had been sacrificed. The wicked at the judgment are compared to goats, the righteous to lambs.

LAMB OF GOD. By this name John the Baptist called our Saviour, (John i. 29, 36.) to signify his innocence, and his quality as a victim to be offered for the sins of the world. Or, he might allude to these words of the prophet: "He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before his shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth," Isa. liii. 7. If it were a little before the passover—then the sight of a number of lambs going to Jerusalem to be slain on that occasion, might suggest the idea; as if he had said, "Behold the true, the most excellent Lamb of God," &c.

I. LAMECH, son of Methuselah, and father of Noah. He was 182 years old at the birth of Noah; and he lived after it 595 years; his whole life was 777; being born A. M. 874, and dying 1651.

II. LAMECH, son of Methusael, and father of Jubal, Jubal, Tubal-Cain, and Naamah, Gen. iv. 18, &c. He is conspicuous for his polygamy, of which he is thought to be the author, having married Adah and Zillah. There is some obscurity in Lamech's address to his wives: "Hear me, ye wives of Lamech; have I slain a man to my wounding, and a young man to my hurt! If Cain shall be avenged seven-fold, truly Lamech seventy-seven fold." A tradition among the Hebrews says, that Lamech, growing blind, when hunting, killed Cain ignorantly, believing that he killed some beast; and that afterwards he slew his own son Tubal-Cain, who had been the cause of this murder, because he had directed him to shoot at a certain place in the thicket where he heard something stir. Other conjectures have been formed to explain the passage, almost all equally uncertain and absurd. Josephus says, Lamech had seventy-seven sons by his two wives; but Scripture mentions only three sons and one daughter. [The following would seem to be a more appropriate translation of Lamech's address: "Hear me, ye wives of Lamech; I have slain a man who wounded me; a young man who smote me. If Cain, &c." It is not to be understood that Lamech had slain two persons; it is merely the repetition of poetic parallelism. R.]

LAMENTATIONS OF JEREMIAH, a mournful poem, composed by the prophet, on occasion of the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. The first two chapters principally describe the calamities of the siege of Jerusalem; the third deplors the persecutions which Jeremiah himself had suffered; the fourth adverts to the ruin and desolation of the city and temple, and the misfortune of Zedekiah; and the fifth is a kind of form of prayer for the Jews in their captivity. At the close the prophet speaks of the cruelty of the Edomites, who had insulted Jerusalem in her misery, and threatens them with the wrath of God.

The first four chapters of the Lamentations are in the acrostic form; every verse or couplet beginning with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet, in regular order. The first and second chapters contain twenty-two verses, according to the letters of the alphabet; the third chapter has triplets beginning with the same letter; and the fourth is like the first two, having twenty-two verses. The fifth chapter is not an acros-

tic. The style of Jeremiah's Lamentations is lively, tender, pathetic and affecting. It was the talent of this prophet to write melancholy and moving elegies; and never was a subject more worthy of tears, nor written with more tender and affecting sentiments.

The Hebrews used to compose lamentations or mournful songs on the death of great men, princes and heroes, and on occasion of public miseries and calamities. (See 2 Chron. xxxv. 25.) "Behold they are written in the Lamentations." These, however, are lost, but we have those which were composed by David on the death of Absalom and Jonathan. The prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, having foretold the desolations of Egypt, Tyre, Sidon and Babylon, made lamentations on their fall. It seems by Jeremiah, that they had women hired to weep: "Call for the mourning women, and send for cunning women, and let them take up a wailing for us," &c. (See Isaiah xiv. 4, 5; xv. xvi.; Jer. vii. 29; ix. 10, 17; xlvi. 32; Ezek. xix. 1; xxviii. 11; xxxii. 2.)

LAMPS are frequently mentioned in Scripture. That with seven branches, which Moses placed in the holy place, and those which Solomon placed afterwards in the temple of Jerusalem, are described in the article CANDLESTICK.

This article will embrace the other kinds of lamps or lanterns mentioned in Scripture. The subject, though of the most familiar nature, has its difficulties and its variations.

It is evident, that lamps intended for the interior of dwellings, for what may be described as "chamber use," are likely to be very different in construction, in form, and in management also, from those which are expected to meet the impulse of the open air, the evening breeze, and, occasionally, the ruder blasts of strong winds. The necessity for proper distinction appeared urgent to Mr. Harmer; but as that ingenious writer refers only to the New Testament for instances of the application of his remarks, there is at least an equal necessity for ascertaining the kinds mentioned in the Old Testament, nor less propriety in distinguishing them, and in maintaining that distinction, according to their application.

The following extract is from this writer's Observations: (vol. ii. p. 429, or iv. p. 274, Amer. ed.) "Captain Norden, among other particulars he thought worthy of notice, has given some account (part i. p. 83.) of the lamps and lanterns that they make use of commonly at Cairo. 'The lamp,' he tells us, 'is of the palm-tree wood, of the height of twenty-three inches, and made in a very gross manner. The glass, that hangs in the middle, is half filled with water, and has oil on the top, about three fingers in depth. The wick is preserved dry at the bottom of the glass, where they have contrived a place for it, and ascends through a pipe. These lamps do not give much light; yet they are very commodious, because they are transported easily from one place to another. With regard to the lanterns, they have pretty nearly the figure of the cage, and are made with reeds.' It is a collection of five or six glasses, like to that of the lamp which has been just described. They suspend them by cords in the middle of the streets, when there is any great festival at Cairo, and they put painted paper in the place of the reeds.' Were these the lanterns that those who came to take Jesus made use of? or were they such lamps as these that Christ referred to in the parable of the virgins? or are we rather to suppose that these lanterns are appropriated to the Egyptian illuminations, and that Dr. Pococke's account of the lanterns of this country will give us a better idea of the lanterns that were anciently made use of at Jerusalem? 'By night,' says that author, (Descript. of the East, vol. i.) speaking of the travelling of the people of Egypt, 'they rarely make use of tents, but lie in the open air, having large lanterns, made like a pocket paper lantern, the bottom and top being of copper, tinued over: and instead of paper, they are made with linen, which is extended by hoops of wire, so that when it is put together it serves as a candlestick, &c. . . . and they have a contrivance to hang it up abroad, by means of three staves.' It appears from travellers, that lamps, wax-candles, torches, lanterns, and cresset-lights, (a kind of movable beacon,) are all made use of among the eastern people. (Thevenot, part ii. p. 35 and 37; Norden, part i. p. 124; Hanway.) I think also, that there are only three words in the New Testament to express these things by, of which λύχνος seems to signify the common lamps that are used in ordinary life, (Luke xv. 8.) which, according to Norden, afford but little light. Λύχνος, which is one of the words made use of, (John xviii. 3.) seems to mean any sort of light that shines brighter than common, whether torches, blazing resinous pieces of wood, or lamps that are supplied with more than ordinary quantities of oil, or other unctuous substances; such as that mentioned by Hanway, in his Travels, (vol. i. p. 223.) which stood in the court-yard of a person of some distinction in Persia, was supplied with tallow, and was sufficient to enlighten the whole place, as a single wax-candle served for the illumination of the room where he was entertained; and such, I presume, were the lamps our Lord speaks of in the parable of the virgins, which were something of the nature of common lamps, for they were supplied with oil; but then were supposed to be sufficient for enlightening the company they went to meet, on a very joyful occasion, which required the most vigorous lights. Sir J. Chardin, in his MS. note on Matt. xxv. 44, informs us, that in many parts of the East, and in particular in the Indies, instead of torches and flambeaux, they carry a pot of oil in one hand, and a lamp full of oily rags in the other. This seems to be a very happy illustration of this part of the parable. He observes, in another of the MSS. that they seldom make use of candles in the East, especially among the great; candles casting but little light, and they sitting at a considerable distance from them. Ezek. i. 13, represents the light of lamps accordingly as very lively. The other word, (φανάρις), which occurs in John xviii. 3, is no where else to be found in the New Testament; and whether it precisely means lanterns, as our translators render the word, I do not certainly know. If it do, I conclude, without much hesitation, that it signifies such linen lanterns as Povecke gives an account of, rather than those mentioned by Norden, which seem rather to be machines more proper for illuminations than for common use; and if so, the evangelist perhaps means, that they came with such lanterns as people were wont to make use of when abroad in the night; but lest the weakness of the light should give an opportunity to Jesus to escape, many of them had torches, or such large and bright burning lamps as were made use of on nuptial solemnities, the more effectually to secure him. Such was the treachery of Judas and the zeal of his attendants!"

The remarks introduced in explanation of marriage processions, (see MARRIAGE,) have furnished materials for a correct judgment on the nature and form of the lamps used in evening perambulations, on such public occasions. Mr. Harmer is more happy in referred those described by Chardin to the parable of the virgins, than in some other of his conjectures. To do this subject justice, it might be considered under several distinctions: as, (1.) Military lamps, those intended to meet the exigencies of night, in the external air, when the breeze is lively, or when the wind is high. (2.) Domestic lamps, those intended for service in the interior of a dwelling, or to be carried about into all parts of it; but not powerful enough to resist a gale of wind in the open air. (3.) Lamps for religious uses; those hung up in temples, or deposited in the sacred recesses of edifices, public or private, &c. We shall, however, attend only to the distinction between lamps for the exterior, the open air; and lamps for the interior, domestic purposes. It is the more necessary to institute a distinction of this kind, because Scripture uniformly maintains it, by employing two very different terms to express artificial lights; as well in the Old Testament as in the New. We might add, because Schleusner has been somewhat too liberal in his definition of the term lampas, of which he says, "generatim omne, quod luceat, notat." But whatever shines is not a lamp in Scripture, as may appear from comparing certain passages.

1. We meet with the Hebrew term לָפִיד, lapid, properly lampid, (whence the word lamp,) in that remarkable history of the "smoking furnace and the burning lamp," which ratified the covenant made with Abraham, (Gen. xv. 17.) where the meaning is simply a flame. The text observes, that, (1.) it was after the sun was gone down, (2.) when it was dark, what is rendered a furnace, passed; and this is expressly noted as (3.) smoking. Whatever light, or splendor, overcame the darkness of the evening, with the much greater darkness occasioned by the density of the smoke by which it was immediately surrounded, and in the centre of which it blazed, was certainly not feeble, or dim, but lively, vigorous, and even powerful. The action took place in the open air; and this lamp, described as burning, was competent to resist, and more than resist, every impulse of the atmosphere. With this we may compare the appearances at the giving of the law, (Exod. xx. 18.) when we read (ver. 21.) of "the thick darkness" where God was; of the "mountain smoking," and of the "thunderings"—implying the concussion of dense clouds—but, notwithstanding these powerful impediments to the passage of light, yet the lampadim—less properly "lightnings" than glowing flames—distinguished themselves by the intensity and the continuance of their effulgence; to the great terror of all the people. The impropriety of rendering lampadim by "lightnings," is evident, on considering a passage where the two words meet, and must be distinguished in the description of a majestic person, (Dan. x. 6.) whose countenance had the brightness of lightning, (כִּרְבִּי, the regular term for the flashes of this meteor,) and his eyes were as lampadi of fire; that is, glowing, clear, steady, conspicuous flames; not vibrating, not blazing, but compact and still. It would manifest a deplorable deficiency in taste and propriety, to compare an earthly production with these celestial appearances; but whoever has contemplated a great body of gas lights, purposely combined, will at least be prepared to admit the overpowering effulgence of a brightness very different from that of lightning.

We must now descend to the humbler walks of humanity. We read in Judg. vii. 16, that the inventive Gideon gave to his soldiers, at his surprise of the Midianites, by night—"pitchers, and lamps within the pitchers." There can be no doubt but what this hero would adopt the most powerful lights he could obtain. Weak rush lights would not answer his purpose. His intention was to make the most tremendous noise possible with his trumpets; and the most terrific display of blazing brightness by means of his lamps, suddenly beaming with malignant splendor, in several parts of the Midianite host, at the same moment. They were, therefore, strong luminaries. We may say the same of the lampid of Samson; (Judg. xv. 4.)—it was a burner not to be extinguished by the rude blast of night. Moreover, the lampid is made an object of comparison in Isa. lxii. 1, "I will not hold my peace—till the salvation of Zion go forth as a lamp that burneth." (Comp. Ezek. i. 13; Zeck. xii. 6, et al.) Certainly, these comparisons imply a vehement, or at least a glowing, brilliant illuminator.

There is a passage in Job xii. 5, which should be illustrated in the present article; but the critics are by no means agreed on its import; whether this attempt to explain it be satisfactory must be left for others to determine. Our translation reads, "He that is ready to slip with his feet is as a lamp despised in the thought of him that is at ease." Scott renders,

Contempt pursues the fall'n; exalted ease
With scornful eye unhappy virtue sees.

Good takes an unjustifiable liberty with the text, and transfers the first word of this verse to the end of the preceding one: he reads,

The just, the perfect man, is a laughing-stock to the proud;

A derision, amidst the sunshine of the prosperous,
While ready to slip with his feet.

[The simplest interpretation, however, is that of the common translation. The sense plainly is, that a man in adversity is, to the prosperous man, as a lamp about to expire, which gives but a fainter and fainter light, and is, therefore, of no value. R.]

The LXX have constantly rendered the Hebrew term lampid by the Greek lampas; which we shall find employed in the New Testament, as well as in the Old, to signify a light for exterior service. Having noticed the effulgent appearances attendant on celestial powers descending upon earth, we shall be excused for calling the attention of the reader, in the first place, to a like phenomenon in heaven, Rev. iv. 5. "Out of the throne proceeded lightnings, and thunders, and voices; and there were seven lamps of fire (ἑπτὰ λαμπάδες πυρός) burning before the throne, which are the seven Spirits of God." This appearance is sufficiently explained by comparison with what has been said on Exod. xx. 18. Again, in chap. viii. 10, There fell from heaven a great star, burning as it were a lamp, ἀστὴρ μέγας καίτοιμος ὡς λαμπάς;—the comparison implies a flame sufficiently vigorous to resist the effect of the velocity with which the meteor travelled, to resist the extinguishing powers of the atmosphere, incalculably increased by that velocity. The allusion is, probably, to a comet, said to fall to the earth. Comets were reckoned among stars by the ancients; and the Romans sometimes called a comet, fax, a torch, or fax cælestis, a heavenly torch. The term lamp, however, adding the notion of a long train of fire streaming behind it, seems more appropriate in this place than that of torch.

The parable of the virgins (Matt. xxv.) can give us no trouble, after what has been said: the allusion is, plainly, to lamps of sufficient strength to retain their flame however agitated, whether by the bearer, or by the wind. And the same we must conceive of the lamps, not "torches," of John xviii. 3, where we read, "Judas, having received a band of men and officers from the chief priests and Pharisees, came with lanterns, and torches, and weapons"—μετὰ φανῶν καὶ λαμπάδων. The term phanos probably means a light-holder, that is, having the light within it; the term lampas certainly means a luminary, having the light on the outside; but it is not easy to fix on the form of the lamp. If this band of men and officers were Roman soldiers, the lamp might be the same as the Romans employed in their armies; one of which is carried among other necessaries attending the army of Trajan, at the commencement of his military expedition across the Danube, represented on his memorial pillar at Rome. It is a square pot (of iron, no doubt) fixed on the end of a tall pole: it is close on the sides, and open only at the top, in which it differs from implements used for the same purposes by modern inhabitants of the East. Major Hope says, "A Turkish camp is lighted up, at night, by a kind of large lanterns, formed of iron hoops, and fastened on long poles. Several of these lights, in which rags impregnated with grease, oil, or resinous substance, are burned, are placed in front of the tent of each of the pachas."—The greater number implies the greater dignity.

Baron du Tott (p. iii. 114.) describes the means used by the Turks to surprise their enemies as passing strange: "The high treasurer, commanding a detachment in the night, was lighted by the flame of resinous wood, burning in iron chafing-dishes fixed to long poles. He therefore got the surname of The Blazer." If the detachment sent to seize Jesus were Jewish guards, rather than Roman, it might be thought that open cages, as Hill calls them, or chafing-dishes, as Baron du Tott describes them, were the lamps they carried; but the term does not appear to determine their form or construction.

2. A lamp for domestic use is called נֵר, Ner, Nir, or Nur, in the Hebrew; a word which is frequently rendered "candle" in our version. It imports apparently a weaker kind of light. We read of the industrious woman, (Prov. xxxi. 18.) "Her candle (נֵר) goeth not out by night." Whether the term "candle" be unexceptionable here, might be questioned; but, certainly, the busy housewife's light is understood to be in the inside of her house. Candles, among us, are columns of solid tallow, wax, &c. surrounding a wick; but in countries where oil is plentiful, and especially in hot countries, the preference will naturally be given to small, portable oil lamps; and perhaps it were to be wished that our language afforded a diminutive to express this piece of domestic furniture;—as in Spanish, lampara, lamparilla. When we read of the "golden candlestick," in Exodus and Leviticus, we naturally connect with it the idea of a stand for holding candles, but we find directions for trimming and filling the lamps, which shows this idea to be erroneous. See CANDLESTICK.

This restriction of the term Ner to an interior light, corrects the usual acceptance of a passage in Job xxix. 3, which is commonly understood of the benefit derived from the light of a lamp, by a man who is walking abroad in a dark night; thus rendered in our English translation:

When his (God's) candle shined upon my head,
And when by his light I walked through darkness.

But Scott saw the application of this to a domestic incident: "His candle, or rather his lamp, is probably an allusion to the lamps which hung from the ceiling of the wealthy Arabs." He adds, "The latter phrase, 'by his light I walked through darkness,' refers, it is likely, to the fires, or other lights, which were carried before the caravans in their night travels through the deserts," such as we have already noticed.—Good, slightly changing the tense of the verb, reads,

When he suffered his lamp to shine upon my head,
And by its light I illumined the darkness!

The reference is probably to the mode by which the palaces and mansions of the great were illumined in ancient times, of which we have an excellent description in Lucretius, well known to have been afterwards closely copied by Virgil. (De Rer. Nat. ii. 24.)

Good's change of the agent has the air of an imperfection in this passage: after the action, or supposed action, of Deity, the party honored should be perfectly quiet; he should not affirm, "I illumined the darkness." Job means to say, "I was admitted to the interior of his residence, his splendid abode; and lamps for interior illumination enabled me to pass through those approaches to his presence, which, without such irradiation, were absolute darkness." This differs something from Scott's conception of the latter verse; yet, if the lights of that verse be referred to those which stand before the tents of Turkish grandees, as already stated, the difference would disappear. Such luminaries would direct the person who approached, however dark the night might be.

A similar conception verifies the import of another passage:

The light of the wicked shall be cast out,
And the spark of his fire shall not shine:
The light shall be dark in his tabernacle,
And his candle shall be put out with him.

Job xviii. 5, 6.

"In his tabernacle"—rather, in his most splendid tent (טֹהַר); that of his dignity and grandeur. "His candle," rather his lamp, (נֵר) "which is hung high over him in the ceiling of his tent, even that shall be extinguished." The term here, also, preserves its import, as marking an interior light. Scott's note on the passage is characteristic of the manners of the country: "These metaphors denote, in general, the splendor and festivity in which such men live. There is, however, an allusion, we think, in the fifth verse, to what an Arabian poet calls the fires of hospitality—beacons lighted on the tops of hills by persons of distinction among the Arabs, to direct and invite travellers to their houses and table. Hospitality was their national glory; and the loftier and larger these fires were, the greater was the magnificence thought to be: a wicked rich man, therefore, would affect this piece of state, from vanity and ostentation. Another Arabian poet expresses the permanent prosperity of his family almost in the very words of our author: 'Neither is our fire, lighted for the benefit of the night stranger, extinguished.' It is but just to call the attention of the reader to his choice between this illustration and that we have above suggested from major Hope.

This term occurs so frequently, that much time might be spent in tracing it; but what has been said is sufficient to justify the analogy that derives from this domestic lamp the metaphor of life, and of renewed life, rather than from the external lamp, though that were much more powerful. So when we read (2 Sam. xxi. 17.) that David's servants forbade his exposing himself any more in battle—that thou quench not the light (the lamp, נֵר) of Israel—this allusion to the king's life is, with the greatest propriety, drawn from the domestic, the family lamp. Again, (1 Kings xi. 36.) God says, "And unto his son will I give one tribe, that David my servant may have a light (נֵר, a domestic lamp) always before me in Jerusalem, the city which I have chosen to put my name there." This certainly implies the continuance of David's family; but when the ten tribes were broken off from his regal descendants, the simile would have been without resemblance, in fact, contradictory, had it referred to the splendid blaze of the more conspicuous illuminator, the greater lamp. Hence arises something of difficulty, to distinguish whether the term be used literally, or metaphorically, in certain passages. When we read, that the light, the domestic lamp, of the wicked shall be put out, we are not always sure that it means a luminary; it may mean posterity—his family shall fail; or, on the contrary, what seems at first sight to imply posterity, may refer to the light, the lamp of the tent, tabernacle, or dwelling.

We come now to the consideration of the representative of this domestic lamp, in the New Testament, where, we believe, there is no instance of the word lamp being applied to an article of interior use. λύχνος, a light, whence λύχνια, a light-holder, badly rendered in the English version, a candle, and a candlestick, imports an illuminator proper to an apartment; and when we read (Rev. i. 12, &c.) of the "seven golden candlesticks," and of "one walking in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks," we should by no means conceive of loose, isolated candlesticks, like those in use among ourselves, but of the seven-branched lamp-stand, a principal article of furniture in the Mosaic tabernacle. (See CANDLESTICK.) So we read (Matt. v. 15.) "Neither do men light a candle, (λύχνον, a lamp,) and put it under a bushel, (a measure less than a peck,) but put it on a candlestick, (λύχνιον, a lamp-stand,) and it giveth light to all in the house." This passage would read more correctly, "Neither do they light the lamp, and place it under a small measure, but on the lamp-stand, and it is competent to give light to all the residence." It seems to import the customary lamp of the family, and one only; like that of the poor widow, (Luke xv. 8.) who, having lost one piece of silver out of ten, lights the lamp, (λύχνον) which she carries about into all parts of her residence, searching every creek and corner. The simplicity, not to say the poverty, of the family, is very expressive in this simile; they surely would not conceal the only lamp they had. A more wealthy establishment had many lamps, Luke xii. 35. Let your loins be girded about, and your lights (of λύχνοι, the lamps) brightly burning, (καιόμενοι, because fresh trimmed,) like servants expecting their lord's return from a wedding-feast, that at whatever time of night he come home, they may open to him instantly; and he may find all things in order.

These passages prove sufficiently that λύχνος denotes a household implement, a domestic lamp; a lamp that shines in a dark place; (2 Pet. i. 19.) a lamp, the services of which may be dispensed with in the heavenly Jerusalem; (Rev. xxii. 5.) for there shall be no night there and they need no candle, λίχτρον, lamp. No, the Lamb is the lamp (ὁ λυχνος) thereof, chap. xxi. 23.

The description given of John the Baptist may seem to militate against this notion: He was a burning and a shining light; (John v. 35.) properly, he was the lamp, ὁ λυχνος, the burning and shining; also, he certainly was much in the desert, and at no time very domestic. As to the term burning (καίετος.) Campbell dissents from the opinion of those who would make it refer to the ardor, zeal, or power of John's example: he observes, very properly, that a lamp is used, not for warming people, but for giving them light. And certainly, the good servants (Luke xii. 35.) are not expected to have their lamps burning for the purpose of warming their lord, but for enlightening the apartments, or the passages to the apartments, and giving him an honorable reception. Moreover, since the days of Campbell, we are able to give a further account of John, whom his followers boasted of as the light, the apostle of light, (see ZABIANs,) insomuch, that the evangelist found it necessary to say explicitly, "He was not that light; but came to bear witness," &c. Since, then, the phrase was current among the Jews, concerning John, our Lord takes it in their sense and application, implying splendor, brilliancy; but we may well question, with Campbell, whether it implies heat, or any thing beyond the brightness of which a domestic lamp is susceptible. If this be correct, the other part of the objection of course falls.

Another metaphorical use of this lamp respects the eye; the light, lamp, of the body is the eye, (Matt. vi. 22.) but as the eyes of some have been compared to burning lamps, (lampadim.) should not the same comparison be maintained here? We apprehend not; because this lamp is understood to illuminate only the body itself; not beyond it; and as a domestic lamp may enlighten all parts of a house, being properly directed, so may the eye be directed to all the members of the body, and inspect them all in succession; which it is not the intention of the comparison employed by Daniel, and in the Revelation, to express.

This article may be closed by remarking, that we are so much accustomed to the use of glass for transparency, in every form and application, that it is with some difficulty we conceive of a light-holder, or lantern, as complete without it. But we should not forget the horn lanterns used by our carriers, ostlers, watchmen, &c. horn being much safer, because less brittle, than glass; and though it is certain that the ancients had glass equally perfect with our own, yet we are at a loss to prove that they used it in the construction of lanterns. That they employed a transparent substance of some kind, is evident, from a ship's lantern hanging from the aplustum of a vessel in which Trajan is voyaging. It seems to distinguish the ship of the commander-in-chief; as the vessels in company have it not.

The torches of antiquity were of all sizes, from a foot in length to six feet; and the largest of these were employed not only in military affairs, for signals, &c. but also in religious processions. It may be questioned, whether lights of either of these kinds are really mentioned in Scripture, but as commentators have inclined to find both torches and lanterns there, they could not well be passed over without notice.

LAND, in the Old Testament, often denotes the country of the Israelites, or the particular country, or district, spoken of; the land of Canaan, the land of Egypt, the land of Ashur, the land of Moab. "Behold, my land is before thee;" (Gen. xx. 15.) settle where you please. In many places of our public version the phrase "all the earth" is used, where the meaning should be restricted to the land, or all the land.

LANGUAGE. Several questions are proposed on this subject, as (1.) Whether God was the author of the original language. (2.) Whether Adam received it from him by infusion; or formed and invented it by his own industry and labor. (3.) Whether this language is still in being. (4.) Where it is to be found.

The ancients, who were unacquainted with the true history of the world's creation, affirm, that under the happy reign of Saturn, not only all men, but all terrestrial animals, birds, and even fishes, spoke the same language; that mankind, not sufficiently sensible of their happiness, sent a deputation to Saturn, desiring immortality, representing, that it was not just that they should be without a prerogative granted by him to serpents, which are yearly renewed by shedding their old skin, and assuming a new one. Saturn, in great anger, not only refused their request, but punished their ingratitude, by depriving them of that unity of language which kept them associated. He confounded their language, and thereby put them under a necessity of separating. Hence we learn that the heathen attributed the confusion of tongues to a divine interposition; and so far they confirm the history of what took place at Babel.

Moses represents Adam and Eve as the stock whence all nations spring. He describes them as reasonable and intelligent persons, speaking, and giving names to things. Now, if we admit God as a Creator, there is no difficulty in acknowledging him to be the Author of the language of the first man; and it is difficult to conceive of his attaining the power of language without a divine inspiration. There is scarcely any eastern language which has not aspired to the honor of having been the original; but the majority of critics decide for the Hebrew, or its cognate, the Arabic; the conciseness, simplicity, energy, and fertility of which; their relation to the most ancient oriental languages, which seem to derive from them the etymologies of the earliest names borne by mankind; the names of animals, which are all significant in them, and describe the nature and property of the animals, (particulars not observed in other languages);—all these characters uniting, incline us much in favor of their primacy and excellency. The Hebrew has another privilege, that the most ancient and venerable books in the world are written in it.

Language is the medium of communication between the material animal life and the spiritual rational power, in man; it is the link that connects the senses with the understanding. Whatever faculties we may suppose belong to animals, we see no proof of their drawing inferences, conclusions, and determinations consequent on the exercise of language. In respect to vocal sounds man may have taken hints and lessons from animals; but animals have taken no discursive lessons from man. It is well worth while, then, to consider this invaluable gift of the Almighty; and the rather, as it forms one of the chains of evidence that all the families of mankind are derived from the same origin; and are made, as the apostle's expression is, "of one blood." Late years have brought us acquainted with ancient languages which were formerly unknown to the learned of Europe; among them the most venerable is the Sanscrit of India. Its structure is, apparently, too perfect, too refined and artificial, to warrant our admitting it as the first language of mankind; yet in point of antiquity, it may compete with the Hebrew, as current in the days of Moses; and it is remarkable that the Mosaic writings seem to contain several words of Sanscrit origin; (chiefly in the history of Baalam;) which may give occasion to various reflections.

The following extracts from Niebuhr will show the fate of language, when those who speak it are subjected to foreigners of another tongue; nevertheless, that some remains of it may survive the general wreck, in different places, is not incredible; and such an account, with the manner in which it is preserved, is subjoined from the same author: "Many people living under the dominion of the Arabians and Turks, have lost the use of their mother tongue. The Greeks and Armenians settled in Egypt and Syria speak Arabic; and the services of their public worship are performed in two languages at once. In Natolia, these nations speak their own languages in several different dialects. The Turkish officers sometimes extend their despotism to the language of their subjects. A pacha of Kaysar, who could not endure to hear the Greek language spoken, forbade the Greeks in his pachalic, under pain of death, to use any language but the Turkish. Since that prohibition was issued, the Christians of Kaysar and Angora have continued to speak the Turkish, and at present do not even understand their original language." (Vol. ii. p. 259.) "In Syria and Palestine, indeed, no language is to be heard but the Arabic; and yet the Syriac is not absolutely a dead language, but is still spoken in several villages in the pachalic of Damascus. In many places, in the neighborhood of Merdin and Mosul, the Christians still speak in the Chaldean language; and the inhabitants of the villages who do not frequent towns, never hear any other than their mother tongue. The Christians born in the cities of Merdin and Mosul, although they speak Arabic, write in the Chaldean characters, just as the Maronites write their Arabic in Syriac letters, and the Greeks write their Turkish in Greek letters."

Many languages now spoken may be traced to one common and primitive stock, as the original. Sir W. Jones has demonstrated, that three great branches of language are sufficient to account for all the varieties extant: and this hypothesis forms a very strong, as well as a new, argument in favor of the Mosaic history of the early post-diluvian ages, which represents the three great families as being implicated in the confusion of languages at Babel. But, should we allow a fourth branch, we should do violence to the narration of Moses. It is now, perhaps, impossible to combine, or even to ascertain, what words remaining in either, or in all, of the three branches, should be considered as belonging to the primitive language; but, by way of showing how words may sometimes be traced into different dialects, to which at first sight they appear to have little relation, the reader will accept the following note from a popular work: "—Numberless instances might be given, but our limits permit us to produce only a few. In the Sanscrit, or ancient language of the Gentoos, our signifies a day. (See Halhed's preface to the Code of Gentoos Laws.) In other eastern languages, the same word was used to denote both light and fire. Thus in the Chaldee, ur is fire; in the Egyptian, or is the sun, or light; (Plut. de Osir. et Isid;) in the Hebrew, aur is light; in Greek, αἴρ (air) is the air, often light; in Latin, aura is the air, from the Æolic Greek; and in Irish it is acar."

From what appears on this subject, we may warrantably suppose, (1.) That the ancient Hebrew language retained a considerable portion of original words, and expressions, or modes of expression. (2.) That some of these may occur in the Hebrew Scriptures. (3.) That the sister dialects to the Hebrew, the Chaldee, the Arabic, &c. may also have retained many original words; and when these radical words are similar to those retained by the Hebrew, an adequate knowledge of these languages cannot but contribute essentially to our understanding of passages where derivatives from such words occur in the Hebrew. And this is particularly fortunate, when such words occur but once in Holy Scripture; when they have, as we may say, neither friend nor brother in the Holy language, the advantage to be derived from their relations, in foreign but kindred dialects, becomes invaluable. See LETTERS.

[To the student of the Bible one of the most important subjects is the character and history of the original languages in which that holy book was written. In respect to the original Greek of the New Testament, some remarks have been made, and the best sources of information pointed out, under the article GREECE. For the Hebrew language a reference has been made to the present article. The Hebrew is but one of the cluster of cognate languages which anciently prevailed in western Asia; commonly called the oriental languages, or in late years the Semitish, or Shemitish, languages, as belonging particularly to the descendants of Shem. A proper knowledge of the Hebrew, therefore, implies also an acquaintance with these other kindred dialects. The principal source of information on these points is the work of Gesenius entitled Geschichte der hebräischen Sprache und Schrift, History of the Hebrew Language and Letters, Leipsic, 1815. An abstract of the results detailed in this work, accompanied with remarks of his own, was given by professor Stuart in the Introduction prefixed to the first and second editions of his Hebrew Grammar. From these sources the following statements have been condensed.

ORIENTAL OR SEMITISH LANGUAGES.—The languages of western Asia, though differing in respect to dialect, are radically the same; and have been so as far back as any historical records enable us to trace them. Palestine, Syria, Phœnicia, Mesopotamia, Babylonia, Arabia, and also Ethiopia, are reckoned as the countries where the languages commonly denominated oriental have been spoken. Of late, many critics have rejected the appellation oriental, as being too comprehensive, and substituted that of Shemitish. Against this appellation, however, objections of a similar nature may be urged; for no inconsiderable portion of those who spoke the languages in question, were not descendants of Shem. It is doubtless a matter of indifference which appellation is used, if it be first defined.

The oriental languages may be divided into three principal dialects; viz. the Aramæan, the Hebrew, and the Arabic.—(1.) The Aramæan, spoken in Syria, Mesopotamia, and Babylonia, or Chaldea, is subdivided into the Syriac and Chaldee dialects, sometimes called also the west and east Aramæan.—(2.) The Hebrew or Canaanitish dialect (Isa. xix.

18.) was spoken in Palestine, and probably, with little variation, in Phœnicia and the Phœnician colonies, e. g. at Carthage and other places. The remains of the Phœnician and Punic dialects are too few and too much disfigured, to enable us to judge with certainty how extensively these languages were the same as the dialect of Palestine.—(3.) The Arabic, to which the Ethiopic bears a special resemblance, comprises, in modern times, a great variety of dialects as a spoken language, and is spread over a vast extent of country; but so far as we are acquainted with its former state, it appears, more anciently, to have been limited principally to Arabia and Ethiopia.

The Arabic is very rich in words and forms; the Syriac, so far as it is yet known, is comparatively limited in both; the Hebrew holds a middle place between them, both as to copiousness of words and variety of forms.

The Samaritan dialect appears to be made up, as one might expect, (see 2 Kings xvii.) of Aramæan and Hebrew. And the slighter varieties of Arabic are as numerous as the provinces where the language is spoken. In all these cases, however, we commonly name the slighter differences provincialisms rather than dialects.

It is uncertain whether any of the oriental or Shemitish dialects were spoken in Assyria proper, or in Asia Minor. The probability seems to be against the supposition that the Assyrians used them; and a great part of Asia Minor, before it was subjugated by the Greeks, most probably spoke the same language with Assyria, i. e. perhaps a dialect of the Persian. A small part only of this section of Asia seem to have spoken a Shemitish dialect. (Ges. Geschichte, § 4. 1. and § 17. 3.) When western Asia is described, therefore, as speaking the Shemitish languages, the exceptions just made are to be uniformly understood.

Of all the oriental languages, the Hebrew bears marks of being the most ancient. The oldest records that are known to exist are composed in this language; and there are other reasons which render it probable, that it preceded its kindred dialects. It flourished in Palestine, among the Phœnicians and Hebrews, until the period of the Babylonish exile; soon after which it declined, and finally was succeeded by a kind of Hebræo-Aramæan dialect, such as was spoken in the time of our Saviour among the Jews. (See Biblical Repository, vol. i. p. 309, 317.) The west Aramæan had flourished before this, for a long time, in the east and north of Palestine; but it now advanced farther west, and during the period that the Christian churches of Syria flourished, it was widely extended. It is at present almost a dead language, and has been so for several centuries. The Hebrew may be regarded as having been a dead language, except among a small circle of literati, for about the space of two thousand years.—Our knowledge of Arabic literature extends back very little beyond the time of Mohammed. But the followers of this pretended prophet have spread the dialect of the Koran over almost half the population of the world. Arabic is now the vernacular language of Arabia, Syria, Egypt, and in a great measure of Palestine and all the northern coast of Africa; while it is read and understood wherever the Koran has gone, in Turkey, Persia, India, and Tartary.

The remains of the ancient Hebrew tongue are contained in the Old Testament, and in the few Phœnician and Punic words and inscriptions that have been here and there discovered.—The remains of the Aramæan are extant in a variety of books. In Chaldee, we have a part of the books of Daniel and Ezra, (Dan. ii. 4—vii. 28. Ezra iv. 8—vi. 19, and vii. 12—27.) which are the most ancient of any specimens of this dialect. The Targum of Onkelos, i. e. the translation of the Pentateuch into Chaldee, affords the next and purest specimen of that language. All the other Targums, the Mishna and Gemara are a mixture of Aramæan and Hebrew. It has been said that there are still some small districts in the East, where the Chaldee is a vernacular language. In Syriac, there is a considerable number of books and MSS. extant. The oldest specimen of this language, that we have, is contained in the Peshito, or Syriac, version of the Old and New Testament. A multitude of writers in this dialect have flourished, (vid. Assemani Bibliotheca Orientalis,) many of whose writings probably are still extant, although but few have been printed in Europe.—In Arabic, there exists a great variety of MSS. and books, historical, scientific and literary. The means of illustrating this living language are now very ample and satisfactory. See TALMUD, and VERSIONS.

It is quite obvious from the statement made above, that a knowledge of the kindred dialects of the Hebrew is very important, for the illustration of that language. Who can, even now, have a very extensive and accurate understanding of the English language, that is unacquainted with the Latin, Greek, Norman, French and Saxon? Supposing, then, that the English had been a dead language for more than two thousand years, and that all the remains of it were comprised in one moderate volume; who could well explain this volume, that did not understand the languages with which it is closely connected? The answer to this question will decide whether the study of the languages, kindred with the Hebrew, is important to the thorough understanding and illustration of the Hebrew Scriptures.

The relation of the Hebrew to the Aramæan and Arabic is not such as exists between the Attic and other dialects of Greece. The diversity is much greater. It bears more resemblance to the diversity between German and Dutch, or German and Swedish. The idiom of all is substantially the same. The fundamental words are of common origin. But the inflections differ in some considerable measure: derivative words are diverse in point of form; and not a few words have been adopted in each of the dialects, which either are not common to the others, or are used in a different sense.—The affinity between the Chaldee and Syriac is very great, in every respect.

The oriental languages are distinguished from the western or European tongues, in general, by a number of peculiar traits; viz. (1.) Several kinds of guttural letters are found in them, which we cannot distinctly mark; and some of which our organs are incapable of pronouncing, after the age of maturity.—(2.) In general, the roots are triliteral, and of two syllables. By far the greater part of the roots are verbs.—(3.) Pronouns, whether personal or adjective, are, in the oblique cases, united in the same word with the noun or verb to which they have a relation.—(4.) The verbs have but two tenses, the past and future; and in general, there are no optative or subjunctive moods definitely marked.—(5.) The genders are only masculine and feminine; and these are extended to the verb, as well as to the noun. (6.) For the most part, the cases are marked by prepositions. Two nouns coming together, the latter of which is in the genitive, the first, in most cases, suffers a change which indicates this state of relation, while the latter noun remains unchanged; i. e. the governing noun suffers the change, and not the noun governed. (7.) To mark the comparative and superlative degrees, no special forms of adjectives exist. From this observation the Arabic must be excepted, which, for the most part, has an intensive form of adjectives that marks both the comparative and superlative. (8.) Scarcely any composite words exist in these languages, if we except proper names. (9.) Verbs are not only distinguished into active and passive, by their forms; but additional forms are made, by the inflections of the same verb with small variations, to signify the cause of action, or the frequency of it, or that it is reflexive, or reciprocal, or intensive, &c. (10.) Lastly, all these dialects (the Ethiopic excepted) are written and read from the right hand to the left; the alphabets consisting of consonants only, and the vowels being generally written above or below the consonants.

HEBREW LANGUAGE.—The appellation of Hebrew, (עִבְרִי,) so far as we can learn from history, was first given to Abraham by the people of Canaan among whom he dwelt, Gen. xiv. 13. As the first names of nations were commonly appellatives, it is quite probable that this epithet was applied to Abraham because he came from beyond the Euphrates, עֵבֶר meaning over or beyond; so that עִבְרִי, Hebrew, meant as much as one who came from beyond the Euphrates. But whatever extent of meaning was attached to the appellation Hebrew before the time of Jacob, it appears afterwards to have been limited only to his posterity, and to be synonymous with Israelite.

The origin of the Hebrew language must be dated further back than the period to which we can trace the appellation Hebrew. It is plain from the history of Abraham, that wherever he sojourned he found a language in which he could easily converse. That Hebrew was originally the language of Palestine appears plain, moreover, from the names of persons and places in Canaan, and from other facts in respect to the formation of this dialect. E. g. the west is in Hebrew יָם, which means the sea, i. e. towards the Mediterranean sea. As the Hebrew has no other proper word for west, so it must be evident that the language, in its distinctive and peculiar form, must have been formed in Palestine. That this dialect was the original language of mankind, is not established by any historical evidence, which may not admit of some doubt. But it seems highly probable, that if the original parents of mankind were placed in western Asia, they spoke substantially the language which has for more than fifty centuries pervaded those countries. This probability is greatly increased, by the manner in which the book of Genesis makes use of appellatives, as applied to the antediluvians; which are nearly all explicable by Hebrew etymology, and would probably all be so, if we had that part of the Hebrew which is lost.

How far back then the Hebrew dialect in its distinctive form is to be dated, we have no sure means of ascertaining. At the time when the Pentateuch was written, it had reached nearly, if not quite, its highest point of culture and grammatical structure. The usual mode of reasoning would lead us to say, therefore, that it must, for a long time before, have been spoken and cultivated, in order to attain so much regularity of structure and syntax. But reasoning on this subject, except from facts, is very uncertain.

Many of the savage tribes in the wilds of America possess languages which, as to variety in combinations, declensions and expression, are said to surpass the most cultivated languages of Asia or Europe. Homer was as little embarrassed in respect to variety of form, combination or structure, as any Greek poet who followed a thousand years later. The best pledge for the great antiquity of the Hebrew is, that there never has been, so far as we have any knowledge, but one language substantially in western Asia; and of the various dialects of this, the Hebrew has the highest claims to be regarded as the most ancient.

Sketch of the Hebrew language.—From the time when the Pentateuch was composed until the Babylonish exile, the language, as presented to us in the Old Testament, wears a very uniform appearance; if we except the variety of style, which belongs of course to different writers. This period has been usually called the golden age of the Hebrew. On account of this uniformity, many critics deny that the Pentateuch could have been composed five hundred years before the time of David and Solomon, or even long before the captivity. They are willing to admit the antiquity of a few laws, and of some fragments of history in Genesis and some other books. But it is against all analogy, they aver, that a language should continue so nearly the same, as the Hebrew of the Pentateuch and of the historical books, for a space of time so great as this. And besides, they affirm, there are many internal evidences of a later origin, contained in occasional notices of later events, which could not possibly be known in the time of Moses.

In regard to this last allegation, only a single consideration can be here stated. It may be safely admitted, that some things were added to the Pentateuch by writers in later times; such as a completion of the genealogy of the Edomitish princes, Gen. xxxvi. an account of the death and burial of Moses, Deut. xxxiv; and a few other things of a similar nature. But the other allegation, that universal analogy, in respect to other languages, renders it highly improbable that such uniformity in the Hebrew could have been preserved, so long as from the time of Moses down to that of David, or down to the period of the captivity, we may be permitted to doubt; for a greater philological wonder than this, which so much excites their incredulity, can be produced.

Dr. Marshman is very extensively acquainted with the Chinese language, and has published a copious grammar and dictionary of it, with a translation of the works of Confucius, which were written about 550 years before Christ, or, according to the Chinese, much earlier. He asserts, that there is very little difference between the style of Confucius and that of the best Chinese writers of the present day. One commentary on his works was written 1500 years after the text, and another still later, which Dr. Marshman consulted. He found no difference between them and the works of Confucius, except that the original was somewhat more concise. The documents of this philologist, gathered from Chinese records, prove that the written and spoken language of the Chinese (nearly one fourth part of the human race) has not varied, in any important respect for more than 2000 years. (Quarterly Review, May, 1811, p. 401, &c. Marshman's Chinese Gram. in var. loc.) In respect to seclusion from other nations, the Jews bore a very exact resemblance to the Chinese. Like them, they had no foreign commerce or intercourse to corrupt their language. New inventions and improvements in the arts and sciences there were not. What then was there to change the language? And why should not David and Solomon, and others write in the same manner, substantially as Moses did?

In respect to the argument, which concludes against the composition of the Pentateuch by Moses, because there are some things in it, which, if written by him, must be admitted to be predictions, it can here be observed only, that if the inspiration of the Scriptures be admitted, criticism has no right to reject it in any investigations respecting these books; for inspiration constitutes one of the circumstances in which the books were composed, and cannot, therefore, be omitted in the critical consideration of them, without virtually denying the fact of inspiration, and conducting the investigation in an uncritical manner.

The second or silver age of the Hebrew, reaches from the period of the captivity down to the time when it ceased to be a living language. The distinguishing trait of Hebrew writings belonging to this age is, that they approximate to the Chaldee dialect. Nothing is more natural, than that the language of exiles, in a foreign country for seventy years, should approximate to that of their conquerors who held them in subjection. To this period belong many of the Psalms, and the whole books of Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Zechariah, Haggai, Malachi, Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, and perhaps some others. The books of Job and Ecclesiastes abound in Aramæisms; and Canticles exhibits a considerable number. The age of these three last books, as also that of Jonah, Daniel, and the Pentateuch, has been the subject of animated contest among critics on the continent of Europe, for almost half a century. The Chaldaisms, or Aramæisms, of the silver age, consist, either in adopting both the form and meaning of Aramæan words, or in preserving the Hebrew form, but assigning to it an Aramæan signification. (Ges. Gesch. § 10. 4, 5.) What is called the younger or later Hebrew is somewhat distinct from Aramæism. It does not consist in using foreign words, but in a departure from the customary idiom of the older Hebrew, by the adoption of different expressions to convey the same idea. E. g. the early Hebrew calls the shew-bread לחם הפנים; the younger Hebrew לחם פניו. The Hebrew of the Talmud, and of the rabbins, has a close affinity with the later Hebrew.

All the books belonging to the second age are not of the same character in respect to idiom. The book of Job, if it be set down to a later age, though full of Aramæisms, in other respects is a peculiar example of the ancient simplicity of diction. Such is the case with many Psalms, which belong, as their contents plainly show, to the second period. Of the other authors comprised in this period, Jeremiah and Ezekiel merely border upon the silver age in regard to diction. Esther, Canticles, Chronicles and Daniel are strongly tinged with the characteristics of later Hebrew; and the remaining later books are not less strongly marked. Nearly half of the books of Daniel and Ezra is composed in pure Chaldee. In general, the earlier Hebrew writers are entitled to preëminence in respect to their compositions, when considered merely in a rhetorical point of view. But still, among the later class are some of most exquisite taste and genius. Some parts of Jeremiah have scarcely been excelled. Psalms cxxxix, xlv, lxxxiv, lxxxv; several of the Psalms of degrees, cxx, &c. Dan. vii, &c. and other parts of later authors, are fine specimens of writing; and some of them may challenge competition, in respect to excellence of style, with the writings of any age or country.

The Hebrew language throughout, both earlier and later, exhibits a twofold diction, viz. the prosaic and the poetic. Hebrew poetry, so far as we can ascertain, never comprised any thing of the Roman and Grecian measure of long and short syllables, and the varieties of verse arising from this cause. Its distinguishing characteristics are four; viz. a rhythmical conformation of periods or distichs; a parallelism of the same in regard to sense or expression; a figurative, parabolic style; and a diction peculiar to this species of composition. (See Lowth's Lectures on Heb. Poetry, Lec. xviii.—xx; also the Introduction to his Commentary on Isaiah. De Wette's Commentär über den Psalmen, Einleit. § 7.)

The poetic diction displays itself in the choice of words, the meaning assigned to them, and the forms which it gives them. In other respects, too, poetic usage gives peculiar liberty. The conjugations Piel and Hithpaël are sometimes used intransitively; the apocopated future stands for the common future; the participle is often used for the verb; and anomalies in respect to concord, ellipsis, &c. are more frequent than in prose.

As the Aramæan dialect was learned by the Jews during their captivity, and a mixture of this and the Hebrew, ever after their return, was perhaps spoken in Palestine by the people at large; so it is evident, that many words of the old Hebrew, in consequence of this, must fall into desuetude, and the meaning of them become obscured. Of course, the later Hebrew writers were obliged to avoid such words. A comparison of the books of Kings with those of the Chronicles, where they are parallel, is full of instruction in respect to this subject. It will be found, that the author of the Chronicles has introduced the later orthography and forms of words; substituted new words for old ones; given explanations of the ancient text from which he drew the materials of his history; and inserted grammatical glosses of the same, so as to accommodate his style to the times in which he wrote. (Ges. Gesch. § 12.)

There is no probability that the Hebrew language ceased, during the captivity, to be cultivated and understood, in a good degree, by those who were well educated among the Jews. The number of books already extant in it at this period; the reverence with which they were regarded; the care with which they were preserved; all render such a supposition entirely inadmissible. Every nation subjected to a foreign yoke and to exile, does indeed gradually lose its own language and approximate to that of its conquerors. Yet the Jews, who held all foreign nations in abhorrence, were less exposed to this than most others would be. The fact, that after the return from exile, so many authors wrote in the Hebrew dialect, and for public use, demonstrates that the knowledge of the language was not generally lost, although the dialect spoken may have been a mixed one. After the worship of God was renewed in the second temple, the ancient Hebrew Scriptures were unquestionably used in it. In the synagogues, which appear to have been erected not long after this, the Hebrew Scriptures were always used. Even so late as the time of the apostles, this was the case, (Acts xv. 21.) as it has continued to be ever since.

How long the Hebrew was retained, both in writing and conversation, or in writing, after it ceased to be the language of conversation, it is impossible to determine. The coins stamped in the time of the Maccabees are all the oriental monuments we have, of the period that elapsed between the latest canonical writers and the advent of Christ; and the inscriptions on these are in Hebrew. At the time of the Maccabees, then, Hebrew was understood, at least as the language of books; perhaps in some measure also among the better informed, as the language of conversation. But soon after this, the dominion of the Seleucidæ in Syria over the Jewish nation, uniting with the former influence of the Babylonish captivity to diffuse the Aramæan dialect among them, appears to have destroyed the remains of proper Hebrew, as a living language, and to have universally substituted, in its stead, the Hebræo-Aramæan as it was spoken in the time of our Saviour. A representation very different from this has been made by the Talmudists and Jewish grammarians; and, in following them, by a multitude of Christian critics. This is, that the Hebrew became altogether a dead language during the Babylonish exile; which, say they, is manifest from Neh. viii. 8. But as this sentiment is wholly built on a mistaken interpretation of the verse, and as facts speak so plainly against such an opinion, it cannot be admitted. (Ges. Gesch. § 13.)

From the time when Hebrew ceased to be vernacular, down to the present day, a portion of this dialect has been preserved in the Old Testament. It has always been the subject of study among learned Jews. Before and at the time of Christ, there were flourishing Jewish academies at Jerusalem. Those of Hillel and Shammai are the most celebrated. After Jerusalem was destroyed, schools were set up in various places; but particularly they flourished at Tiberias, until the death of rabbi Judah, surnamed Hakkodesh, or the Holy, the author of the Mishna, about A. D. 230. Some of his pupils set up other schools in Babylonia, which became the rivals of these. The Babylonish academies flourished until near the tenth century. From the schools at Tiberias and in Babylonia, we have received the Targums, the Talmud, the Masora, and the written vowels and accents of the Hebrew language.

The Mishna or second law, i. e. the oral traditions of the fathers, was reduced to writing by rabbi Judah Hakkodesh, in the beginning of the third century, as above stated. This constitutes the text of both the Jerusalem and Babylonish Talmuds; and though tinged with Aramæan, still exhibits a style of Hebrew that is pretty pure.

The Gemara or commentary on the Mishna is later. The Jerusalem Gemara belongs, perhaps, to the latter part of the third century; that of Babylon is about three centuries later. Both exhibit a very corrupted state of the Hebrew language. Other Jewish writings, composed about this period, are similar as to their dialect.

The Targums, or translations of the Old Testament, are confessedly Chaldee; but they are quite impure, if you except that of Onkelos. See VERSIONS.

The Masora consists of critical remarks on the text of the Old Testament. A part of it is older than the Targums; but it was not completed, or reduced to its present form, until the eighth or ninth century. Its contents or criticisms show, that already the substantial principles of Hebrew grammar, and the analogical structure of the language, had been an object of particular study and attention.

Among Christians, during the first twelve centuries after the apostolic age, the knowledge of Hebrew could scarcely be said to exist. Epiphanius, who before his conversion was a Jew, probably had a knowledge of the Hebrew tongue; and perhaps Theodoret and Ephrem Syrus whose native language was Syriac, may have understood it. But among all the fathers of the Christian churches, none have acquired any reputation for the knowledge of Hebrew, except Origen and Jerome. In regard to the former, it is very doubtful whether he possessed any thing more than a superficial knowledge of it. (Ges. Gesch. § 27. 1.) But Jerome spent about twenty years in Palestine, in order to acquire a knowledge of this tongue, and has left the fruits of his knowledge behind him, in the celebrated translation of the Hebrew Scriptures called the Vulgate. See VERSIONS.

In consequence of the persecutions and vexations of the Jews in the East, by Christians, and especially by Mohammedans, in the tenth and eleventh centuries, their literati emigrated to the west, and their schools in Babylonia were destroyed. The north of Africa, but particularly Spain, and afterwards France and Germany, became places of resort for the Jews; and here, during the eleventh and twelfth centuries, almost all those important Jewish works in grammar and lexicography were composed, which have been the means of preserving a knowledge of the Hebrew language in the world, and eventually of rousing Christians to the study of this sacred tongue. It was during this period, that the Kimchis, Jarchi, Aben Ezra, and Maimonides flourished; and somewhat later appeared Ben Gerson, Ben Melech, Abarbanel, Elias Levita, and others; who, by their philological labors, prepared the way for the diffusion of Hebrew learning over the Christian world.

During the dark ages, the knowledge of Hebrew appears to have been banished from the Christian world, and to have been commonly regarded as a proof of heresy. But in the fourteenth century, some glimmerings of light appeared. The council at Vienna, in A. D. 1311, ordered the establishment of professorships of oriental literature in the universities. After this, slow but gradual progress was made among Christians in the study of Hebrew, until the sixteenth century; when the reformation, operating with other causes, served to increase the attention among the learned to the original Scriptures. But as yet, the study of Hebrew was embarrassed by many Jewish traditions and conceits, which had been propagated by the rabbins among their christian pupils. Nor was it until about the middle of the seventeenth century, that Hebrew philology made real advances, beyond the limits by which it had as yet been circumscribed. During this century, many grammars and lexicons of the Hebrew and its cognate dialects were published, which increased the means of investigation for future philologists. In the first part of the succeeding century, Schulcius published his philological works, which exhibited deeper researches into the structure and nature of the Semitic languages than had hitherto appeared. The application of the kindred dialects, especially of the Arabic, to the illustration of the Hebrew, was urged much beyond what had before been done. Many eminent philologists were nurtured in his school at Leyden. The great body of critics, almost until the present time, have followed in the path which he trod. Many of them have made an excessive use of the Arabic languages in tracing the signification of Hebrew words. Some of the best lexicographers, such as Eichhorn and Michaëlis, are not free from this fault.

Of late years, a new and much better method of Hebrew philology has commenced, and is still advancing, in a great measure, under the patronage and by the labors of Gesenius at Halle. A temperate use of all the kindred dialects is allowed by this method, or rather enjoined, in illustrating the sense of words; but the most copious illustrations, borrowed from the kindred languages, are those which respect the forms of words, their significance as connected with the forms, and the syntax of the Hebrew language. There is reason to hope that the present age will advance greatly beyond preceding ones, in respect to a fundamental and critical knowledge of the Shemitish languages. See further under LETTERS L. *R.

LAODICEA. There are several cities of this name, but Scripture speaks only of that on the confines of Phrygia and Lydia. Its ancient name was Diospolis, then Rhoas, and lastly, Laodicea. It was situated on the river Lyens, not far above its junction with the Meander; and was the metropolis of Phrygia Pacatiana. Paul had never been in this city, nor had the Laodiceans ever seen his face in the flesh; (Col. ii. 1.) but on information from Epaphras their messenger, that false teachers had propagated pernicious doctrines there and at Colossæ, he wrote to the inhabitants of the latter, and desired them, when they had read his letter, to send it to the Laodiceans. He writes also, as is thought, in the same epistle, that the Laodiceans should also send their letter to the Colossians. "That ye likewise read the epistle from Laodicea," καὶ τὴν ἐκ Λαοδικείας ἴνα καὶ ὑμεῖς ἀναγνῶτε, Col. iv. 16. This expression, however, is ambiguous. It may either signify the letter which the apostle wrote to Laodicea, or that which the Laodiceans wrote to him. The letter to the Laodiceans, which has been attributed to Paul, is universally admitted to be spurious.

Laodicea was long an inconsiderable place, but it increased towards the time of Augustus Cæsar. The fertility of the soil, and the good fortune of some of its citizens, raised it to greatness. Hiero, who adorned it with many offerings, bequeathed to the people more than two thousand talents; and though an inland town, it grew more potent than the cities on the coast, and became one of the largest towns in Phrygia, as its present ruins prove. Among the ruins seen by doctor Chandler, was an oblong amphitheatre, the area of which was about one thousand feet in extent, with a number of other splendid ruins.

"Laodicea was often damaged by earthquakes, and restored by its own opulence, or by the munificence of the Roman emperors. These resources failed, and the city, it is probable, became early a scene of ruin. About the year 1097, it was possessed by the Turks, and submitted to Ducas, general of the emperor Alexis. In 1120, the Turks sacked some of the cities of Phrygia by the Meander, but were defeated by the emperor John Comnenus, who took Laodicea, and repaired and built anew the walls. About 1161, it was again unfortified. Many of the inhabitants were then killed, with their bishop, or carried with their cattle into captivity by the Turkish sultan. In 1190, the German emperor Frederick Barbarossa, going by Laodicea with his army toward Syria on a crusade, was received so kindly, that he prayed on his knees for the prosperity of the people. About 1196, this region, with Caria, was dreadfully ravaged by the Turks. The sultan, on the invasion of the Tartars in 1255, gave Laodicea to the Romans, but they were unable to defend it, and it soon returned to the Turks. We saw no traces either of houses, churches or mosques. All was silence and solitude. Several strings of camels passed eastward of the hill; but a fox, which we first discovered by his ears peeping over a brow, was the only inhabitant of Laodicea." (Trav. p. 225.)

The grandeur of this city in A. D. 79, is sufficiently attested by these ruins; whence we infer, that at the date of the Epistle to the Colossians, (A. D. 60, or 61,) it was a place of consequence. Whether the church here were numerous we know not; but, from the epistle in the Revelations addressed to its minister, it should seem to have fallen into a lukewarm state, (about A. D. 96,) and it is threatened accordingly. It seems, also, that the Laodiceans boasted of their wealth, and knowledge, and garments; which agrees with their history, that they were enriched by the fleeces of their sheep, and eminent in polite studies, as evinced by the odæum, the theatre, the amphitheatre, and the magnified sculptures, the remains of which are still discernible.

LAPIDOTII, the prophetess Deborah's husband, Judg. iv. 4.

LAPWING, a bird by Moses declared to be unclean, Lev. xi. 19. It is about the size of a thrush; its beak is long, black, thin, and a little hooked; its legs gray and short. On its head is a tuft of feathers of different colors, which it raises or lowers as it pleases. Its neck and stomach are something reddish; and its wings and tail black with white streaks. See BIRDS, p. 188.

LASHA. Moses, describing the limits of the land of Canaan, says, that it reaches south to Lasha, Gen. x. 19. The Chaldee and Jerome take this to be the place Callirhoë, east of the Dead sea, where are warm springs, (see ANAH) and this is the more probable opinion; but Calmet thinks it is the city of Lasha, Lusa, or Elusa, at nearly an equal distance between the Dead sea and the Red sea. Ptolemy mentions this city of Lusa, as do Stephens the geographer, and Josephus.

LATTICE, see HOUSE, p. 506.

LAVER, BRAZEN. Moses was directed (Exod. xxx. 18.) to make, among other articles of furniture for the services of the tabernacle, a laver of brass. This is not particularly described as to form; but the lavers made for the temple were borne by four cherubim, standing upon bases or pedestals mounted on brazen wheels, and having handles belonging to them, by means of which they might be drawn, and conveyed from one place to another, as they should be wanted. These lavers were double, that is to say, composed of a basin, which received the water that fell from another square vessel above it, from which they drew water with cocks. The whole work was of brass; the square vessel was adorned with the heads of a lion, an ox, and a cherub; that is to say, of extraordinary hieroglyphic creatures. Each of the lavers contained forty baths, or four bushels, forty-one pints, and forty cubic inches of Paris measure. There were ten made in this form, and of this capacity; five of them were placed to the right, and five to the left of the temple, between the altar of burnt-offerings and the steps which led to the porch of the temple.

In describing the laver made for the tabernacle, the sacred writer says, Moses "made it of brass, and the foot of it of brass, and of the looking-glasses of the women assembling, which assembled at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation," Exod. xxxviii. 8. The impropriety of introducing looking-glasses here is obvious, since a laver of brass could never have been formed out of these; besides, our glass mirrors are quite a modern invention. Dr. A. Clarke conceives, therefore, that the Hebrew word מַרְאֵה, maroth, denotes mirrors simply, and here, mirrors of polished metal, such as were known to be in common use among the ancients; and which Dr. Shaw states to be still used by the Arab women in Barbary. (Jahn, Bib. Arch. § 132. Hartmann, Hebräerium, ii. p. 240. Adam's Rom. Antiq. p. 423.)

LAUGHTER is an indication of joy, insult, mockery, assurance, or admiration. Sarah in her transport of joy called her son Isaac, that is, laughter, Gen. xxi. 6. "At destruction and famine thou shalt laugh;" i. e. thou shalt not fear it, thou shalt be perfectly secure against those evils. God laughs at the wicked; he despises their vain efforts. Ishmael laughed at Isaac; he insulted him, he vexed him. (See Gal. iv. 29.) Laughter in general implies rejoicing. "There is a time to laugh, and a time to weep;" that is, a time to rejoice, and a time to be afflicted, Eccl. iii. 4. "Blessed are ye who weep now, for ye shall laugh," Luke vi. 21, 25. "I said of laughter," of joy, pleasure, "it is mad," Eccl. ii. 2. "Your laughter shall be turned into mourning;" your joy shall terminate in sorrow, repentance, remorse, James iv. 9. Laughter does not become a wise man. "A fool lifteth up his voice with laughter, but a wise man doth scarcely smile a little. The laughter of a fool is as noisy as the crackling of thorns," Eccles. viii. 8. Abraham's laughter, when God promised him a son, was an expression of admiration and gratitude, not of doubt; the Scripture, which relates it, does not disapprove of it, as it does of Sarah's, Gen. xvii. 17.

LAW denotes in general a rule by which actions are to be determined; and is either natural or positive; the former is founded on the unchangeable nature of things, and is therefore immutable; the latter is founded on the circumstances in which rational creatures may happen to be placed, and is therefore changeable. The former is called moral; the latter ritual.

The rabbins pretend that Noah's sons received certain laws which compose the law of nature, and bind all people, in all countries. Maimonides believes, that the first six were given to Adam, and that God added a seventh to Noah. Of these precepts the first ordains submission to judges and magistrates; the second forbids blasphemy against God; the third, idolatry and superstition; the fourth, incest, sodomy, bestiality, and sin against nature; the fifth, murder, and all effusions of blood; the sixth, theft; the seventh, the eating of the limb of an animal while living, that is, of crude blood, &c.

A distinction is generally made between the law of nature and positive laws. The law of nature is impressed on our hearts; such are our obligations to worship the Supreme Being, to honor our parents, to obey superiors, to do to no man what we would not have done to us, &c. Positive laws are of several kinds; civil and political or ceremonial. Judicial, civil and political laws regard principally the duties of men in society, and the order and polity of the state; they restrain the violence of wicked men, defend the weak from the oppression of the strong, and regulate duties, rights and powers. Ceremonial laws respect the external worship of God, the duties of ministers and people towards God, and their reciprocal obligations to one another, with relation to the Divine Being.

The law was given to the Hebrews, by the intervention of Moses, on mount Sinai, fifty days after their departure out of Egypt, A. M. 2513, ante A. D. 1491. (See Exod. xx. &c.)

Some learned men have been of opinion, that Moses in most of his laws intended either to imitate those of the Egyptians, or to reverse their customs and maxims, or to circumscribe the Hebrews, to prevent their falling into those errors, idolatries, and superstitions, which they had seen in Egypt. Others, on the contrary, have asserted, that the Egyptians imitated, in part, at least, the Hebrew laws. Calmet most reasonably concludes, that there was a reciprocal imitation; bearing in mind that the practices of the Mosaic laws, which oppose the superstition of Egypt, were not instituted without design, and that the Jewish legislator intended to cure the Israelites of their proneness to idolatry, and to correct the evil habits which they had contracted in Egypt. What was useful among those of Egypt, might be retained; and such as had been perverted, might be restored to their purity.

The law of Moses being the shadow only of good things to come, (see TYPE,) but bringing nothing to perfection, (Heb. x. 1; vii. 19.) it was necessary that Jesus Christ should complete what was imperfect in it, reform what abuses it tolerated, and fulfil what it only promised and typified. This he has executed with great precision. He declares, (Matt. v. 17.) that he came not to destroy the law, but to perfect it. He has enlarged, modified, or restrained it, more particularly the explanations which the rabbins, and masters in Israel, had given of it; explanations, which were rather corruptions than illustrations. Paul has, in some sort, finished what our Saviour had begun; or rather, he has set in their full light the purposes of his Master. E. g. that the law of Moses is superseded or abrogated by the gospel; that since the death of the Messiah the legal ceremonies are of no obligation; that believers are no longer under the yoke of the law, but under grace; (Rom. vi. 14.) that Christ has procured for us the liberty of sons, instead of the spirit of bondage, which reigned under the Old Testament; in a word, that it is neither the law, nor the works of it, that justify Christians, (Rom. viii.) but faith animated by love, and accompanied with good works, Gal. iv. 31; v. 13. When we say that the gospel has rescued us from the yoke of the law, we understand only the appointments of the ceremonial and judicial law; not those moral precepts, whose obligation is indispensable, and whose observation is much more perfect, and extensive, and enforced, under the law of grace, than it was under the old law.

The Jews affirm, that Moses received with the written code, on mount Sinai, an oral law; that the latter was given only by word of mouth, and has been transmitted by the elders. They give a preference to the oral law, before the written law; for this, they say, is in many places obscure, imperfect, or defective, and could not be used as a rule without the assistance of the oral law, which supplies all that is wanting in the written law, and removes all difficulties. They therefore add to the written law the explanations, modifications and glosses of the oral law, and it is a sort of maxim among them, that the covenant which God made with them at Sinai, consists less in the precepts of the written law than in those of the oral law; and to the latter they generally give the preference. They say that the words of the Levites are more lovely than those of the law; that the words of the law are sometimes weighty and sometimes light; whereas those of the doctors are always weighty; that the words of the elders were of greater weight than those of the prophets. They compare the sacred text to water, and the Mishna, or Talmud, which contains their tradition, to wine; or the written law to salt, but the Mishna and Talmud to most exquisite spices; the law is only, as it were, the body, but the oral law or tradition, is the soul of religion. They have been justly reproached with making the word of God of no effect by their traditions, Mark vii. 13.

The word "law" often implies the Scriptures of the Old Testament. [In the Jewish division of the Old Testament into the law, the prophets and the hagiography, the law, or torah, designates the Pentateuch. R.]

LAWYERS. These functionaries, so often mentioned in the New Testament, were men who devoted themselves to the study and explanation of the Jewish law; particularly of the traditionary or oral law. They belonged to the sect of the Pharisees, and fell under the reproof of our Saviour for having taken from the people the key of knowledge. They were as the blind leading the blind. See SCRIBES.

I. LAZARUS, brother of Martha and Mary, dwelt with his sisters at Bethany, near Jerusalem; and our Saviour sometimes lodged with them, when he visited that city. While he was beyond Jordan with his apostles, Lazarus fell sick; and his sisters sent information to him. He remarked, "This sickness is not unto death, but for the glory of God;" and after two days he said to his disciples, "Lazarus is asleep, but I go to awake him;" meaning, that he was dead, but that he would restore him to life. On his arrival at Bethany, he found that he had been already four days in the grave, but proceeding to the sepulchre, he commanded those who stood by to take away the stone; and having returned thanks to his Father for always hearing him, cried with a loud voice, "Lazarus, come forth!" Lazarus came forth bound hand and foot with grave-clothes, and his face wrapped up in a napkin, and returned home to his family, John xi.

Six days before his last passover, Jesus again visited Bethany, and Lazarus reclined at table with him. The Jews, observing that the resurrection of Lazarus had made a great impression on the people's minds, took a wicked and foolish resolution to effect the death of both. That part of their design which related to our Saviour, they executed; but Scripture does not inform us what became of Lazarus.

II. LAZARUS. In Luke xvi. 19, Jesus in a parable speaks of a poor man, named Lazarus, who lay at a rich man's gate full of sores, and desired the crumbs which fell from his table, without finding relief or pity; while the rich man enjoyed great plenty, was clothed in purple and fine linen, and dined sumptuously every day. Lazarus having died, was carried by angels into Abraham's bosom; the rich man also died, and while he was in hell amidst his torments, he saw Lazarus afar off, and cried out, Father Abraham, have pity on me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the end of his finger in water to refresh my tongue. But Abraham answered him, Son, thou in thy life-time receivest thy good things, and Lazarus his evil things; now he is happy, thou art miserable.

LEAD is a very heavy metal, sufficiently well known. The mode of purifying it from the dross which is mixed with it, by subjecting it to a fierce flame, and melting off its scoria, furnishes several allusions in Scripture to God's purifying, or punishing, his people. The prophet Ezekiel (xxii. 18, 20,) compares the Jews to lead, because of their guilt, and dross, from which they must be purged as by fire. Mention is made of a talent of lead in Zech. v. 7, 8, which probably was of a figure and size as well known as any of our weights in ordinary use; so that though weights are usually called in Hebrew stones, yet, perhaps, they had some of metal only; as this talent of lead, for instance.

Lead was one of the substances used for writing upon by the ancients. See BOOK.

LEAH, wife of Jacob, and Laban's eldest daughter. See JACOB.

LEAVEN was forbidden to the Hebrews, during the seven days of the passover, in memory of what their ancestors did, when they went out of Egypt; they being then obliged to carry unleavened meal with them, and to make bread in haste; the Egyptians pressing them to be gone, Exod. xii. 15, 19; Lev. ii. 11. They were very careful in cleansing their houses from it before this feast began. God forbade either leaven or honey to be offered to him in his temple; that is, in cakes, or in any baked meats. But on other occasions they might offer leavened bread, or honey. See Numb. xv. 20, 21, where God requires them to give the first fruits of the bread, which was kneaded in all the cities of Israel, to the priests and Levites. Paul (1 Cor. v. 7, 8,) expresses his desire, that Christians should celebrate their passover with unleavened bread; which figuratively signifies sincerity and truth. The apostle here teaches us two things; first, that the law which obliged the Jews to a literal observance of the passover is no longer in force; secondly, that by unleavened bread, truth and purity of heart were denoted.

Paul alludes to the care with which the Hebrews cleansed their houses from leaven, when he says, "A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump;" that is, if there were but a small portion of leaven in a quantity of bread or paste, during the passover, it was thereby rendered unclean, and was to be thrown away and burned. Our Saviour (Matt. xvi. 11,) warns his apostles to avoid the leaven of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Herodians; meaning their doctrine.

LEBANON, see LIBANUS.

LEBAOTH, a town in Judah and Simcon, (Josh. xv. 32,) called Beth Lebaoth, in Josh. xix. 6.

LEBBÆUS, otherwise Judas, or Thaddeus, brother of James the Less, son of Mary, sister of the Virgin, and of Cleophas, and brother of Joseph. He was married and had children. Nicephorus calls his wife Mary. The Muscovites believe, that they received the faith from him. See JUDAS IV.

LEBONAH, (Judg. xxi. 19,) a place which Maundrell takes for Chan-Leban, four leagues from Sichem southward, and two from Bethel.

LEECH, see HORSE-LEACH.

LEEK, a pot-herb generally known. The Hebrews complained in the wilderness, that manna grew insipid to them; they longed for the leeks and onions of Egypt. Hasselquist says the karrat, or leek, is surely one of those after which the Israelites repined; for it has been cultivated in Egypt from time immemorial. The favorable seasons for this plant are winter and spring. The Egyptians are extremely fond of it.

LEES, faeces. To drink up the cup of God's wrath, "even to the lees," is to drink the whole cup to the bottom, Ps. lxxv. 8; Isa. li. 17; Ezek. xxiii. 34. The rabbins say that Zedekiah, the last king of Judah, drank the lees of all the foregoing ages. "The lees of the people," signifies the vilest part of them, Isa. xlix. 6, 7. God threatens by Zephaniah, to visit those who are settled on their lees; i. e. hardened in their sins, Zeph. i. 12.

LEGION. The Roman legions were composed each of ten cohorts, a cohort of fifty maniples, and a manipule of fifteen men; consequently, a full legion contained six thousand soldiers. But the number varied at different times. In the time of Polybius it was 4200. (See Adan's Rom. Antiq. p. 367.) Jesus cured a demoniac who called himself "legion," as if possessed by a legion of devils, Mark v. 9. He also said to Peter, who drew his sword to defend him in the olive-garden: "Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father, who shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels?" Matt. xxvi. 53.

LEGS are properly those limbs of an animal, by which it moves from place to place; yet, to manifest the divine omnipotence, and that God is not confined to one mode of action, many creatures have no legs, though they move, (and some swiftly too,) as serpents, worms, snails, &c. and various kinds of fishes, which pass from one place to another, not having even the rudiments of legs. Linnæus classes some kinds of fishes by the situation of their fins, which he considers as answering the purposes of legs, or feet, to land-animals. But, beside being the instruments of motion, the legs of the human frame are the supporters of the body, and great means of strength they are, when in health, firm, stable, secure. As such Scripture often alludes to them, Ps. cxlvii. 10. "Leg" is sometimes used modestly, in the same manner as foot, which see.

LEHABIM, the third son of Mizraim, Gen. x. 13. Some think that Lehabim denotes the Libyans, one of the most ancient people in Africa. In Nab. iii. 9, and Dan. xi. 43, we find mention of the Lubim, which the Vulgate and LXX. every where render Libyans; or, what comes to the same in Nahum and Daniel, they render Nubians. It is clear that this name describes colonies of Egyptians; whether to the west or south, is the question. (See LUBIM.) It is probable that we should restrain our researches after them to the continent of Africa. Certainly we ought to distinguish them from the Lydians of Lesser Asia. The Targum of Jerusalem reads Pentapolitanos, which was a region in the country of Cyrene, including the cities of Berenice, Arsinoe, Ptolemais, and Cyrene; and this is usually considered as a very probable situation for the Lehabim. These and the Lubim are doubtless the same.

LEHI, the jaw-bone. Samson, having vanquished the Philistines with the jaw-bone of an ass, after the conflict threw away the jaw which had been his weapon, and called the spot where it fell, "the place of the lifting up of the jaw-bone—Ramath Lehi." Becoming, soon after, very thirsty, he cried to the Lord, and said, "It is thou, Lord, who hast given this great deliverance into the hand of thy servant: and now shall I die for thirst, and fall into the hands of the uncircumcised?" Upon which God opened one of the large teeth in lehi, the jaw-bone, and a fountain sprung out of it, to allay Samson's thirst; and the place retained the name of Lehi, or the Jaw-bone, Judg. xv. 18. To explain this, Calmet remarks, that the Hebrews sometimes called naked, sharp, and steep rocks, teeth, (1 Sam. xiv. 4, 5; Job xxxix. 28.) and that in this case God opened a rock called Machtes, or the Cheek-tooth, which was at the place where Samson obtained his victory, and which, for this reason, he called Lehi, the Jaw-bone. This fountain issuing out of a rock called the Cheek-tooth, at a place named Lehi, or the Jaw-bone, has induced some to believe that it came immediately out of a tooth-hole in the ass's jaw-bone, which would be a surprising miracle indeed. But as Calmet explains the matter, the miracle of the fountain issuing out of the rock at Samson's prayer is acknowledged; and wonders are not to be multiplied without necessity. This opinion is adopted by Josephus, by the paraphrast Jonathan, and by many commentators. The fountain subsisted long, and still subsists, probably, in Palestine. Glycas, and the martyr Antoninus, speak of it as in the suburbs of Eleutheropolis.

Mr. Taylor has observed, that perhaps this fountain gushed out at the very point in the rock where the jaw-bone of the ass struck when thrown away by Samson; and thus, though the water really issued from the rock, it might seem to issue from under the jaw-bone. He queries, in fact, whether the violence with which the jaw-bone was thrown away by Samson, did not make a breach, or open a crevice in the rock, from which issued water; that part of the rock which before confined it being broken off. If this be just, we see the reason of the name of the fountain, with the veracity of the remark, "it exists to this day;" which, if it had issued merely from the alveole, the hole of a tooth in the jaw-bone of the ass, is not within the compass of credibility; as the jaw itself must have perished in a few years at furthest.

LENTIL, a species of pulse; or a kind of bean. We find Esau longing for a mess of pottage made of lentiles, (Gen. xxv. 34.) and Augustin says, "Lentiles are used as food in Egypt, for this plant grows abundantly in that country; which is what renders the lentiles of Alexandria so valuable, that they are brought from thence to us, as if none were grown among us." In Barbary, Dr. Shaw says, that "lentiles are dressed in the same manner as beans, dissolving easily into a mass, and making a pottage of a chocolate color." This we find was the red pottage which Esau, from thence called Edom, (עֶדוֹם, red, Gen. xxxv. 30.) exchanged for his birthright.

LEOPARD, a fierce animal, spotted with a diversity of colors; it has small white eyes, wide jaws, sharp teeth, round ears, a large tail; five claws on his fore feet, four on those behind. It is said to be extremely cruel to man. Its name, leo-pard, implies that it has something of the lion and of the panther in its nature. It seems from Scripture, that the leopard could not be rare in Palestine. Isaiah, describing the happy reign of the Messiah, says, (chap. xi. 6.) "The leopard shall lie down with the kid, and the calf, and the young lion, and the fatling together." Jeremiah says, (chap. v. 6.) that the leopard lies in ambush near the cities of the wicked; that all they who go out thence shall be torn in pieces by it. And Hosea (chap. xiii. 7.) affirms that the Lord will be unto them as a lion, and as a leopard, lurking in the way of the Assyrians, to devour those who pass by. Jeremiah speaks of the leopard's spots: "Can the Æthiopian change his color, or the leopard his spots?" Scripture often joins the leopard with the lion, as animals of equal fierceness. Habakkuk says, (i. 8.) that the Chaldean horses are swifter than leopard ards. The spouse in the Canticles speaks of the mountains of the leopards, (Cant. iv. 8.) that is to say, of mountains such as Libanus, Shenir, and Hermon, where wild beasts dwelt. Brocard says, that the mountain called by the name of Leopards is two leagues from Tripoli northwards, and one league from Libanus; but we can scarcely believe that Solomon in the Canticles had this mountain in view.

LEPER, a person afflicted with the leprosy. The law excluded such from society; banishing them into the country, and to places uninhabited, Lev. xiii. 45, 46. This law was observed so punctually, that even kings, under the disease, were expelled their palaces, shut out of society, and deprived of the government, as Uzziah, or Azariah, king of Judah, who was afflicted with this malady for attempting to offer incense in the temple, 2 Kings xv. 5; 2 Chron. xxvi. 20. When a leper was cured, he appeared at the city gate, and the priest examined whether he were truly healed, Lev. xiv. 1, &c. After this he went to the temple, took two clean birds, made a wisp with a branch of cedar, and another of hyssop, tied together with a scarlet riband made of wool; an earthen vessel was then filled with water, and one of these birds was fastened alive to the wisp we have mentioned. The leper who was cured killed the other bird, and let the blood of it run into the vessel filled with water. The priest then took the wisp with the live bird, dipped both into the water tinged with the blood of one of the birds, and sprinkled the leper with it. After this the live bird was set at liberty, and the person healed, and purified in this manner, was again admitted to the society of the healthy, and to the use of sacred things.

Many commentators are of opinion, that Job's disease was a leprosy, but in a degree of malignity which rendered it incurable, and produced a complication of diseases.

LEPROSY. Moses mentions three sorts of leprosy; in (1.) men; (2.) houses; and (3.) clothes.

1. Leprosy in men. This disease affects the skin, and sometimes increases in such a manner, as to produce scurf, scabs, and violent itchings, and to corrupt the whole mass of blood. At other times it is only a deformity. The Jews regarded the leprosy as a disease sent from God, and Moses prescribes no natural remedy for the cure of it. He requires only that the diseased person should show himself to the priest, and that the priest should judge of his leprosy; if it appeared to be a real leprosy, capable of being communicated to others, he separated the leper from the company of mankind. He appoints certain sacrifices and particular ceremonies already mentioned for the purification of a leper, and for restoring him to society. The marks which Moses gives for the better distinguishing a leprosy, are signs of the increase of this disease. An outward swelling, a pimple, a white spot, bright, and somewhat reddish, created just suspicions of a man's being attacked with it. When a bright spot, something reddish or whitish, appeared, and the hair of that place was of a pale red, and the place itself something deeper than the rest of the skin, this was a certain mark of leprosy. Those who have treated of this disease, have made the same remarks, but have distinguished a recent leprosy from one already formed and become inveterate. A recent leprosy may be healed, but an inveterate one is incurable. Travellers who have seen lepers in the East, say, that the disease attacks principally the feet. Maundrell, who had seen lepers in Palestine, says, that their feet are swelled like those of elephants, or horses' feet swelled with the farcy. The common marks by which, as physicians tell us, an inveterate leprosy may be discerned, are these: The voice becomes hoarse, like that of a dog which has been long barking, and comes through the nose rather than the mouth: the pulse is small and heavy, slow and disordered: the blood abounds with white and bright corpuscles, like millet-seeds; is, in fact, all a scurfy serum, without due mixture; so that salt put into it does not melt, and is so dry, that vinegar mixed with it bubbles up; the urine is undigested, settled, ash-colored, and thick; the sediment like meal mixed with bran: the face is like a coal half extinguished, shining, unctuous, bloated, full of very hard pimples, with small kernels round about the bottom of them: the eyes are red and inflamed, and project out of the head, but cannot be moved either to the right or left: the ears are swelled and red, corroded with ulcers about the root of them, and encompassed with small kernels: the nose sinks, because the cartilage rots: the nostrils are open, and the passages stopped with ulcers at the bottom: the tongue is dry, black, swelled, ulcerated, shortened, divided in ridges, and beset with little white pimples; the skin of it is uneven, hard and insensible; even if a hole be made in it, or it be cut, a putrefied sanies issues from it instead of blood. Leprosy is very easily communicated; and hence Moses has taken so much precaution to prevent lepers from communication with persons in health. His care extended even to dead bodies thus infected, which he directed should not be buried with others.

We can hardly fail of observing the character, and terror in consequence, of this disease. How dreadful is the leprosy in Scripture! how justly dreadful, when so fatal, and so hopeless of cure! Mungo Park states that the negroes are subject to a leprosy of the very worst kind; and Mr. Grey Jackson, in his "Account of Morocco," (p. 192.) informs us, that the species of leprosy called jeddem, is very prevalent in Barbary. "At Morocco there is a separate quarter, outside of the walls, inhabited by lepers only. Those who are affected with it are obliged to wear a badge of distinction whenever they leave their habitations, so that a straw hat, with a very wide brim, tied on in a particular manner, is the signal for persons not to approach the wearer. Lepers are seen in many parts of Barbary, sitting on the ground, with a wooden bowl before them, begging. They intermarry with each other."

[To the above somewhat meagre account of this terrible disease, it may not be improper to subjoin the accounts given us by some other writers. The following extract from Jahn's Archæology, as translated by professor Upham, affords, perhaps, sufficiently full information: (see p. 189, seq.)

"The leprosy exhibits itself on the exterior surface of the skin, but it infects, at the same time, the marrow and the bones; so much so that the farthest joints in the system gradually lose their powers, and the members fall together in such a manner, as to give the body a mutilated and dreadful appearance. From these circumstances, there can be no doubt, that the disease originates and spreads its ravages internally, before it makes its appearance on the external parts of the body. Indeed, we have reason to believe, that it is concealed in the internal parts of the system a number of years, for instance, in infants commonly till they arrive at the age of puberty, and in adults as many as three or four years, till at last it gives the fearful indications on the skin, of having already gained a well-rooted and permanent existence.

"Its progress subsequently to its appearance on the external surface of the body is far from being rapid; in a number of years it arrives at its middle, and in a number after to its final, state. A person who is leprosy from his nativity may live fifty years; one who in after life is infected with it may live twenty years, but they will be such years of dreadful misery as rarely fall to the lot of man in any other situation.

"The appearance of the disease externally, is not always the same. The spot is commonly small, resembling in its appearance the small red spot that would be the consequence of a puncture from a needle, or the pustules of a ringworm. The spots for the most part make their appearance very suddenly, especially if the infected person, at the period when the disease shows itself externally, happens to be in great fear, or to be intoxicated with anger, Numb. xii. 10; 2 Chron. xxvi. 19. They commonly exhibit themselves, in the first instance, on the face, about the nose and eyes; they gradually increase in size for a number of years, till they become, as respects the extent of surface which they embrace on the skin, as large as a pea or bean. The white spot or pustule, MORPHEA ALBA, and also the dark spot, MORPHEA NIGRA, are indications of the existence of the real leprosy, Lev. xiii. 2, 39; xiv. 56. From these it is necessary to distinguish the spot, which, whatever resemblance there may be in form, is so different in its effects, called Bohak, and also the harmless sort of scab, which occurs under the word מִסְפַּחַת, mispahath, Lev. xiii. 6—8, 29.

"Moses, in the thirteenth chapter of Leviticus, lays down very explicit rules for the purpose of distinguishing between those spots which are proofs of the actual existence of the leprosy, and those spots which are harmless, and result from some other cause. Those spots which are the genuine effects and marks of the leprosy, gradually dilate themselves, till at length they cover the whole body. Not only the skin is subject to a total destruction, but the whole body is affected in every part. The pain, it is true, is not very great, but there is a great debility of the system, and great uneasiness and grief, so much so, as almost to drive the victim of the disease to self-destruction, Job vii. 15.

"There are four kinds of the real leprosy. The first kind is of so virulent and powerful a nature, that it separates the joints and limbs, and mutilates the body in the most awful manner. The second is the white leprosy. The third is the black leprosy, or Psora, Deut. xxviii. 27, 35; Lev. xxi. 20—22. The fourth description of leprosy is the alopécia, or red leprosy.

"The person who is infected with the leprosy, however long the disease may be in passing through its several stages, is at last taken away suddenly, and, for the most part, unexpectedly. But the evils which fall upon the living leper, are not terminated by the event of his death. The disease is, to a certain extent, hereditary, and is transmitted down to the third and fourth generation: to this fact there seems to be an allusion in Exod. xx. 4—6; iii. 7; Deut. v. 9; xxiv. 8, 9. If any one should undertake to say, that in the fourth generation it is not the real leprosy, still it will not be denied, there is something, which bears no little resemblance to it, in the shape of defective teeth, of fetid breath, and a diseased hue. Leprous persons, notwithstanding the deformities and mutilation of their bodies, give no special evidence of a liberation from the strength of the sensual passions, and cannot be influenced to abstain from the procreation of children, when at the same time they clearly foresee the misery of which their offspring will be the inheritors. The disease of leprosy is communicated not only by transmission from the parents to the children, and not only by sexual cohabitation, but also by much intercourse with the leprosy person in any way whatever. Whence Moses acted the part of a wise legislator in making those laws, which have come down to us, concerning the inspection and separation of leprosy persons. The object of these laws will appear peculiarly worthy, when it was considered, that they were designed, not wantonly to fix the charge of being a leper upon an innocent person, and thus to impose upon him those restraints and inconveniences which the truth of such a charge naturally implies; but to ascertain in the fairest and most satisfactory manner, and to separate those, and those only, who were truly and really leprosy. As this was the prominent object of his laws, that have come down to us on this subject, viz. to secure a fair and impartial decision on a question of this kind, he has not mentioned those signs of leprosy which admitted of no doubt, but those only which might be the subject of contention; and left it to the priests, who also fulfilled the office of physicians, to distinguish between the really leprosy, and those who had only the appearance of being such. In the opinion of Heusler, (Geschichte der abendländischen Aussatzes, p. 273.) Moses, in the laws to which we have alluded, discovers a great knowledge of the disease. Every species of leprosy is not equally malignant; the most virulent species defies the skill and power of physicians. That which is less so, if taken at its commencement, can be healed. But in the latter case also, if the disease has been of long continuance, there is no remedy.

"Bohak.—We find mention, in the rules laid down by Moses for the purpose of ascertaining the true tokens of leprosy, of a cutaneous disorder, which is denominated by him Bohak, and of which there is a slight mention above. It was thought by the translator, that it might be interesting to the reader to have some further account of this disorder, and he has accordingly introduced here the answer of Niebuhr, found at page 135 of his Description of Arabia, to the inquiry of Michaëlis on this subject. The words of Moses, which may be found in Leviticus xiii. 38, 39, are as follows: 'If a man or woman have white spots on the skin, and the priest see that the color of these spots is faint and pale, it is, in this case, the Bohak, that has broken out on the skin, and they are clean.' A person, accordingly, who was attacked with this disease, the Bohak, was not declared unclean, and the reason of it was, that it is not only harmless in itself, but is free from that infectious and hereditary character, which belongs to the true leprosy.

"Niebuhr says, 'The Bohak is neither infectious nor dangerous. A black boy at Mocha, who was attacked with this sort of leprosy, had white spots here and there on his body. It was said, that the use of sulphur had been for some time of service to this boy, but had not altogether removed the disease.' He then adds the following extract from the papers of Dr. Forskal. 'May 15th, 1763, I myself saw a case of the Bohak in a Jew at Mocha. The spots in this disease are of unequal size. They have no shining appearance, nor are they perceptibly elevated above the skin; and they do not change the color of the hair. Their color is an obscure white or somewhat reddish. The rest of the skin of this patient was blacker than that of the people of the country in general, but the spots were not so white as the skin of a European when not sunburnt. The spots in this species of leprosy, do not appear on the hands, nor about the navel, but on the neck and face; not, however, on that part of the head where the hair grows very thick. They gradually spread, and continue sometimes only about two months; but in some cases, indeed, as long as two years, and then disappear, by degrees, of themselves. This disorder is neither infectious nor hereditary, nor does it occasion any inconvenience.' 'That all this,' remarks Michaëlis, 'should still be found exactly to hold at the distance of three thousand five hundred years from the time of Moses, ought certainly to gain some credit to his laws, even with those who will not allow them to be of divine authority.' (Commentaries on the Laws of Moses, Smith's translation, vol. iii. p. 283, art. 210.)

"Michaëlis, in discussing the subject of leprosy, expresses his gratitude to God, that the Lepra Arabum, as it is termed by the learned, is known to the physicians of Germany only from books and by name. But this disease, although it is very infrequent in Europe, indeed almost extinct, made its appearance about the year 1730, on the western continent, and spread its ravages among the sugar islands of the West Indies, particularly Guadaloupe. The inhabitants of this island, alarmed and terrified at the introduction of so pernicious a disorder among them, petitioned the court of France to send to the island persons qualified to institute an inspection of those who labored under suspicion of being infected, in order that those who were in fact lepers, might be removed into lazarettos.

"M. Peyssonel, who was sent to Guadaloupe on this business, writes as follows on the third of February, 1757: 'It is now about twenty-five or thirty years since a singular disease appeared on many of the inhabitants of this island. Its commencement is imperceptible. There appear only some few white spots on the skin, which, in the whites, are of a blackish red color, and in the blacks, of a copper red. At first, they are attended neither with pain, nor any sort of inconvenience; but no means whatever will remove them. The disease imperceptibly increases, and continues for many years to manifest itself more and more. The spots become larger, and spread over the skin of the whole body indiscriminately; sometimes a little elevated, though flat. When the disease advances, the upper part of the nose swells, the nostrils become enlarged, and the nose itself soft. Tumors appear on the jaws; the eye-brows swell; the ears become thick; the points of the fingers, as also the feet and toes, swell; the nails become scaly; the joints of the hands and feet separate, and drop off. On the palms of the hands, and on the soles of the feet, appear deep, dry ulcers, which increase rapidly, and then disappear again. In short, in the last stage of the disease, the patient becomes a hideous spectacle, and falls in pieces. These symptoms supervene by very slow and successive steps, requiring often many years before they all occur. The patient suffers no violent pain, but feels a sort of numbness in his hands and feet. During the whole period of the disorder, those afflicted with it experience no obstructions in what are called the naturalia. They eat and drink as usual; and even when their fingers and toes mortify, the loss of the mortified part is the only consequence that ensues; for the wound heals of itself without any medical treatment or application.

When, however, the unfortunate wretches come to the last period of the disease, they are hideously disfigured, and objects of the greatest compassion.

"It has been remarked, that this horrible disorder has, besides, some very lamentable properties; as, in the first place, that it is hereditary; and hence some families are more affected with it than others: secondly, that it is infectious, being propagated by coition, and even by long-continued intercourse: thirdly, that it is incurable, or at least no means of cure have hitherto been discovered. Mercurial medicines, and diaphoretics, and all the usual prescriptions and plans of regimen for venereal complaints, have been tried, from an idea that the infection might be venereal, but in vain: for instead of relieving, they only hastened the destruction of the patients. The medicines serviceable in lues venerea, had no other effect than to bring the disease to its acmé; inducing all its most formidable symptoms, and making those thus treated die some years sooner than other victims to it." *R.

2. The leprosy of houses, mentioned in Lev. xiv. 34, &c. must have been known to the Israelites, who had lived in Egypt, and must have been common in the land of Canaan, whither they were going, since Moses says to them: "When ye come into the land of Canaan, which I give you for a possession, if there be a house infected with a leprosy, he to whom the house belongs shall give notice of it to the priest, who shall go thither. If he sees as it were little holes in the wall, and places disfigured with pale or reddish spots, which in sight are lower than the wall, he shall go out of the house, and direct it to be shut up for seven days. At the end of this time, if he find that the leprosy is increased, he shall command the stones infected with the leprosy to be taken away, and thrown without the city into some unclean place. New stones shall be put in the room of those which were plucked out, and the wall shall be again rough-cast. If the leprosy do not return, the house shall be thought clean; but if it return, it is then an inveterate leprosy; the house shall be declared unclean, and immediately be demolished: all the wood, stone, mortar and dust shall be cast out of the city into an unclean place."

The rabbins and others conclude, that this leprosy of houses was not natural, but was a punishment inflicted by God on wicked Israelites; but Calmet is of opinion that it was caused by animalcula, which erode the stones like mites in a cheese. Might it be similar to the dry-rot in timber? Or, rather, it arose more probably from the effects of saltpetre, which shows itself in greenish or reddish spots on the walls of stone houses, and spreads wider and wider. In the long run it injures the walls; and at all times corrupts the air and is injurious to the health. Hence the propriety of the strict regulations of Moses. (See Michaëlis's Mos. Recht, or Commentary on the Laws of Moses.)

3. The leprosy in clothes is also noticed by Moses, as common in his time. He says, if any greenish or red spots be observed on any woollen or linen stuffs, or on any thing made of skin, they shall be carried to the priest, who shall shut them up for seven days; and if at the end of this time the spots increase, and spread, he shall burn them, as infected with a real leprosy. If these spots are not increased, the priest shall command the clothes to be washed, and if he afterwards observe nothing extraordinary in them, he shall declare them to be clean. If the greenish or red spots remain, he shall order the garments so spotted to be burnt, as unclean, or if they spread and increase, he shall order the garment to be burnt; or if the place suspected of a leprosy be in color like a singed garment, and deeper than the rest, this part of the garment shall be taken away, and the rest preserved. Calmet thinks it very credible, that the leprosy in clothes and skins was caused by vermin. More probably it was a mould or mildew arising from dampness.

LESHEM, probably Laish, or Dan.

LETECH, a Hebrew measure, half an omer; containing sixteen pecks, or four bushels, Hos. iii. 2.

LETTER, THE. Paul places the letter in opposition to the spirit; a way of speaking very common in the ecclesiastical style, Rom. ii. 27, 29; vii. 6; 2 Cor. iii. 6, 7. "God hath made us ministers of the New Testament, not by the letter, but by the spirit; for the law killeth, but the spirit quickeneth;" that is, the law of Moses is incapable of giving life to the soul, and justifying before God those who are most servilely addicted to the literal observance of it. To obtain holiness, we must join with it the spirit of faith, hope and charity; must supply what is deficient in literal observances, by spiritual actions of a more sublime, perfect and excellent nature; for example, instead of bloody sacrifices, the sacrifice of an humble and contrite heart; the mortification of the passions; death unto sin, &c.

I. LETTERS. We know not who was the inventor of letters and writing. All agree that it is an admirable and divine art, to paint speech, and speak to the eyes, and, by tracing out characters in different forms, to give color and body to thought. Some have been of opinion, that God, when he inspired man with reason and speech, communicated to him also a knowledge of writing. Josephus speaks of certain columns, erected before the deluge, by the sons of Seth, upon which they had written astronomical observations and inventions. Adam and Enoch have been reputed authors of certain books, by some, who consequently supposed that they had the use of writing. Others maintain, that the use of letters is much later: some give the honor of them to Abraham; others, to Moses; others, to the Phœnicians; others, to Saturn; others, to the Egyptians. Others, more rationally, divide the honor of the invention among several, and acknowledge that it began among the eastern people, and was much later among those in the west; that some invented, and others perfected the invention; that letters at first were uncommon in their use, and imperfect in their forms; and that afterwards they were perfected, and their use rendered more familiar.

The Egyptian writing was originally hieroglyphics, or figures of animals, and other things, engraven on stone, or painted on wood. This way of writing is, perhaps, the most ancient; and we still see many instances of it on Egyptian obelisks and marbles. Marsham is of opinion, that this way of writing was invented by the second king of Memphis, Thauth, whom the Greeks call the first Mercury; and that another Thauth, or the second Mercury, put into common characters what the first had written in hieroglyphics. All this was in times of the most remote antiquity, if Menes, the first king of Memphis, were Ham, the son of Noah.

Lucan affirms, that the Phœnicians invented the common letters before the Egyptians were acquainted with the use of paper, or with the art of writing in hieroglyphical characters; (lib. iii.) it was probably in imitation of the Phœnicians, therefore, that the Egyptians used letters in their writing. Of this we cannot be certain, but two things we know; first, that there were great resemblances in the ancient characters of the two people; and secondly, that Moses, who was instructed in all the learning of Egypt, wrote in Phœnician characters. The old Egyptian letters are at present unknown, though many of them remain. This people lost the use of their writing when under the dominion of the Greeks, and the Coptic, or modern Egyptian character, is formed from the Greek.

The Phœnicians spread the use of their letters throughout all their colonies. Cadmus carried them into Greece; the Greeks perfected them, and added others. They communicated them to the Latins, and after the conquests of Alexander, extended them over Egypt and Syria. So that the Phœnician writing, which is so ancient, and the parent of so many others, would at this day have been entirely forgotten, had not the Samaritans preserved the Pentateuch of Moses, written in the old Canaanite, or Hebrew, character; by the help of which, medals, and the small remains of Phœnician monuments, have been deciphered.

Some learned men, however, maintain that the square Hebrew character still in use, is the same as was used by Moses; but the greater number suppose that the Jews gradually abandoned the original character while in captivity at Babylon, and that ultimately Ezra substituted the Chaldee, which is now used; while the Samaritans preserved their Pentateuch, written in old Hebrew and Phœnician characters.

It is generally said that the Hebrews have no vowels, and that to supply the want of them, they invented the vowel-points, sometimes used by them in their books. The vowel-points are modern, and the invention of the Massorets, probably from the sixth to the eighth century. They are ten in number, and express the five vowels according to their different changes and pronunciations. The inquisitive reader may find the substance of the dispute for and against the antiquity of the vowel-points clearly and concisely represented by Prideaux, in the first part of his Connection, book v. and from thence may have a distinct view of the chief arguments produced pro and con in this controversy, by those eminent antagonists, Capellus, the two Buxtorfs, &c.

[The subject of the Hebrew letters and vowel points is too important to the biblical student, to be passed over thus slightly. The best source of information on these topics is the work of Gesenius, Geschichte der Heb. Sprache u. Schrift, the results of which are also given by professor Stuart in the Introduction to his Hebrew Grammar, first and second editions. From this the following statements have been condensed. See also LANGUAGE.]

The origin of letters is lost in remote antiquity. But in tracing the history of them, we arrive at a very satisfactory degree of evidence, that in hither Asia they originated among those who spoke the Hebrew language; that they passed from them to the Greeks; and through these to the European nations in general. The ancient Shemitish alphabets may be divided into two kinds:

I. The Phœnician character. To this belong: (a) Inscriptions discovered at Malta, Cyprus, &c. and upon Phœnician coins. (b) Inscriptions upon Hebrew coins. (c) Phœnico-Egyptian inscriptions on the bandages of mummies. (d.) The Samaritan letters. (e) The most ancient Greek alphabet.

II. The Hebræo-Chaldaic character. To this belong: (a) The square character of our present Hebrew Bibles. (b) The Palmyrene inscriptions. (c) The old Syriac, or Estrangelo. (d) The old Arabic or Kufish character, which preceded the Nishi or common character of Arabia at the present time.

To all these characters it is common, that they are read from the right to the left; and that the vowels constitute no part of the alphabet, but are written above, in, or below the line. The old Greek character is, in part, an exception to this remark.

There are three kinds of characters, in which the remains of the ancient Hebrew are presented to us, viz. (1.) The square character in common use. This is sometimes called the Chaldee, or Assyrian, character, because (as the Talmud avers, Gem. Sanh. fol. 21. c. 2.) the Jews brought it from Assyria, or Babylon, on their return from the captivity.—(2.) The inscription character. This is found on ancient Hebrew coins, stamped under the Maccabees.—(3.) The Samaritan character. This is only a variety, or degenerate kind, of the inscription character.

Although it is highly probable, that the present square character was introduced among the Jews by means of the exile, yet it is not likely, that it usurped the place of the more ancient character at once, but came into gradual use, on account of its superior beauty, and the tendency of the language towards what was Aramaean. It is most probable, that the inscription-character approximates the nearest of all the alphabets now known, to the ancient Hebrew, or Phœnician. The square character gradually expelled this from use among the Hebrews; as the Nishi did the Kufish among the Arabians; the present Syriac, the old Estrangelo among the Syrians; or the Roman type, the old black letter among the English. The Palmyrene inscriptions seem to mark the character in transitu; about one half of them resembling the square character, and the other half the inscription-letters. It was very natural for the Maccabees, when they stamped coins as an independent government, to use the old characters which the nation had used when it was free and independent.

The square character was the common one in the time of our Saviour; as in Matt. v. 8, Yodh is evidently referred to, as being the least letter of the alphabet. It is highly probable, that it was the common character in Hebrew MSS. when the Sept. version was made; because the departures from the Hebrew text in that version, so far as they have respect to the letters, can mostly be accounted for, on the ground that the square character was then used, and that the final letters, which vary from the medial or initial form, were then wanting. (Ges. Gesch. § 40—43.)

Manner of writing.—It has commonly been advanced as an established position, that all the ancient Greek and Hebrew MSS. are without any division of words, i. e. are written continua serie. But the Eugubine tables, and the Sigeian inscriptions, have one or two points to divide words; others, still more: which, however, are not used at the end of lines, nor when the words are very closely connected in sense, as a preposition with its noun. Most of the old Greek is written without any division of words. Most of the Phœnician inscriptions are written in a similar way, but not all. Some have the words separated by a point. In this manner, the Samaritan, and the wedge-character among the Persians, are separated. The Kufish, or old Arabic, had spaces between words. So have all known Hebrew MSS. now extant. It is probable, however, that the scriptio continua, i. e. writing without any division of words, was found in the MSS. used by the LXX, because many errors, which they have committed, arise from an incorrect division of words. The synagogue-rolls of the Jews, written in imitation of the ancient Hebrew manuscripts, have no vowel-points, but exhibit a small space between the words. The Samaritan Pentateuch is also destitute of vowels, but divides the words.

The final letters with a distinctive form are not coeval with the alphabet. The LXX manifestly were unacquainted with them; as they often divide words in a manner different from that which would accord with these final letters. But the Talmud, Jerome, and Epiphanius acknowledge them.

It can hardly be supposed that the square character now in use, and which has become uniform in consequence of appearing only in printed books, was altogether immutable while it was transmitted only by MSS. Jerome complains of the smallness of the Hebrew characters; but whether this was owing to the scribe who wrote his manuscript, or to the form of writing then generally used, cannot be determined. From what Origen and Jerome both say of the similarity and relation of Hebrew letters to each other, it appears that the characters were then essentially the same as they now are. (Ges. Gesch. § 46. 1.)

Hebrew MSS. exhibit two kinds of writing:

(1.) The Tam letter, probably so named from Tam, a grandson of Jarchi, about A. D. 1200, with sharp corners and perpendicular coronule, used particularly in the synagogue-rolls of the German and Polish Jews.—(2.) The Velshe letter; such as we see in the Hebrew Bibles of Simonis and Van der Hooght. In MSS. however, this species of character has coronule upon some of the letters. The Spanish printed Hebrew character resembles the Velshe; the German resembles the Tam letter. The coronule in both are omitted. The Spanish letters are square and upright; the German, sharp-cornered and leaning. The Italian and French Hebrew character is a medium between both.

Hebrew vowels.—It has been mentioned that the Shemitish languages exhibit alphabets destitute of vowels; and that these, when added to the text of any book, are placed above, in, or below the line of the consonants. The question whether the written vowels of the Hebrew language were coeval with the consonants, or at least very ancient, has been agitated by many critics, for three centuries past, with great interest and much learning. On the one side it has been maintained, that the vowel-points are coeval with the writings of the Old Testament, or at least with the time of Ezra; on the other, that they are an invention of the Masorites, at some period between the fifth and tenth centuries. A few, however, have taken a middle path, and maintained that some of the vowel-points (probably three) are very ancient; and that in the oldest MSS. they were appended to doubtful words.

The position that the written vowel signs are of comparatively recent date, is now considered, by all critics of any note, as settled. The principal reasons for this opinion may be summarily stated, in a short compass.

(1.) The kindred Shemitish languages anciently had no written vowels. The most ancient Estrangelo and Kufish characters, i. e. the ancient characters of the Syrians and Arabians, it is generally agreed, were destitute of vowels. The Palmyrene, and nearly all the Phœnician inscriptions, are destitute of them. Some of the Maltese inscriptions, however, and a few of the Phœnician, have marks which probably were intended as vowels. The Koran was, at first, confessedly destitute of them. The punctuation of it occasioned great dispute among Mohammedans. In some of the older Syriac writings is found a single point, which, by being placed in different positions with regard to words, served as a diacritical sign. The present vowel system of the Syrians was introduced so late as the time of Theophilus and Jacob of Edessa, about A. D. 800. The Arabic vowels were adopted soon after the Koran was written; but their other diacritical marks did not come into use, until they were introduced by Ibn Mokla about A. D. 900, together with the Nishi character now in common use. It should be added here, that the inscriptions on the Hebrew coins have no vowel-points.—(2.) Jewish tradition generally admits, that the vowels were not written until the time of Ezra.—(3.) The synagogue-rolls of the Pentateuch, written with the greatest possible care, and agreeably to ancient usage as handed down by tradition, have never had any vowel-points.—(4.) The LXX most manifestly used a text destitute of vowel-points; as they have not only departed, in a multitude of instances, from the sense of the pointed text, but even pronounce the proper names in a manner dialectically different from that in which they must be read, according to the vowel-system.—(5.) No explicit mention is made in the Talmud of vowel-points or accents; not even in all the disputes among the rabbins about the sense of words, which are there recorded. Doubtful names of some kind of diacritical signs have been produced from the Talmud, and repeatedly discussed; but no definite and satisfactory proof has been educed from them, that they respect written vowel-points.—(6.) The various readings in our Hebrew Bibles, called Keri, many of which are quite ancient, have no reference to the vowel-points of words.—(7.) Neither Origen nor Jerome makes any mention of the present vowel-marks, or of any technical expressions of Hebrew grammar. Jerome says expressly, that “the Hebrews very rarely use vowels in the middle of words, but pronounce (according to the will of the reader and the difference of countries) the same words with different sounds and accents.” (Epist. 126, ad Evagr.) On Hab. iii. 5, he says of רַבָּר, “tres beræ positæ sunt in Hebræo absque ulla vocali.” In other places, he speaks of a diversitas accentuum upon words; but whether he means a difference in pronouncing them, or that some diacritical sign was occasionally used, which he thus names, it is difficult to determine.

Objections against this view of the subject may be readily answered. The allegation that a language cannot be read without written vowels, is certainly unfounded; for hundreds of Jewish and Arabic volumes are every day read, that were never pointed; not to mention, that in all the Shemitish languages there are unpointed books, manuscripts or inscriptions. Nor has the objection, that an alphabet without vowels is an absurdity, any more weight; for the question is merely a matter of fact, not a discussion respecting what a perfect alphabet ought to be. Besides, even in our own language, one of the first principles in stenography is, to omit all the vowels, and write only the consonants; nor does any difficulty arise from this circumstance.

The allegation that the Targums approximate very closely to the sense of our present Hebrew text as furnished with vowels, is true; but the inference therefrom, that the Targumists must have used MSS. with vowel-points, does not follow. On the contrary, we may draw the conclusion with more probability, that the vowel-points were conformed to the sense which the Targums gave. Both merely convey the traditionary explications of the Jewish schools; and the same thing is done by Origen and Jerome in their commentaries. All that can be proved by such arguments is, that the vowel-points have faithfully transmitted to us the sense which the Jews very early affixed to the words of the Hebrew Scriptures.

Laying aside Jewish traditionary stories, the first certain marks of our present vowel-system may be found in the Masora, compiled, though not concluded, about the fifth century. Most of the vowels are there named. A few of the occidental and oriental readings, collected in the eighth century and printed in some of our Hebrew Bibles, respect the diacritical points; e. g. two of them respect Mappik in He. The various readings of Ben Asher and Ben Naphthali (about A. D. 1034) have exclusive regard to the vowels and accents. The Arabic version of Saadias, made about this time, is predicated upon a pointed text; and the Jewish grammarians of the ninth century appear plainly to proceed on the ground of such a text. The time when the vowel-system was completed cannot be definitely fixed, for want of historical data. Most probably, it was during the sixth or seventh century. Probably, too, it first began, as the accentuation of Greek did, in the schools; and gradually spread, on account of its utility in a dead language, into a great part of the Hebrew manuscripts.

The importance of the vowel-points to learners, can be fully estimated only by those who have studied Hebrew without and with the use of them. In respect to their being a constituent part of the Hebrew language, it may be observed, (1.) That no language can exist without vowels; although it is not necessary that they should be written; and originally, as we have seen, they were not written in the Hebrew.—(2.) It is certain that the vowel-points exhibit a very consistent, deep, and fundamental view of the structure of the Hebrew, which cannot well be obtained without them, by those who study it as a dead language.—(3.) Comparison with the Syriac and Arabic, the latter of which is a living language, shows that the vowel-system, as to its principles, is altogether accordant with the structure of those languages.—(4.) It is quite certain, from comparing the sense of the Hebrew Scriptures as given in the Targums and in the version and notes of Jerome, that the vowel-points do give us an accurate, and for the most part, clear account of the manner in which the Jews of the first four centuries of the Christian era understood the text of the Old Testament. Indeed, it is very remarkable, that there should be so exact a coincidence between the vowel-system and commentaries, or rather versions, of so remote an age; and this only serves to show with how great exactness the vowel-system has been arranged, agreeably to the ancient Jewish ideas of the sense of the Old Testament. The importance, then, of the written vowels, as conveying to us a definite idea of the ancient commentary of the Jewish church, in regard to a great number of difficult and dubious passages, is obviously great.—(5.) The critic and interpreter, being satisfied that the written vowel-system is not coeval with the composition of the Hebrew Scriptures, will not feel himself bound to follow it in cases where it makes no sense, or a sense inconsistent with the context.

The unwary student who is betrayed into the system of Masclef and Parkhurst, which rejects the vowel-points of the Shemitish languages, can scarcely conceive how much loss and disappointment he will experience, by pursuing the study of Hebrew in this method. In a period of one year, the progress by the use of the vowel-points is considerably greater than without them. In two years it is doubled. Moreover, if the student uses the points from the first, he will be able, with almost no trouble, to pass to the reading of Chaldee, Syriac and Arabic. One thing is pretty evident; there never was, and it may be doubted whether there ever will be, a thorough Hebrew scholar, who is ignorant of the vowel-system.

Hebrew accents.—The system of accents, as it now appears in our Hebrew Bibles, is inseparably connected with the present state of the vowel-points; inasmuch as these points are often changed by virtue of the accents. The latter, therefore, must have originated coterminously with the written vowels; at least, with the completion of the vowel-system. Respecting the design of the accents, there has been great diversity of opinion, and much dispute. Three uses have been assigned them, viz. (1.) To mark the tone-syllable of a word. (2.) To mark the interpunction. (3.) To regulate the reading or cantillation of the Scriptures. This latter seems to have been their primitive and most important use; just as similar marks are now found in the Koran to indicate the manner in which it is to be read or cantillated. The cantillation must necessarily have reference to the tone-syllables of every word; and also, in a greater or less degree, to the divisions of the sense; and so far as this, the use of the accents serves to mark these two particulars. *R.

The Hebrews have certain acrostic verses, which begin with the letters of the alphabet, ranged in order.

The most considerable of these is Psalm cxi. which contains twenty-two stanzas of eight verses each, all acrostic; that is, the first eight begin with א, Aleph, the next eight with ב, Beth, and so on. Other Psalms, as xxv. xxxiii. have but twenty-two verses each, beginning with one of the twenty-two letters of the alphabet. Others, as cxi. cxii. have one half of the verse beginning with one letter, and the other half with another. Thus:

. . . . Blessed is the man who feareth the Lord.
. . . . Who delighteth greatly in his commandments.

The first half of the verse begins with א, Aleph; the second with ב, Beth. The Lamentations of Jeremiah are also in acrostic verse, as well as the thirty-first chapter of Proverbs, from the eighth verse to the end.

The Jews use their characters not only for writing, but for numbers, as did the Greeks, who, in their arithmetical computations, fixed a numerical value on their letters. But we do not believe the ancient Hebrews did so, nor that letters were numerical among them. The sacred authors always write the numbers entire and without abbreviation. We know that some learned men have attempted to rectify dates, or supply years, on a supposition that the letters served for numerals in the Scripture; but it was incumbent on them, first, to prove that the ancient Hebrews used that manner.

II. LETTERS, written messages, or other communications, sent from one person to another, and generally implying some matters of secrecy, or at least, of importance. Norden states, that when he and his company were at Essuan, an express arrived there, despatched by an Arab prince, who brought a letter directed to the Reys (or master of their barque.) "The letter, however, according to the usage of the Turks," says the author, "was open; and as the Reys was not on board, the pilot carried it to one of our fathers to read it." (p. 109.) Sanballat sending his servant, then, with an open letter, which is mentioned in Neh. vi. 5, does not appear an odd thing, it should seem; but if it were according to their usages, why is this circumstance complained of, as it visibly is? Why, indeed, is it mentioned at all? Because, however, the sending letters open to common people may be customary in these countries, it is not according to their usages to send them so to people of distinction. So Pococke, in his account of that very country where Norden was when his letter was brought, gives us, among other things, in the 57th plate, the figure of a Turkish letter put into a satin bag to be sent to a great man, with a paper tied to it directed and sealed, and an ivory button tied on the wax. So Lady Montague says, the Bassa of Belgrade's answer to the English ambassador, going to Constantinople, was brought to him in a purse of scarlet satin. (Letters, vol. i. p. 136.) The great Emir, indeed, of the Arabs, according to D'Arvieux, was not wont to enclose his letters in these bags, any more than to have them adorned with flourishes; but that is supposed to have been attributable to the unpoliteness of the Arabs; and he tells us, that when he acted as secretary to the Emir he supplied these defects, and that his doing so was highly acceptable to the Emir. (Voy. dans la Pal. p. 58, 59.) Had this open letter then come from Gessem, who was an Arab, (Neh. vi. 1.) it might have passed unnoticed; but as it was from Sanballat, the enclosing it in a handsome bag was a ceremony Nehemiah had reason to expect from him, since he was a person of distinction in the Persian court, and then governor of Judea; and the not observing it was the greatest insult, insinuating, that though Nehemiah was, according to him, preparing to assume the royal dignity, he should be so far from acknowledging him in that character, that he would not even pay him the compliment due to every person of distinction. If this be the true representation of the affair, commentators have given but a poor account of it. Sanballat sent Nehemiah a message, says one of them, "pretending, it is likely, special respect and kindness to him, informing him what was laid to his charge." (Harmer, Obs. vol. ii. p. 129.)

Contrast with this open letter to Nehemiah the closed, rolled or folded letter sent by Sennacherib to Hezekiah, 2 Kings xix. 14. We read, verse 9, "He sent messengers to Hezekiah, saying"—"And Hezekiah received the letter at the hand of the messengers, and read it; and Hezekiah went up into the house of the Lord, and spread it before the Lord." It was therefore folded or rolled, and no doubt enclosed in a proper envelope. Consider also the passage in Isa. xxix. 11, "And the vision shall be to you, as the words of a letter that is sealed—sealed up in a bag, closely—which is given to a man of learning to read, but he says, 'It is sealed'—how should I know what information it contains? I merely can discover to whom it is directed;" while the unlearned cannot even read the address. We see such occurrences daily in the streets of London; messengers, sent with letters, desire passengers to read the directions for them. The messengers sent to Hezekiah are described as saying, when in fact they say nothing; but only deliver a letter containing the message.

It is proper to add something relative to the customary kind of homage which, in the East, is paid not only to sovereignty, but to communications of the sovereign's will, whether by word or by letter. "When the Mogul, by letters, sends his commands to any of his governors, those papers are entertained with as much respect as if himself were present; for the governor, having intelligence that such letters are come near him, himself, with other inferior officers, rides forth to meet the Patamar, or messenger, that brings them; and as soon as he sees those letters, he alights from his horse, falls down on the earth, and takes them from the messenger, and lays them on his head, whereon he binds them fast: then, retiring to his place of public meeting, he reads, and answers them." (Sir Thomas Roe's Embassy, p. 453.) This binding of these letters on his head is, no doubt, to do them honor. What then shall we think of the force of Job's expressions, chap. xxxi. 35: "O that mine adversary had written a book, roll, accusation, bill; surely I would take it on my shoulder, and would bind it as a crown upon me," that is, on my head. This idea, then, of the poet, was drawn from real observation of life; not from fancy, but from fact; though to us it seems singular, if not extravagant. "The letter which was to be presented to the new monarch was delivered to the general of the slaves. It was put up in a purse of cloth of gold, drawn together with strings of twisted gold and silk, with tassels of the same; and the chief minister put his own seal [upon it, to close it.] Nor was any omitted of all those knacks and curiosities, which the oriental people make use of in making up their epistles. The general threw himself at his majesty's feet, bowing to the very ground; then, rising upon his knees, he drew out of the bosom of his garment the bag wherein was the letter which the assembly had sent to the new monarch. Presently he opened the bag, took out the letter, kissed it, laid it on his forehead, presented it to his majesty, and then rose up." (Chardin's Coron. of Soleiman, p. 44.) This is a clear confirmation of the sense given to the passages quoted in the article KISS.

LEVI, the third son of Jacob and Leah, was born in Mesopotamia, A. M. 2248, Gen. xxix. 34. After Sichen, the son of Hamor, had violated Dinah, sister to Levi and Simcon, these two brethren fraudulently engaged him to receive circumcision, and on the third day, when the pain was greatest, they entered the town, slew all the males, carried off their sister Dinah, and pillaged the place, chap. xxxiv. 25, 26. This action was very displeasing to their father Jacob, who characterized it as one of extreme cruelty and abhorrence, Gen. xlv. 11; xlix. 5, 6.

Levi was, according to his father's prediction, scattered over all Israel, having no share in the division of Canaan, but certain cities in the portions of other tribes. He was not the worse provided for, however, since God chose the tribe for the service of the temple and priesthood, and bestowed on it many privileges above the other tribes, in dignity, and in the advantages of life. All the tithes, first-fruits, and offerings, presented at the temple, as well as several parts of all the victims that were offered, belonged to the tribe of Levi. See LEVITES.

LEVIATHAN. This word (לִיָּאָתָן) occurs in four places in the Old Testament, and is variously translated, whale, dragon, serpent, and sea-monster; not improperly, probably, since it appears to be employed by the sacred writers to describe all these, and perhaps other animals also; though one description of animal appears to be marked out more particularly by the term.

Many of the old commentators were of opinion that the whale was the animal described by Job; (chap. xli.) but Beza, Diodati, and some other writers, contended for the crocodile, which interpretation Bochart has since defended with a train of argument which defies contradiction. (Hieron. iii. p. 737—774. Rosenmüller.) It is a sufficient objection to the whale tribes, says Dr. Good, that they do not inhabit the Mediterranean, much less the rivers that empty themselves into it. This family of marine monsters, moreover, have neither proper snout nor nostrils; they have a mere spiracle, or blowing hole, with a double opening on the top of the head, which has not hitherto been proved to be an organ of smell; and for teeth, a hard expanse of horny laminae, which we call whalebone, in the upper jaw, but nothing of the sort in the under. The eyes of the common whale, too, instead of answering the description here given, are most disproportionably small, and do not exceed in size those of an ox. Nor can this monster be regarded as of fierce habits, or unconquerable courage; for instead of attacking the larger sea animals for plunder, it feeds chiefly on crabs and medusas, and is often itself attacked and destroyed by the ork or grampus, though less than half its size.

The crocodile, on the contrary, is a natural inhabitant of the Nile, and other Asiatic and African rivers; of enormous voracity and strength, as well as fleetness in swimming; attacks mankind, and the largest animals, with most daring impetuosity; when taken by means of a powerful net, will often overturn the boats that surround it; has, proportionally, the largest mouth of all monsters whatever; moves both its jaws equally, the upper of which has not less than forty, and the lower than thirty-eight, sharp, but strong and massy, teeth; and is furnished with a coat of mail so scaly and callous, as to resist the force of a musket-ball in every part, except under the belly. The general character of the leviathan, in fact, seems so well to apply to this animal, in modern as well as in ancient times, the terror of all the coasts and countries about the Nile, that it is unnecessary to seek further.

[The following extract of a letter from an American gentleman in Manilla, dated October 6, 1831, gives a graphic view of the strength and size of the crocodile: "I have recently been sick, but have passed a month in the country, and am entirely recovered. I resided on a large plantation on the lake, about thirty miles in the interior, and was treated with the utmost attention and hospitality. I hunted deer and wild boar with much success. My last operation in the sporting line, was no less than killing an alligator or crocodile; which for a year or two before had infested a village on the borders of the lake, taking off horses and cows, and sometimes a man. Having understood that he had killed a horse a day or two before, and had taken him into a small river, I proceeded to the spot, which was distant, accompanied by my host, closed the mouth of the river with strong nets, and attacked the huge brute with guns and spears. After something of a desperate battle, we succeeded in driving him against the nets, where, being considerably exhausted by the wounds he had received from balls and lances, he got entangled, was dragged on shore, and the 'coup de grace' given to him. He measured twenty feet in length, and from eleven to thirteen feet in circumference, the smallest part being eleven and the largest thirteen. The head alone weighed two hundred and seventy-five pounds. He had nearly the whole of the horse in him, and the legs, with the hoofs, were taken out entire. This capture has caused considerable sensation, not only on the field of battle, but at Manilla, none of equal size having been before seen; and it is rarely that any of small size are taken." *R.

The article which Calmet has furnished on the leviathan, is very meagre and unsatisfactory; we have therefore availed ourselves of the able disquisition of Dr. Harris, who has bestowed more than his ordinary labor upon the subject.

The chapter introduces two speakers in the shape of dialogue, one of whom questions the other in regard to such and such circumstances relating to the leviathan; and this continues till the twelfth verse; at which the description of leviathan commences. The dialogue is professed to be between the Almighty Jehovah and his servant Job. But whether it is Jehovah himself, or some one representing him, is not to be inquired in this place. As it is, the person appears extremely well acquainted with the crocodile, as he does also with the other animals described in the thirty-ninth and fortieth chapters. The other person of the dialogue appears to be one well knowing the worship paid to the crocodile: and the eleven first verses are an exposure of the folly of making an animal of a savage nature, and one whose head could be pierced with fishhooks, a god. Of these eleven verses, the first six appear to relate to the mode of treatment received by the crocodile in the places where he was worshipped; the remaining five to his treatment at Tentyra, and wherever he was considered as a destructive animal. At the twelfth verse the description of leviathan commences, and is divided into three parts, and classed under the different heads of, (1.) ברוי, his parts; (2.) רבר גבורתו, great might; (3.) הין עינו, his well-armed make. Of these the first and the third describe him as truly as a naturalist would do. The second or middle part magnifies him as a god. If, then, this second part be in honor of the crocodile as God, then the person speaking it must be either an inhabitant of Egypt, a worshipper of that animal, or one well acquainted at least with his worship; or, perhaps, the whole chapter may be altogether an argument, founded on the idolatrous homage paid to this creature.

The following is the doctor's corrected version of this description; with explanations and references to the crocodile:

Behold leviathan! whom thou leadest about with a hook,
Or a rope which thou fixest upon his snout.

It is no easy matter, says Mr. Scott, to fix the precise meaning of the several terms here used: they seem, however, to denote, in general, the instruments made use of, partly for the taking him alive in the water, and partly for governing him when brought to land. Herodotus expressly asserts, (l. ii. 70.) that one of the modes by which this creature was occasionally taken, in his time, was by means of a hook, ἄγκιστρον, γκίζος, which was baited with a dog's chine, and thrown into the midst of the river; the crocodile, having swallowed which, was drawn on shore, and despatched.

Hast thou put a ring in his nose,
Or pierced his cheek through with a clasp?

This has been usually supposed to refer to the manner of muzzling the beast, so as to be able to lead him about, by a hook or ring in the nostrils, as is threatened Pharaoh under the emblem of the crocodile, Ezek. xxix. 4. But Mr. Vansittart thinks the words here used expressive of ornaments; and says, "This second verse may be considered as expressive of leviathan led about, not as a sight, but in his state of divinity; and the γκίζος, a gold ring or ornament worn at the nose; for, in the eastern countries, nasal rings are as frequent as any other ornament whatever. The commentators and lexicographers, not dreaming of applying Herodotus's account of the Thebaïd crocodile to the illustration of leviathan, have imagined only large rings for the purpose of chaining leviathan. Herodotus says, the ears and fore feet were the parts from which the ornaments were suspended. But, as the ears do not appear capable of bearing ear-rings, from their lying extremely flat upon the lower jaw, perhaps they were put upon other parts; or the historian, hearing that the sacred crocodile was adorned with ornaments, fixed them naturally upon the ears and fore feet, as ear-rings and necklaces were the most usual ornaments of the Greeks. Very likely the ornaments were not always put upon the same parts, but varied at different times; and that in the time of the Hebrew writer, the nose and the lips received the ornaments which, in the days of the Greek historian, were transferred to the ears and fore feet. The exact place of the ornaments is, however, of no material consequence; it is sufficient for our purpose to know, that ornaments were put upon the sacred crocodile, and that he was treated with great distinction, and in some degree considered a domestic animal. The three verses immediately following, speak of him as such; as entering into a covenant of peace, being retained in subjection, &c.

Has he made many supplications to thee?
Has he addressed thee with flattering words?
Hast thou, in return, made a league with him,
And received him into perpetual service?

The irony here is very apparent. The sacred poet shows a wonderful address in managing this deriding figure of speech, in such a manner as not to lessen the majesty of the great Being into whose mouth it is put.

Hast thou played with him as a bird?
Wilt thou engage him for thy maidens?
Shall thy partners spread a banquet for him,
And the trading strangers bring him portions?

Job is here asked how he will dispose of his captive; whether he will retain him in his family for his own amusement, or the diversions of his maidens; or exhibit him as a spectacle to the Phœnician caravans. But Mr. Vansittart gives quite another turn to the verse. He thinks that the word הברים, which I have rendered "partners," signifies *charm*ers (incantatores); hence rendered by the Chaldee Targum חכמים, wise men; and that it is to be applied to the priests who had the charge of the sacred crocodile, and might as well be called charmers of the crocodile, as the psylli were of serpents; and שָׁרָרָה, which is at present rendered "merchants," may be formed from שָׁרָר, prostravit, humilem reddere, and mean suppliants, worshippers. Hence, he would understand it of the PRIESTS making a feast, and the SUPPLIANTS going up to make offerings.

Hast thou filled his skin with barbed irons,
Or his head with harpoons?

The impenetrability of his skin is here intimated, and is afterwards described at large. The attempt to wound him with missile weapons is ridiculed. This is a circumstance which will agree to no animal so well as to the crocodile. The weapons mentioned are undoubtedly such as fishermen use in striking large fish at a distance.

Make ready thy hand against him.
Dare the contest; be firm.
Behold! the hope of him is vain;
It is dissipated even at his appearance.

The hope of mastering him is absurd. So formidable is his very appearance, that the resolution of his opposer is weakened, and his courage daunted.

None is so resolute that he dare rouse him.
Who then is able to contend with me?
What will stand before me, yea, presumptuously?
Whatsoever is beneath the whole heavens is mine.
I cannot be confounded at his limbs and violence,
Nor at his power, or the strength of his frame.

"However man may be appalled at attacking the leviathan, all creation is mine; his magnitude and structure can produce no effect upon me. I cannot be appalled or confounded; I cannot be struck dumb."

Job is, in this clause, taught to tremble at his danger in having provoked, by his murmurs and litigation, the displeasure of the Maker of this terrible animal.

The poet then enters upon a part of the description which has not yet been given, and which admirably pairs with the detailed picture of the war-horse and behemoth. Nor does he descend from the dignity he had hitherto supported, by representing the great Creator as displaying his own wonderful work, and calling upon man to observe the several admirable particulars in its formation, that he might be impressed with a deeper sense of the power of his Maker.

Who will strip off the covering of his armor?
Against the doubling of his nostrils who will advance?

This verse is obscure. The first line, however, seems to describe the terrible helmet which covers the head and face of the crocodile. The translation might be, "Who can uncover his mailed face?" If, in the days of Job, they covered their war-horses in complete armor, the question will refer to the taking off the armor; and the scales of leviathan be represented by such an image. Then, the second line may denote bridling him, after the armor is stripped off, for some other service.

The doors of his face who will tear open?
The rows of his teeth are TERROR:
The plates of his scales, TRIUMPH!
His body is like embossed shields;
They are joined so close one upon another,
The very air cannot enter between them.

Each is inserted into its next;
They are compact, and cannot be separated.

The mouth of the crocodile is very large; and the apparatus of teeth perfectly justifies this formidable description. The indissoluble texture, and the largeness of the scales with which he is covered, are represented by the powerful images of these verses.

His snortings are the radiance of light;
And his eyes as the glancing of the dawn.

Schultens remarks, that amphibious animals, the longer time they hold their breath under water, respire, so much the more strongly when they begin to emerge; and the breath, confined for a length of time, effervesces in such a manner, and breaks forth so violently, that they appear to vomit forth flames.

The eyes of the crocodile are small, but they are said to be extremely piercing out of the water. Hence, the Egyptians, comparing the eye of the crocodile, when he first emerged out of the water, to the sun rising from out of the sea, in which he was supposed to set, made the hieroglyphic of sunrise. Thus Horus Apol. says, (lib. i. § 65.) "When the Egyptians represent the sunrise, they paint the eye of the crocodile, because it is first seen as that animal rises out of the water."

From out of his mouth issue flashes;
Sparks of fire stream out;
From his nostrils bursteth fume,
As from the rush-kindled oven.
His breath kindleth coals;
Raging fire spreadeth at his presence.

Here the creature is described in pursuit of his prey on the land. His mouth is then open. His breath is thrown out with prodigious vehemence; it appears like smoke, and is heated to that degree as to seem a flaming fire.

The images which the sacred poet here uses are indeed very strong and hyperbolic; they are similar to those in Ps. xviii. 8: "There went a smoke out of his nostrils, and fire out of his mouth devoured; coals were kindled by it." Ovid (Metam. viii.) does not scruple to paint the enraged boar in figures equally bold:

Lightning issueth from his mouth,
And boughs are set on fire by his breath.

Silius Italicus (l. vi. v. 208.) has a correspondent description.

In his neck dwelleth MIGHT:
And DESTRUCTION exulteth before him.

Might and destruction are here personified. The former is seated on his neck, as indicating his power, or guiding his movements; and the latter is leaping and dancing before him when he pursues his prey, to express the terrible slaughter which he makes.

The flakes of his flesh are compacted together
They are firm, and will in no wise give away.
His heart is as hard as a stone,
Yea, as hard as the nether mill-stone.

These strong similes may denote not only a material, but also a moral, hardness—his savage and unrelenting nature. Ælian calls the crocodile "a voracious devourer of flesh, and the most pitiless of animals."

At his rising, the mighty are alarmed;
Frighted at the disturbance which he makes in the water,
The sword of the assailant is shivered at the onset,
As is the spear, the dart, or the harpoon.
He regardeth iron as straw;
Copper as rotten wood.
The arrow cannot make him flee,
Sling-stones he deemeth trifling;
Like stubble is the battle-axe reputed;
And he laugheth at the quivering of the javelin.

These expressions describe, in a lively manner, the strength, courage, and intrepidity of the crocodile. Nothing frightens him. If any one attack him, neither swords, darts, nor javelins avail against him. Travellers agree, that the skin of the crocodile is proof against pointed weapons.

His bed is the splinters of flint,
Which the broken rock scattereth on the mud.

This clause is obscure, and has been variously rendered. The idea seems to be, that he can repose himself on sharp-pointed rocks and stones with as little concern as upon mud.

He maketh the main to boil as a caldron;
He snuffeth up the tide as a perfume.
Behind him glittereth a pathway;
The deep is embroidered with hoar.

To give a further idea of the force of this creature, the poet describes the effect of his motion in the water. When a large crocodile dives to the bottom, the violent agitation of the water may be justly compared to liquor boiling in a caldron. When swimming upon the surface, he cuts the water like a ship, and makes it white with foam; at the same time his tail, like a rudder, causes the waves behind him to froth and sparkle like a trail of light. These images are common among the poets. Thus Homer, (Odys. l. xii. v. 235.) as translated by Pope:

..... "Tumultuous boil the waves;
They toss, they foam, a wild confusion raise;
Like waters bubbling o'er the fiery blaze."

He hath not his like upon earth,
Even among those made not to be daunted,
He looketh upon every thing with haughtiness;
He is king over all the sons of the fierce.

Mr. Good observes, that all the interpreters appear to have run into an error in conceiving, that "the sons of pride or haughtiness, in the original בְּנֵי גִבּוֹר, refer to wild beasts, or monsters of enormous size; it is far more confounding to the haughtiness and exultation of man,—to that undue confidence in his own power, which it is the very object of this sublime address to humiliate, to have pointed out to him, even among the brute creation, a being which he dares not to encounter, and which laughs at all his pride, and pomp, and pretensions, and compels him to feel in all these respects his real littleness and inferiority. It is difficult, perhaps impossible, to find a description so admirably sustained in any language of any age or country. The whole appears to be of a piece, and equally excellent."

The word leviathan is also found in the original of Job, chap. iii. 8, in our version rendered "mourning." Mr. Good has a long note, explaining the passage as having a reference to ancient sorceries, and execrating incantations. Gesenius supposes it to refer to the power of drawing out serpents from their lurking places by means of music. (See INCHANTMENTS.) Mr. Scott's version and note are as follows:

Let them curse it that curse the day
Of those who shall awake leviathan.

To stir up, or awake, leviathan is represented, in chap. xli. 8—10, to be inevitable destruction. It was natural to mention such a terrible casualty in the strongest terms of abhorrence, and to lament those who so miserably perished with the most bitter imprecations on the disastrous day. Job here calls for the assistance of such language, to execrate the fatal night of his nativity. Or it may have a reference to the execration expressed by the Ombitæ against the Tentyrites. The Ombitæ were the inhabitants of Ombos, a town upon the right bank of the Nile, not far from the cataracts of the ancient Siene, now Assuan. This people were remarkable for the worship of the crocodile, and the foolishly kind manner in which they treated and cherished him. Their nearly opposite neighbors, the Tentyrites, were, on the contrary, conspicuous for their hatred and persecution of the same animal. The different mode of treatment of this animal produced deadly feuds and animosities between the two people, which Juvenal, in his fifteenth Satire, ridicules most justly. He was an eye-witness of the hostility described, residing as a Roman officer at Syene. If there be any allusion to this in the passage before us, it would mean, "Let my birth be held in as much abhorrence, as is that of those who are the rousers of leviathan."

Between two neighboring towns a rancorous rage
Yet burns; a hate no lenients can assuage.
Juv. Sat. xv. v. 35.

By leviathan, (Ps. lxxiv. 14.) we may suppose Pharaoh to be represented, as a king of Egypt is called by Ezekiel, (chap. xxix. 3.) "the great dragon [or crocodile] that lieth in the midst of his rivers;" and if, says Mr. Merriek, the Arabic lexicographers quoted by Bochart (Phaleg. l. i. c. 15.) rightly affirm that Pharao, in the Egyptian language, signified a crocodile, there may possibly be some such allusion to his name in these texts of the psalmist and of Ezekiel, as was made to the name of Draco, when Herodius, in a sarcasm recorded by Aristotle, (Rhet. l. ii. c. 23.) said that his laws, which were very severe, were the laws ὅντι ἀνθρώπων ἀλλὰ δράκοντος, non hominis sed draconis. Moses Chorenensis mentions some ancient songs, which called the descendants of Astages a race of dragons, because Astages in the Armenian language signified a dragon, (l. i. c. xxix.)

LEVIRATE, see MARRIAGE.

LEVITES. All the descendants of Levi may be comprised under this name; but chiefly those who were employed in the lower services in the temple, by which they were distinguished from the priests, who were of the race of Levi, by Kohath, and were employed in higher offices. The Levites were the descendants of Levi, by Gershom, Kohath and Merari, excepting the family of Aaron; for the children of Moses had no part in the priesthood, and were only common Levites. God chose the Levites instead of the first-born of all Israel, for the service of his tabernacle and temple, Numb. iii. 6, &c. They obeyed the priests in the ministrations of the temple, and sung and played on instruments, in the daily services, &c. They studied the law, and were the ordinary judges of the country; but subordinate to the priests. God provided for the subsistence of the Levites, by giving to them the tithes of corn, fruit and cattle; but they paid to the priests the tenth of their tithes; and as the Levites possessed no estates in land, the tithes which the priests received from them were considered as the first-fruits which they were to offer to the Lord, Numb. xviii. 21—24.

God assigned for the habitations of the Levites forty-eight cities, with fields, pastures and gardens, Numb. xxxv. Of these, thirteen were given to the priests, six of which were cities of refuge, Josh. xx. 7; xxi. 19, &c. While the Levites were actually employed in the temple, they were supported out of the provisions kept in store there, and out of the daily offerings. (See Deut. xii. 18, 19; xviii. 6—8.) The consecration of Levites was without much ceremony. (See Numb. viii. 5; 2 Chron. xxix. 34.)

The Levites were no peculiar habit to distinguish them from other Israelites, till the time of Agrippa, whose innovation in this matter is mentioned by Josephus, (Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 8.) who remarks, that the ancient customs of the country were never forsaken with impunity.

The Levites were divided into different classes; the Gershonites, Kohathites, Merarites and the Aaronites, or priests, Numb. iii. &c. The Gershonites were in number 7,500. Their office in the marches through the wilderness was to carry the veils and curtains of the tabernacle. The Kohathites were in number 8,600. They were employed in carrying the ark and sacred vessels of the tabernacle. The Merarites were in number 6,200. They carried those pieces of the tabernacle which could not be placed on chariots. Thus we find that the whole number of the Levites amounted to 22,300, of whom 8,580 were fit for service, and 13,720 unfit, being either too old or too young, Numb. iii. iv. When the Hebrews encamped in the wilderness, the Levites were placed round about the tabernacle; Moses and Aaron at the east, Gershom at the west, Kohath at the south, and Merari at the north.

The Levites were not to enter upon their service at the tabernacle till they were 25 years of age; (Numb. viii. 24.) or, as in chap. iv. 3, from 30 to 50 years old. But David fixed the time of service at 20 years. The priests and Levites waited by turns, weekly, in the temple, 1 Chron. xxiii. 24; 2 Chron. xxxi. 17; Ezra iii. 8.

LEVITICUS, the third book in the Pentateuch; called Leviticus, because it contains principally the laws and regulations relating to the priests, Levites and sacrifices. The Hebrews call it "the priests' law;" and also vayikra, because in Hebrew it begins with this word, and he called. The first seven chapters prescribe the ceremonies in offering burnt-sacrifices, meat-offerings, bread and cakes, peace-offerings or thanksgivings, and sin-offerings; regulating what parts were to be consumed on the fire of the altar, and what were to be given to the priest, who offered them. This is followed by directions as to the manner in which the priests were to be consecrated, and what sacrifices were to be offered on that occasion. On occasion of the punishment of Nadab and Abihu, Moses appoints the mourning of the priests, and forbids them to drink wine while waiting in the temple. Chapters xi. to xv. give rules for distinguishing beasts clean and unclean; also relative to the leprosy of men, of houses and of habits; for the purification of men indisposed with gonorrhœa, and of women after child-birth. After this, the ceremonies on the day of solemn expiation are regulated; also the degrees of relation permitted or forbidden in marriage. Then follow prohibitions of alliances with the Canaanites, of idolatry, theft, perjury, calumny, hatred, Gentile superstitions, magic, divination, sooth-saying, prostitution and adultery. Chapter xxvii. notices the principal festivals in the year, (including the story of a man who was stoned to death for having blasphemed the sacred Name,) the sabbatical and the jubilee years, and some directions relative to vows and tithes.

This book is generally held to be the work of Moses, though probably assisted by Aaron. It contains the history of the eight days of Aaron and his sons' consecration, A. M. 2514.

LIBANUS, or LEBANON, a long chain of limestone mountains, on the northern border of Palestine. It consists of two principal ridges, the easterly ridge being called Anti-Libanus by the Greeks. The western ridge, or proper Libanus, runs nearly parallel to the coast of the Mediterranean; the eastern, or Anti-Libanus, runs first east, but soon inclines in like manner to the north. Between these two ridges is a long valley called Cele-Syria, or Hollow Syria, the Valley of Lebanon, (Josh. xi. 17.) at present Bukkah; it opens towards the north. The elevation of Lebanon is so great, that it is always covered in many places with snow; whence in all probability it derives its name. It is composed of four enclosures of mountains, which rise one on the other. The first is very rich in grain and fruits; the second is barren, abounding in thorns, rocks and flints; the third, though higher than this, enjoys a perpetual spring, the trees being always green, and the orchards filled with fruit: it is so agreeable and fertile, that some have called it a terrestrial paradise. The fourth is so high as to be always covered with snow. Mr. Buckingham, who ascended one of the highest parts of Lebanon, states that it occupied him and his companions four hours in reaching it, from the place where the cedars grow. "From hence the view was, as may be easily imagined, grand and magnificent. To the west we had a prospect of all the side of Lebanon down to the plain at its foot, and, beyond, a boundless sea, the horizon of which could not be defined, from its being covered with a thick bed of clouds. . . . To the east we had the valley of the Bukkah, which we could see from hence on a much higher level than the sea; the descent to it on the east appearing to be about one third less in depth than the descent to the plain at the foot of Lebanon on the west, and scarcely more than half of that to the line of the sea. The range of Anti-Libanus, which forms the eastern boundary of the Bukkah, was also covered with snow at its summit, but not so thickly as at this part of Libanus where we were, and which seemed to us the highest point of all. We could distinguish that from the northward towards Balbek, the Jebel-el-wast was one even range, without pointed summits like this, and that from thence there extended two forks to the southward, the eastern, or principal one, ending in the great Jebel-el-Sheik, or Jebel-el-Telj, of the Arabs, the mount Hermon of the Scriptures; and the western, or lesser one, in the point which I had passed in going to Baniass, the valley between them being called Wade Ityre. The range of Anti-Libanus, though of less height than this, completely intercepted our view of the country to the eastward of it; although, as before said, we were on the highest point of view which it admits. Mr. Volney, therefore, must have imagined the unlimited view which he says this mountain affords across the eastern deserts to the Euphrates; and indeed, from his description altogether, both of the mountain and the cedars, there is reason to believe that he travelled but little over it." (Travels among the Arab Tribes, p. 477.)

D'Arvieux, in describing this mountainous region, says, "These are not barren mountains, but almost all well cultivated, and well peopled. Their summits are in many places level, and form vast plains, wherein are sown corn (comp. Ps. lxxii. 16.) and all kinds of pulse. They are watered by numerous sources, and rivulets of excellent water, which diffuse on all sides a freshness and fertility, even in the most elevated regions. The soil of their declivities, and of the hollows which occur between them, is excellent, and produces abundantly corn, oil and wine, which is the best in Syria; and this is praising it highly in a single word. Drinkers, who esteem themselves judges, make no difference between this wine and that of Cyprus. Their principal riches, at present, is the silk which they produce. They are inhabited by Christians, Greeks and Maronites; also by Druses and Mahometans. The Christians here have many privileges, and in some places complete liberty. Though the mountains which compose Lebanon are of this considerable extent, yet the vulgar restrain the name to that district whereon the cedars grow; (see CEDARS;) and they give other names to other portions which compose this famous mountain. After travelling six hours in pleasant valleys, and over mountains covered with different species of trees, we entered a small plain on a fertile hill, wholly covered with walnut-trees and olives, in the middle of which is the village of Eden. This village has a bishop. In spite of my weariness, I could not but incessantly admire this beautiful country. It is, truly, an epitome of the terrestrial paradise, of which it bears the name. . . . We quitted Eden about eight o'clock in the morning, and advanced to mountains so extremely high, that we seemed to be travelling in the middle regions of the atmosphere. Here the sky was clear and serene above us, while we saw, below us, thick clouds dissolving in rain and watering the plains."

De la Roque, after commending in strong terms the beauty of the valley watered by the Kadisha, says, "In pursuing our route, and tracing up the source of this agreeable river, our sight was still more gratified. The trees rise higher than before, being for the most part plantains, pines, cypresses, and evergreen oaks, forming a continual assemblage of verdure of different kinds; among which peeps out, from time to time, either a chapel or a grotto, always situated on some spot apparently impossible to be attained, and absolutely astonishing to the sight. We passed twice or thrice over the Kadisha, by means of stone bridges, or of trees laid along to form a passage: we proceeded in this manner two or three leagues, by a very easy and agreeable road, walking almost constantly among groves and covered alleys formed by the hand of nature, and too abundant in foliage to be penetrated by the rays of the sun. After quitting the Kadisha, we continued to find every where a wonderful abundance of water, issuing from divers sources, forming rivulets; and proceeding to unite their waters with those of that river. Canobin, the convent established on Lebanon, is a large, irregular building, situated on the declivity of a high mountain. Its environs are, nevertheless, very cheerful; the lands adjacent are well cultivated, and are adorned with hedges, gardens and vineyards. It would be difficult to find any where superior wine to that which was offered us: from which we determined, that the reputation of the wine of Lebanon, as alluded to by the prophet, (Hosea xiv. 7.) was extremely well founded. These wines are of two sorts; the most common is the red; the most exquisite is of the color of Vin Muscat, and is called golden on account of its color."

He mentions his fear, in some of his excursions, of meeting with tigers, or with bears, which are in great numbers on Lebanon; and come down during the night to drink. He also mentions the finding of a quantity of eagles' feathers on the mountain, at the cedars.

Lebanon furnishes many rivers and streams. The first described by De la Roque is the Orontes, which rises in the northern district, and during a course of more than thirty leagues runs almost due north, passing Emesa and Apanea; then turning to the west, it passes Antioch and Seleucia; its whole course being about seventy-five leagues. The river Eleutherus also rises in the heights of Lebanon. It falls into the Mediterranean, between Orthosia and Tripolis; but is not easily ascertained, because four or five rivers discharge themselves in this space. The first, (perhaps the Eleutherus,) about half way between Tortosa and Tripolis, is the Nahr Kibir, or Great river; the second, advancing toward Tripolis, is the Nahr Abrach, Leper's river; the third is Nahr Acehar, red river; and there is a fourth, less considerable, called Alma Albarida, or the Cold waters. Following the coast southward, we find the Nahr Kadisha, or Holy river, which receives many streams, by which it is greatly enlarged in its passage to the sea. Among others, Ras Ain, Fountain Head, in itself a small stream, but is greatly swelled by the melting of the snows, and furnishes a considerable body of water. The next stream is the Nahr Ebrahim, Abraham's river, which discharges itself about two leagues from Jebilee; it is the Adonis of the ancients. After this follows the Nahr Kelb, Dog's river; the Lycus, or Wolf's river, of antiquity. About an hour and a half from this river is Nahr Bairuth, so called because it is the nearest stream to the city of Berytus. Between Berytus and Sidon is the Nahr Damer, pronounced by Europeans d'Amour, the Jamyrus of former times: the passage of it is very dangerous during the rains. About a league south of Sidon, is the river called Awle by the peasants; by the Franks called Finumere: its source is perhaps in Anti-Libanus. About an hour short of Tyre, is the river Kasemiech, which rises in Anti-Libanus, and is increased by the waters of the Letani, which flows along the valley of Bekaa. The Barrady rises in Anti-Libanus, not far from the territory of Damascus, which city it visits; and being divided into streams and canals, contributes to the delights of that place, and its environs. A little river, called Baniass, (perhaps the Abana of Nauman, 1 Kings v. 12.) discharges itself into the Barrady. After having passed Damascus, these streams issue in a large lake and marshes. The course of the Barrady is southerly. The Jordan, too, has its source in Anti-Libanus, in the region now called Wad-et-tein, which includes the mount Hermon of the ancients, not far from the celebrated spot which pagan antiquity called Panim, or Pancas. See JORDAN.

The following is Volney's account of this celebrated mountain: (Travels, vol. i. p. 293, 301.) "A view of the country will convince us that the most elevated point of all Syria is Lebanon, on the south-east of Tripoli. Scarcely do we depart from Larneca, in Cyprus, which is thirty leagues distant, before we discover its summit capped with clouds. This is also distinctly perceivable on the map, from the course of the rivers. The Orontes, which flows from the mountains of Damascus, and loses itself below Antioch; the Kasnia, which, from the north of Balbec, takes its course towards Tyre; the Jordan, forced, by the declivities, towards the south, prove that this is the highest point. Next to Lebanon, the most elevated part of the country is mount Akkar, which becomes visible as soon as we leave Marra in the desert. It appears like an enormous flattened cone, and is constantly in view for two days' journey. No one has yet had an opportunity to ascertain the height of these mountains by the barometer; but we may deduce it from another consideration. In winter their tops are entirely covered with snow, from Alexandretta to Jerusalem; but after the month of March it melts, except on mount Lebanon, where, however, it does not remain the whole year, unless in the highest cavities, and towards the north-east, where it is sheltered from the sea winds, and the rays of the sun. In such a situation I saw it still remaining, in 1784, at the very time I was almost suffocated with heat in the valley of Balbec. Now, since it is well known that snow, in this latitude, requires an elevation of fifteen or sixteen hundred fathoms, we may conclude that to be the height of Lebanon, and that it is consequently much lower than the Alps, or even the Pyrenees.

"Lebanon, which gives its name to the whole extensive chain of the Kesraouan, and the country of the Druses, presents us every where with majestic mountains. At every step we meet with scenes in which nature displays either beauty or grandeur, sometimes singularity, but always variety. When we land on the coast, the loftiness and steep ascent of this mountainous ridge, which seems to enclose the country, those gigantic masses which shoot into the clouds, inspire astonishment and awe. Should the curious traveller then climb these summits which bounded his view, the wide-extended space which he discovers becomes a fresh subject of admiration; but completely to enjoy this majestic scene, he must ascend to the very point of Lebanon, or the Samnin. There, on every side, he will view an horizon without bounds; while, in clear weather, the sight is lost over the desert, which extends to the Persian gulf, and over the sea which bathes the coasts of Europe. He seems to command the whole world, while the wandering eye, now surveying the successive chains of mountains, transports the imagination in an instant from Antioch to Jerusalem.

"If we examine the substance of these mountains, we shall find they consist of a hard calcareous stone, of a whitish color, sonorous like free-stone, and disposed in strata variously inclined. This stone has almost the same appearance in every part of Syria; sometimes it is bare, and looks like the peeled rocks on the coast of Provence. The same stone, under a more regular form, likewise composes the greater part of Lebanon, Anti-Lebanon, the mountains of the Druses, Galilee and mount Carmel, and stretches to the south of the lake Asphaltites. The inhabitants every where build their houses and make lime with it. I have never seen, nor heard it said, that these stones contain any petrified shells in the upper regions of Lebanon; but we find, between Batroun and Djebail, in the Kesraouan, at a little distance from the sea, a quarry of schistous stones, the flakes of which bear the impressions of plants, fish, shells, and especially of the sea onion. Iron is the only mineral which abounds here; the mountains of the Kesraouan, and of the Druses, are full of it. Every summer the inhabitants work those mines which are ochreous.

"It appears equally extraordinary and picturesque to a European at Tripoli, to behold under his windows, in the month of January, orange-trees loaded with flowers and fruit, while the hoary head of Lebanon is covered with ice and snow. If in Saide, or Tripoli, we are incommoded by the heats of July, in six hours we are in the neighboring mountains, in the temperature of March; or, on the other hand, if chilled by the frosts of December at Besharrai, a day's journey brings us back to the coast, amid the flowers of May. The Arabian poets have therefore said, that 'the Samnin bears winter on his head, spring on his shoulders, and autumn in his bosom, while summer lies sleeping at his feet.'"

[Mr. Fisk describes Lebanon in the following manner: "You would like, perhaps, to know how mount Lebanon looks. It is not, as I used to suppose, one mountain, but a multitude of mountains thrown together, and separated by very deep, narrow valleys, which seem to have been made merely for the sake of dividing the hills. There are more trees on mount Lebanon than on the hills of Judea, yet there is nothing which Americans would call a forest. Most of the trees, where I have been, are either pines or fruit trees. I have not yet seen the cedars. The roads are bad, worse and worst; steep and rocky, I presume, beyond any thing you ever saw in Vermont, or any where else. I generally ride a mule or an ass, and it is often literally riding up and down stairs, for a considerable distance together. These mountains present a variety of the most rude, sublime and romantic scenery." (Missionary Herald for 1824, p. 135.) R.

From these descriptions the reader may conceive, not only with what ardor Moses might desire to see "that goodly mountain, even Lebanon," (Deut. iii. 25.) but what a supreme gratification a man who had been all his life habituated to a flat and arid desert, and to a low and level country, must have felt, had he been permitted to enjoy the verdant hills and murmuring cascades of Lebanon. The renown of these paradises must have stimulated his curiosity, as a man and a naturalist, independent of his wishes as a sovereign and legislator for the welfare and settlement of his people.

Almost all travellers who have visited these places have felt and noticed the propriety of the bridegroom's address to the bride, (Cant. iv. 15.) in which he compares her to "a fountain of gardens, a well of living waters, and streams from Lebanon;" but they have not observed the climax of this passage, which appears to stand thus, (1.) a fountain, (2.) a source, (3.) numerous and lively streams, communicating refreshment and pleasure, together with fertility.

These descriptions may also contribute to place in a new light a passage of the prophet Jeremiah, (chap. xviii. 14.) which stands thus in our translation: "Will a man leave the snow of Lebanon which cometh from the rock of the field; or shall the cold flowing waters that come from another place be forsaken?" The whole of this verse no doubt refers to the same object, mount Lebanon, though to different things which are found there. It may be supposed, that the "cold flowing waters" of the prophet were the Nahr el berd, or Nahr al barida of Maundrell and De la Roque.

The prophet seems to think that no waters could be so refreshing as those which flowed from recently thawing congelation; and to persons who highly value the addition of snow to their beverage, to cool it, nothing could be more refrigerating than drinking from streams which trickled down the sides of that mountain, the great Syrian reservoir of snow and ice. The narrations we have inserted show the vigor and energy of these similes.

The reputation attached to the wine of Lebanon, and the character given of it by travellers, render very credible the idea that in this wine Danascus traded with Tyre, (Ezek. xxvii. 18.) and that Helbon was in the eastern part of Lebanon. The comparison of the wine of Lebanon to Vin Muscat, by De la Roque, includes, probably, the scent as well as the color; and justifies the allusion of the prophet Hosea, xiv. 7.

It is not easy to determine, with certainty, what can be intended by the prophet Isaiah in the phrase, "the glory of Lebanon;" but very likely it refers to the verdure constantly maintained on it, and to the stately trees which cover it; for so we may best explain Isa. xxxv. 2, the glory of Lebanon, magnificent cedars, plantains, pines, cypresses, &c. the excellency of Carmel, "pines, oaks, olives and laurels," (see CARMEL,) and the meadow productions, flowers, shrubs, &c. of Sharon. This agrees perfectly with chap. lx. 13, "the glory of Lebanon—the fir-tree, the pine-tree, and the box-tree together." Perhaps, by some scientific traveller, who has noticed the trees growing upon Lebanon, we may ascertain those intended by the prophet. Is it the cedar eminently?

The discovery of eagles' feathers in great quantity by De la Roque, where they must have been dropped by the birds themselves, serves to justify the idea of the prophet Ezekiel, (chap. xvii. 2.) of "a great eagle, with long wings, visiting Lebanon, and plucking off a branch from among the young twigs," &c. (meaning Nebuchadnezzar, who destroyed the temple, and carried away its treasures.) It shows that nature was considered in this particular of the parable.

The bears which frightened De la Roque, and the lions, which he says come down to the marshes of Jordan to drink, may point out the quarter that furnished those sanguinary animals which destroyed the new settlers in the land of Israel, (2 Kings xvii. 25, 26,) as the country is the same; and it is likely that, during the interval of population, these wild animals should have roamed over a greater tract of country than usual; out of which they were not easily expelled. It is likely, too, that when the prophet threatens that the king of Babylon shall come "as a lion from the swelling of Jordan," (Jer. xlix. 19; l. 44.) he may not so much allude to the stream of Jordan, where it runs in a considerable body, between its banks, as probably lions are rarely seen so low, but to the marshes of Jordan, to which De la Roque says they come down from the neighboring mountains; which marshes being at some times dry, and at other times overflowed, annually, may justly be described as the swellings of Jordan. (Comp. Zech. xi. 3.) The same place may also be intended under this description: (Jer. xii. 5.) "If thou hast run with the footmen, and they have wearied thee, how canst thou contend with horses? And if in the land of peace (solid land, firm footing) thou hast been wearied, how wilt thou do, when called to exert thyself in such slippery and uncertain footing as the marshes (swellings) of Jordan are?"—much resembling, probably, the bogs of Ireland. The wild beasts enumerated by this traveller, with such others as we may suppose inhabit, or haunt, the various branches of this mountain, may furnish the true import of the expression, (Hab. ii. 17.) "The violence of Lebanon shall cover thee; even the terrific ravages of wild beasts;" to which that mountain affords shelter and covert.

Lebanon is certainly taken for cedars of Lebanon. Thus Solomon's palace is called the "house of the forest of Lebanon;" it was supported, probably by pillars of cedar, as numerous as trees in a forest. When we read "The fruit thereof shall shake like Lebanon," we suppose the majestic cedars furnish the simile: so, "He cast forth his roots as Lebanon," not the mountain, but the cedars on it. The temple of Jerusalem is also called Lebanon: "Open thy doors, O Lebanon, that the fire may devour thy cedars," says Zechariah, (xi. 1.) speaking of the future desolation of the temple by the Romans.

TOWER OF LIBANUS.—Solomon (Cant. vii. 4.) compares his spouse's nose to "the tower of Lebanon, which looketh towards Damascus." Travellers speak of a tower seen on Libanus on the side next Damascus, which seems to have been very high. Benjamin of Tudela assures us, that the stones of this tower, the remains of which he had seen, were twenty palms long, and twelve wide. Gabriel Sionita says, that it was a hundred cubits high, and fifty broad.

LIBATION, a word used in sacrificial language, to express an affusion of liquors, poured upon victims to be sacrificed to the Lord. The quantity of wine for a libation was the fourth part of a hin; rather more than two pints. Among the Hebrews libations were poured on the victim after it was killed, and the several pieces of it laid on the altar, ready to be consumed by the flames, Lev. vi. 20; viii. 25, 26; ix. 4; xvi. 12, 20; xxiii. 13. They consisted in offerings of bread, wine and salt. Paul describes himself, says Calmet, as a victim about to be sacrificed, the accustomed libations of meal and wine being already, in a manner, poured upon him: (2 Tim. iv. 6.) "For I am ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand." But it is probable that the apostle refers to the manner of pouring out the blood of the victims, at the foot of the altar, which was the ceremony prescribed in the Hebrew ritual, rather than to the libations poured upon the victim, as practised by the heathen:—Ἐγὼ γὰρ ἴδθ σπένδομαι—For I am now pouring out, or going to be poured out, as a libation. The same expressive sacrificial term occurs in Phil. ii. 17, where the apostle represents the faith of the Philippians as a sacrifice, and his own blood as a libation poured forth to hallow and consecrate it:—Ἀλλ' εἰ καὶ σπένδομαι ἐπὶ τῇ θυσίᾳ καὶ λειτουργίᾳ τῆς πίστεως ὑμῶν. χαίρω καὶ συχαίρω πάντων ὑμῶν—the strength and beauty of the passage cannot be comprehended from a translation.

LIBERTINES, SYNAGOGUE OF, Acts vi. 9. This Synagogue of the Libertines obviously stands connected with the Cyrenians and Alexandrians, both of which were of African origin; it is, therefore, most probable that the Libertines were of African origin also; and without assenting to the entire history of the liberation of the Jewish captives in Egypt, by Ptolemy Philadelphus, in its utmost extent, as to their numbers, it is credible, that there may be sufficient truth in it, to justify our believing that many Jews and Jewish families did obtain their liberty, by the munificence of that prince; the descendants of which freedmen, remaining in Egypt, would be known under an appellation answering to the Latin, libertini. Moreover, their residence would naturally connect them with their fellow Africans, the Cyrenians and Alexandrians. They are evidently separated, by the construction of the language, from "those of Cilicia, and of Asia:" and if Luke were of Cyrene, as is thought, we see the reason why this conduct of his compatriots excited his particular observation. It has been thought by some writers that they were a nation of Libertini. That there was a place in Africa called Libertina, or some such name, is certain; for in the council of Carthage (c. 116,) two persons assumed the title of Episcopus Ecclesie Libertinensis. (See Kuinoel on Acts vi. 9.)

LIBERTY, as opposed to servitude and slavery, denotes the condition of a man, who may act independently of the will of another. There is frequent mention of this liberty in Scripture. The Jews valued themselves highly on their liberty; and they even boasted, in our Saviour's time, that they had never been deprived of it, John viii. 33. This from them was ridiculous; since we know that they were often subject to foreign powers, under the judges, and afterwards to the kings of Assyria, Chaldea and Persia. They were at this very time, also, subject to the Romans. It is however true, that the Israelites, according to the intention of Moses, were never to be reduced entirely to a state of bondage. They might be sold, or fall into servitude among their brethren; but always had a power of redeeming themselves, or procuring themselves to be redeemed by their relations, or of being liberated in the sabbatical year, or in the jubilee year. Probably, on this account they boasted that they never had been reduced to slavery. Paul speaks of the liberty of the gospel, in opposition to the servitude of the law: "We are not the children of the bond-woman, but of the free," (Gal. iv. 31.) i. e. we are not derived from Hagar, who with her descendants are slaves, but we are sons of Sarah the free-woman: we enjoy the liberty of God's children, by virtue of the adoption procured for us by Jesus Christ; which liberty delivers us from the yoke of legal ceremonies, from the obligation of observing purifications and distinctions of meats, and many other practices, to which the Jews were subjected, Rom. viii. 21; 1 Cor. x. 29; 2 Cor. iii. 17; Gal. ii. 4, 5; James i. 25; ii. 12.

"Liberty to righteousness," in opposition to "the bondage of sin," is part of the justification which Christ has procured for us; which we acquire by faith in him, and preserve by a holy life, and the practice of Christian virtues; or it is one effect of justification by Christ. (Comp. Rom. vi. 20. Gr. and Eng. margin.)

LIBERTY AND FREE-WILL, in opposition to constraint and necessity. Man is at liberty to do good or evil; (Ecclus. xv. 14, &c.) there is, however, a great difference between our liberty of doing good and of doing evil. We have in ourselves the unhappy liberty of doing evil; we are prompted to it by our concupiscence, which indeed we ought always to resist, yet shall not really and effectually resist, without the assistance of God's grace; whereas, to do good, though we have the liberty of doing it, we cannot as we should without the help of grace, which, without violating our liberty, incites us agreeably, gently, (nevertheless, efficaciously,) to prefer what is pleasing to God before what is desired by self-love and concupiscence.

Manasseh Ben Israel, a famous rabbi, says we stand in need of the concurrence of Providence in all virtuous actions; and as a man, who is going to take a heavy burden on his shoulders, calls somebody to help him up with it, so the just man first endeavors to fulfil the law, while God, like the arm of another person, comes to his assistance, that he may be able to execute his resolution. This seems to be exactly the idea of the apostle in Rom. viii. 26. which he expresses by using the word συναρτιζουμένοι, which Doddridge renders "lendeth us his helping hand;" and which Macknight says properly signifies "I bear together with another," by taking hold of the thing borne on the opposite side, as persons do who assist one another in carrying heavy loads. Ambrose, very properly, refers this to the weakness of our prayers (and of our minds too) without such aid.

But we ought to acknowledge that very important part of "preventing grace," which so arranges circumstances as to diminish, or to disappoint, opportunities of doing evil. There is scarcely any thing in life that more strongly and more intelligibly calls for gratitude, than those preservations from evil, those preventions of bad consequences, those counteractions of perverse bias, of which every one must be conscious, and none more conscious than the most virtuous. (Comp. David, 1 Sam. xxv. 32, sq.)

I. LIBNAH, a city in the south of Judah, (Josh. xv. 42.) given to the priests, and declared a city of refuge, 1 Chron. vi. 54, 57. Eusebius and Jerome say, it was in the district of Eleutheropolis.

II. LIBNAH, a station of the Israelites in the desert, Num. xxxiii. 20. See EXODUS, p. 420.

LIBNATH, or, fully, SHIHOR-LIBNATH, a stream near Carmel, on the borders of Asher; according to Michaëlis, fluvius vitri, the glass river, i. e. the Belus, from whose sands glass was first made, Josh. xix. 26. R.

LIBYA, a province of Egypt, which is thought to have been peopled by the descendants of Lehabim, son of Mizraim, Gen. x. 13. It reached from Alexandria to Cyrene, and perhaps farther. In Nah. iii. 9, Lubim is rendered Libya, because of its connection with Phut, which implies Africa; and probably, that part of Africa near and around Carthage, rather than Nubia. Josephus says, "Phut was the conductor of Libya, whose settlements were from him called Phutæi. It is beyond the river in the region of Mauritania. By this name it is well known in the Grecian histories; adjacent to the region which they call Phut." We read of the Lubim in 2 Chron. xii. 3; xvi. 8; Nah. iii. 9; Dan. xi. 43. Sometimes all Africa is called Libya; but we believe it does not occur in this sense in Scripture.

LICE, see GNAT.

LIFE, FUTURE, ETERNAL LIFE, or simply LIFE, signifies the state of the righteous after death, Matt. vii. 14; xix. 16, 17. Jesus Christ is sometimes called the Life, John xiv. 6; xi. 25. So, "In him was life; and the life was the light of men," John i. 4. (See also 1 John v. 12.) He is the life of the soul; he enlightens it, fills it with graces, and leads it to eternal life. He is himself the life of it, its sustenance, light and happiness.

In the Old Testament, God promises to those who observe his laws, long life and temporal prosperity; which were the figure and shadow of eternal life, and of those future blessings expressed more clearly in the New Testament. The carnal Jews confined their hopes to these transitory blessings; but the holy patriarchs, the prophets, and more enlightened Hebrews, carried their views and expectations further. Moses says, (Deut. xxx. 15, 19, 20.) "See, I have set before thee this day life and good, and death and evil."

Wisdom, or a knowledge of truths relating to salvation, is called "the way of life," "the truth of life," "the fountain of life;" or "life," simply. As life is the first of blessings belonging to the body, so wisdom is the supreme happiness of the soul; it promotes our well-being in this world, and is the source of felicity to eternity. The principal wisdom, the most serious study, of the Hebrews consisted in the knowledge of their law; and hence the Holy Spirit terms the law, as well as wisdom, life, and the source of life; and perhaps also because they both produce the same effects for time and for eternity.

Life is sometimes used for subsistence; thus it is said in Mark xii. 44, that a poor widow, who put two very small pieces of silver into the treasury of the temple, gave more than any of the rest, because it was all she had, even all her living, or life.

We find an expression in Deut. xxviii. 66, and in Job xxiv. 22, which requires explanation: "Thy life shall hang in doubt before thee, and thou shalt fear day and night, and shalt have none assurance of thy life." Some of the fathers understood this of Christ, crucified in the sight of the unbelieving Jews, who rejected the belief of that Saviour who was their life and salvation; but the meaning is more likely to be, "Ye shall be under perpetual fear and uneasiness, and shall have no assurance of your own lives." The words of Job must be interpreted in the same sense: "He riseth up, and no man is sure of life." When the wicked man appears most resolute, he shall not be assured of his life; or, according to the Hebrew, when he riseth in the midst of his guards, he shall not be sure of his life.

LIFE; To LIVE. These words, as well as death, and to die, are equivocal, and are understood properly for the life of the body; figuratively, for the life of the soul; for the life of faith, grace and holiness; for temporal life and life eternal. "A living soul" signifies a living animal, a living person: "my soul shall live because of thee;" (Gen. xii. 13.) my life will be preserved in consideration of thee. "No man shall see me and live;" (Exod. xxxiii. 20.) that is, no man can be able to sustain the splendor of my majesty, if beheld by his bodily eye. Jehovah was called the living God, in opposition to the gods of the Gentiles, who were but dead men, stars or animals, whose lives are transitory; whereas Jehovah is living, immortal, and the Author of life to every thing; in him we live; from him we derive motion and existence, Acts xvii. 28.

The "just man lives by faith," Rom. i. 17. Faith gives life to the soul, but it must be animated by charity, and accompanied with works, Gal. v. 6; James ii. 20. Even they who are dead in sin rise again, and lead a new life, when they believe in Christ, and put on Christ; and they who have a lively and entire faith never die, or rather after death enjoy eternal life, John xi. 25, 26. The letter kills, but the Spirit makes alive, 2 Cor. iii. 6. The law cannot make alive; (Gal. iii. 21.) it cannot communicate righteousness, without gospel faith and charity.

In a figurative sense, "to give life" is used for delivering from great danger. The captives in Babylon often ask of God, in the Psalms, to restore them to life, to deliver them from a state of death, of oppression, of trouble, under which they groaned. (Comp. Psalm cxix. 25, 107.)

LIFE, BOOK OF, see BOOK, p. 201.

LIFTING UP THE HANDS is, among the orientals, a common part of the ceremony of taking an oath: "I have lift up mine hand unto the Lord," says Abraham, Gen. xiv. 22. And, "I will bring you into the land concerning which I lift up my hand," (Exod. vi. 8.) which I promised with an oath.

To LIFT UP ONE'S HAND against any one, is to attack him, to fight him, 2 Sam. xviii. 28; 1 Kings xi. 26.

To LIFT UP ONE'S FACE in the presence of any one, is to appear boldly in his presence, 2 Sam. ii. 22; Ezra ix. 6. (See also Job x. 15; xi. 15.)

To LIFT UP ONE'S HANDS, EYES, SOUL OR HEART, unto the Lord, are expressions describing the sentiments and emotion of one who prays earnestly, or desires a thing with ardor.

LIGHT, a subtle fluid, which creates in us a sensation of colors, and enables us to discern surrounding objects.

"Light" is often put figuratively for prosperity, as night is for adversity: "The light shall shine upon thy ways;" i. e. God shall favor thy conduct. Thou hast "lifted up on us the light of thy countenance;" i. e. thou hast granted us thy favor.

"The light of the living" literally signifies a happy life, great prosperity; but in a moral and spiritual sense, it signifies the felicity of eternal life; as the misery of the wicked is described by the darkness of death, Ps. lvi. 13; cxxix. 12; cxlviii. 3, and Job xxxiii. 30. God is styled "the Father of lights;" (James i. 17.) the Author of all graces; and Jesus Christ is called "the Light of the world;" "a Light to enlighten the Gentiles," "Light of righteousness;" "the Light of life," John viii. 12; i. 8. (Comp. Isa. lx. 1.) The apostles are the light of the world, (Matt. v. 14.) by showing forth the doctrines and graces of their divine Master.

LIGN-ALOEES, see ALOEES I.

LILY, שושן, susan, or shushan, so called, perhaps, by reason of the number of its leaves, which are six, in Heb. ses, or shesh. There are lilies of different colors, white, red, yellow and orange-colored. They were common in Judea, and grew in the open fields. "Consider the lilies of the field," says Christ, (Matt. vi. 28.) "how they grow, they toil not, neither do they spin; yet I say unto you that Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?" Luke xii. 27. Father Souciet affirms, that the lily mentioned in Scripture, is the crown imperial; that is, the Persian lily, the tusā of the Persians, the royal lily, or lilium basilense, of the Greeks. In reality it appears from the Canticles, that the lily spoken of by Solomon was red, and distilled a certain liquor, Cant. v. 13. The very learned Celsus, however, supposes it to be the white lily, which the Arabs call susanu. It has a great resemblance to this panceratum, which in whiteness surpasses lilies, and the most perfect white produceable by the art of dyeing. White dresses were formerly reserved for the masters of the sacrifices. May we hence conclude, says Forskal, that this, as well as the purple, was an appendage to royalty? There are crown imperials with yellow flowers; but those with red are the most common. They are always bent downwards, and disposed in the manner of a crown at the extremity of the stem, which has a tuft of leaves at the top. At the bottom of each leaf of this flower is a certain watery humor, forming, as it were, a very white pearl, which gradually distils very clear and pure drops of water. This water is probably what the spouse in the Canticles called myrrh. Judith speaks of an ornament belonging to the women, which was called lily, Jud. x. 3. What these lilies were, we cannot tell. In the judgment of Grotius, they might be something which hung about the neck. Perhaps lilia may be a fault of the copyist, who, instead of monilia, bracelets, which he did not understand, inserted lilia. The Greek says pselia, and the Syriac the same, i. e. chains, necklaces or bracelets.

LINE. To stretch a line over a city, is to destroy it, Zech. i. 16; Jer. ii. 8.

LINEN, lin, bad, the produce of a well-known plant, flax, whose bark, being prepared, serves to make fine and much esteemed linen clothes. Another sort of linen Scripture calls shesh; (Gen. xli. 42.) [and at a later period lin, bils, Greek βύσσος, byssus, 1 Chron. xv. 27; Esth. i. 6, et al. This, however, is strictly the fine Egyptian cotton, and the white cloth made from it. This cloth, so celebrated in ancient times, is still found wrapped around mummies; and appears to have been about of the texture and quality of the ordinary cotton sheeting of the present day. Both these Hebrew words signify originally white. R.]

LINUS, a Christian mentioned by Paul, (2 Tim. iv. 21.) and whom Irenæus, Eusebius, Optatus, Epiphanius, Augustin, Jerome and Theodoret affirm to have succeeded Peter as bishop of Rome.

It was not possible that Calmet could have access to the Welsh Triads, which only within these few years have appeared in English. Mr. Taylor thinks there is little hazard in taking LINUS for the British CYLLIN, brother of Claudia. [The only ground for this conjecture seems to be that each of these names contains the three letters lin. R.] If so, it agrees with the history that Christianity had made converts in the family of Brennus, king of Britain, and Caractacus, his son, then prisoners at Rome; and the first (Gentile) bishop of Rome was a Briton. See CHRISTIANITY.

LION, a well known and noble beast, frequently spoken of in Scripture. It was common in Palestine, and the Hebrews have seven words to signify the lion in different ages, (1.) gur, or gor, a young lion, a whelp. (2.) kēphir, a young lion. (3.) ari, ari, or aryeh, a young and vigorous lion. (4.) shahal, a lion in the full strength of his age. (5.) shahats, a vigorous lion. (6.) lēbia, an old lion. (7.) lašh, a decrepit lion, worn out with age. But these distinctions are not always used in speaking of the lion.

"The lion of the tribe of Judah" (Rev. v. 5.) is Jesus Christ, who sprung from the tribe of Judah, and the race of David, and overcame death, the world and the devil. It is supposed by some, that a lion was the device of the tribe of Judah: whence this allusion. (Comp. Gen. xlix. 9.)

The lion "from the swelling of Jordan," (Jer. i. 44.) is, figuratively, Nebuchadnezzar marching like a lion against Judea. He is compared to a lion by reason of his strength and fierceness; to a lion driven by the rising waters from the neighborhood of Jordan, where he had lain amidst the thickets which cover the banks of that river. (See JORDAN.) A lion which in his anger falls with fury on every thing he meets in the fields.

Samson, on his way to Timnath, having torn a young lion to pieces with his hands, (Judg. xiv.) found, as he afterwards passed by that way, that bees had made their honey in the skeleton, which was then dried up. This furnished him with a riddle which he proposed to the young men his companions at his wedding: "the devourer furnished meat, and the strong yielded sweetness." See SAMSON.

David boasts, that he had killed a lion and a bear, (1 Sam. xvii. 34, 35.) and Ecclesiasticus says, (xlvii. 3.) that he played with bears and lions, as he would do with lambs.

Isaiah, (xi. 6.) describing the happy time of the Messiah, says, "The calf, the young lion and the fatling shall lie down together, and a little child shall lead them;" and that "the lion should eat straw like the ox;" signifying the peace and happiness of the church of Christ.

The roaring of the lion is terrible, (Amos iii. 8.) and therefore it is said, "The king's wrath is as the roaring of a lion; whoso provoketh him to anger sinneth against his own soul;" (Prov. xix. 12; xx. 2.) i. e. he seeketh his own death.

LIP, in Hebrew, is sometimes used for the bank of a river, for the border of a vessel or table, Josh. iii. 8; 2 Chron. iv. 2. It also signifies language, Gen. xi. 1; Exod. vi. 12, &c. "We will render thee the calves of our lips," says Hosea; (xiv. 2.) that is, sacrifices of praise, instead of bloody victims. "I do not send thee," says the Lord to Ezekiel, (iii. 5.) "to a people deep of lip," of an unknown language.

LIZARD. Several species of lizards are well known. There are some in Arabia, a cubit in length; but in the Indies there are some much longer. They are still sometimes eaten, as they probably were in Arabia and Judea, since Moses forbids them as food.

We find several sorts of lizards mentioned in Scripture; letah, homel, tinshemeth; (Lev. xi. 30.) and shemamith. The third is translated mole; but Bochart maintains that it is the chameleon (which is a kind of lizard.)

LOAVES, see BREAD.

LOCUST, a voracious insect, belonging to the grasshopper or grylli genus, and a great scourge in oriental countries.

Moses declares all creatures that fly and walk on four feet to be impure, but he excepts those which, having their hind feet longer than the others, skip, and do not crawl upon the earth. Afterwards (Lev. xi. 22.) he describes four sorts of locusts, or, it may be, the same sort in different states:—arbeh; salam, hargol, and hagab; which Jerome translates bruchus, attacus, ophiomacus, and locusta.

On many occasions the locust has been employed by the Almighty for chastising his guilty creatures. A swarm of locusts were among the plagues of Egypt, when they covered the whole land, so that the earth was darkened; and they devoured every green herb of the earth, and the fruit of every tree which the hail had left, Exod. x. 15. But the most particular description of this insect, and of its destructive career, mentioned in the sacred writings, is to be found in Joel ii. 3—10. This is, perhaps, one of the most striking and animated descriptions to be met with in the whole compass of prophecy. The contorture of the passage is extremely curious; and the double destruction to be produced by locusts, and the enemies of which they were the harbingers, is painted with the most expressive force, and described with the most terrible accuracy. We may fancy the destroying army to be moving before us while we read, and imagine that we see the desolation spreading. The following extracts may furnish a commentary upon this and other passages in the Holy Scriptures:—

“I never observed the mantes (a kind of locusts) to be gregarious; but the locusts, properly so called, which are so frequently mentioned by sacred as well as profane authors, are sometimes so beyond expression. Those which I saw, anno 1724 and 1725, were much bigger than our common grasshoppers, and had brown spotted wings, with legs and bodies of a bright yellow. Their first appearance was towards the latter end of March, the wind having been some time from the south. In the middle of April their numbers were so vastly increased, that in the heat of the day they formed themselves into large and numerous swarms, flew in the air like a succession of clouds, and as the prophet Joel expresses it, they darkened the sun. When the wind blew briskly, so that these swarms were crowded by others, or thrown one upon another, we had a lively idea of that comparison of the psalmist, (Ps. cix. 23.) of being tossed up and down as the locust. In the month of May, when the ovaries of these insects were ripe and turgid, each of these swarms began gradually to disappear, and retired into the Metijah, and other adjacent plains, where they deposited their eggs. These were no sooner hatched in June, than each of the broods collected itself into a compact body of a furlong or more in square, and marching afterwards directly forward towards the sea, they let nothing escape them; eating up every thing that was green and juicy, not only the lesser kinds of vegetables, but the vine likewise, the fig-tree, the pomegranate, the palm, and the apple-tree, even all the trees of the field, (Joel i. 12.) in doing which, they kept their ranks like men of war, climbing over, as they advanced, every tree or wall that was in their way; nay, they entered into our very houses and bed-chambers like thieves. The inhabitants, to stop their progress, made a variety of pits and trenches all over their fields and gardens, which they filled with water; or else they heaped up therein heath, stubble, and such like combustible matter, which were severally set on fire upon the approach of the locusts. But this was all to no purpose, for the trenches were quickly filled up, and the fires extinguished by infinite swarms succeeding one another, whilst the front was regardless of danger, and the rear pressed on so close, that a retreat was altogether impossible. A day or two after, one of these broods was in motion, others were already hatched to march and glean after them, gnawing off the very bark, and the young branches of such trees, as had before escaped with the loss only of their fruit and foliage. So justly have they been compared by the prophet to a great army, who further observes, that the land is as the garden of Eden before them, and behind them a desolate wilderness.” (Shaw’s Travels, p. 187, 4to.)

Colonel Needham, who had lived some time in Teneriffe, informed sir Hans Sloane, that in 1649 locusts destroyed all the product of that island. They saw them come from off the coast of Barbary, the wind being a Levant from thence. They flew as far as they could; then one alighted in the sea, and another upon that, so that one after another they made a heap as large as the greatest ship above water, and were thought to be almost as many under. Those above water, on the next day, after the sun’s refreshing them, took flight again, and came in clouds to the island, from whence they had perceived them in the air, and had gathered all the soldiers of the island and of Laguna together, being 7000 or 8000 men, who, laying aside their arms, some took bags, some spades, and having notice by their scouts from the hills where they alighted, they went forward, made trenches, and brought their bags full, and covered them with mould. This, however, did not do, for some of the locusts escaped, or, being cast on the shore, were revived by the sun, and flew about and destroyed all the vineyards and trees. They ate the leaves and even the bark of the vines where they alighted. But all would not do; the locusts remained there for four months; cattle ate them and died, and so did several men; and others struck out in blotches. The other Canary islands were so troubled also, that they were forced to bury their provisions. “I cannot better represent their flight to you,” says Beauplan, “than by comparing it to the flakes of snow in cloudy weather, driven about by the wind; and when they alight upon the ground to feed, the plains are all covered, and they make a murmuring noise as they eat, and in less than two hours they devour all close to the ground; then rising, they suffer themselves to be carried away by the wind; and when they fly, though the sun shines ever so bright, it is no lighter than when most clouded. The air was so full of them, that I could not eat in my chamber without a candle; (Joel ii. 2, 10.) all the houses being full of them, even the stables, barns, chambers, garrets, and cellars, ver. 9. I caused cannon-powder and sulphur to be burnt to expel them, but all to no purpose; for when the door was opened an infinite number came in, and the others went out, fluttering about; and it was a troublesome thing, when a man went abroad, to be hit on the face by those creatures, sometimes on the nose, sometimes the eyes, and sometimes the cheeks, so that there was no opening one’s mouth but some would get in. Yet all this was nothing, for when we were to eat, those creatures gave us no respite; and when we cut a bit of meat, we cut a locust with it; and when a man opened his mouth to put in a morsel, he was sure to chew one of them. I have seen them at night, when they sit to rest them, that the roads were four inches thick of them, one upon another; so that the horses would not trample over them, but as they were put on with much lashing, pricking up their ears, snorting and treading fearfully. The wheels of our carts and the feet of our horses bruising those creatures, there came from them such a stink, as not only offended the nose, but the brain. I was not able to endure that stench, but was forced to wash my nose with vinegar, and hold a handkerchief dipped in it continually at my nostrils. The swine feast upon them as a dainty, and grow fat; but nobody will eat of them so fattened, only because they abhor that sort of vermin that does them so much harm.” (Gent’s Mag. 1748.)

Mr. Morier says, “On the 11th of June, while seated in our tents about noon, we heard a very unusual noise, that sounded like the rustling of a great wind at a distance. On looking up we perceived an immense cloud, here and there semi-transparent, in other parts quite black, that spread itself all over the sky, and at intervals shadowed the sun. These we soon found to be locusts, whole swarms of them falling about us . . . These were of a red color, and I should suppose are the red predatory locusts, one of the Egyptian plagues; they are also the ‘great grasshopper,’ mentioned by the prophet Nahum; no doubt in contradistinction to the lesser, chap. iii. 17. As soon as they appeared, the gardeners and husbandmen made loud shouts, to prevent their settling on their grounds. It is to this custom that the prophet Jeremiah, perhaps, alludes, when he says, 'Surely I will fill thee with men, as with caterpillars, and they shall lift up a shout against thee,' chap. li. 14. They seemed to be impelled by one common instinct, and moved in one body, which had the appearance of being organized by a leader, Joel ii. 7. Their strength must be very great, if we consider what immense journeys they have been known to make." (Second Journey, p. 99.)

Niebuhr thus gives the sum of all the information which he had collected respecting the locusts: (Deser. of Arabia, p. 168, Germ. ed.) "Locusts are very frequent in the East; but still, not so much so, perhaps, as is generally supposed in Europe. The first great flight of locusts that we saw was at Cairo, about the end of December, 1761; and on the 9th of January, 1762, there was another, in the same city, still more terrible, which came with the south-west wind, and consequently from over the Libyan desert. Of these last great numbers fell upon the roofs of the houses and in the streets, perhaps from being fatigued with their long journey. After this I saw no locusts in any great number until after our arrival in Djidda. An immense swarm of them arrived at this place in the night between the 10th and 11th of November, 1762, brought by a west wind, and consequently from across the Arabian gulf, which is here very broad. Very many of them had found their graves in the water. On the 17th of the same month, another flight of them arrived at Djidda, but not so large as the former. In May, as the dates began to ripen in Tehâma, there came several times to Mocha immense swarms, from the west or south; consequently across the Red sea. They commonly the next day either turned back, or continued their journey eastwards to the mountainous parts of the country. The sea at Mocha, as is well known, is not very broad; nevertheless, the shore was sometimes thickly covered with the dead locusts. In the beginning of July, 1763, we saw innumerable multitudes of locusts in the mountain Sumâra, and on the way from thence to Yerim. On the 17th of April, 1766, I fell in with, so to speak, a nest of locusts. A large tract of land near Tel el Hana, on the way between Mosul and Nissebin, was entirely covered with young locusts, not yet much larger than a common fly. Their wings were as yet scarcely to be seen; and of the hinder legs they seemed to have only the upper half. These locusts are said to acquire their full size with astonishing rapidity. Had there been in this country a good police, it would have been easy to have destroyed here multitudes of these insects, in their birth, as it were; and thus probably have prevented much damage. A heavy rain would probably also have been fatal to these young insects; for, wherever I have seen locusts, there had been no rain for some time; and whenever rainy weather appeared, they departed.

"Except in the countries above mentioned, I have seen no locusts, at least, not in such numbers as to think it worth while to note them. The locust of these swarms is the same that the Arabs eat; and also, as I remember to have heard from Forskal, the same which has been seen in Germany."

Burekhardt first fell in with locusts in the Haouran, not far from Bozra: (Travels in Syria, &c. p. 238.) "It was at Naeme that I saw, for the first time, a swarm of locusts: they so completely covered the surface of the ground, that my horse killed numbers of them at every step; whilst I had the greatest difficulty in keeping from my face those that rose up and flew about. This species is called, in Syria, the Djerad Nedjdyat, or flying locusts, being thus distinguished from the other species, called Djerad Dsahhaf, or devouring locusts. The former have a yellow body, a gray breast, and wings of a dirty white, with gray spots. The latter, I was told, have a whitish gray body, and white wings. The Nedjdyat are much less dreaded than the others, because they feed only upon the leaves of trees and vegetables, sparing the wheat and barley. The Dsahhaf, on the contrary, devour whatever vegetation they meet with, and are the terror of the husbandmen; the Nedjdyat attack only the produce of the gardener, or the wild herbs of the desert. I was told, however, that the offspring of the Nedjdyat, produced in Syria, partake of the voracity of the Dsahhaf, and like them prey upon the crops of grain.

"The natural enemy of the locust is the bird Sememar, which is of the size of a swallow, and devours vast numbers of them. It is even said that the locusts take flight at the cry of this bird. But if the whole feathered tribe of the districts visited by locusts were to unite their efforts, it would avail little, so immense are the numbers of these dreadful insects."

In Southern Africa, the plague of locusts would seem to be not much less than in Asia. The following is an extract from a newspaper published at Cape Town, July 30, 1831: "About a month ago an innumerable swarm of locusts made their appearance on the place of Mr. De Waal, Field Cornet, Cold Bokkeveld: the swarm covers more than a mile square, when they settle on the grass or among the bushes. An attempt was made to destroy them, by setting fire to the bushes in the morning, before they began to fly; but although millions have been destroyed in this manner, their number appears nothing decreased. Towards the afternoon, if the weather is warm, they arise, and appear to drive with the wind. They do not rise high, but their thickness is such as to darken the place over which they fly; they come round and cover the house and offices, and also the garden. When they settle, they eat the place bare in a few minutes; there is, however, grass sufficient to satisfy this immense multitude, without any loss being felt. A cloud of them passed within a few yards of my window yesterday afternoon, in a train of many millions thick, and about an hour in length; they were so near that I could catch them without going out: they were eagerly attacked by the turkeys and other poultry, which appeared to feed deliciously upon them. They have not as yet done any harm to the crops, they being too young, and the grass more enticing. In their flight, myriads remain on the ground, which are devoured by the crows, black-birds, &c. The fear is, that the eggs or spawn which they leave, may produce equal, if not more, at some future period, which may then be destructive to the crops, after the grass begins to dry and waste. In cold, rainy weather they remain still; it is only when it is fine and warm that they move." *R.

Even England has been alarmed by the appearance of locusts, a considerable number having visited that country in 1748; but they happily perished without propagating. They have frequently entered Italy and Spain, from Africa. In the year 591, an immense army of them ravaged a considerable part of the former country, and it is said that nearly a million of men and beasts were carried off by a pestilence occasioned by their stench.

Such is the general history of the locust-swarms, and their devastations: the following more particular account of the manners of this insect and its noxious qualities is translated from Rozier's Journal de Physique, Nov. 1786, p. 321, &c. It was furnished by M. Baron, Conseiller en la Cour des Comptes, &c. at Montpellier:—

"These insects seek each other the moment they are able to use their wings: after their union, the female lays her eggs in a hole which she makes in the earth; and for this purpose she seeks light sandy earth, avoiding moist, compact and cultivated grounds. A Spanish author says, 'Should even a million of locusts fall on a cultivated field, not one of them may be expected to lay her eggs in it; but if there be in this space a piece of earth not cultivated, though it be very small, thither they will all resort for that purpose.' The sense of smelling is supposed to direct this preference. The eggs lie all the winter, till the warmth of spring calls them into life. They appear at first in the form of worms, not larger than a flea, at first whitish, then blackish, at length reddish. They undergo several other changes: according to the heat of the season and situation, is the time of their appearance. 'I have seen,' says the Spanish writer already referred to, 'at Almierra millions creep forth, in the month of February, because this spot is remarkably forward in its productions. In Sierra Nevada they quit the nest in April; and I have observed that in La Mancha they were not all vivified at the beginning of May.' Heat also promotes their numbers; for, if the heat be sufficient, every egg is hatched; not so if cold weather prevails. Dryness favors the production of locusts; for, as this insect deposits its eggs in the ground, enclosed in a bag, and this bag is smeared with a frothy white mucus, if the season be wet, this mucus becomes rotten, the ground moistens the eggs, and the whole brood perishes. Eight or ten days' rain, at the proper season, is a certain deliverance from the broods committed to the earth.

"There is no doubt on the changes to which the locust is subject. The same animal which appears at first in the form of a worm, passes afterwards into the state of a nymph; and undergoes a third metamorphosis by quitting its skin, and becoming a perfect animal, capable of continuing its species. A locust remains in its nymph state 24 or 25 days, more or less, according to the season: when, having acquired its full growth, it refrains some days from eating; and, gradually bursting its skin, comes forth a new animal, full of life and vigor. These insects leap to a height two hundred times the length of their bodies, by means of those powerful legs and thighs, which are articulated near the centre of the body. When raised to a certain height in the air, they spread their wings, and are so closely embodied together, as to form but one mass, intercepting the rays of the sun, almost by a total eclipse.

"In the south of France, besides the labors of men to discover the eggs of the locust, about September and October, or in the month of March, they turn troops of hogs into the grounds that are suspected of concealing their nests, and these animals, by turning up the earth with their snouts, in search of a food which they are fond of, clear away vast quantities. In Languedoc they dig pits, into which they throw them:—great care is necessary in destroying them, that they are not hurtful after they are dead. The infection spread by their corrupting carcasses is insupportable. Surlius and Cornelius Gemma, both mentioning a prodigious incursion of locusts in 1542, report, that after their death, they infected the air with such a stench, that the ravens, crows, and other birds of prey, though hungry, yet would not come near their carcasses. We have ourselves experienced two years ago the truth of this fact; the pits where they had been buried, after twenty-four hours, could not be passed."

Upon this information Mr. Taylor submits the following remarks:

1. Heat and dryness are favorable to the increase of locusts. We think, therefore, that when God threatens to bring a plague of locusts over Israel, as in Joel, (chap. ii.) it may imply also a summer of drought. So we read, chap. i. verse 20: "The rivers of water are dried up; the fire hath devoured the pastures of the wilderness:"—and after the removal of this plague: (chap. ii. 23.) "The Lord giveth the former rain moderately . . . and the latter rain . . . and will (by means, no doubt, of these showers) restore the years that the locust hath eaten." Indeed, on attentively perusing that chapter, we shall find these extracts to be direct comments upon it. Compare a few verses: "Blow the trumpet . . . sound an alarm . . . let all the inhabitants of the land tremble;" as at Teneriffe, when the whole population watched the flying invaders with the most painful anxiety. "A day of darkness and gloominess . . . of clouds . . . of thick darkness, as the morning spread on the mountains." "They are like flakes of snow," says one writer, "when they fly: though the sun shines ever so bright, it is no lighter than when most clouded:"—"they darken the sun, so that travellers could not descry the town." "A great (rather a numerous) people, and a strong:"—their numbers are noticed by every writer. "The land is as the garden of Eden before them, but behind them a desolate wilderness:"—"they eat up all sorts of grain and grass, cabbage leaf, lettuce, blossoms of apple and crab-trees, and especially the leaves of the oaks, grassy rushes and reeds,"—"yea, and nothing shall escape them. The appearance of them is as the appearance of horses. Like the noise of chariots on the tops of mountains shall they leap:"—"You cannot conceive the noise made by those insects in their flight." "Like the noise of a flame of fire that devoureth stubble:"—"they make a murmuring noise as they eat." "Before their face the people shall be much pained . . . They shall run like mighty men; they shall climb the wall like men of war . . . They shall run to and fro in the city; they shall run upon the wall; they shall climb upon the houses; they shall enter in at the windows, like a thief." See what is observed from Beauplan, of "every room being full; and even every dish of meat." After the terrible devastation committed by these ravages, the Lord calls to repentance; and promises, on the penitential humiliation of his people, to remove far off the northern army; and drive him into a land, barren and desolate, with his face toward the East sea, and his hinder part toward the utmost sea: and his stink shall come up and his ill savor. It is remarkable, that our extracts agree in recording the stink and ill savor of the locust: "They leave behind them an intolerable stench." "They leave a great stench behind them:" and M. Baron gives strict orders concerning the effectual interment of these masses of corruption; observing, "The infection left by their carcasses is insupportable."

The prophet Nahum says of the locusts, that they camp in the hedges in the cold day, but when the sun riseth they flee away. Every observer notices the torpid effect of cold, and the invigorating powers of heat, on the locust.

2. Another remarkable particular appears to have considerable connection with some things said on Exod. xvi. 13. that "in the morning, or evening, or in misty weather, locusts do not see equally well, nor fly so high; they suffer themselves to be more closely approached; they are stiff and slow in their motions; and are more easily destroyed." This supports rather the opinion of those who consider the word selav as denoting a mist, or fog; and think it possible that the word selarim (Num. xi. 31.) may express those clouds of locusts, which compose these flying armies. The opposition of two winds was likely to produce a calm, and a calm to cause a fog; the lower flight of the locusts, the gathering them during the evening, all night, and the next morning, agree with these extracts; and the fatal effects (verses 33, 34.) while the flesh was yet between the teeth of the people, seem to be precisely such as might be expected, from the stench of the immense masses of locusts, spread all abroad round about the camp. Could a more certain way of generating a pestilence have been adopted, considering the stench uniformly attributed to them, and the malignity attending such infection as their dead carcasses so exposed must occasion? [Several interpreters have supposed that the word rendered quails in Ex. xvi. 13. means a species of locust; but this opinion is now generally abandoned, although supported by Ludoff and Niebuhr. R.]

As locusts are commonly eaten in Palestine, and in the neighboring countries, there is no difficulty in supposing, that the word akrides, used by Matthew, (iii. 4.) speaking of the food on which John subsisted, might signify these insects. The ancients affirm, that in Africa, Syria, Persia, and almost throughout Asia, the people did commonly eat these creatures. Some nations were called Aeridophagi, or eaters of locusts, because these insects formed their principal food. Clenard, in a letter from Fez, (A. D. 1541,) assures us, that he saw wagon-loads of locusts brought into that city for food. Kirstenius, in his notes on Matthew, says, he was informed by his Arabic master, that he had often seen them on the river Jordan; that they were of the same form as ours, but larger; that the inhabitants pluck off their wings and feet, and hang up the rest till they grow warm and ferment; and that then they eat them, and think them good food. A monk, who had travelled into Egypt, assures us, that he had eaten of these locusts, and that in the country they subsisted on them four months in the year. More recent travellers corroborate these statements.

[Niebuhr remarks that "it is no more inconceivable to Europeans, that the Arabs should eat locusts with relish, than it is incredible to the Arabs, who have had no intercourse with Christians, that the latter should regard oysters, lobsters, &c. as delicacies. Nevertheless, one is just as certain as the other. Locusts are brought to market on strings, in all the cities of Arabia, from Babelmandeb to Bassorah. On mount Sumara I saw an Arab who had collected a whole sack-full of them. They are prepared in different ways. An Arab in Egypt, of whom we requested that he would immediately eat locusts in our presence, threw them upon the glowing coals; and after he supposed they were roasted enough, he took them by the legs and head, and devoured the remainder at one mouthful. When the Arabs have them in quantities, they roast or dry them in an oven, or boil them and eat them with salt. The Arabs in the kingdom of Morocco boil the locusts, and then dry them on the roofs of their houses. One sees there large baskets-full of them in the markets. I have myself never tried to eat locusts." (Descr. of Arabia, p. 171, Germ. ed.)

Burckhardt also relates the fact in a similar manner: (Travels in Syria, &c. p. 239.) "The Bedouins eat locusts, which are collected in great quantities in the beginning of April, when the sexes cohabit, and they are easily caught. After having been roasted a little upon the iron plate on which bread is baked, (see BAEAN, p. 208.) they are dried in the sun, and then put into large sacks, with the mixture of a little salt. They are never served up as a dish, but every one takes a handful of them when hungry. The peasants of Syria do not eat locusts; nor have I myself ever had an opportunity of tasting them. There are a few poor Fellahs in the Haouran, however, who sometimes, pressed by hunger, make a meal of them; but they break off the head and take out the entrails before they dry them in the sun. The Bedouins swallow them entire."

After these statements, there can surely be no difficulty in admitting "locusts" to have been the food of John the Baptist, Matt. iii. 4. *R.

There is a remarkable passage in Eccl. xii. 5. where Solomon, describing the infelicities of old age, says, according to our translation: "The grasshopper shall be a burden;" but it is generally admitted, that the words should be rendered "The locust shall burden itself." The word (צאן, hagab) signifies a particular species of locust: in Arabic, the word implies to veil, or hide, and it probably denotes a kind of hooded locust, or the lesser yellowish locust, which greatly resembles our grasshopper. To this insect the preacher compares "a dry, shrunk, shrivelled, crumpling, craggy old man, his back-bone sticking out, his knees projecting forwards, his arms backwards, his head downwards, and the apophyses or bunching parts of the bones in general enlarged." From this exact likeness, says Dr. Smith, without all doubt, arose the fable of Tithonus, who, living to an extreme old age, was at last turned into a grasshopper. This poetical use of the locust, as figurative of an old man, may be justified by quoting the poetical figurative application of the same insect, to the same purpose. In the collection of gems in the Florentine gallery, (Plate 96.) appear several instances, as it seems, of this allegory.

The one here copied, appears to be perfectly coincident with what is understood to be the true import of the royal preacher's expressions. It represents an old man, under the emaciated figure of a locust, which has loaded his shrunk stature, his drooping wings, and his spindle shanks, with a supplicatory sacrifice to Venus. In this gem, the idea of an old man being signified by the locust, is conspicuous; for he stands upright, so far as he can stand upright, on his hinder legs; over his shoulder he carries a kind of yoke, with a loaded basket of offerings at each end, (a very common instrument in representations of sacrifice,) which he grasps carefully with his two fore legs (the other fore legs being omitted for the sake of similarity,) and he proceeds creeping (not flying) on tip-toe, staggering towards the column which is consecrated, as appears by evident insignia, to the divinity of his adoration.

Surely, these are sufficiently remarkable coincidences of imagination; as will appear, on analyzing the words of the passage in Ecclesiastes:

Shall crouch all the daughters of song;
And of that which is high they shall fear;
And alarms [shall be] in the way;
And shall drop off the almond, or . . . . . be dismissed the watcher,
or . . . . . be relinquished vigilance;
And shall burden itself the locust;
And abolished is enjoyment.

The Latin version of Pagninus gives the same sense, "Et reprobabitur coitus, et onerabitur dorsum, et dissipabitur concupiscentia."

The adoption of the same emblem of imbecility, by persons so distant and different as the royal preacher, and the engraver of this gem, at least merits this remark; but it seems also to favor the idea, that such was a common figurative representation; and, if so, it may justify the inference that the other parts of Solomon's description of old age were perfectly familiar to the reader in his day, though to explain them thoroughly now, requires no little share of penetration. If this representation be thought less common, it may be esteemed the more curious. But the reason for allegorizing such a character under the figure of a locust, may be gathered from a note of M. Baron: "Ces insectes sont si fortement joints dans l'accouplement, que les prenant avec la main, ils ne se séparent point. Ils restent ainsi dans la même situation plusieurs heures, les jours et les nuits entières; si vous tentez de les séparer, vous sentez qu'ils font résistance, et ce ne peut être qu'avec effort que vous en venez à bout." This is a complete vindication of the version adopted by Pagninus; and, being drawn from nature, shows how the same notion might be expressed under the same similitude, as well by other observers as by the sagacious Solomon.

No apology is necessary for adding the following: "Barzillai was a very aged man, fourscore years old. And Barzillai said unto the king, How long have I to live? Can I discern between good and evil? Can thy servant taste what I eat, or what I drink? Can I hear any more the voice of singing men and singing women? Let thy servant return, to die in my own city, and to be buried in the grave of my father, and of my mother," 2 Sam. xix. 35.

—The sixth age shifts
Into the lean and slipped pantaloon,
With spectacles on's nose, and pouch on's side;

His youthful hose, well saved, a world too wide
For his shrunk shank; and his big manly voice,
Turning again towards childish treble, pipes
And whistles in his sound: Last scene of all,
That ends this strange eventful history,
Is second childishness and mere oblivion;
Sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans every thing.
Shakspeare.

But there is another, and perhaps a more difficult, application of the locust as an emblem, in the Book of Revelation, chap. ix. The passage has generally been thought singular, and has, indeed, been abandoned by most critics as desperate:—

"And there came out of the smoke, locusts upon the earth; and unto them was given power, as the scorpions of the earth have power—and their torment was as the torment of a scorpion when he striketh a man. And the shapes of the locusts were like unto (1) horses prepared unto battle; and on their heads were as it were (2) crowns like gold; and their faces were (3) as the faces of men; and they had hair (4) as the hair of women; and their teeth were (5) as the teeth of lions; and they had breast-plates as it were (6) breast-plates of iron; and the sound of their wings was as the sound of (7) chariots of many horses, rushing to battle; and they had (8) tails like unto scorpions; and there were stings in their tails . . . and (9) they had a king over them."

The following passage from Niebuhr serves in part to explain this representation: (Descrip. Arab. p. 173.) "An Arab of the desert near Basra [Bassorah] informed me of a singular comparison of the locust with other animals. The terrible locust of chap. ix. of the Apocalypse, not then occurring to me, I regarded this comparison as a jest of the Bedouin [Arab], and I paid no attention to it, till it was repeated by another from Bagdad. It was thus:—He compared the head of the locust to that of the horse (1, 6); its breast to that of the lion (5); its feet to those of the camel; its body to that of the serpent; its tail to that of the scorpion (8); its horns [antennæ], if I mistake not, to the locks of hair of a virgin (4); and so of other parts." [In like manner locusts are called by the Italians cavallette, little horses; and by the Germans Heupferde. R.

We have numbered these sentences, that the eye may more readily perceive their correspondences. Every reader will wish that Niebuhr had been aware of the similarity of these descriptions; he might then have illustrated, perhaps, every word of this passage. It seems more natural to compare, in No. 5. their teeth to those of lions, than their breasts to those of lions; but this is more especially proper to the Apocalyptic writer's purpose, as he already had informed us of their resemblance to "horses prepared for battle." As to the armor, &c. of horses prepared for battle, in the East, Knolles informs us, that the Mamelukes' horses were commonly furnished with silver bridles, gilt trappings, and rich saddles; and that their necks and breasts were armed with plates of iron. It is not therefore unlikely, that they had also ornaments resembling crowns of gold, to which the horns of the locust might be, with propriety, compared (2); we find they had really "breast-plates of iron;" (6) and by their rushing on the enemy, and the use they made of their mouths, as described by Knolles, the comparison of them to locusts seems very applicable. Without entering into the question, What these locusts prefigured? the reader will accept the following extracts from this old writer, (p. 75.) in which those who think that the Tartar, or Turkish, nation was intended by the locusts, will not fail to discover many points of resemblance.

“About this time (when in the space of a few yeares such mutations as had not before of long beene seen, chanced in diuers great Monarchies and States) that the Tartars, or rather Tattars, inhabiting the large, cold and bare countries in the North side of Asia, (of all others a most barbarous, fierce, and needie Nation,) stirred vp by their owne wants, and the persuasion of one Zingis, (or as some call him, Cangis,) holden amongst them for a great Prophet, and now by them made their Leader, and honoured by the name of Vlu-Chan, that is to say, THE MIGHTIE KING, (commonly called the great Cham,) flocking together in number like the sand of the sea, and conquering first their poore neighbours, of condition and qualitie like themselves, and easie enough to be entreated with them to seek their better fortune, like swarmes of grasshoppers sent out to devour the world, passed the high Mountaine Caucasus, part of the Mountaine Taurus, of all the Mountaines in the world the greatest; which, beginning neere vnto the Archipelago, and ending vpon the Orientall Ocean, and running thorow many great and famous kingdomes, diuideth Asia into two parts; ouer which great Mountaine, one of the most assured bounders of nature, that had so many worlds of yeares shut vp this rough and sauage people, they now passing without number, and comming downe as it were into another World, full of such Nature's pleasant delights as neuer were to them before seene, bare downe all before them as they went, nothing beeing now able to stand in their way.”

It is remarkable, that Solomon says, (Prov. xxx. 27.) “The locusts have no king;” but the locusts of the Apocalypse have a king, and a dreadful king too—Abaddon,—the destroyer.

LOOKING-GLASSES. Moses says, that the devout women who sat up all night at the door of the tabernacle in the wilderness, offered cheerfully their “looking-glasses” to be employed in making a brazen laver for the purifications of the priests, Exod. xxxviii. 8. These looking-glasses were, without doubt, of brass, since the laver was made out of them. See LAVER.

LORD, Domínus; Κύριος; אדוני, Adonì, or Adonai; Elohìm, or Jehovah; for the Greck and Latin interpreters often put Κύριος, and Domínus, for all these names. (1.) The name Lord belongs to God by pre-eminence, and in this sense ought never to be given to any creature. The Messiah as Son of God, equal to the Father, is also often called Lord in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments. (2.) This name is sometimes given to angels; whether as representing the person of God, or as sent by God. Daniel (x. 16, 17.) says to the angel, or, as he calls him, to one who spoke to him under a human form; “O my Lord, by the vision my sorrows are turned upon me, and I have retained no strength. For how can the servant of this my Lord talk with this my Lord?” (3.) It is sometimes given to princes, and other persons to whom we would show respect, though the appellation Jehovah never is.—The word Lord in the English version, when printed in small capitals, stands always for Jehovah in the Hebrew. See JEHOVAH.

LO-RUHAMA, not obtaining mercy, a symbolical name given by Hosea to his daughter, Hos. i. 6.

LOT, the son of Haran, and nephew of Abraham, followed his uncle from Ur, and afterwards from Haran, to settle in Canaan, Gen. xi. 31. A. M. 2082. Abraham had always a great affection for him, and when they could not continue longer together in Canaan, because they both had large flocks, and their shepherds sometimes quarrelled, (Gen. xiii. 6, 7.) he gave Lot the choice of his abode.

About eight yeares after this separation, Chedorlaomer and his allies having attacked the kings of Sodom, and the neighboring cities, pillaged Sodom, and took many captives, among whom was Lot. Abraham, therefore, armed his servants, pursued the confederate kings, overtook them near the springs of Jordan, recovered the spoil which they had taken, and brought back Lot with the other captives. When the sins of the Sodomites and of the neighboring cities had called down the vengeance of God to punish and destroy them, two angels were sent to Sodom, to forewarn Lot of the dreadful catastrophe that was about to happen. They entered Sodom in the evening, and in the morning, before day, they took Lot, his wife, and his daughters, by the hand, and drew them forcibly, as it were, out of their house; saying, “Save yourselves with all haste: look not behind you; get as fast as you are able to the mountain, lest you be involved in the calamity of the city.” Lot entreated the angels, who consented that he might retire to Zoar, which was one of the five cities doomed to be destroyed. His wife, looking behind her, was destroyed.

Lot left Zoar, and retired with his two daughters to a cave in an adjacent mountain.—Conceiving that all mankind was destroyed, and that the world would end, unless they provided new inhabitants for it, they made their father drink, and the eldest lay with him without his perceiving it; she conceived a son whom she called Moab. The second daughter did the same, and had Ammon.

Several questions are proposed concerning Lot's wife being changed into a pillar of salt. Some are of opinion, that being surprised and suffocated with fire and smoke, she continued in the same place, as immovable as a rock of salt; others, that a column or monument of salt stone was erected on her grave; others, that she was stifled in the flame, and became a monument of salt to posterity; that is, a permanent and durable monument of her imprudence. The common opinion is, that she was suddenly petrified and changed into a statue of rock salt, which is as hard as the hardest rocks.

The words of the original, however, have been much too strictly taken by translators. בַּיָּצִי, rendered statue, by no means expresses form, but fixation, settledness; hence a military post; (1 Sam. x. 5.) that is, a fixed station; and as the Hebrews reckoned among salts both nitre and bitumen, so the term salt here used, may denote the bituminous mass which overwhelmed this woman, fixed her to the place where it fell upon her, raised a mound over her, of a height proportionable to that of her figure, and was long afterwards pointed out by the inhabitants as a memento of her fate, and a warning against loitering, when divinely exhorted, Luke xvii. 32.

LOTS are mentioned in many places of Scripture. God commanded, that lots should be cast on the two goats, to ascertain which should be sacrificed. (See GOAT, SCAPE.) He required, also, that the land of promise should be divided by lot, (Numb. xxvi. 55, 56; xxxiii. 54; xxxiv. 13, &c.) and that the priests and Levites should have their cities given to them by lot, Josh. xiv. xv. xvi. In the time of David, the twenty-four classes of the priests and Levites were distributed by lot, to their order of waiting in the temple, (1 Chron. vi. 54, 61.) and it would seem from Luke i. 9. that the portions of daily duty were appointed to the priests by lot; as Zechariah's lot was to burn incense. In the division of the spoil after victory, lots were cast to determine the portion of each, 1 Chron. xxiv. xxv. The soldiers cast lots for our Saviour's garments, as had been foretold by the prophet; and after the death of Judas, lots were cast to decide who should succeed in his place, Acts i. 26.

The manner of casting lots is not described in the Scriptures; but several methods appear to have been used. Solomon observes, (Prov. xvi. 33.) that "the lot," pebble, "is cast into the lap," בְּרֵיץ, into the bosom, that is, probably, of an urn, or vase; which leads to a very different idea from lap—the lap of a person; yet, had our translators used the word bosom, which is a more frequent and correct import of the word, they would have equally misled the reader, had that bosom been referred to a person; for it does not appear that the bosom of a person, that is, of a garment worn by a person, was ever used to receive lots. But probably several modes of drawing lots, or of casting lots, were practised. In support of this remark it should be observed, that the same word is not always used in the Hebrew to express the event of a lot. In Lev. xvi. 8—10, the lot is said to ascend, אָסַד, i. e. come up out of the vase, or urn. Our translation says, "Aaron shall bring the goat on which the Lord's lot fell,"—but it is, "on which the lot ascended," the direct contrary to falling. "But the goat on which the lot ascended—to be the scape-goat," &c. This compels us to dissent from the explanation of the action, by Parkhurst, (Art. גֵּרָה,) who says, "The stone or mark itself which was cast into the urn or vessel, and by the leaping out of which (when the vessel was shaken) before another of a similar kind, the affair was decided." This is completely inconsistent with the action attributed (very credibly) to Simon the Just, of drawing out these lots; but it may well enough describe what passed in the instance of Haman; (Esth. iii. 7.) they cast Pur, that is, the lot, before Haman, from day to day, and from month to month." They "cast"—rather perhaps they caused to be cast, (הִפְלִיטוּ,) which is very different from drawing out. Also, the manner of casting lots on Jonah; (chap. i. 7.) הִפְלִיטוּ, "they cast lots, and the lot fell, was cast, on Jonah." It cannot well be supposed that these mariners had on board their ship the proper vase, with its accompaniments, for performing this action with suitable dignity; but, more probably, something of the nature of our dice-box was sufficient to answer their purpose.

We are now brought to a more accurate conception of the passage under consideration, in which neither of the words just noticed occurs, (Prov. xvi. 33.) but a very different one, (הִפְלִיטוּ,) the root of which means to cast out, rather than to cast in. It is taken sometimes, however, to express a casting in all directions; and hence Mr. Taylor infers that the intention of the royal preacher was to express an action of the person who holds the lot vase; that is, strongly shaking it, for the purpose of commingling the whole of its contents to prevent all preference for one lot over another, to the hand of him who is to draw:—Literally, "In a lot vase the lots are shaken in all directions; nevertheless, from the Lord is their whole decision—judgment."

The wise man also acknowledges the usefulness of this custom: (Prov. xviii. 18.) "The lot causeth contentions to cease, and parteth between the mighty." It is sometimes forbidden, however; as, when it is practised without necessity; or with superstition; or with a design of tempting God; or in things in which there are other natural means of discovering truth, reason and religion furnish better ways to guide us. Haman (Esth. iii. 7, &c.) used lots, not only out of superstition, but likewise in an unjust and criminal matter, when he undertook to destroy the Jews. Nebuchadnezzar did so in a superstitious manner, when, being on the way to Jerusalem, and Rabbath of the Ammonites, he cast lots to determine which of the two cities he should first attack, Ezek. xxi. 18, &c.

LOTS THE FEAST OF, SEE PUR OR PURIM.

LOVE is a natural passion of the human mind; given to man for the most important purposes. It is denominated from its object, as, (1.) Divine love, love to God, love to divine things, to whatever relates to God, or is appointed or approved by him. Love is generally excited in the mind by a sense of some good, some excellence, real or supposed, in the object beloved; wherefore, as all good is supremely excellent, absolutely certain and infinite, in God, he is entitled to our supreme affection. (2.) Brotherly love, is an affection arising from a sense of participation in certain enjoyments, benefits, &c. of which both parties are conscious. In a family, brothers love each other, because they are conscious of their mutual relation, of enjoying the same family advantages, privileges, &c. (3.) Christian brotherly love, is assimilated to the sentiments and feelings of the former: it is a sympathy actuated by a sense of communion in the same hopes, the same fears, the same affections, the same aversions, the benevolence of the same parent, and the general and particular sympathies connected with the principles of piety, the union of the Christian system, and the reciprocal kindnesses of truly renewed minds.

It is the excellence of the Christian system that it ennobles, regulates, and directs this passion to proper objects, and moderates it within due bounds. Finding this principle in the human mind, it does not banish but encourage it; does not depress but exalt it; does not abate but promote it. It is conducted by piety to proper objects, is animated with the noblest expectations, and is trained up for perpetual exercise in a world where it shall be perfectly purified, perfectly extended, and perfectly rewarded.

LOVE-FEAST, see ΑΓΑΠÆ. Eng. trans. Feasts of charity, Jude 12.

LOW is taken for station in life, for disposition of mind, for national depression, &c. As poverty of station is not poverty of spirit, so lowliness of condition is not lowliness of mind; neither is it always connected with it. Nevertheless, it is a great blessing which sometimes attends the dispensations of Providence, that they abase a person in this world, and bring him into a more suitable disposition of mind, a more lowly habit of thought and conduct than when his prosperity was high. So that if he have occasion to regret the loss of temporal goods, he may have much greater reason to rejoice in the acquisition of mental and spiritual advantages. See HUMILITY.

LOWER PARTS of the earth are, (1.) Valleys, which diversify the face of the globe, and are evidently lower than hills, which also contribute to that diversity, Isa. xlv. 23.—(2.) The grave, which, being dug into the earth, or into rocks, &c. is the lower part of the earth, or that portion of it which is usually opened to men: this is sometimes called the deep, or abyss; and, indeed, it is secluded from our cognizance, till we are called to visit "that bourn from whence no traveller returns," Ps. lxxiii. 9; Eph. iv. 9.—(3.) As to the phrase, "lower parts of the earth," (Ps. cxxxix. 15.) in reference to the mother's womb, it is obscure. Perhaps there is a mark of assimilation (s) dropped; the word may include the idea of a mere particle, an atom of earth,—“When I was made in secret, when I was compacted into form, put together in the most secret of places, (the womb,) and endued with life, though a minute particle of clay, an atom of earth,” as the fetus in the embryo, the chick in the egg; quasi animalcula in semine, &c. Or the passage may have reference to the first formation of man from the dust of the earth. Gen. ii. 7. It does not appear necessary to take the Hebrew word, rendered “lower parts,” as expressing the extremely deep, or central parts, in reference to the general globe of the earth, (see Ps. lxxiii; Eph. iv. 9; Isa. xlv. 23.) so that the superficial dust of the earth, of which man was made, being taken from the moist valley, not from high hills, from a loamy soil, not from granite rock, may be understood by the phrase. If this be accepted, the psalmist may intend to say, “The formation of my body, with its various members, was not without thy knowledge, when I was in the secret womb, completely constituted, body, soul and spirit, (1 Thess. v. 23.) as wonderfully now, by natural generation, as man was at first compacted from the dust of the earth:” or, “as a wonderful microcosm, a world—a human world, with its many secret combinations, and interior constructions necessary to life; as wonderful as the composition of the globe itself!” Those acquainted with the speculations of the inquisitive on the mode of impregnation, will admit the truth of this representation, notwithstanding the unremitted labors of our own hunters, the experiments of the curious Spallanzani, and of a thousand others, which, probably, would have been thought little, if any thing, short of impiety among the Hebrews. “The construction of my solid parts—my bones, &c. was not hidden from thee, though formed in the most secret place; and they became connected, compact, firm, under thy appointment and inspection, though originally a mere molecule of moist matter.” (Comp. Job x. 9—12.)

LUBIM, the Libyans, always mentioned in connection with the Egyptians and Ethiopians, 2 Chr. xii. 3; xvi. 8; Neh. iii. 9. See LIBYA, and LEHAEM. R.

LUCIFER. [“How art thou fallen from heaven, O LUCIFER, son of the morning! how art thou cut down to the ground, which didst weaken the nations!” Isa. xlv. 12. This is the only place where the word Lucifer occurs in the English Bible, and it is here evidently applied to the king of Babylon. The word signifies light-giver, and is the Latin epithet of the planet Venus, or the morning star,—a meaning which is also here expressly assigned to it by the phrase “son of the morning.” The Hebrew word is הֵלֵל, hélél, which may either have the meaning brilliant star, or it may be an imperative, signifying lament, howl. It is taken in this latter sense by the Syriac, Aquila and Jerome; but the general sense of the passage is thereby little changed; it would only read, “Howl, son of the morning,” &c. The former sense is preferred by the Sept. Vulg. Targums, Rabbins, Luther, and the English version. A brilliant star, and especially the morning star, is often put as the emblem of a mighty prince, Num. xxiv. 17. In Rev. ii. 28, it is said of Christ, “I will give him [cause him to be] the morning star;” and in Rev. xxii. 16, Christ says of himself, “I am the bright and morning star.” The Arabs, also, according to the Camoos, call a prince, the star of a people.

Tertullian and Gregory the Great understood this passage in Isaiah of the fall of Satan; and from this circumstance the name Lucifer has since been applied to Satan. This is now the usual acceptation of the word. *R.

The Arabians call Lucifer Eblis, and also Azazel, which is the name of the scape-goat that was sent into the wilderness, laden with the sins of the Jews. They relate, that the angels, having God's order to fall prostrate before Adam immediately after his creation, all complied, excepting Eblis, who obstinately refused, alleging, that he and his companions having been derived from the element fire, which is much purer and more excellent than that of earth, of which Adam was formed, it was not just that they should be obliged to pay submission to their inferior. Whereupon God said to him, “Be gone from hence, for thou shalt be deprived for ever of my peace, and shalt be cursed to the day of judgment.” Eblis desired of God that he would grant him respite till the time of the general resurrection; but all the delay he could obtain was till the sound of the first trumpet, that at which all men shall die, in order to rise again at the second sound of the trumpet; that is, forty years after. Eblis, therefore, died, according to the Mahometans, but he will hereafter rise with all men, in order to be plunged into flames. We relate these idle traditions for no other reason but to show, that the theology of the eastern people is but a corruption of Christianity.

LUCIUS of Cyrene, mentioned Acts xiii. 1, was one of the prophets of the Christian church at Antioch. While employed in his ministry with the others, the Holy Ghost said, “Separate me Paul and Barnabas,” &c. Some think that Lucius was one of the seventy. The disciple mentioned, (Rom. xvi. 21.) and styled Paul's kinsman, is, probably, the same as Lucius the Cyrenian. [He is by many supposed to be the same with the evangelist Luke. See LUKE. R.]

LUD, the fourth son of Shem, (Gen. x. 22.) who is said by Josephus to have peopled Lydia, a province of Asia Minor. Arias Montanus places these Ludim where the Tigris and Euphrates meet, and M. le Clerc, between the rivers Chaboras and Saocoras, or Masca.

LUDIM, the son of Mizraim, (Gen. x. 13.) and also the name of a people frequently mentioned in Scripture, Isa. lxvi. 19; Jer. xlvi. 9; Ezek. xxvii. 10; xxx. 5. We must, however, distinguish between the children of Mizraim, (Gen. x. 13.) or rather, a people or colony which had migrated from Egypt, and Lud the son of Shem, in verse 22, noticed above. These African Lydians are usually mentioned with Phul, Ethiopia and Phut. They were also mercenary auxiliaries to Tyre; and we must therefore expect to meet with them in a country which admits of all these particulars. Bochart inclines to Abyssinia; but this seems to have other characters, and is justly rejected by Michaelis. In Isaiah lxvi. 19, Lud is associated with Pul, or Phul, and described as a nation which draws the bow; also Jer. xlv. 19. In Ezekiel xxx. 5, it is in our translation taken for Lydia, being, however, mentioned with the mingled people, or Abyssinia; it is distinguished from that country, but plainly placed in Africa. We may therefore admit of two countries under this name. (1.) Lydia in Asia; and (2.) Lydia, or Ludim, in Africa. Josephus affirms, that the descendants of Ludim had been long extinct, having been destroyed in the Ethiopian wars. The Jerusalem paraphrast translates Ludim, the inhabitants of the Marcotis, a part of Egypt. The truth is, that although these people were in Egypt, it is not easy to show exactly where they dwelt.

LUHITH, a mountain, in the opinion of Lyra, and the Hebrew commentators on Isa. xv. 5; but Eusebius thinks it to be a place between Areopolis and Joara; others suppose between Petra and Sihor. From Jer. xlviii. 5, it is evident that it was an elevated station, but whether a town on a hill, or a place for prospect, does not appear. It seems to be associated with other places which we know to be towns. The order of the places named is not the same in both prophets, though both refer to the calamities of Moab, to which dominion Luhith belonged.

LUKE, the Evangelist, is the author of the Gospel bearing his name, and also of the Acts of the Apostles. As Mr. Taylor has bestowed much labor on an historical biography of this evangelist, with a view to the elucidation and authentication of several of the Scripture narratives, we shall lay before our readers the most material parts of his dissertations.

It may be thought a somewhat singular mode of treating the biographical history of an individual to begin it with mention of his death; but, in the present instance, that becomes nothing less than a kind of key to the greater incidents of his life; for, as we have no regular history of the party, but are obliged to arrange incidental references to him, not recorded with any such intention, it is of consequence to be able to annex dates to those incidents, and to show the propriety of certain circumstances connected with them. On that propriety depends the cogency of our arguments.

It passes uncontradicted, that the "Acts of the Apostles" were completed and published A. D. 63, or 64; that Luke, not very long afterwards, went over into Achaia, where he lived, perhaps, a year or two, and died aged 84. He was, therefore, more than fifteen years (but less than twenty) older than the computed era of A. D. and, if we trace this calculation upwards, we shall find it furnish notable coincidences. For instance, Paul says, "At my first hearing all forsook me, no man stood with me;" (2 Tim. iv. 16.) yet Luke was with him at that time;—why did he not support the apostle? No answer can be given to this so rational, or so effectual, as the recollection, that Luke was then eighty years old, (more or less,) a time of life when many infirmities may become innocent causes of absence in such a case, when the person can afford but little assistance, at best; an age which even persecutors may feel some compunction, if not reluctance, at bringing to the bar, and exposing to danger from "the mouth of the lion." We may also discover tokens of elderly weakness, in the circumstance, that whereas Paul and his company intended to travel on foot from Troas to Assos, a short but mountainous tract, (Acts xx. 13.) Luke preferred proceeding by ship, as less fatiguing. He might be now about seventy-four or seventy-five years of age. The same consideration manifests the discretion of the Christian missionaries in leaving Luke at Philippi, Acts xvi. 40. A. D. 51. (This appears from the change of persons in the narrative; compare verses 10—16.) After what had happened, it was impossible for Paul and Silas to remain in that city; of the other brethren Timothy was too young a man, not only as it concerned the care and superintendence of an infant church, but, as it is most likely that the family of Lydia (in whose house they abode) consisted principally of daughters, the residence of that young man in her family, however pious he might be, was unadvisable. No such objection lay against Luke: he was then much beyond sixty years old; an age which prevented censure, while it bespoke prudence: and, accordingly, we find that under the charge of our intelligent as well as pious evangelist, this church speedily became flourishing, numerous, and composed of members who had something to spare for their spiritual father; and from whom their spiritual father would condescend to accept what he declined from other churches—an incident not to be overlooked.

Again, we read (Acts xiii. 1. A. D. 45.) that "there were in the church that was at Antioch, certain prophets and teachers:—as (1.) Barnabas, (2.) Simeon, called Niger, (3.) Lucius of Cyrene, (4.) Manaen, who had been brought up with Herod the tetrarch, and (5.) Saul. It is inquired whether this Lucius were Luke the evangelist. General opinion inclines to the affirmative; but the argument has never been so clearly stated as it might be. There are two propositions necessary to be attended to, for the better understanding of this passage: the first is, that the writer Latinizes; the second is, that the names are ranked according to seniority. There needs no other proof that the writer Latinizes here than the appellation Niger, given to Simeon. The import of this Latin term certainly is—black, dark, deeply swarthy; but, unless Latin were the current language at Antioch, (which we know it was not,) this is a translation of the Greek term Melas, which denotes the same thing; and, therefore, is a verbal accommodation. But if the writer Latinizes in the preceding name, it can occasion no surprise if he also Latinizes in writing Lucius instead of Luke; and perhaps we may find, before our inquiry terminates, that this is constantly observed when Latins are expected to be the readers. The second proposition is, that the names are ranked according to the age of the parties. To establish this we must reflect that Barnabas (though, perhaps, he may be placed first in compliment to his being a superintending visitor sent from Jerusalem) was brother to Mary, who was herself advanced in life, being mother of a son, John Mark, already old enough to accompany his uncle on various journeys; and to choose firmly for himself the cause of his own conduct. Barnabas was also of a certain dignified and majestic presence, proper to the currently understood character of Jupiter, the father of the gods, Acts xiv. 12. This is inconsistent with the notion of his being a young man. Moreover, as Mercury was son of Jupiter, according to the heathen theogony, Barnabas must have had the appearance of sufficient age, and gravity, the natural attendant on age, to pass for the father of Paul, whom the Lycaonians qualified as Mercury; for we cannot suppose that the mere eloquence of these missionaries was the sole cause of these people's mistake: there must have been a suitable deportment, figure, and relative time of life also; and these conspicuous. The second on the list is Simeon, surnamed the Black; an epithet that well agrees with the complexion of a native of Cyrene in Africa; and, therefore, renders it extremely probable, that this is Simon the Cyrenian, the father of Alexander and Rufus, Mark xv. 21. It appears from Acts xi. 19, 20, that among the believers dispersed at the time of Stephen's martyrdom, were men of Cyrene, who travelled as far as Antioch, preaching the Lord Jesus. There is, therefore, nothing to hinder our reckoning among them, Simon the Cyrenian, otherwise Simeon the Black; but if so, and if the Rufus whom Paul salutes, (Rom. xvi. 13.) with his mother, were son of this Simeon, then he was, certainly, an elderly man; since both his sons were eminently distinguished in the church, when Mark composed his Gospel, and apparently long before. It is probable, also, that Simeon was deceased, when Paul wrote to the Romans, say A. D. 58. We come now to Lucius; and if he be Luke the evangelist—placing this transaction in the year of Christ 45—then Lucius exceeded the age of sixty years; consequently, he might probably enough take precedence of Manaen, and certainly of Saul, who at this time, as the most judicious commentators suppose, was not more than about thirty-five.

Thus we have reduced to its true value one of Michaëlis's two formidable objections; objections which appeared to him insurmountable, against the identity of Lucius and Luke. "Besides," says he, "the name of Lucius stands before that of Paul, an arrangement which is incompatible with Luke's modesty, if he himself were Lucius, for he would not then have placed his own name before that of an apostle." Now, this he had a very good right to do, without any impeachment of his modesty—in fact he was obliged to do so, if this were the arrangement of the church lists at Antioch; and if the order were determined by seniority.

And here we ought not to overlook the wisdom of the appointment made by the Holy Ghost in uniting Barnabas and Saul in the same mission; one was the eldest, the other the youngest, of the teachers at Antioch: the sedateness of one would temper the fire of the other: the character of Barnabas as a "son of consolation," as a "good man," mild, courteous, a man of experience, who had long been a companion of the apostles, and was familiar with their views of things, admirably combined with the fervor of his younger friend, whose greater activity and promptitude would induce and enable him to improve every opening to "spend and be spent" in all directions, to discern possible advantages, and to act on contingencies, in cases which to his less vigorous partner might appear dubious, if not imprudent; or which he might think himself, at least, not altogether competent to. If Luke were about sixty years of age, when settled at Antioch, whither he, a Cyrenian, had followed some of his countrymen, he must have been about forty-eight or fifty at the period of the crucifixion;—a time of life when the judgment is mature, when the reasoning faculties are vigorous; when the character of the man is formed; and when even the company and associates of a person assimilate to the same qualities with his own; for men of this number of years seldom choose boys or youths for their confidential friends. Nor was it a boy, or a youth, who accompanied the disciple whose name is omitted in the history of the travellers walking to Emmaus; it was Cleophas, or Alpheus; and Alpheus was the father of several of the apostles; he was, therefore, in advanced life. If his sons were of age to be called to that eminent station, their father was certainly not under the age attributed by our calculation to Luke:

and forty-eight, or fifty, is likely to have been nearly the corresponding years of these two confidential intimates.

We are now arrived at that point of time when, according to our intention to support the competency of Luke as an eye-witness to some of the facts he records, it is of importance to consider what evidence of this his narrative affords. It is the earliest period at which he can, with propriety, be introduced; for though some have placed him among the seventy, yet every probability is against that notion. It appears that he was a native of Cyrene, not of Galilee; and, therefore, not likely to have been so employed. To understand this properly, we must observe, that there assembled on the morning of the resurrection a number of adherents to Jesus, beside the apostles; for the women ran and told their wonderful tale "to the eleven, and to all the rest (as Luke, and Luke only distinctly observes):—they believed them not:—However, Peter, starting up, ran to the monument, and stooping down, he saw the linen clothes laid by themselves, and went away, wondering in himself at what was come to pass." Nor was Peter the only one who ran; for we learn afterwards, from the traveller's recital, that "certain (τινες, plural) of those who were with us went to the monument, and found it as the women had reported;—but him they saw not." Among this "rest," and this "us," we must place the speaker; but evidently, whoever the speaker was, this was not the first time of his associating with this company: he was, like his fellow-traveller Alpheus, a well-known friend. These travellers quitted their company after Peter and John had returned; in the very height of their universal amazement. And, going for Emmaus, they debated, they argued with each other, concerning these events. And as they discoursed together and reasoned, controverted the various incidents, Jesus himself approached them, (their eyes were holden that they should not know him—which implies that, otherwise, they would have known him; they, therefore, had a previous acquaintance with him,) and said, "What are these subjects which ye are bandying backwards and forwards, one to the other, as ye walk and are sad?" Alpheus answering said, "Art thou the only stranger in Jerusalem, who hath not known what hath taken place there, in these days?" He inquired what things; and they said—No, it was not they who said; for Alpheus had spoken already, and it was now his companion's turn to speak. The writer mentions the name of Alpheus, distinctly enough, but the name of his companion—the present speaker—he suppresses. . . . And, further, to avoid introducing "I said," as the fact really was, the writer takes a liberty with grammar, and puts that in the plural, which certainly passed in the singular. This license betrays the man; the writer and the speaker are the same person. The distinctness and accuracy of the speech mark more than mere second-hand narrative. The subsequent observation, "Did not our hearts burn within us by the way?" and the precision with which the action of Jesus is described, "he made as though he would have gone farther," are hints of participation, not of information. And they agree well with the correctness of the historian who has told us, that the inscription on the cross was "written in letters of Greek, and Latin, and Hebrew." How could he know this minute particular? He must have been in Jerusalem at the time, to see it. If he were in Jerusalem at that time, then we infer, at once, the competency of Luke as an eye-witness to some of the facts he records; which it is the purport of the present discussion to support.

Moreover, it is remarkable, that all appearances of Jesus after his resurrection introduced by Luke are in, or near, Jerusalem. He says nothing of what happened in Galilee, at the sea of Tiberias, or any where else; he confines his history to facts which came within his own knowledge. Nor should we disregard remarks that might be made on the early chapters of the Acts, such as the writer's acquaintance with the number of the names recorded on the first Christian list; "they were about 120;" his full report of Peter's speeches; of the conduct of Caiaphas and the Sadducees towards the apostles, and towards the deacons, especially Stephen, whose speech he records in a manner that proves he heard it; with the action of the Jewish rulers, "they gnashed upon him with their teeth," a minor circumstance, of no importance whatever to the story, but, evidently, the remark of a by-stander, made at the time. Now, if we admit the residence of Luke at Jerusalem, when Stephen was murdered, and when the Holy Ghost descended, &c. we shall find it impossible to deny his residence in that city a few weeks sooner, when the crucifixion and the resurrection took place; and if he were, as every thing leads us to conclude, of the number of the 120, he was certainly a believer of long standing, and one of those who formed the "rest," the "us," the deeply interested and argumentative associate of Alpheus, and one of the company met together with the apostles. Is it too much to say, that the medical knowledge of Luke contributed to the confidential altercation between him and Alpheus? that he knew the course of the wound made by the spear under given circumstances, and argued, as he well might, on the impossibilities of the case? Is it too much to say, that as Luke is the only writer who notices (chap. xxiii. 49.) that "all the acquaintance of Jesus stood with the women, afar off;" therefore, he himself was one of those acquaintance?

If this train of argument be credible, we have ascertained two facts; that Luke was of mature age, at the time of the manifestation of the gospel; and, that he is by no means that mere reporter of what he had learned from others, which some have supposed. The reader will perceive, that by tracing the chronology of Luke's life in an inverted order, we have obtained a stronger conviction of the truth of the facts stated, than others have allowed themselves to indulge; nevertheless, that these facts have already been admitted, may appear from the words of the equally cautious and learned Lardner: "It is probable, that he is Lucius, mentioned Rom. xvi. 21. If so, he was related to St. Paul the apostle. And it is not unlikely, that that Lucius is the same as Lucius of Cyrene, mentioned by name, Acts xiii. 1, and in general with others, chap. xi. 20. It appears to me very probable, that St. Luke was a Jew by birth, and an early Jewish believer. This must be reckoned to be a kind of requisite qualification for writing a history of Christ, and the early preaching of his apostles, to advantage; which certainly St. Luke has performed. He may, also, have been one of the two whom our Lord met in the way to Emmaus, on the day of his resurrection, as related Luke xxiv. 13—35. He is expressly styled by the apostle his fellow-laborer, Philem. ver. 24. If he be the person intended Col. iv. 14, (which seems very probable,) he was or had been by profession a physician. And he was greatly valued by the apostle, who calls him beloved. He accompanied Paul when he first went into Macedonia.

And we know, that he went with the apostle from Greece, through Macedonia and Asia, to Jerusalem, and thence to Rome, where he staid with him two years of his imprisonment. We do not exactly know when Luke formed the design of writing his two books; but, probably, they are the labor of several years. Nor can any hesitate to allow the truth of what is said by some of the ancients, that Luke, who for the most part was a companion of Paul, had likewise more than a slight acquaintance with the rest of the apostles."

It is proper, however, to state "the most material objection" of Michaëlis to the identity of Lucius and Luke, in his own words: "St. Paul wrote his Epistle to the Romans from Corinth, and Lucius was with him at the time; for St. Paul sends a salutation from Lucius, Rom. xvi. 21. Consequently, if Lucas and Lucius be one and the same person, the author of the Acts of the Apostles must have been with St. Paul at Corinth, when the Epistle to the Romans was written. But if we attend to the mode of writing in the Acts of the Apostles, we shall perceive that the author of this book was not at this time in Corinth. . . . He staid behind at Philippi—he remained at Philippi (probably with a view of edifying the newly-founded community) during the whole of St. Paul's travels, which are described in chapters xvii. xviii. xix. But in this interval St. Paul wrote his Epistle to the Romans from Corinth; and, therefore, the author of the Acts was not with St. Paul when he wrote that Epistle; consequently, he was not the same person with Lucius."

The consequence relied on by Michaëlis in this extract does not seem to be strictly legitimate. Was it absolutely necessary that Lucius should be present with Paul in order to send his salutation to the Romans? We think not; and the following arguments may support this opinion. First, it is not impossible that Luke might be with Paul at any given time or place, in the interval of Acts xvii.—xx. 5, though not mentioned in these chapters; for we learn, that repeated acts of intercourse took place between the Philippians and the apostle; as we read, Phil. iv. 10—18: "Now ye, Philippians, know also that in the beginning of the Gospel, when I departed from Macedonia, no church communicated with me as concerning giving and receiving, but ye only; for even in Thessalonica ye sent once and again unto my necessity;"—"I rejoiced in the Lord greatly, that now, at the last, your care of me hath flourished again; wherein ye were also careful, but ye lacked opportunity;"—for "Epaphroditus, your messenger, hath ministered to my wants," chap. ii. 25—30. That similar communications reached the apostle at Corinth is clear, from 2 Cor. xi. 8, 9: "I robbed other churches, taking wages of them to do you service; and when I was present with you and wanted, I was chargeable to no man; for that which was lacking to me the brethren which came from Macedonia supplied." Philippi, we know, was a chief city of Macedonia; and if we allow the possibility that among the brethren which came from Macedonia, Luke might, on some occasion, be one, the possibility that he might be present with Paul, when he sent the salutation of Lucius to the Romans, follows of course. But, secondly, as we see that communications from Philippi to the apostles were frequent, what should hinder Luke from desiring Paul to insert his salutation to the Romans, though the evangelist were still at Philippi? He certainly was acquainted with Paul's intentions, generally, as the apostle writes to the Romans, (chap. i. 15.) "Now I would not have you ignorant, brethren, that oftentimes I purposed to come to you."—This often purposing was no secret; and admit that Luke might express his readiness to accompany Paul, and the reason of sending his salutation is evident. But this argument may be drawn still closer; for Luke was certainly informed of Paul's intention at this very time. The apostle writes to the Romans, (chap. xv. 13.) "Whosoever I take my journey into Spain, I will come to you, for I trust to see you in my journey. But now I go unto Jerusalem, to minister unto the saints; for it hath pleased them of Macedonia, to make a certain contribution for the poor saints which are at Jerusalem. When, therefore, I have performed this, I will come by you into Spain." Now this is, in other words, what Luke relates in Acts xix. 21: "Paul purposed in spirit, when he had passed through Macedonia, to go to Jerusalem; saying, After I have been there, I must also see Rome." By whatever means Luke knew of Paul's purpose in spirit to see Rome, he might know of the epistle in preparation to be sent to the Romans, which was, evidently, the precursor to the execution of that intention; and by means of the frequent remittances from Philippi to the apostle, he might easily express his desire to be remembered to the Romans. Nor is there any thing unlikely in the thought, that Paul himself communicated to Luke what he purposed in spirit; and that it was in some friendly letter to him he should say, I must also see Rome.

A hint on the Latinizing of the evangelist's name will conclude this part of the subject. We have already seen this mutation take place at Antioch; and we ought to add, that, no doubt, much Latin was spoken in this city; it being the residence of the Roman president of Syria, the seat of tribunitial power, the metropolis of the East, and also the station of considerable military forces. Nor would we forget, that though Antioch was a Greek city, yet a coin of Vespasian is somewhat distinguished by bearing the Latin name Antiochia, inscribed around a turreted female head, the genius of the city. It was struck under Mucianus, who lay there with an army, while Vespasian, lately proclaimed emperor, was yet in Asia. It is, therefore, possible, that Simeon was really called Niger by the Roman part of the population at Antioch, and by the Roman members of the church there, as Luke might be called Lucius by them. These Latin names the writer of the Acts retains, in compliment to his Latin readers in Italy, where he finished his history; and Paul adopts the name Lucius when writing to the same persons, in his Epistle to the Romans; although, when writing from Rome to the Greeks, he inserts this appellation in its Greek form, Lucas, as 2 Tim. iv. 11, et al.

We have presumed that Luke, at our first acquaintance with him, was of mature age, a reasoning and considerate man; and we further presume, a physician. Such was the companion of Alpheus. But there is another personage of greater importance than Alpheus, on whose account the character of Luke peculiarly demands notice. For if we reflect, we shall find that Mary, the mother of Jesus, was of much about the age of Luke; (say nearly fifty years, at the time of the crucifixion;) that she was no less reasoning and no less considerate than he was; and that his profession of physician admitted access to the confidence of the sex, without offence. The inference we wish to draw is, that this evangelist received from the Holy Mother those papers which he has preserved in the early part of his Gospel; with that information which enabled him to assert his "perfect understanding (or diligent tracing) of all things connected with this history, from the very first." It is probable, that this confidence was the result of prolonged intercourse; and, therefore, we cannot possibly say at what time it produced the effect we have attributed to it. Leaving this uncertain, yet placing it, as most convenient, in the interval from the resurrection to the dispersion subsequent to the martyrdom of Stephen, we shall lay before the reader those arguments which may tend to establish our general position, relative to Luke's veracity as an historian, and his characteristic accuracy as a writer.

Nothing so fully establishes our confidence in a writer, as a knowledge of his personal character. If he be loose, inaccurate, heedless, we hardly know how to trust him when he declares the most solemn truths in the most solemn manner. If he be studious, particular, punctual, we pay a deference even to his current discourse; and if he affirm a thing, we rest satisfied of its truth and reality. But persons of strict accuracy seldom trust to their memory entirely on important affairs; they make memoranda, or keep some kind of journal, in which they minute transactions as they arise; so that, at after-periods, they can refer to events thus recorded, and refresh their memories by consulting their former observations. This, too, is customary, chiefly, if not wholly, among men of letters, men of liberal and enlarged education, men who are conversant with science, and who know the value of hints made on the spot, pro re nata. My first proposition is, that Luke the evangelist was a person of learning, of accuracy of character, and that he instanced this by keeping a journal of events, of which we have traces in his writings. He did not trust to his recollection, but his custom was, to make memoranda of interesting occurrences.

Let us try a few passages of his travels by this proposition. We meet this evangelist in Acts xvi. 17, where he says, "Loosing from Troas, we came with a straight course to Samothracia, and the next (day) to Neapolis, from thence to Philippi, a city of the first part of Macedonia, and a (Roman) colony." These particulars are precisely such as a traveller of education would insert in his pocket-book.

Acts xx. Memorandum of the company. 1. Sopater of Berea—2. Aristarchus—3. Secundus; these were of Thessalonica—4. Gaius; he was of Derbe—and 5. Timothy, whom I know so well as to have no need of marking his country—6. Tychicus—7. Trophimus; these were of Asia. These, going before, tarried for us at Troas.—Memorandum of the time of year. We sailed from Philippi, after the days of unleavened bread; as we might say in modern English, directly after Easter.—Memorandum of the time occupied in the journey. We came unto them to Troas in five days, where we abode seven days, &c.

Acts xxvii. At Casarea went on board a ship belonging to Adramyttium, Aristarchus, a Macedonian, of Thessalonica, in our company, made sail same day. Next day touched at Sidon, staid there some little time, made sail again, wind contrary, sailed under the lee of Cyprus, sailed across the sea of Cilicia and Panphylia, bore up for Myra, in Lycia; finding an Alexandrian vessel there, went on board her; sailed slowly; after many days had hardly made Cnidus, the wind being unfavorable; sailed under the lee of Crete, standing towards Salmone, which we weathered with difficulty, and brought up in a roadstead called the Fair Havens, near Lasea. Not advisable to remain here, the opinion prevailed to make for Phenice, said to be a good port of the same island, Crete, over against Africa, but bearing west-south-west of us.—It will be perceived, that every idea of these extracts is in the original; we have done no more than put them into current language, such as we find in books of travels. They are mostly particulars of no consequence to the main purport of the history; but are evidently transcripts, not from memory, but from memoranda. The same we may say of the following.

Acts xxviii. 11.—After three months, we departed in a ship of Alexandria, which had wintered in the isle (Malta), whose sign was Castor and Pollux; landing at Syracuse, we tarried there three days; from thence, standing out to sea, and tacking frequently, we came to Reggio; and after one day the wind blew from the south, we came the next day to Puteoli, tarried there seven days, went on to Appii Forum, and the Three Taverns—arrived in Rome. This repeated mention of days' journeys, is clearly a continuation of the journal, and shows that the writer had not lost it in the shipwreck at Malta. We often find travellers preserving their papers when they lose every thing else.

There are many other notes of time, &c. which might corroborate our assertion; but this specimen we think sufficient, and is all we offer at present. Hence the inference is undeniable, that the writer of the "Acts of the Apostles" had, in composing that work, written evidence, of the most accurate description, before him.

Let us see whether he maintains the same character for precision in his Gospel; which he thus begins—"In the fifteenth year of Tiberius Cæsar (the emperor), Pontius Pilate being governor of Judea, Herod tetrarch of Galilee, his brother Philip tetrarch of Iturea and the Træchonitis, Lysanias tetrarch of Abilene, Annas and Caiaphas being high-priests."—Could any man take greater pains to insure precision, or to fix a date? He does not content himself with mentioning the year of the emperor, or the king of the country, in which the events he is about to narrate happened, but he calls in, by way of corroboration, as it were, the evidence of three sovereigns, for no other purpose than that of marking the period he intended; they being afterwards dropped by him.—This shows clearly the particularity of a writer; of a man conversant with written documents of the most correct and precise description; one who trusted nothing to words, or to memory. How extra precise should we think the author, who dated a volume from Jamaica, "In the fifteenth year of George III. such an one being governor of Jamaica, such an one governor of Barbadoes, such an one governor of Grenada, and the Rev. M. and N. archbishops of Canterbury and York." We should certainly conclude "this writer, whatever else he is, is correctness itself." Moreover, this method of notation is completely Egyptian, and therefore answers, to us, the double purpose of confirming the opinion that Luke was "Lucius of Cyrene," and of the genuineness and authenticity of this part of the Gospel.

We turn now to the preface of Luke's Gospel, and we find it completely in union with this strongly marked exactness and precision:—"Whereas many good people, and not to be blamed, have taken in hand, but did not complete their intention, to publish an orderly narration of certain events, as they have been delivered to us by those who, from the beginning of these events, were (some of them) eye-witnesses, and (others) parties concerned in them, promoters of them by personal participation; it has seemed good to me, having accurately examined all points from a much earlier period than they had done, indeed from the very first rise of the matter, to write an orderly history of these things; and thereby to accomplish that desirable purpose in which those writers have failed." We say, this profession of correctness and order is perfectly in character with the man who tells us how many days he staid in such a place, in what point the wind was, what was the name of the ship he sailed in, on what occasion a council was held in the vessel, and what were the language and observations of the seamen, as to the bearing of the port they intended to make, &c. This man could not bear the imperfections of the books which came under his notice on a certain subject; they did not begin early enough, and they ended too soon. He therefore determined to begin his history much earlier, and to continue it much later. This he accomplished in a manner which we shall see hereafter.

There is an instance of his accuracy and spirit of research that ought not to pass unnoticed, (Acts xxiii. 26.) where he gives us (translated, probably, from the Latin) a copy of the letter which Clæudius Lysias sent to his excellency Felix the governor. That this corresponds exactly with Roman letters of the like kind, we know; that the Greek is not the original, will, we think, appear to any one who reads it with this idea on his mind; besides, that it should seem most natural for Roman officers to write to each other in their native language. And what (additional) do we learn from this letter? Nothing at all; had it been omitted, we should have known the same facts as we know now; but it was not consistent with the researching spirit of this writer to let it escape him; it adds a written document to his history; and, very characteristically, he procures a copy, and preserves it years, for future service.

This argument is stated on two suggestions. If Luke had no intention at this time of composing a history, his procuring this letter was the effect of his general character, and customary inquisitiveness; but if he had an intention at this time of composing a history, his procuring it is an instance of his collecting the most authentic materials possible for that purpose. The same may be said relative to the Songs of Mary and Zacharias, which he has preserved.

But if these poems be genuine, they contribute to establish the genuineness of the history with which they are connected. The anecdotes attaching to them are such as could only have been known, after the crucifixion, from Mary herself, Joseph being dead; and it is certain, that whoever gave Luke the papers might very easily give him further information. The preservation of them supposed to be by Mary, adds to the evidence of her being a considerable person, and pondering events in her heart. But the establishment of the early chapters of Luke becomes an argument for the authenticity of the early chapters of Matthew. The most wonderful circumstance alluded to by Matthew occupies a considerable space in the narration of Luke; and if it be admitted as authentic in this evangelist, no good reason can be given for rejecting it from that evangelist; since we should willingly receive it on the credit of any one of the four. If, then, the history in Matthew must be exploded, let those who attempt it set aside these events from Luke;—but on close examination, they will find that there are in this writer's history such natural and artless characters of authenticity, such internal demonstrations of genuineness and integrity, that if those who peruse them, even with suspicion, or aversion, have any tolerable portion of mental acumen, or critical skill, they will abandon the undertaking. See GOSPEL.—Luke.

It imports nothing as to the character of these papers, whether they were spoken first, and afterwards reduced to writing, or first composed in writing, and afterwards published; in either case, the care and industry of Luke in procuring them is the same. They were composed, certainly not in Greek, as we now have them, but in the language then spoken in the country, the Syriac Hebrew; and they follow the rules of Hebrew poetry, as to the parallelisms of verbal construction. Luke, then, receiving them in Syriac, translated them into Greek; and thus justifies the assertion in his preface, that he derived his materials from those who were eye-witnesses of the matters, as Mary was of Zacharias's prophecy, and the facts in his family; or were personal participators in them, as Mary was in what concerned herself. Of these very early events Luke, by his diligence, obtained perfect understanding, and he inserts these documents, that Theophilus might know the certainty of those things in which he had already been instructed. That they are very happily adapted to this purpose, and have undeniable internal marks of authenticity, must be evident to every careful reader of them.

We have no design of enlarging on the life of Luke; but would point out a few incidental allusions to him, in their regular order. For, notwithstanding what appears so conspicuously, his habitual correctness and diligence, we, by placing him in the number of the 120, on whom the Holy Ghost fell, in a visible form, insist on his unquestionable inspiration; and that in no ordinary degree. He was, in this respect, though no apostle, yet equal to the apostles: and there can be no doubt, but what the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Spirit qualified him abundantly for the discharge of every duty to which he might be called, whether as a teacher or as a writer.

We suppose him, being a Cyrenian, to have felt a special interest in the opposition raised by "those of the synagogue of the Libertini, of the Cyrenians, and the Alexandrians (all Africans) against Stephen; which ended in the death of that proto-martyr, Acts vi. 9. And here, perhaps, began his acquaintance with the "young man, whose name was Saul." We suppose him, also, to have sympathized much with those who were scattered abroad on the persecution that followed the death of Stephen; "some of whom were men of Cyprus and Cyrene, who went as far as Antioch," Acts xi. 20. But whether he quitted Jerusalem at this time, cannot be determined without reserve. If he did, he was now a sufferer through the persecution of that very man, Saul, with whom he afterwards contracted the most confidential intimacy. Little did either of them see the events of a few years.

But whatever becomes of this conjecture, if he be the same with Lucius, we must direct our attention to Antioch, to which city some of the expelled Cyrenians certainly travelled. And here it may be proper to notice a remarkable variation in Beza's ancient MS. now at Cambridge, (Acts xi. 28.) where, instead of There stood up one of them, (the prophets at Antioch, i. e. Agabus,) we read "And when we were gathered about him, he said;" by which phraseology the writer evidently expresses his own presence, on the occasion, A. D. 43. It is, indeed, hazardous, as Michaëlis well observes, to confide in the reading of a single MS. unsupported by any other; yet it is difficult to account for this insertion, if the transcriber had no authority for it from the original before him. Moreover, if Lucius be Luke, we certainly find him among the teachers at Antioch, shortly after; i. e. in the following year, A. D. 44, as we have already seen.

We conclude this article by remarking, that there are no indications in the history that Luke was merely an attendant on Paul in his travels, as many writers maintain. His language is not consistent with that opinion. He says, "A vision appeared to Paul—and immediately we endeavored to go into Macedonia, assuredly gathering, συμβιβάσσομεν, collecting the sentiments of the company, comparing and uniting them in order to obtain a just inference, that the Lord had called us to preach the gospel in Macedonia." The writer does not say, nor does he mean, "Paul determined and we obeyed;" no; he esteems himself equally entitled to give his opinion, and equally called to this expedition. Again at Philippi: "On the Sabbath-day, we sat down and spoke to the women." And when Lydia was baptized with her family, "she besought us, saying, If ye have judged, after a proper examination and consultation together, that I should become faithful to the Lord, come into my house, and abide there; and she constrained us." Luke means to inform his readers, that he sat down and spoke to the women, and that he gave an opinion on the conduct proper to be observed towards Lydia. The voyage from Philippi to Judea is, of course, expressed in the plural, we and us. And when the company was arrived at Jerusalem, says Luke, "Paul went in with us to James and the elders;" the equality is perfect; or if any thing, Paul follows his company. In addition to this, Paul's respectful mention of Luke is very observable. In writing to their common friend Philemon, he calls him not his attendant, but his fellow-laborer, verse 24. In Col. iv. 14, he describes him as Luke the beloved physician; beloved generally, both by you and by me. In writing to Timothy, (2 Epist. iv. 11.) he mentions the various places to which he had sent his attendants, Crescens to Galatia, Titus to Dalmatia, Tychicus to Ephesus, but Luke he had not sent any where. He was still in his company, and only he; partly, no doubt, from respect to his great age; and still more from deference to his character. The hypothesis gathers strength as we proceed. We have traced the evangelist, under the names of Lucius and Luke, from Jerusalem to Antioch, from Antioch to Troas and Philippi; again from Philippi to Jerusalem, and from Jerusalem to Malta, and to Rome. We have found him a learned, confidential and considerate man, advanced in years, endowed with the Holy Ghost from on high, an inspired teacher, a valuable companion and counsellor of the apostle Paul; a correct, judicious and spirited writer, a man of research, and of no less fortitude than composure. We now part with him, at the conclusion of his history, on his last remove into Achaia; where he soon after died, at the great age of eighty-four.

LUMINARIES, METAPHORICAL. Among other descriptions of the Messiah, he is called "a Light to enlighten the Gentiles; and the Glory of the people of Israel." Jesus also describes John the Baptist as "a burning and shining light;" and addressing his disciples as "the light of the world," he bids them not conceal, but show their light, and be of use to mankind, by their lustre. In conformity with this idea, Paul says to the Philippians, "Ye shine as lights in the world, holding forth the word of life;" or, as some prefer to read it, "shine ye as lights." It has indeed been said, that when the apostle directs the Philippians to "shine as lights," he uses the word φωτίζω, which alludes to the light-houses raised on various parts of a coast, where navigation required their services, to direct the pilots of vessels in the course they ought to steer. We have many such along our coasts. The most famous in antiquity was that of the Pharos at Alexandria. Under this allusion, the sacred writer may be considered as saying, "Shine in the midst of bad persons, as light-houses shine in a dark country; holding forth the word of life, as light-houses hold forth their nightly flames; that I may stand erect with confidence; may boast, may exult, in the day of Christ." But Mr. Taylor is by no means satisfied that these active verbs are adequately understood, or that we do justice to their full import, when we refer them to subjects which rather suffer certain things to be done by their means, than are active in doing those things. A building can hardly be said to hold forth, or to hold fast; but if we reflect that some of the Pharoses of antiquity were constructed in form of human figures, we shall advance, he thinks, nearer to the apostle's meaning. All the world has heard of the Colossus at Rhodes; that immense brazen figure, which stood across the entrance of the (inner) harbor, and under whose enormous stride vessels might pass in full sail. This figure held forth in one hand a prodigious flame, which enlightened the whole port: by this it directed the distant mariner whose attention it attracted, and who looked up to this light for safety.

On the whole, then, Mr. Taylor thinks that Paul's expression refers to luminary figures, rather than to luminary buildings; in which case his words, "shine as luminaries, holding out the words of life;" that great Light, which, coming into the world, has light enough to enlighten every man, have peculiar spirit and propriety.—Nor is it certain, that the idea of a figure has totally quitted him in the next sentence; when he says, "that in the day of Christ, I may stand up with a stiff (upright) neck, and exult that I have not labored in vain." Is not this the very attitude of such a figure?—Some propose to translate "hold fast the word of life;" but this loses the beauty of the passage, if it may be supported by grammar, which is not now investigated.

"The word Pharos was used in a metaphorical sense," says Montfaucon; "any thing was called a Pharos, which could enlighten and instruct; every man of letters, who could guide others. In this sense the poet Ronsard says to Charles IX. of France, "Be my Pharos, guide my sails through rolling seas."—Might not this metaphorical application have been current in the first times of the gospel? and if so, does not the apostle adopt it?"

LUNATICS, a name given to those diseased persons, who suffer most severely on the changes of the moon; for example, epileptical persons, or those who have the falling sickness; insane persons, or those tormented with fits of morbid melancholy; as well as persons possessed by the devil, for often those have been believed to be really possessed by the devil, who were tormented only with great degrees of melancholy or fury. Jerome (in Matt. iv. 24.) is of opinion, that the lunatics in the gospel were possessed persons, whom the people through mistake called lunatics, because they saw them most tormented during the change of the moon; the devil affecting to make them suffer most in these circumstances, that simple people might impute the cause of it to the moon, and from thence take occasion to blaspheme the Creator. Others maintain, that all the difference between an epileptic and a lunatic was, that one was more disordered than the other. Persons subject to epilepsies are not all equally attacked. Some fall more frequently, others more rarely; some every day. Lunatics are affected chiefly on the declension of the moon. (Comp. Matt. xvii. 15.) See DEMONS.

LUST, (1 John ii. 6.) the irregular love of pleasure, riches or honors. Lust is not a sin; but is the effect and cause of sin:—the effect of original sin; the cause of actual sin. As in both Testaments, evil desires, as well as evil actions, are equally proscribed, so the first care of every man who would please God should be to bridle his lust.

LUST, GRAVES OF, (קברות-הלוסט, Kibroth-hattuavah), an encampment of the Hebrews in the wilderness, at which they arrived, after they decamped from Sinai. It was called the graves of lust, because 23,000 Israelites died there, who were smitten by God, because of eating to excess of quails, which fell about the camp, Numb. xi. 34; Deut. ix. 20, 22.

I. LUZ, a city of the Canaanites, in Benjamin, afterwards called Bethel, Gen. xxviii. 19; xxxv. 6; Josh. xviii. 13; Judg. i. 23.

II. LUZ, a city attached to the sons of Joseph, near to Sichem, Josh. xvi. 2. It is principally on Josh. xvi. 2, that the second of these places is distinguished from the first. There might, however, be a small distance between the place where Jacob slept, and the ancient town of Luz; and indeed the text in Joshua, by alluding to mount Bethel, seems to suppose, that the travelling patriarch slept on a hill apart.

III. LUZ, a city built by a man of Bethel, who, while the tribe of Ephraim besieged his native town, showed them a secret entrance, whereby they took it. For this service they spared him and his family; and he retired into the land of the Hittites, and built Luz, Judg. i. 26.

LYCAONIA, a province of Asia Minor, having Galatia north, Pisidia south, Cappadocia east, and Phrygia west. It appears to have been within the limits of Phrygia Major, but was erected into a separate province by Augustus. Paul preached in Lycaonia, in the cities of Iconium, Lystra and Derbe, (Acts xiv. 6, &c.) and having cured a man who had been lame from his mother's womb, and had never walked, the inhabitants of Lystra said, in the speech of Lycaonia, "The gods are come down to us in the likeness of men. And they called Barnabas, Jupiter, and Paul, Mercurius, because he was the chief speaker." This speech of Lycaonia is generally believed to have been a corrupt Greek; that is, Greek mingled with a great deal of Syrian.

LYCIA, a province in the south-west of Asia Minor, having Phrygia and Pisidia on the north, the Mediterranean on the south, Pamphylia on the east, and Caria on the west, 1 Mac. xv. 23; Acts xxi. 1; xxvii. 5. Paul landed at the ports of Patara and Myra in this province, in different voyages.

LYDDA, in Hebrew לוד, Lud, or Lod, by the Greeks and Latins called Lydda, or Diospolis, is a city in the way from Jerusalem to Cæsarea Philippi. It lay east of Joppa four or five leagues, and belonged to Ephraim. It seems to have been inhabited by the Benjamites, after the Babylonish captivity, (Neh. vi. 35.) and was one of the three toparchies which were dismembered from Samaria, and given to the Jews, 1 Mac. xi. 34. Peter, coming to Lydda, cured Æneas, who was sick of the palsy, Acts ix. 33, 34. The Jews inform us, that after the destruction of Jerusalem, they set up academies in different parts of Palestine, of which Lydda was one, where the famous Akiba was a professor, for some time. Gamaliel succeeded him, and was obliged to retire to Japhna. Lydda, says D'Arvieux, "is situated on a plain, about a league from Rama. It is so entirely ruined as to be at present but a miserable village, noticeable only on account of the market which is held here, once a week. The dealers resort to it to sell the cotton and other commodities which they have collected during the week. Here was formerly a handsome church, dedicated to St. George, a saint who is equally in favor with Turks and Christians. Dr. Wittman says, (Trav. p. 203, 205, January 12.) "I rode across the plains of Jaffa and Lydda. We approached the town of Lydda, or Loudda, and saw the Arab inhabitants busily employed in sowing barley. The soil of these fine and extensive plains is a rich black mould, which, with proper care and industry, might be rendered extremely fertile. Lydda is denominated by the Greeks Diospolis, the city or temple of Jupiter, probably because a temple had been dedicated in its vicinity to that deity. Since the crusades it has received from the Christians the name of St. George, on account of its having been the scene of the martyrdom and burial of that saint. In this city tradition reports that the emperor Justinian erected a church."

I. LYDIA, a woman of Thyatira, a seller of purple, who dwelt in the city of Philippi in Macedonia, (Acts xvi. 14, 40.) and was converted by Paul's preaching. After she and her family had been baptized, she offered her house to Paul and his fellow-laborer so earnestly, that he was prevailed on by her entreaties. This woman was not by birth a Jewess, but a proselyte.

II. LYDIA, a celebrated kingdom of Asia Minor, peopled by the sons of Lud, son of Shem, Gen. x. 23. We have very little notice of these Lydians in Scripture. They are mentioned in Isa. lxvi. 19, if these be not rather the Lydians in Egypt. (Comp. 1 Mac. viii. 7.) See LUD, and LUDIM.

LYING is condemned in many places in Scripture, Exod. xxiii. 1, 7; Lev. xix. 11; Prov. xii. 22; xiii. 5; xix. 22; Wisd. i. 11; Eccl. vii. 13; xx. 10; xxv. 23; Hos. iv. 1; Acts v. 4; Eph. iv. 25; James v. 12. Our Saviour requires his disciples to be so plain and sincere, that their word might be equivalent to the most solemn oath; and that in all their assertions, they should say only, "It is," or "It is not," Matt. v. 37. It is in vain, therefore, to attempt to justify some particular persons who have told lies; which persons are in other respects commended in Scripture. It never praises their lying, but their good actions. That which is in itself evil never can become good. When Abraham calls Sarah his sister, not his wife; and Isaac says the same of Rebekah; when Jacob, by a lie, defrauds Esau of his father's blessing; and when the Egyptian midwives declare, that the Hebrew women are delivered without their assistance; they are not, any of them, in these particulars, to be commended; though the evil which they committed might be mitigated by circumstances not known to us. When we condemn lying, we do not condemn stratagems, hyperboles, or certain raileries and discourses; or fables, or parables; which custom and general consent do not rank among lies.

God is said to have put a lying spirit into the mouths of false prophets; that is, he permitted them to follow the impressions of the evil spirit, 1 Kings xxii. 23; Prov. xxiii. 3. "We have made lies our refuge," (Isa. xxviii. 15.) i. e. we have placed our confidence in falsehood; in deceitful allies, or in the delusive promises of false prophets; or, lastly, in the assistance of idols, whom they call vanity and lying. "The hail shall sweep away the refuge of lies," (ver. 17.) i. e. the vain hopes, previously mentioned by the prophet. "A deceived heart hath turned him aside, that he cannot deliver his soul, nor say, Is there not a lie in my right hand?" i. e. am I not in the wrong, thus to adore wood? Isa. xlv. 20; also Jer. viii. 8. Waters that fail, that lie, are those that flow part of the year only; they may be said to be false, for they should flow perpetually, Jer. xv. 18. "Lying hills" (Jer. iii. 24.) are those which, after they have made a fine appearance to the eye, produce nothing. Hosea says, (ix. 2.) The vine shall lie to them; the vintage shall fail; and Habakkuk, (iii. 17.) that the olive-trees shall lie; that is, fail. The Latins have the same way of speaking.

LYSANIAS, or LYSIAS, tetrarch of Abilene, a small province in Lebanon, (Luke iii. 1.) was probably son or grandson of another Lysanias known in history, (Dio. lib. xlix. p. 44.) and put to death by Mark Antony, who gave part of his kingdom to Cleopatra. See ABILENE.

I. LYSIAS, a Roman tribune, see CLAUDIUS LYSIAS.

II. LYSIAS, a friend and relation of king Antiochus Epiphanes, to whom he left the regency of Syria when he passed beyond the Euphrates. See ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES.

LYSIMACHUS, brother of Menelaus, high-priest of the Jews, who, in an attempt to pillage the treasury of the temple, was killed, 2 Mac. iv. 39, 40. He is sometimes reckoned among the high-priests, because he was vicegerent to his brother Menelaus; but he never himself possessed that dignity.

LYSTRA, a city of Lycaonia, of which Timothy was a native. It is now called Latik. See LYCAONIA.

MAACAH, MAACHAH, MAACHATH, or BETH-MAACHAH, a city and region of Syria, east and north of the sources of Jordan, not far from Geshur, at the foot of mount Hermon. It was called Abel-beth-maachah, because Abel was situated in it. The Israelites would not destroy the Maachathites, but permitted them to dwell in the land, (Josh. xiii. 13.) and their king assisted the Ammonites against David, 2 Sam. x. 8, 9. The lot of the half-tribe of Manasseh beyond Jordan extended to this country, Deut. iii. 14; Josh. xii. 5. See ABEL II.

I. MAACHAH, daughter of Abishalom, wife of Rehoboam, king of Judah, and mother of Abijam, his successor, 1 Kings xv. 2. In 2 Chron. xiii. 2, she is called Micaiah, daughter of Uriel of Gibeah. See KING'S MOTHER.

II. MAACHAH, the daughter of Abishalom, wife of Abijam, king of Judah, and mother of Asa, his successor, 1 Kings xv. 10, 13, 14. Asa deprived her of the office of priestess of the groves. There are several other persons of this name, mentioned in the Old Testament.

MAACHATH, see MAACAH.

MAALEH-ACRABBIM, the ascent of scorpions, a mountain so called from the multitude of scorpions that infested it, at the southern end of the Salt sea, Numb. xxxiv. 4; Josh. xv. 3. See ACRABATENE, II.

MACCABEES, a name assumed by a patriotic Hebrew and his descendants, who successfully resisted the tyranny of Antiochus Epiphanes. (See JUDAS.) It is generally supposed that their name was derived from the inscription on their ensigns, or bucklers—מי כנכה באלהים יהוה, which begin these words, Mi Camocha Be-elohim Yehovah; (מי כנכה, Maccabei;) Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the gods? (Exod. xv. 11.) after the manner that the Romans put on their ensigns, S. P. Q. R. Senatus Populusque Romanus.

THE BOOKS OF MACCABEES are four in number; the first two are esteemed to be canonical by the church of Rome. The first book contains the history of forty years; i. e. from Antiochus Epiphanes to the time of Simon the high-priest; from A. M. 3829 to 3869. The second book contains a compilation of several pieces, but is far inferior in point of accuracy to the first. It comprises a history of about fifteen years; from the execution of Heliodorus's commission, who was sent by Seleucus to fetch away the treasures of the temple, to the victory obtained by Judas Maccabæus over Nicanor; from A. M. 3828 to 3843. The third book contains the history of the persecution raised by Ptolemy Philopater against the Jews of Egypt, A. M. 3787, and should therefore be placed before the first book. The fourth book is very little known. It is found in the collected works of Josephus, under the title of the Government of Reason, though it is rejected as spurious by the best critics. It contains an embellished account of the persecution of the Maccabean family as related in 2 Mac. vi. vii. the scene of which it places at Jerusalem.

MACEDONIA, a country of Greece, having Thrace north, Thessaly south, Epirus west, and the

MACEDONIA

Ægean sea east. It is believed that Macedonia was peopled by Kittim, son of Javan, (Gen. x. 4.) and that by Kittim, in the Hebrew text, Macedonia is often to be understood. (See KITTIM.) Alexander the Great, son of Philip, king of Macedonia, having conquered Asia, and subverted the Persian empire, the name of the Macedonians became famous throughout the East; and is often given to the Greeks, the successors of Alexander in the monarchy, Esth. (Apoc.) xvi. 10, 14. and 2 Mac. viii. 20. So also the Greeks are often put for the Macedonians, (2 Mac. iv. 36.) Paul, being called in a vision, while at Troas, to preach the gospel at Macedonia, founded the churches of Thessalonica and Philippi, Acts xvi. 9, &c. A. D. 55.

The prophet Daniel describes Macedonia under the emblem of a goat with one horn, and it is therefore of great consequence that this symbol should be proved to be that proper to Macedonia; for if this country had no such emblem belonging to it, we must look to another kingdom for a fulfilment of the prophecy, which would be contrary to the truth of history, and would produce inextricable confusion. The following observations on an ancient symbol of Macedon, by Taylor Combe, Esq. F. A. S. will be found useful:

"I had lately an opportunity of procuring an ancient bronze figure of a goat with one horn, which was the old symbol of Macedon. . . It was dug up in Asia Minor, and brought into this country by a poor Turk. Not only many of the individual towns in Macedon and Thrace employed this type, but the kingdom itself of Macedon, which is the oldest in Europe of which we have any regular and connected history, was represented also by a goat, with this particularity, that it had but one horn. Carnus, the first king of the Macedonians, commenced his reign 814 years before the Christian era. The circumstance of his being led by goats to the city of Edessa, the name of which, when he established there the seat of his kingdom, he converted into Ægea, is well worthy of remark: Urbem Edessam, ob memoriam muneris, Ægeas, populem Ægeadas. (Justin. lib. vii. cap. 1.) Hesiychius says, that the Cretans call the goat caranus. Xenophon informs us in his first book of the Grecian history, that the word caranus signifies lord. Now in the latter case the word caranus may seem regularly to be derived from κέρας, caput; but in the former example it must be deduced from keren, (קרן,) the Hebrew word for a horn, or, which is the same thing, from the Greek word κέρας. This last etymology will not appear improbable, when we consider the difference of pronunciation among the early Macedonians, who were esteemed by the rest of Greece as barbarians, and who, we are expressly told, used a language different from that which was spoken in the southern parts of Greece. (Strabo, lib.

vii. p. 327.) If, then, the above root be admitted,—and for this the change of a single letter is only necessary,—it will appear, I say, that Caranus was so called in conformity with an idea of power, which was annexed to the word horn, even in the earliest period of Macedonian history. In the reign of Amyntas the First, nearly 300 years after Caranus, and about 547 years before Christ, the Macedonians, on being threatened with an invasion, became tributary to the Persians. In one of the pilasters of Persepolis this very event seems to be recorded in a manner that throws considerable light upon the present subject. A goat is represented with an immense horn growing out of the middle of his forehead, and a man in a Persian dress is seen by his side, holding the horn with his left hand, by which is signified the subjection of Macedon. A proverb in use at the present day is grounded upon this ancient practice of signifying conquest by the capture of the horns. "To take a bull by the horns" is an equivalent phrase for "to conquer." When Demetrius Phalereus was endeavoring to persuade Philip, the father of Perseus king of Macedon, to make himself master of the cities of Ithome and Acrocorinthus, as a necessary step to the conquest of Peloponnesus, he is reported to have used the following expression; "Having caught hold of both horns, you will possess the ox itself;" thereby meaning, that if those cities which were the chief defence of Peloponnesus were once taken, it could not but happen that the conquest of Peloponnesus would follow. (Strabo, lib. vii. p. 361.) . . .

"In the reign of Archelaus of Macedon, (A. A. C. 413.) there occurs on the reverse of a coin of that king, the head of a goat having only one horn. Of this coin, so remarkable for the single horn, there are two varieties; one is engraved by Pellerin, and the other is preserved in the cabinet of the late Dr. W. Hunter.

"But the custom of representing the type and power of a country under the form of a horned animal is not peculiar to Macedonia. Persia was represented by a ram. Ammianus Marcellinus acquaints us, that the king of Persia, when at the head of his army, wore a ram's head made of gold, and set with precious stones, instead of a diadem. (Lib. xix. cap. 1.) The type of the ram, is observable on a very ancient coin, undoubtedly Persian, in Dr. Hunter's collection.

"The relation of these emblems to Macedon and Persia is strongly confirmed by the vision in the prophet Daniel, (chap. viii. 3—8.) which, while it explains the specimens of antiquity before us, receives itself in return no inconsiderable share of illustration. The whole of this vision is afterwards explained by the angel Gabriel, verses 21—23. Nothing, certainly, is more directly applicable to overthrow the joint empire of the Medes and Persians by Alexander the Great, than are these verses in the book of Daniel; nor at the same time can better authority be required for the true meaning of the single-horned goat, than may be derived from the same source.

There is a gem engraved in the Florentine collection, (plate 51.) which, as it confirms what has been already said, and has not hitherto been understood, I think worthy of mention. It will be seen by the drawing I have made of this gem, that nothing more nor less is meant by the ram's head with two horns, and the goat's head with one, than the kingdoms of Persia and Macedon, represented under their appropriate symbols. From the circumstance, however, of these characteristic types being united, it is extremely probable that the gem was engraved after the conquest of Persia by Alexander the Great."

This testimony is of great value, especially to those who know that the writer had the best means of instruction in numismatics, under his father, Dr. Combe, who edited the publication of Dr. Hunter's Medals, &c. Mr. Taylor, however, has endeavored to collect some additional circumstances.

The Macedonians are supposed by Dr. Mede to have derived their origin from Media. Without determining on the conclusiveness of the doctor's etymologies, Mr. Taylor supposes that Media, a province adjoining Persia, is much more likely to be alluded to, on the walls of Persepolis, a Persian palace, than Macedonia, a province very remote from the seat of empire. The triumph of Persia over Media, or any advantage gained over that country, was of importance, and worth recording; but of what importance was a triumph over Macedonia? It is observable, also, that in the general procession which adorns the palace of Persepolis, and which is supposed to be a representation of the various provinces of the empire, in the act of paying their annual presents to the king, each of them being denoted by its proper symbol, there appears the emblem of two goats, each having only one horn. This would be extremely embarrassing, if we did not know that there were two Medias, the Upper and the Lower; which as they were in some respects but one province, though divided, so they are represented by two goats walking together, but each directed by his proper superintendent. He therefore concludes that Media was symbolized by the single-horned goat; and that the Macedonians, being derived from thence, retained the symbol of their original country. This will also explain the reason of Daniel's perplexity on seeing the vision, as he could not tell which of the two countries, that in the East, or that in the West, was intended as the conqueror of Persia. It was most likely that he should think of Media, unless informed to the contrary.

This medal is given in proof that Macedonia was divided into several provinces, four at least, when under the Roman government. Many medals of the first province are extant, mostly in silver, and they enable us to assert, that the evangelist Luke (Acts xvi. 12.) means not to describe Philippi as the first or chief city of Macedonia, which was not true in any sense; but as a city of the first Macedonia, which is the correct import of his words. See PHILIPPI.

Among the medals of Macedonia is one with a lion devouring a bull; and it is remarkable that the same subject is sculptured in very large figures on the palace of Persepolis. What could induce Macedonia, a country where there are no lions, to adopt this emblem? But if it were derived from the East, then it contributes to prove the derivation of this people from the same quarter; and we must look to the East for its explanation.

MACEDONIAN is in the Apocryphal books sometimes used as an appellation, for an enemy to the Jews. Thus, in the additions to the book of Esther, it is said Haman was a Macedonian by nation and inclination, or party; that he was desirous to transfer the empire of the Persians to the Macedonians; that is, to the greatest enemies of the state.

MACHERUS, or MACHERONTE, a city and fort beyond Jordan, in the tribe of Reuben, north and east of the lake Asphaltites, two or three leagues from Jordan, and not far from where that river discharges itself into the Dead sea. This castle had been fortified by the Asmoneans; but Gabinius demolished it, and Aristobulus re-fortified it. Herod the Great made it much stronger than before. Here John the Baptist was imprisoned, and beheaded, by order of Herod Antipas. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 10, 11; xviii. 7.)

MACHPELAH, or MACHPELA, the name of the plain in which the cave which Abraham bought of Ephron was situated, Gen. xxiii. 9, 17.

MAD, MADNESS, insanity, or deprivation of reason; medically defined to be delirium without fever. Our Lord cured, by his word, several who were deprived of the exercise of their rational powers; and the circumstances of their histories prove, that there could neither be mistake nor collusion respecting them. How far madness may be allied to, or connected with, demoniacal possession, is a very intricate inquiry; and whether in the present day (as perhaps anciently) evil spirits may not take advantage from distemperature of the bodily frame, to augment evils endured by the patient, is more than may be affirmed, though the idea seems to be not absolutely repugnant to reason. Nevertheless, what may be, is probably different on most inquiries from what we can prove really is.

The epithet mad is applied to several descriptions of persons in Scripture; as (1.) to one deprived of reason, Acts xxvi. 24; 1 Cor. xiv. 23.—(2.) To one whose reason is depraved, and overruled by the fury of his angry passions, Acts xxvi. 11.—(3.) To one whose mind is perplexed and bewildered, so disturbed that he acts in an uncertain, extravagant, irregular manner, Deut. xxviii. 34; Eccl. vii. 7.—(4.) To one who is infatuated by the vehemence of his desires after idols and vanities, Jer. l. 38.—or (5.) After folly, deceit and falsehood, Hosea ix. 7.

David's madness (1 Sam. xxi. 13.) is by many supposed not to have been feigned, but a real epilepsy or falling sickness; and the LXX use words which strongly indicate this sense. It is urged in support of this opinion, that the troubles which David underwent might very naturally weaken his constitutional strength; and that the force he suffered in being obliged to seek shelter in a foreign court, would disturb his imagination in the highest degree.

MADAI, the third son of Japheth, (Gen. x. 2.) and father of the Medes. Others suppose that Media is too distant from the other countries peopled by Japheth, and cannot be comprehended under the name of "The Isles of the Gentiles," which were allotted to the sons of Japheth. For these reasons some learned men have been led to suggest, that Madai was father of the Macedonians, whose country was called Æmathia, as if from the Hebrew or Greek Ei, an island, and Madai; q. d. the isle of Madai, (יַמַּי אִי) insula Madai. Near this country is mentioned a people called Mædi, or Madi. This supposition, however, is too artificial, and is unnecessary. See MEDIA.

MADMANNAH, or MEDEMENE, a city of Simeon, (Josh. xv. 31.) first given to Judah, very far south, towards Gaza, Isa. x. 31; 1 Chron. ii. 49.

MAGDALA, a tower, was not far from Tiberias; it is sometimes called by the Jews "Magdala of Gadara." From hence, probably, Mary of Magdala, or Mary the Magdalene, was named, Matt. xxviii. 1; Luke viii. 2.

I. MAGI, or MAGIANS, is a name given to an ancient sect in Persia who are worshippers of fire. Their later name is Parsees, or Guebres. They have three books, which contain the whole of their religion, Zend, Pazend and Abesta, which they ascribe to Abraham. Abesta is a commentary on the other two. They maintain the existence of two principles; one, which they call Oromazd, the author of good; and the other, Aherman, the author of evil. They worship fire in temples called Atesch-kana, or Atesch-kade; that is, the house of fire, where they carefully maintain the flame. To fire they give the name of bab, i. e. part, because they acknowledge this element as the principle of all things. The Magi observe a mysterious and religious silence, when they wash, or eat, having first said certain words; and to every month of the year, to every day, star, mountain, mine, collection of water, and tree, they ascribe particular genii, angels created before man, who sinned by infidelity and disobedience, and therefore were confined to what they call the country of Genii, not unlike to our notions of Fairy-Land. See ZOROASTER, and MEDIA.

They represent the good principle by light, the evil principle by darkness; they acknowledge both as gods, and address prayers and adorations to them; yet they were divided in opinion, some thinking that both had existed from eternity; others, that only the good principle was eternal, and the evil one created. These two principles they believe to be in continual opposition, and that they will so continue to the end of the world, when the good principle will prevail; after which, each will have his own distinct world; the good reigning with all good people, and the bad with all the wicked.

The principles of the most ancient Magi, though still imperfectly known, have been lately communicated to Europe in several translations from the works of their sect, obtained from its adherents in India. Among these the most considerable is the Zend-Avesta, attributed to Zoroaster; translated into French by M. Anquetil Du Perron, 4to, 3 vols. Paris, 1771. That this is really the work of the most ancient Zoroaster, and therefore of the Magi, it would be difficult to prove; but it contains the prayers, ceremonies and maxims of those who now call themselves his disciples, in India. It has some traces of ancient simplicity and superstition; but interpolated with much later and burdensome additions and amplifications. More recently has been published at Bombay, (1818,) by Mulla Firuz bin Kaus, the learned chief priest of the Parsee religion at Bombay, "The Desatir, or Sacred Writings of the ancient Persian Prophets, with an English Translation." It is written in a dialect now wholly extinct; and would have been unintelligible, but for the fortunate circumstance of being attended with a Persian translation and glossary. Among these writings is one attributed to Zoroaster, who stands here as the thirteenth in order. The last is the fifth Sasan, who lived in the time of Khosroo Parvez, who was contemporary with the emperor Heraclius; and died only nine years before the destruction of the ancient Persian monarchy. No account is given of the times of the other prophets, whose works precede.

The doctrines inculcated in these writings are, the eternity and self-existence of the Supreme Deity, who created another intelligence, who made the worlds, who made several heavens, and gave to each a soul, and a body, also the stars; (the planets and the fixed stars, called slow-moving stars;) that the elements, meteors, &c. have each its guardian angel; that in a former state ferocious animals have been guilty of crimes, for which they now suffer punishment, in being hunted, &c. and that men who now commit crimes, will be punished by becoming such, or like, animals, or vegetables, or minerals. The ineffable attributes of Deity are emphatically celebrated in these works; which contain much laudable theism, but little or nothing of rites and ceremonies. They direct that prayer be made to light, or fire, not as being themselves deities, but as conveying the sacrifice to divine intelligences.

II. MAGI, or WISE MEN, who came to adore Jesus at Bethlelem, (Matt. ii. 1.) are commonly thought to have been philosophers, whose chief study was astronomy, and who dwelt in Arabia Deserta, or Mesopotamia, which the sacred authors express by the word East. (See Numb. xxiii. 7. and KEDEM.) [This name, Magi, is properly an appellation given, among the Persians, to priests, wise men, philosophers, etc. who devoted themselves to the study of the moral and physical sciences, and particularly cultivated astrology and medicine. As they thus acquired great honor and influence, they were introduced into the courts of kings and consulted on all occasions. They also followed them in warlike expeditions; and so much importance was attached to their advice and opinions, that nothing was attempted without their approbation. (See Xen. Cyr. iv. 5. 51. iv. 6. 11. vii. 5. 57. Aelian. Var. Hist. ii. 17. iv. 10. Porphyry. de abst. Anim. iv. 16. Strabo i. 43. xv. 1045. Plin. Hist. Nat. xxiv. 29. xxix. 3.) R.

Calmet is of opinion that the star seen by the Magi was an inflamed meteor, in the middle of the air, which, having been observed by them to be attended with miraculous and extraordinary circumstances, was taken for the star so long foretold by Balaam; and that, afterwards, they resolved to follow it, and to seek the new-born king, whose advent it declared. It was, therefore, as he thinks, a light that moved in the air before them, something like the pillar of cloud in the desert.

MAGIC, that is, all those arts, the superstitious ceremonies of magicians, sorcerers, enchanters, necromancers, exorcists, astrologers, soothsayers, interpreters of dreams, fortune-tellers, casters of nativities, &c. are all forbidden by the law of God, whether practised to hurt or to benefit mankind. It was also forbidden to consult magicians on pain of death, Lev. xix. 31; xx. 6. Daniel speaks of magicians and diviners in Chaldea, under Nebuchadnezzar, (Dan. i. 20, &c.) of whom he names four sorts: Chartumim, Asaphim, Mecasphim and Casdim, (chap. ii. 2.) but their distinctions are not certainly known.

MAGOG, son of Japheth, (Gen. x. 2.) and father, as is believed, of the Scythians and Tartars; a name which comprehends the Getæ, the Goths, the Sarmatians, the Sacæ, the Massagetæ, and others. The Tartars and Muscovites possess the country of the ancient Scythians, and retain several traces of the names Gog and Magog. They were formerly called Mogli, and in Tartary are the provinces Lug, Mongug, Cangigu and Gigui; Engui, Corgangui, Caigui, &c. Gog and Magog have in a manner passed into a proverb, to express a multitude of powerful, cruel, barbarous and implacable enemies to God and his worship. (See GOG.) The Arabians and other oriental writers speak of the same people under the names of Jagug and Magug.

Suidas says Magog is the Persians; whence we might suppose, that Ezekiel, who describes the army of Magog, intended the army of Xerxes. Josephus says, the people named Magoges were so called from their leader, Magog, who, by the Greeks, is called a Scythian. It should seem, therefore, that Josephus speaks of a name and a people well known in his own time. And Ebedjesu, in the thirteenth century, says, that Adeus planted Christianity "throughout Persia, the regions of Assyria, Armenia, Media, Babylon, the land of Huz, (in the south of Persia, not far from the Tigris, whose metropolis is marked Ahvaz in D'Anville, about lat. 40.) to the confines of India, and even to the land of Gog and Magog;"—the country, evidently, which we now call Tartary. Gog appears to describe the king, and Magog the people.

MAHALALEEL, or MALALEEL, son of Canaan, of the race of Seth, Gen. v. 15, &c.

MAHALATH is the title of Psalms liii. and lxxxviii. "To the chief musician on Mahalath;" which signifies a musical instrument; probably a stringed instrument to be accompanied by song. In Ethiopic the corresponding word, Mahlet, signifies song, psalm, but also κιθάρα, a harp, guitar, etc. R.

MAHANAIM, the two camps or hosts, a city of the Levites of the family of Merari, in Gad, on the brook Jabbok, Josh. xxi. 38; xiii. 29, 30; 1 Chron. vi. 80. Jacob gave it this name, because here he had a vision of angels, Gen. xxxii. 2. It was the seat of the kingdom of Ish-bosheth, after the death of Saul, (2 Sam. ii. 9—12.) and thither David retired, during the usurpation of Absalom, 2 Sam. xvii. xviii, &c. In the Vulgate it is sometimes called simply Castra, or the camp, Gen. xxxii. 2; 2 Sam. ii. 8, 12, 29; xvii. 24; xix. 32. κιθάρα, a harp, guitar, etc. R.

MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ, he hasteneth to the prey, a name given to one of the sons of the prophet Isaiah, by way of prediction; (Isa. viii. 3.) The prophet observes that his children were for signs and wonders, and this name is evidence of the fact. Of the same nature we are to consider Emmanuel, and some other names. See VIRGIN.

MAHLAH, or MAHALA, a daughter of Zelophehad, who with her sisters received their allotment in the land of Canaan, because their father died without male issue, Numb. xxvi. 33; xxvii. 1; Josh. xvii. 3; 1 Chron. vii. 15.

MAHLON, son of Elimelech and Naomi, (Ruth i. 2, &c.) who in the country of Moab married Ruth, a Moabite woman, but died without children: his widow followed her mother-in-law Naomi to Bethlehen, where she married Boaz.

MAIMED implies the loss of a limb or member; often the absolute loss of it, not a suspension of its use, by a contraction, or diminution. This total loss is clearly the import of the original word, "If thine hand or foot offend thee, cut them off, and cast them from thee—enter into life maimed—rather than having two hands," &c. Matt. xviii. 8. And this should the rather be observed, to distinguish it from withered, contracted, &c. and because it may be asked, what we should think of a person who could restore a lost limb, or member. Perhaps we are not always sensible of the full import of this word, when reading the history of the miraculous cures performed by our Lord.

MAKAZ, a city probably of Dan, (1 Kings iv. 9.) supposed by Calmet to be the Maktesh, the jaw-tooth, or En-hakkore, of Judg. xv. 19; Zeph. i. 11.

MAKELOTH, an encampment of Israel in the desert, Numb. xxxiii. 25, 26.

MAKKEDAH, a city of Judah, (Josh. xv. 41.) which Eusebius places 8 miles from Eleutheropolis, east, Josh. x. 29. Called Maked, 1 Mac. v. 26, 38.

MAKTESH, morter, probably the name of a quarter or district in or near Jerusalem, perhaps one of the adjacent valleys, Zeph. i. 11. *R.

MALACHI, the last of the twelve minor prophets, and so little known that it is doubted whether his name be a proper name, or only a generical one, signifying the angel of the Lord, a messenger, a prophet. It appears by Hag. i. 13. and Mal. iii. 1. that in these times the name of Malach-Jehovah, messenger of the Lord, was given to prophets. The LXX have rendered Malachi, his angel, instead of my angel, as the original expresses; and several of the fathers have quoted Malachi under the name of "the angel of the Lord." The second book of Esdras and Tertullian unite the name Malachi and angel of the Lord. Origen thought that Malachi was an angel incarnate, rather than a prophet; but this opinion is insupportable. It is much more probable that Malachi was Ezra; and this is the opinion of the ancient Hebrews, of the Chaldee paraphrast, of Jerome, and of abbot Rupert. The author of the Lives of the Prophets, under the name of Epiphanius Dorotheus, and the Chronicle Alexandrinum, say, that Malachi was of the tribe of Zebulun, and native of Sapha; that the name Malachi was given to him because of his angelical mildness, and because an angel used to appear visibly to the people, after the prophet had spoken to them, to confirm what he had said. He died very young, as they say, and was buried near the place of his ancestors.

It appears certain that Malachi prophesied under Nehemiah, and after Haggai and Zechariah, at a time of great disorder among the priests and people of Judah, whom he reproves. He inveighs against the priests; reproves the people for having taken strange wives, for inhumanity to their brethren, for too frequently divorcing their wives, and for neglect of paying tithes and first-fruits. He seems to allude to the covenant that Nehemiah renewed with the Lord, together with the priests and the chief of the nation. Malachi is the last of the prophets of the synagogue, and lived about 400 years before Christ. He prophesied of the coming of John the Baptist, and of the two-fold coming of our Saviour, very clearly, ch. iii. He speaks of the abolition of sacrifices under the old law, and of the sacrifice of the new law, chap. i. 10, 13; iv. 5, 6.

MALCHUS, a servant of the high-priest Caiaphas, who, in the garden of olives, among those sent to apprehend Jesus, was struck by Peter, and had his right ear cut off, John xviii. 10.

MALICE is a word which expresses not only that evil disposition of the mind and heart, which we so call, but also punishment and correction, 1 Sam. xx. 7; xxv. 17. (See also Isa. xl. 2.) Paul requires that Christians should be children in malice, but men in prudence and wisdom, 1 Cor. xiv. 20.

MALTA, or MELITA, [Eng. tr.] a famous island in the Mediterranean sea. It is thought to have been named Melita, from the great quantity of honey found there formerly. Its length is from east to west, and its breadth from north to south. Its circumference is about sixty miles, and is ascribed to Africa by geographers, because, if a line be drawn from east to west, it will be included in the African sea. Paul suffered shipwreck on this island, and, with his companions, was well used by the inhabitants, Acts xxviii. Paul taking up a fagot of twigs to throw into the fire, a viper that lurked in it, feeling the heat, seized him by the hand; but he, without any emotion, shook it into the fire. The people expected every moment to see him fall down dead; and as this did not happen, they changed their sentiments, and began to look upon him as some deity. Publius, the governor of the island, received the apostle courteously; and his father being sick of a fever and bloody flux, Paul healed him, and also restored many of the islanders to health. When he and his company sailed thence, the people abundantly supplied them with necessaries for their voyage. Several of them were converted by the preaching of Paul; and the house of Publius was changed into a church.

A native of this island informed Calmet that Malta was an ancient colony of the Carthaginians, and had always spoken the language of Africa, as it continues to do. Hence those of Paul's company, who were Greeks or Latins, called the Maltese barbarians.

We ought not to close this article, without hinting at an opinion lately started, and supported by men of very competent learning, that the Melita of the Acts was an island in the Adriatic sea, on the coast of Illyricum, now called Meleda. To prove this, the course of the winds, the Euroclydon, with the other circumstances of the voyage, have been closely examined. But it appears from the history, that the same winds, the S. E. the E. S. E. and the E. were equally likely to drive the ship to Malta, in a direct course from Crete; that the fears of the seamen, of falling on the Syrtis (quicksands) the greater or the lesser, were more than nugatory in that case, as they were going farther and farther from them, towards Meleda; that it does not appear that ever the Romans had such an establishment at Meleda as warranted the residence of a protos or pro-pretor there; and that it was to the last degree unlikely that "a ship of Alexandria" should have chosen Meleda for the purpose of "wintering in the island," which implies her arrival before the stormy season:—all these objections form a strong argument against the newly-proposed opinion.

[The name Melita was anciently applied to two islands; one in the Adriatic sea on the coast of Illyricum, now called Meleda; the other in the Mediterranean, between Sicily and Africa, now called Malta. That the latter is the one on which Paul suffered shipwreck is probable, because he left the island in a ship of Alexandria which had wintered there on her voyage to Italy, and after touching at Syracuse and Rhegium, landed at Puteoli; thus sailing on a direct course. The other Melita would be far out of the usual track from Alexandria to Italy; and in sailing from it to Rhegium, Syracuse also would be out of the direct course. The fact that the vessel was tossed all night before the shipwreck, in the Adriatic sea, does not militate against the probability of its afterwards being driven upon Malta; because the name Adria was applied to the whole Ionian sea, which lay between Sicily and Greece. So Strabo ii. p. 185. C. vii. p. 488. A. (See Wetstein on Acts xxvii. 27. and ADRIA.) R.

MAMMON, a Chaldee word signifying riches. Our Saviour says, we cannot at the same time serve God and mammon; (Matt. vi. 24.) that we ought not to make ourselves adherents of mammon, or of the riches of unrighteousness, that is, of worldly riches, which are commonly the instruments of sin, and are acquired too often by unrighteousness and iniquity.

MAMRE, the name of an Amorite in alliance with Abraham, Gen. xiv. 13, 24. Hence the oaks of Mamre, (Engl. tr. plain of Mamre, Gen. xiii. 18; xviii. 1.) or simply Mamre, (xxiii. 17, 19. xxxv. 27.) a grove near Hebron. R.

MAN, the generic name of the human race, (Gen. i. 27.) who were created after the image and likeness of God. See ADAM.

"A man of God" generally signifies a prophet; a man devoted to God; to his service. Moses is called peculiarly "the man of God," Deut. xxxiii. 1; Josh. xiv. 6. Our Saviour frequently calls himself "the son of man," in allusion, probably, to the prophecy of Daniel, in which the Messiah is spoken of, Dan. vii. 13.

MAN OF SIN, see ANTICHRIST.

MANAEN, a Christian prophet, and foster-brother of Herod Antipas, (Acts xiii. 1.) was at Antioch with other prophets, when the Holy Ghost said, "Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them." It is conjectured that he was one of the seventy disciples, but no particulars of his life are known.

MANAHEM, the sixteenth king of Israel, was originally general of the army of Zeebariah. He was at Tirzah when he heard of his master's murder, and immediately marched against Shallum, who had shut himself up in Samaria, whom he killed, and then ascended the throne. He reigned in Samaria ten years, and did evil in the sight of the Lord. Pul, king of Assyria, having invaded Israel during the reign of Manahem, obliged him to pay a tribute of a thousand talents, which Manahem raised by a tax on all his subjects of fifty shekels a head. Manahem slept with his fathers, and his son Pekahiah reigned in his stead, 2 Kings xv. 13—32.

I. MANASSEH, the eldest son of Joseph, (Gen. xli. 50, 51.) was born A. M. 2290, and named Manasseh, (causing to forget), because Joseph said, "God has made me forget all my toil, and all my father's house." When Jacob was about to die, Joseph brought his two sons to receive his last blessing, Gen. xlviii. 1, &c. Jacob adopted them; made them come to his bed-side, and kissed them. Joseph having placed Ephraim at Jacob's left hand, and Manasseh at his right, Jacob put his right hand on Ephraim, and his left on Manasseh; which Joseph observing, would have had him reverse. Jacob, however, said, "I know what I am doing, my son; the eldest shall be father of a great people, but his younger brother shall be greater than he." He continued to bless them, and said, "In thee shall Israel be blessed, and it shall be said, 'God make thee as Ephraim and as Manasseh.'" The tribe of Manasseh came out of Egypt, in number 32,200 men, upwards of twenty years old, under the conduct of Gamaliel, son of Podahzur, Numb. ii. 20, 21. The tribe was divided in the Land of Promise. One half settled east of the river Jordan, and possessed the country of Bashan, from the river Jabbok to mount Libanus; and the other half settled west of Jordan, and possessed the country between the tribe of Ephraim, south, of the tribe of Issachar, north, having the river Jordan east, and the Mediterranean west, Josh. xvi. xvii. See CANAAN, pp. 232, 233.

II. MANASSEH, fifteenth king of Judah, and son and successor of Hezekiah, (2 Kings xx. 21; xxi. 1, 2; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 1, &c. A. M. 3306.) was twelve years old when he began to reign, and reigned fifty-five years. He did evil in the sight of the Lord; worshipped the idols of Canaan; rebuilt the high places that his father Hezekiah had destroyed; set up altars to Baal, and planted groves to false gods. He raised altars to the whole host of heaven; in the courts of God's house; made his son pass through the fire in honor to Molech; was addicted to magic, divinations, auguries, and other superstitions; set up the idol Astarte in the house of God; and finally involved his people in all the abominations of idolatry to that degree, that Israel committed more wickedness than the Canaanites which the Lord had driven out before them. To all these crimes Manasseh added cruelty, and shed rivers of innocent blood in Jerusalem.

It is supposed that the prophet Isaiah raised his voice loudly against those enormities. He had been in great credit at court, in the reign of Hezekiah; and was probably of high birth. He is by many thought to have been put to death by this wicked king. See ISALAH.

The calamities which God had threatened, began towards the 22d year of Manasseh's reign. The king of Assyria sent his army against him, who, seizing him among the briars and brambles where he was hid, fettered his hands and feet, and carried him to Babylon, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11. When in bonds, at Babylon, Manasseh humbled himself before God; who heard his prayers, and brought him back to Jerusalem. Here he acknowledged the hand of the Lord; and we have a prayer which, it is affirmed, he made in prison. The church, however, does not receive it as canonical. He restored the worship of the Lord; broke down the altars of the false gods; and abolished all traces of their idolatrous worship; but did not destroy the high places, which is the only thing Scripture reproaches him with, after his return from Babylon. He caused Jerusalem to be fortified; enclosed with a wall another district, which in his time was built west of Jerusalem, and which after his reign was called the second city, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 14. He also put garrisons into all the strong places of Judah. Manasseh died at Jerusalem, and was buried in the garden of his house, in the garden of Uzza, 2 Kings xxi. 18. His son Ammon succeeded him, A. M. 3361.

Many believe that the history of Holofernes happened under Manasseh. See JUDITH.

III. MANASSEH, husband of Judith, who lived but a little while with her. He had been dead three years when Holofernes' war began. Manasseh was of the tribe of Simeon, and died in the time of barley harvest, of a stroke of the sun, which had affected his head, Judith viii. 2, 3.

IV. MANASSEH, high-priest of the Jews, son of John, and brother of Jaddus, succeeded Eleazar, his great uncle, and was succeeded by Onias II. his nephew. Manasseh married Nicaso, daughter of Sanballat, governor of Samaria, and by his aid built the temple on mount Gerizim, in which he became the first high-priest. (Josephus xi. 7, 8. Compare Neh. xiii. 28.)

MANDRAKE, a plant called in Hebrew דודא, dudaim, (plural,) is a species of melon, of which the ancients, and among others Josephus, have entertained many strange conceits. There are two sorts: the female, which is black, having leaves not unlike lettuce, though smaller and narrower, which spread on the ground, and have a disagreeable smell. It bears berries something like services, pale, of a strong smell, and having kernels within, like those of pears. It has two or three very large roots, twisted together, white within, black without, and covered with a thick rind. The other kind, or male mandrake, is called morion, or folly, because it suspends the use of the senses. It produces berries twice the size of those of the female, of a good scent, and of a color approaching towards saffron. Its leaves are white, large, broad and smooth, like the leaves of the beech tree. Its root resembles that of the female, but is thicker and larger. This plant stupefies those who use it; sometimes depriving them of understanding; and often causes such vertiges and lethargies, that if those who have taken it have not present assistance, they die in convulsions.

Pythagoras was the first who conferred on the mandrake the name of anthropomorphos, which became very general. On what account this name was given is not certainly known; Calmet states it to have been because most of the roots are parted from the middle downwards, somewhat resembling thighs and legs.

From Gen. xxx. 14, 15, 16, we collect that the fruit was ripe in wheat harvest. And thus Hasselquist, speaking of Nazareth in Galilee, says, "What I found most remarkable at this village, was the great number of mandrakes which grew in a vale below it. I had not the pleasure to see this plant in blossom, the fruit now (May 5th, O. S.) hanging ripe on the stem, which lay withered on the ground. From the season in which the mandrake blossoms, and ripens fruit, one might form a conjecture that it was Rachel's dudaim. These were brought her in the wheat harvest, which in Galilee is in the month of May, about this time, and the mandrake was now in fruit." (Travels, p. 160.)

From Cant. vii. 13, it appears that the dudaim yielded a remarkable smell, at the same time as the vines and pomegranates flowered, which in Judea is about the end of April or beginning of May. It is probable, therefore, that this circumstance of their smell is to be referred to the fruit rather than to the flower, especially as Brookes, who has given a particular description and a print of the plant, expressly observes that the fruit has a strong nauseous smell, though he says nothing about the scent of the flower. And this circumstance will in some measure account for what Hasselquist remarks, that the Arabs at Nazareth call it by a name which signifies in their language "the devil's victuals." So the Samaritan chief-priest told Maundrell, that the mandrakes were plants of a large leaf, bearing a certain sort of fruit, in shape resembling an apple, growing ripe in harvest, but of an ill savor, and not wholesome. But then he added, that the virtue of them was to help conception, being laid under the genial bed; and that the women were often wont so to apply it at this day, out of an opinion of its prolific nature.

From these accounts of the mandrake, it is evident that Rachel could not want them either for food or fragrantcy; and from the whole tenor of the narration in Gen. xxx. compared with chap. xxix. 32—34, it appears that both she and Leah had some such notion as the Samaritan chief-priest entertained of their genial virtue. And does not the Jewish queen's mention of them in Cant. vii. 13, intimate something of the same kind, and show that the same opinion prevailed among the Jews in the time of Solomon? Nor was this opinion confined to the Jews; the Greeks and the Romans had the same notion of mandrakes. They gave to the fruit the name of "Apple of Love," and to Venus that of Mandragoritis. The emperor Julian, in his epistle to Calixenes, says, that he drank the juice of mandrakes to excite amorous inclinations. And before him Dioscorides had observed of it, "The root is supposed to be used in philters or love-potions." On the whole, there seems little doubt but this plant had a provocative quality, and therefore its Hebrew name, dudaim, may be properly deduced, says Calmet, from dudim, pleasures of love.

[The mandrakes of the Bible have given rise to much dispute and diversity of opinion among interpreters. It seems to have been a plant to which was attributed the power of rendering barren women fruitful. According to most of the ancient versions, it was the Mandragora, mandrake, (Atropa Mandragora of Linn.) a plant of the genus Belladonna, with a root like a beet, white and reddish blossoms, and yellow apples, which ripen from May to July. To these apples the orientals to this day attribute the power of exciting to venery; and they are called poma amatoria, or love-apples. (See Schulz Leitungen, &c. p. v. 197. D'Herbelot's Bibliothèque Orientale, p. 17.) R.]

MANEH, see MINA.

MANNA, a substance which God gave to the children of Israel for food, in the deserts of Arabia. It began to fall on Friday morning, the sixteenth day of the second month, which from thence was called Jjar, and continued to fall daily in the morning, except on the sabbath, till after the passage over Jordan, and to the passover of the fortieth year from the exodus, that is, from Friday, June 5, A. M. 2513, to the second day of the passover, Wednesday, May 5, A. M. 2553. It was a small grain, white, like hoar-frost, round, and the size of coriander-seed, Exod. xvi. 14; Numb. xi. 1. It fell every morning with the dew, about the camp of the Israelites, and in so great quantities during the whole forty years of their journey in the wilderness, that it was sufficient to feed the entire multitude, of above a million of souls, every one of whom gathered, for his share every day, the quantity of an omer, i. e. about three quarts. It maintained all this multitude, and yet none of them found any inconvenience from the constant eating of it. Every Friday there fell a double quantity, (Exod. xvi. 5.) and though it putrefied and bred maggots when kept on any other day, yet on the sabbath it suffered no such alteration. And the same manna that was melted by the heat of the sun, when left in the field, was of so hard a consistence when brought into the house, that it was beat in mortars, and would even endure the fire. It was baked in pans, made into paste, and so into cakes, Numb. xi. 5. It is somewhat extraordinary that Calmet should think the "entire multitude" of Israel subsisted wholly on the manna. Certainly, the daily sacrifices were offered; and, no doubt, other offerings, affording animal food, on which the priests and Levites subsisted, according to their offices. That considerable flocks and herds accompanied the camp of Israel is clear from various passages, and it is equally clear these could not live upon manna.

Scripture gives to manna the name of "bread of heaven," and "food of angels;" perhaps, as intimating its superior quality, Ps. lxxviii. 25. There is a vegetable substance called manna which falls in Arabia, in Poland, in Calabria, in mount Libanus, and elsewhere. The most common and the most famous is that of Arabia, which is a kind of condensed honey, found in the summer time on the leaves of trees, on herbs, on the rocks, or the sand of Arabia Petraea. That which is gathered about mount Sinai has a very strong smell, which it receives from the herbs on which it falls. It easily evaporates, inso-much that if thirty pounds of it were kept in an open vessel, hardly ten would remain at the end of fifteen days. Several writers think that the manna with which the Israelites were fed was like that now found in Arabia, and that the only thing that was miraculous in the occurrence was the regularity of the supply, and its cessation on the sabbath. The Jews, however, with the majority of critics, are of opinion that it was a totally different substance from the vegetable manna, and was specially provided by the Almighty for his people.

Burckhardt says, that in the valleys around Sinai the manna is still found, dropping from the sprigs of several trees, but principally from the Gharrab. It is collected by the Arabs, who make cakes of it, and call it "Assal Beyrouk," or "Honey of Beyrouk." (See Exod. xvi. 31.) The Arabs who collect it make cakes of it; so did Israel, loc. cit. Could a similar manna be the wild honey on which John the Baptist lived?

[The following is Burckhardt's account of the manna found near Sinai at the present day. Since his time it has been ascertained by Dr. Ehrenberg and M. Rüppell, that the manna is occasioned by an insect, which the former has particularly described. That this, however, could not have been the manna of the Israelites, is sufficiently obvious; unless we regard it as having been miraculously increased, and its qualities miraculously changed,—a supposition which involves as great an exertion of miraculous power, as the direct bestowment of a different substance. (See Burckhardt's Travels in Syria, &c. p. 599, seq.)

"The Wady el Sheikh, the great valley of western Sinai, is in many parts thickly overgrown with the tamarisk or tarfa, (Hedysarum Alhagi of Linn.) It is the only valley in the peninsula of Sinai where this tree grows, at present, in any great quantity; though small bushes of it are here and there met with in other parts. It is from the tarfa that the manna is obtained. This substance is called by the Bedouins mann, and accurately resembles the description of manna given in the Scriptures. In the month of June, it drops from the thorns of the tamarisk upon the fallen twigs, leaves and thorns, which always cover the ground beneath that tree in the natural state; the manna is collected before sunrise, when it is coagulated; but it dissolves as soon as the sun shines upon it. The Arabs clean away the leaves, dirt, etc. which adhere to it, boil it, strain it through a coarse piece of cloth, and put it in leathern skins: in this way they preserve it till the following year, and use it as they do honey, to pour over unleavened bread, or to dip their bread into. I could not learn that they ever made it into cakes or loaves. The manna is found only in years when copious rains have fallen; sometimes it is not produced at all. I saw none of it among the Arabs, but I obtained a small piece of the last year's produce, in the convent (of mount Sinai), where, having been kept in the cool shade and moderate temperature of that place, it had become quite solid, and formed a small cake; it became soft when kept some time in the hand; if placed in the sun for five minutes, it dissolved; but when restored to a cool place, it became solid again in a quarter of an hour. In the season at which the Arabs gather it, it never acquires that state of hardness which will allow of its being pounded, as the Israelites are said to have done, in Num. xi. 8. Its color is a dirty yellow, and the piece which I saw was still mixed with bits of tamarisk leaves; its taste is agreeable, somewhat aromatic, and as sweet as honey. If eaten in any considerable quantity, it is said to be slightly purgative.

"The quantity of manna collected at present, even in seasons when the most copious rains fall, is trifling, perhaps not amounting to more than five or six hundred pounds. It is entirely consumed among the Bedouins, who consider it the greatest dainty which their country affords. The harvest is usually in June, and lasts for about six weeks. In Nubia and in every part of Arabia, the tamarisk is one of the most common trees; on the Euphrates, on the Astaboras, in all the valleys of the Hedjaz and the Bedja, it grows in great plenty.

"It is remarked by Niebuhr, that in Mesopotamia manna is produced by several trees of the oak species; a similar fact was confirmed to me by the son of a Turkish lady, who had passed the greater part of his youth at Erzerum in Asia Minor; he told me that at Moush, a town three or four days distant from Erzerum, a substance is collected from the tree which produces the galls, exactly similar to the manna of the peninsula in taste and consistence, and that it is used by the inhabitants instead of honey." (Compare Niebuhr's Descript. of Arabia, p. 145. Germ. edition.) *R.

MANOAH, father of Samson, of the tribe of Dan, and of the city of Zorah, Judg. xiii. An angel of the Lord having appeared to his wife, and having promised her a son, Manoah desired of the Lord that he might see him who had thus appeared, that he might know from him how to treat his son when born. The Lord heard his prayer, and the angel appeared again to his wife, being then in the fields; who ran to acquaint her husband. Manoah went to him, and obtained from him directions respecting his son. Manoah then said, "My Lord, I pray you be pleased to let us prepare you a kid." The angel replied, "I must not eat any food; but you may offer it for a burnt-sacrifice to the Lord." Manoah said to him, (not knowing him to be an angel,) "What is your name? that we may pay you honor and acknowledgment, if that shall happen which you have foretold." He answered, "Why ask you my name? which is a secret;" or, "and he kept it secret." Manoah therefore took the kid with the wine for the libations, and put them on the fire which he had lighted on a stone. As the smoke began to ascend, the angel also ascended in the midst of the flame, towards heaven. Manoah was alarmed upon the discovery of the angelic nature of his visitant, but was rallied by his wife.

MANSLAYER, see REFUGE.

MAON, a city in the south of Judah, (Josh. xv. 55; 1 Sam. xxiii. 24, 25; xxv. 2.) and about which Nabal the Carmelite had great possessions. It was very probably the Maan mentioned in the next article.

MAONITES, a tribe mentioned (Judg. x. 12.)

along with the Amalekites, Zidonians, Philistines, &c. In 2 Chr. xxvi. 7, they are called Mehunims, and are mentioned along with the Arabians. There is still a city Maân with a castle in Arabia Petrea, south of the Dead sea and near Wady Mousa. (See Burckhardt's Travels in Syria, &c. p. 437.) *R.

MARAH, bitterness. When the Israelites, coming out of Egypt, arrived at the desert of Etham, they there found the water to be so bitter, that neither themselves nor their cattle could drink it, Exod. xv. 23. They therefore began to murmur against Moses, who, praying to the Lord, was shown a kind of wood, which, being thrown into the water, made it potable. This wood was called Alvah by the Mahometans, who maintain that Moses had received a piece of it, by succession, from the patriarchs, Noah having kept it in the ark, and delivered it to his posterity. (D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 105, col. 1. et p. 1022, col. 1.) The word alua has some relation to aloes, which is a very bitter wood; and some interpreters have hinted, that Moses took a very bitter sort of wood, on purpose that the power of God might be the more remarkable, in sweetening these waters. Josephus says, that this legislator used the wood which he found by chance, lying at his feet. [See more on this subject under the article EXODUS. R.]

"El-vah, says Mr. Bruce, (Trav. vol. ii. p. 470.) is a large village, or town, thickly planted with palm-trees, the 'Oasis Parva' of the ancients, the last inhabited place to the west that is under the jurisdiction of Egypt; it yields senna and coloquintida. The Arabs call El-vah, a shrub or tree, not unlike our hawthorn, either in form or flower. It was of this wood, they say, that Moses' rod was made, when he sweetened the waters of Marah. With a rod of this wood too, say they, Kaleb Ibn el Waalid, the great destroyer of Christians, sweetened these waters at El-vah, once bitter, and gave it the name from this miracle. A number of very fine springs burst from the earth at El-vah, which render this small spot verdant and beautiful, though surrounded with dreary deserts on every quarter; it is situated like an island in the midst of the ocean."

We believe that our colonists who first peopled some parts of America, corrected the qualities of the water they found there, by infusing in it branches of sassafras; and it is understood that the first inducement of the Chinese to the general use of tea, was to correct the water of their rivers; it follows, therefore, that some kinds of wood possess such a quality; and it may be, that God directed Moses to the very wood proper for his purpose. But then it must be confessed that the water of these parts continues bad to this day, and is so greatly in want of something to improve it, that had such a discovery been communicated by Moses, it could hardly have been lost. Niebuhr, when upon the spot where this miracle was performed, inquired after wood capable of this effect; but could gain no information of any such. It will not, however, from hence follow, that Moses used a bitter wood, or even any ordinary wood; but, as Providence usually works by the proper and fit means to accomplish its ends, probably the wood used by Moses was, in some degree at least, corrective of that quality which abounded in the waters; though, perhaps, it might itself have other qualities equally bad, but of a different kind, (wherefore it has been lost,) adapted, perhaps, to neutralize the water, and so to render it potable. See EXODUS, as above.

That other water also stands in need of correction, and that such correction is applied to it, appears from a custom in Egypt, in respect to the water of the Nile; a custom which, being of great antiquity, might have been familiar to Moses. "The water of the Nile is always somewhat muddy; but by rubbing with bitter almonds, prepared in a particular manner, the earthen jars in which it is kept, this water is rendered clear, light and salutary." (Niebuhr's Travels, vol. i. p. 71.) Did these bitter almonds suggest the idea of bitter wood?

MARAN-ATHA, the Lord comes, a form of threatening, cursing, or anathematizing among the Jews. Paul pronounces Anathema Maran-atha against all who love not our Lord Jesus Christ, 1 Cor. xvi. 22. Commentators inform us, that Maran-atha is the greatest anathema among the Jews, and equivalent to Sham-atha, or Shem-atha, the name comes, or the Lord comes: q. d. "Mayest thou be devoted to the greatest of evils, and to the utmost severity of God's judgments; may the Lord come quickly to take vengeance of thy crimes." But Selden and Lightfoot maintain, that Maran-atha is not found in this sense among the rabbins, but that it may be understood in an absolute sense: "Let him that does not love our Lord Jesus Christ be anathema. The Lord is come, the Messiah has appeared; evil to whosoever receives him not." See more under ANATHEMA, p. 58. col. 2.

MARESHAH, a fortified city of Judah; called also Moresheth. The prophet Micah was a native of this city. It was two miles from Eleutheropolis; and near to it, in the vale of Zephathah, was fought a famous battle between Asa, king of Judah, and Zerah, king of Chus, in which Asa defeated a million of men, Josh. xv. 44; 2 Chr. xi. 8; xiv. 9, 10; Micah i. 1, 15. In the latter times of the Jewish commonwealth, Maresah belonged to Idumæa, as did several other southerly cities of Judah. It was peopled by the Jews, and their allies, in the time of John Hyrcanus. Alexander Jannæus took it from the Arabians, and Pompey restored it to its first inhabitants. Gabinius rebuilt it, and the Parthians destroyed it in the war of Antigonus against Herod. (Jos. Ant. xiii. xiv.)

I. MARIAMNE, daughter of Alexander, son of Aristobulus, and of Alexandra, daughter of Hyrcanus, high-priest of the Jews, was the most beautiful princess of her age. She married Herod the Great, by whom she had two sons, Alexander and Aristobulus, and two daughters, Salampus and Cypros; also a son called Herod, who died young, during his studies at Rome. Herod was excessively fond of Mariamne, who but slightly returned his passion; and at length cherished a deadly hatred towards him. Herod had her put to death; but afterwards his affection for her became stronger than ever. Josephus mentions a tower that Herod built in Jerusalem, which he named Marianne. See HEROD.

II. MARIAMNE, daughter of the high-priest Simon, and wife of Herod the Great; by whom she had a son called Philip, who married first the famous Herodias, who afterwards lived with Herod Antipas, who put to death John the Baptist, Mark vi. 17; Matt. xiv. 3.

I. MARK, the Evangelist, according to Papias Irenæus and others, was the disciple and interpreter of Peter, who speaks of him, as is thought, (1 Epist. chap. v. 13.) as his son in the spirit; probably because he had converted him. The place and time at which Mark wrote his Gospel are uncertain. Clemens Alexandrinus and others affirm that Peter going to Rome, about A. D. 44, Mark accompanied him, and there wrote his Gospel, at the request of the brethren, who desired that he would give them in writing what he had learned from Peter by word of mouth. And they add, that when the apostle was informed that his disciple had done, he commended his undertaking, and gave his Gospel to be read in the churches, as an authentic work. See GOSPEL.—Mark.

A number of things are related as connected with the life and travels of Mark, after the close of the history in the Acts of the Apostles; (see JOHN MARK;) but as we have no means of attesting their truth, we omit all further mention of them here.

Calmet is of opinion that the Gospel of Mark is an abridgment of that by Matthew. He often uses the same terms, relates the same facts, and notices the same circumstances. He sometimes adds particulars which throw great light on Matthew's text; and there are two or three miracles in Mark, which are not in Matthew. (See chap. i. v. ix. xvi.) But what is the most remarkable is, that he forsakes Matthew in the order of his narration, from chap. iv. 12, to chap. xiv. 13, of that writer. In these places he pursues the order of time as noted by Luke and John; and this has induced chronologers to follow Luke, Mark and John, rather than Matthew. He opens his Gospel with the preaching of John the Baptist, and omits several parables related by Matthew, (chap. xx. xxi. and xxv.) as also several discourses of our Saviour to his disciples, and to the Pharisees, chap. v. vi. vii. xvi. xviii.

The origin of Mark's Gospel forms an interesting subject of inquiry. We have seen that some of the ancients were of opinion that it was written under the dictation of Peter; but the grounds of this opinion are not ascertained. If Mark were son to that Mary (Acts xii. 12.) who resided at Jerusalem, and whose house was the resort of the faithful, he must have known many things which passed at Jerusalem, as well as Peter himself. He must also have been sufficiently versed in the Syriac language, and able to make use of whatever materials for true history were in circulation, which, probably, were many, though incomplete, while he would receive others from Peter. It appears from his history that Mark was much engaged in journeying; sometimes with or for Barnabas, at other times, with or for Paul, and Peter also. It is probable, that he composed his Gospel at intervals of such journeys, as Luke also did; and he is no more an epitomizer of Matthew than Luke is, with whom he agrees in many particulars.

MARKET. The Market, or Forum, in the cities of antiquity, was different from the market in our English towns, where flesh meat, &c. is usually sold. When we read (Acts xvii. 17.) of the apostle Paul disputing with philosophers in the "market" at Athens, we are apt to wonder what kind of philosophers these market-folks could be; or why the disputants could not engage in a place fitter for investigation and discussion of abstruse and difficult subjects. So, when we read that Paul and Silas, having expelled the Pythonic spirit, (Acts xvi. 19.) were led to the market-place, and accused, we may not be aware of the fitness of a market for the residence of a tribunal of justice. But the fact is, that the forum was usually a public market on one side only, the other sides of the area being occupied by temples, theatres, courts of justice, and other public buildings. In short, the forums were sumptuous squares, surrounded by decorations &c. of various, and often of magnificent kinds. Here the philosophers met, and taught; here laws were promulgated; and here devotions, as well as amusements, occupied the populace. The nearest approach to the composition of an ancient forum, is, perhaps, Covent-garden, in London; where there is a market in the middle, a church at one end, a theatre at one corner, and sitting magistrates close adjacent; under the piazzas, too, supposing them to be the resort of philosophers, much philosophic discussion might take place, and many an intricate subject might be examined. In our climate, such a shelter from the cold, or rain, would hardly be thought sufficient; but in the East, it would be sought from the heat, and the cool shade, or the covered settle, would be the place chosen, no less than the sequestered groves of Academus, at Athens. In short, if we add such a school, or any other, for philosophical instruction, or divinity lectures, we have nearly the composition of an ancient forum, or market-place. This removes entirely the seeming incongruity between discourses and disputations on the principles of theology and Christianity, and those commercial avocations which we usually assign to a market-place. On the same principle, when the Pharisees desired salutations in the market-places, (Mark xii. 38.) it was not merely from the country people who brought their productions for sale, but, as they loved to be admired by religious people at the temple, the synagogues, &c. so they desired salutations from persons of consequence, judges, magistrates, dignitaries, &c. in the forum, in order to display their importance to the people, to maintain their influence, &c.

MARRIAGE is, among the Hebrews, a matter of strict obligation. They understand literally, and as a precept, the words addressed to our first parents: (Gen. i. 28.) "Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth." They believe that he who does not marry his children, deprives God of the glory due to him, becomes in some sort a homicide, destroys the image of the first man, and is a reason why the Holy Ghost withdraws himself from Israel. This question is mooted in the Talmud: "Who is he that prostitutes his daughter?" It is answered, "The father that keeps her too long in his house, or that marries her to an old man." (Comp. 1 Cor. vii. 36.) The age at which wedlock becomes an obligation, with them, is twenty years; though generally they marry their children sooner. But if a father marry his daughter before the age of puberty, which is at twelve years and a half, she may be separated from her husband for any slight disgust. Still, the virgins were betrothed very early; though not married till after twelve years old; whence come these expressions, "the spouse of one's youth," (Prov. ii. 17.) or one espoused in early life; also "the guide of one's youth," expressing a husband married young.

In the first ages, marriages between brothers and sisters were necessary, because of the small number of persons then in the world; but after mankind had become numerous, they were unlawful, and were prohibited under great penalties. (See INCEST.) However, the patriarchs long continued to espouse their near relations, intending thereby to avoid alliance with families corrupted by the worship of false gods; or to preserve in their own families the worship of the true God, and the maintenance of the true religion, of which they were the depositaries. For this reason Abraham appears to have married his half-sister, Sarah; and also to have sent his steward Eliezer to fetch a wife for his son Isaac from among the daughters of his nephews. Jacob also espoused the daughters of his uncle.

From what has been said, it is easy to perceive why celibacy and barrenness was a reproach in Israel; and why the daughter of Jephthah went to bewail her virginity; (Judg. xi. 37.) that is, being compelled to die unmarried and childless.

Young women, before their marriage, were called ALMAH, virgin, i. e. perhaps, shut up, because they seldom appeared in public. The manner in which a daughter was demanded in marriage, may be seen in the instance of Hamor and Shechem, when they demanded Dinah of Jacob: (Gen. xxxiv. 8, &c.) "The soul of my son Shechem longeth for your daughter; I pray you, give her him to wife. Let me find grace in your eyes, and what ye shall say unto me I will give. Ask me never so much dowry and gift, and I will give according as ye shall say unto me: but give me the damsel to wife." See also (Gen. xxiv. 33.) the manner in which Eliezer demands Rebekah for Isaac; and (Tobit vii. 10, 11.) the demand that Tobias made of Sarah, the daughter of Raguel. The husband gave a dowry to his wife, as a kind of purchase-money. (See Dowry.) Before the contract, they agreed on what portion the man should give his bride, and what presents to her father and brethren. Jacob served seven years for Leah, and seven additional years for Rachel; (Gen. xxix.) and the sisters complain, some years after, that their father Laban had applied their portions to his own use, Gen. xxxi. 15. (See also 1 Sam. xviii. 25.)

The betrothing was performed either by a writing, or by a piece of silver given to the bride, or by cohabitation and consummation. This is the form of the writing: "On such a day, of such a month, in such a year, N. the son of N. has said to N. the daughter of N. Be thou my spouse according to the law of Moses and the Israelites, and I will give thee for the portion of thy virginity the sum of two hundred Zuzim, as is ordained by the law. And the said N. has consented to become his spouse on these conditions, which the said N. has promised to perform on the day of marriage. To this the said N. obliges himself, and for this he engages all his goods, even as far as the cloak that he wears upon his shoulder. Moreover, he promises to perform all that is generally intended in contracts of marriage, in favor of the Israelitish women. Witnesses N. N. N." The promise by a piece of silver, and without writing, was made before witnesses, when the young man said to his mistress: "Receive this piece of silver as a pledge that you shall become my spouse." Lastly, the engagement by cohabitation, according to the rabbins, was allowed by the law, (Deut. xxiv. 1.) but it had been wisely forbidden, because of the abuses that might happen, and to prevent clandestine marriages. After the marriage was contracted, the young people had the liberty of seeing each other, which was not allowed to them before; and if, during this time, the bride should trespass against that fidelity she owed to her bridegroom, she was treated as an adulteress. Thus the holy Virgin, after she was betrothed to Joseph, having conceived our Saviour Jesus Christ, might have been punished as an adulteress, if the angel of the Lord had not satisfied Joseph. Between the time of being espoused and the marriage, there frequently passed a considerable interval; whether because of the under-age of the persons espoused, or for other reasons of necessity or decency. When the parties were agreed on the terms of marriage, and the time was fit for completing it, they drew up the contract.

The rabbins inform us, that before the temple of Jerusalem was laid in ruins, the bridegroom and bride wore crowns at their marriage. In Scripture we find mention of the crown of the bridegroom, but not of that of the bride; and, indeed, the head-dress of the women was by no means convenient for wearing a crown. (Compare Isa. lxi. 10; Cant. iii. 11.) "Go forth, O ye daughters of Zion, and behold king Solomon with the crown wherewith his mother crowned him in the day of his espousals, and in the day of the gladness of his heart." The modern Jews in some places throw handfuls of wheat on the newly-married couple, particularly on the bride, saying, "Increase and multiply." In other places they mingle pieces of money with the wheat, which are gathered up by the poor.

We see by the gospel, that the bridegroom had a Paranympus, or brideman, called by our Saviour "the friend of the bridegroom," John iii. 29. A number of young people kept him company during the days of the wedding, to do him honor; as also young women kept company with the bride all this time. The companions of the bridegroom are expressly mentioned in the history of Samson, (Judg. xiv. and Cant. v. 1; viii. 13.) also the companions of the bride, Cant. i. 4; ii. 7; iii. 5; viii. 4; Ps. xlv. 9, 14, 15. The office of the brideman was to perform the ceremonies of the wedding, instead of the bridegroom, and to obey his orders. Some think that the Architriclinus, or governor of the feast, at the marriage in Cana, was the brideman, Paranympus, or friend of the bridegroom, who presided at the feast, and had the care of providing for the guests, John ii. 9. The friends and companions of the bride sang the Epithalamium, or wedding song, at the door of the bride the evening before the wedding. Ps. xlv. is an Epithalamium, entitled "A song of rejoicing of the well-beloved." The ceremony of the wedding was performed with great decorum, the young people of each sex being kept separate, in distinct apartments, and at different tables. The reservedness of the eastern people towards their women required this; and we see proofs of it in the marriage of Samson, in that of Esther, and in the Canticles. The young men diverted themselves sometimes in proposing riddles, and the bridegroom appointed the prize to those who could explain them, Judg. xiv. 14.

The wedding ceremonies commonly lasted seven days for a maid, and three days for a widow. So Laban says to Jacob, respecting Leah—"fulfil her week," Gen. xxix. 27. The ceremonies of Samson's wedding continued seven whole days, (Judg. xiv. 17, 18,) as also those of that of Tobias, chap. xi. 12. These seven days of rejoicing were commonly spent in the house of the woman's father, after which they conducted the bride to her husband's home.

Marriage, its forms, and the ideas connected with it, are so dissimilar in different places, that it is extremely difficult to form an adequate conception on the subject. As a partial illustration of them, we may state, on the authority of the Gentoo Code, that, in India, there are eight forms of contracting matrimony. Some of these have little or no reference to customs alluded to in Scripture; but others may afford us information. We find among them the customary dowry given by the proposed husband to the bride's father, as in the case of Shechem, (Gen. xxxiv. 12.) and of David, 1 Sam. xviii. 24. To this may be referred the third and sixth forms. May not the fourth form contribute at least to throw a new light on the story of Judah and Tamar? Gen. xxxviii. Did Tamar contract a kind of marriage, by receiving "the pledges of—thy signet and thy bracelets, and the staff that is in thine hand," as, at least, equally efficacious, and certainly more permanent and confidential tokens, than "necklaces or strings of flowers?" Did Tamar thus marry herself to Judah, though unwittingly in him? From the expression, (ver. 26.) "He knew her again no more," it would seem as if he might lawfully have known her again had he pleased. Although Tamar had been contracted to Er and to Onan, whether those marriages had been consummated may bear a question. When the forms of marriage are so simple as those of the fifth class, we need not be surprised at the ready giving of daughters in marriage; as occurs frequently in Scripture. Is something like it alluded to, Malachi ii. 11? The seventh form illustrates Deut. xxi. 11, of marrying a captive taken in war. The eighth form seems to resemble the provision made in Exod. xxii. 16. From these different kinds, and, as it were, ranks of marriage, it appears that many ideas were attached to the connection anciently, and in the East, which differ greatly from those attending our uniform rites of contract; but they are necessary to be well understood, before we determine on certain passages of Scripture history.

"The third form, Arsh, is so called when the parents of a girl receive one bull and cow from the bridegroom, on his marrying their daughter. The fourth form, Kandehrub, is so called, when a man and woman, by mutual consent, interchange their necklaces or strings of flowers, and both make agreement, in some secret place; as, for instance, the woman says, 'I am become your wife,' and the man says, 'I acknowledge it.' The fifth form, Perajaput, so called, when the parents of a girl, upon her marriage, say to the bridegroom, 'Whatever act of religion you perform, perform it with our daughter;' and the bridegroom assents to this speech. The sixth form, Ashore, so called, when a man gives money to a father and mother, on his marrying their daughter, and also gives something to the daughter herself. The seventh form, Rakhus, so called, when a man marries a daughter of another, whom he has conquered in war. The eighth form, Peishach, so called, when, before marriage, a man, coming in the dress and disguise of a woman, debauches a girl, and afterwards the mother and father of the girl marry her to the same man.

Mr. Harmer has the following observation, (No. lxiii. p. 513. vol. ii.) on the contracts for temporary wives: "Sir J. Chardin observed in the East, that in their contracts for temporary wives, (which are known to be frequent there,) which contracts are made before the Kady, there is always the formality of a measure of corn mentioned over and above the sum of money that is stipulated." It can scarcely be thought, that this formality is recent in the East; it may, possibly, be very ancient, as, apparently, connections of this description are: if it could be traced to patriarchal times, it would, perhaps, account for Hosea's purchasing a woman under this character, "for fifteen pieces of silver, and a certain quantity of barley," chap. iii. 2.

The observations of baron du Tott appear to illustrate, in some degree, the origin of this custom; at least, his account is amusing, and may serve to complete the hints of Mr. Harmer: "I observed an old man standing, singly, before his door. The lot [by which was determined who should receive the newly-arrived guest] fell upon him. The ardor of my new host expressed his satisfaction; and no sooner had he shown me into a clean lower apartment, than he brought his wife and daughter, both with their faces UNCOVERED; the first carrying a basin and a pitcher, and the second carrying a napkin, which she spread over my hands after I had washed them." The baron adds in a note, "We may observe, that the law of Namakreni, of which I have spoken in my preliminary discourse, is not scrupulously observed by the Tartar women. We ought also to remark, that these people have many customs, which seem to indicate the origin of those that are analogous to them among us. May we not also trace the motive of the nuptial crown, and the comfits which are used at the marriages of Europeans, in the manner in which the Tartars portion out their daughters? They cover them with millet. In the origin of society, seed grain ought necessarily to be the representing token of all wealth. A dish, of about a foot in diameter, was placed on the head of the bride; over this a veil was thrown, which covered the face, and descended to the shoulders; millet was then poured upon the dish, which, falling, and spreading all around her, formed a cone, with a base corresponding to the height of the bride. Nor was her portion complete till the millet touched the dish, while the veil gave her the power of respiration. This custom was not favorable to small people; and, at present, they estimate how many measures of millet a daughter is worth. The Turks and Armenians, who make their calculations in money, still preserve the dish and the veil, and throw coin upon the bride, which they call 'spilling the millet.' Have not the crown and the comfits the same origin?" (vol. i. p. 212.) If this be accepted as a probable reference to the origin of the custom of purchasing wives with seed corn, it may, undoubtedly, be very ancient; but it might have some relation to good wishes for a numerous progeny. So among the Greeks, various fruits, as figs, or nuts, &c. were thrown by the youthful attendants upon the head of the bride, as an omen of fruitfulness; and as good wishes of this kind were usual, (see Rebekah's dismissal, Gen. xxiv. 60.) could any thing more aptly allude to them? Its antiquity may be, at least, as remote under this idea as under the other.

As the circumstances of Hosea's behavior appear sufficiently strange to us, it may be worth while to add the baron's account of marriages by Capin; which agrees with the relations of other travellers into the East: "There is another kind of marriage, which, stipulating the return to be made, fixes likewise the time when the divorce is to take place. This contract is called Capin; and, properly speaking, is only an agreement made between the parties to live together, for such a price, during such a time." (Preliminary Discourse, p. 23.) It is scarcely possible to expect more direct illustration of the prophet's conduct (Hos. iii.) than this extract from the baron affords. We learn from it that this contract is a regular form of marriage, and that it is so regarded, generally, in the East. Such a connection and agreement, then, could give no scandal, in the days of Hosea, though it would not be seemly under Christian manners. The prophet says—"So I bought her [my wife] to me for fifteen pieces of silver, and for a homer of barley, and a half homer of barley. And I said unto her, Many days shalt thou abide for me. Thou shalt not play the harlot, and thou shalt not be for another man; so will I also be for thee." What was this but a marriage by Capin, according to the account above given? And the prophet carefully lets us know, that he honestly paid the stipulated price; that he was very strict in his agreement, as to the behavior of his wife ; and that he also bound himself to the same fidelity, during the time for which they mutually contracted. It may easily be imagined that this kind of marriage was liable to be abused ; and that it was glanced at, and included, in our Lord's prohibition of hasty divorces, need not be doubted. Had a certain writer proceeded no further than to consider the direction, "Let every man have [retain] his own wife, and every woman have [retain] her own husband," (1 Cor. vii. 2.) as relating to marriages of such imperfect connection, (for this is not the only kind contracted without much ceremony or delay,) both his work and his principles would have been gainers by his prudence.

MARRIAGE PROCESSIONS.—The procession accompanying the bride from the house of her father to that of the bridegroom was generally one of great pomp, according to the circumstances of the married couple ; and for this they often chose the night. Hence, in the parable of the ten virgins that went to meet the bride and bridegroom (Matt. xxv.) it is said the virgins were asleep ; and at midnight, being awaked at the cry of the bridegroom's coming, the foolish virgins found they had no oil to supply their lamps ; which while they went to buy, the bridegroom and his attendants passed by.

Mr. Taylor has collected very copious information relative to the marriage processions among the oriental people, in Fragments 49, 557, and 674. Many of the circumstances attending these will be found to contribute aid in the elucidation of two or three passages of Scripture, but their value would not justify us in appropriating to them the space they would occupy. "At a marriage, the procession of which I saw some years ago," says Mr. Ward, (View of Hist. of Hindoos, vol. iii. p. 171, 172.) "the bridegroom came from a distance, and the bride lived at Serampore, to which place the bridegroom was to come by water. After waiting two or three hours, at length, near midnight, it was announced, as if in the very words of Scripture, "Behold ! the bridegroom cometh ; go ye out to meet him." All the persons employed now lighted their lamps, and ran with them in their hands, to fill up their stations in the procession ; some of them had lost their lights, and were unprepared, but it was then too late to seek them, and the cavalcade moved forward to the house of the bride, at which place the company entered a large and splendidly illuminated area, before the house, covered with an awning, where a great multitude of friends, dressed in their best apparel, were seated upon mats. The bridegroom was carried in the arms of a friend, and placed in a superb seat in the midst of the company, where he sat a short time, and then went into the house, the door of which was immediately shut, and guarded by Sepoys. I and others expostulated with the door-keepers, but in vain. Never was I so struck with our Lord's beautiful parable, as at this moment :—and the door was shut."

In the beautiful parable of our Lord, there are ten virgins, who took their lamps, and went in a company to meet the bridegroom. Five of them were wise, endued with prudence and discretion ; the other five were foolish, thoughtless and inconsiderate. The thoughtless took their lamps, but were so foolish as to take only a little oil in them to serve the present occasion. But the prudent, mindful of futurity, and knowing that the coming of the bridegroom was uncertain, as well as filling their lamps, prudently took a quantity of oil in their vessels to supply them, that they might be ready to go forth at a moment's warning. Having waited long for the bridegroom, and he not appearing, they all, tired with long watching, and fatigued with tedious expectation, were overcome with sleep, and sunk into profound repose. But lo ! at midnight they were suddenly alarmed with a cry, "The bridegroom, the bridegroom cometh ! Hasten to meet and congratulate him." Roused with this unexpected proclamation, they all got up and trimmed their lamps. But the oil, in those that belonged to the foolish virgins, being consumed, they were in the utmost confusion when they found them gone out ; and having nothing in their vessels to trim them with, they began to see their mistake. In this extremity they entreated their companions to impart to them some of their oil, telling them that their lamps were gone out. To these entreaties the prudent answered, that they had only provided a sufficient quantity for their own use, and therefore advised them to go and purchase oil of those who sold it. They departed accordingly, but while absent on this errand, the bridegroom came, and the prudent virgins, being prepared for his reception, went along with him to the nuptial entertainment, and the door was shut. After some time the others returned, and, knocking loud, supplicated earnestly for admission. But the bridegroom repulsed them, telling them, Ye pretended to be my friends, and to do me honor on this occasion ; but ye have not acted as friends, for which reason I know you not : I do not acknowledge you as my friends, and will not admit strangers.

From another parable, in which a great king is represented as making a most magnificent entertainment at the marriage of his son, (Matt. xxii.) we learn that all the guests, who were honored with an invitation, were expected to be dressed in a manner suitable to the splendor of such an occasion, and as a token of just respect to the new-married couple ; and that after the procession, in the evening, from the bride's house, was concluded, the guests, before they were admitted into the hall where the entertainment was served up, were taken into an apartment and viewed, that it might be known if any stranger had intruded, or if any of the company were apparelled in raiment unsuitable to the genial solemnity they were going to celebrate ; and such, if found, were expelled the house with every mark of ignominy and disgrace. From the knowledge of this custom the following passage receives great light and lustre. When the king came in to see the guests, he discovered among them a person who had not on a wedding garment. He called him and said, Friend, how came you to intrude into my palace in a dress so unsuitable to this occasion ? The man was struck dumb ; he had no apology to offer for this disrespectful neglect. The king then called to his servants, and bade them bind him hand and foot, to drag him out of the room, and thrust him out into the midnight darkness. (Harwood.)

LEVIRATE MARRIAGES. There is one circumstance connected with this subject among the Hebrews, that should not be omitted here. The law of Moses obliged one brother to marry the widow of another, who died without children, that he might raise up seed to him. This is called Levirate. The custom seems to have been in force, among the Hebrews and Canaanites, before the time of Moses ; since Judah gives Er his first-born, and Ouan his second son, to Tamar, and obliges himself to give her also Shelah, his third son. The instance of Ruth, who married Boaz, is an evidence of this practice under the judges. Boaz was neither the father of, nor the nearest relation to, Elimelech, father-in-law of Ruth, the widow of Mahlon; yet he married her, after the refusal of the next of kin. The rabbins suggest many exceptions and limitations to this law; as, that the obligation on the brother of marrying his sister-in-law, regards only brothers born of the same father and mother; that it has respect only to the eldest brother of the deceased; and further, supposes that he was not married; for if he were married, he might either take or leave his brother's widow. If the deceased brother had left a natural or adoptive son or daughter, a grandson or granddaughter, the brother was under no obligation to marry his widow. If the dead person left many wives, the brother could marry but one of them; if the deceased had many brothers, the eldest alone had a right to all his estate, and enjoyed the property which his wife had brought him. They add, that the marriage of the widow with her brother-in-law was performed without solemnity, because the widow of the brother who died not having children, passed for the brother-in-law's wife, without any occasion for further ceremony. Notwithstanding, custom required that this should be done in the presence of two witnesses, and that the brother should give a piece of money to the widow. The nuptial blessing was added, and a writing to secure the wife's dower. Some believe, that this law was not observed after the Babylonish captivity, because, since that time, there has been no distinction of inheritances among the tribes.

The law was this, in case of a refusal by the brother to marry the widow; (Deut. xxv. 7.) "If the man like not to take his brother's wife, then let his brother's wife go up to the gate unto the elders, and say, 'My husband's brother will not perform the duty of a husband's brother;' then shall his brother's wife come unto him, in the presence of the elders, and loose his shoe from off his foot, and spit in his face, and shall say, 'So shall it be done unto that man that will not build up his brother's house.' And his name shall be called in Israel, 'The house of him who hath had his shoe loosed.'" Remark, (1.) The word rendered shoe (נַעַל, naal), usually means sandal, i. e. a mere sole held on the foot in a very simple manner; and is so understood by the Chaldee Targums, by the LXX, and by the Vulgate. (2.) The primary and radical meaning of the word rendered face (פָּנִים, peni), is surface, the superficies of any thing. Mr. Taylor suggests, then, that the directions of the passage may be to this purpose; the brother's wife shall loose the sandal from off the foot of her husband's brother, and shall spit upon his face, or surface, (i. e. that of the shoe,) and shall say, &c.—in which case the ceremony is coincident with the following:

Tournafort says, (vol. ii. p. 316.) "A woman may demand to be separated from her husband if he" declines her intimacy; "if the woman turn her slipper upside down in presence of the judge it is a sign," and is taken as evidence against her husband. "The judge sends to look for the husband, bastinades him, and dissolves the marriage." A more particular account of this ceremony is given by Aaron Hill: (Travels, p. 104.) "The third divorce practised by the Turks, is, when a man" withholds his personal intimacy from his wife, "yet refuses to dismiss her. Being summoned by her friends before a judge, and forced to bring her with him to the same appearance, when the charge is read against him, she is asked if she will then affirm the truth of that accusation? Hereupon she stoops, and taking off her slipper, spits upon the sole; and strikes on her husband's forehead. Modesty requires no further confirmation from the female plaintiff; and sentence is immediately pronounced, in favor of the lady, who is thenceforth free to marry as she pleases; and is entitled, notwithstanding, to a large allowance from her former consort's yearly income."

These ceremonies differ in some things, however; for in the case of complaint against her own husband, for personal abstinence, the wife takes off her own shoe and spits upon it; but in the case of complaint against her husband's brother for refusing to be his locum tenens, and declining her intimacy, she takes off his shoe and spits upon it. Moreover, the text does not say she shall turn up the sole, and spit upon it, (such inversion signifying a very different matter, as may be seen in Busbequius, (Ep. 169.) and could have no place in the case of the husband's brother,) but she shall spit upon the face or upper part of it, as an oath, affirmation, and evidence, of his refusal "to build up his brother's house." It deserves notice that the appellative phrase which brands the character of the refuser is not "the house of him who had his shoe loosed, and was spit upon;" but the reference is to the loosing of the shoe only, the more considerable disgrace being omitted.

This custom seems to be alluded to, with some variation, in the case of Ruth's kinsman, (Ruth iv. 7.) where it seems clearly to include the force of an oath, "for to confirm all things." This form of an oath, then, like that of placing the hand under the thigh, appears sufficiently strange to us, yet, being binding on those who took it, it might fully answer its purpose. Why the subject to which it alludes was signified by the shoe in particular, might possibly be ascertained by an accurate attention to some of the senses in which the word foot, or feet, is used, Jer. ii. 25; Ezek. xvi. 25; Isa. vii. 20; xxxvi. 12; in Heb. &c.

Is there a gradation observable in the treatment of more distant relatives, though the nearest of kin remaining, as in the case of Ruth? The man himself plucked off his own shoe; and gave it to his neighbor; it was not plucked off by the petitioner, nor was it given to her; but it was loosened, perhaps decently, and deliberately, by himself, and given by him to his neighbor; implying, probably, a smaller portion of indignity, as the relation was more remote, and his obligation to comply with the custom proportionately less urgent. This affords an answer to Michaëlis's question, (No. 59,) which Niebuhr has not replied to.

Christ has restored marriage to its first perfection, by banishing polygamy, and forbidding divorce, except in the case of adultery, (Matt. v. 32.) nor leaving to the parties so separated, the liberty of marrying again, Luke xvi. 18. (See DIVORCE.) Our Saviour blessed and sanctified marriage by being present himself at the wedding at Cana, (John ii. 1, 2.) and Paul declares the excellence of Christian marriage, when he says, (Eph. v. 32.) "Let every one of you so love his wife, even as himself, and the wife see that she reverence her husband." "So ought men to love their wives as their own bodies; he that loveth his wife, loveth himself. For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall be joined unto his wife, and they two shall be one flesh. This is a great mystery; but I speak concerning Christ and the church." The union of husband and wife represents the sacred and spiritual marriage of Christ with his church. The same apostle assures us (Heb. xiii. 4.) that "marriage is honorable in all, and the bed undefiled; but whoremongers and adulterers God will judge." The New Testament prescribes no particular ceremony for the solemnizing of matrimony; but in the church, a blessing has always been given to the married couple.

MARRIAGE VEIL, see VEIL.

MARS' HILL. Our translators have entirely spoiled the narrative of the historian in Acts xvii. 19, 22, by rendering "they took Paul, and brought him unto Areopagus . . . then Paul stood in the midst of Mars' hill." Now as Mars' hill is Areopagus translated, and as both Areopagus and Mars' hill signify the same place, the same name ought to have been preserved in both verses; in which case the narrative would have stood thus:—"They took Paul, and brought him before the court of the Areopagites," or the court which sat on Areopagus. . . . "and Paul stood in the midst before the court of the Areopagites, and said, Ye chief men of Athens." (See AREOPAGUS.) The propriety of the apostle's discourse is greatly illustrated by considering the important, the senatorial, and even the learned, character of his auditors.

MARTHA, sister of Lazarus and Mary. Upon one occasion, when our Saviour visited them at Bethany, Martha was very busy in preparing supper, while Mary sat at our Saviour's feet, hearing his doctrine with great attention, Luke x. 38—42. Martha complained, and wished Mary to rise and assist her. But Jesus made answer, "Martha, Martha, you are very busy and in much trouble to provide indifferent and unnecessary things; there is but one thing necessary, and Mary has chosen the better part, which shall not be taken from her." Some time after this, Lazarus falling sick, the sisters sent word to Jesus, who was then beyond Jordan; but he departed not thence till he knew Lazarus to be dead. When he approached Bethany, Martha went out to meet him; expostulated with him on his delay; and professed her faith in him. Jesus bade them bring him to Lazarus's tomb, and there raised him from the dead, John xi. 20, &c. (See LAZARUS.) Six days before his passion, Jesus, being at Bethany, on his way to Jerusalem, was invited to eat by a Pharisee, called Simon the leper, John xii. Martha attended upon the guests, of whom Lazarus was one; and Mary poured a box of precious perfume on the head and feet of Jesus, Matt. xxvi. 6, &c. This is all we know of Martha. The Latins and Greeks maintain, that she died at Jerusalem, as also Mary and Lazarus, and that they were all buried there.

MARTYR, properly, denotes a witness; in ecclesiastical history, a witness, by the shedding of his blood, in testifying the truth. Thus martyrs are distinguished from confessors, properly so called, who underwent great afflictions for their confession of the truth, but without suffering death. The term martyr occurs only thrice in the New Testament, Acts xxii. 20; Rev. ii. 13; xvii. 6.

I. MARY, the wife of Joseph, the mother of Jesus, was, it is said, daughter of Joachim and Anna, of the tribe of Judah; but Scripture mentions nothing of her parents, not even their names, unless Heli (Luke iii. 23.) be the same as Joachim. She was of the royal race of David, as was Joseph her husband; and was also cousin to Elisabeth, wife of Zechariah the priest, Luke i. 5, 36. The Greek text (Matt. i. 18.) imports that Mary was espoused to Joseph, who, according to the usages of the Hebrews, had the same power over her as if she were his wife. (See MARRIAGE.)

Some time after the espousals the angel Gabriel appeared to Mary, to acquaint her, that she should be the mother of the Messiah, Luke i. 26, 27, &c. Mary asking how this could be, since she knew not man, the angel replied, that "The Holy Ghost should come upon her, and that the power of the Highest should overshadow her." To confirm his message, and show that nothing was impossible to God, he added, that her cousin Elisabeth, who was both old and barren, was then in the sixth month of her pregnancy. Mary answered, "Behold the handmaid of the Lord; be it unto me according to thy word." She soon afterwards set out for Hebron, to visit her cousin; and as soon as Elisabeth heard the voice of Mary, her child (John the Baptist) leaped in her womb; she was filled with the Holy Ghost, and cried out, "Blessed art thou among women," &c. Mary, filled with acknowledgment and supernatural light, praised God, saying, "My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour," &c. Mary continued with Elisabeth about three months, and then returned to her own house.

When Mary was ready to lie in, an edict of Cæsar Augustus decreed, that all subjects of the empire should go to their own cities, to register their names, according to their families. Joseph and Mary, who were both of the lineage of David, went to Bethlehem, whence sprung their family. But while they were here, the time being fulfilled in which Mary was to be delivered, she brought forth her first-born son, whom she wrapped in swaddling-clothes, and laid in the manger of the stable whither they had been compelled to take up their residence, as they could find no place in the inn. (See CARAVANSERAI.) Angels made the event known to shepherds, who were in the fields near Bethlehem, and who came in the night to see Mary and Joseph, and the child in the manger, and to pay him their adoration. Mary took notice of all these things, and laid them up in her heart, Luke ii. 19. A few days afterwards, the Magi or wise men came from the East, and brought to Jesus the presents of gold, frankincense and myrrh, Matt. ii. 8, &c. The time of Mary's purification being come, that is, forty days after the birth of Jesus, she went to Jerusalem, to present her son in the temple, and there to offer the sacrifice appointed by the law, for the purification of women after child-birth, Luke ii. 21. When Joseph and Mary were about to return to their own country, Nazareth, the angel of the Lord appeared to Joseph in a dream, bidding him retire into Egypt with Mary and the child, because Herod designed to destroy it, Matt. ii. 13, 14. Joseph obeyed the admonition, and continued in Egypt till after the death of Herod, when he returned to Nazareth with his wife and the child.

Mary is only mentioned two or three times afterwards in the sacred history, Luke ii. 49; John ii. 1; xix. 25—27, &c. She was with the apostles, no doubt, at the ascension of our Saviour, and continued with them at Jerusalem, waiting the descent of the Holy Ghost. After this time she dwelt with John the evangelist, who regarded her as his own mother. Some have believed that Mary finished her life by martyrdom, from those words of Simeon, "A sword shall pierce through thy own soul also," Luke ii. 35. The Catholic church has understood this literally, and the Virgin is very often represented with a sword thrust through her vitals. But this is generally and more properly referred to her affliction, at beholding her son's crucifixion: no history mentions her martyrdom.

[The following remarks and suggestions are from the English editors of Calmet, and may pass for what they are worth. On similar principles it would not be very difficult to prove or disprove any historical fact. R.]

Traditions seldom or never retain, unadulterated, for any length of time, the original truth from which they took their rise. Yet some of them convey information, though disguised, which more regular history does not afford. Among these Mr. Taylor classes the report, that Luke was a painter, and had painted the portrait of the mother of our Lord; conceiving that we find in the writings of this sacred penman such a description of the Holy Mother, as may justly be called her portrait; that is—the portrait of her character and mind, not of her person and countenance. We are scarcely introduced to this interesting personage, (chap. i. 29.) when we are told, that “she was troubled, and cast in her mind what manner of salutation this should be.” The word rendered troubled, does not import any deficiency of natural courage, but simply the agitation of her mind, dashing, as it were, backwards and forwards like water; now thinking well, now suspecting ill, of this salutation. And to this sense agrees the word διελογίζετο, reasoning within herself, examining both sides of the question, dialoguizing pro and con, as to the nature of the present occurrence. A very natural action, surely, for a person of understanding and manners! And this character for reflection and thought is retained by Mary, where we next find her: (chap. ii. 19.) she “kept all these things, and pondered them in her heart.”—She collected and preserved these events in the storehouse of her mind, and laying them beside one another, compared them together; by this means they mutually served as objects illustrative of each other. Again, verse 51, “She kept all these sayings in her heart.” But the form of the verb here used is διετη/οει, (before, it was συνετη/οει.) she closely watched, with all the affection of her heart, all these sentiments, to see what turn they would take.

Now, nothing of this depicting of the character of Mary appears in any of the other evangelists; Luke alone has thus painted her. Moreover, this character is perfectly agreeable to the warning given her by Simeon, that a sword should pierce her reflective and considerate heart; or rather, that a javelin, thrown by a fierce hand, after having pierced its object, should wound her deeply, in its further course. It is perfectly agreeable, also, to the solicitude which, many years afterwards, induced her to think her son, our Lord, overdid himself; that is, exceeded his strength, in labors, &c. We have seen a picture of the mind of Holy Mary; the evangelist draws another of her actions. We have found her thoughtful and reflective; she was, also, discreet and active; for after her salutation, she determined to put to the test the information she had received; and to judge by her own eyes and ears, whether her elder friend Elisabeth had really “conceived a son in her old age;” and whether this was really the sixth month of her pregnancy. Elisabeth had concealed herself during five months, but this Mary did not know; Elisabeth’s pregnancy might, however, be reported in her neighborhood, and so the informant of Mary might have told her no great news; nothing worthy of being a sign in confirmation of what he had predicted. It might also have been the third month, or the eighth, in which case the imperfection of the information would have been apparent. Mary staid till she saw a son born. Nothing, then, could be so discreet as placing herself under the protection of a person of the age and character of Elisabeth. Nor is this all; for Mary went in haste on this, to her, extremely important business: it follows, that she must have been in circumstances of life which permitted this instant exertion. No person extremely poor, no person in servitude, no person under any authoritative control, could have made this hasty journey. This, then, is another feature in the picture of Mary, as drawn by Luke. But the inference from Mary’s situation in life is of still greater consequence. That education contributes essentially to form a thinking mind, we know from every day’s experience; and we have seen that such a mind was Mary’s. It is evident, also, from what is called her Song, that she had read the Scriptures of the Old Testament with attention; and as reading was not (as it is not, at this day) a common acquisition among women of the lowest class in the East, the possession of it removes Mary from that class, had we no other proof. It seems to have been an error in critics to take Mary’s Song for a sudden vocal effusion, by instantaneous inspiration; there are so many allusions in it to passages of the then extant Scriptures, that this appears to be improbable. It is not likely that instantaneous inspiration should have repeated sentiments already recorded, and public to the whole nation. Something not yet known, something looking forward, something of sufficient consequence to justify its being revealed, is what we should rather expect from such an afflatus of the Holy Spirit. It will be observed, also, that the sacred writer does not assert the instant inspiration of Mary: his words are, speaking of Elisabeth, she “was filled with the Holy Ghost;” and speaking of Zechariah, he “was filled with the Holy Ghost, and prophesied;” whereas, concerning Mary, he says nothing of the kind; but simply, “Mary said.” This distinction of phrase is not favorable to the notion of a sudden verbal inspiration, in which the party speaking is the mere organ of the Sacred Spirit. We know not whether it be necessary to remind our readers, that to say, is often used, when writing, not speech, is the subject. We have the phrase among ourselves, “He says in this letter”—“He tells us in such a place”—“Your correspondent says that”—and that the same idea is annexed to the verb to say, in Scripture, appears, among many other places, from John i. 23. Isaiah said, (that is, wrote,) vii. 38. The Scripture hath said, Rom. vii. 7. The law hath said, Gal i. 9. As we said (that is, wrote) before, so say (that is, write) I again, &c. We may then consider the Song of Mary as composed—written—under the illumination of the Sacred Spirit; and being committed to paper, it comes under the principle which we have endeavored elsewhere to establish, (see LUKE,) that Luke sought out and procured all the written documents which he could obtain for his purpose. The fact may be, that during the residence of Mary with Elisabeth (three months or more) she penned this song; and copies of it were extant, one of which Luke employed in his history.

Now, the acquisition of writing by a young Jewish woman, adds to proofs already suggested, that Mary was in respectable circumstances, and had received a liberal education; for we are not to attribute to those times, and to that country, the same diffusion of knowledge as obtains among ourselves. Writing and reading were rare among the men, much more rare among the women; and the possession of them seems to be decisive against that poverty which some have unwittingly attached to the condition of our Lord and his parents.

We remark, further, that Luke is the writer who last mentions Mary the mother of Jesus by name, (Acts i. 14.) and she is the only woman whom he thus distinguishes. On the whole, the inference is clear, that we are obliged to him for a portrait of this highly distinguished person; not indeed of her features, but of her character and conduct: and thus the tradition, of which no critic has ever been able to make any thing probable, may be explained with some appearance of consistency.

II. MARY, the mother of Mark, had a house in Jerusalem, to which it is thought the apostles retired after the ascension of our Lord, and where they received the Holy Ghost. This house was on mount Sion, and Epiphanius says, it escaped the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, and was changed into a very famous church, which continued several ages. After the imprisonment of Peter, the faithful were assembled in this house, praying, when Peter, delivered by the ministry of an angel, knocked at the gate, Acts xii. 5, 12.

III. MARY CLEOPHAS, the sister of Mary the mother of our Lord, was wife of Cleophas, and mother of James the Less, and of Simon, brethren of our Lord, John xix. 25; Luke xxiv. 10; Matt. xxvii. 56, 61. She believed early on Jesus Christ, and at length accompanied him in some of his journeys, to minister to him, followed him to Calvary, and was with the Virgin at the foot of his cross. She was also present at his burial, and prepared perfumes to embalm him. But going to his tomb on Sunday morning very early, with other women, they learned from an angel that he was risen, of which they informed the apostles. By the way Jesus appeared to them, and they embraced his feet, worshipping him. The year of her death is not known.

IV. MARY, sister of Lazarus, who has been confounded with the woman mentioned Luke vii. 37, 39. See MARTHA.

V. MARY MAGDALEN, one of the females who followed Jesus, in company with his apostles, when he preached the gospel from city to city. She took her surname either from the town of Magdala in Galilee, beyond Jordan, or from Magdolos, a town at the foot of mount Carmel, perhaps the Megiddo of Joshua xvii. 11; 2 Kings ix. 27; xxiii. 29. Luke (viii. 2.) and Mark (xvi. 9.) observe, that she had been delivered by Christ from seven devils. This some understand literally; others figuratively, for the crimes and wickednesses of her past life. Others maintain, that she had always lived in virginity, and consequently was a different person from the sinner mentioned by Luke, (chap. vii. 36.) and by the seven devils, they understand a real possession, which is not inconsistent with a recluse life. She followed Christ in his last journey from Galilee to Jerusalem, and was at the foot of the cross with the Holy Virgin. She continued on mount Calvary till our Saviour's death, and saw him placed in his tomb; after which she returned to Jerusalem, to prepare to embalm him after the sabbath was over, John xix. 25; Mark xv. 47. All the sabbath day she remained in the city, and the next day, early in the morning, she went to the sepulchre, with Mary the mother of James and Salome, Mark xvi. 1, 2; Luke xxiv. 1, 2. Being come to his tomb, they saw two angels, who informed them that Jesus was risen. On this, Mary Magdalen ran to Jerusalem, to acquaint the apostles. Returning to the sepulchre, and stooping forward to examine the inside of the tomb, she there saw two angels sitting, one at the head and the other at the bottom of the tomb. (See SEPULCHRE.) They asked her why she wept. To which she replied, "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him." Immediately turning about, she saw Jesus, who asked her what she looked for. She answered, "Sir, if you have removed my Master, let me know it, that I may take him away." Jesus said to her, Mary! Immediately she knew him, and cast herself at his feet, to kiss them. But Jesus said to her, "Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended to my Father." q. d. You shall have leisure to see me hereafter; go now to my brethren, my apostles, and tell them; I shall ascend to my God and their God; to my Father and their Father. Thus had Mary the happiness of first seeing our Saviour after his resurrection. She related this to the apostles, but they did not believe her, till her report was confirmed by other testimony.

It has been thought by Calmet and others, that "the sinner," mentioned in Luke vii. 36, was Mary Magdalen; but this is hardly credible, Magdalen being always named in company with women of the best character and quality; as (Luke viii.) with Joanna, wife of Chuza, Herod's steward, and Susannah, and many others. Generally she is named first of her company, even before Mary the mother of Jesus, Mark xv. 47. She was, also, a woman of property; she not only "ministered to Jesus of her substance," while he was living, but she was one of those who bought spices to embalm him after his death, Matt. xxviii. 55, 56; Luke xxiii. 56; John xx. Probably she was not young; and, therefore, the story of her following John to Ephesus is entitled to no attention; yet, as the name Mary was very common among the Jews, some woman bearing it might accompany the apostle, and give occasion to the mistake.

MASCHIL, which is a term found as a title to some of the Psalms, imports he that instructs or makes to understand. Some interpreters think, that it signifies an instrument of music; but it is much more probable that it signifies an instructive song.

MASH, the fourth son of Aram, (Gen. x. 23.) called Meshech in 1 Chron. i. 17. Bochart believes he inhabited mount Masius in Mesopotamia, and gave his name to the river Mazecha, whose source is there.

MASHAI, a city of Asher, yielded to the Levites of the family of Gershon, (1 Chron. vi. 74.) is said by Eusebius to have been in the vicinity of mount Carmel near the sea. In Josh. xix. 26, it is called Misheal; and in xxi. 30, Mishal.

MASORA, see LANGUAGE, p. 609.

MASREKAI, a city of Idumea, (Gen. xxxvi. 36; 1 Chron. i. 47.) and probably a plantation of vines.

MASSA, a name given to the encampment of the Hebrews at Rephidim, when the people, wanting water, began to murmur against Moses and the Lord, as if they had doubted of his presence among them, Exod. xvii. 2, &c.

MASSADA, a castle or fortress in the tribe of Judah, west of the Dead sea, or the lake Asphaltites, not far from Engedi, situated on a steep rock, of very difficult access. Jonathan the Asmonean, brother of Judas Maccabæus, fortified it against the kings of Syria, and Herod the Great made it still more impregnable.

It is mentioned by Josephus in his account of the last war of the Jews against the Romans, as having been taken possession of by Eleazar, a grandson of the famous Judas Gaulonites, at the head of the Sicarii, or assassins. Flavius Sylva besieged the castle with such vigor, that finding escape impossible, Eleazar prevailed upon his companions to kill one another. The last that survived set fire to the castle. This happened A. D. 71. (Joseph. Bell. Jud. vii. 28—33.)

MATTAN, son of Eleazar, father of Jacob, and grandfather of Joseph, husband to the Virgin Mary. Luke (iii. 23.) makes Heli, son of Mattan, to be father of Joseph; but it is thought that Heli is the same as Joachim, father of Mary, and father-in-law to Joseph. So that Matthew (i. 15, 16.) gives the direct genealogy of Joseph, and Luke that of Mary.

MATTANAH, an encampment of Israel, (Numb. xxi. 18, 19.) which Eusebius says was on the Arnon, twelve miles from Medaba, east.

I. MATTATHIAS, son of John, of the family of Joarib, and of the race of the priests, was the first who opposed the persecution by Antiochus Epiphanes, 1 Mac. ii. A. M. 3837. He had five sons, who inherited their father's undaunted spirit, and made a determined stand against the oppressors of their country and the persecutors of their religion. Mattathias and his sons being joined by the Assideans, the most religious as well as valiant men of Israel, they marched through the country, destroyed the altars dedicated to false gods, circumcised the children that had not received circumcision, humbled the children of pride, and delivered the law from its subjection to strangers, and from the power of the king. Being near his death, Mattathias assembled his sons, and exhorted them to be truly zealous for the law, and ready to sacrifice their lives for the covenant of their ancestors. He was buried at Modin, in the sepulchre of his ancestors, and all Israel made a great mourning for him.

II. MATTATHIAS, son of Simon Maccabæus, and grandson of Mattathias, was killed treacherously, with his father and one of his brethren, by Ptolemy, son-in-law of Simon, in the castle of Docus, 1 Mac. xvi. 14—16.

MATTHEW, an apostle and evangelist, was son of Alphaeus, a Galilean by birth, a Jew by religion, and a publican by profession, Mark ii. 14; Luke v. 27. The other evangelists call him only Levi, which was his Hebrew name; but he always calls himself Matthew, which was probably his name as a publican, or officer for gathering taxes. He does not dissemble his former profession, thus exalting the grace of Christ, which raised him to the apostleship. His ordinary abode was at Capernaum, and his office out of the town, at the sea of Tiberias, whence he was called by Jesus to follow him, Matt. ix. 9; Luke ii. 13, 14. It is probable that he had a previous knowledge of the miracles and doctrine of Christ, whom he might have heard preach. He was made an apostle the same year he was converted, and, consequently, he was called to the apostleship in the first year of Christ's ministry. He is sometimes named the seventh among the apostles, and sometimes the eighth. The most general opinion of both ancients and moderns is, that he preached and suffered martyrdom in Persia, or among the Parthians, or in Caramania, which then was subject to the Parthians.

Matthew wrote his Gospel while in Judea, but whether in the Hebrew or Syriac language, then common in the country, or in Greek, cannot be determined. See GOSPEL.—Matthew.

I. MATTHIAS, one of those disciples who continued with our Saviour from his baptism to his ascension, (Acts i. 21, 22.) and was after the ascension associated with the eleven apostles. We know nothing further of him.

II. MATTHIAS, son of Theophilus, high-priest of the Jews, succeeded Simon, A. M. 3999, and after one year was deposed by Herod the Great, because he thought him engaged in the confederacy with Matthias, son of Margaloth, and Judas, son of Sarpheus, who pulled down from over the gate of the temple the golden eagle that Herod had set up. (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 8.)

III. MATTHIAS, son of Ananus, high-priest of the Jews, succeeded Simon Cantharus, A. D. 41. (Jos. Ant. xix. 6.)

IV. MATTHIAS, son of Theophilus, and another high-priest of the Jews, succeeded Jesus, son of Gamaliel, A. D. 65. (Joseph. Bel. Jud. v. 33.)

V. MATTHIAS, a Jew, of the party of the Maccobians, or Syrians, sent by Nicanor to Judas Maccabæus, with proposals of peace, 2 Mac. xiv. 19.

MAZZAROTH, Job xxxviii. 32. Our margin properly supposes this word to denote the twelve signs of the zodiac, a broad circle in the heavens, comprehending all such stars as lie in the path of the sun and moon. As these luminaries appear to proceed throughout this circle annually, so different parts of it progressively receive them every month; and this progression seems to be what is meant by "bringing forth mazzaroth in his season," q. d. "Canst thou by thy power cause the revolutions of the heavenly bodies in the zodiac, and the seasons of summer and winter, which ensue on their progress into the regular annual or monthly situations?"

MEASURE. See the general table of Weights, Measures, and Money, of the Hebrews, at the end of the Dictionary. Also the particular names of each, as SHEKEL, TALENT, BATH, EPHAIH, &c.

MEATS. (See ANIMALS.) It does not appear that the ancient Hebrews were very nice about the seasoning and dressing of their food. We find among them roast meat, boiled meat, and ragouts. Meats that were offered were boiled in a pot, 1 Sam. ii. 15. Moses (Exod. xxiii. 19; xxxiv. 26.) forbids to seethe a kid in its mother's milk; which may be understood as forbidding to sacrifice it while it suckled; or that it should not be boiled in the milk of its dam; as the Hebrews explain it. They might not kill a cow and its calf in the same day; nor a sheep, or goat, and its young one at the same time. They might not cut off a part of a living animal to eat it, either raw or dressed. If any lawful beast or bird should die of itself, or be strangled, and the blood not drain away, they were not allowed to taste of it; and if in any bird was found a thorn, pin, or needle, that had gored it; or in any beast an imposthume, or disease of the entrails; or if it had been bitten by any beast, they were not to eat of it, Exod. xxii. 31; Lev. v. 2; vii. 24; xvii. 15; xxii. 8. He that by inadvertence should eat of any animal that died of itself, or that was killed by any beast, was to be unclean till the evening, and was not purified till he had washed his clothes. They ate of nothing dressed by any other than a Jew, nor did they ever dress their victuals with the kitchen implements of any but one of their own nation.

The prohibition of eating blood, or animals that are strangled, has been always rigidly observed by the Jews. They do not so much as eat an egg, if there appear the least streak of blood in it. When an animal is to be killed, it must be performed by a skilful person, because of the circumstances to be observed. For the time must be proper for the action, and the knife must be very sharp, and without notches, that the blood may run without interruption. They let it spill itself upon the ground, or on ashes, and afterwards take it up. They put the meat into salt for an hour before they put it into the pot, that the blood may run quite out; otherwise they must not eat the meat, except they roast it. They take great care to cut away the sinew of the thigh of such animals as they intend to eat, according to Gen. xxxii. 22. And in several places of Germany and Italy, the Jews will not eat any of the hinder quarter, because great nicety is required in taking away this sinew as it should be done; and few know how to do it exactly. They forbear eating any fat of oxen, sheep, goats, or animals of this kind, according to Lev. vii. 23, &c. but other kind of fat they think is allowed them. See FAT.

In the Christian church, the custom of refraining from things strangled, and from blood, continued for a long time. In the council of the apostles, held at Jerusalem, (Acts xv.) it was declared that converts from paganism should not be subject to the legal ceremonies, but that they should refrain from idolatry, from fornication, from eating blood, and from such animals as were strangled, and their blood thereby retained in their bodies; which decree was observed for many ages by the church. Augustin affirms, that in the church they observed the distinction of certain meats, so long as the wall of separation was kept up between the Jews and the converted Gentiles, and the Christian church, composed of these two sorts of people, was not yet entirely formed; but that when there were no longer any Israelites according to the flesh, there were no longer any persons who made this distinction.

MEATS OFFERED TO IDOLS, 1 Cor. viii. 7, 10.—At the first settling of the church there were many disputes concerning the use of meats offered to idols. Some newly converted Christians, convinced that an idol was nothing, and that the distinction of clean and unclean creatures was abolished by our Saviour, ate indifferently of whatever was served up to them, even among pagans, without inquiring whether the meats had been offered to idols. They took the same liberty in buying meat sold in the market, not regarding whether it were pure or impure, according to the Jews; or whether it had been offered to idols. For among the heathen, as well as among the Jews, there were several sacrifices, in which only a part was offered on the altar, the rest belonging to him who offered it, which he disposed of at his pleasure, or ate with his friends. But other Christians, weaker, or less instructed, were offended at this liberty, and thought that eating of meat which had been offered to idols, was a kind of partaking in that wicked and sacrilegious offering. This diversity of opinion produced some scandal, to which Paul thought it behoved him to provide a remedy, Rom. xiv. 20; Tit. i. 15. He determined, therefore, that all things were clean to such as were clean, and that an idol was nothing at all. That a man might safely eat of whatever was sold in the shambles, and need not scrupulously inquire from whence it came; and that if an unbeliever should invite a believer to eat with him, the believer might eat of whatever was set before him, &c. 1 Cor. x. 25, &c. But at the same time he enjoins, that the laws of charity and prudence should be observed; that believers should be cautious of scandalizing or offending weak minds; for though all things might be lawful, yet all things were not always expedient. That no one ought to seek his own accommodation or satisfaction, exclusively, but that each should have regard to that of his neighbor. That if any one should warn another, "This has been offered to idols," he should not eat of it, for the sake of him who gave the warning; not so much for fear of wounding his own conscience, as his brother's: in a word, that he who is weak, and thinks he may not indifferently use all sorts of food, should forbear, and eat herbs, Rom. xiv. 1, 2. It is certain, however, that Christians generally abstained from eating meat that had been offered to idols, for in Rev. ii. 20, the angel of Thyatira is reproved for suffering a Jezebel in his church, who called herself a prophetess, and seduced the servants of God to commit impurity, and to eat meat that had been consecrated to idols. Tertullian says, that Paul has put the key of the flesh-market into our hands, by allowing us the use of all sorts of meat, except that which has been offered to idols; and we know that in the persecutions by the Roman emperors, they often polluted the flesh sold in the shambles, by consecrating it to idols, that they might reduce the Christians to the necessity of purchasing that, or of totally abstaining from flesh.

MEDAD and ELDAD, two men who were among those whom God inspired with his Holy Spirit, to assist Moses in the government, Numb. xi. 26—30. The Jews affirm, that they were brothers by the mother's side to Moses, and sons of Jochebed and Elizaphan.

MEDAN, or MADAN, the third son of Abraham and Keturah, (Gen. xxv. 2.) is thought, with Midian his brother, to have peopled the country of Midian or Madian, east of the Dead sea.

MEDEBA, a city east of Jordan, in the southern part of Reuben, (Josh. xiii. 16.) not far from Heshbon. Isaiah (xv. 2.) assigns it to Moab, because the Moabites took it from the Israelites; whereas Josephus ascribes it to the Arabians, because they made themselves masters of it towards the conclusion of the Jewish monarchy. The inhabitants of Medeba having killed John Gaddis, brother of Judas Maccabeus, as he was passing to the country of the Nabatheans, Simon and Jonathan, his brethren, revenged his death on the children of Jambri, as they were conducting a bride to her husband. Burckhardt describes the ruins of this town, which still retains its ancient name.

MEDIA, a country east of Assyria, which is supposed to have been peopled by the descendants of Madai, son of Japheth, Gen. x. 2. Esther (i. 3, 14, 18, 19; x. 2.) and Daniel (v. 28; vi. 3, 12, 15; viii. 20.) commonly put Madai for the Medes, and so most interpreters understand it. The Greeks maintain, that this country takes name from Medus, son of Medea; and truly if what has been said under the article MADAI may be relied on, or if this son of Japheth peopled Macedonia, we must then seek another origin for the people of Media.

Media has been taken in sometimes a larger and sometimes a narrower extent. Ptolemy makes its limits to the north to be a part of the Caspian sea, and the mountains of the same name, and the Cadusians; the greater Armenia west: the countries of the Parthians and Hyrcania east; Persia, Susiana, and a part of Assyria, south. Its capital was Ecbatana, Judith i. 1. This city is also mentioned Ezra vi. 2, under the name of Achmeta.

[Ancient MEDIA, called by the Hebrews MADAI, extended itself on the west and south of the Caspian sea, from Armenia on the north to Farsistan or Persia proper on the south; and included the districts now called Shirvan, Adserbijan,* Ghilan, Masanderan, and Irak Adjemi. It covered a territory larger than that of Spain, lying between 30 and 40 degrees of north latitude; and was one of the most fertile and earliest cultivated among the kingdoms of Asia. It had two grand divisions; of which the north-western was called Atropatene, or Lesser Media, and the southern Greater Media. The former corresponds to the modern Adserbijan, now, as formerly, a province of the Persian empire on the west of the Caspian, surrounded by high mountains of the Tauritic range, except towards the east, where the river Kur, or Cyrus, discharges its waters into the Caspian. The greater Media corresponds principally to the modern Irak Adjemi, or Persian Irak.

Media is one of the most ancient independent kingdoms of which history makes mention. Ninus, the founder of the Assyrian monarchy, encountered in his wars a king of Media, whom he subdued, and whose land he made a province of the Assyrian empire. For five hundred and twenty years, the Medes remained subject to the Assyrian yoke; but at last, when Tiglath-pileser and Salmanser began to depopulate whole districts of western Asia, and transport their inhabitants into the cities of the Medes and other regions of interior Asia, the patience of the Medes was exhausted. They rebelled; and the overthrow of Sennacherib before Jerusalem, his subsequent flight and murder, and the confusion in the Assyrian royal family, completed their deliverance. Six years they passed in a sort of anarchy, arising from internal dissensions and parties, until at length, about 700 B. C. they found in DEJOCES a wise and upright statesman, who was proclaimed king by universal consent. He reigned over Media alone, whose six tribes he united into a single nation. His son and successor, PHRAORTES, brought first the Persians, and then all upper Asia, to the river Halys, Cappadocia included, under the Median dominion. He ventured afterwards to attack Assyria, and laid siege to Nineveh; but his army was defeated and he himself killed. His successor, CYAXARES, determined to take vengeance on the Assyrians for his father's death; but as he was about to besiege Nineveh, he received intelligence, that the Scythians had made an irruption into Media. He marched against them; was defeated; and it was not till after eight and twenty years, that Media could free itself from the oppression of these rude and unexpected enemies. Cyaxares now appeared again before Nineveh, and conquered it, with the help of his ally, Nabopolassar, the first king of Babylon. Assyria now became a Median province. This widely extended Median empire was inherited, after the death of Cyaxares, by his son ASTAGES; who, thirty-five years afterwards, about 556 B. C. delivered it over to his grandson, CYRUS, king of the Persians. (Herodot. lib. i. c. 95—130.)

In this way arose the Medo-Persian kingdom; and the laws of the Medes and Persians are always mentioned by the sacred writers together, Esth. i. 9; x. 2; Dan. vi. 8, 12, et al. So also the annals of the Medes and Persians are mentioned together, Esth. x. 2. Indeed, from this time onward, the manners, customs, religion and civilization of the Medes and Persians seem ever to have become more and more amalgamated. And in general it would seem, as we may gather from the ancient Zend writings, that the Medes, Persians and Bactrians were originally the same people, having in common one language, the Zend, and one religion, the worship of Ormuzd, the highest being, under the symbol of fire. The priests of this religion, the Magi, were a Median race, to whom were intrusted the cultivation of the sciences and the performance of the sacred rites. Among these, and, as is supposed, before the time of Cyrus, appeared Zerdusht, or Zoroaster, as a reformer, or rather as the restorer of the ancient but now degenerated religion of light; whose disciples have maintained themselves even to the present day in Persia and India, under the name of Guebres. (See Rosenmüller, Bibl. Geogr. i. i. p. 289, seq.) *R.

Isaiah describes the Medes as instruments and executioners of God's decrees against Babylon, (chap. xiii. 17, 18; xxi. 2, 3.) and Jeremiah (xxv. 25.) speaks of the misfortunes which were to happen to the Medes. He foretells, that they also, in their turn, were to drink of the cup of God's wrath; and it is likely that Cyrus made them suffer the evils they were here threatened with.

MEDIATOR. In covenants between man and man, in which the holy name of God is used, he is witness and mediator of all reciprocal promises and engagements. Thus Laban and Jacob made a covenant on mount Gilead; (Gen. xxxi. 49—54.) and when the elders of this place made a covenant with Jephthah, they called on the name of the Lord, Judg. xi. 10. When God gave his law to the Hebrews, and made a covenant with them at Sinai, a mediator was necessary, who should relate the words of God to the Hebrews, and their answers to him; in order that the articles of the covenant being agreed to by each party, they might be ratified and confirmed by blood, and by oath. Moses on this occasion was mediator between God and the people, as Paul says, (Gal. iii. 19.) "The law was added because of transgressions, and was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator." In the new covenant which God has been pleased to make with the Christian church, Jesus Christ is the mediator of redemption. He was the surety, the sacrifice, the priest, and the intercessor of this covenant. He has sealed it with his blood, has proposed the terms and conditions of it in his gospel, has instituted the form of it in baptism, and the commemoration of it in the sacrament of his body and blood. Paul, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, enlarges on this office of mediator of the new covenant, exercised by Christ, Heb. viii. 6; ix. 25; xii. 24. (See also 1 Tim. ii. 5.)

In all ages, and in all parts of the world, there has constantly prevailed such a sense of the infinite holiness of the supreme Divinity, with so deep a conviction of the imperfections of human nature, and the guilt of man, as to deter worshippers from coming directly into the presence of a Being so awful:—recourse has therefore been had to mediators. Among the Sabians the celestial intelligences were constituted mediators; among other idolaters their various idols; and this notion still prevails in Hindostan and elsewhere. Sacrifices were thought to be a kind of mediators; and, in short, there has been a universal feeling, a sentiment never forgotten, of the necessity of an interpreter, or mediator, between God and man. As Luther said—"I will have nothing to do with an absolute God."

MEDICINE, or Physic, is an invention, by Jesus son of Sirach, ascribed to God himself, Ecclus. xxxviii. 1, &c. Scripture makes no mention of physicians before the time of Joseph, who commanded his servants, the physicians of Egypt, to embalm the body of Jacob, Gen. 1. 2. The art of medicine, however, was very ancient in Egypt. They ascribed the invention of it to Thaut, or to Hermes, or to Osiris, or to Isis; and some of the learned have thought that Moses, having been instructed in all the learning of the Egyptians, must also have known the chief secrets of medicine. They also argue it from his indications concerning diseases, the leprosy, infirmities of women, animals, clean and unclean, &c. It does not appear that physicians were common among the Hebrews, especially for internal maladies, but for wounds, fractures, bruises, and external injuries, they had physicians, or surgeons, who understood the dressing and binding up of wounds, with the application of medicaments. (See Jer. viii. 22; xli. 11; Ezek. xxx. 21.) Asa, being diseased in his feet, and having applied to physicians, is upbraided with it, as contrary to that confidence which he ought to have had in the Lord, 1 Kings xv. 23; 2 Chron. xvi. 12. Hezekiah, having a bile, probably a pestilential one, was cured by Isaiah, on the application of a cataplasm of figs, 2 Kings xx. 7; Isa. xxxviii. 21. But there was no remedy known for the leprosy, or for distempers which were the consequences of incontinence. When Job was afflicted with a very terrible distemper, we hear no mention of recourse to physic or to physicians; his malady was looked upon as an immediate stroke from the hand of God. The low state of the art of medicine, with the persuasion that distempers were effects of God's anger, or were caused by evil spirits, was the reason that in extraordinary maladies the sufferers applied to diviners, magicians, enchanters, or false gods. Sometimes they applied to the prophets of the Lord for cure; or, at least, to know whether they should recover or not. When Abaziah, king of Israel, by a fall from the roof of his house, was greatly hurt, he sent to consult the false god Baal-zebub at Ekron, 2 Kings i. 2, &c. Jeremiah (viii. 17.) speaks of enchantments used against the biting of serpents, and other venomous animals. Hazael was sent by the king of Syria to consult Elisha the prophet as to the issue of his distemper, 2 Kings viii. 8. Naaman the Syrian came into the land of Israel, to obtain from Elisha a cure for his leprosy, 2 Kings v. 5, 6. And when our Saviour appeared in Palestine, although there can be no doubt that there were physicians in the country, it is evident that the people placed but little confidence in them. (Comp. Mark v. 26; Luke viii. 43.) They brought to our Saviour and his apostles multitudes of diseased people from all parts of the land.

MEDITATE, to think closely and seriously on any thing. The chief employment of the just is to meditate on the law of God day and night, Psalm i. 2.

MEEKNESS, a calm, serene temper of mind, not easily ruffled or provoked; a disposition that suffers injuries without desire of revenge, and quietly acquiesces in the dispensations and will of God, Col. iii. 12. This temper of mind is admirably fitted to discover, to consider, and to entertain truth, (Jam. i. 21.) and is ranked among the fruits of the Spirit, Gal. v. 23.

MEGIDDO, a city of Manasseh, (Josh. xvii. 11; Judg. i. 27.) famous for the defeat of king Josiah, (2 Kings xxiii. 29, 30,) who was overcome and mortally wounded there by Pharaoh-necho, king of Egypt. Herodotus, speaking of this victory, says that Necho obtained it at Magdolos. The waters of Megiddo are mentioned in Judg. v. 19.

Megiddo was certainly in, or near, the great plain of Esdraelon, which had been the scene of many bat-des; as of Gideon with the Midianites, of Saul with the Philistines, of Josiah with Pharaoh-necho, of Judas Maccabæus with Tryphon; (1 Mac. xii. 49, &c.) as in later ages it was of combats between the Tartars and Saracens. It is alluded to under this character, Rev. xvi. 16. For a fuller account of the topography of Megiddo and its vicinity, see the Biblical Repository, vol. i. p. 602.

MELCHISEDEC, king of justice, king of Salem, and priest of the Most High God. Scripture tells us nothing of his father, or of his mother, or of his genealogy, or of his birth, or of his death, Heb. vii. 1—3. And in this sense he was, as Paul says, a figure of Jesus Christ, who is a priest for ever, according to the order of Melchisedec; and not according to the order of Aaron, whose origin, consecration, life and death are known.

When Abraham returned from pursuing the confederate kings, (Gen. xiv. 17.) Melchisedec came to meet him as far as the valley of Shaveh, (afterwards named the King's Valley,) and presented him refreshments of bread and wine; or he offered bread and wine in sacrifice to the Lord, for he was priest of the Most High God. And he blessed Abraham, saying, "Blessed be Abraham of the Most High God, possessor of heaven and earth; and blessed be the Most High God, who hath delivered thine enemies into thy hand." Abraham, desirous to acknowledge in him the quality of priest of the Lord, offered him tithes of all he had taken from the enemy. After this there is no mention of the person of Melchisedec; only the psalmist, (ex. 4.) speaking of the Messiah, says, "Thou art a priest for ever, after the order of Melchisedec." Paul (Heb. v. 6, 10.) unfolds the mystery of Melchisedec. First, he exalts the priesthood of Christ, as a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec—who in this quality, "in the days of his flesh, offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears, unto him that was able to save him from death; and was heard in that he feared," ver. 7. He also says, that our Saviour as a forerunner is entered for us into heaven, being made a high-priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec. "For," he adds, "to this Melchisedec, king of Salem, and priest of the Most High God, Abraham gave tithes. Now Melchisedec is according to the interpretation of his name; first, king of (Tsadek) justice; secondly, king of (Salem) peace; who is without father, without mother, without genealogy; who has neither beginning nor end of life. Consider, therefore, how great this Melchisedec is, since Abraham himself gives him tithes, and receives his blessing. Moreover, Levi, who (now) receives tithes from others, paid them himself, as one may say, in the person of Abraham, since he was in the loins of Abraham his ancestor, when Melchisedec met that patriarch."

Jerome thought that Salem, of which Melchisedec was king, was not Jerusalem, but the city of Salem, near Scythopolis; and where he thinks Jacob arrived after his passage over Jordan, when returning from Mesopotamia, Gen. xxxiii. 18. But the majority of interpreters differ from Jerome in this.

The person of Melchisedec presents an interesting subject of inquiry. He has been variously supposed to be the Holy Spirit, the Son of God, an angel, Enoch, and Shem. [But the safest and most probable opinion is that, which considers Melchisedec as a righteous and peaceful king, a worshipper and priest of the Most High God, in the land of Canaan; a friend of Abraham, and of a rank elevated above him. This opinion, indeed, lies upon the face of the sacred record in Gen. xiv. and Heb. vii.; and it is the only one which can be defended on any tolerable grounds of interpretation. What can be more improbable than all the opinions above enumerated? The most popular of them all, viz. that Melchisedec was Christ, would of course force us to adopt the interpretation in Heb. vii. that 'Christ was like himself'; and that a comparison is there formally instituted between Christ and himself! the mere mention of which is its best refutation. That Melchisedec was Shem has been very elaborately, but fancifully, supported by Mr. Taylor; for whose remarks those who may wish to peruse them are referred to the quarto edition of Calmet, Fragm. 660, seq. (See Stuart's Comm. on the Ep. to the Hebrews, vol. ii. Excurs. iii. p. 364.) *R.

MELITA, see MALTA.

MEMBER properly denotes a part of the natural body, 1 Cor. xii. 12—25. Figuratively, sensual affections, like a body consisting of many members; (Rom. vii. 23.) also, true believers, members of Christ's mystical body, as forming one society or body, of which Christ is the head, Eph. iv. 25.

MEMPHIS, see NOPH.

MENAHEN, see MANAHEN.

MENE, a Chaldean word, signifying he has numbered, or he has counted. At a feast which Belshazzar gave to his courtiers and concubines, where he profaned the sacred vessels of the temple of Jerusalem, which Nebuchadnezzar had carried to Babylon, there appeared on the wall a form like a hand, writing these words, Mene mene, tekel, upharsin; (God has numbered, has weighed and divided). Daniel explained this ill-boding inscription to the king, Dan. v. 25, seq. See BELSHAZAR.

MENI, an idol, worshipped by the idolatrous Jews in Babylon, and in honor of which, along with Gad, they held festivals and lectisternia, Is. lxx. 11. Meni, in the opinion of the best interpreters, was most probably the same as Astarte or the planet Venus, which occurs in the astrological mythology as the second star of fortune, along with the planet Jupiter, (Gad, or Baal.) (See ASTAROTH I. and BAAL, p. 121.) Jeremiah (vii. 18; xlv. 17, 18.) speaks of her as queen of heaven, and, with Isaiah, (lxv. 11. Heb.) shows that her worship was popular in Palestine, and among the Hebrews. She was worshipped by the Phenicians and Carthaginians, from whom Israel learned her worship. Isaiah reproaches them with setting up a table to Gad—fortune, good fortune, or the lord of fortune—and with making libations to Meni. Jeremiah says, that in honor of the queen of heaven, the fathers light the fire, the mothers knead the cakes, and the children gather the wood to bake them. Elsewhere, the Israelites declared to Jeremiah, that notwithstanding his remonstrances, they would continue to honor the queen of heaven, by oblations, as their fathers had done before them; and that ever since they had left off to sacrifice to the queen of heaven, they had been consumed by the sword and by famine. [But it must not be denied that many interpreters have referred both Meni and Astarte to the moon; of which the following remarks may serve as an illustration. R.

We see by Strabo, (lib. xii.) that mên, the month, or moon, had several temples in Asia Minor, and in Persia, and that they often swore by the mên of the king, that is, by his fortune. "As the worship of Diana Luna, or the moon, was very famous among the Greeks and Romans, so was that of the god Lunus in the East. There are a great many monuments of him; he was named Mên (Μην) in Greek, and honored by this name in Phrygia, where was a place, according to Athenæus, (lib. iii. p. 47.) called Μηνος ὁδός, 'The Street of Mên'; that is, of the god Lunus. Men also signifies a month in Greek; and there was a temple of Mên, or Lunus, in this place. We see also the god Mên, or Lunus, on several medals of the towns of Lydia, Pisidia and Phrygia. On a medal of Antiochus, struck in Pisidia, the god Lunus hath a spear in one hand, and holds a Victory in the other, and hath a cock, a symbol of the rising sun, at his feet. Spartian, in his life of Caracalla, says, that prince came to Carrhæ [Charra] on his birth-day, in honor to the god Lunus. He adds further, that the people of Carrhæ did still say, what had formerly been written by learned authors, that 'they who call the moon by a feminine word, and consider her as a woman, will be always addicted to women and subject to their command; but those who think the moon to be a male god, will have the dominion over women, and suffer nothing by their intrigues;' hence he concludes, that it comes to pass, that the Greeks and Egyptians, though they name the moon by a word of the feminine gender, in common discourse, yet in their mysteries they call him a male god." (Montfaucon, Antiq. Expl. Suppl. vol. 1.) See IDOLATRY.

MEPHAATH, a city of Reuben, (Josh. xiii. 18.) yielded to the Levites of the family of Merari, Josh. xxi. 37.

I. MEPHIBOSHETH, a son of Saul, and his concubine Rizpah, who was delivered by David to the Gibeonites, to be hanged before the Lord, 2 Sam. xxi. 8, 9.

II. MEPHIBOSHETH, a son of Jonathan, also called Merib-baal. (See MERIB-BAAL.) Mephibosheth was very young when his father was killed in the battle of Gilboa, (2 Sam. iv. 4.) and his nurse was in such consternation at the news, that she let the child fall, who from this accident was lame all his life. When David found himself in peaceable possession of the kingdom, he sought for all that remained of the house of Saul, that he might show them kindness, in consideration of the friendship between him and Jonathan. He told Mephibosheth, that for the sake of Jonathan his father, he should have his grandfather's estate, and eat always at the royal table, 2 Sam. ix. 1, &c. Some years after this, when Absalom drove his father from Jerusalem, Mephibosheth ordered his servant Ziba to saddle him an ass, that he might accompany David; for being lame, he could not go on foot. But Ziba himself went after David, with two asses laden with provisions, and reported that Mephibosheth staid at Jerusalem, in hopes that the people of Israel would restore him to the throne of his ancestors. David, thus deceived, said to Ziba, I give to you all that belonged to Mephibosheth. When David returned to Jerusalem in peace, Mephibosheth appeared before him in deep mourning, having neither washed his feet, nor shaved his beard, since the king went, and David then discovered the truth. Nevertheless Ziba continued to possess half his estate. Mephibosheth left a son named Micha; but the time of his death is not known, 1 Chron. viii. 34.

MERAB, or MEROB, the eldest daughter of king Saul, was promised to David in marriage, in reward for his victory over Goliath; but was given to Adriel, son of Barzillai the Meholathite, 1 Sam. xiv. 49; xviii. 17, 19. Merab had six sons by him, who were delivered to the Gibeonites and hanged before the Lord. The text intimates, that the six men delivered to the Gibeonites, were sons of Michal, daughter of Saul, and wife of Adriel; but see under ADRIEL.

MERAIOTH, a priest of the race of Aaron, son of Zerabiah, and father of Amariah, among the high-priests, 1 Chron. vi. 6.

MERAN, or MERRHA, a people of Arabia, Baruch iii. 23.

MERCURY, a fabulous god of the ancient heathen, the messenger of the celestials, and the deity that presided over learning, eloquence, and traffic. The Greeks named him Hermes, an interpreter, because they considered him as interpreter of the will of the gods. Probably, it was for this reason that the people of Lystra, having heard Paul preach, and having seen him heal a lame man, would have offered sacrifice to him, as to their god Mercury; and to Barnabas as Jupiter, because of his venerable aspect, Acts xiv. 11.

MERCY, a virtue which inspires us with compassion for others, and inclines us to assist them in their necessities. That works of mercy may be acceptable to God, as Christ has promised, (Matt. v. 7.) it is not enough that they proceed from a natural sentiment of humanity, but they must be performed for the sake of God, and from truly pious motives. In Scripture, mercy and truth are commonly joined together, to show the goodness that precedes, and the faithfulness that accompanies, the promises; or, a goodness, a clemency, a mercy that is constant and faithful, and that does not deceive. Mercy is also taken for favors and benefits received from God or man; for probity, justice, goodness. Merciful men, in Hebrew chasdim, are men of piety and goodness. Mercy is often taken for giving of alms, Prov. xiv. 34; xvi. 6; Zach. vii. 9.

Mercy, as derived from miseriordia, may import that sympathetic sense of the suffering of another by which the heart is affected. It is one of the noblest attributes of Deity, speaking after the manner of men, and explaining what, by supposition, may pass in the mind of God, by what passes in the human mind. The object of mercy is misery: so God pities human misery, and forbears to chastise severely: so man pities the misery of a fellow man, and assists to diminish it: so public officers occasionally moderate the strictness of national laws, from pity to the culprit. But only those can hope for mercy, who express penitence, and solicit mercy: the impenitent, the stubborn, the obdurate, rather brave the avenging hand of justice, than beseech the relieving hand of mercy.

MERCY-SEAT. The Hebrew כפרת, capporeth, comes from the verb cáphar, to expiate, to pardon sins; to cover, to harden any thing. It may be rendered, a covering; and indeed it was the cover of the ark of the covenant, or of the sacred chest in which the laws of the covenant were contained. At each end of this cover was a cherub of beaten gold; which, stretching out their wings towards each other, formed a kind of throne, where the Lord was considered as sitting. Hence the Hebrews invoked him sometimes as, he "who sitteth upon the cherubim." And perhaps, by translating capporeth by propitiatory or mercy-seat, it may be intimated, that from thence the Lord hears the prayers of his people, and pardons their sins; while, by translating it oracle, as Jerome and others have done, they would show, that from hence he manifested his will and pleasure, and gave responses, as he did to Moses.

From the similitudes connected with this term in the New Testament, it is scarcely possible to attach too much consequence to it; nor can the few words of Calmet do it justice, though they may contribute to explain its nature and import. The root of the term ἱλάσσω, hilasko, signifies to placate, to pacify, to at-one, to reconcile; or that intervening, or mediating power, or thing, or consideration, by which two parties at variance are reconciled. So Heb. ii. 17, "To make reconciliation, (ἱλάσσομαι) for the sins of the people;" and (Luke xviii. 13.) the publican prayed, "God be merciful, ἱλάσθητι, be reconciled to, be at one with me, a sinner." (Comp. LXX. Psalm xxv. 11; lxxviii. 38; Dan. ix. 19.) The propitiation (ἱλόσιος) is properly an offering from one party to another, which possesses the power, or property, or influence of reconciling, or re-uniting those who have been separated by offences. It answers to רמית, remission, forgiveness, (Psalm cxxx. 4; Dan. ix. 9.) and to כפרית, Numb. v. 8, "the raim of atonement, whereby an atonement shall be made for his sins." So in 2 Mac. iii. 33, certain of Heliodorus's friends prayed Onias that he would call on the Most High to grant him his life: "So the high-priest offered a sacrifice for a man's restoration to health. Now, as the high-priest was making an atonement,"—rather the atonement, (τον ἱλοσίου), that is, by means of the sacrifice. And this term is expressly applied to Christ, by the evangelist John (1 Epist. ii. 2; iv. 10.) "He is a propitiation, a means of at-one-ment, for our sins, and not for ours only, nor for those of the Jewish nation only, as were the sacrifices offered on the day of expiation, but for the whole world."—"God sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins," in other words "that we might live through him," (verse 9.) that is, through his death, as the propitiating, the mediating sacrifice. By the way, this allusion seems to suppose the rite of expiation to be in a course of performance, at the time when this epistle was written.

Upon the whole, it seems that, if we read reconciliation-residence, seat, or lid of the ark, we should come the nearest to the true idea of this subject: for it was not a seat from whence was dispensed mercy only, but oracles; and those were occasionally threatenings, i. e. until reconciliation was made; but it was the station of a person understood to be there constantly present, where he might be reconciled to those who entreated him: this was the place for those who wished for reconciliation to apply for it; and this reconciliation-seat was itself occasionally at-one-ed with the people, &c. as when the blood of at-one-ment was sprinkled upon it, on the great day of expiation. The apostle declares, (Rom. iii. 25.) that "God had set forth Jesus Christ to be an ἱλαστήριον, a reconciliation-residence, through faith in his blood," i. e. as God was understood to be constantly on the mercy-seat of old, there to be at-one-ed, so is he now in Christ; who is his residence for the same blessed purpose—that of at-one-ment.

Hilasterion is certainly taken for the mercy-seat in Heb. ix. 5, "And over it (the ark of the covenant) the cherubim of glory shadowing the mercy-seat, ἱλαστήριον." Nevertheless, it may be doubted whether Christ is, strictly speaking, assimilated to the mercy-seat itself, and not rather to the sacrifice by which that mercy-seat was understood to be reconciled to the people who had offended. For it seems very harsh to say, that the victim which effected reconciliation was the same with one of the parties to be reconciled; but the mercy-seat, accepted figuratively for the Supreme Deity, who sat on it, was a party to be reconciled. Moreover, the apostle, alluding to the rite of expiation in the passage above quoted, (Rom. iii. 25.) says, "whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation (ἱλαστήριον) through faith in his blood,"—the victim had blood; but the mercy-seat had none; and to say that the blood sprinkled on the mercy-seat, is the blood of the mercy-seat, is to force a sense on the passage. Yet the term has been so understood by many; among whom, Theodoret, Le Clerc and Luther; for the other explanation are the Vulgate version, Chrysostom, Theophylact, Erasmus, &c. and it seems, on the whole, to be the easiest, the most consistent, and the best supported sense.

MERIBAH, strife or contention, the name given to the station at or near Replidim, where the people murmured for water, and Moses struck the rock, where it gushed out, Exod. xvii. 1—7. Dr. Shaw feels confident that he has discovered this extraordinary stone, at Replidim, and has furnished a particular account of it in his Travels. See EXODUS, p. 405, 410, and REPHIDIM.

MERI-BAAI, or MERIB-BAAI, son of Jonathan; (I Chron. viii. 34; ix. 40.) elsewhere called Mephibosheth. This difference of name has most probably arisen from some corruption; though many suppose that the Hebrews scrupled pronouncing the name of Baal; so that instead of Mephi-baal or Meri-baal, they chose to say Mephi-bosheth, or Meri-bosheth; Bosheth in Hebrew signifying shame, confusion.

MERODACH, an ancient king of Babylon, placed among the gods, and worshipped by the Babylonians; or more probably, according to the analogy of the other Babylonian divinities, one of the planets, e. g. Mars. Jeremiah (l. 2.) speaking of the ruin of Babylon, says, "Babylon is taken, Bel is confounded, Merodach is broken in pieces, her idols are confounded, her images are broken in pieces." We find certain kings of Babylon, whose names comprise that of Merodach; as Evil-Merodach, and Merodach-Baladan. See BERODACH.

MEROM, the waters of Merom, (Josh. xi. 5.) or lake of Semechon, is the most northern of the three lakes supplied by the river Jordan. It is situate in a valley, called the Ard Houle, formed by the two branches of mount Hermon. The lake is now called after the valley, the lake of Houle. In summer this lake is for the most part dry, and covered with shrubs and grass, in which lions, bears, and other wild beasts conceal themselves. See JORDAN, and CANAAN, p. 232.

MEROZ, (Judg. v. 23.) a place in the neighborhood of the brook Kishon, whose inhabitants, refusing to assist their brethren when they fought against Sisera, were put under anathema.

MESSECH, see MESNECH.

I. MESHA, (Gen. x. 30.) the same, probably, as mount Masius. The sons of Joktan possessed the whole country between mount Masius and the mountains of Sephar, or Sepharvaim. [Among all the various conjectures as to the place designated by the name of Mesha, that of Michaelis (Spicileg. pt. ii. p. 214.) is still the most probable, viz. that Mesha is the region around Bassora, which the later Syrians called Maision, and the Greeks Mesene. Under these names they included the country on the Euphrates and Tigris between Selencia and the Persian gulf. Abulfeda mentions in this region two cities not far from Bassora, called Maisan and Mushan. Here, then, was probably the north-eastern border of the district inhabited by the Joktanites. The name of the opposite limit, Sephar, signifies in Chaldee shore, coast, and is probably the western part of Yemen, along the Arabian gulf, now called by the Arabs Tehamah. The range of high and mountainous country between these two borders Moses calls 'the mount of the east,' or eastern mountains,—in reference either to Palestine or to Yemen, i. e. Sephar. It is also called by the Arabs Djebel, i. e. mountains, to the present day. (See Rosenm. Bib. Geogr. III. p. 163.) R.

II. MESHA, king of Moab, (2 Kings iii. 4.) paid Ahab, king of Israel, a tribute of a hundred thousand lambs, and as many rams, with their fleeces. After the death of Ahab, however, he revolted against Jehoram, king of Israel, who declared war against him, and called to his assistance Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, who, with the king of Idumea, then in subjection to him, marched against Mesha, and forced him to retire to Areopolis, his capital. Here they besieged him so closely that, not being able to escape through the camp of the Idumæans, which he attacked, he took his own son, the presumptive heir to his crown, brought him upon the wall of the city, and was going to sacrifice him. The kings of Judah, Israel and Edom, seeing this, retired without taking the town, but making a great spoil in the land of Moab.

In a communication from sir John Shore, now lord Teignmouth, the governor-general, to the society at Calcutta, he mentions a custom of the Brahmins, of sitting at a person's door, with some implement of suicide in their hands, and threatening to kill themselves, unless that which they demand be granted to them: this, when their demand is not excessive, is usually complied with, through fear of their self-murder. After which his excellency relates the following history, as it appeared on a trial before the English court of justice. It will elucidate the otherwise unaccountable conduct of Mesha:—

"Beechuk and Adher were two Brahmins, and zemindars, or proprietors of landed estates, the extent of which did not exceed eight acres. The village in which they resided was the property of many other zemindars. A dispute which originated in a competition for the general superintendence of the revenues of the village, had long subsisted between the two brothers, and a person named Gowry. The officer of government, who had conferred this charge upon the latter, was intimidated into a revocation of it, (by the threats of the mother of Beechuk and Adher to swallow poison,) as well as to a transfer of the management to the two Brahmins. By the same means of intimidation, he was deterred from investigating the complaint of Gowry, which had been referred to his inquiry by his superior authority. But the immediate cause which instigated these two Brahmins to murder their mother, was an act of violence said to have been committed by the emissaries of Gowry, (with or without his authority, and employed by him for a different purpose,) in entering their house during their absence at night, and carrying off forty rupees, the property of Beechuk and Adher, from the apartments of their women. Beechuk first returned to his house; where his mother, his wife and his sister-in-law related what had happened. He immediately conducted his mother to an adjacent rivulet, where being joined in the gray of the morning by his brother Adher, they called out aloud to the people of the village, that although they would overlook the assault, as an act that could not be remedied, yet the forty rupees must be returned. To this exclamation no answer was received; nor is there any certainty that it was even heard by any person; nevertheless, Beechuk, without any further hesitation, drew his cimeter, and at one stroke severed his mother's head from her body; with the professed view, as entertained and avowed both by parent and son, that the mother's spirit, excited by the beating of a large drum during forty days, might for ever haunt, torment, and pursue to death, Gowry and the others concerned with him. The last words which the mother pronounced were, that 'she would blast the said Gowry, and those concerned with him.' The violence asserted to have been committed by the emissaries of Gowry, in forcibly entering the female apartments of Beechuk and Adher, might be deemed an indignity of high provocation; but they appear to have considered this outrage as of less importance than the loss of the money, which might, and would, have been recovered, with due satisfaction, by application to the court of justice at Benares. The act which they perpetrated had no other sanction than what was derived from the local prejudices of the place where they resided: it was a crime against their religion; and the two brothers themselves quoted an instance of a Brahmin, who, six or seven years before, had lost his caste, and all intercourse with the other Brahmins, for an act of the same nature. But in truth, Beechuk and Adher, although Brahmins, had no knowledge or education suitable to the high distinctions of their caste, of which they preserved the pride only; being as grossly ignorant and prejudiced as the meanest peasants in any part of the world. They seemed surprised when they heard the doom of forfeiture of caste pronounced against them by a learned Pundit, and they openly avowed that so far from conceiving they had committed a barbarous crime, both they and their mother considered this act as a vindication of their honor, not liable to any religious penalty." (Asiatic Researches, vol. iv.)

Sir John Shore gives two other instances of a like nature; one of which is, the murder of a daughter by a Brahmin who was provoked by an adversary. These instances are all of Brahmins; and probably are not general in India; but the idea connected with them appears to be of ancient date, and are similar to the action of the king of Moab, failing in his attempt to repulse his assailants; "he took his eldest son, who should have reigned in his stead, and offered him up, a whole burnt-offering [ascension-offering] upon the wall. And great was the foaming with rage upon Israel. And they (the kings of Edom and Judah) went away from off him, and returned to their own land." Does our extract suggest a reason why the king of Moab offered his son on the wall—publicly? i. e. that it might plainly appear to the attacking armies to what straits they had reduced him, q. d. "You see the whole process: the child brought out, the wood, the fire, the bloody knife; why will you force me to the slaughter? do you proceed? let his imberbered spirit haunt you, terrify you, blast you even to death." If these Brahmins thought they had such a right over the life of their mother, with her consent, might not the king of Moab think he had such a right over the life of his son? who, perhaps, was hero enough voluntarily to suffer it, like the son of Idomeneus, in Fenelon's Telemachus. Also, from whence was the "foaming rage" against Israel? no doubt from Moab, thus deprived of her prince; but, probably, also from Edom, q. d. "These Israelites, not having such customs among themselves, despise our institutions; they push this king to extremities, and call his behavior superstitious, profane, impious; whereas we, being aware of this custom, and indeed respecting it, sympathize with the distressed king, and hate those who abominate what he is doing." Is not this a natural solution of the difficulty, Whence was this rage? and why, and wherefore Israel returned disgusted, as it should seem, into their own land? Did Edom also suppose itself to be haunted by the spirit of this sacrifice, and, feeling this terror, flee to avoid it, at the same time cursing Israel, who had brought it upon them? If this conjecture be applicable, the king of Moab did not merely by this sacrifice implore assistance from his gods; but he took this method of terrifying his adversaries, after his own personal valor had proved ineffectual to deliver himself and his country from them.

The reader will notice more particularly the ideas of the Brahmins, as related by sir John Shore, on the disposal of the life of another person; especially of a parent's power over the life of his child, (which, in the instance given by sir John, was without the child's consent, the daughter being an infant,) as perhaps it may be found to bear pretty strongly on some circumstances noticed in Scripture. It is certain, that parental power extended even to the depriving a child of life among the Romans, the Gauls, the Persians, and other ancient nations.

I. MESHECH, or MESHACH, the sixth son of Japheth, (Gen. x. 2.) supposed to be the father of the Moschi, a people between Iberia, Armenia and Colchis; or, as others believe, of the Muscovites. (See Gen. x. 2; Ezek. xxvii. 13; xxxii. 26; xxxviii. 2, 3; xxxix. 1.)

II. MESHECH, a son of Aram, Gen. x. 23.

MESOPOTAMIA, the Greek name of ARAM-NANANAIM, a country between the two rivers; a famous province, situated between the rivers Tigris and Euphrates, and celebrated in Scripture as the first dwelling of men after the deluge. It gave birth to Phaleg, Heber, Terah, Abraham, Nahor, Sarah, Rebekah, Rachel, Leah, and the sons of Jacob. The plains of Shinar were in this country; and it was often called Mesopotamia Syria, because it was inhabited by the Arameans, or Syrians; and sometimes Padan-aram, (Gen. xxviii. 2, &c.) the plains of Aram; or Seder-aram, the fields of Aram; to distinguish the fertile plains from the uncultivated mountains of the country. Balaam, son of Beor, was of Mesopotamia, (Deut. xxviii. 4.) whose king Chushamrathaim subdued the Hebrews after the death of Joshua, Judg. iii. 8. Mesopotamia was afterwards seized by the Assyrians, and continued united to the empire till its dissolution. It frequently formed part of the Medo-Persian, Macedonian and Parthian empires; and is now comprised in modern Persia.

MESSIAH, or MESSIAS, anointed, a title given principally, or by way of eminence, to that sovereign deliverer formerly and still expected by the Jews. (See CHRIST.) They used to anoint their kings, high-priests, and sometimes prophets, when they were set apart to their office; and hence the phrase, to anoint for an employment, sometimes signifies merely a particular designation or choice for such an employment. Cyrus, who founded the empire of the Persians, and who set the Jews at liberty, is called (Isa. xlv. 1.) "the anointed of the Lord;" and in Ezek. xxxviii. 14. the name of Messiah is given to the king of Tyre.

But as we have already observed, Messiah is the designation given by the Hebrews, eminently, to that Saviour and Deliverer whom they expected, and who was promised to them by all the prophets. As the holy unction was given to kings, priests and prophets, by describing the promised Saviour of the world under the name of Christ, Anointed, or Messiah, it was sufficiently evidenced, that the qualities of king, prophet and high-priest would eminently centre in him; and that he should exercise them not only over the Jews, but over all mankind; and particularly over those who should receive him as their Saviour. Peter and the other believers, being assembled together, (Acts iv. 27.) quote from Psalm ii, "Why did the heathen rage, and the people imagine vain things? The kings of the earth stood up, and the rulers gathered together against the Lord, and against his Christ. For of a truth against thy holy child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles, and the people of Israel, were gathered together." Luke says, (iv. 18.) that our Saviour, entering a synagogue at Nazareth, opened the book of the prophet Isaiah, where he read, "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor." After which he showed them, that this prophecy was accomplished in his own person. Such, too, was the uniform testimony of all the apostles.

It is not recorded that our Saviour Jesus Christ ever received an external unction. The unction that the prophets and the apostles speak of, is the spiritual and internal unction of grace, and of the Holy Ghost, of which the outward unction, with which kings, priests, and prophets were anciently anointed, was but the figure or symbol. He united in his own person the offices of king, prophet and priest, and eminently included in himself whatever the law and the prophets had promised or prefigured, that was most excellent or most perfect. Christians, his disciples and his children, enjoy, in some sense, the same prerogatives, by the anointing of the Holy Spirit, 1 Pet. ii. 9.

The ancient Hebrews, being instructed by the prophets, had clear notions of the Messiah; but these were gradually depraved, so that when Jesus appeared in Judea, the Jews entertained a false conception of the Messiah, expecting a temporal monarch and conqueror, who should remove the Roman yoke, and subject the whole world. Hence they were scandalized at the outward appearance, the humility, and seeming weakness of our Saviour; and the modern Jews, indulging still greater mistakes, form to themselves chimerical ideas of the Messiah, utterly unknown to their forefathers. See CHRIST.

Our Saviour gave warning to his disciples, that false prophets and false Messiahs should arise; (Mark xiii. 22.) that they should perform signs and wonders, by which even the elect themselves would be in danger. The event has verified his prediction. Every age among the Jews has produced false prophets, and false Christs, who have succeeded in deceiving many of that nation. One appeared even in the age of Christ himself; Simon Magus, who reported at Samaria that he was the great power of God, Acts viii. 9. In the following century Barchochebas, by his impostures, drew down on the Jews the most terrible persecution; and since his time several others have appeared, and succeeded in imposing upon the credulity of this infatuated people.

METHUSAEL, son of Mehujael, of the race of Cain, Gen. iv. 18.

METHUSELAH, son of Enoch, (Gen. v. 21, 22.) was born A. M. 687: he begat Lamech A. M. 874, and died A. M. 1656, aged 969 years; the greatest age attained by any man. The year of his death was that of the deluge.

MEZUZOTH is a name the Jews give to certain pieces of parchment, which they fix on the door-posts of their houses; taking literally what Moses says, Deut. vi. 9, 11, 13, "Thou shalt never forget the laws of thy God, but thou shalt write them on the posts of thy house, and on thy gates." They pretend, that to avoid making themselves ridiculous, by writing the commandments of God without their doors, or rather to avoid exposing them to profanation, they ought to write them on parchment, and to enclose it. Therefore they write these words on a square piece of prepared parchment, with a particular ink, and a square kind of character, Deut. vi. 4—9. "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord," &c. Then they leave a little space, and afterwards go on, to Deut. xi. 13. "And it shall come to pass, if thou shalt hearken diligently to my commandments," &c. as far as, "thou shalt write them upon the door-posts of thy house." After this they roll up the parchment, put it into a case, and write on it Shaddai, which is one of the names of God, and then attach it to the doors of their houses and chambers, and to the knocker of the door on the right side. As often as they pass, they touch it in this place with their finger, which they afterwards kiss. The Hebrew mezuca properly signifies a door-post of a house, but is a name also given to this roll of parchment.

I. MICAH, the Morasthite, or of Mareslah, (q. v.) a village near Eleutheropolis, in the south of Judah, is the seventh in order of the lesser prophets. He prophesied under Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, for about 50 years; from about A. M. 3245, or the beginning of the reign of Jotham, to A. M. 3306, or the last year of Hezekiah. He was nearly contemporary with Isaiah, and has some expressions in common with him. (Compare Isaiah ii. 2, with Micah iv. 1, and Isaiah xli. 15, with Micah iv. 13.) The extant prophecy of Micah contains but seven chapters. He first foretells the calamities of Samaria; afterwards he prophesies against Judah and Samaria; and then foretells the captivity of the ten tribes, and their return. The third chapter contains a pathetic invective against the princes of the house of Jacob, and the judges of the house of Israel. We are informed by Jeremiah (xxvi. 18, 19, &c.) that this prophecy was pronounced in the time of Hezekiah, and that in the days of Jehoiakim it protected Jeremiah from death, who prophesied much the same things against Jerusalem as Micah had done. After these terrible denunciations, Micah speaks of the reign of the Messiah. And as the peaceable times which succeeded the return from the Babylonish captivity, and which prefigured the reign of the Messiah, were disturbed by a tempest of short continuance, Micah foretold it in a manner which agrees closely with what Ezekiel says of the war of Gog against the saints, and which Calmet thinks had relation to the reign of Cambyzes, or the war of Holofernes. He also speaks particularly of the birth of the Messiah (v. 2, 3, &c.) at Bethlehem, whose dominion was to extend over the earth. The two last chapters contain a long invective against the iniquities of Samaria, the fall of Babylon, and predictions of the re-establishment of Israel, and in such lofty terms, as chiefly agree with the state of the Christian church.

We know nothing authentic of Micah's death. He has been, by some, confounded with Micaiah son of Imlah, who lived in the kingdom of the ten tribes, under the reign of Ahab.

II. MICAH, of Ephraim, son of a rich widow, who became an occasion of falling to Israel, (Judg. xvii. xviii.) by making an ephod (or priestly habit) and images of metal, for a domestic chapel. He made one of his own sons priest; and afterwards a young Levite. It is believed this happened in the interval, after the death of Joshua, and the elders that succeeded him, till Othniel judged Israel. During this time the tribe of Dan, being straitened in their inheritance, sent six hundred men to seek a more convenient settlement. They passed by Micah's house, on the mountains of Ephraim, and desired the Levite who resided there, to inquire of the Lord about the success of their expedition. He answered them, that the Lord would prosper their undertaking. They came a second time to the house of Micah; and having persuaded the priest to join their party, they took away the ephod and the graven images. See DAN.

MICAH, son of Inlah, of Ephraim, and a prophet, who lived in the time of Ahab. Having foretold the issue of this prince's expedition against Ramoth-Gilead, he was delivered over to ANION, the governor of Samaria, with orders that he should be fed with the bread of grief, and water of affliction, till Ahab returned in peace. Micah answered, "If thou return at all in peace, the Lord has not spoken by me;" and the event justified his prediction, 1 Kings xxii. 7, seq.

MICHAEL, the name given to the archangel who is represented as presiding over the Jewish nation. (See ANGEL, p. 60.) Jude (9, 10.) speaks of his contending with the devil, and disputing about the body of Moses; an expression which has given rise to many opinions. Without detailing these, we remark, that the opinion of Macknight seems to be the most reasonable, and the least liable to exception.

In Dan. x. 13—21, and xii. 1, Michael, he remarks, is spoken of as one of the chief angels, who took care of the Israelites as a nation: he may, therefore, he thinks, have been "the angel of the Lord," before whom Joshua the high-priest is said to have stood, "Satan being at his right hand to resist him;" (Zech. iii. 1.) namely, in his design of restoring the Jewish church and state, called by Jude, 'the body of Moses,' just as the Christian church is called by Paul, 'the body of Christ.' Zechariah adds, "And the Lord," that is, the angel of the Lord, as is plain from ver. 1, "said unto Satan, The Lord rebuketh thee, O Satan! even the Lord who hath chosen Jerusalem, rebuketh thee!" Dr. A. Clarke adopts this view of the passage, and adds to the remarks of Macknight the following: "Among the Hebrews, goph, body, is often used for a thing itself; so Rom. vii. 24, the body of sin, signifies sin itself. So the body of Moses may signify Moses himself; or that in which he was particularly concerned; namely, his institutes, religion, &c.

MICHAL, daughter of Saul, and wife of David, 1 Sam. xviii. 20; xix. 11. See DAVID, p. 335.

MICHMAS, a city of Ephraim, on the confines of Benjamin, (Ezra ii. 27; Neh. vii. 31.) called also MICHMASH, 1 Sam. xiii. 2; Isa. x. 28. (Compare Neh. xi. 31.) Eusebius says, it was, in his time, a considerable place, about nine miles from Jerusalem, towards Rama.

MICHMETHAN, or MACHMETHATH, a city of the half-tribe of Manasseh, on the frontiers of Ephraim and Manasseh; over against Shechem, Josh. xvi. 6; xvii. 7.

MIDIAN, fourth son of Abraham and Keturah, (Gen. xxv. 2.) and father of the Midianites, mentioned Numb. xxii. 4, 7; xxv. 15; xxxi. 2, &c. whose daughters seduced Israel to the worshipping of Baal-peor. The Midianites, who were overcome by Hadad, son of Bedad, king of Edom, (Gen. xxxvi. 35.) and those who oppressed Israel, and were defeated by Gideon, (Judg. vi. 1, &c.; vii. 1, 2.) were also descended from him. Their capital city was called Midian, and its remains were to be seen in the time of Jerome and Eusebius. It was situated on the Arnon, south of the city Ar, or Areopolis. The Lord, intending to punish the Midianites, because their daughters had seduced Israel to the worship of Peor, directed Moses to take a thousand men out of each tribe, and send them under the command of Phinehas, son of the high-priest Eleazar, to execute vengeance upon them. Phinehas marched, therefore, at the head of 12,000 men, having with him the ark of the covenant, according to some commentators, and the trumpets of the tabernacle. He defeated the Midianites, and slew five of their kings, Levi, Rekem, Zur, Hur and Reba, who reigned over several cities of the country of Midian, east of the Dead sea. The wicked prophet Balaam was also involved in their misfortune, and lost his life. The Israelites took the women, the children, the flocks, and whatever belonged to the Midianites; and burnt their cities, villages and forts.

[The original and appropriate district of the Midianites seems to have been on the east side of the Elanitic branch of the Red sea; where the Arabian geographers place the city Madian. But they appear to have spread themselves northward, probably along the desert east of mount Seir, to the vicinity of the Moabites; and on the other side also, they covered a territory extending to the neighborhood of mount Sinai. (See Exod. iii. 1; xviii. 5; Numb. xxxi; Judg. vi.—viii.) In Gen. xxv. 2, 4, compared with verses 12—18, they are distinguished from the descendants of Ishmael; but elsewhere, the names Midianites and Ishmaelites seem to be used as nearly synonymous. (See Gen. xxxvii. 25, compared with verse 36; Judg. vii. 12, compared with viii. 22, 24.) R.

MIGDOL, a tower. When the Israelites came out of Egypt, the Lord commanded them to encamp over against Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the Red sea, over against Baal-zephon, Exod. xiv. 2. See EXODUS, p. 401, 403.

MILCOM, see MOLOCH.

MILE. The Greek μῖλιον, mile, (Matt. v. 41.) is spoken of the Roman miliare, or mile, which contained 8 stadia or 1000 paces, i. e. about 1611 $\frac{2}{3}$  yards; while the English mile contains 1760 yards. (See ADAM'S Rom. Ant. p. 503.) \*R.

MILETUS, or MILETUM, a city and seaport, and the ancient capital of all Ionia. Paul, going from Corinth to Jerusalem, in A. D. 58, passed by Miletus; and as he went by sea, and so could not take Ephesus in his way, he desired the bishops of the church of Ephesus to meet him here, Acts xx. 18, 35.

This city was originally a colony of Cretans; but at length became so powerful, that it sent out settlers to a great number of cities on the Euxine sea, and many others on the continent. What most contributed to its renown was a magnificent temple of Apollo. Dr. Chandler has an interesting account of the city. (Travels, p. 146—149.)

MILK. Moses forbids to seethe a kid in its mother's milk, (Exod. xxiii. 19; xxxiv. 16; Deut. xiv. 21.) which the Hebrews, generally, understand literally; though some accept it metaphorically, as forbidding cruelty, Deut. xxii. 6.

A land flowing with milk and honey is a country of extraordinary fertility. In the prophets the kingdom of the Messiah is represented as a time of great abundance, "when the mountains should flow with milk and honey," Joel iii. 18. And Isaiah says, (lx. 16.) "Thou shalt also suck the milk of the Gentiles, and shalt suck the breasts of kings." Paul compares his converts to little children, to be fed with milk, and not with solid food, (1 Cor. iii. 2; Heb. v. 12.) and Peter exhorts the faithful, "As new-born babes, to desire the sincere milk of the word, that ye may grow thereby," 1 Pet. ii. 2.

MILL. For a description of the hand-mills commonly used in the East, see CORN.

MILLENNIUM, a thousand years, the name applied to that period of the Christian church described in Rev. xx. 4, during which many sound commentators have supposed that Jesus Christ will reign personally on the earth, and that the bodies of martyrs and other eminent Christians will be raised from the dead, and in this renewed state constitute the subjects of his glorious kingdom. Other writers, however, understand those passages which refer to this blessed era in a figurative sense, and explain them of a period in which Christianity shall eminently prevail, in its purity; annihilate paganism, idolatry, Mohammedanism, and all other false religions; and triumphantly reign throughout all the earth.

MILLET, a kind of grain, of which there are several species cultivated in Italy, Syria and Egypt. It is used partly green as fodder, and partly in the ripe grain for bread, &c. Ezekiel (iv. 9.) received an order from the Lord, to make himself bread with a mixture of wheat, barley, beans, lentil and millet. "Durra," says Niebuhr, "is a kind of millet, made into bread with camel's milk, oil, butter, &c. and is almost the only food eaten by the common people of Arabia Felix. I found it so disagreeable, that I would willingly have preferred plain barley bread." This illustrates the appointment of it to the prophet Ezekiel, as a part of his hard fare.

I. MILLO, a part of the citadel at Jerusalem; or more probably of the fortifications themselves, 2 Sam. v. 9; 1 Kings ix. 15, 24; xi. 27, al. The house of Millo (2 Kings xii. 21.) is probably the same. R.

II. MILLO, a place near Shechem. It is said, (Judg. ix. 6.) that the inhabitants of Shechem and those of the house of Millo, made Abimelech, son of Gideon, king. House is here put for place or dwelling.

MINA, a species of money, called in Hebrew maneh. We find this word only in the books of Kings, Chronicles, Ezra, and in Ezekiel, who tells us, (xlv. 12.) that it was valued at sixty shekels, which, in gold, made about 240 dollars, and in silver about 30 dollars. This is the Hebrew maneh: but the Greek or Attic mina, which is probably that mentioned in the books of the Maccabees, and in the New Testament, is valued at a hundred drachmæ, or about 13½ dollars. There was also a lesser mina, valued at seventy-five drachmæ.

MINCHA, a Hebrew word, signifying an offering of meal, cakes, or biscuits, presented in the temple of the Lord. The LXX sometimes preserve this word; but instead of mincha, they read manna, which doubtless was the common pronunciation in their time. We find manna in Baruch i. 10: "Prepare ye manna, and offer upon the altar of the Lord our God." Scripture uses the word mincha, in the Hebrew, to express the offerings that Cain and Abel made to the Lord of their first-fruits, (Gen. iv. 3, 4.) for the presents made by Jacob to his brother Esau, at his return from Mesopotamia; (Gen. xxxii. 13, 16, 18, 20, 21.) for those carried by the sons of Jacob to Joseph in Egypt, before he discovered himself to them; (Gen. xliii. 11, 14, 24.) and for those that Ehud presented to Eglon, king of Moab, Judg. iii. 15, 17, 18. (See also Mal. i. 10, 11.)

MIND, the understanding, or judgment; that principle which distinguishes the differences of things, lawful or unlawful, good or evil, 2 Cor. iii. 14; Tit. i. 15. It is sometimes supposed to be seated, or rather, perhaps, to exercise itself, in the heart, (Gen. xxvi. 35; Deut. xviii. 6.) or in the memory, (Ps. xxxi. 12; Isa. xlvi. 8.) or in the imagination, or will. These ramifications are all referable to the exercise of the understanding, in these departments of the intellectual faculties.

MINISTER, one who attends or waits on another; so Elisha was the minister of Elijah, (2 Kings iii. 11.) and Joshua the servant of Moses, Exod. xxiv. 13; xxxiii. 11. And these persons did not feel themselves degraded by their stations, but in due time they succeeded to the offices of their masters. In like manner, John Mark was minister to Paul and Barnabas, Acts xiii. 5. Christ is called a Minister of the true, that is, the heavenly sanctuary.

The minister of the synagogue, (Luke iv. 20.) was appointed to keep the book of the law, and to observe that those who read in it read correctly, &c. The rabbins say, he was the same as the angel of the church, or overseer. Lightfoot says, Baal Aruch expounds the chazan, or minister of the congregation, by Sheliach hatzibbor, or angel of the congregation; and from this common platform and constitution of the synagogue, we may observe the apostle's expression of some elders ruling, and laboring in word and doctrine; others in the general affairs of the synagogue. Allusions to the officers of the Jewish synagogue are often introduced by the writers of the New Testament, and perhaps are hardly intelligible to us, who are not intimately acquainted with the constitutions of those assemblies.

Ministers were servants; not menial, but honorable. Those who explain the word, and conduct the service of God; who dispense the laws, and promote the welfare of the community. The holy angels, who, in obedience to the divine commands, protect, preserve, succor and benefit the godly, are all beneficial ministers to those who are under their charge, Heb. viii. 2; Exod. xxx. 10; Lev. xvi. 15; 1 Cor. iv. 1; Rom. xiii. 6; Ps. civ. 4. See ANGEL.

MINNI. Jeremiah (li. 27.) invites the kings of Minni, Ararat and Aschenaz to war against Babylon. Minni is thought to denote Minuas, a province of Armenia.

MINNITH, a city beyond Jordan, four miles from Heshbon, on the road to Philadelphia. It belonged to the Ammonites when Jephthah made war against them, Judg. xi. 33. Ezekiel says, that Judah carried wheat of Minnith to the fairs of Tyre, Ezek. xxvii. 17.

MINT, a garden herb, or pot herb, sufficiently known. The Pharisees, desiring to distinguish themselves by a most scrupulous and literal observation of the law, gave tithes of mint, anise, and cummin, Matt. xxiii. 23. Our Saviour does not censure this exactness, but complains, that while they were so precise in these lesser matters, they neglected the essential commandments of the law.

MIRACLE, a sign, wonder, prodigy. These terms are commonly used in Scripture to denote an action, event, or effect, superior (or contrary) to the general and established laws of nature. And they are given, not only to true miracles, wrought by saints or prophets sent from God, by good angels, by the finger of God, or by the Son of God; but also to the false miracles of impostors, and to wonders wrought by the wicked, by false prophets, or by devils. Moses speaks of the miracles of Pharaoh's magicians, in the manner he speaks of those wrought by himself, in the name and by the power of God; our Saviour foretold that false Christs and false prophets should perform wonders capable of deceiving, were it possible, the elect themselves; (Matt. xxiv. 24.) and John, in the Revelation, (xiii. 13, 14.) speaks of a beast that came out of the earth, which performed such prodigies, as even to make fire descend from heaven on the earth, which seduced many persons, &c. And in the same book he speaks of demons, which showed wonders, to stimulate the kings of the earth to make war on the saints; and also of a false prophet, who works miracles, to seduce those who have received the mark of the beast, Rev. xvi. 14; xix. 20.

Miracles and prodigies, therefore, are not always sure signs of the sanctity of those who perform them; nor proofs of the truth of the doctrine they deliver; nor certain testimonies of their divine mission. The Son of God not only permits but commands us to examine miracles, and those who perform them, (Matt. xxiv. 23, 24.) and Moses (Deut. xiii. 1.) cautioned the Israelites against listening to the words of certain prophets, or dreamers of dreams; adding, that the Lord permitted them to prove his people, to know whether they loved the Lord their God with all their heart, and with all their soul. It may, therefore, be affirmed, that the proof of miracles is not always unquestionable. To the mission of him who works miracles, must be joined the truth of the doctrine he advances, the holiness of his life, his good understanding, and his concurrence with those whose life, mission and doctrine, have been already ascertained and approved. His miracles must be strictly examined, to see if they be true, and will stand the test; and are not juggling tricks, or magical operations; whether they lead to God, to peace, to righteousness, to salvation. If these marks and characters be found in him who works miracles, we must allow such a one to be a messenger from God.

Our Saviour complains (John iv. 48.) of the Jews: "Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe." When they asked a sign from him, (Matt. xii. 38.) he replied that they should see no other sign but that of the prophet Jonah. He says (John xv. 24.) that if he had not performed among them such miracles as were never before performed by man, they would have had no sin; and Nicodemus acknowledged, (John iii. 2.) "No man can do these miracles that thou doest, except God be with him." Such a train of miracles, accompanied with so much innocence and righteousness, with a doctrine so pure and divine, could not be operations of falsity and delusion. When Christ sent his apostles to preach the gospel among the Jews, and among infidel nations, he gave them the power of working miracles in his name, (Matt. x. 6, 8, &c.) than which nothings so much contributed to the propagation of the Christian faith.

The prejudices, obstinacy and incredulity of the Jews must have been very extraordinary, not to yield to the miracles of Christ and his apostles. The doctors themselves could not give the lie to their own eyes, or oppose what was so public and notorious; they could not directly deny the miracles, but chose rather to ascribe them to Beelzebub. The modern Jews pretend, that Christ had stolen the name JEHOVAH out of the temple, by which he performed his miracles. If this were true, could it be conceivable, that God would favor an impostor with the gift of working miracles, and such a long train of miracles, and of so high degree, and by one who announced the subversion of the law and the Jewish religion? And would he permit him to transfer this power to his disciples and apostles?

MIRIAM, sister of Moses and Aaron, and daughter of Amram and Jochebed. If she were the one who was watching when her brother Moses was exposed on the bank of the Nile, she might be ten or twelve years old at that time. When Pharaoh's daughter discovered the infant, Miriam proposed to fetch a nurse for the little foundling; the princess accepted the offer, and Miriam brought her own mother, Exod. ii. 4, &c. It is thought that Miriam married Hur, of Judah; but it does not appear that she had any children by him.

Miriam had the gift of prophecy, as she insinuates in Exod. xvii. 10, 11; Numb. xii. 2. After the passage of the Red sea, she led the choir and dances of the women, and repeated with them the canticle, "Sing ye to the Lord," &c. which Moses sung in the choir of men, Exod. xv. 21. When Zipporah, the wife of Moses, arrived in the camp of Israel, Miriam and Aaron disparaged her, speaking against Moses on her account, Numb. xii. The Lord punished Miriam by visiting her with a leprosy. Her death happened in the first month of the fortieth year after the exodus, at the encampment of Kadesh, in the wilderness of Sin, (Numb. xx. 1.) where Eusebius assures us that in his time her sepulchre was to be seen.

MITE, Gr. λίτρον, a small piece of money, two of which made a kodrantes, or the fourth part of the Roman as. The as was equal to  $3\frac{1}{3}$  farthings sterling, or about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  cents. The mite, λίτρον, therefore, would be equal to about two mills, Luke xii. 59; xxi. 2. R.

MITHCAH, an encampment of Israel in the wilderness, between Tarah and Hashmonah, Numb. xxxiii. 28, 29.

MITYLENE, the celebrated capital of the island of Lesbos, through which Paul passed as he went from Corinth to Jerusalem, A. D. 58, Acts xx. 14. Now Castro.

I. MIZPAH, or MIZPEH, elevation, a city of Judah, (Josh. xv. 38.) south of Jerusalem, and north of Hebron; about six leagues from Jerusalem. Calmet thinks it is the Mizpah of Benjamin, where the Hebrews often assembled for purposes of devotion. (See 1 Kings xv. 22; 2 Chron. xvi. 6, &c.)

II. MIZPAH, or MIZPEH, a city of Gad, in the mountains of Gilead, where Laban and Jacob made a covenant, Gen. xxxi. 49. Jephthah dwelt here when he made a covenant with the Israelites on the other side Jordan, who chose him for their captain; and here he assembled his troops, Judg. xi. 11, 29, 34. It is sometimes ascribed to Moab, because the Moabites conquered and kept it.

III. MIZPAH, or MIZPEH. Joshua (xi. 3, 8.) speaks of the Hivites, who inhabited the country of Mizpeh, at the foot of mount Hermon, and consequently towards the head of the Jordan. He adds, that the army of Jabn and his allies took refuge at Mizpah, to the east of the city of Sidon; which agrees with this position.

MIZRAIM, son of Ham, and father of Ludim, Anamin, Lehabim, Naphtuhim, Pathrusim and Caslulim, Gen. x. 6. He was father of the Mizraim, or Egyptians. Mizraim is also put for the country of Egypt; thus it has three significations, which are perpetually confounded and used promiscuously; sometimes denoting the land of Egypt, sometimes he who first peopled Egypt, and sometimes the inhabitants themselves. See EGYPT.

MNASON, of Cyprus, a Jew, converted by Christ himself; and one of the seventy, Acts xxi. 16. Paul lodged at his house at Jerusalem, A. D. 58.

MOAB, son of Lot, and of his eldest daughter; (Gen. xix. 31, &c.) born about the time of the birth of Isaac, A. M. 2108.

MOABITES, the descendants of Moab, son of Lot, whose habitation was east of Jordan, and adjacent to the Dead sea, on both sides the river Arnon, on which their capital city was situated; although the river Arnon was strictly and properly the northern boundary of Moab. This country was originally possessed by a race of giants called Emim, (Deut. ii. 11, 12.) whom the Moabites conquered. Afterwards, the Amorites took a part from the Moabites, (Judg. xi. 13.) but Moses reconquered it, and gave it to the tribe of Reuben. The Moabites were spared by Moses, as God had restricted him; (Deut. ii. 9.) but there always was a great antipathy between them and the Israelites, which occasioned many wars. Balaam seduced the Hebrews to idolatry and uncleanness, by means of the daughters of Moab, Numb. xxv. 1, 2. God ordained that this people should not enter into the congregation of his people, or be capable of office, &c. even to the tenth generation, (Deut. xxiii. 3.) because they had the inhumanity to refuse the Israelites a passage through their country, nor would supply them with bread and water in their necessity.

Eglon, king of the Moabites, was one of the first who oppressed Israel after the death of Joshua. Ehud killed him, and Israel expelled the Moabites, Judg. iii. 12. A. M. 2679. David subdued Moab and Ammon; under which subjection they continued till the separation of the ten tribes; when they were attached to the kings of Israel till the death of Ahab. Soon after the death of this king, the Moabites began to revolt, 2 Kings iii. 4, 5. Mesha refused the tribute of a hundred thousand lambs, and as many rams, which till then had been customarily paid, either yearly or at the beginning of every reign. The reign of Ahaziah was too short to allow of his invading them; but Jehoram, son of Ahab, and brother to Ahaziah, having ascended the throne, intended reducing them to obedience. He invited Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, to join him; who, with the king of Edom, then his vassal, entered Moab, where they were almost on the point of perishing with thirst, but were miraculously relieved, 2 Kings iii. 16, &c. We have little knowledge of the Moabites after this time; but Isaiah, at the beginning of the reign of Hezekiah, threatens them with a calamity which was to happen three years after his prediction, and which probably referred to the war of Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, against the ten tribes, and the nations beyond the Jordan. Amos (i. 13, &c.) also foretold great miseries to them, which probably they suffered under Uzziah and Jotham, kings of Judah; if not under Shalmaneser; (2 Chron. xxvi. 7, 8; xxvii. 5.) or, lastly, the war of Nebuchadnezzar, five years after the destruction of Jerusalem. Calmet believes that this prince carried them captive beyond the Euphrates, as the prophets had threatened; (Jer. ix. 26; xii. 14, 15; xxv. 11, 12; xlvi. 47; xlix. 3, 6, 39; l. 16.) and that Cyrus sent them home again, as he did other captive nations. It is probable that in the later times of the Jewish republic, they obeyed the Asmonean kings, and afterwards Herod the Great.

The principal deities of the Moabites were Chemosh and Baal-peor. Scripture speaks of Nebo, of Baal-meon, and of Baal-dibon, as gods of the Moabites; but it is likely these are rather names of places where Chemosh and Peor were worshipped; and that Baal-dibon, Baal-meon, and Nebo, are no other than Chemosh adored at Dibon, or at Meon, or on mount Nebo.

For a description of the land of Moab, see CANAAN, p. 237.

MODIN, a celebrated city or town in the tribe of Dan, whence came Mattathias and his family, the Maccabees, (1 Mac. ii. 1, 15; ix. 19.) and which is also famous for a battle fought there by a handful of men, under Judas Maccabeus, against Antiochus Eupator, 2 Mac. xiii. 9, &c.

MOLADAH, (Josh. xv. 26; xix. 2.) a city first given to Judah, and afterwards to Simeon. It was in the southerly part of Judah.

MOLE, an unclean animal, (Lev. xi. 30.) several times referred to in Scripture. In the Vulgate and in the English Bible, however, the word tenshemeth, lizard or chameleon, is improperly translated mole, this animal being called in Hebrew hholed. The only passage requiring elucidation, in which the mole is spoken of, is Isa. ii. 20, and this the reader will find examined in the article IDOLS, p. 522.

MOLOCH, or MILCOM, a god of the Ammonites, to whom human sacrifices were offered. Moses in several places forbids the Israelites, under the penalty of death, to dedicate their children to Moloch, by making them pass through the fire, (Lev. xviii. 21; xx. 2—5.) and God himself threatens to pour out his wrath against those who should be guilty of it. There is great probability that the Hebrews were addicted to the worship of this deity, even before their coming out of Egypt, since Amos, (v. 26.) and after him Stephen, (Acts vii. 43.) reproaches them with having carried in the wilderness the tabernacle of their god Moloch. (See CHURCH.) Solomon built a temple to Moloch on the mount of Olives, (1 Kings xi. 7.) and Manasseh, a long time after, imitated his impiety, making his son pass through the fire in honor of this idol, 2 Kings xxi. 3, 4. Such idolatry was practised chiefly in the valley of Tophet and Hinnom, east of Jerusalem, Jer. xix.

Some are of opinion, that the devotees contented themselves with making their children leap over a fire sacred to Moloch; by this action consecrating them to that false deity; and as by a lustration purifying them; this being a usual ceremony on other occasions among the heathen. Others believe that they made them pass between two fires opposite each other, with the same intention; but it is generally thought that they really burnt their children as sacrifices. See Ps. evi. 37; Isa. lvii. 5; Ezek. xvi. 20, 21; xxiii. 37, 39, where it is positively asserted, that the Hebrews sacrificed their children to devils, to Moloch, and to strange gods. See FIRE.

The rabbins assure us, that the idol Moloch was of brass, sitting on a throne of the same metal, adorned with a royal crown, having the head of a calf, and his arms extended as if to embrace any one; that when they offered children to him, they heated the statue from within, by a great fire; and when it was burning hot, put the miserable victim within its arms, where it was soon consumed by the violence of the heat; and that the cries of the children might not be heard, they made a great noise with drums and other instruments about the idol. Others say, that his arms were extended, and reaching toward the ground, so that when they put a child within his arms, it immediately fell into a great fire which was burning at the foot of the statue.

There are various sentiments about Moloch: some believe that it represented Saturn, to whom it is well known that human sacrifices were offered. So Genesius in his Comm. z. Jesa. ii. p. 343; comp. p. 327. (See also CHRON.) Others think he was Mercury, others say Venus, others Mars, or Mithra. Calmet has endeavored to prove, that Moloch signified the sun, or the king of heaven. (See also Selden, de Diis Syris; Spencer, de Legibus Hebræorum Ritualib. lib. ii. cap. 10. And Vossius, de Origine et Progressu Idolatriæ, lib. ii. cap. 5.)

MONEY. Scripture often speaks of gold, silver, brass, of certain sums of money, of purchases made with money, of current money, of money of a certain weight; but we do not observe coined or stamped money till a late period; which induces a belief that the ancient Hebrews took gold and silver only by weight; that they only considered the purity of the metal, and not the stamp. The most ancient commerce was conducted by barter, or exchanging one sort of merchandise for another. One man gave what he could spare to another, who gave him in return part of his superabundance. Afterwards the more precious metals were used in traffic, as a value more generally known and stated. Lastly, they gave this metal, by public authority, a certain mark, a certain weight, and a certain degree of alloy, to fix its value, and to save buyers and sellers the trouble of weighing and examining the coins.

Abraham weighed out four hundred shekels of silver, to purchase Sarah's tomb; (Gen. xxiii. 15, 16.) and Scripture observes, that he paid this in current money with the merchant. Joseph was sold by his brethren to the Midianites for twenty pieces of silver, (Gen. xxxvii. 28.) Heb. twenty shekels of silver. The brethren of Joseph brought back with them into Egypt the money they found in their sacks, in the same weight as before, Gen. xlili. 21. Isaiah describes the wicked as weighing silver in a balance, to make an idol thereof, (chap. xlvi. 6.) and Jeremial (xxxii. 10.) weighs seventeen pieces of silver in a pair of scales to pay for a field he had bought. Isaiah says, "Come, buy wine and milk without money, and without price. Wherefore do ye weigh money for that which is not bread?" Amos (viii. 5.) represents the merchants encouraging one another to make the ephah small, wherewith to sell, and the shekel great, wherewith to buy, and to falsify the balances by deceit.

In these passages, three things only are mentioned: (1.) The metal; that is, gold or silver, and never copper, it not being used in traffic as money. (2.) The weight, a talent, a shekel, a gerah or obolus; the weight of the sanctuary, and the king's weight. (3.) The standard of pure or fine gold and silver, and of good quality, as received by the merchant. The impression of the coinage is not referred to; but it is said, they weighed the silver, or other commodities, by the shekel and by the talent. This shekel, therefore, and this talent, were not fixed and determined pieces of money, but weights applied to things used in commerce. Hence those deceitful balances of the merchants who would increase the shekel; that is, would augment the weight by which they weighed the gold and silver they were to receive, that they might have a greater quantity than was their due; hence the weight of the sanctuary, the standard of which was preserved in the temple, to prevent fraud; hence those prohibitions in the law, "Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights, [Heb. stones,] a great and a small," Deut. xxv. 13. Hence those scales that the Hebrews wore at their girdles, (Hos. xii. 7.) and the Canaanites carried in their hands; to weigh the gold and silver which they received in payment.

And it is to be observed, that in the original text there is no mention of coined money, or of any thing like it. The gold and silver offered to Moses in the desert, for the use of the tabernacle; that which was given to Aaron to make a golden calf; that of which Gideon made an ephod; that which tempted Achan; that which David left to Solomon; and that which Gehazi received from Naaman; was only gold or silver made into rings, bracelets, pendants, vessels, or ingots. Not a word of coined money, of any mark or impression; nothing to show the form of the money, or the figure represented upon it; for, generally, coined money has the impress of some prince, some animal, flower, or other device. But nothing of this kind occurs among the Hebrews.

It is true, that in the Hebrew (Gen. xxxiii. 19.) we find Jacob bought a field for a hundred kesitahs; and that the friends of Job, (chap. xlii. 11.) after his recovery, gave to that model of patience each a kesitah, and a golden pendant for the ears. We also find there Darics, (Heb. Darmonim, or Adarmonim) and Mina, Statere, Oboli: but this last kind of money was foreign, and is put for other terms, which in the Hebrew only signify the weight of the metal. The kesitah is not well known to us; some take it for a sheep or a lamb; others for a kind of money, having the impression of a lamb or a sheep. But Calmet rather thinks it to be a purse of money.

"The practice of weighing money is general in Syria, Egypt, and all Turkey. No piece, however effaced, is refused there: the merchant draws out his scales and weighs it, as in the days of Abraham, when he purchased his sepulchre. In considerable payments, an agent of exchange is sent for, who counts paras by thousands, rejects pieces of false money, and weighs all the sequins, either separately or together." (Volney, vol. ii. p. 425.) Does not this mention of "an agent of exchange," give a new idea to the expression in Genesis, above referred to, "current money with the merchant;" i. e. such as was approved by a competent judge, whose business it was to detect fraudulent coin, if offered in payment? On this subject we may remark a much deeper inference than is usually discovered in the question of our Lord to the ill-designing Pharisees:—"Whose IMAGE and superscription is this?" For we ought to observe, that few, or none, of the early and truly Asiatic coins, had any image, or representation, of the king on them; that those of the original Jewish coinage, have the pot, or jug, (of manna, say some,) or the vine, or sheaf of corn, and the date when coined; but no image of any person, or power, (which the Jews would have held unlawful,) as the Roman coinage universally had, especially under the Cæsars. When, therefore, our Lord commands, "Show me the tribute-money," and asks, "Whose IMAGE is this?" by attributing currency to the (Roman) image of Cæsar, and appropriating this (Roman) coin to the payment of his tribute, they acknowledged Cæsar's authority and power; thereby answering their own question. And this inference appears still more forcibly, when we recollect the utter aversion of the Jewish nation from images at this time, and that the figures on the standards of the Roman legions nearly occasioned an insurrection.—In this view, the idea of IMAGE is stronger than that of SUPERScription; though, in fact, one accompanied the other, the superscription, or epigraphus, being the emperor's titles, usually inserted around his image, or bust, as on our British coins.

"They [the Turks] stamp nothing on their money (which is all of gold and silver, and consists in the sorts aforesaid) but the emperor's name, and the year in which it was coined. They receive, nevertheless, foreign coins, with figures of living things, which seems contrary to their law." (De la Motraye's Travels, vol. i. p. 154.) Here we find the Turks receiving, through commercial policy, what the Jews were forced to receive, and to pass current, by reason of their subjection to the Roman emperor. It is also common, in the East, for coins to have some sentence on them, such as, "God is great," &c. The Roman coins had no such inscription, but were purely heathen, and solely presented the image and superscription of Cæsar; or if any figure was added on the reverse, it was that of some ideal or idolatrous deity.

It deserves notice, that the three evangelists who record this story, insert the word image, (and, indeed, they use coincidentally the same words,) which seems to confirm the ideas above suggested. (See Matt. xxii. 20; Mark xii. 16; Luke xx. 24.)

MONTH. The ancient Hebrews had no particular names for their months; they said, the first, the second, the third, &c. In Exod. xiii. 4; xxiii. 15; xxxiv. 18, and Deut. xvi. 1, we find חודש, Chodesh Abib, or the month of the young ears of corn, or of the new fruits; which is, probably, the Egyptian name of that month, which the Hebrews afterwards called Nisan, and which was the first of the holy year. Every where else this lawgiver designates the months by their order of succession. In Joshua, Judges and Samuel we see the same method. Under Solomon (1 Kings vi. 1.) we read of the month Zif, which is the second month of the holy year, and answers to that afterwards called Jair. In the same chapter we read of the month Bul, which is the eighth of the holy year, and answers to Marchesvan, or October. Lastly, in chap. viii. 2, we read of the month Ethanim, or the month of the valiant, which answers to Tizri, the seventh of the holy year.

Critics are not agreed about the origin of these names of the months. Scaliger thought Solomon borrowed them from the Phœnicians, with whom he had much intercourse. Grotius believes they came from the Chaldeans; and Hardouin deduces them from the Egyptians. However this may be, we see nothing of them, either before or after Solomon. But after the captivity of Babylon, the people continued the names of the months as they had found them among the Chaldeans and Persians.

Names of the Hebrew months, according to the order of the sacred and civil years.

Sacred. Civil.

7	1	ניסן,	Nisan, answering to March, O. S.
8	2	אייר,	Ijar, April.
9	3	סיון,	Sivan, May.
10	4	תמוז,	Thammuz, June.

11	5	אב,	Ab,	July.
12	6	אבול,	Elul,	August.
1	7	תשרי,	Tisri,	September.
2	8	כרחשון,	Marchesvan,	October.
3	9	כסלו,	Casleu,	November.
4	10	תבת,	Thebet,	December.
5	11	שבט,	Shebat,	January.
6	12	אדר,	Adar,	February.

[Other interpreters, with greater propriety, reckon the beginning of Nisan from the new moon of April, and not of March; and this varies the beginning of the other months. (See Jahn's Archæol. § 103. Winer, Bibl. Realwörterb. p. 454.) R.

Originally, the Hebrews followed the same distribution of their years and months as in Egypt. Their year consisted of 365 days, and of twelve months, each of thirty days. This appears by the enumeration of the days of the year of the deluge, Gen. vii. The twelfth month was to have thirty-five days, and they had no intercalary month, but at the end of one hundred and twenty years, when the beginning of the year following was out of its place thirty whole days.

After the exodus, which happened in the month of March, God ordained that the holy year, that is, the calendar of religious feasts and ceremonies, should begin at Nisan, the seventh month of the civil year, (the civil year being left unchanged,) which the Hebrews continued to begin at the month Tisri (September). After the Babylonish captivity, the Jews, being but a handful of people in the midst of others surrounding them, complied with such customs and manners of dividing times and seasons, as were used by the people that ruled over them; first, of the Chaldeans; afterwards, of the Persians; and lastly, of the Grecians. They took the names of the months from the Chaldeans and Persians, and perhaps their manner of dividing the year and the months. However, we cannot be sure of this, not exactly knowing the form of the Chaldean months. But we see plainly by Ecclesiasticus, (xliii. 6.) by the Maccabees, by Josephus, (Antiq. lib. iii. cap. 10,) and by Philo, (Vit. Mos. lib. iii.) that in their time they followed the custom of the Grecians; that is, their months were lunar, and their years solar.

These lunar months were each of twenty-nine days and a half; or, rather, one was of thirty days, the following of twenty-nine, and so on alternately: that which had thirty days was called a full or complete month; that which had but twenty-nine days was called incomplete. The new moon was always the beginning of the month, and this day they called Neomenia, new-moon day, or new month. They did not begin it from that point of time when the moon was in conjunction with the sun, but from the time at which she first became visible, after that conjunction. And to determine this, it is said, they had people posted on elevated places, to inform the Sanhedrim as soon as possible. Proclamation was then made, "The feast of the new moon! The feast of the new moon!" and the beginning of the month was proclaimed by sound of trumpet. For fear of any failing in the observation of that command, which directed certain ceremonies at the beginning of each month, they continued the Neomenia two days; the first was called "the day of the moon's appearance," the other "of the moon's disappearance." So say the rabbins: but there is great probability, that if this was ever practised, it was only in provinces distant from Jerusalem. In the temple, and in the metropolis, there was always a fixed calendar, or at least a fixed decision for festival days, determined by the House of Judgment.

When we say that the months of the Jews answered to ours, Nisan to March, Jair to April, &c. we must be understood with some latitude; for the lunar months cannot be reduced exactly to solar ones. The vernal equinox falls between the twentieth and twenty-first of March, according to the course of the solar year. But in the lunar year, the new moon will fall in the month of March, and the full moon in the month of April. So that the Hebrew months will answer partially to two of our months, the end of one, and the beginning of the other.

Twelve lunar months making but three hundred and fifty-four days and six hours, the Jewish year was short of the Roman by twelve days. To recover the equinoctial points, from which this difference of the solar and lunar year would separate the new moon of the first month, the Jews every three years intercalated a thirteenth month, which they called Ve-adar; the second Adar. By this means their lunar year equalled the solar; because in thirty-six solar months there would be thirty-seven lunar months. The Sanhedrim regulated this intercalation, and the thirteenth month was placed between Adar and Nisan; so that the passover was always celebrated the first full moon after the equinox.

MOON. The Lord created the sun and the moon on the fourth day of the world, to preside over day and night, and to distinguish times and seasons, Gen. i. 15, 16. As the sun presides over day, so the moon presides over night; the sun regulates the course of a year, the moon the course of a month; the sun is, as it were, king of the host of heaven, the moon is queen. The moon was appointed for the distinction of seasons, of festival days, and days of assembling, Gen. i. 14; Ps. civ. 19. For the days of the NEW MOON, see NEOMENIA.

We do not know whether the Hebrews understood the theory of lunar eclipses; but they always speak of them in terms which intimate that they considered them as wonders, and as effects of the power and wrath of God. When the prophets speak of the destruction of empires, they often say, that the sun shall be covered with darkness; the moon withdraw her light; and the stars fall from heaven, Isa. xiii. 10; xxiv. 23; Ezek. xxxii. 7, 8; Joel ii. 10; iii. 15. But we cannot perceive that there is any direct mention of an eclipse.

Among the orientals in general, and the Hebrews in particular, the worship of the moon was more extensive, and more famous than that of the sun. In Deut. iv. 19; xvii. 3, Moses bids the Israelites take care, when they see the sun, the moon, the stars, and the host of heaven, not to pay them any superstitious worship, because they were only creatures appointed for the service of all nations under heaven. Job (xxxi. 26, 27.) also speaks of the same worship: "If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness, and my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand," as a token of adoration. The Hebrews worshipped the moon, by the name of Meni, of Astarte, of the goddess of the groves, of the queen of heaven, &c. (But see under ASTAROTH I.) The Syrians adored her as Astarte, Urania, or Cælestis; the Arabians as Alilat; the Egyptians as Isis; the Greeks as Diana, Venus, Juno, Hecate, Bellona, Minerva, &c. Macrobius and Julius Firmicus acquaint us, that men dressed like women, and women dressed like men, sacrificed to the moon. Maimonides thinks, that Moses intended to forbid this, when he prohibited the sexes from exchange of habits. The moon was worshipped as a god, and not as a goddess, in Syria, Mesopotamia and Armenia. The Sepharvites called her Anamellech, the gracious king. Strabo calls her Meen; as does Isaiah, lxx. 11. She was represented clothed like a man; and there are medals extant, on which she is represented in the habit and form of a man armed, having a cock at his feet, covered with a Phrygian or Armenian bonnet. Spartian, in Caracalla, assures us, that the people of Charrae in Mesopotamia believed, that such as held the moon for a goddess, would be always in subjection to their wives. He adds, that though the Greeks and Egyptians sometimes called her goddess, yet they always call her god in their mysteries. Several sorts of sacrifices were offered to the moon. We see in Isaiah lxx. 11, and Jeremiah vii. 18, that they offered to her in the high ways, and upon the roofs of their houses, sacrifices of cakes, and similar offerings. Thus the Greeks honored Hecate, or Trivia, which is the moon. Elsewhere they offered to her human sacrifices. Strabo relates, that in the countries bordering on the Araxes, they especially worshipped the moon, who had there a famous temple. The goddess had several slaves, and every year they offered one of them in sacrifice to her, after having fed him daintily the whole year before. Lucian speaks of like sacrifices, offered to the Syrian goddess, the Dea Cælestis, that is, the moon. Fathers carried their children, tied up in sacks, to the top of the porch of the temple, whence they threw them down upon the pavement; and when the unfortunate victims moaned, the fathers would answer, that they were not their children, but young calves.

The Jews ascribed different effects to the moon. Moses speaks of the fruits of the sun and the moon, (Deut. xxxiii. 14.) these being considered as the two causes which produce the fruits of the earth. Some commentators think, that the fruits of the sun are those that come yearly, as wheat, grapes, &c.; and the fruits of the moon those that may be gathered at different months of the year, as cucumbers, figs, &c.

MORASTH, the country of the prophet Micah, east of Eleutheropolis, Micah i. 1; Jer. xxvi. 18. See MARESHAL.

MORDECAI, son of Jair, of the race of Saul, and a chief of the tribe of Benjamin. He was carried captive to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, with Jehoiachin, or Jeconiah, king of Judah, A. M. 4305; Esth. ii. 5, 6. He settled at Shushan, and there lived to the first year of Cyrus, when it is thought he visited Jerusalem, with several other captives; but afterwards he returned to Shushan. Mordecai had a niece called Edessa, or Esther, the daughter of his brother, whom he had adopted and brought up as his own daughter, after the death of his brother. After Esther became the wife of Ahasuerus, (see ESTHER,) Mordecai was constant at the palace gate to learn news of the queen. During his attendance there he discovered a conspiracy of two eunuchs to kill the king; his service, however, was registered only, and not rewarded. Ahasuerus raising Haman to be his favorite, Mordecai refused to honor him; and Haman resented the indignity by endeavoring to exterminate the whole Jewish people, for which he obtained a decree from the king, but was defeated in his purpose by Mordecai and Esther.

It is evident that the anxiety of Mordecai for

Esther was extreme; but we cannot fully enter into the circumstance of his walking day after day, (chap. ii. 11.) for a long period of time, probably upwards of a year, without recollecting the extreme vigilance with which the harems of the East are guarded. On this subject Chardin says: "The place where the women are shut up is sacred, especially among persons of condition; and it is a crime for any person whatever to be inquiring what passes within those walls. The husband has there an absolute authority, without being obliged to give any account of his actions. And 'tis said, that there are most bloody doings in those places sometimes, and that poison despatches a world of people, which are thought to die a natural death." (p. 332.) "I could not learn what was done more the rest of the night; for I have already informed you how difficult it is to be informed of the transactions in those habitations, that seem to be regions of another world. There are none but women that can approach within a league of it, or some black eunuchs, with whom a man may as well converse as with so many dragons, that can discover those secrets; and you may as well tear out their hearts as a syllable upon that text. You must use a great deal of art to make them speak; just as we tame serpents in the Indies, till they make them hiss and dance when they please." (p. 54. Cor. Solyman.)

"And here we must observe, that Habas the second left behind him two sons; or, at least, I never heard that he left any more, nor is it known whether he left any daughters or no. For what is done in the women's apartment is a mystery concealed even from the grandees and prime ministers. Or, if they know any thing, it is merely upon the account of some particular relation or dependence which the secret has to some peculiar affair, which, of necessity, must be imparted to their knowledge. For my part, I have spared neither pains nor cost to sift out the truth, but I could never discover any more; only, that they believed he never left any daughter behind him that lived. A man may walk a hundred days, one after another, by the house where the women are, and yet know no more what is done therein, than at the further end of Tartary." (p. 6.)

We learn from these extracts, (1.) That to inquire what passes in the harem is a crime. (2.) That it is possible, "by a great deal of art," and weighty reasons, no doubt, to make the black eunuchs "speak," on some occasions. (3.) That a man may walk a hundred days, one after another, yet obtain no intelligence from thence. (4.) That "bloody doings" are occasionally transacted there.

These hints may account for the conduct of Mordecai, who walked every day before the court of the women's house, to gather any intelligence that might chance to come within his cognizance, respecting his niece. An English reader is apt to say, "Why did not he visit her at once?" or, "To be sure, when he walked before the court, he inquired of the servants, and they told him as a matter of course." No: he walked, day after day, if perchance he might make some of these "dragons" in any degree tractable. In like manner, the English reader may suppose, that (chap. ii. 22.) when "Mordecai told Esther the queen" of the treason of the king's chamberlains, he spoke to her personally. This, however, is not probable: he sent her the intelligence by intervening agents. And when Mordecai, in the utmost distress, wished to communicate with Esther, (chap. iv. 2.) "he cried with a loud and bitter cry, even before the king's gate," which was the only means left him of gaining attention from the attendants of the place; some of whom, coming out to him, returned and told Esther, who was too far off to hear him. Esther sent her own chamberlain, Hatach, (a confidential person, no doubt,) to inquire from Mordecai himself the cause of his lamentation; and, by means of Hatach, messages passed between them, which agrees with what Chardin says, that it is possible on urgent occasions to make these officers "speak." We learn, also, that there are "bloody doings" in the harem; this agrees with the remark of Mordecai, (chap. iv. 13.) "Think not that thou shalt escape in the king's house, more than all the Jews." He certainly means that Haman would procure her death, even in the harem.

MORIAH, a mountain upon which the temple of Jerusalem was built by king Solomon, 2 Chron. iii. 1. It is thought this was the place where Abraham intended to offer up his son Isaac, (Gen. xxii. 2, 14.) though this supposition is attended with some difficulties. Instead of Moriah, the Samaritan reads Morch, in Genesis, as if God sent Abraham near to Sichem, where certainly was a Moreh, Gen. xii. 6; Deut. xi. 30.

The name of Moriah is thought to be derived from a root implying height, or elevation; and it is certain, from the descriptions given of Jerusalem, that it stands on the highest hill in the neighborhood, and is seen from a great distance. It is probable, therefore, that the idea of being seen from far, as if it lifted itself up, is included in the name Moriah, which we may observe is in the feminine. Probably there is a reference to this in those prophets, who say, The mountain of the Lord's temple shall be exalted above the (surrounding) hills, and all nations shall flow to it, Isa. ii. 2; Mic. iv. 1. See JERUSALEM.

MORROW. The word morrow denotes the next succeeding period of light, which commences a little before the rising of the sun, and is opposed to the preceding period of darkness, as day is to night. The Hebrew term Mâhâr, rendered Morrow, signifies the exchange of one thing for another. Light was given instead of the preceding hours of darkness; during which the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters, Gen. i. 2. The idea of the Hebrews, under the word Mâhâr, may be further understood from the two following passages:—"And the people stood up all that day, and all night, and all day on the morrow;" which phrase our translation renders all the next day, (Numb. xi. 32.) as opposed to night. "But God prepared a worm in the rising of the dawn for the morrow," or against the morrow, which is, in our translation, when the morrow rose the next day, Jonah iv. 7. This phrase shows that the Hebrew morrow did not commence before the light. The Anglo-Saxon morrow is, no doubt, derived from the eastern Mâhâr; and as it is evident from Tacitus and Julius Cæsar, that both the Germans and the Gauls computed time in the manner of the Hebrews, and other eastern nations, there is the greater reason for supposing that our ancestors used the word morrow according to the idea of the Hebrew Mâhâr. The Anglo-Saxon to morgen, our to-morrow, is found in the following passages: Exod. vii. 15; viii. 23; xvi. 23; xvii. 9; xxxii. 5; xxxiv. 2; Numb. xi. 18; Matt. vi. 30; Luke xiii. 32, 33, &c.

MORTAR. There is a remarkable passage in Prov. xxvii. 22, "Though thou shouldst bray a fool in a mortar among wheat, with a pestle, yet will not his foolishness depart from him." The mode of punishment here referred to may be proved to exist in the East, by positive testimony.

"Fanaticism has enacted, in Turkey, in favor of the Ulemas, [or body of lawyers,] that their goods shall never be confiscated, nor themselves put to death, but by being bruised in a mortar. The honor of being treated in so distinguished a manner, may not, perhaps, be sensibly felt by every one; examples are rare; yet the insolence of the Mufti irritated sultan Osman to such a degree, that he ordered the mortars to be replaced, which, having been long neglected, had been thrown down, and almost covered with earth. This order alone produced a surprising effect: the body of Ulemas, justly terrified, submitted." (Baron du Tott, vol. i. p. 28.) "As for the guards of the Towers, who had led prince Coreskie [a prisoner] escape, some of them were empayed, and some were pounded, or beaten to pieces, in great mortars of yron, wherein they doe vsually pound their rice, to reduce it to meal." (Kuolles's History of the Turks, p. 1374.)

This last quotation is the very case in point; except that Solomon seems to suppose the fool was pounded together with the wheat; whereas, in this instance, the guards were beaten to death, certainly, without any such accompaniment.

"The Mahometans consider this office as so important, and entitled to such reverence, that the person of a pacha, who acquits himself well in it, becomes inviolable, even by the sultan: it is no longer permitted to shed his blood. But the divan has invented a method of satisfying its vengeance on those who are protected by this privilege, without departing from the literal expression of the law, by ordering them to be pounded in a mortar, . . . of which there have been various instances." (Volney, vol. ii. p. 250.)

MOSERAH, or MOSEROTH, (Numb. xxxii. 30.) a station of the Israelites, near mount Hor. Burekhardt mentions a valley east of mount Hor, called Wady Mousa, which is perhaps a corruption of Moserah. See EXODUS, p. 418, and AARON, p. 2.

MOSES, son of Amram and Jochebed, of the tribe of Levi, was born in Egypt, A. M. 2433. In consequence of the decree of Pharaoh for putting the male children of the Hebrews to death, he was put into a kind of vessel made of rushes, and laid on the banks of the Nile. Here he was found by the daughter of Pharaoh, and placed unknowingly with his mother to be nursed, Exod. ii. 1—9.

The princess named the infant MOSES, (saved out of the water;) and adopted him for her son, Acts vii. 22. His own parents, however, who brought him up, instructed him in the religion and expectations of his forefathers; so that, when grown up, he preferred rather to partake with his people in their afflictions, than to share in the pleasures of a court, Heb. xi. 24—26.

Moses relates his own story with great simplicity, thus: (Exod. ii.) Being grown up he visited his brethren, and seeing an Egyptian oppressing a Hebrew, he vindicated him, slew the Egyptian, and hid his body in the sand. The transaction becoming known, Pharaoh sought for Moses to put him to death; but he fled into the country of Midian, in Arabia Petraea, south of mount Sinai; where he married Zipporah, a daughter of Jethro, priest or prince of Midian.

Moses, employed in feeding the sheep of Jethro, one day came to the mountain of Horeb, where the Lord appeared to him in a burning bush, and commissioned him, notwithstanding his reluctance and hesitation, to deliver his people Israel. See AARON.

Being arrived in Egypt, Moses and Aaron carried their message to Pharaoh, and demanded permission for the Hebrews to go three days' journey into the desert of Arabia, to offer sacrifices to the Lord. Pharaoh refused, and augmented the burdens of the people, who complained to Moses, and he to the Lord. The ten plagues followed; and at midnight on the fourteenth day of Abib, or Nisan, Moses led his people out of Egypt. See EXODUS.

Arrived in the wilderness of Sin, or Zin, between Elim and Sinai, the multitude, tired with the length of their journey, began to murmur against Moses, saying, "Would to God we had died in Egypt, where we sat at the flesh-pots, and where we ate bread in abundance!" The Lord promised to rain food from heaven; of which Moses informed the people, and that very evening the camp of Israel was covered with quails, brought thither by the wind. The next morning they saw all round the camp a kind of hoarfrost, or little grains, of the color of bdellium, and of the shape of coriander-seeds; the manna. (See MANNA.) Moses bade Aaron to fill an omer with manna, and to lay it up before the Lord; to remain as a monument to future generations.

At Rephidim, the people, in want of water, murmured against Moses; but the Lord, by his ministry, drew them water out of the rock of Horeb. The Amalekites attacking Israel, Moses sent Joshua against them; he himself, at the same time, with Aaron and Hur, being on an eminence, whence they could see the engagement. While Moses held up his hands toward heaven, Joshua had the advantage over the enemy; but when he held them down, the Amalekites prevailed. Aaron and Hur, therefore, put stones under him, that he might sit down, while each of them supported his arms, that he might not be tired. So the Amalekites were entirely defeated. The Lord desired Moses to write an account of this action in a book, and to instruct Joshua concerning it, he having determined utterly to destroy the memory of Amalek from under heaven. On the third day of the third month from their coming out of Egypt, they arrived at the foot of mount Sinai, where they continued a year: here Moses was the mediator of a covenant between God and his people. See LAW.

Coming down from the mountain, Moses declared to the people the laws he had received, and the articles of the covenant that the Lord would make with them. The people answering, that they would perform whatever the Lord enjoined, Moses erected an altar of unhewn stones, at the foot of the mountain, and twelve monuments, or twelve other altars, in the name of the twelve tribes of Israel. Having offered sacrifices and peace-offerings, he took the blood of the victims, poured half upon the altar, and the other half into cups, and having read to the people the ordinances he had received from the Lord, and which he had written in a book, he sprinkled all the people with the blood that was in the cups. Thus was concluded the solemn and celebrated covenant between the Lord and the children of Israel.

The Lord then commanded Moses to come up again into the mountain, and to bring with him Joshua, his servant, that he might instruct him in all which he would have observed by the priests or people, in the public exercise of religion; all the parts of which he distinctly appointed. Descending from the mount, Joshua heard the shouts and rejoicings of the people, as if of an engagement with an enemy. But Moses observed that it was not the sound of an alarm, but cries of joy. When they approached the camp, they saw the golden calf, which had been made, (see CALF,) and the people singing and dancing about it. Moses indignantly threw down the tables of stone he held in his hands, and broke them; and taking the calf, he reduced it to powder, and scattered it into the water, which he made all the congregation drink of. Moses severely rebuked Aaron; and, standing at the entrance of the camp, he proclaimed, "Whoever is for the Lord, let him join himself to me." All the children of Levi assembling about him, he said, "Thus saith the Lord, Let every one of you take his sword, and let him go from gate to gate, across the camp, and slay even to his brother, his friend, or his kinsman." They did so, and that day there were slain about 3000 people.

The next day Moses remonstrated to the people on the heinousness of their sin; but told them he would again ascend the mountain, and endeavor to obtain forgiveness for them. He went up and entreated the Lord to pardon them; or otherwise, he begged that he himself might be blotted out of the book of the Lord. (See BOOK.) He also desired another favor, which was, that he might see his glory. The Lord answered him, that he could not see his face, for no man could support that sight; but that he would pass before the opening of the rock, where he might hear his name, and see his train, as he passed along.

Afterwards, Moses went up into the mountain, and carried new tables of stone. There God renewed the decalogue, and gave several other commandments. After forty days and forty nights, he came down, bringing the two tables of testimony with him, and caused proclamation to be made, that whoever had any valuable metals, or precious stones, thread, wool, furs, or fine wood, fit for the tabernacle, might offer them to the Lord. The Lord commanded also, that each Israelite should contribute half a shekel; (about 25 cents;) and that this contribution might be regularly raised, Moses took an account of the people, from twenty years old and upwards; of whom there were found 603,550, each of which paying a bekah or half shekel, the sum amounted to 100 talents of silver and 1775 shekels, or about $150,000. Six whole months they worked at the tabernacle, that is, from the sixth month of the holy year, after their leaving Egypt, A. M. 2513, to the first day of the first month of the following year, 2514. On the first day of Nisan, (April 21, according to Usher,) the tabernacle of the congregation was set up, and filled with the glory of the Lord, and on the fourteenth, the Israelites celebrated the second pass-over from their coming out of Egypt. About this time, Moses published the laws contained in the first seven chapters of Leviticus, consecrated Aaron and his sons, and dedicated the tabernacle with all its vessels.

The first day of the second month of this year, Moses took a second account of the people, in which the Levites were reckoned apart, and appointed to the service of the tabernacle. The princes of the tribes made their offerings to the tabernacle, each according to his rank, and on his day, during the twelve days of the dedication and consecration of this holy place. Lastly, and about this time, Moses made several ordinances relating to the purity to be observed in holy things, and the manner of approaching the tabernacle.

About the end of the year, Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, brought him his wife Zipporah, and his two sons, Gershom and Eliezer. Moses received him with all respect, and by his persuasion commissioned judges to assist in accommodating differences, and minor suits. On the arrival of Zipporah in the camp, Aaron, and Miriam his sister, spoke against Moses, because his wife was an Ethiopian; but the Lord interposed in behalf of Moses, who was the meekest man upon earth. See AARON.

It is not easy to determine, whether the sedition of Korah, Dathan and Abiram happened after the arrival of the Hebrews at Kadesh-barnea, or before. (See KORAH.) At Kadesh, where Miriam died, the people murmured for water, which Moses and Aaron supplied, by causing it to gush out of a rock. But as they showed some distrust in the Lord, he condemned them to die in the wilderness, without entering the land of promise. Hence they called this encampment Meribah, or waters of contradiction. At Zalmonah, it is thought Moses erected the brazen serpent, to heal those who had been bitten by fiery serpents. Being come to mount Pisgah, in the desert of Kedemoth, he despatched ambassadors to Sihon, king of the Amorites, to solicit a passage through his country, which being refused, Moses gave him battle, overcame him, and took all his territories. Some time afterwards, Og, king of Bashan, marched against Moses, and fought with him; but he was conquered and his country taken.

While encamped in the plains of Moab, at Shittim, Balak, king of Moab, invited Balaam to come and curse Israel. But the sorcerer having rather blessed than cursed them, he sent the daughters of Moab into the camp, to tempt them to idolatry and fornication. This wicked counsel had the desired effect; but Moses put to death all who had abandoned themselves to the worship of Baal-peor, to the number of 23,000, besides 1000 others who were executed by the judges. After this, the Lord commanded Moses to make war against the Midianites, who had sent their daughters, with those of Moab, to debauch Israel. Phinehas was appointed chief of the expedition, with 12,000 chosen men, who routed the Midianites.

On the first day of the eleventh month of the fortieth year after the coming out of Egypt, Moses, being in the fields of Moab, and knowing that he was not to pass over Jordan, made a long discourse to the people, recapitulating all he had done, and all that had happened from the coming out of Egypt. He set before them the happiness that would attend their constancy and fidelity, and the calamities which would punish their prevarication. He put into the hands of the priests and elders a copy of the law, with an injunction to have it read solemnly every seventh year in a general assembly of the nation. He composed an excellent canticle or poem, in which he exclaimed against their future infidelity, and threatened them with all the evils that in after-ages came upon them. A little before his death, he annexed to each of the tribes a particular blessing, in which he mingled several prophecies and predictions.

At the beginning of the twelfth month, the Lord commanded him to ascend mount Nebo, where he obtained a view of the country, both on this side and beyond Jordan. "So Moses, the servant of the Lord, died there in the land of Moab, over against Beth-peor; but no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day. And Moses was 120 years old when he died: his eye was not dim nor his natural force abated. And the children of Israel wept for Moses in the plain of Moab thirty days." It is added, "There arose not a prophet since like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face: in all the signs and wonders which the Lord sent him to do in the land of Egypt, to Pharaoh, and to all his servants, and to his land: and in all that mighty hand, and in all the great terror which Moses showed in the sight of all Israel."

Moses is the most ancient writer of whom there remain any authentic works. He has left us the Pentateuch, or the five books—Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers and Deuteronomy—which were probably not originally separate works, as we find them now. These books are acknowledged as authentic and inspired, by both Jews and Christians. Some difficulties have been started about their author, because a few later passages have been inserted. But these additions make no alteration in the sense: they are by way of illustration only. See BIBLE.

In addition to the Pentateuch, the Jews ascribe to Moses eleven Psalms, from xc. to c.; but there is no sufficient proof that these were all written by him. The greater part of the titles of the Psalms are not original, nor indeed very ancient, and some of them are wrongly placed. Besides, in these Psalms we find the names of persons, and other marks, that by no means agree with Moses.

Some of the ancients believe that Moses was the author of the book of Job. Origen is of opinion, that he translated it out of Syriac, or Arabic, into Hebrew; in which he is followed by many of the moderns.

As to the death and burial of Moses, many difficulties have been raised. Scripture tells us expressly, that Moses died, according to the word of the Lord, Deut. ult. 5, 6. But as the Hebrew (ל-ק-י-י-י) literally imports, upon the mouth of the Lord, the rabbins have imagined that the Lord took away his soul by a kiss. Others have maintained that he did not die; and some have supposed that he was translated into heaven.

The rabbins do not content themselves with the miracles that Scripture relates of Moses, but add many particulars of a spurious description; as, for example, that he was born circumcised; that the daughter of Pharaoh, who found him on the banks of the Nile, was leprous, and that as soon as she touched the ark in which the infant lay, she was immediately cured; that when it was known to Pharaoh that Moses had killed an Egyptian, he condemned him to lose his head; but God permitted that his neck should become as hard as a pillar of marble, and the rebound of the sword killed the executioner.

The history of Moses was so famous, for many ages, in almost all countries, that it is no wonder writers of different nations have each represented it after his own manner. The orientals, the ancient Grecians, the Egyptians, the Chaldeans, the Romans, have all made additions to his history. Some of them have improved on the miracles that the Scripture relates concerning his life; others have disguised his story by adding to it not only false, but mean and trifling, circumstances, of which we have just given a specimen. The character and life of this legislator is, however, one of the finest subjects for the pen of a philosophical historian, who is at the same time a competent antiquary.

His institutes have not only been maintained for several thousands of years, and by Jews, however dispersed in all parts of the globe, but they retain a vigor that promises a perpetuity, unless disturbed by some omnipotent interference. They have withstood the fury of persecution, and the more dangerous snares of seduction. They are essentially the same in China and in India as in Persia and in Europe. They may have been neglected, they may have been interpolated, they may have been abused, yet they are the same. Nor is the nation insensible to its relation in all its branches: the principle of consanguinity is allowed and felt throughout. It is impossible not to discern the hand of Providence in the fate of this people. To assign too positively the termination of the Mosaic institutions, were rash; for even supposing the general conversion of the body of the Jewish nation to Christianity, it does not follow that every rite established under the Mosaic economy, should absolutely cease and determine.

MOTE, see EYE.

MOTH, an insect which flies by night, and of which there are many kinds. As some of them are particularly attached to woollen cloth, which they consume, &c. they are alluded to in Scripture under that description, Job xiii. 28; Isa. l. 9; Jam. v. 2. The moth is, as it were, a night butterfly, and is distinguished from the day butterfly by having its antennæ, or horns, sharp-pointed, not tufted. In Job iv. 19, we read, "How much less in them who dwell in houses of clay, whose foundation is in the dust; which are crushed before the moth." The Hebrew עוּ, osh, is employed to describe the moth in other passages of this poem, as ch. xiii. 28; xxvii. 18. and elsewhere. This creature is usually taken for the moth which consumes clothes and wool, by reducing them to a dust and powder. But, perhaps, it is more properly a moth-worm, for the moth itself is called עוּ, ses, and is joined with עוּ, osh, in Isaiah li. 8. This moth-worm is one state of the creature, which first is enclosed in an egg, whence it issues a worm; after a time it quits this worm state, to assume that of the complete insect, or moth. It cannot be, then, to a moth flying against a house and oversetting it, (as Mr. Harvey conjectured,) that this comparison is intended; but to the gradual consumption of the dwelling of the worm by its erosion; q. d. "As the habitation of a worm is consumed by its inhabitant, so is the person of man: it is no more capable of resisting disease than a woollen cloth is capable of resisting decay, when devoured and demolished by the worm appointed to it;" otherwise, "Crushed as a feeble and contemptible insect is crushed; as we crush a moth-worm, without reluctance or compunction."

MOTHER. This word is sometimes used for a metropolis, the capital city of a country, or of a tribe; and sometimes for a whole people, 2 Sam. xx. 19. The synagogue is the mother of the Jews, as the church is of Christians. Isaiah asks, (l. 1.) "Where is the bill of your mother's divorce, whom I have put away?" that is, of the synagogue; and Paul, (Gal. iv. 26.) says, "Jerusalem which is above, is free, which is the mother of us all." The great Babylon, that is, Rome, is called in the Revelation, "the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth," that is, of idolatry, Rev. xvii. 5.

A mother in Israel signifies a brave woman, whom God uses to deliver his people. This name is given to Deborah, Judg. v. 7. Wisdom calls herself the mother of chaste love. The earth, to which at our death we must all return, is called the mother of all men, Eccles. xl. 1.

MOUNTAINS. Judea is a mountainous country, but the mountains are generally beautiful, fruitful and cultivated. Moses says, (Deut. xxxii. 13.) that the rocks of its mountains produce oil and honey, by a figure of speech, which elegantly shows their fertility. He says, (Deut. viii. 7, 9.) that in the mountains of Palestine spring excellent fountains; and that their bowels yield iron and brass. He desired earnestly of the Lord, that he might see the fine mountains of Judea and Libanus, Deut. iii. 25. The most famous mountains mentioned in Scripture are, SEIR in Idumea—HOREB, near Sinai, in Arabia Petrea—SINAI, in Arabia Petrea—HOR, in Idumea—GILBOA, south of the valley of Jezreel—NEBO, a mountain of Abarim—TABOR, in Lower Galilee—EN-GEDI, near the Dead sea—LIBANUS and ANTI-LIBANUS—GERIZIM, in Samaria—EBAL, near to Gerizim—GILEAD, beyond Jordan—AMALEK, in Ephraim—MORIAH, where the temple was built—PARAN, in Arabia Petrea—GAHASH, in Ephraim—OLIVET—PISGAI, beyond Jordan—HERMON, beyond Jordan, near Libanus—CARMEL, near the Mediterranean sea, between Dora and Ptolemais. There are many other mountains, famous for having cities on them; as Hebron, Samaria, Nazareth, Gibeon, Shophim, Shilo, &c.

The Hebrews frequently give to mountains the epithet eternal, because they are as old as the world itself, Gen. xlix. 26; Deut. xxxiii. 15. They were sometimes retired to as places of security.

Mountains and their properties are frequently objects of comparison in Scripture—their elevation, their stability, the breadth of their bases, &c. Many extraordinary events narrated in sacred history, took place on mountains, which seem to form, by their very structure and appearance, proper places of seclusion.

MOURNING. The Hebrews, at the death of their friends and relations, gave all possible demonstrations of grief and mourning. They wept, tore their clothes, smote their breasts, fasted, and lay upon the ground, went barefooted, pulled their hair and beards, or cut them, and made incisions on their breasts, or tore them with their nails, Lev. xix. 28; xxi. 5; Jer. xvi. 6. The time of mourning was commonly seven days; but it was lengthened or shortened according to circumstances. That for Moses and Aaron was prolonged to thirty days, which Josephus says, ought to be sufficient for any wise man, on the loss of his nearest relation, or his dearest friend.

During the time of their mourning, the near relations of the deceased continued sitting in their houses, and ate on the ground. The food they took was thought unclean, and even themselves were judged impure: "Their sacrifices shall be unto them as the bread of mourners; all that eat thereof shall be polluted," Hos. ix. 4. Their faces were covered, and in all that time they could not apply themselves to any occupation, nor read the book of the law, nor say their usual prayers. They did not dress themselves, nor make their beds, nor uncover their heads, nor shave themselves, nor cut their nails, nor go into the bath, nor salute any body. Nobody spoke to them unless they spoke first. Their friends commonly went to visit and comfort them, bringing them food, according to Prov. xxxi. 6, 7: "Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine to those that be of heavy heart. Let him drink and forget his poverty, (or affliction,) and remember his misery no more." (Compare BAPTISM for the dead.) Anciently, they set bread and meat at the tombs of the dead, that the poor might have the benefit of it, Tob. iv. 18;

Ecclus. xxx. 18; Baruch vi. 26, 31. They also went up to the roof, or upon the platform of their houses, to bewail their misfortune: "Through all the cities of Moab (says Isaiah) they shall gird themselves with sackcloth: on the tops of their houses, and in their streets, every one shall howl, weeping abundantly," chap. xv. 3. And (xxii. 1.) speaking to Jerusalem, he says, "What aileth thee now, that thou art wholly gone up to the house-tops?"

They hired women to weep and mourn, and also persons to play on instruments, at the funerals of the Hebrews. Persons in years were carried to their graves by sound of trumpet, as Servius says, and younger people by the sound of flutes. In Matt. ix. 23, we observe a company of players on the flute, at the funeral of a girl of twelve years of age. All that met a funeral procession, or a company of mourners, out of civility were to join them, and to mingle their tears with those who wept. Paul seems to allude to this custom when he says, "Rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep," Rom. xii. 15. And our Saviour in the gospel, "The men of this generation are like unto children sitting in the market-place, and calling one to another, and saying, We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned to you, and ye have not wept," Luke vii. 32; Matt. xi. 17.

When our Saviour was led away to his crucifixion, the women of Jerusalem followed him, making great lamentations, (Luke xxiii. 27.) and when the daughter of Jephthah was devoted by her father, she went with her companions upon the mountains, to lament her leaving the world without being married, Judg. xi. 38. In Palestine and Syria, the women go out into the burying-places at certain times, there to mourn for the death of their near relations.

The mourning habit among the Hebrews was not fixed either by law or custom. We only find in Scripture, that they used to tear their garments—a custom still observed; but they tear a small part merely, and for form's sake. Anciently, in times of mourning, they clothed themselves in sackcloth, or hair cloth, that is, in coarse or ill made clothes, of brown or black stuff. At this day, that they may not appear ridiculous, they wear mourning after the fashion of the countries where they live, without being constrained to it by any law.

MOUSE, or RAT, in Hebrew עכבר, Akbar, especially FIELD-MOUSE. By many this word is thought to denote the Jerboa, an animal described by Bruce, and which is classed by the Arabs under the El Akbar, or the largest of the Mus montanus. The accompanying engraving will afford a good idea of this curious creature, which is very different from the common mouse. But the Jerboa is more probably the animal called in the English translation coney. (See CONEY.) The word rendered mouse probably includes various species of these animals, some of which were eaten. Moses (Lev. xi. 29.) declared it to be unclean, which implies that it was sometimes eaten; and Isaiah (lxvi. 17.) reproaches the Jews with this practice. Mice made great havoc in the fields of the Philistines, after that people had taken the ark of the Lord, (1 Sam. v. 6, &c.) which induced them to send it back with mice and emerods of gold, as an atonement for the irreverence committed, and to avert the vengeance that pursued them. The Assyrians, who besieged Bethulia, when they saw the Hebrews come out of the city in order of battle, compared them to mice, saying, "See, the mice are coming forth out of their holes," Judith xiv. 12. Vulgate.

MOUTH. It has been observed, on the article ADORE, that to kiss one's hand, and to put it to one's mouth, was a sign of adoration. The Hebrews, by way of pleonasm, often say, He opened his mouth, and spoke, sung, cursed, &c. Also, that God opens the mouth of the prophets, puts words into their mouth, bids them speak what he inspires them with. To inquire at the mouth of the Lord, is to consult him, Josh. ix. 14. God says, that he will be a mouth to Moses and Aaron, Exod. iv. 15. "We will call the damsel, and inquire at her mouth;" let us know Rebekah's sentiments of the matter, Gen. xxiv. 57. "Let us hear what is in the mouth of Ahithophel," (2 Sam. xvii.) let us consult him about this affair.

To open the mouth, is often used emphatically for speaking aloud, boldly, freely: (1 Sam. ii. 1.) "My mouth is enlarged—opened—over my enemies," says Hannah, the mother of Samuel. (Comp. Ezek. xxiv. 27; Isa. lvii. 4.) In a contrary sense, to shut the mouth, to silence, is a mark of humiliation and affliction, Ps. evii. 42; xxxviii. 14. "To set their mouth against the heavens," (Ps. lxxxiii. 9.) is when they speak arrogantly, insolently and blasphemously of God.

God directs that his law should be always in the mouth of his people; i. e. that the Israelites commune frequently with one another about it. He forbids them so much as to pronounce the name of strange gods, Exod. xxiii. 13. To speak mouth to mouth, is a Hebraism, which we render by face to face, Numb. xii. 8. Heb. "With one mouth," is with common consent, Dan. iii. 51. To observe the mouth of the king, is to hear his words with attention, Eccles. viii. 2. To walk by the mouth of any one, is to obey his orders. To transgress against the mouth of the Lord, is to disobey his commands. You shall be justified by your own mouth; you shall be condemned out of your own mouth: by the good or ill use of your tongue.

Hosea says, (vi. 5.) the Lord has put the people to death by the words of his mouth; i. e. he foretold death (or captivity) to them by his prophets. Isaiah says of the Messiah, (xi. 4.) "He shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked." These expressions denote the absolute power of God, and that it requires only one breath to destroy his enemies—perhaps by his judicial sentence. The same prophet says, (xlix. 2.) "He hath made my mouth like a sharp sword." These ways of speaking energetically express the sovereign authority of God. "From the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh;" (Matt. xii. 34.) i. e. our discourses are the echo of the sentiments of our hearts. It is not what enters into the mouth that defileth the man; it is neither meat nor drink that makes us unclean in the sight of God.

MULBERRY-TREE. The word translated mulberry-tree signifies literally weeping, and indicates, therefore, some tree which distils balsam or gum. The particular species is not known, 2 Sam. v. 23, 24; 1 Chr. xiv. 14, 15. In Ps. lxxviii. 7, it is said that among other plagues with which the Lord visited Egypt, he destroyed their vines with hail, and their mulberry-trees with frost. The English translation reads sycamore-trees; which are common in Egypt. They have a leaf nearly resembling that of a mulberry-tree, and fruit something like figs; hence the word sycamore, from sycos, a fig or fig-tree, and morus, a mulberry-tree. See SYCAMORE.

MULE, the offspring of two animals of different species, as a horse and an ass.

There is no probability that the Jews bred mules, because it was forbidden to couple creatures of different species, Lev. xix. 19. But they were not forbidden to use them. Thus we may observe, especially after David's time, that mules, male and female, were common among the Hebrews: formerly they used only male and female asses, 2 Sam. xiii. 29; xviii. 9; 1 Kings i. 33, 38, 44; x. 25; xviii. 5, &c.

Some have thought that Anah, son of Zibeon, of the posterity of Seir, being in the desert, found out the manner of breeding mules. This opinion was much espoused by the ancients. But Jerome, who notices it in his Hebraical questions on Genesis, translates, "that Anah found hot waters." The Syriac says, a fountain; but rather it signifies a people whom Anah surprised and defeated. See ANAH.

MURDER. This crime among the Hebrews was always punished by death, but involuntary homicide was only punished by banishment. Cities of refuge were appointed for involuntary manslaughter, whither the slayer might retire, and continue in safety till the death of the high-priest, Numb. xxxv. 28. Then the offender was at liberty to return to his own house, if he pleased. A murderer was put to death without remission: the kinsman of the murdered person might kill him with impunity. Money could not redeem his life; he was dragged away even from the altar, if he had taken refuge there.

When a dead body was found in the fields, and the murderer was unknown, Moses commanded that the elders and judges of the neighboring places should resort to the spot, Deut. xxi. 1—8. The elders of the city nearest to it were to take a heifer, which had never yet borne the yoke, and were to lead it into some rude and uncultivated place, which had not been ploughed or sowed, where they were to cut its throat; the priests of the Lord, with the elders and magistrates of the city, were to come near the dead body, and washing their hands over the heifer that had been slain, they were to say: "Our hands have not shed this blood, nor have our eyes seen it shed. Lord, be favorable to thy people Israel, and impute not unto us this blood which has been shed in the midst of our country." This ceremony may inform us what idea they had of the heinousness of murder, and how much horror they conceived at this crime; also their fear that God might avenge it on the whole country; and the pollution that the country was supposed to contract, by the blood spilt in it, unless it were expiated or avenged on him who had occasioned it, if he could be discovered. (Comp. Psalm lxxiii. 13, also the action of Pilate, Matt. xxvii. 4.)

MURMURING, a complaint made for wrong supposed to have been received. Paul forbids murmuring, (1 Cor. x. 10.) as did also the wise man, Wisd. i. 11. God severely punished the Hebrews who murmured in the desert, and was more than once on the point of forsaking them, and even of destroying them, had not Moses appeased his anger by earnest prayer, Numb. xi. 33, 34; xii. xiv. 30, 31; xvi. 3; xxi. 4—6; Ps. lxxviii. 30.

MUSIC The ancient Hebrews had a great taste for music, which they used in their religious services, in their public and private rejoicings, at their feasts, and even in their mournings. We have in Scripture canticles of joy, of thanksgiving, of praise, of mourning; epithalamiums, or songs composed on occasion of marriage; as the Song of Songs, and Psalm xlv. which are thought to have been composed to celebrate the marriage of Solomon. Also mournful songs, as those of David on the deaths of Saul and Abner, and the Lamentations of Jeremiah on the destruction of Jerusalem. Also Psalms to celebrate the accession of a prince to his crown, as Psalm lxii. Songs of victory, triumph and gratulation, as that which Moses sung after passing the Red sea, that of Deborah and Barak, and others. The book of Psalms is an ample collection of different pieces for music, composed on all sorts of subjects by inspired authors.

Music is very ancient. Moses says that Jubal, who lived before the deluge, was the father of those who played on the kinnor, and the uggab, Gen. iv. 21. The kinnor manifestly signifies the harp, and uggab the ancient organ; answering to the Paudean pipes. Laban complains that his son-in-law Jacob had left him, without bidding him farewell, without giving him an opportunity of sending his family away "with mirth and with songs, with tabret and with harp." Moses, having passed over the Red sea, composed a song, and sung it with the Israelite men, while Miriam, his sister, sung it with dancing, and playing on instruments, at the head of the women. He caused silver trumpets to be made, to be sounded at solemn sacrifices, and on religious festivals. David, who had a great taste for music, seeing that the Levites were numerous, and not employed, as formerly, in carrying the boards, veils and vessels of the tabernacle, its abode being fixed at Jerusalem, appointed a great part of them to sing and to play on instruments in the temple.

Asaph, Heman and Jeduthun were chiefs of the music of the tabernacle under David, and of the temple under Solomon. Asaph had four sons, Jeduthun six, and Heman fourteen. These twenty-four Levites, sons of the three great masters of the temple music, were at the head of twenty-four bands of musicians, which served in the temple by turns. Their number there was always great, but especially at the chief solemnities. They were ranged in order about the altar of burnt-sacrifices. Those of the family of Kohath were in the middle, those of Merari on the left, and those of Gershon on the right hand. As the whole business of their lives was to learn and to practise music, it must be supposed that they understood it well; whether it were vocal or instrumental.

The kings also had their particualr music. Asaph was chief master of music to David. In the temple, and in the ceremonies of religion, female musicians were admitted as well as male; they generally were daughters of the Levites. Ezra, in his enumeration of those whom he brought back with him from the captivity, reckons 200 singing men and singing women. In 1 Chron. xv. 20, the Hebrew says, that Zechariah, Aziel and Sheniramoth presided over the seventh band of music, which was that of the young women.

As to the nature of their music, we can judge of it only by conjecture, because it has been long lost. Probably, it was a mixture of several voices, of which all sung together in the same tune, each according to his strength and skill; without musical counterpoint, or those different parts, and that combination of several voices and tunes, which constitute harmony in our concerts, or compounded music. Probably, also, the voices were generally accompanied by instrumental music. But if we may draw any conclusions in favor of their music from its effects, its magnificence, its majesty, and the lofty sentiments contained in their songs, we must allow it great excellence. David, by his skill on the harp, dispelled the melancholy vapors of Saul. Subsequently, Saul having sent messengers to apprehend David at Naioth in Ramah, the messengers no sooner heard the sound of the instruments of the prophets, than they were transported (as it were) by a divine enthusiasm, to engage in the service. Saul sent a second and a third company after them, who did the same; and at last came thither himself, but was equally seized by the divine Spirit, and began to experience prophetic sensations even before he came to the place where the prophets were assembled. The prophet Elisha, finding himself agitated, caused a minstrel to play before him, to calm his spirits into a temper fit to receive the divine Spirit.

The musical instruments of the Hebrews are, perhaps, what has been hitherto least understood of any thing in Scripture. Calmet considers them under three classes: (1.) stringed instruments; (2.) wind instruments, or divers kinds of flutes; (3.) different kinds of drums.

Of stringed instruments, are the nabel, and the psaltery, or psanneterim, Dan. iii. 5. These three names apparently signify nearly, or altogether, the same thing. They considerably resembled the harp; the ancient cythara, or the ashur, or the ten-stringed instrument; both were nearly of the figure  $\Delta$ : but the nablum, or psaltery, was hollow toward the top, and played on toward the bottom; whereas the cythara, or ten-stringed instrument, was played on on the upper part, and was hollow below: both were touched with a small bow, or fret, or by the fingers. The kinnor, or ancient lyre, had sometimes six, sometimes nine strings, strung from top to bottom; and sounded by means of a hollow belly, over which they passed: they were touched with a small bow, or fret, or by the finger. The ancient symphony was nearly the same as our viol. The sambuc was a stringed instrument, which was nearly the same, it is thought, as the modern psaltery.

We discover in Scripture various sorts of trumpets and flutes; of which it is difficult to ascertain the forms. The most remarkable of this kind is the ancient organ, in Hebrew uggab; the ancient pipe of Pan, now common among us.

Drums were of many kinds. The Hebrew toph, whence comes tympanum, is taken for all kinds of drums or timbrels. The zazelim is commonly translated by the LXX and the Vulgate, cymbala; instruments of brass, of a very clattering sound, made in the form of a cap, or hat, and struck one against the other, while held one in each hand. Later interpreters by zazelim understand the sistrum; an instrument anciently very common in Egypt. It was nearly of an oval figure, and crossed by brass wires, which jingled upon being shaken, while their ends were secured from falling out of the frame, by their heads being larger than the orifice which contained the wire.

The Hebrew mentions an instrument called shalishim, which the LXX translate cymbala; but Jerome sistra. It is found only 1 Sam. xviii. 6. The term shalishim suggests that it was of three sides, (triangular,) and it might be that ancient triangular instrument, which carrying on each side several rings, they were jingled by a stick, and gave a sharp, rattling sound. The original also mentions mezilothaim, which were of brass, and of a sharp sound. This word is usually translated cymbala: some, however, render it tintinabula, little bells, which is countenanced by Zechariah xiv. 20, which says, the time shall come when on the meziloth of the horses shall be written, "Holiness to the Lord!" We know that bells were anciently worn by horses trained for war, to accustom them to noise.

MUSTARD-TREE. The description which our Lord has given of the sinapi, or mustard-tree, in Matt. xiii. 31, 32, and the parallel passages, has given rise to much conjecture. His words are, "A grain of mustard seed, which a man took and sowed in his field; which indeed is the least of all seeds: but when it is grown, it is the greatest among herbs, and becometh a tree, so that the birds of the air come and lodge in the branches thereof." In order to account for the discrepancy which exists between this representation and the character of the sinapis nigra, or common mustard plant it has been supposed that this may, in the more favorable climates of the East, exceed by far, in its dimensions and strength, that which is found in these colder countries. Lightfoot cites a passage from the Talmud, in which a mustard-tree is said to have been possessed of branches sufficiently large to cover a tent; and Schencher describes and represents a species of the plant several feet high, and possessing a tree-like appearance.

In support of these conjectures, Dr. A. Clarke remarks, "Some soils, being more luxuriant than others, and the climate much warmer, raise the same plant to a size and perfection far beyond what a poorer soil, or a colder climate, can possibly do." Herodotus says, he has seen wheat and barley, in the country of Babylon, which carried a blade full four fingers' breadth, and that the millet and sesamum grew to an incredible size. The doctor states, that he has himself seen a field of common cabbages in one of the Norman isles, each of which was from seven to nine feet in height; and one in the garden of a friend, which grew beside an apple-tree, though the latitude of the place was only about 48 deg. 18 min. north, was fifteen feet high. These facts, and several others, which might be adduced, fully confirm, Dr. Clarke thinks, the possibility of what our Lord says of the mustard-tree, however incredible such a thing may appear to those who are acquainted only with the productions of the northern regions and cold climates.

These are striking specimens of the great difference which is found to obtain among productions of the same species in different climates and countries; but, then, their distinctive character remains the same; whereas the reference in our Lord's parable implies so essential a difference as, on these principles, to convert an herbaceous plant into a tree, which destroys the identity of its character.

For the purpose of removing these difficulties, Mr. Frost some time since published a work, in which he maintains that the sinapi of the New Testament does not signify any species of the genus we now designate sinapis, but a species of the phytolacca. We shall transcribe some passages from his work, and leave the reader to form his own judgment as to the conclusive nature of the arguments.

"The seed of an herbaceous plant, for such is the sinapis nigra, or common mustard, cannot possibly produce a tree; and however great a degree of altitude and circumference the stem of common mustard might attain, yet it could not afford support for 'fowls of the air,' even allowing it to grow to the height of eight feet, which it never does.

"Mustard seed is not the smallest of all seeds, as the translation implies, because those of foxglove (digitalis purpurea) and tobacco (nicotiana tabacum) are infinitely smaller; these are herbaceous as well as mustard, (sinapis nigra), and even granting for a moment that the common mustard seed was intended, the above evidence would annul the validity of the translation. This discordancy has been endeavored to be reconciled by a reference to sinapis erucoides, or shrubby mustard; but even this has not the smallest seed: and allowing, for the sake of argument, that this shrub could, by luxuriance of soil and climate, increase in height and circumference, and throw off large branches, the size of the seed would remain the same, and the smallest of all seeds would not apply."

Among other statements made, as to the size to which the mustard plant will sometimes grow, Mr. Frost notices one writer, who observes that he saw one so large that it became a great bush, and was higher than the tallest man he had ever seen, and that he had raised it from seed. This our author readily conceives to be true, but does not consider it as all explanatory of the subject, because an annual plant, such as sinapis nigra is, cannot become even a shrub, much less a tree. Having thus endeavored to prove that the mustard seed of the New Testament is not procured from sinapis nigra, or any species of that genus, he next proceeds to show the identity that exists between kokkon sinapeos and phytolacca dodecandra, which he believes to be the dendron mega of the Scriptures: "Phytolacca dodecandra grows abundantly in Palestine; it has the smallest seed of any tree, and obtains as great, or even greater, altitude than any other in that country, of which it is a native.

"Common mustard is both used for culinary and medicinal purposes; so are several species of phytolacca. It is rather remarkable, that the acidity of the latter induced Linnæus to place that genus in the natural order Piperitæ, whilst De Jussieu referred it to the family Atriplicis, which certainly bears out its edible and acid properties. The North Americans call phytolacca dodecandra (commonly known in European gardens by the name of American pokeweed) wild mustard. Murray, in his Apparatus Medicaminum, enters into a long history of the excellent quality of the young shoots; but remarks, that when mature, they cannot be eaten with impunity. Linnæus, in his Materia Medica, refers to the same circumstances. Its being edible, may be inferred from the Greek term lachanon, which occurs Matt. xiii. 32, and Mark iv. 32.

"Mustard seed is applied externally, as a stimulant, in the form of a sinapism; and the foliage of phytolacca dodecandra was used as an outward application to cancerous tumors.

"Of the acid qualities of phytolacca dodecandra there can be no doubt; so that there appears a very strong analogy between the effects and properties of the general sinapis and phytolacca; besides which, I have ascertained the existence of a fourth ultimate chemical element, nitrogen, in the seed of a species of phytolacca. Nitrogen was said only to exist in plants belonging to the natural orders Cruciata and Fungi, in the former of which the common mustard, sinapis nigra, is placed."

Mr. Frost then proceeds to sum up his argument, showing that the phytolacca dodecandra is the tree mentioned in the Gospels from the following circumstances :—

“ Because it is one of the largest trees indigenous to the country where the observation was made; because it has the smallest seed of any tree in that country; because it is both used as a culinary vegetable and medicinal stimulant, which common mustard is also; because a species of the same genus is well known in the United States, by the term wild mustard; because the ultimate chemical elements of the seed sinapis nigra and phytolacca dodecandra are the same.”

In conclusion, the author adds the generic characters of the two vegetables, by which they are seen, botanically, to be very distinct families.

We must here express our regret that Mr. Frost should have thought it unnecessary to furnish a proper authentication, from the writings of accredited eastern travellers, of the various statements he has made relative to the phytolacca dodecandra.

MYNDUS, a maritime city of Caria, 1 Mac. xv. 23.

MYRA, a town of Lycia, where Paul embarked for Rome, on board a ship of Alexandria, Acts xxvii. 5.

MYRRH, MYRRHA, a gum yielded by a tree common in Arabia: which is about five cubits high; its wood hard, and its trunk thorny. Scripture notices two kinds, one which runs of itself, without incision; the other a kind which was employed in perfumes, and in embalming, to preserve the body from corruption. The Magi, who came from the East to worship Christ, offered to him myrrh, Matt. ii. 11.

In the Gospel (Mark xv. 23.) is mentioned myrrh and wine, or wine mingled with myrrh, which was offered to Jesus previous to his crucifixion, and intended to deaden in him the anguish of his sufferings. It was a custom among the Hebrews to give such kind of stupefying liquors to persons who were about to be capitally punished, Prov. xxxi. 6. Some have thought that the myrrhed wine of Mark is the same as the “ wine mingled with gall ” of Matthew; but others distinguish them. They suppose the myrrhed wine was given to our Lord from a sentiment of sympathy, to prevent him from feeling too sensibly the pain of his sufferings; while the potion mingled with gall, of which he would not drink, was given from cruelty. Others, however, think that Matthew, writing in Syriac, used the word marra, which signifies either myrrh, bitterness or gall; which the Greek translator took in the sense of gall, and Mark in the sense of myrrh. Wine mingled with myrrh was highly esteemed by the ancients.

MYRTLE, a beautiful evergreen tree, growing wild throughout the southern parts of Europe, north of Africa, and temperate parts of Asia; principally on the sea-coast. The leaves are of a rich and polished evergreen; the flowers white, with sometimes a tinge of red externally; and the berries are of the size of a small pea, violet or whitish, sweetish, and with the aromatic flavor which distinguishes the whole plant. These are eaten in the Levant, Isa. xli. 19; Iv. 13; Zech. i. 8; x. 11. *R.

MYRIA, a province of Asia Minor, bounded north by the Propontis; west by the Egean sea; south by Lydia; and east by Bithynia. Paul preached in this country, Acts xvi. 7, 8.

MYSTERY, a secret. All false religions have their mysteries; that is, certain things kept private, not to be divulged, or exposed indifferently to all; but known only to the initiated. The pagans had their mysteries, but they were mysteries of iniquity; shameful mysteries, concealed because their exposure would have rendered their religion contemptible, ridiculous and odious. If men of sense and honor had known what was practised in the mysteries of certain false deities, they would have abhorred them. (See Bibl. Repository, ii. p. 261.) Scripture often speaks of the infamous mysteries of Astarte, Adonis and Priapus, wherein a thousand infamous actions were practised, and called religion. Baruch speaks of the prostitutions practised in honor of Venus at Babylon, chap. vi. 42, 43. The whole religion of the Egyptians was mysterious; but these pretended mysteries were invented subsequently, to conceal the folly and vanity of it. They could not vindicate, for example, the adoration paid to brutes, but by saying that their gods had sometimes assumed these shapes. In the Maccabees, mention is made of the mysteries of Bacchus, of the ivy imprinted on every one that was initiated therein, and of the garlands of ivy worn by those who assisted at these ceremonies, 1 Mac. vi. 7; 2 Mac. vi. 7. Asa, king of Judah, would not suffer the queen his mother to continue to preside over the mysteries of Priapus, 1 Kings xv. 13. No doubt but they gave mysterious and secret reasons for the worship of Moloch, and for offering human sacrifices to him. It was, perhaps, a perverse imitation of Abraham's intended sacrifice of Isaac. The Phœnicians assigned a reason, not unlike this, for their cruel sacrifices to Hercules and to Saturn.

Taking the term mystery in another sense for typical, or predictive, we may say that the religion of the Jews was full of mysteries; the whole nation was a mystery, according to Augustin. It represented the people of Christ, and the Christian religion. Whatever happened to them, whatever they practised, all that was commanded, or forbidden them, was figurative, according to Paul. Their sacrifices, their priesthood, their purifications, their abstinence from certain sorts of food, included mysteries which have been explained by Christ and his apostles. The passage over the Red sea symbolized baptism. The brazen serpent prefigured the cross and death of Christ. Sarah and Hagar, Isaac and Ishmael, denoted the two covenants. The tabernacle and its vessels hinted at the worship of God in the Christian church. The priesthood of Aaron has been admirably explained by Paul of the priesthood of Christ; who himself discovered the mystery of Jonah's being three days in the whale's belly; that of the manna which represented his body and blood; and that of the union of Adam and Eve. The repobation of the Jews, and the adoption of the Gentiles, were intimated in a hundred passages of Scripture; by Hagar and Sarah, by Ishmael and Isaac, by Ephraim and Manasseh, by Saul and David, by Absalom and Solomon, and even by Moses and Aaron, who were not permitted to enter the land of promise.

The prophecies concerning the person, the coming, the character, the death and passion of the Messiah, appear in a multitude of places in the Old Testament; but figuratively and mysteriously. The actions, the words, the lives of the prophets, were a continual and general prophecy, concealed from the people, and sometimes from the prophets themselves, and not explained and discovered till after the birth and death of Christ. These mysteries, too, were dispensed so wisely, that the first served as a foundation for the second, and the succeeding illustrated those that preceded. Daniel is much more explicit than the earlier prophets; Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi speak of the coming, of the death, and of the priesthood of Jesus Christ, and of the calling of the Gentiles, more distinctly than the prophets before them.

The word mystery is also taken for secrets of a higher order, supernatural; for those the knowledge of which God has reserved to himself, or has sometimes communicated to his prophets and friends. Daniel gives to God the name of "revealer of mysteries;" he tells Nebuchadnezzar, that only God who reigns in heaven can reveal hidden mysteries, things to come.

Our Saviour says to his disciples, (Matt. vi. 7.) that they are peculiarly happy, because God has revealed to them the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven. Paul often speaks of the mystery of the gospel, of the mystery of the cross of Christ, of the mystery of Christ which was unknown to former ages, of the mystery of the resurrection, &c. Mystic Babylon, the great harlot, had written on her forehead, MYSTERY, to show that she represented not any particular woman, but a corrupted and idolatrous people.

The mysteries of the Christian religion, as the incarnation of the Word, his hypostatical union with his human nature, his miraculous birth, death, resurrection, ascension, his grace, and the manner of its operation in our hearts, the resurrection of the dead, &c. are objects of faith to all true Christians.

These, then, were called mysteries, the doctrine of the gospel, the tenets of Christianity, and the Christian sacraments; not only because they included secrets which had not been known, if the Son of God and his Holy Spirit had not revealed them, but also because they were not opened indifferently to every body; according to the advice of Christ to his apostles, "Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine." Preachers in their sermons, and ecclesiastical writers in their books, did not fully express themselves on all the mysteries. They said enough to be understood by the faithful; while to the pagans they were secrets, mysteries. This precaution continued long in the church.

The Greek word mystery is expressed by the Latin word sacramentum; denoting the sacraments and mysteries of the Christian church. "God has made known unto us the mystery of his will;" his incarnation, his coming, his gospel.

So far Calmet: but the word mystery has been so repeatedly discussed, and the import of it, apparently, so often perverted, that it demands a few additional remarks. What follows is from Mr. Taylor.

We never hear the word mystery, without thinking of the old English term MAISTERIES; c. g. the maisterie of the Merchant Taylors, the maisterie of the Cordonniers, (cordwainers,) and of other arts and trades. In fact, the term is still currently used in the city of London: "the art and mystery of," occurs in the indentures of apprenticeship, used in most branches of business; meaning, that which may be a difficulty, or even an impossibility, to a stranger, to a novice, to a person only beginning to consider the subject, but which is perfectly easy and intelligible to a master of the business; whose practice, and whose understanding, have been long cultivated by habit and application. Or mystery may be defined a secret: and a secret will always remain such to those who use no endeavors to discover it. We often hear it said, such a person holds such a mode of accomplishing such a business, a secret. Now, imagine one who wishes to know this secret; he labors, strives, &c. but unless he proceed in the right mode, the object still continues concealed: suppose the possessor of this secret shows him the process, teaches him, gives him information, &c. then that secret (mystery) is no longer mysterious to him; but he enjoys the discovery, and profits accordingly; while others, not so favored, are as much in the dark respecting this peculiar process, as he was.

Secrets may be considered as various: some are known to a few, but are unknown to the many; some are kept closely a long time, but are revealed in proper season; some are kept entirely, totally, and never are revealed; some are of a nature not to be investigated by us; and some so far surpass our powers, that however familiar their effects may be to our observation, yet their principles, causes, progresses, and distributions, exceedingly perplex our understanding, and confine us to probabilities, inference and conjecture. We might instance this in electricity, galvanism, magnetism, attraction or gravitation, &c.

We treat that this familiar illustration of the word mystery may not be despised because of its familiarity; as we incline to think, that it is not far from a scriptural acceptance of the term. Let us see its effect when applied to Scripture examples, 1 Tim. iii. 16. "Great is the mystery, secret, of godliness;" that is, a thing not to be comprehended at first sight; nor until after many reflections, and much consideration. Rom. xi. 25, "I would not have you ignorant of this mystery, secret, that blindness in part hath happened to Israel;" strange indeed, if mystery denoted something utterly incomprehensible and inexplicable, that the apostle should wish them not to be ignorant of it! that he should instantly open to them this mystery! To the Jews, indeed, it was still a secret; and they did not believe the fact, that they labored under any blindness at all; while to the apostle, and among his fellow Christians, the mystery was clear and well understood. 1 Cor. xv. 16, "Behold, I show you a mystery—we shall not all sleep"—change the phrasology; "Behold, I tell you a secret, we shall not all sleep;" could the apostle mean to show them a thing utterly incomprehensible? 1 Cor. xiii. 2, the apostle speaks of a man's understanding all mysteries; that is, they were easy to him, though not so to others. In 1 Cor. xiv. 2, he alludes to a man who, discoursing in a language foreign to his auditors, may in the Spirit speak mysteries: he may tell all manner of secrets in a foreign language; but while he himself understands perfectly well his own meaning, and what he says, yet his subjects of discourse, with all his explanations of those subjects, will continue secrets to such as are ignorant of the language he uses. "We speak the wisdom of God in a mystery," says the apostle; (1 Cor. ii. 7.) that is, the wisdom hitherto kept secret; but now the secret is explained, is opened, is let out; not indeed to the princes of the world; to them it is as much a secret as ever; but God by his Spirit hath given us information respecting it, and by that we know and understand it. "Stewards of the mysteries of God," that is, persons intrusted with some of the secrets of God, for the benefit of his church, 1 Cor. iv. 1.

So the calling of the Gentiles separately from the Jews, was a mystery, a secret, which no Jew would have thought of, or would have believed, had not God opened, and explained, and enforced it, by his Spirit, &c.; (Eph. iii. 3—6.) nor would any Gentile: it would have remained unknown, unsuspected.

Mystery signifies also an allegory, that is, a mode of information under which partial instruction is given, a partial discovery is made, but there is still a cover of some kind, which preserves somewhat of secrecy: this the person who desires to know the secret thoroughly must endeavor to remove. So the mystery of the seven stars, (Rev. i. 20.) is an allegory representing the seven Asiatic churches under the figure, or symbol, of seven burning lamps. So the mystery, "Babylon the Great, is an allegorical representation of the spiritual Babylon, spiritual idolatry, spiritual fornication, &c. and to this agrees the expression afterwards, "I will tell thee the mystery of the woman;" that is, I will explain to thee the allegory of this figure, Rev. xvii. 5, 7.

We apprehend that, originally, the fathers understood the word in this sense; so the mystery of the sacrament of the Lord's body and blood, is the figurative representation of the Lord's body. But the mysteries among the heathen in time perverted this, and the true idea of the word mystery, into sentiments not merely unscriptural, but unwarrantable and unwise. It may be proper here to state that the heathen mysteries continued to be performed with great pomp, during the second and third centuries of Christianity; and were not wholly suppressed till the emperor Theodosius closed the temples, more than a hundred years later.

Nevertheless, it cannot be denied, that there are mysteries, in the highest sense of the word, in Nature, Providence and Grace. The union of the human soul and body is a profound secret: the origin of life is a profound secret: the cause, manner, &c. of thought is a deep secret. So are many dispensations of Providence: why goodness should suffer and evil prosper, is a secret: and why one is called and another left, is a secret of secrets, a mystery of grace!

If the ways and works of God are mysteries, we may justly expect to find his attributes, his essence, his perfections, his nature, inscrutable mysteries to us, poor worms of mankind! Could we suppose—pardon the supposition—that God were inclined to instruct us in this, it would be (as we are constituted at present) teaching us a maisterie, which we have no faculties capable of learning; it would be speaking to us in a language of which we could never comprehend a word; it would be overwhelming us with too mighty, too extensive, too profound, too exalted, discoveries, unless we were previously endued with the attributes and qualities of the divine nature; with immensity, infinity, ubiquity, omniscience, eternity, in short, with deity!

Now, since none denies the existence of God, because he cannot comprehend his nature and essence, which is a mystery; so none ought to deny exertions of his power, goodness, wisdom, &c. because they imply the exercise of what is secret to mankind in general: and this principle, which is undeniable in nature, ought to be equally undeniable in religion. In short, what relates to God may, rather must, always include much of mystery. Even the most direct and profound intercourse between the human powers, and their ineffable Creator, mental emotions, prayer and praise, may be secrets, that is, mysterious services, but not, therefore, less devout, or less acceptable.

MYSTICAL. The mystical sense of Scripture is that which is gathered from the terms or letter of various passages, beyond their literal signification. For example, Babylon signifies literally a city of Chaldea, the habitation of kings who persecuted the Hebrews, and who were overwhelmed in idolatry and wickedness. But John, in the Revelation, gives the name of Babylon, mystically, to the city of Rome. So Jerusalem is literally a city of Judea; but mystically, the heavenly Jerusalem; the habitation of the saints, &c. The serpent is, literally, naturally, a venomous reptile, but mystically is the devil, the old serpent, &c.

N

NAAMAN

I. NAAMAH, daughter of Lamech and Zillah, and sister of Tubal-cain, (Gen. iv. 22.) who is believed to have found out the art of spinning wool, and of making or enriching cloth and stuffs.

II. NAAMAH, an Ammonitess, wife of Solomon, and mother of Rehoboam, 1 Kings xiv. 21.

NAAMAN, a general in the army of Benhadad, king of Syria, who, being afflicted with a leprosy, was cured by washing seven times in the Jordan, agreeably to the command of Elisha the prophet, 2 Kings v. (Comp. Lev. xiv. 7, &c.)

The prophet having refused to receive a present offered to him by Naaman, the latter begged that he might be permitted to carry home two mules' burden of the earth of Canaan, assigning as a reason, that henceforth he would serve no God but Jehovah. It seems that his intention was to build an altar in Syria formed of that holy ground, as he conceived it to be, to which God had assigned the blessing of his peculiar presence, that he might daily testify his gratitude for the great mercy which he had received, that he might declare openly his renunciation of idolatry, and that he might keep a sort of communication, by simi-litude of worship, with the people who inhabited the land where Elisha dwelt, who had so miraculously cured him. This is perfectly consistent with the precept, (Exod. xx. 24.) "An altar of earth shalt thou make unto me;" and it is very credible, that the temporary altars were usually of earth; especially on the high places. To such an altar, apparently, Elijah, after repairing it, added twelve stones, in allusion to the twelve tribes of Israel, 1 Kings xviii. 31. See, however, another suggestion in respect to this passage, under BAPTISM, p. 143.

Elisha having consented to this request, Naaman again addressed the prophet thus: "In this thing the Lord pardon thy servant, that when my master goeth into the house of Rimmon to worship there, and he leaneth on my hand, and I bow myself in the house of Rimmon; when I bow down myself in the house of Rimmon, the Lord pardon thy servant in this thing." And Elisha said to him, "Go in peace." This passage has given rise to many scruples. Many commentators think, that Naaman only asks leave to continue those external services to his master Benhadad, which he had been used to render him, when he entered the temple of Rimmon; and that Elisha suffered him to accompany the king into the temple, provided he paid no worship to the idol. Others, translating the Hebrew in the past tense, suppose that Naaman mentions only his former sin, and asks pardon for it.

NAARATH, a city of Ephraim, (Josh. xvi. 7.) about five miles distant from Jericho.

NABAL, a rich but churlish man, of the tribe of Judah, and race of Caleb, who dwelt in the south of Judah, and who had a very numerous flock on Carmel, but refused to give David and his followers, in their distress, any provisions, though modestly requested to do so. David, resenting this harsh treatment, so contrary to the usages of eastern hospitality, armed 400 of his people, and resolved to put Nabal and his family to the sword. In the interim, however, one of Nabal's servants acquainted his wife Abigail with what had passed, and she, as a wise and prudent woman, having justified David's people, prepared provisions and refreshments, with which she appeased David. On her return home, Abigail apprized Nabal of the danger he had brought himself into, and her account had such effect on his mind, that he became as immovable as a stone, and died in ten days, 1 Sam. xxv. 25, &c.

NABATHEANS, or NABATHENIANS, Arabians descended from NEBAJOTH. Their country is called Nabathæa, and extends from the Euphrates to the Red sea, the chief cities of which are Petra, the capital of Arabia Deserta, and Medaba.

NABONASSAR, the first king of Babylon. See BABYLON, p. 138.

NABOPOLASSAR, see NEBUCHADNEZZAR I.

NABOTH, an Israelite of Jezreel, who lived under Ahab, king of Israel, and had a vineyard in Jezreel, near to the king's palace, which he refusing to transfer to the king, was, by the command of Jezebel, falsely accused of blasphemy, condemned, and stoned to death, 1 Kings xxi. Jezebel immediately went to the king, and wished him joy of the vineyard, of which Ahab instantly took possession. See AHAB, JEZEBEL, and 2 Kings ix. 10.

NACHON. The floor of Nachon (2 Sam. vi. 6.) was either so called from the name of its proprietor; or, which is more probable, the Hebrew denotes the prepared floor, that is, the floor of Obed-edom, which was near, and was prepared to receive the ark. This place, wherever it might be, was either in Jerusalem, or very near Jerusalem, and near the house of Obed-edom, in that city.

I. NADAB, son of Aaron, and brother of Abihu, who offered incense to the Lord with strange, that is, common, fire, not with that which had been miraculously lighted on the altar of burnt-offerings, was slain by the Lord together with his brother, Lev. x. 2.

II. NADAB, son of Jeroboam I. king of Israel, succeeded his father A. M. 5050, and reigned but two years, being assassinated while besieging Gibbethon, by Baasia, son of Abijah, of the tribe of Issachar, who usurped his kingdom. Scripture says Nadab did evil in the sight of the Lord, 1 Kings xv. 25.

NAHALAL, and NAHALOL, a city of Zebulun, (Josh. xix. 15.) yielded to the Levites, and given to the family of Merari, Josh. xxi. 35. The children of Zebulun did not make themselves complete masters of it, but permitted the Canaanites to dwell in it, Judg. i. 30.

NAHAHEL, an encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness, (Numb. xxi. 19.) which Eusebius places on the Arnon.

I. NAHASH, a king of the Ammonites, who, besieging Jabesh-Gilead, was defeated and killed by Saul, 1 Sam. xi. The piece of mutilating barbarity proposed to the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead, by Nahash, "that I may thrust out all your right eyes, and lay it for a reproach upon Israel," perhaps by altering the name of the town to that of "those who have lost their right eyes," is worthy of notice. We must, however, recollect, that the loss of the eyes is a punishment regularly inflicted on rebels and others in the East. Mr. Hanway, in his "Journey in Persia," gives very striking instances of this practice; and the cruelty of which, and the sight of the streaming blood, were felt by that gentleman as a man of humanity and a Christian must feel them. See BLIND, p. 195, 196.

II. NAHASH, a king of the Ammonites, and a friend to David; probably son to the above, 2 Sam. xvii. 27.

III. NAHASH, father of Abigail and Zeruiah, is thought to be the same as Jesse, father of David. (Comp. 2 Sam. xvii. 25, and 1 Chron. ii. 13, 15, 16.) This perhaps might be the surname of Jesse, the father of David. Others think that Nahash is the name of Jesse's wife; but the first explication seems to be the best.

NAHASSON, son of Aminadab, and head of the tribe of Judah at the exodus, Numb. vii. 12, 13.

I. NAHOR, son of Serug, and father of Terah, was born A. M. 1849, and died aged 148 years, Gen. ix. 22, 24.

II. NAHOR, son of Terah, and brother of Abraham, Gen. xi. 26. He married Milcah, daughter of Haran, by whom he had several sons—Huz, Buz, Kemuel, Kesed, Hazo, Pildash, Jidlaph and Bethuel. Nahor fixed his habitation at Haran, which is, therefore, called the city of Nahor, Gen. xxiv. 10.

NAHUM, the seventh of the twelve minor prophets. The circumstances of Nahum's life are unknown. His prophecy consists of three chapters, which form one discourse, in which he foretells the destruction of Nineveh, in so powerful and vivid a manner, that he seems to have been on the very spot.

Opinions are divided as to the time in which Nahum prophesied. Josephus says, he foretold the fall of Nineveh 115 years before it happened, which makes him contemporary with Ahaz. The Jews say, that he prophesied under Manasseh; Clemens Alexandrinus places him between Daniel and Ezekiel, and, consequently, during the captivity. The best interpreters, as Gesenius, Rosenmüller, and others, adopt Jerome's opinion, that he foretold the destruction of Nineveh in the time of Hezekiah, and after the war of Sennacherib in Egypt, mentioned by Berosus. Nahum speaks of the taking of No-ammon, of the haughtiness of Rabshakeh, and of the defeat of Sennacherib, as things that were passed. He supposes that the tribe of Judah were still in their own country, and that they there celebrated their festivals. He notices also the captivity and dispersion of the ten tribes.

NAIL. Few things are more perplexing to distant strangers than those which are of daily occurrence in their own country; their very familiarity renders them beneath the notice of persons where they are practised, who, therefore, seldom report them, but where they are not practised, simple as they are in themselves, they occasion much perplexity to those who wish to understand what they read. Our translation renders by one word, nail, what the Hebrew employs two words to denote; a distinction which seems to import a difference.

(1.) The nail of Jael's tent, or rather the tent-pin, with which she killed Sisera, is called נַיִם, yáthéd; it was formed for penetrating earth, or other hard substance, when driven by sufficient force, as with a hammer; it includes the idea of strength. So, in Isa. xxii. 23, the idea is that of strength: "I will fasten him as a nail (נַיִם) in a sure place," that is, he shall be strong enough to support whatever is suspended on him. This illustrates an allusion of the prophet Zechariah, x. 4, "The Lord hath made (Judah) his flock of sheep, &c. which are naturally timid, as martial as a horse trained to battle; yea, out of Judah shall come the chief for the corner, (a hero,) out of Judah shall come the strong nail, or pike-head, (נַיִם,) which shall effect whatever is requisite, by force or strength; out of him shall come the battle-bow, with powers augmented by additional vigor; out of him shall come the general regulator, (the commander-in-chief, perhaps,) at once;" meaning, most probably, different ranks of men, (the lower class, the nail, humble but strong; a superior class, the battle-bow,) which, combined in their proper stations, should compose a formidable army. Observe, too, these shall come at once, without much disciplining; without that experience in former wars, which is usually necessary to form the complete military character.

We add Chardin's account of the manner of fastening nails in the East: "They do not drive with a hammer the nails that are put into the eastern walls; the walls are too hard, being of brick; or if they are of clay, they are too mouldering; but they fix them in the brick-work as they are building. They are large nails, with square heads like dice, well made, the ends bent so as to make them cramp-irons. They commonly place them at the windows and doors, in order to hang upon them, when they like, veils and curtains." (Harmer, vol. i. p. 191.)

(2.) But we have another word for nails, which seems to imply ornament, rather than strength; or something of dignified stability. So we read, 2 Chron. iii. 9, "The weight of the nails (מִסְמֵרוֹת, mismeroth) was fifty shekels of gold." These nails, then, being of gold, were used to adorn the holy place, no less than to strengthen it. We have the same word, though varied, in 1 Chron. xxii. 3. David prepared iron in abundance for the nails, (מִסְמֵרִים, mismirim), designed to ornament, no doubt, the leaves of the doors of the sanctuary entrance; for, had the intention been only to fasten these doors, what need of so great a quantity?

Observe how Ezra employs his simile, chap. ix. 8: "The Lord leaves us a remnant to escape, to give us a nail—not an ornamental nail, not a golden stud, but a yáthéd, a nail of support in his holy place." Can any thing be less arrogant, than assimilation to such a nail?

But the idea of Eccl. xii. 11, seems to be the reverse of this: "The words (sayings) of the wise are as goads," sharp, piercing, penetrating, stimulating, when taken each one by itself; but when combined they are like ornamental nails (mismeroth) planted in a regular order, and disposed in symmetrical rows, or patterns, as those were in the holy place, or those in the doors of the sanctuary.

This gives also the true import of the expression, Isa. xli. 7: "The image is ready for joining together," that is, the junctures fit accurately to each other, now fix them to each other; and he strengthens it, by driving in ornamental nails, nails of the best kind, (mismirim), or, at least, flat-headed nails, not brads; that it should not start, be separated, fall to pieces." This is very different from the usual notion of the passage, but is supported by Jer. x. 4: "They deck the image with silver and with gold; with ornamental nails, (mismeroth), and with piercings; they bind it tightly together, compact it, brace it up, and add to the whole a delicate coat of paint, for complete decoration;" as we know was customary in early antiquity.

NAIN, a city of Palestine, where Jesus restored a widow's son to life, as they were carrying him out to be buried. Eusebius says, it was in the neighborhood of Endor and Scythopolis; and elsewhere, that it was two miles from Tabor, south. The brook Kishon ran between Tabor and Nain.

NAIOTH, a town near Ramah, where David withdrew to avoid the violence of Saul; and where Samuel, with the sons of the prophets, dwelt, 1 Sam. xix. 23.

NAKEDNESS. This term, besides its ordinary and literal meaning, sometimes signifies, void of succor, disarmed. So, after worshipping the golden calf, the Israelites found themselves naked in the midst of their enemies. "Nakedness of the feet" was a token of respect. Moses put off his shoes to approach the burning bush. Most commentators are of opinion, that the priests served in the tabernacle and temple with their feet naked; which idea is countenanced by the fact, that in the enumeration that Moses makes of the habit and ornaments of the priests, he no where mentions any dress for the feet. Some also maintain, that the Israelites might not enter this holy place, till they had put off their shoes, and cleaned their feet. (See Eccles. v. 1.) "Nakedness of the feet" sometimes expresses what delicacy would conceal, Lam. i. 9.

"Nakedness" should in many places be understood as our word undressed;—not fully, or properly, or becomingly clothed. A king having on only his under-clothing, is undressed, that is, naked, for a king; though his garb might suit a laborer. When the apostle says, (1 Cor. iv. 11.) "To this present hour we are naked;" he does not mean absolute nakedness, in the same sense as Job says, (i. 21.) "Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return;" but he means unprovided with suitable clothing. To the same effect, a nation, or people, is said to be made naked; (Exod. xxxii. 25; 2 Chron. xxviii. 19.) "Asa made Judah naked;" unprovided with means of resisting the enemy. So the walls of Babylon are said to be made naked; (Jer. li. 58.) that is, stripped of their towers and other defences; and a tree in the wilderness is described as naked, deprived of its verdure, its foliage, Jer. xlviii. 6. In warm countries slight clothing, or even nakedness, is more endurable than with us; but when nakedness is put absolutely, it usually intends a shameful discovery of the person; ruthless privation of necessities, degradation, misery.

"Naked" is put for discovered, known, manifest. So Job xxvi. 6, "Hell is naked before him;" the sepulchre, the unseen state, is open to the eyes of God. Paul says in the same sense, "Neither is there any creature that is not manifest in his sight; but all things are naked and open unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do," Heb. iv. 13.

The nakedness of Adam and Eve was unknown, that is, unfelt; they were unconscious of it, before they sinned. They were not ashamed of it, because concupiscence and irregular desires had not yet excited the flesh against the spirit. They were exempt from whatever indecency might now happen among their descendants on occasion of nakedness.

NAME. "The name," without any addition, signifies the name of the Lord, which, out of respect, was not pronounced. "The Israelitish woman's son blasphemed THE NAME," Lev. xxiv. 11. "The name of God" often stands for God himself, his power, or majesty. Our assistance, or strength, and hope, is in the name of God, in his goodness, power, &c. To take the name of God in vain, (Exod. xx. 7.) is to swear falsely, or without occasion; or to mingle the name of God in our discourses, or oaths, either falsely, rashly, wantonly, unnecessarily, or presumptuously. God forbids to "make mention of the names of other gods," Exod. xxiii. 13. It is doing them too much honor to swear by their names, to take them as witnesses of what we affirm, as if they were really something. The Hebrews hardly ever pronounced the name Baal; they disfigured it, by saying Mephibosheth, or Meribosheth, instead of Mephibaal, or Meribaal; where Bosheth signifies something shameful or contemptible; instead of saying Elohim, they said Elilim, gods of filthiness.

To give a name is a token of command and authority. A father gives names to his children, a master to his slaves, to his animals. It is said, (Gen. ii. 23.) that Adam gave name to his wife and to all the animals, and that the names he gave them became their true names. God changed the name of Abram, Jacob and Sarai, as a token of honor, an addition, expressing his particular regard towards those whom he receives, more especially, into the number of his own. Hence he gave a name, even before their birth, to some persons whom he appointed, and who belonged to him in a particular manner: e. g. to Jedidiah, or Solomon, son of David, to the Messiah, to John the Baptist, &c.

God, speaking to Moses, promises to send his angel before him; and says, "My name is in him," Exod. xxiii. 21. He shall act, he shall speak, he shall punish in my name; he shall bear my name, he shall be my ambassador, he shall receive the same honors as belong to me. And in effect, the angel that spake to Moses, that appeared to him in the bush, that gave him the law on mount Sinai, speaks and acts always as God himself; and Moses always gives him the name of God: "Thus saith the Lord," and "The Lord spake to Moses," &c.

To know any one by his name, (Exod. xxxiii. 12.) expresses a distinction, a friendship, a particular familiarity. The kings of the East had little communication with their subjects, and hardly ever appeared in public; so that when they knew their servants by name, vouchsafed to speak to them, to call them, and to admit them into their presence, it was a great mark of favor. In many eastern countries the true personal name of the king is unknown to his subjects; in Japan, to pronounce the emperor's real name is punishable; his general name, as emperor, is held to be sufficiently sacred. Titles often became names, or parts of names; by these titles many sovereigns are known in history; and varying with incidents and occurrences, they occasion great confusion.

Those who in the assemblies were called by their names, (Numb. xvi. 2.) were principals of the people, the heads of tribes; or those who had some great employment, or particular dignity.

God, speaking of the fixed place where his temple should be built, calls it "The place which the Lord shall choose to place his name there," Deut. xiv. 23; xvi. 2. There his name should be solemnly invoked; this place should have the honor of bearing the name of the Lord, of being consecrated to his service and worship. These expressions show the veneration of the Hebrews for whatever in any wise belonged to God.

"Name" is often put for renown or reputation. The name of Joshua became famous over all the country; (Josh. vi. 27.) and God said to David, when he reproached him with the crime he had committed with Bathsheba, "I have made thee a great name, like unto the name of the great men that are in the earth;" (2 Sam. vii. 9.) I have given you honor and reputation, equal to that of the greatest of monarchs.

"To raise up the name of the dead," (Ruth iv. 5, 10, &c.) is said of the brother of a man who died without children, when his brother married the widow of the deceased, and revived his name in Israel, by means of the children which he might beget; and which were deemed to be children of the deceased. In a contrary sense to this, to blot out the name of any one, is to exterminate his memory; to extirpate his race, his children, works, or houses, and in general whatever may continue his name on the earth, Ps. ix. 5; Prov. x. 7.

Isaiah (iv. 1.) describes a time of calamity and disgrace in Israel, in which men should be very scarce: he says, "In that day seven women shall take hold of one man, saying, We will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel; only let us be called by thy name, to take away our reproach." Take us for wives, and let us be called your spouses. The Lord complains in Ezekiel, that his spouses (Judah and Israel) are become prostitutes, though they bore his name; they defiled his holy name by abominations and idolatry.

God often complains that the false prophets prophesied in his name; (Jer. xiv. 14, 15; xxvii. 15, &c.) and Christ says, (Matt. vii. 22.) that in the day of judgment many shall say, "Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name, and in thy name cast out devils, and in thy name done many wonderful works?" He also says, (Mark ix. 41.) whosoever shall give a cup of cold water in his name, shall not lose his reward; and he that receives a prophet or a just man, in the name of a prophet or a just man, shall receive a recompense in proportion to his good intention, Matt. x. 41. In all these instances the "name" is put for the person, for his service, his sake, his authority. So names of men are sometimes put for persons. Rev. iii. 4, "Thou hast a few names even in Sardis, which have not defiled their garments." And chap. xi. 13, seven thousand men perished in the earthquake,—names of men, Gr. Perhaps this should be considered as implying men of name, persons of consequence, nobles, &c. It is probable, also, that this phrase contains some allusion to a list or catalogue of names; very credibly, of eminent persons, for we find it in Acts ii. 15, expressing the apostles and principals of the Christian church—"The number of the names was about a hundred and twenty." There were many thousands of followers of Jesus in Jerusalem; but the apostles, the Seventy and some others, enough to make up about the number stated, were the principals.

There were certain mysterious notions connected with the names of individuals; hence, in calling a muster-roll of soldiers, the sergeants always began with names of good omen, as Felix, Faustus, &c. analogous to our Good-luck, Happy, &c. Also, the number comprised in the letters of a name was mysterious, as that of Antichrist. See that article.

NAOMI, wife of Elimelech, and mother-in-law of Ruth. See RUTH.

NAPHTALI, the sixth son of Jacob, by Bilhah, Rachel's handmaid, Gen. xxx. 8. We know but few particulars of the life of Naphtali. His sons were Jazheel, Guni, Jezer and Shillem, Gen. xli. 24. The patriarch Jacob, when he gave his blessing, said, as it is in the English Bible, "Naphtali is a hind let loose; he giveth goodly words," Gen. xlix. 21. For an illustration of this passage, see the article HIND.

NAPHTUHIM, the fourth son of Mizraim, Gen. x. 13. He dwelt in Egypt, and probably peopled that part of Ethiopia, between Syene and Meroe, of which Napata, or Napatea, was the capital.

NARCISSUS, a freedman and favorite of the Roman emperor Claudius, who possessed great influence at court, Rom. xvi. 11.

NATHAN, a famous prophet, who lived under David, and had much of the confidence of that prince, whom he served in a number of ways. (See 2 Sam. xi. xii. &c.) The time and manner of Nathan's death are not known. 1 Chron. xxix. 29, notices that he, with Gad, wrote the history of David. There are several other persons of this name mentioned in Scripture; one of them a son of David, 2 Sam. v. 14.

NATHANAEL, a disciple of Christ, the manner of whose conversion is related John i. 46, &c. He is probably the same as Bartholomew. See BARTHOLOMEW.

NATION, all the inhabitants of a particular country, (Deut. iv. 34.) a country or kingdom, (Exod. xxxiv. 10; Rev. vii. 9.) countrymen, natives of the same stock, (Acts xxvi. 4.) the father, head, and original of a people, (Gen. xxv. 23.) the heathen, or Gentiles, Isa. lv. 5. See GENTILES, or HEATHEN.

NATURE, in Scripture, expresses the course of things established in the world. So a crime is said to be against nature, because it is contrary to what is established by the Creator, Rom. i. 26; Judg. xix. 24. Paul says, to engraft a good olive-tree into a wild olive, is contrary to nature; (Rom. xi. 24.) the customary order of nature is thereby in some measure inverted. "Nature" is also put for natural descent; (Gal. ii. 15; Eph. ii. 3.) and for common sense, natural instinct, 1 Cor. xi. 14. The nature of animals is that by which they are distinguished from other creatures, and from one another, James iii. 7.

Peter informs us that our Saviour has made us partakers of a divine nature; he has merited for us the character of children of God, and grace to practise godliness, &c. like our Father who is in heaven. (Comp. 1 John iii. 1.)

NAVIGATION was little cultivated among the Hebrews, till the days of their kings: Solomon had a fleet, but he had not sailors equal to the management of it; no doubt, from their want of habit. Moses mentions nothing of navigation, and David, it should seem, rather acquired his great wealth by land commerce than by sea voyages. It is not easy to say what assistance the wisdom of Solomon contributed to his fleet and officers on the mighty ocean. Perhaps his extensive knowledge of natural things first suggested the plan of these voyages. We know that Judea had ports on the Mediterranean, as Joppa, &c. but probably the coast, during the days of the judges, was in the hands of the Philistines, to the exclusion of Hebrew mariners; and this accounts for the means by which the Philistines, on so narrow a slip of land, could become powerful, and could occasionally furnish immense armies, because they were free to receive reinforcements by sea. In later ages the Greeks and Romans invaded Syria by sea, and the intercourse between Judea and Rome was direct: as we learn from the voyage of Paul, &c. Comp. JOPPA.

There were also many boats and lesser vessels employed in navigating the lakes, or seas, as the Hebrews called them, which are in the Holy Land; and there must have been some embarkations on the Jordan; but the whole of these were trifling; and it appears, that though Providence taught navigation to mankind, yet it was not the design of Providence that the chosen people, and the depositaries of the Messiah, should have been other than a settled or local nation, attached to one country, to which country, and even to certain of its towns, peculiar privileges were attributed in prophecy, and by divine appointment. The legal observances, distinction of meats, &c. were great impediments to Jewish sailors, and prevented their attainment of any great skill in navigation.

NAZARENE, see NAZARITE.

NAZARETH, a little town of Zebulun, in lower Galilee, west of Tabor, and east of Ptolemais; celebrated for having been the residence of Christ for the first thirty-three years of his life, (Luke ii. 51.) and from which he received the name of Nazarene. After he had begun his mission, he sometimes preached here in the synagogue, (Luke iv. 16.) but because his countrymen had no faith in him, and were offended at the meanness of his origin, he did not many miracles among them, (Matt. xiii. 54, 58.) and fixed his habitation at Capernaum for the latter part of his life, Matt. iv. 13. Nazareth is situated on high ground, having on one side a precipice, from whence the Nazarenes one day attempted to throw down our Saviour, because he upbraided them with their unbelief, Luke iv. 29.

Nazareth is upon the side of a barren, rocky elevation, facing the east, and commanding a long valley, of a round, concave form, and encompassed with mountains. The place is shown where the house of the Holy Virgin stood; but the house itself, say the Catholics, was transported by angels to Loretto! Dr. E. D. Clarke, who describes Nazareth, mentions the village of Sephoury, in which is shown the house of St. Anna, the mother of the Virgin Mary, five miles from the town; the fountain near Nazareth, called the "Virgin Mary's fountain;" the great church, or convent, at that time the refuge of wretches afflicted with the plague, hoping for recovery from the sanctity of the place; Joseph's workshop, converted into a chapel; the synagogue wherein Jesus is said to have preached, now a church; the precipice, whence the inhabitants would have thrown our Lord, concerning which "the words of the evangelist are remarkably explicit; and it is, probably, the precise spot alluded to in the text of Luke's Gospel."—A stone, that is said to have served as a table to Christ and his disciples, is an object of worship to the superstitious of Galilee.

[The following description of Nazareth, and the "brow of the hill" on which it stood, is given by Dr. Jowett, (Chr. Researches in Syria, p. 128, Amer. ed.) "Nazareth is situated on the side, and extends nearly to the foot, of a hill, which, though not very high, is rather steep and overhanging. The eye naturally wanders over its summit, in quest of some point from which it might probably be that the men of this place endeavored to cast our Saviour down, (Luke iv. 29.) but in vain: no rock adapted to such an object appears. At the foot of the hill is a modest, simple plain, surrounded by low hills, reaching in length nearly a mile; in breadth, near the city, a hundred and fifty yards; but farther on, about four hundred yards. On this plain there are a few olive-trees, and fig-trees, sufficient, or rather scarcely sufficient, to make the spot picturesque. Then follows a ravine, which gradually grows deeper and narrower; till, after walking about another mile, you find yourself in an immense chasm, with steep rocks on either side, from whence you behold, as it were beneath your feet, and before you, the noble plain of Esdraelon. Nothing can be finer than the apparently immeasurable prospect of this plain, bounded to the south by the mountains of Samaria. The elevation of the hills on which the spectator stands in this ravine is very great; and the whole scene, when we saw it, was clothed in the most rich mountain-blue color that can be conceived. At this spot, on the right hand of the ravine, is shown the rock to which the men of Nazareth are supposed to have conducted our Lord, for the purpose of throwing him down. With the Testament in our hands, we endeavored to examine the probabilities of the spot; and I confess there is nothing in it which excites a scruple of incredulity in my mind. The rock here is perpendicular for about fifty feet, down which space it would be easy to hurl a person who should be unawares brought to the summit; and his perishing would be a very certain consequence. That the spot might be at a considerable distance from the city, is an idea not inconsistent with St. Luke's account; for the expression, thrusting Jesus out of the city, and leading him to the brow of the hill on which their city was built, gives fair scope for imagining, that, in their rage and debate, the Nazarenes might, without originally intending his murder, press upon him for a considerable distance after they had quitted the synagogue. The distance, as already noticed, from modern Nazareth to this spot is scarcely two miles—a space, which, in the fury of persecution, might soon be passed over. Or should this appear too considerable, it is by no means certain but that Nazareth may at that time have extended through the principal part of the plain, which I have described as lying before the modern town: in this case, the distance passed over might not exceed a mile. It remains only to note the expression—the brow of the hill, on which their city was built: this, according to the modern aspect of the spot, would seem to be the hill north of the town, on the lower slope of which the town is built; but I apprehend the word hill to have in this, as it has in very many other passages of Scripture, a much larger sense; denoting sometimes a range of mountains, and in some instances a whole mountainous district. In all these cases the singular word "hill," "gebél," is used, according to the idiom of the language of this country. Thus, Gebel Carmyl, or mount Carmel, is a range of mountains: Gebel Libnan, or mount Lebanon, is a mountainous district of more than fifty miles in length; Gebel ez-Zeitun, the mount of Olives, is certainly, as will be hereafter noted, a considerable tract of mountainous country. And thus any person, coming from Jerusalem and entering on the plain of Esdraelon, would, if asking the name of that bold line of mountains which bounds the north side of the plain, be informed that it was Gebel Nasra, the hill of Nazareth; though, in English, we should call them the mountains of Nazareth. Now the spot shown as illustrating Luke iv. 29, is, in fact, on the very brow of this lofty ridge of mountains; in comparison of which, the hill upon which the modern town is built is but a gentle eminence. I can see, therefore, no reason for thinking otherwise, than that this may be the real scene where our divine Prophet, Jesus, experienced so great a dishonor from the men of his own country, and of his own kindred." R.

NAZARITE, or NAZARENE, may signify, (1.) An inhabitant of Nazareth; or a native of that city. (2.) A sect of Christians. (3.) A man under a vow to observe the rules of Nazariteship; whether for his whole life, as Samson, and John the Baptist; or for a time, as those in Numb. vi. 18—20; Amos ii. 11, 12. (4.) A man of distinction and dignity in the court of a prince. (Compare the Bibl. Repository, ii. p. 388.)

(1.) The name of Nazarene is given to Christ, not only because of his having lived the greater part of his life at Nazareth, and because that place was considered as his country, but also because the prophets had foretold that "he should be called a Nazarene," Matt. ii. 23. We find no particular place in the prophets, expressly affirming, that the Messiah should be called a Nazarene; and Matthew only mentions the prophets in general. Perhaps he would infer that the consecration of Nazarites, and their great purity, was a type and prophecy referring to our Saviour; (Numb. vi. 18, 19.) or, that the name Nazir, or Nazarite, [separated,] given to the patriarch Joseph, had some reference to Christ, Gen. xlix. 26; Deut. xxxiii. 16. Jerome was of opinion, that Matthew alludes to Isa. xi. 1; lx. 21: "There shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a branch (Heb. Nezer) shall grow out of his roots." This branch, or Nezer, and this rod, are certainly intended to denote the Messiah, by the general consent of the fathers and interpreters. Or, possibly, in a more general sense, "He shall be vilified, despised, neglected," as every thing was that came from Nazareth; and this might be a kind of prophetic proverb.

(2.) It may reasonably be doubted, whether the Nazarenes or Nazaraens spoken of in early ecclesiastical history were heretics: it is more probable, that they were descendants of the original Jewish Christians, and, as Jews, were too harshly treated by those who should have been their Gentile brethren. They must have been well known to Jerome, who lived long in Judea, and who thus describes them in several places. Mentioning Hebrews believing in Christ, he says they were anathematized for their rigid adherence to the ceremonies of the Jewish law, which they mingled with the gospel of Christ: "They so receive Christ, that they disregard not the rites of the ancient law." He also describes the Nazarenes as persons "who believed in Christ the Son of God, born of the Virgin Mary," in whom the orthodox believe; but who were nevertheless so bigoted to the Mosaic law, that they were rather to be considered as a Jewish sect, than a Christian.

(3.) A Nazarite, under the ancient law, was a man or woman engaged by a vow to abstain from wine and all intoxicating liquors, to let the hair grow, not to enter any house polluted by having a dead body in it, nor to be present at any funeral. If, by accident, any one should have died in their presence, they recommenced the whole of their consecration and Nazariteship. This vow generally lasted eight days, sometimes a month, and sometimes during their whole lives. When the time of Nazariteship was expired, the priest brought the person to the door of the temple, who there offered to the Lord a he-lamb for a burnt-offering, a she-lamb for an expiatory sacrifice, and a ram for a peace-offering. They offered likewise loaves and cakes, with wine for libations. After all was sacrificed and offered, the priest, or some other person, shaved the head of the Nazarite at the door of the tabernacle, and burnt his hair on the fire of the altar. Then the priest put into his hands the shoulder of the ram roasted, with a loaf and a cake, which the Nazarite returning into the hands of the priest, he offered them to the Lord, lifting them up in the presence of the Nazarite. From this time the offerer might drink wine, his Nazariteship being accomplished. Perpetual Nazarites, as Samson and John the Baptist, were consecrated to their Nazariteship by their parents, and continued all their lives in this state, without drinking wine, or cutting their hair. Those who made a vow of Nazariteship out of Palestine, and could not come to the temple when their vow was expired, contented themselves with observing the abstinence required by the law, and cutting off their hair in the place where they were. The offerings and sacrifices prescribed by Moses, to be offered at the temple, by themselves, or by others for them, they deferred, till a convenient opportunity. Hence Paul, being at Corinth, having made the vow of a Nazarite, he had his hair cut off at Cenchrea, but deferred the complete fulfilment of his vow till he came to Jerusalem, Acts xviii. 18.

When a person found he was not in condition to make a vow of Nazariteship, or had not leisure fully to perform it, he contented himself by contributing to the expense of the sacrifices and offerings of those who had made, and were fulfilling, this vow; by which means he became a partaker in such Nazariteship. Josephus, magnifying the zeal and devotion of Herod Agrippa, says, he caused several Nazarites to be shaven. Maimonides says, that he who would partake in the Nazariteship of another, went to the temple, and said to the priest, "In such a time such an one will finish his Nazariteship; I intend to defray the charge attending the shaving off his hair, either in part, or in whole." When Paul came to Jerusalem, (A. D. 58, Acts xxi. 23, 24.) James, with other brethren, advised that, to quiet the minds of the converted Jews, he should unite with four persons, who had vows of Nazariteship, and contribute to their charges and ceremonies; by which the people would perceive, that he did not disregard the law, as they had been led to suppose.

(4.) Nazarite expresses a man of great dignity: hence the patriarch Joseph is called a Nazarite, a prince, among his brethren; (Gen. xlix. 26.) Engl. tr. separated from his brethren. Nazarite in this sense is variously understood. Some think it signifies one who is crowned, chosen, separated, distinguished; Nezer in Hebrew signifying a crown. The LXX translate, a chief, or him that is honored. Nazir was a name of dignity in the courts of eastern princes. In the court of Persia, the Nezir is superintendent-general of the king's household, the chief officer of the crown; the high steward of his family, treasures and revenues. (Chardin, Government of the Persians, ch. 5.) In this sense Joseph was Nezir of the house of Pharaoh. Moses also gives to Joseph the title of Nazir, speaking of the tribes of his two sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, Dent. xxxiii. 16.

NEAPOLIS, now called Napoli, (Acts xvi. 11.) a maritime city of Macedonia, near the borders of Thracia, whither Paul came from the isle of Samothracia. From Neapolis he went to Philippi.

NEBAJOTH, a son of Ishmael, (Gen. xxv. 13; xxviii. 9.) the father of the Nabatheans, (q. v.) a people of Arabia Petræa, who lived by plunder and trade, Is. lx. 7. R.

NEBAT, or NABATH, of Ephraim, of the race of Joshua, and father of Jeroboam, the first king of the ten tribes, 1 Kings xi. 26.

I. NEBO, a city of Reuben, (Numb. xxxii. 38.) taken by the Moabites, who held it in the time of Jeremiah, Jer. xlviii. 1.

H. NEBO, a city of Judah, (Ezra ii. 29; x. 43; Neh. vii. 33.) probably the village Nabau, eight miles south of Hebron, which was forsaken in the time of Eusebius and Jerome.

III. NEBO, a high mountain east of the Jordan, where Moses died, and forming one of the mountains of Abarim, Dent. xxxii. 49; xxxiv. 1.

IV. NEBO, an idol of the Babylonians, Isa. xlv. 1. [In the astrological mythology of the Babylonians, this idol probably represented the planet Mercury. He is regarded as the scribe of the heavens, who records the succession of celestial and terrestrial events; and is related to the Egyptian Hermes and Anubis. He was also worshipped by the ancient Arabians. The extensive prevalence of this worship among the Chaldeans and Assyrians, is evident from the many compound proper names occurring in the Scriptures, of which this word forms part; as Nebuchadnezzar, Nebuzaradan, Nebushashan; and also in the classics, as Naboned, Nabonassar, Nabopolassar, &c. (See Gesenius, Comm. zu Jesa. ii. p. 342.) R.

I. NEBUCHADNEZZAR, or NABOPOLASSAR, father of Nebuchadnezzar the Great, was a Chaldean, and was the first monarch of Babylonia who made himself independent of Assyria. See BABYLONIA, p. 138.

H. NEBUCHADNEZZAR, son and successor of Nabopolassar, succeeded to the kingdom of Chaldea, A. M. 3399. He had been some time before associated in the kingdom, and sent to recover Carchemish, which had been wrested from the empire by Necho, king of Egypt. Having been successful, he marched against the governor of Phœnicia, and Jehoiachim, king of Judah, tributary to Necho, king of Egypt. He took Jehoiachim, and put him in chains, to carry him captive to Babylon; but afterwards he left him in Judea, on condition of his paying a large tribute. He took away several persons from Jerusalem; among others, Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, all of the royal family, whom the king of Babylon had carefully educated in the language and learning of the Chaldeans, that they might be employed at court.

Nabopolassar dying about the end of A. M. 3399, Nebuchadnezzar, who was then either in Egypt or in Judea, hastened to Babylon, leaving to his generals the care of bringing to Chaldea the captives taken in Syria, Judea, Phœnicia, and Egypt; for, according to Berossus, he had subdued all these countries. He distributed these captives into several colonies, and in the temple of Belus he deposited the sacred vessels of the temple of Jerusalem, and other rich spoils.

Jehoiachim, king of Judah, continued three years in fealty to Nebuchadnezzar, and then revolted; but after three or four years, he was besieged and taken in Jerusalem, put to death, and his body thrown to the birds of the air, according to the predictions of Jeremiah. See JEHOIACHIM.

In the mean time, Nebuchadnezzar, being at Babylon, in the second year of his reign, had a mysterious dream, in which he saw a statue composed of several metals; the interpretation of which was given by Daniel, and procured his elevation to the highest post in the kingdom. See DANIEL, and IMAGE OF NEBUCHADNEZZAR.

Jehoiakin, or Jeconiah, king of Judah, having revolted against Nebuchadnezzar, was besieged in Jerusalem, forced to surrender, and taken, with his chief officers, captive to Babylon; also his mother, his wives, and the best workmen of Jerusalem, to the number of ten thousand men. Among the captives were Mordecai, the uncle of Esther, and Ezekiel the prophet. Nebuchadnezzar also took all the vessels of gold which Solomon made for the temple and the king's treasury; and set up Mattaniah, Jeconiah's uncle by the father's side, whom he named Zedekiah. Zedekiah continued faithful to Nebuchadnezzar nine years, at the end of which time he rebelled, and confederated with the neighboring princes. The king of Babylon came into Judea, reduced the chief places of the country, and besieged Jerusalem; but Pharaoh Hophra coming out of Egypt to assist Zedekiah, Nebuchadnezzar went to meet him, and forced him to retire to his own country. This done, he resumed the siege of Jerusalem, and was 390 days before the place. In the eleventh year of Zedekiah, (A. M. 3419,) the city was taken, and Zedekiah, being seized, was brought to Nebuchadnezzar, who was then at Riblah in Syria. The king of Babylon condemned him to die, caused his children to be put to death in his presence, and then bored out his eyes, loaded him with chains, and sent him to Babylon.

Three years after the Jewish war, Nebuchadnezzar besieged Tyre, which siege lasted thirteen years. But during this interval he attacked the Sidonians, Moabites, Ammonites, and Idumeans, whom he treated much as he had done the Jews. Tyre was taken A. M. 2432. Ithobaal, the king, was put to death, and Baal succeeded him. The Lord, to reward the army of Nebuchadnezzar, which had been so long before Tyre, assigned to them Egypt and its spoils, and they returned in triumph to Babylon, with a vast number of captives.

Nebuchadnezzar, being at peace, applied himself to the adorning, aggrandizing, and enriching of Babylon with the most magnificent buildings. About this time he had a dream of a great tree, loaded with fruit, which an angel, suddenly descending from heaven, commanded should be cut down, and the branches, leaves and fruit be scattered. The trunk and the root were to be preserved in the earth, and it was to be bound with chains of iron and brass, among the beasts of the field, for seven years. The king consulted all his diviners, but none could explain his dream, until Daniel informed him, that it respected himself. "You," says Daniel, "are represented by the great tree; you are to be brought low, to be reduced to the condition of a brute, &c. but you shall afterwards be restored." About a year afterwards, as Nebuchadnezzar was walking on his palace at Babylon, he began to say, "Is not this Babylon the Great, which I have built in the greatness of my power, and in the brightness of my glory?" But he had hardly pronounced the words, when he was struck by a distemper or distraction, which so perverted his imagination, that he thought himself to be metamorphosed into an ox; and assumed the manners of that animal. After having been seven years in this state, God restored his understanding to him, and he recovered his royal dignity.

His repentance, however, was not sincere; for in the year of his restoration, he erected a golden statue, whose height was sixty cubits, in the plain of Dura, in Babylon. Having appointed a day for the dedication of this statue, he assembled the principal officers of his kingdom, and published by a herald, that all should adore it, at the sound of music, on penalty of being cast into a burning fiery furnace. The three Jews, companions of Daniel, would not bend the knee to the image. Daniel probably was absent. Nebuchadnezzar commanded Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego to be called, and he asked them why they presumed to disobey his orders. They replied, that they neither feared the flames, nor any other penalty; that the God whom only they would worship knew how to preserve them; but that if he should not think fit to deliver them out of his hands, they would, nevertheless, obey the laws of God rather than men.

Hearing this, the king caused them to be bound, and to be thrown into the furnace, which being vehemently heated, the flame consumed the men who cast them in; but an angel of the Lord abated the flames, so that the fire did not affect them. Nebuchadnezzar was much astonished, and said to his nobles, "Whence is it that I see four men walking in the midst of the flames? and the fourth is like a son of God." Then, approaching the furnace, he called the three Hebrews, who came out of the furnace, to the great astonishment of the whole court. The king now gave glory to the God of Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego; and he exalted the three Hebrews to great dignity in the province of Babylon, Dan. iv. 1, &c.

Nebuchadnezzar died this year, A. M. 3442, after having reigned 43 years.

NEBUZAR-ADAN, general of Nebuchadnezzar's armies, and chief officer of his household.

NECHO, king of Egypt, carried his arms to the Euphrates, where he conquered the city of Carchemish. He is known not only in Scripture, but in Herodotus, who says that he was son of Psammetichus, king of Egypt, and that having succeeded him in the kingdom, he raised great armies, and sent out great fleets, as well on the Mediterranean as the Red sea; that he fought the Syrians near the city of Migdol, obtained the victory, and took the city Cadytis, which some think to be Jerusalem. Josiah, king of Judah, being tributary to the king of Babylon, opposed Necho, and gave him battle at Megiddo, where he received the wound of which he died; and Necho passed forward, without making any long stay in Judea. On his return, he halted at Riblah, in Syria; and sending for Jehoahaz, king of the Jews, he deposed him, loaded him with chains, and sent him into Egypt. Then coming to Jerusalem, he set up Eliakim, or Jehoiakim, in his place, and exacted the payment of one hundred talents of silver and one talent of gold. Jeremiah (xlv. 2.) acquaints us, that Carchemish was retaken by Nabopolassar, king of Babylon, in the fourth year of Jehoiachim, king of Judah; so that Necho did not retain his conquest above four years. Josephus adds, that the king of Babylon, pursuing his victory, brought under his dominion the whole country, between the river Euphrates and Egypt, excepting Judea. Thus Necho was again reduced within the limits of his own country.

NEGINOTH, a term which is read before some of the Psalms, and signifies stringed instruments of music, to be played on by the fingers. The titles of these Psalms may be translated, A Psalm of David to the master of music, who presides over the stringed instruments.

NEHEMIAH, the son of Hachaliah, was born at Babylon during the captivity. He was, according to some, of the race of the priests; according to others, of the tribe of Judah, and of the royal family. Those who maintain the former opinion, support it by 2 Mac. i. 18, 21, where it is said, Nehemiah the priest offered sacrifices; and by Esdras x. 10, where he is reckoned in the number of the priests. Those who believe that he was of the race of the kings of Judah, say, (1.) That Nehemiah having governed the republic of the Jews for a considerable time, there is great probability he was of that tribe of which the kings always were. (2.) Nehemiah mentions his brethren Hanani, and other Jews, who, coming to Babylon during the captivity, acquainted him with the sad condition of their country. (3.) The office of cup-bearer to the king of Persia, to which Nehemiah was promoted, is a proof that he was of an illustrious family. (4.) He excuses himself from entering into the inner part of the temple, probably because he was not of the sacerdotal order. This last argument, however, appears to be very inconclusive. As to the Maccabees, where he is mentioned as a priest, it is answered, that the Greek text does not affirm him to be a priest, but only that he ordered the priests to perform their functions. As to his singing among the priests, this he might do in quality of governor, which gave him at least equal rank with the priests. Lastly, the name of Nehemiah is found in no catalogue or genealogy of Hebrew priests.

Scripture gives him the name, or title, of Tirshatha, that is, cup-bearer; which office he held at the court of Artaxerxes Longimanus. He had a great affection for the country of his fathers, though he had never seen it; and one day, as some Jews recently come from Jerusalem acquainted him with the miserable state of that city, in its destruction, he fasted, prayed, and humbled himself before the Lord, entreating that he would be favorable to the design he had conceived of asking the king's permission to rebuild Jerusalem. The course of his attendance at court having arrived, he presented the cup to the king, according to his duty, but with a dejected countenance. The king observed it, and thought he had some evil design; but Nehemiah discovering the occasion of his disquiet, Artaxerxes gave him leave to go to Jerusalem, and to repair its walls and gates; but appointed him a time to return.

Nehemiah arrived at Jerusalem with letters and full powers, but was there three days before he opened the occasion of his journey. On the night of the third day he went round the city and viewed the walls. After this, he assembled the chief of the people, produced his commission and letters, exhorted them to undertake the repairing of the gates and walls of the city; and immediately all began the work. The enemies of the Jews only scoffed at them at first, but afterwards, seeing the chief breaches repaired, they used stratagems and threats to deter Nehemiah. He therefore ordered part of his people to stand to their arms behind the walls, while others worked, having also their arms near them. His enemies then had recourse to craft and stratagem, endeavoring to draw him into an ambuscade in the fields, where they proposed to finish their dispute at an amicable conference. Nehemiah, however, defeated all their stratagems, and continuing his work, completed it in fifty-two days.

The walls, towers and gates of Jerusalem having been dedicated with solemnity and magnificence, Nehemiah separated the priests, the Levites, and the princes of the people, into two companies, one of which walked to the south, and the other to the north, on the top of the walls. These two companies, which were to meet at the temple, were accompanied with music, vocal and instrumental. Having entered the temple, they there read the law, offered sacrifices, and made great rejoicings; and the Feast of Tabernacles happening at the time, it was celebrated with great solemnity. Nehemiah, observing that the city was too large for its present inhabitants, ordered that the chief of the nation should there fix their dwelling; and caused them to draw lots, by which a tenth part of the whole people of Judah were obliged to dwell at Jerusalem.

Nehemiah then applied himself to the reforming of such corruptions as had crept into public affairs. He curbed the inhumanity of the great, who held in slavery and subjection the sons and daughters of the poor or unfortunate, keeping also the lands, which the poor had mortgaged or sold to them. He also undertook to dissolve the marriages with strange and idolatrous women, whom he sent away; obliged the people punctually to pay the ministers of the Lord their due; and enjoined the priests and Levites to strict attendance on their respective duties and functions. He enforced the observation of the sabbath, and would not permit strangers to enter the city to buy and sell, but kept the gates shut during the whole day. To perpetuate as much as possible these regulations, he engaged the chief men of the nation solemnly to renew their covenant with the Lord; and an instrument to this effect was drawn up, and signed by the chief of the priests and the people.

We read in 2 Mac. i. 19, &c. that Nehemiah sent to search for the holy fire, which, before the captivity of Babylon, the priests had hidden in a dry and deep pit: not finding any fire there, but only a thick and muddy water, he sprinkled this upon the altar; and presently the wood which had been so sprinkled, took fire as soon as the sun began to shine, which miracle coming to the knowledge of the king of Persia, he caused the place to be encompassed with walls where the fire had been hidden, and granted great favors and privileges to the priests. It is recorded in the same books, that Nehemiah erected a library, in which he placed whatever he could find, either of the books of the prophets, of David, or of such princes as had made presents to the temple. After having fulfilled his commission, he returned to Babylon, according to his promise to king Artaxerxes, about the thirty-second year of that prince; but afterwards he revisited Jerusalem, where he died in peace, having governed the people of Judah about thirty years.

The second book, which in the Latin Bibles bears the name of Esdras, bears, in the Hebrew and English Bibles, the name of Nehemiah. Its author speaks almost always in the first person; and at first reading one would think he had written it day by day; but if we read it with due attention, we may observe several things which could not have been written by Nehemiah. For example, memorials are quoted, in which were registered the names of the priests in the time of Jonathan, son of Eliashib, and even to the times of Jaddus, who lived under Darius Codomanus, and under Alexander the Great. It is therefore very probable, that Nehemiah wrote memoirs of his government, which are cited 2 Mac. ii. 13, and that from these memoirs this book has been compiled.

Whiston supposes that Nehemiah's library, with augmentations, continued in the temple till the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus; from which prince Josephus received a copy of the Hebrew Scriptures, fuller in many respects than our common copies. This may be true, at least, so far as concerns the preservation of the original writings of Nehemiah himself.

NEHILOTH, a word found at the beginning of the fifth Psalm, and which signifies the dances, or more probably the flutes. The title of the fifth Psalm may be thus translated, "A Psalm of David, addressed to the master of music presiding over the dancers, or over the flutes."

NEHUSHTAN, a name given by Hezekiah king of Judah to the brazen serpent that Moses had set up in the wilderness, (Numb. xxi. 8.) and which had been preserved by the Israelites to that time. The superstitious people having made an idol of this serpent, Hezekiah caused it to be burnt, and in derision gave it the name of Nehushtan, q. d. this little brazen serpent, 2 Kings xviii. 4.

NEIGHBOR signifies a near relation, a fellow countryman, one of the same tribe or vicinage; and generally, any man connected with us by the bonds of humanity, and whom charity requires that we should consider as a friend and relation. At the time of our Saviour, the Pharisees had restrained the meaning of the word neighbor to those of their own nation, or to their own friends; holding, that to hate their enemy was not forbidden by the law, Matt. v. 43; Luke x. 20. But our Saviour informed them, that the whole world were neighbors; that they ought not to do to another, what they would not have done to themselves; and that this charity extended even to enemies. See the beautiful parable of the good Samaritan, the real neighbor to the distressed, Luke x. 29.

God is a neighbor near to those who fear him, and call upon him, Ps. lxxxv. 9; cxlv. 18. He gives them tokens of his presence and protection: "Am I a God at hand, and not a God afar off?" am I one of those gods that men have made not above two days ago? am not I an eternal God? Otherwise, I am a neighbor God, that sees every thing, knows every thing, and not an absent or a distant God, Jer. xxiii. 23. (Comp. Elijah and Baal's prophets.)

NEOMENIA, (Col. ii. 16.) a Greek word, signifying the first day of the moon or month; in the Engl. tr. new moon. The Hebrews had a particular veneration for the first day of every month, for which Moses appointed peculiar sacrifices, (Numb. xxviii. 11, 12.) but he gave no orders that it should be kept as a holy day, nor can it be proved that the ancients observed it so; it was a festival of merely voluntary devotion. (See ΜΟΝΗ.) It appears that even from the time of Saul they made, on this day, a sort of family entertainment, since David ought then to have been at the king's table; and Saul took his absence amiss, 1 Sam. xx. 5, 18. Moses insinuates, that besides the national sacrifices then regularly offered, every private person had his particular sacrifices of devotion, Numb. x. 10. The beginning of the month was proclaimed by sound of trumpet, at the offering of solemn sacrifices, ibid. But the most celebrated neomenia was that at the beginning of the civil year, or first day of the month Tizri, Lev. xxiii. 24. This was a sacred festival, on which no servile labor was performed. In the kingdom of the ten tribes, the people used to assemble at the houses of the prophets, to hear their instructions, 2 Kings iv. 23; Isa. i. 13, 14. Ezekiel says (xlv. 17; see also 1 Chron. xxiii. 31; 2 Chron. viii. 13.) that the burnt-offerings offered on the day of the new moon, were provided at the king's expense, and that on this day was to be opened the eastern gate of the court of the priests, ch. xlvi. 1, 2.

Spencer has a long dissertation on the neomenia, or new moons, in which he shows that the Gentiles honored the first day of the month, out of veneration to the moon. He would infer, that the Hebrews borrowed this practice from strange and idolatrous people. But he by no means proves this; and it is much more probable, that, without any design of imitating the Hebrews, the Gentiles thought fit to honor the moon at the beginning of the month, that is, her first appearance.

NERGAL. Among the gods of the transplanted heathen, (2 Kings xvii. 30.) we find some, the etymology of whose names would never lead us to conjecture by what image, or figure, they might be represented. The rabbins, indeed, have occasionally told us their nature, and sometimes their symbols; but rabbinical authority is not always satisfactory. It is hardly to be supposed, that on many subjects the present Jewish literati have really any tradition extant among them; and, in many instances, we may well hesitate in admitting the accuracy of what they report as traditionary information derived from their forefathers. Nevertheless, we may consider their description of NERGAL as an instance either of their correctness or of their judgment. This god, they tell us, was worshipped under the figure of a cock; and, to make a pair of the species, ΣΥΚΟΤΗ ΒΕΝΟΤΗ, they say, was worshipped as a hen and chicken. For this latter conjecture we find no authority; but the former seems to be more plausible.

[The researches of Gesenius on the subject of the astrological mythology of the Assyrians and Babylonians, go to show that the idol Nergal represents the planet Mars, which was ever the emblem of bloodshed. Mars is named, by the Zabians and Arabians, ill-luck, misfortune. He was represented as holding in one hand a drawn sword, and in the other, by the hair, a human head just cut off; his garments were blood red; as the light of the planet is also reddish. His temple among the Arabs was painted red; and they offered to him garments sprinkled with blood, and also a warrior, (probably a prisoner,) who was cast into a pool. It is related of the caliph Hakem, that, in the last night of his life, as he observed the stars, and saw the planet Mars rise above the horizon, he murmured between his lips, "Dost thou ascend, thou accursed shedder of blood? then is my hour come!" and at the moment the assassins sprang upon him from their hiding place. (Barhebræus, p. 220.)

The name Nergal appears also in the proper names Nergalsharezer, Neriglassar. The assertion of the rabbins above mentioned, that this idol was represented under the form of a cock, may have arisen from the fact that in the Talmud the similar word תרנגול, terngal, signifies cock; or from a Persian etymology proposed by some, viz. ner-gal, i. e. male bird, cock. Gesenius inclines to regard it as a mere conceit. (Comm. zu Jesa. ii. p. 344.) *R.

NERGAL-SHAREZER, an officer of Nebuchadnezzar, Jer. xxxix. 3.

NETHINIM, given, or offered, servants dedicated to the service of the tabernacle and temple, to perform the most laborious offices; as carrying of wood and water. At first the Gibeonites were destined to this station; afterwards, the Canaanites who surrendered themselves, and whose lives were spared. We read, in Ezra viii. 20, that the Nethinim were slaves devoted by David, and other princes, to the service of the temple; and in Ezra ii. 58, that they were slaves given by Solomon: the children of Solomon's servants. From 1 Kings ix. 20, 21, we see that he had subdued the remains of the Canaanites, and it is very probable, that he gave a good number of them to the priests and Levites, for the temple service. The Nethinim were carried into captivity with the tribe of Judah, and great numbers were placed not far from the Caspian sea, whence Ezra brought 220 of them into Judea, ch. viii. 17. Those who followed Zerubbabel, made up 392, Neh. iii. 26. This number was but small in regard to their offices; so that we find afterwards a solemnity called Xylophoria, in which the people carried wood to the temple, with great ceremony, to keep up the fire of the altar of burnt sacrifices.

NETOPHA, a city and district between Bethlehem and Anathoth, Ezra ii. 22; Neh. vii. 26; Jer. xi. 8; 1 Chron. ix. 16.

NETTLE. There are two words rendered nettle in the English Bible: קרנשת, kimosh, (Prov. xxiv. 31; Isa. xxxiv. 13; Hos. ix. 6.) about which there is no dispute; and חרור, chârûl, (Job xxx. 7; Prov. xxiv. 31; Zeph. ii. 9.) which we have no means of identifying, but which cannot be a nettle. Mr. Good, after Dr. Stock, translates the passage in Job:

Among the bushes did they bray;
Under the briars did they huddle together, and remarks, "Why Junius and Tremellius, and Piscator, should render חרור by urtica, and our common lection after them by nettle, I know not. In almost every other place in which the word occurs, it is uniformly rendered as it ought to be, thorns, brambles, briars."

NEW is used for extraordinary or unusual. (See Judg. v. 8; Numb. xvi. 30.) God promises a new heaven and a new earth, at the time of the Messial, (Isa. lxxv. 17; lxxvi. 22.) that is, a universal renovation of manners, sentiments and actions, throughout the world. This passage is also referred to the end of the world; when will commence a new heaven and a new earth; not that the present heaven and earth will be annihilated; but the air, the earth and the elements will be more perfect, or at least, together with the inhabitants, shall be of a nature superior to those vicissitudes and alterations that now affect these elements. God also promises to his people "a new covenant, a new spirit, a new heart;" and this promise was fulfilled in the covenant of grace, the gospel, Ezek. xi. 19; xviii. 31; xxxvi. 26.

NEW MOON, see NEOMENIA.

NIBHAZ, a god of the Avim, or Hivites, 2 Kings xvii. 31. The Jewish interpreters say the name means latrator, barker, (from נבה) and affirm that this idol had the shape of a dog. Historical traces have also been found of the ancient worship of idols in the form of dogs among the Syrians. In the Zabian books Nibhaz occurs as the Lord of darkness; which, according to the character of the Assyrian-Chaldean mythology, would point to an evil planetary demon. R.

I. NICANOR, a general in the armies of Antiochus Epiphanes, who was thrice defeated, and at last slain by Judas Maccabeus. See ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES.

II. NICANOR, one of the first seven deacons, who were chosen and appointed at Jerusalem soon after the descent of the Holy Ghost, on occasion of a division among the believers, into those who spoke Greek, and those who spoke Hebrew, or Syriac, Acts vi. 5, &c. Nothing particular is known of him.

III. NICANOR, a king of Syria, who ascended the throne A. M. 3854. See DEMETRIUS, II.

NICODEMUS, a disciple of Jesus Christ, a Jew by nation, and by sect a Pharisee. He was one of the senators of the Sanhedrim, (John iii.) and at first concealed his belief in the divine character of our Lord. Afterwards, however, he avowed himself a believer, when he came with Joseph of Arimathea to pay the last duties to the body of Christ, which they took down from the cross, embalmed, and laid in the sepulchre.

NICOLAITANS, see below in NICOLAS.

NICOLAS, a proselyte of Antioch, that is, converted from paganism to the religion of the Jews. He afterwards embraced Christianity, and was among the most zealous and most holy of the first Christians; so that he was chosen for one of the first seven deacons of the church at Jerusalem, Acts vi. 5.

His memory has been tarnished in the church by a blemish, from which it has not been possible hitherto to clear him. Certain heretics were called Nicolaitans, from his name; and though perhaps he had no share in their errors, nor their irregularities, yet he is suspected to have given some occasion to them. The early writers inform us that he had a wife who was very handsome, and that, in imitation of those who aimed at a high degree of perfection, he left her, to live in a state of continence. Epiphanius says he did not persevere in this resolution, but took his wife again, and, in order to justify his conduct, advanced principles contrary to truth and purity. He plunged himself into irregularities, and gave rise to the sect of the Nicolaites, to that of the Gnostics, and to several others, who followed the bent of their natural passions to crimes and wickednesses.

In this statement Epiphanius is supported by Irenæus, Tertullian, Hippolytus, Hilary, Gregory of Nyssa, Phylaster of Bressa, Jerome, Cassian, Gregory the Great, Pacian, pope Gelasius, Gildas, and several moderns, who say that Nicolas the deacon was the author of the impious and infamous sect of the Nicolaitans. Clemens Alexandrinus, however, who is more ancient than Epiphanius, expresses much esteem for Nicolas; and relates the affair otherwise. The apostles, he says, having reproached Nicolas, as being too jealous of his wife, he introduced her before them, and declared that any one might espouse her that pleased. This declaration, made in pure simplicity, and without reflection, was only designed as a proof that his attachment and passion for his wife did not overcome him; but such as were glad to catch at the pretence of his authority, screened themselves under what he had done, in order to palliate and vindicate their irregularities. These heretics grounded themselves, says Clement, on a word that Nicolas let fall, that "the flesh ought to be abused." By which he meant nothing else, but that we ought to control and suppress our inclinations to sensuality and concupiscence; whereas, these disciples of pleasure explained the words according to their own sensuality, and not according to the meaning of Nicolas. Augustin, Victorinus Petaviensis, Isidorus, and the council of Tours, also acquit him; and the Apostolical Constitutions, and the interpolated letters of Ignatius the martyr, affirm that the Nicolaitans falsely assumed his name. Upon the whole, it is highly probable either that the Nicolaitans falsely assumed the name of Nicolas, or that they took their rise from another person of the same name.

The Lord (Rev. ii. 6, 15.) condemns the actions and doctrine of the Nicolaitans. He says he hates them; commends the bishop of Ephesus that he abhors them; and reproaches the bishop of Pergamus that some of his church adopted their doctrine.

[In regard to the Nicolaitans, a more probable supposition is, that the appellation is not here derived from a proper name, but is symbolical; and that it refers to the same persons who are said, in Rev. ii. 14, to hold the doctrine of Balaam; since the Greek name Νικολαοι, Nicolas, corresponds to the Hebrew בַּלְעָם, Balaam, and signifies to overcome, seduce, a people. The allusion, then, would be to false and seducing teachers like Balaam; and refers more particularly, perhaps, to those who opposed the decree of the apostles in Acts xv. 29. (Compare the use of Jezebel in Rev. ii. 20.) R.

I. NICOPOLIS, a city of Epirus, on the gulf of Ambracia; where Paul passed his winter, A. D. 64. He wrote to Titus, then in Crete, to come to him thither, Tit. iii. 12. Some are of opinion, that this Nicopolis, however, was not that of Epirus, but that of Thrace, on the borders of Macedonia, near the river Nessus. But the former is the prevailing opinion.

II. NICOPOLIS, a name given to Emmaus, a city of Palestine, under the emperor Alexander, son of Manmæus.

NIDDUI, the lesser sort of excommunication used among the Hebrews. He who had incurred this, was to withdraw himself from his relations, at least to the distance of four cubits. It commonly continued thirty days. If it was not then taken off, it might be prolonged for sixty, or even ninety, days. But if within this term the excommunicated person did not give satisfaction, he fell into the cherem, which was the second sort of excommunication; and thence into the third sort, called schammatha, the most terrible of all. See EXCOMMUNICATION, and ANATHEMA.

NIGER, the surname of Simon, (Acts xiii. 1.) who was a prophet and teacher, and one who laid his hands on Saul and Barnabas, for the execution of that office to which the Holy Ghost had appointed them. Some believe he is that Simeon the Cyrenian, who carried the cross of Christ to mount Calvary; but this opinion is founded only on a similitude of names. Epiphanius speaks of one Niger among the seventy disciples of our Saviour.

NIGHT. The ancient Hebrews began their artificial day in the evening, and ended it the next day evening; so that the night preceded the day; whence it is said, (Gen. i. 5.) evening and morning one day. They allowed twelve hours to the night and twelve to the day; but these hours were not equal, except at the equinox. At other times, when the hours of the night were long, those of the day were short, as in winter; and contrariwise, when the hours of night were short, as at midsummer, the hours of the day were long in proportion. See HOURS.

"Night" is put for a time of affliction and adversity, (Ps. xvii. 3; Isa. xxi. 12.) as also for the time of death, (John ix. 4.) for the end of the world, 1 Thess. v. 2.

Children of the day, and children of the night, in a moral and figurative sense, denote good men and wicked men, Christians and Gentiles. The disciples of the Son of God are children of light; they belong to the light, they walk in the light of gospel truths; while children of the night walk in the darkness of ignorance and infidelity, and perform only works of darkness. "Ye are all the children of the light, and the children of the day; we are not of the night nor of darkness," 1 Thess. v. 5.

NILE, the river of Egypt, whose fountains are in the mountains of Abyssinia towards the north, whence it proceeds, and afterwards winds about to the east, passing into a great lake, and thence running towards the south. It waters the country of Akata, where it has several falls, continues its course far into the kingdom of Goiam, then winds about again, from the east to the north; and at length, running northward, enters Egypt at the cataracts, which are waterfalls made by meeting with rocks, of the length of two hundred feet.

After passing these rocks, the Nile flows directly through the valley of Egypt. Its channel, according to Villamont, is about a league broad. Eight miles below Cairo, it is divided into two arms, which make a triangle, whose base is at the Mediterranean sea, and which the Greeks call the Delta, because of its figure,  $\Delta$ . These two arms are divided into others, which discharge themselves into the Mediterranean, whose distance from the top of the Delta is about twenty leagues. These branches the ancients commonly reckoned to be seven mouths, Septemplex ostia Nilii. Ptolemy makes them nine, others four, others eleven, others fourteen. Others maintain, that there are no more than the mouths of Damietta, of Rosetta, and of the two canals, one of which passes by Alexandria.

Several have thought that the Nile was the Gihon, one of the four rivers mentioned by Moses, as flowing from the terrestrial paradise. But this opinion is not to be supported, since the other rivers are too far from the Nile. Yet the inhabitants of the kingdom of Goiam call this river Gihon. The Abyssinians call it Ab Euch, Abay, or the father of rivers. The negroes call it Tami. Homer, Diodorus Siculus and Xenophon testify, that its ancient name was Egyptus, and Homer mentions it by no other name. Diodorus says, it took the name of Nilus, after a king of Egypt, called by that name. Pliny relates the opinion of king Juba, who affirmed that the Nile had its source in Mauritania; that it appeared and disappeared in different places, first hiding itself under ground, and then showing itself again; that in this country it was called Niger, and in Ethiopia it had the name Astapus; that about Meroë it was divided into two arms, of which the right was called Astusapes, and the left Astaborus; and lastly, that it obtained the name of Nile only below Meroë. Pliny, Plutarch, Dionysius the geographer, and some others, testify that it was also named Siris. Dionysius says, that the Ethiopians call it Siris, and that after it passes Syena, it has the name of Nilus. In Scripture the Nile has seldom any other name but the river of Egypt. Joshua and Jeremiah express it by the name Sihor, or the river of troubled water: "What hast thou to do in the way of Egypt, to drink the water of Sihor?" says Jeremiah. (But see SIHOR.) The Greeks give it the name of Melas, which also signifies black, or troubled. And indeed travellers inform us that the water of this river is generally something muddy, but it is easily fined by throwing into it some almonds or skinned beans. Servius, explaining that verse of Virgil, where, speaking of the Nile, he says, observes, that the ancients called the Nile, Melo. Melo in Hebrew signifies full, which may well agree with the Nile, because of its great floods, which continue for about six weeks in the heat of summer, and overflow Egypt.

Et viridem Ægyptum nigrâ fecundat arenâ,
Georg. iv. 291.

Diodorus Siculus observes, that the most ancient name by which the Grecians knew the Nile, is Oceanus. It had also the name of Aigle, afterwards of Ægyptus, and lastly of Nilus, from king Nileus. The Egyptians paid divine honor to the Nile, and called it Jupiter Nilus; for which reason, perhaps, the Lord sometimes threatens to smite the river of Egypt, to dry it up, and kill its fishes; as it were to show the Egyptians the vanity of their worship, and the impotence of their pretended deity, Isa. xi. 15; Ezek. xxix. 3, &c.

Scripture, marking the limits of the Land of Promise, sometimes puts the river or the stream of Egypt for its southerly limits: "From the entering in of Hamath, unto the river of Egypt," 2 Chron. vii. 8. Or "from the channel of the river (Euphrates) unto the stream of Egypt," Isa. xxvii. 12. Some interpreters, however, justly doubting whether the dominion of the Israelites extended to the Nile, have properly supposed that the stream of Egypt was a stream that fell into the Mediterranean sea, between Rhinocorura and Gaza, which is called in Scripture the river of the wilderness, Amos vi. 14. See EGYPT, RIVER OF.

The Arabians and other orientals often give the Nile the name of a sea, and the surname or epithet of Faidh, which is common also to the Euphrates, because these two rivers, by their overflowing, increase the fertility of the countries they pass through. They also give it the name of Mobarek, *blesse*d, as well because of the fruitfulness it occasions to the land, as the fecundity it is thought to procure to the women.

When the Nile rises only to the perpendicular height of twelve cubits, a famine necessarily follows in Egypt; nor is the famine less certain, if it should exceed sixteen cubits; so that the just height of the inundation is between twelve and sixteen cubits.

The Nilometer is a pillar erected in the middle of the Nile, on which are marked degrees measuring the ascent of the water. There were several of these in different places. At this day there is one in the island which divides the Nile into two arms, one of which passes to Cairo, and the other to Gizah. M. d'Herbelot notices several others, built or repaired by the reigning caliphs. The Nile overflows yearly in the month of August, in the higher and middle Egypt, where it hardly ever rains. But in lower Egypt the flood is less sensible and less necessary, because it frequently rains there, and the country is sufficiently watered. It is less sensible, because they make fewer dikes, or receptacles for the water there, and the inundation spreading itself equally over the country, does not rise higher than a cubit through the whole Delta. Whereas in higher and middle Egypt, they have deep canals, to receive the waters of the river. They make a breach in these dikes by authority of the pacha, and when one district is sufficiently watered, the dike is stopped up, and another opened. The Egyptians have often contentions, village against village, which shall have the first distribution of the waters; and when the overflowing comes as they desire, they celebrate a great festival throughout the country.

When the waters are subsided, the culture of the land is easy. The seed is cast on the mud, and with little tillage produces great plenty. The mud which the Nile brings is earth washed away from the banks in its course; which same mud, covering the landmarks and furrows of the fields, obliges the proprietors to have recourse to the line and the measuring rod, to measure out their lands and inheritances every year anew. See EGYPT, p. 370, 371.

"Some descriptions of Egypt would lead us to think that the Nile, when it swells, lays the whole province under water. The lands adjoining immediately to the banks of the river are indeed laid under water, but the natural inequality of the ground hinders it from overflowing the interior country. A great part of the lands would therefore remain barren, were not canals and reservoirs formed to receive water from the river, when at its greatest height, which is thus conveyed every where through the fields, and reserved for watering them, when occasion requires." (Niebuhr's Travels, vol. i. p. 87.)

"It is to be remarked, that though this water becomes thick, by washing off the clayey soil over which it passes, it appears, when drank, as light and limpid as the clearest; the Egyptians themselves believe it is nourishing, and say, whoever drinks of the river will never remove to any great distance from its banks. The divine honors which the ancient Egyptians paid to the Nile, and for which the plenty it occasions may be some justification, are, in a manner, still preserved under the Mahometans; they give this river the title of Most Holy, they likewise honor its increase with all the ceremonies practised by pagan antiquity." (Baron du Tott, vol. ii. p. 24. part 4.)

The superior veneration paid to the eastern or Abyssinian branch of this celebrated river appears from the variety of names given to it, as well as from the import of these names; of this Mr. Bruce gives a full account, from which we shall only quote a part. By the Agows it is named Gzeir, Geesa, or Seir; the first of which terms signifies a god. It is likewise called Ab, father; and has many other names, all implying the most profound veneration. In Gogjam it is named Abay, which signifies overflowing. By the Gongas, on the south of mounts Dyre and Tagla, it is called Dahli; by those on the north, Koass, both of which imply dog-star. Formerly the Nile had the name of Siris, both before and after it enters Beja, which the Greeks imagined was given to it on account of its black color during the inundation; but Mr. Bruce assures us that the river has no such color. He affirms, with great probability, that this name in the country of Beja imports the river of the dog-star, on the vertical appearance of which this river overflows: "and this idolatrous worship (says he) was probably part of the reason of the question the prophet Jeremiah asks: 'What hast thou to do in Egypt to drink the waters of Seir, or the water profaned by idolatrous rites?'" The inhabitants of the Barabra call it Bahar el Nil, the sea of the Nile, in contradistinction to the Red sea, for which they have no other name than Bahar el Molech, or the Salt sea. The junction of the three great rivers, the Nile, flowing on the west side of Meroë; the Tacazze, which washes the east side, and joins the Nile at Maggiran, in north latitude 17 degrees; and the Mareb, which falls into this last something above the junction, gives the name of Triton to the Nile. The ancient name Egyptus, given it in Homer, is supposed to have been derived from its black color; but Mr. Bruce derives it from Y Gypt, the name given to Egypt in Ethiopia, that is, the country of canals.

We also quote from Mr. Bruce what he has said concerning the natural operation by which the tropical rains are produced; which are now universally allowed to be the cause of the annual overflowing of this and other rivers. "The air is so much rarified by the sun, during the time he remains almost stationary over the tropic of Capricorn, that the winds loaded with vapors rush in upon the land from the Atlantic ocean on the west, the Indian ocean on the east, and the cold Southern ocean beyond the Cape. Thus a great quantity of vapor is gathered, as it were, into a focus; and as the same causes continue to operate during the progress of the sun northward, a vast train of clouds proceeds from south to north, which is sometimes extended much farther than at other times.—In April all the rivers in the south of Abyssinia begin to swell, and greatly augment the Nile, which is further enlarged by the vast quantity of water poured into the lake Tzana. In the beginning of June the rivers are all full, and continue so while the sun remains stationary in the tropic of Cancer. This excessive rain, which would sweep off the whole soil of Egypt into the sea, were it to continue without intermission, begins to abate as the sun turns southward; and on his arrival at the zenith of each place, on his passage towards that quarter, they cease entirely. Immediately after the sun has passed the line, he begins the rainy season to the southward. There are three remarkable appearances attending the inundation of the Nile. Every morning in Abyssinia is clear, and the sun shines. About nine a small cloud, not above four feet broad, appears in the east, whirling violently round as if upon an axis; but, arrived near the zenith, it first abates its motion, then loses its form, and extends itself greatly, and seems to call up vapors from all the opposite quarters. These clouds, having attained nearly the same height, rush against each other with great violence. The air, impelled before the heaviest mass, or swiftest mover, makes an impression of its form on the collection of clouds opposite; and the moment it has taken possession of the space made to receive it, the most violent thunder possible to be conceived instantly follows, with rain: after some hours the sky again clears, with a wind at north, and is always disagreeably cold when the thermometer is below sixty-three degrees. The second thing remarkable is the variation of the thermometer. When the sun is in the southern tropic, thirty-six degrees distant from the zenith of Gondar, it is seldom lower than seventy-two degrees; but it falls to sixty degrees, and sixty-three degrees, when the sun is immediately vertical; so happily does the approach of rain compensate the heat of a too scorching sun. The third is that remarkable stop in the extent of the rain northward, when the sun, that has conducted the vapors from the line, and should seem now more than ever to be in possession of them, is here overruled suddenly; till, on his return to Gorri, again it resumes the absolute command over the rain, and reconducts it to the line, to furnish distant deluges to the southward. The river, passing through the kingdom of Sennaar, the soil of which is a red bole, becomes colored with that earth; and this mixture, along with the moving sand of the deserts, of which it receives a great quantity when raised by the wind, precipitates all the viscous and putrid matters which float in the waters; whence Dr. Pococke judiciously observes, that the Nile is not wholesome when the water is clear and green, but when so red and turbid that it stains the water of the Mediterranean."

The following account is from father Vansleb, whose remarks were made at Cairo:—

"This is remarkable of Nilus: (1.) That it begins to increase and decrease on a certain day precisely, (2.) That when it first increaseth it grows green. (3.) That afterwards it appears red; and (4.) That it changeth its channel sometimes. The day in which it begins to increase is yearly the twelfth day of June, on which day they observe the feast of St. Michael the archangel:—on this day the drops fall. Now these drops are nothing else, according to the judgment of the inhabitants, but the mercies and blessings of God. As soon as this dew is fallen, the water begins to be corrupt, and assumes a greenish color; this color increases more and more, till the river appears as a lake covered all over with moss. This color is to be seen not only in its great channel, but also in all the ponds and branches that come from thence: only the cisterns keep the water pure. Some years this green color continues about twenty days, and sometimes more, but never above forty. The Egyptians call this time, when the river is green, il chad raviat, for they suffer much, because the water is corrupt, without taste, and unwholesome; and good water is very rare. As soon as the green color is gone, the river Nilus begins to become red, and very muddy: it is then no doubt but the fermentation is passed, and that the waters of Ethiopia are arrived in Egypt, which are of that color, because of the red earth which the furious torrents from the mountains carry into the river; for it is not possible that the land of Egypt, which is very black, should give it that color. In the year 1673, in the beginning of July, the water began to be red, and so continued till the end of December, the time when the river returns to its ordinary dimensions. The Egyptians believe that the river Nilus decreaseth also at a certain day, Sept. 24.

"The waters of this river cause an itch in the skin, which troubles such as drink of them when the river increases. This itch is very small, and appears first about the arms, next upon the stomach, and spreads all about the body, which causeth a grievous pain. This itch comes not only upon such as drink of the river; but such as drink of the waters of the cisterns filled with the river water. It lasts about six weeks. When the river runs over, it makes a great destruction; it carries away not only great pieces of the bank, but destroys sometimes towns and villages near to it."

The prophet Nahum calls this river by the name of a sea, when describing the rampart of populous No, which, he says, "was the sea, and her wall was from the sea." This may appear very extraordinary to British readers: but the account of Ibn Haukal, who uses the same phraseology, will justify it. He thus writes: (sir W. Ouseley's trans. p. 34.) "In this sea there are islands, to which one may pass in boats or vessels. Of these islands are Teneis and Damiat. In each of these, agriculture is practised, and cattle are kept: and the kind of clothes called rekia come from these places. "The waters of this sea are not very considerable, and vessels move on it by the help of men. . . . From the borders of this sea, to those of the sea of Syria, it is all sand."

In these passages the mouths of the Nile, the lakes adjacent to them, the marshes, &c. appear to be called seas, in the Arabic; as such collections of water also are in the Hebrew.

"The Nile," says Ibn Haukal, (sir W. Ouseley's trans. p. 31.) "produces crocodiles, and the fish sekenkour: and there is also a species of fish called raadab, which if any person take in his hand while it is alive, that person will be affected by a trembling of his body: when dead this fish resembles other fishes. The crocodile's skin is so hard, that it resists the blows of all weapons when stricken on the back: they therefore wound him under the arm-pits and between the thighs. The sekenkour is a species of that fish, (the crocodile), but the crocodile has hands and feet: and they use the sekenkour in medicinal and culinary preparations.*

It deserves notice that the crocodile is here reckoned a fish, though it is, as we well know, a lizard; and the sekenkour, or skinkore, or skink, of European naturalists, is referred to the same genus, that is, of fishes, though that also is a lizard, is amphibious, and is found in various countries of the East. It appears that the ancient Hebrews also included lizards in the division of Tannim, which comprised not only fishes but amphibia; creatures using the water, generally; and even serpents. The crocodile, therefore, being called a fish by this Arab writer, we need not hesitate to admit the same idea among the learned Hebrews.

NIMRAH, BETH-NIMRAH, house of limpid waters, and NIMRIM, a city of Gad, or rather of Reuben, east of the Dead sea, Numb. xxxii. 3. Jeremiah (xlviii. 34.) speaks of Nimrim and its pleasant waters; Isaiah (xv. 6.) also mentions the waters of Nimrim. [Burckhardt mentions the ruins of Nimrim, probably the same as the ancient Nimrah, or Nimrim, as being on the eastern side of the Dead sea, towards its northern part. (Trav. in Syria, &c. p. 391.) *R.]

NIMROD, son of Cush, "and a mighty hunter before the Lord," Gen. x. 8, 9. He was the first who began to monopolize power on the earth, and gave occasion to the proverb, "Like Nimrod, the great hunter before the Lord." His hunting was not only of wild beasts, but also to subdue men, to reduce them under his dominion. Ezekiel (xxxii. 30. Vulg.) gives the name of hunters to all tyrants. The foundation of the empire of Nimrod was at Babylon; and, very probably, he was among the most eager undertakers of the tower of Babel. He built Babylon at, or near, that famous tower, and from thence he extended his dominion over the neighboring countries, and Erech, Accad and Calneh, in the land of Shinar. Moses adds, according to the English version: "Out of that land went forth Ashur, and builded Nineveh, and the city Rehoboth, and Calah, and Resen, between Nineveh and Calah; the same is a great city." This Bochart and others understand still of Nimrod, and translate, "From this place he went out to go into Assyria, where he built Nineveh, Rehoboth, Calah, and Resen;" that is, when Nimrod had established the beginning of his empire at Babylon, and in the land of Shinar, he advanced towards Assyria, where he built powerful cities, as so many fortresses, to keep the people in subjection. Comp. ASSYRIA, p. 113, col. 2.

Many interpreters regard Nimrod as the same with Belus, founder of the kingdom of Babylon, and with Ninus, founder of that of Nineveh. (See ASSYRIA, p. 113, BABYLONIA, p. 138.) Profane authors have embellished the history of Bacchus with several circumstances taken from that of Nimrod. The name Nebrodeus, or Nebrodis, given to Bacchus, is perhaps derived from Nembrod, or Nimrod, though the Greeks derive it from a goat-skin, with which they pretend Bacchus was clothed. The name Bacchus may also be derived from Bar-chus, "son of Cush;" because Nimrod was indeed the son of Cush. The Greeks gave to Bacchus the name of hunter, just as Moses gives it to Nimrod. The expeditions of Bacchus into the Indies are formed on the wars of Nimrod in Babylonia and Assyria. To Nimrod is imputed the invention of idolatrous worship paid to men.

NINEVEH, the capital of Assyria, was founded by Ashur, son of Shem; or more probably by Nimrod, son of Cush; for in Gen. x. 11, Moses seems to refer to Nimrod, mentioned above. However this may be, Nineveh was one of the most ancient, famous, potent and extensive cities of the world. It is very difficult to assign the time of its foundation; but it cannot have been long after the building of Babel. It stood on the banks of the Tigris; and in the time of the prophet Jonah, who was sent thither under Jeroboam the second, king of Israel, and, as Calmet judges, under the reign of Pul, father of Sardanapalus, king of Assyria; its circuit was three days' journey. Diodorus Siculus says, it was 150 stadia in length, 90 stadia in breadth, and 480 stadia in circuit; that is, about seven leagues long, three leagues broad, and eighteen leagues round. Its walls were a hundred feet high, and so broad, that three chariots could drive abreast upon them. Its towers, of which there were fifteen hundred, were each two hundred feet high.

Some place it on the west, others on the east, bank of the Tigris. At the time of Jonah's mission, (Jonah iv. II.) it was reckoned to contain more than 120,000 persons, "who could not distinguish their right hand from their left;" that is, young children. By this computation, there ought to have been then in Nineveh more than 600,000 persons.

Nineveh, which had long been mistress of the East, was first taken by Arbaces and Belesis, under the reign of Sardanapalus, in the time of Ahaz, king of Judah, about the time of the foundation of Rome, A. M. 3257. It was taken a second time by Cyaxares and Nabopolassar, from Chinaladin, king of Assyria, A. M. 3378, after which it no more recovered its former splendor. It was entirely ruined in the time of Lucian of Samosata, who lived under the emperor Adrian. It was rebuilt under the Persians, but was destroyed by the Saracens about the seventh century.

Profane histories say, that Ninus founded Nineveh. The sacred authors make frequent mention of Nineveh and its kings, Tiglath-pileser, Sennacherib, Shalmanezar, and Esar-haddon. Tobit lived in this city. Nahum and Zephaniah foretold its ruin in a very particular and pathetic manner, which Tobit repeated. The behavior of Jonah at Nineveh is well known; with the signal repentance of the Ninevites; which is even commended in the gospel, Matt. xi. 41; Luke xi. 32.

Several writers are of opinion that the ruins on the eastern bank of the Tigris, opposite to the town of Mosul, point out the site of the ancient Nineveh. Mr. Rich, who was resident at Bagdad, describes on this spot an enclosure of a rectangular form, corresponding with the cardinal points of the compass, but the area of which is too small to have contained a larger town than Mosul. The boundary of this enclosure, which he supposes to answer to the palace of Nineveh, may be perfectly traced all around, and looks like an embankment of earth or rubbish, of small elevation; and has attached to it, and in its line, at several places, mounds of greater size and solidity. The first of these forms the south-west angle; and on it is built the village of Nebbi Yunus, where they show the tomb of the prophet Jonas. The next, and largest of all, is the one which Mr.

Rich supposes to be the monument of Ninus, and is situated near the centre of the western face of the enclosure, being joined like the others by the boundary wall; the natives call it Koyunjuk Tepè. Its form is that of a truncated pyramid, with regular steep sides and a flat top; and is composed of stones and earth, the latter predominating sufficiently to admit of the summit being cultivated by the inhabitants of the village of Koyunjuk, which is built on it at the north-east extremity. The measurements of this mound were 178 feet for the greatest height, 1850 feet the length of the summit east and west, and 1147 for its breadth north and south. Out of a mound in the north face of the boundary was dug, some time since, an immense block of stone, on which were sculptured the figures of men and animals. So remarkable was this fragment of antiquity, that even Turkish apathy was roused, and the pacha and most of the principal people of Mosul came out to see it. One of the spectators particularly recollected among the sculptures of this stone, the figure of a man on horseback, with a long lance in his hand, followed by a great many others on foot. These ruins seem to attest the former existence of some extensive buildings on the spot, but whether belonging to the ancient Nineveh will admit of considerable doubt.

NISAN, a Hebrew month, partly answering to our March; and which sometimes takes from February or April, according to the course of the moon. It was the seventh month of the civil year; but was made the first month of the sacred year, at the coming out of Egypt, Exod. xii. 2. In Moses it is called Abib. The name Nisan is only since the time of Ezra, and the return from the captivity of Babylon. See the JEWISH CALENDAR, and MONTHS.

NISROCH, or NESROCH, a god of the Assyrians, 2 Kings xix. 37. The LXX call him Nesrach; Josephus, Araskes; and the Hebrew of Tobit, published by Munster, Dagon. [According to the etymology, the name would signify eagle. Among the ancient Arabs, also, the eagle occurs as an idol. (See Gesenius, Heb. Lex.) R.

NITRE, a sort of salt, or of salt-petre, a mineral alkali, common in Palestine, Arabia and Egypt. The Hebrews call it Nether, and use this word to express a salt proper to take spots out of cloth, and even from the face. The wise man says, (Prov. xxv. 20.) "As he that taketh away a garment in cold weather, and as vinegar upon nitre; so is he that singeth songs to a heavy heart." That is, he makes bad worse who deprives the shivering wretch of a garment in cold weather; so doth he who singeth songs to a heavy heart: vinegar poured on nitre makes a great ebullition; merriment, jollity and song are equally out of time, unsoothing, unsuitable to a mind overwhelmed with profound grief. Jeremiah, speaking to his people under the image of a faithless and abandoned spouse, says, "Though thou wash thee with nitre, and take thee much soap, yet thine iniquity is marked before me, saith the Lord God." Thou art too much polluted in my eyes ever to be made clean. This passage proves the use of nitre, to purify from outward spots and blemishes. The nitre common among us, from which gunpowder is made, is apparently not the nitre of the Scriptures; it is nearer, we believe, to sal-ammoniac.

NO, or NO-AMMON, a city of Egypt. See AMMON I.

NOACHIDÆ, a name given to the children of Noah, and in general, to all men not of the chosen race of Abraham.

NOAH, repose, or rest, son of Lamech, was born

A. M. 1056. Amidst the general corruption of mankind, he found favor in the eyes of the Lord, and received a divine command, to build an ark for the saving of his house from the general deluge which the Lord was about to bring upon the earth. (See ARK, and DELUGE.) After having left the ark, Noah offered as a burnt-sacrifice to the Lord one of all the pure animals that had been preserved. His sacrifice was accepted, and the Lord promised to bring no more a deluge over the earth; of which promise the sign he gave to Noah was the rainbow.

Noah, being a husbandman, cultivated the vine; and having unwarily intoxicated himself by drinking of wine, he fell asleep in his tent. Ham, the father of Canaan, discovering him in this condition, made sport of him, and jeered with his two brothers; who going backwards, covered their father's nakedness, by throwing a mantle over him. Noah awaking, and knowing what Ham had done, foretold the doom of slavery to Canaan and his posterity; while he blessed his other sons.

Noah lived after the deluge 350 years; his whole life being 950 years. He died A. M. 2006, leaving three sons, Shem, Ham and Japheth, (see their articles,) among whom, according to the common opinion, he divided the whole world, giving to Shem Asia, to Ham Africa, and to Japheth Europe.

Peter calls Noah a preacher of righteousness, (2 Pet. ii. 5.) because, before the deluge, he was incessantly declaring, not only by his discourses, but by his unblamable life, and by building the ark, in which he was employed 120 years, the coming of the wrath of God, Matt. xxiv. 37. The passage in 1 Pet. iii. 18—20, has been the theme of much controversy. Several of the ancient fathers took the words literally; as if Christ after his death had really preached to those men, who before the deluge were disobedient to the preaching of Noah. Others, by prison, understand the body, which is, as it were, the prison of the soul. Others, that Christ, by his Spirit, with which Noah was replenished, preached by the mouth of that patriarch to the unbelievers before the deluge, whose souls were then in the prison of the body; but at the time when Peter wrote, were in the prison of hell. The last interpretation seems to be the most natural. It is certain, that the term "he went and preached," may signify only "he preached;" as in Eph. ii. 15, "he came and preached peace to you who were afar off,—not in person; but by his agents, his apostles. In this sense Noah, in his day, was an agent of Christ, being actuated by his Spirit. It is probable, that as fallen angels are described as being held in chains of darkness, unto judgment, so disobedient human spirits may be described as being in prison, that is, reserved to future judgment. (Comp. Job xxvi. 5. as usually understood.)

Several learned men have observed, that the pagans confounded Saturn, Deucalion, Ogyges, the god Cælus or Uranus, Janus, Proteus, Prometheus, Vertumnus, Bacchus, Osiris, Vadimon, and Xisuthrus, with Noah. See ARK, p. 95.

The fable of Deucalion and his wife Pyrrha, is manifestly derived from the history of Noah. Deucalion, by the advice of his father, built an ark, or vessel of wood, in which he stored all sorts of provisions necessary for life, and entered it with his wife Pyrrha; to secure themselves from a deluge, that drowned nearly all Greece. All the people almost of this country were destroyed, none escaped but those who took refuge on the tops of the highest mountains. When the flood was over, Deucalion came out of his ark, and found himself on mount Parnassus. There he offered sacrifices to Jupiter, who sent Mercury to him to know what he desired. He requested that he might become the restorer of mankind, which Jupiter granted to him. He and Pyrrha were ordered to cast stones behind them, which immediately became so many men and women. The name Nuraito, given to the wife of Noah by the Syro-Chaldee, is derived from the Syriac, נורי, which signifies fire; hence Pyrrha (fire) is, by the Greeks, said to have been the name of the wife of Deucalion; and so far the Grecian story rests on authority more oriental than itself. Epiphanius has a reference to this derivation: he calls her "Noria, said to be the wife of Noah, whose name is, by interpretation, Pyrrha." There is also, much allegory couched under the names of Deucalion's father, Prometheus, (foresight,) by whom she was advised to build a vessel, and Pyrrha's father, Epimetheus, whose wife was Pandora, accomplished by gifts from all the gods, with her box of evils, in which, when opened, remained only Hope, &c.

NOB, a sacerdotal city of Benjamin or Ephraim, not far from Diospolis. When David was driven away by Saul, he came to Nob, the priests of which city were slain by Saul, 1 Sam. xxii. 9, &c.; xxi. 6, &c.

NOBLEMAN, John iv. 46. This was probably an officer of Herod's court, and of considerable distinction; not an hereditary nobleman. The word βασιλικός signifies a servant of the king; as the Syriac and Arabic versions render it. Many have conjectured that this nobleman, or royal servant, was Chuza, Herod's steward, whose wife is thought to have been converted on this occasion, and afterwards to have become an attendant on Jesus, Luke viii. 3.

NOD, vagabond, a country so called, whither Cain withdrew after his fratricide, Gen. iv. 16. Jerome and the Chaldee have taken the word Nod in the sense of an appellative, a vagabond, or fugitive.

NOON, the middle time of the day, when the sun is highest in his daily course; in modern language, when he is direct south, on the meridian of any place, 1 Kings xviii. 27; Ps. lv. 17. This time of the day being the brightest, is made a subject of comparison in several places of Scripture, Job v. 14; Ps. xxxvii. 6. The apostle Paul says, the brightness in which he beheld the Lord Jesus, was superior to that of the sun at noon, Acts xxvi. 13.

NOPH, a city of Egypt, (Isa. xix. 13; Jer. ii. 16; xlv. 1; xlv. 14; Ezek. xxx. 13, 16.) generally believed to have been the same with Moph, the Menouf of the Copts and Arabs, that is, Memphis. Memphis is the Greek form of the Egyptian name, which, according to Plutarch, signifies the port of the good; it was therefore a compound word, men being an affix, and nouf, or noph, being the distinguishing appellative. It is sometimes found with the article prefixed, in the form of Panouph, that is, Pi-Nouf. Nouf, as Mr. Conder remarks, is evidently no other than the god Χουφίς, the Ἀγαθοδαίμων of the Egyptian Pantheon.

The situation of Memphis, formerly the capital of Egypt, has been a subject of considerable dispute, and has afforded materials for long and laborious investigation by the learned. Sicard and Shaw fix its site at Djehz, or Gizeh, directly opposite to Old Cairo. This opinion, however, has been controverted by Pococke, D'Anville, Niebuln, and other writers and travellers, who place Memphis more in the direction of Metrahery, about 15 miles farther south, on the bank of the Nile, at the entrance of the plain of mummies, at the north of which the pyramids are placed. (See Bruce's Travels; the Fragments to Cahnet, No. 546; and the Modern Traveller, Egypt, vol. i. p. 339—352, Engl. ed. Rosenmüller, Bibl. Geog. iii. 290.)

Memphis was the residence of the ancient kings of Egypt, till the times of the Ptolemies, who commonly resided at Alexandria. The prophets, in the places above referred to, foretell the miseries Memphis was to suffer from the kings of Chaldea and Persia, and they threaten the Israelites who should retire into Egypt, or should have recourse to the Egyptians, that they should perish in that country. In this city they fed the ox Apis; and Ezekiel says, that the Lord will destroy the idols of Memphis, chap. xxx. 13, 16. Memphis retained its splendor till it was conquered by the Arabians in the 18th or 19th year of the Hegira, A. D. 641. Amrou-Ben-As, who took it, built another near it, which was called Fusthath, from the general's tent, which had long occupied that place. The Fatimite caliphs, becoming masters of Egypt, added another city, which they named Caherah, "the victorious," the present Grand Cairo, which is built on the eastern shore of the Nile.

NORTH. As it was customary for the Hebrews to consider the cardinal points of the heavens in reference to a man whose face was turned toward the east, the north was consequently to his left hand. The north wind dissipates rain, (Prov. xxv. 23.) but this must depend on the situation of a place; as in different places the same wind has different effects.

NOSE. The Hebrews commonly place the seat of anger in the nose; since the effect of anger is often hard breathing, and in animals, snorting. "There went up a smoke out of his nostrils," 2 Sam. xxii. 9; Ps. xviii. 8. "The anger of the Lord and his jealousy shall smoke against that man," Dent. xxix. 20. "Out of his nostrils goeth smoke," Job xli. 21. The ancient Greek and Latin authors speak much after the same manner.

Solomon alludes to the custom of women wearing golden rings in their nostrils, when he says, (Prov. xi. 22.) "As a jewel of gold in a swine's snout, so is a fair woman without discretion." And Ezekiel, (xvi. 12.) "I will put a jewel on thy forehead, [Heb. nose,] and ear-rings in thine ears, and a beautiful crown upon thine head." They also put rings in the nostrils of oxen and camels, to guide them by: "I will put my hook in thy nose, and my bridle in thy lips," 2 Kings xix. 28. (See also Job xli. 2.)

NOTHING is sometimes put in opposition to body, solidity, or mass. It is also put for vacuity, and for what is not sensible. Job says, (xxvi. 7.) "he stretcheth out the north over the empty place, and hangeth the earth upon nothing," upon the vacuum. Isaiah says, (xl. 22. Vulg.) "God spreads out the heavens as nothing;" he extends them in the air in invisible space. The wise man says, (Wisd. ii. 2. Vulg.) We are born of nothing, and in some sense shall return to nothing again. We shall disappear from the face of the earth, as if we had never been there. And Isaiah says, (xli. 24.) "Behold ye are of nothing, and your works of nought; an abomination is he that chooseth you."

Idols are often called nothings, non-entities. "Ye which rejoice in a thing of nought," Amos vi. 13. And Esther, (Apoc. xiv. 11.) "O Lord, give not thy sceptre unto them that be nothing;" deliver not over thy people to those gods that are nothing. Paul says,

"We know that an idol is nothing in the world," 1 Cor. viii. 4. To bring to nothing is to exterminate, to destroy; utterly to root out any thing.

NOVICE, or NEOPHYTE, newly sown, or planted, a name given to new converts to Christianity, or to those newly baptized. Paul advises (1 Tim. iii. 6.) that a novice should not be made a bishop, "lest, being lifted up with pride, he fall into the condemnation of the devil." As Lucifer, being puffed up with those eminent qualities he possessed, became proud and insolent, and was therefore precipitated into hell, so a man who finds himself suddenly exalted in dignity, easily flatters himself, and conceits that he has more real worth than others; that there is great occasion for his services, &c. Hence arise presumption and pride, and then follows the judgment of God, who always humbles the proud. The term Neophyte continued to be used among the primitive Christians during several ages, as appears from the tombstones of children, &c. who died when recently baptized.

NUMBERS, THE BOOK OF, is the third of the Pentateuch. The Hebrews call it נומבר, Vayedabber, (and he spoke.) because in the Hebrew it begins with these words. Some Jews call it במדבר, Bemidbar, (in the desert,) because it includes the history of the Israelites' journeying in the wilderness. The Greeks, and after them the Latins, call it the book of Numbers, because the first three chapters contain the numbering of the Hebrews and Levites, which was performed separately, after the erection and consecration of the tabernacle.

The people, having departed from Sinai on the twentieth day of the second month of the second year after their coming out of Egypt, went to the wilderness of Paran, and thence to Kadesh, whence they sent spies to view the Land of Promise. At their return the people were discouraged; for which God condemned them to die in the desert. And having journeyed thirty-nine years in the wilderness, they arrived at last at the plains of Moab, beyond Jordan. What happened during this interval, is recorded in the book of Numbers.

NUN, son of Elishamah, and father of Joshua, of the tribe of Ephraim. The Greeks give him the name of Nave instead of Num.

OAK

OAK. The religious veneration paid to this tree, by the original natives of Britain, in the time of the Druids, is well known to every reader of English history. We have reason to think that this veneration was brought from the East; and that the Druids did no more than transfer the sentiments their progenitors had received in oriental countries. It would appear that the patriarch Abraham resided under an oak, or a grove of oaks, which our translators render the plain of Mamre; and that he planted a grove of this tree, Gen. xxi. 23. In fact, since in hot countries nothing is more desirable, or more refreshing, than the shade of a tree, we may easily suppose the inhabitants would resort for such enjoyment to

Where'er the oak's thick branches spread
A deeper, darker shade.

Oaks, and groves of oaks, were esteemed proper places for religious services; altars were set up under them, (Josh. xxiv. 26.) and probably, in the East, as well as in the West, appointments to meet at conspicuous oaks were made, and many affairs transacted, or treated of, under their shade, as we read in Homer, Theocritus, and other poets.

It was common among the Hebrews to sit under oaks, Judg. vi. 11; 1 Kings xiii. 14. Jacob buried idolatrous images under an oak, (Gen. xxxv. 4.) and Deborah, Rebekah's nurse, was buried under one of these trees, chap. xxxv. 8; 1 Chron. x. 12. Abimelech was made king under an oak, Judg. ix. 6. Idolatry was practised under oaks, Isa. i. 29; lvii. 5; Hosea iv. 13. Idols were made of oaks, Isa. xlv. 14.

There are several kinds of oak in the East, as Tournefort observes: one of which he calls "the fairest species of oak in the world," and describes it as growing in the isle of Zia. He says also, of Anatolia, (vol. iii. p. 268.) "Beside the common oaks, and that which bears the Velanede, we saw several other kinds in the valleys." It is very reasonable to suppose that more than one kind is mentioned in Scripture.

O A T

אלון, Alon is the general name for oak, the mention of which occurs frequently; the Chaldee אילן, Ailen, seems also to be a species of oak, Dan. iv. 7, &c. [The word אילן, rendered oak in our version, is properly terebinth, Gen. xxxv. 4; Judg. vi. 11, 19. See TEREBINTH. R.]

The famous oracle of Dodona stood among oaks; which tree was sacred to Jupiter, who often on medals, &c. wears an oaken garland: sacra Jovi Quercus.

OATH, a solemn affirmation, accompanied by an appeal to the Supreme Being. God has prohibited all false oaths, and all useless and customary swearing in ordinary discourse; but when the necessity or importance of a matter requires an oath, he allows to swear by his name.

Among the Hebrews an oath was administered by the judge, who stood up, and adjured the party, who was to be sworn. To this mode of administering an oath Moses alludes, when he says, (Lev. v. 1.) "If a person sin, hearing the voice of swearing, that is, of adjuration, being called on to witness, whether he hath seen or known of the transaction then in judgment," &c. And this we take to be the true import of Prov. xxix. 24, "Whoso is partner, accomplice, even after the fact, with a thief, hateth his own soul: he heareth the voice of cursing, that is, the adjuration by the judge, when inquiry is making after the truth of a fact, but does not discover his knowledge of the matter:" consequently, he is guilty of perjury. (See 1 Kings viii. 31; 2 Chron. vi. 22.) In this manner our Lord was adjured by Caiaphas, Matt. xxvi. 63. Jesus had remained silent under long examination, when the high-priest rising up, knowing he had a sure mode of obtaining an answer, said, "I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ," &c. To this oath, thus solemnly administered, Jesus confessed a good confession. That the high-priests had this power, see Exod. xxii. 11; Lev. v. 1; Prov. xix. 24; xxx. 9. Probably, they might thus interfere only on occasions of some moment, and when the most solemn kind of oath was necessary.

An oath is a solemn appeal to God, as to an all-seeing witness, and an almighty avenger, if what we say be false, Heb. vi. 16. It is an act of religious worship; whence God requires it to be done in his name, (Deut. x. 20.) and points out the manner in which it ought to be administered, and the duty of the person who swears, Ps. xv. 4; xxiv. 4; Jer. iv. 2. An oath in itself is not unlawful, either as it is a religious act, or as God is called on to witness. See COVENANT.

God himself is represented as confirming his promise by oath, (Heb. vi. 13.) and thus conforming himself to what is practised among men, chap. v. 16, 17. The oaths forbidden (Matt. v. 34, 35; Jam. v. 12.) refer only to the unthinking, hasty and vicious practices of the Jews; otherwise, Paul would have acted against the command of Christ, Rom. i. 9; 2 Cor. i. 23. Neither atheists nor Epicureans, who deny, the former the being, the latter the providence, of God, can take an oath administered, and be bound by it, from the very form of an oath, which declares the omniscience and primitive justice of God. That person is obliged to take an oath, whose duty requires him to profess the truth. As we are bound to manifest every possible degree of reverence towards God, the greatest care is to be taken that we swear neither rashly nor negligently in making promises. To neglect performance is perjury; unless the promise be contrary to the law of nature; in which case no oath is binding. A person is guilty of perjury who takes an oath in a sense different from that in which it is (lawfully) tendered: such simulation and dissimulation, or mental reservation, is contrary to the law of nature, because a violation of duty. To swear by a creature is simply unlawful, from the nature of an oath, which implies omniscience and omnipotence in the party appealed to, and sworn by, perfections incompetent to any creature.

We find Joseph using an extraordinary kind of oath, as it appears to us; (Gen. xlii. 15.) "As Pharaoh liveth," or, by the life of Pharaoh. This custom of swearing by the king still continues in the East. The most sacred oath among the Persians is "by the king's head," says Hanway, (Trav. vol. i. p. 313.) and among other instances of it, we read in the Travels of the Ambassadors, (p. 204.) "There were but sixty horses for ninety-four persons. The Mehemandar (or conductor) swore by the head of the king (which is the greatest oath among the Persians) that he could not possibly find any more." And Thenevot says, (Trav. p. 97, part ii.) "His subjects never look upon him but with fear and trembling, and they have such respect for him, and pay so blind an obedience to all his orders, that how unjust soever his commands might be, they perform them, though against law both of God and nature. Nay, if they swear by the king's head, their oath is more authentic, and of greater credit, than if they swore by all that is most sacred in heaven and upon earth." These instances seem allied to that very common oath in Scripture, "As the Lord liveth:" and it should seem, that as this oath could not be taken without naming the name of God, which the later Jews regarded as a profanation, that they gradually introduced the custom of swearing (not judicially) by sacred things, as heaven, the temple, the gold of the temple, the altar, &c. all which our Lord forbids, and refers oaths to the great object of swearing, God; or, if the subject in debate be too trivial to call upon God about, then swear not at all; use no subterfuge, no lesser oath, but either affirm, or deny, simply.

Our Lord further says, thou shalt not swear by thy head, as some we see are accustomed to do by the king's head. The apostle Paul observes, "men verily swear by a greater than themselves;" as those no doubt understood they did, who swore by the king.

Grievous curses are promulgated against false swearers, and false oaths are among the greatest abominations before both God and man. (1.) That a person swear lawfully, he must swear by the Most High God, since only the Most High God can judge of the sincerity of his affirmation, which is the essence of an oath: to swear by any person or thing not omniscient to know, and omnipotent to remunerate, is to trifle with an oath. (2.) The veracity of an oath is its essence: to preserve this veracity we should swear only on due deliberation, only on actual knowledge, only agreeably to justice and equity: openly, candidly, with due circumspection, and if necessary, with due inquiry and explanation. (3.) The end of an oath is to glorify God, by acknowledging his attributes of holiness, justice, truth, knowledge, &c. and to appease man, by determining controversy, clearing the innocent, satisfying our brethren, or discharging our own consciences: and an oath should be "an end of all strife!"—If such be the essence and nature of oaths, what apology shall be made for profane swearing? swearing without an object, and to no avail; for who credits such asseverations beyond what they would credit simple assertion?

We have in Gen. xxi. 28. a curious account of a ceremony practised by Abraham, in respect to Abimelech: "Abraham set seven ewe lambs of the flock by themselves, and Abimelech said to Abraham, What mean these seven ewe lambs, which thou hast set by themselves? And he said, For these seven ewe lambs shalt thou take of my hand, that they may be a witness unto me [in my behalf] that I have digged this well: wherefore he called that place Beersheba, because they there swore both of them. Thus they made a covenant at Beersheba."—Beersheba may signify the well of the oath, or the well of the seven. Mr. Taylor inclines to the latter signification, from having read the following, in Bruce's Travels:—

"All that is right, Shekh, said I; but suppose your people meet us in the desert, in going to Cosseir, or otherwise, how should we fare in that case? Should we fight?—I have told you, Shekh, already, says he, cursed be the man who lifts his hand against you, or even does not defend and befriend you to his own loss, even were it Ibrahim, my own son." Then, after some conversation—"The old man muttered something to his sons, in a dialect I did not then understand; it was that of the shepherds of Suakem; and a little after, the whole hut was filled with people. These were priests and monks of their religion, and the heads of families; so that the house could not contain half of them. The great people among them came, and, after JOINING HANDS, repeated a kind of prayer of about two minutes long; [this kind of oath was in use among the Arabs, or shepherds, as early as the time of Abraham, Gen. xxi. 22, 23; xxvi. 28.] by which they declared themselves and their children accursed, if ever they lifted their hands against me, in the tell, [or field,] in the desert, or on the river; or, in case that I, or mine, should fly to them for refuge, if they did not protect us, at the risk of their lives, their families, and their fortunes, or, as they emphatically expressed it, 'to the death of the last male child among them." (See 1 Sam. xxv. 22; 1 Kings xiv. 10; xvi. 11; xxi. 21; 2 Kings ix. 8.) Medicines and advice being given on my part, faith and protection pledged on theirs, two bushels of wheat and SEVEN SHEEP were carried down to the boat; nor could we decline their kindness; as refusing a present in that country is just as great an affront as coming into the presence of a superior without any present at all." Gen. xxxiii. 10, 11; Mal. i. 20; Matt. viii. 11.

There is a remarkable passage in Prov. xi. 21, thus rendered by our translators, "Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished; but the seed of the righteous shall be delivered;" i. e. though they make many associations, and oaths, and join hands among themselves, (as formed part of the ceremony of swearing among these shepherds of Suakem,) yet they shall be punished. But Michaëlis proposes another sense of these words, "hand in hand"—my hand in your hand, i. e. as a token of swearing, "the wicked shall not go unpunished."—How far this sense of the passage is illustrated by the foregoing and the following extract, the reader will judge:

"I cannot here help accusing myself of what, doubtless, may be well reputed a very great sin. I was so enraged at the traitorous part which Hassan had acted, that, at parting, I could not help saying to Ibrahim, 'Now, Shekh, I have done every thing you have desired, without ever expecting fee or reward; the only thing I now ask you—and it is probably the last—is, that you avenge me upon this Hassan, who is every day in your power. Upon this, HE GAVE ME HIS HAND, saying, He shall not die in his bed, or I shall never see old age.'" (Bruce's Travels, vol. i. p. 199.)

We may remark further on this extract, that though Bruce's reflections do not applaud his conduct in this instance, yet it seems, in some sense, similar to the behavior of David, when he gave charge to his son, Solomon, to execute that justice upon Joab and Shimei, which he himself had been unable to do by reason of the vicissitudes of his life and kingdom; and of the influence which Joab, the general, had in the army; but of which the pacific reign of Solomon would deprive him, 1 Kings ii. 6.

Perhaps, also, this joining of hands may add a spirit to the passage, 2 Kings x. 15: "Is thine heart right, as my heart is with thy heart?" says Jehu to Jehonadab; "if it be, give me thine hand"—"And he (Jehonadab) gave him (Jehu) his hand;" i. e. in token of affirmation; "and he (Jehu) took him (Jehonadab) up into his chariot." So, then, it was not as an assistance to enable Jehonadab to get into the chariot, that Jehu gave him his hand, but, on the contrary, Jehonadab gave his hand to Jehu. This seems confirmed by verse 16, "So THEY made him (Jehonadab) ride in his (Jehu's) chariot." All these pronouns embarrass our translation, but they were perfectly understood by those who knew the customs of their country.

This sense of the passage is further confirmed by the following extracts from Ockley's History of the Saracens:—

"Several [of the Mahometan chiefs] came to Ali, and desired him to accept the government. He resolved not to accept of their allegiance in private; for they proffered to give him their hands (the customary ceremony then in use among them, on such occasions) at his own house; but he would have it performed at the mosque. Telha and Zobein came, and offered him their hands, as a mark, or token, of their approbation.

Ali bade them, if they did it, to be in good earnest, otherwise he would give his own hand to either of them that would accept of the government; which they refused; and gave him theirs." (Vol. i. p. 4.) Again (p. 36.):—"Telha, being wounded in the leg, ordered his man to take him up behind him; who conveyed him into a house in Bassora, where he died. But, just before, he saw one of Ali's men, and asked him if he belonged to the emperor of the faithful. Being informed that he did, Give me then, said he, your hand, that I may put mine in it, and by this action renew the oath of fidelity, which I have already made to Ali." (See 1 Sam. xxii. 17; 1 Chron. xxix. 24, marg. or orig.; Lam. v. 6; 2 Kings xiv. 5; xv. 19.)

Whoever recollects the mode of swearing allegiance, or doing homage for provinces, anciently used between sovereigns and vassals, (as by the kings of England to those of France, while England held provinces in that country,) will find considerable resemblance in it to this eastern usage. The vassal put both his hands into the hands of his sovereign, repeating words to this effect: "Thus I do thee homage, for such or such a province," &c. After which he withdrew his hands. This was repeated according to the number of fiefs or provinces held.

OBADIAH. There are several persons of this name mentioned in the Old Testament: it is only necessary, however, that we should notice the prophet. It is not certain when he lived, but it is probable that he was contemporary with Jeremiah and Ezekiel, who denounced the same dreadful judgments on the Edomites, as the punishment of their pride, violence, and cruel insultings over the Jews, after the destruction of their city. The prophecy, according to Usher, was fulfilled about five years after the destruction of Jerusalem.

OBED-EDOM, son of Jeduthun, a Levite, 1 Chron. xvi. 38. He had a numerous family, (1 Chron. xxvi. 4.) because the Lord blessed him. After the death of Uzzah, David, terrified at that accident, durst not remove the ark into the apartment he had provided for it in his palace, but left it in the house of Obed-Edom, near the place where Uzzah was struck. The presence of the ark became a blessing to Obed-Edom, which encouraged David some months afterwards to remove it to the place he had appointed for it. Obed-Edom and his sons were assigned to the keeping of the doors of the temple, 1 Chron. xv. 18, 21. In 2 Sam. vi. 10, Obed-Edom is called the Gittite, probably, because he was of Gath Rimmom, a city of the Levites beyond Jordan, Josh. xxi. 24, 25.

OBIL, an Ishmaelite, and master of the camels under David, 1 Chron. xxvii. 30.

OBLATION, see SACRIFICE.

OBOOTH, an encampment of the Hebrews in the wilderness of Arabia Petraea. See EXODUS.

OBSCURE is put for adversity. (See NIGHT, and DARKNESS.) An obscure, dark, or sad countenance is opposed to a serene and open one. Christ upbraids the Pharisees, that they had obscure or sad aspects (Matt. vi. 16, σύνδροποι) when they fasted. And Nahum, (ii. 10.) speaking of the destruction of Nineveh, says, their faces were as black as a pot; (Heb.) as if they had blacked their faces with soot. Some travellers affirm that, by way of mourning, the orientals daub their faces with the black of a kettle. Joel alludes to this custom: (chap. ii. 6.) "All faces shall gather blackness." [In these passages, however, the more appropriate translation is, "All faces shall withdraw their light," i. e. their cheerfulness, cheerful expression; all countenances shall become pale with fear; just as it is said in the context that the stars shall withdraw their light. R.

Obscure places denote the grave, (Ps. cxliii. 3.) "The enemy hath made me to dwell in darkness, as those who have been long dead." In Ps. lxxiv. 20, we read, "The dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty," which some understand of the obscure places of prisons, in which tyrants often keep the weak and unfortunate; because the obscure of the earth, the poor Israelites, are reduced to captivity in the houses of the Babylonians.

In great calamities, the sun is said to be obscured, and the moon to be covered with darkness, Matt. xxiv. 29; Luke xxiii. 45. (See also Nah. iii. 19; Jer. xiv. 2.)

Obscurity of the heart and mind, is put for the wilful ignorance and hardness of the Jews, Rom. i. 21; Eph. iv. 18.

ODED, a prophet of the Lord, (2 Chron. xxviii. 9.) who, being at Samaria, when the Israelites returned from the war against Judah, with their king Pekah, and brought 200,000 captives, went to meet them, and remonstrated effectually with them; so that the principal men in Samaria took care of them, gave them clothes, food, and other assistances, with horses, because the greater part of them were exhausted, and unable to walk. Thus they conducted them to Jericho, on the confines of Judah.

OFFENCE may be either active or passive. We may give offence by our conduct, or we may receive offence from the conduct of others. We should be very careful to avoid giving just cause of offence, that we may not prove impediments to others in their reception of the truth, in their progress in sanctification, in their peace of mind, or in their general course toward heaven. We should abridge or deny ourselves in some things, rather than, by exercising our liberty to the utmost, give uneasiness to Christians weaker in mind, or weaker in the faith, than ourselves, 1 Cor. x. 32. On the other hand, we should not take offence without ample cause; but endeavor, by our exercise of charity, and perhaps by our increase of knowledge, to think favorably of what is dubious, as well as honorably of what is laudable.

It was foretold of the Messiah, that he should be "a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence." Perhaps predictions of this kind are among the most valuable which Providence has preserved to us; as we see by them, that we ought not to be discouraged because the Jews, the natural people of the Messiah, rejected him, and still reject him; since the very offence they take at his humiliation, death, &c. is in perfect conformity to, and fulfilment of, those prophecies which foretold, that however they might profess to wish for the great deliverer, yet when he came they would overlook him, and stumble at him.

OFFERINGS. The Hebrews had several kinds of offerings, which they presented at the temple. Some were free-will offerings; others were of obligation. The first-fruits, the tithes, and the sin-offerings were of obligation: the peace-offerings, vows, offerings of wine, oil, bread, salt, and other things, made to the temple, or to the ministers of the Lord, were offerings of devotion. The Hebrews called offerings in general Corban; but the offerings of bread, salt, fruits, and liquors, as wine and oil, presented to the temple, they called Mincha. Sacrifices are not properly offerings: nor are they generally included under this name. Offerings of grain, meal, bread, cakes, fruits, wine, salt, oil, were common in the temple. Sometimes these offerings were alone; sometimes they accompanied the sacrifices. Honey was never offered with sacrifices, but it might be presented alone, as first-fruits, Lev. ii. 11, 12.

There were five sorts of offerings called Mincha, or Korban Mincha, Lev. ii. 1. (1.) Fine flour, or meal. (2.) Cakes of several sorts, baked in the oven. (3.) Cakes baked on a plate. (4.) Another sort of cakes baked on a plate with holes in it. (5.) The first-fruits of the new corn, which were offered either pure and without mixture, or roasted, or parched in the ear, or out of the ear. The cakes were kneaded with oil-olive, or fried in a pan, or only dipped in oil after they were baked. The bread offered to the altar was without leaven; for leaven was never offered on the altar, nor with the sacrifices, Lev. ii. 11, 12. But they might make presents of common bread to the priests and ministers of the temple. These offerings were appointed in favor of the poor, who could not afford the charge of sacrificing animals. Those also who offered living victims were not excused from giving meal, wine and salt, which were to accompany the greater sacrifices. Those who offered only oblations of bread, or of meal, offered also oil, incense, salt and wine, which were in a manner their seasoning. The priest in waiting received the offerings from the hand of him who brought them, laid a part on the altar, and reserved the rest for his own subsistence, as a minister of the Lord. Nothing was wholly burnt up but the incense, of which the priest retained none. (See Lev. ii. 2, 13; Numb. xv. 4, 5.)

When an Israelite offered a loaf to the priest, or a whole cake, the priest broke it into two parts, setting aside that part he reserved to himself, and breaking the other into crumbs, poured on it oil, salt, wine and incense, and spread the whole on the fire of the altar. If these offerings were accompanied by an animal for a sacrifice, this portion was all thrown on the victim, to be consumed with it.

If the offerings were ears of new corn, (wheat or barley,) these ears were parched at the fire, or in the flame, and rubbed in the hand, and then offered to the priest in a vessel; over the grain he put oil, incense, wine and salt, and then burnt it on the altar, first having taken his own portion, Lev. ii. 14, 15.

The most of these offerings were voluntary, and of pure devotion. But when an animal was offered in sacrifice, they were not at liberty to omit them. Every thing proper was to accompany the sacrifice, and what served as seasoning to the victim. In some cases the law required only offerings of corn, or bread; as when they offered the first-fruits of harvest, whether offered solemnly by the nation, or as the devotion of private persons.

As to the quantity of meal, oil, wine or salt to accompany the sacrifices, we cannot see that the law determines it. Generally, the priest threw a handful of meal, or crumbs, on the fire of the altar, with wine, oil and salt in proportion, and all the incense. The rest belonged to himself; the quantity depended on the liberality of the offerer. We observe, that Moses appoints an assaron, or the tenth part of an ephah of meal, for those who had not wherewith to offer the appointed sin-offerings, Lev. v. 11; xiv. 21. In the solemn offerings of the first-fruits for the whole nation, they offered an entire sheaf of corn, a lamb of a year old, two tenths or two assarons of fine meal mixed with oil, and a quarter of a hin of wine for the libation, Lev. xxiii. 10, &c. Numb. v. 15.

In the sacrifice of jealousy, when a husband accused his wife of infidelity, the husband offered the tenth part of a satum of barley meal, without oil or incense, because it was a sacrifice of jealousy.

Offerings of fruits of the earth, of bread, wine, oil and salt, are the most ancient of any that are known, Gen. iv. 3, 4. Cain offered to the Lord fruits of the earth, the first-fruits of his labor. Abel offered firstlings of his flock, and of their fat.

The heathen religion has nothing more ancient than these sorts of offerings made to their gods. The difference between the offerings of meal, wine and salt, with which the Greeks and Latins accompanied their bloody sacrifices, and those used by the Hebrews in their temple, consisted, chiefly, in that the Hebrews cast the oblations on the flesh of the victim, being already offered and laid on the fire, whereas the Greeks put them on the head of the victim while alive, and when just going to be sacrificed.

OG, king of Bashan, was a giant of the race of the Rephaim. We may judge of his stature by the length of his bed, which was long preserved in Rabbath, the capital of the Ammonites, Deut. iii. 11. See BED.

Moses says, (Numb. xxi. 33.) that after having conquered Sihon, king of the Amorites, he advanced toward the country of Bashan; where Og reigned, who marched against him to Edrei, with all his subjects. Og was conquered, and slain, with his children, and all his people. Og and Sihon were the only kings that withstood Moses. Their country was given to the tribes of Gad, Reuben, and half the tribe of Manasseh.

OIL. The Hebrews commonly anointed themselves with oil; they anointed also their kings and high-priests. See ANOINTING.

Isaiah calls an eminence, or vineyard, that was fruitful and fat, a horn, the son of oil, chap. v. 1. In chap. x. 27, he says, that God would destroy the yoke of the Israelites, by the quantity of oil that he would pour thereon. He would take from it all its roughness and hardness. The high-priest Joshua, and the prince Zerubbabel, are called sons of oil; (Zech. iv. 14.) that is, each of them had received the sacred unction. Job, speaking of the condition of his first prosperity, says that the rocks were then fountains of oil to him, Job xxix. 6.

The oil of gladness (Ps. xlv. 7; Isa. lxi. 3.) was the perfumed oil with which the Hebrews anointed themselves on days of rejoicing and festivity. Moses says (Deut. xxxii. 13.) that God made his people to suck oil and honey out of the rocks; that is, that in the midst of dreary deserts, he abundantly provided them with all things not only necessary, but agreeable. "The olive-tree shall fail to bring forth fruit, says Hab. iii. 17. James directs that the sick should be anointed with oil in the name of the Lord, by the elders of the church, Jam. v. 14.

OINTMENT. As perfumes are seldom made up among us in the form of ointment, but mostly in that of essence, while ointments are rather medical, we do not always discern the beauty of those comparisons in Scripture, in which ointments are mentioned. "Dead flies, though but small insects, cause the ointment of the apothecary (it should be, the fragrant unguent of the perfumer) to emit a fetid vapor; so does a small proportion of folly, or perverseness, overcome, prevail above, overpower by its fetor, the fragrance of wisdom and glory," Eccl. x. 1.

We read of ointments for the head; (Eccl. ix. 8.) our own pomatums, some of which are pretty strongly essenced, may indicate the nature of these, as being their representatives in this country.

Ointments and oils were used in warm countries after bathing; and as oil was the first recipient of fragrance, probably from herbs, &c. steeped in it, many kinds of unguents not made of oil (olive oil) retained that appellation. As the plants imparted somewhat of their color as well as of their fragrance, hence the expression green oil, &c. in the Hebrew. See ANOINTING, and ALABASTER.

OLD, ancient. We say the Old Testament, by way of contradistinction from the New. Moses was the minister of the Old Testament, of the old age of the letter; but Christ is the Mediator of the New Testament, or of the new covenant; not of the letter, but of the spirit, Heb. ix. 15—20.

The old man, (Rom. vi. 6.) the old Adam, in a moral sense, is our derived corrupted nature, which we ought to crucify with Jesus Christ, that the body of sin may die in us. In Col. iii. 9, the apostle enjoins us "to put off the old man with his deeds, and to put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him." And in Eph. iv. 22, we are instructed to "put off the old man which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts."

The old leaven is concupiscence, and adherence to the literal and ceremonial observances of the law. Paul advises (1 Cor. v. 8.) "to keep the feast, not with old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness; but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth." Our Saviour expresses almost the same thing, when he says (Luke v. 37.) that "no man putteth new wine into old bottles, else the new wine will burst the bottles, and be spilled, and the bottles shall perish."

The old fruits and the new, which succeed one another, (Lev. xxv. 22; xxvi. 10; Cant. vii. 13.) denote great abundance. You shall have so much that, to make room for the new, you shall be obliged to remove the old.

Old age is promised as a blessing by God, to those who maintain obedience to his commands; and it is probable that Providence did, and still does, watch over and prolong the lives of eminently pious men. It was formerly thought a great blessing to come to the grave in a good old age, or "as a shock of corn fully ripe;" and though "they are not to be heard, which feign that the old fathers did look only for transitory promises," yet we think we may venture to say they did on various occasions expect peculiar mercies from God, even in this life; and that their expectations were not disappointed. Old age was entitled to peculiar honor, and no doubt, when men lived to the age of several hundred years, the wisdom they must needs have acquired, the influence they must needs have possessed over the younger part of the community, must have been much greater than they are among ourselves. Very venerable must have been the personal appearance of a patriarch of three or four hundred years, or even of half that age, in the eyes of his family, and of his descendants, whether immediate or remote.

There is nothing more decidedly recorded than the respect paid among the ancients to old age; of which Grecian story affords highly pleasing proofs; and that it was equal among the orientals we learn from various allusions in the book of Job, the Proverbs, &c.

Old is spoken of what is decaying; (Isa. l. 9; Heb. viii. 13.) of what has been destroyed; (2 Pet. ii. 5.) of former times, Lam. i. 7.

OLIVE-TREE. Paul, in his Epistle to the Romans, (xi. 24.) distinguishes two kinds of olive-trees; (1.) the wild and natural; and (2.) those under care and culture. The cultivated olive-tree is of a moderate height, its trunk knotty, its bark smooth, and ash-colored; its wood is solid and yellowish; the leaves are oblong, almost like those of the willow, of a green color, dark on the upper side, and white on the under side. In the month of June it puts out white flowers that grow in bunches. Each flower is of one piece, widening upwards, and dividing into four parts; the fruit oblong and plump. It is first green, then pale, and when it is quite ripe, black. In the flesh of it is enclosed a hard stone, full of an oblong seed. The wild olive is smaller in all its parts.

When Noah sent forth the dove out of the ark, it brought back to him a small olive-branch with its leaves, (Gen. viii. 11.) which was a token to the patriarch that the waters of the deluge were sunk away. In the temple of Jerusalem, Solomon made of olive-wood the cherubim, and the portal that parted the sanctuary, 1 Kings vi. 23, 33. Eli-phaz (Job xv. 33.) compares a wicked man to a vine which sheds its blossoms, and to an olive whose flowers fall before their season, and consequently brings no fruit. The sacred writers often use similes taken from the olive.

OLIVES, MOUNT OF, is situate east of Jerusalem, and separated from the city by the brook Kidron, and the valley of Jehoshaphat. On this mount Solomon built temples to the gods of the Ammonites and Moabites, out of complaisance to his wives, 1 Kings xi. 7. Hence the mount of Olives is called the mountain of Corruption, 2 Kings xxiii. 13. Josephus says, it is five stadia (or furlongs) from Jerusalem. Luke says, a sabbath-day's journey; i. e. about eight furlongs, Acts i. 12. The mount of Olives has three summits, ranging from north to south; from the middle summit our Saviour ascended into heaven; on the south summit Solomon built temples to his idols; the north summit is distant two furlongs from the middlemost. This is the highest, and is commonly called Galilee, or Viri Galilæi, from the expression used by the angels, Ye men of Galilee.

In the time of king Uzziah, the mount of Olives was so shattered by an earthquake, that half the earth on the western side fell, and rolled four furlongs, or five hundred paces, toward the opposite mountain on the east; so that the earth blocked up the highways, and covered the king's gardens. (Joseph. Antiq. lib. ix. cap. 11, and Zech. xiv. 5.)

Though this mount was named from its olive-trees, yet it abounded in other trees also. It was a station for signals, which were communicated from hence by lights and flames, on various occasions. They were made of long staves of cedar, canes, pine wood, with coarse flax, which, while on fire, were shaken about till they were answered from other signals.

What is said in Midras Tellim, by Rab. Janna, is extremely remarkable: "The Divine Majesty stood three years and a half on mount Olivet, saying, 'Seek ye the Lord, while he may be found; call on him while he is near.'" Is this the language of a Jew?

The names of the various districts of this mount deserve attention, as, (1.) Geth-semame, the place of oil-presses; (2.) Bethany, the house of dates; (3.) Bethphage, the house of green figs, and, probably, other names in different places. The Talmudists say, that on mount Olivet were shops, kept by the children of Canaan, of which shops some were in Bethany: and that under two large cedars which stood there, were four shops, where things necessary for purification were constantly on sale, such as doves or pigeons for the women, &c. Probably, these shops were supplied by country persons, who hereby avoided paying rent for their sittings in the temple.

The mention of these residences implies that this mount had various dwellings upon it.

There was also a collection of water at Bethany on this mount, which was by some used as a place of purification.

The small building, erected over the place of ascension, is contiguous to a Turkish mosque, and is in possession of the Turks, who show it for profit; and subject the Christians to an annual contribution for permission to officiate within it on Ascension day. From the mosque is a fine and commanding view of Jerusalem, mount Sion and the Dead sea.

Dr. Clarke found on the top of the mount of Olives a vast and very ancient crypt, in "the shape of a cone, of immense size; the vertex alone appearing level with the soil, and exhibiting by its section at the top a small circular aperture; the sides extending below to a great depth, lined with a hard red stucco." He thinks it to have been an idolatrous construction, perhaps as old as Solomon, and profaned by Josiah, 2 Kings xxiii. 13. The number of crypts about Jerusalem is well deserving attention. If Solomon built this crypt, he might, as the Jews say he did, construct one of the same kind for the reception of the ark, &c. in case of danger; but this must continue undecided till the "times of the Gentiles are fulfilled."

"So commanding is the view of Jerusalem afforded in this situation, (says Dr. Clarke,) that the eye roams over all the streets, and around the walls, as if in the survey of a plan or model of the city. The most conspicuous object is the mosque, erected upon the site and foundations of the temple of Solomon." Hence the observation of the evangelist, (Luke xix. 37.) that Jesus beheld the city, and wept over it, acquires additional force. "Towards the south appears the lake Asphaltites, a noble expanse of water, seeming to be within a short ride from the city; but the real distance is much greater. Lofty mountains enclose it with prodigious grandeur. To the north are seen the verdant and fertile pastures of the plain of Jericho, watered by the Jordan, whose course may be distinctly discerned." (Travels, vol. ii. p. 572.)

OMEGA, ( $\Omega$ ), the last letter of the Greek alphabet; Alpha, A, and Omega,  $\Omega$ , therefore, include all; the first and the last. See ALPHA.

OMER, or GOMER, a measure of capacity among the Hebrews; the tenth part of an ephah, a little more than five pints.

OMRI, or AMRI, was general of the army of Elah, king of Israel; but being at the siege of Gibbethon, and hearing that his master Elah was assassinated by Zimri, who had usurped his kingdom, he raised the siege, and, being elected king by his army, marched against Zimri, attacked him at Tirzah, and forced him to burn himself and all his family, in the palace in which he had shut up himself. Zimri reigned but seven days, A. M. 3075, 1 Kings xvi. 9. After his death, half of Israel acknowledged Omri for king, the other half adhered to Tibni, son of Gineth; which division continued four years. When Tibni was dead, the people united in acknowledging Omri as king of all Israel, who reigned twelve years; six years at Tirzah, and six at Samaria, 1 Kings xvi.

Tirzah had previously been the chief residence of the kings of Israel, but when Omri purchased the hill of Shomeron, (1 Kings xvi. 24, about A. M. 3080,) he there built a new city, which he called Samaria, from the name of the first possessor Shemer, or Shomer, and there fixed his royal seat. From this time Samaria was the capital of the kingdom of the ten tribes.

Omri did evil before the Lord, and his crimes exceeded those of his predecessors. He walked in all the ways of Jeroboam son of Nebat, and died at Samaria, A. M. 3086. His successor was Ahab.

ON, or HELIOPOLIS, a city of Egypt, by Ptolemy called Onion; On, Gen. xli. 45; xlii. 20; and Beth Shemesh, the temple of the sun, Jer. xliii. 13, which agrees with the Egyptian idea of the name. See HELIOPOLIS, I.

ONAN, son of Judah, and grandson of the patriarch Jacob, was given in marriage to Tamar, after the death of his brother Ur, but was destroyed by the Lord, for refusing to comply with the law of the Levirate, Gen. xxxviii. See MARRIAGE.

ONESIMUS, (Philem. verse 10.) a Phrygian by nation, and slave to Philemon. Having run away from his master, and also having robbed him, (Philem. verse 18; Chrysost. Prolog.) he went to Rome about A. D. 61, while Paul was there in prison the first time. As Onesimus knew the apostle by repute, (his master Philemon being a Christian,) he sought him out, acquainted him with his transgression, owned his flight, and did him all the service Philemon himself could have done, had he been at Rome. Paul brought him to a sense of the greatness of his crime, instructed, converted and baptized him, and sent him back to his master Philemon, with a letter inserted among Paul's epistles; which is universally acknowledged as his.

Philemon, it is related, not only received Onesimus as a faithful servant, but as a brother and a friend; and after a little time, he sent him back to Rome, that he might continue his services to Paul, in his prison. From this time Onesimus's employment was in the ministry of the gospel. The Apostolical Constitutions report that Paul made him bishop of Berea in Macedonia. The martyrologies call him apostle, and say he ended his life by martyrdom. The Roman martyrology mentions him as being made bishop of Ephesus, by Paul, after Timothy. Others add, that it was he whom Ignatius the Martyr speaks of, as bishop of Ephesus, A. D. 107; but this wants proof.

ONESIPHORUS, (2 Tim. i. 16.) a Christian who came to Rome A. D. 65, while the apostle Paul was imprisoned there for the faith, and at a time when almost every one had forsaken him, 2 Tim. i. 16, 18. Having found Paul in bonds, after long seeking him, he assisted him to the utmost of his power; for which the apostle wishes all sorts of benedictions on himself and his family.

I. ONIAS, son of Jaddus, was made high-priest of the Jews A. M. 3682, and governed the Hebrew republic twenty years, to A. M. 3702. He had had two sons, Simon and Eleazar. Simon, surnamed the Just, succeeded him. (Joseph. Ant. xi. ult.)

II. ONIAS, a son of Simon the Just, succeeded Manasseh in the high-priesthood, A. M. 3771, and held it to 3785. (Joseph. Ant. xii. 3, 4.)

III. ONIAS, a son of Simon II. high-priest of the Jews, was established in the priesthood A. M. 3805. (Joseph. Ant. xii. 4.)

IV. ONIAS, or MENELAUS, whom Josephus (Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 4, 5.) describes as son to Simon the Just, was created high-priest A. M. 3832, and put to death in 3842.

ONO, a city of Benjamin; built or re-built by the family of Elpaal, of Benjamin, 1 Chron. viii. 12. It was five miles from Lod, or Lydda, also built by Benjamites. In Neh. vi. 2, we have mention of "The Plain of Ono," which probably was not far from the city.

ONYCHA. The Hebrew שֶׁחֶלֶת, Shecheleth, (Exod. xxx. 31.) which Jerome, after the LXX, translates onychinus, others understand of labdanum, or of bellium. But the greater part of commentators explain it by the onycha or odoriferous shell, a shell like that of the shell-fish purpura. The onycha is fished for in watery places of the Indies, where the spica nardi grows, which is the food of this fish, and what makes its shell so aromatic. The best onycha is found in the Red sea, and is white and large. The Babylonian is black and smaller, according to Dioscorides. [The onycha is the Blatta Byzantina of the shops. It consists of the cover or lid of a species of muscle, which, when burnt, emits a musky odor. R.]

ONYX was the eleventh stone in the high-priest's pectoral, Exod. xxviii. 20. It is a kind of flesh-colored agate, whence it has obtained the name of onyx, or the nail. See SARDONYX.

OPHEL was a cliff, or acclivity, a part of mount Zion, on the east, not far from mount Moriah. Jotham, king of Judah, made several buildings on Ophel, 2 Chron. xxvii. 3. Manasseh, king of Judah, built a wall west of Jerusalem and the fountain Gihon, beyond the city of David, from the fish-gate to Ophel, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 14. At the return from the captivity, the Nethinim dwelt at Ophel, Neh. iii. 26; xi. 21: Micah (iv. 8.) mentions the tower of Ophel: "And thou, O tower of the flock, the strong hold of the daughter of Zion:" Heb. "And thou tower of the flock, Ophel, daughter of Zion." There was at Jerusalem a sheep-gate, and a tower of Ophel.

I. OPHIR, a son of Joktan, whose descendants peopled the district between Mesha and Sephar, a mountain of the East, Gen. x. 26, 30. See MESHA.

II. OPHIR, a country to which the vessels of Solomon traded, and as to the situation of which there has been much discussion. All the passages in which it is mentioned have been examined, (1 Kings xxii. 48, compared with 2 Chron. xx. 36; also 1 Kings ix. 28; x. 22.) and it has been observed, that the so called ships of Tarshish went to Ophir; that these ships sailed from Ezion-geber, a port of the Red sea; (1 Kings xxii. 48; ix. 26; x. 22.) that three years were required for the voyage; that the fleet returned freighted with gold, peacocks, apes, spices, ivory and ebony; (1 Kings ix. 28; x. 11, 12; compare 2 Chron. viii. 18; ix. 10, &c.) that the gold of Ophir was in the highest esteem; and that the country of Ophir more abounded with gold than any other then known. Upon these data interpreters have undertaken to determine the situation of Ophir, but almost all have arrived at different conclusions.

Josephus places it in the Indies, and says it is called the gold country, by which he is thought to mean Chersonesus Aurea, now known as Malacca, a peninsula opposite to the island of Sumatra. Lucas Holstenius thinks we must fix on India generally, or on the city of Supar in the island of Celebes. Others place it in the kingdom of Malabar, or in Ceylon; that is, the island of Taprobana, so famous among the ancients, an opinion which Bochart has labored to support. Lipenius places it beyond the Ganges, at Malacca, Java, Sumatra, Siam, Bengal, Peru, &c. Others, as Huet and Brice, have placed it at Sofala, in South Africa, where mines of gold and silver have been found, which appear to have been anciently and extensively worked, and to this hypothesis Gesenius inclines. Rosenmüller and others suppose it to be southern Arabia.

From these statements it will be seen, that there is room for considerable diversity of opinion as to the geographical situation of Ophir; and, indeed, the best writers are of opinion that it must ever remain a matter of mere conjecture.

OPHNI, a city of Benjamin, (Josh. xviii. 24.) and thought to be the same as Gophni, or Gophna, which was about 15 miles from Jerusalem, towards Naplouse, or Shechem.

I. OPHRAH, a city of Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 23; 1 Sam. xiii. 17. Instead of this Micah has Aphrah, i. 10.

II. OPHRAH, a city of Manasseh, the birth place of Gideon, Judg. vi. 11; viii. 27; ix. 5.

OPPRESSION is the spoiling or taking away of men's property by constraint, terror, or force, without having any right thereto; working on the ignorance, weakness, or fearfulness of the oppressed. Men are guilty of oppression when they offer violence to the bodies, property, or consciences of others; when they crush or overburden others, as the Egyptians did the Hebrews, Exod. iii. 9. There may be oppression which maligns the character, or studies to vex another, yet does not affect his life: as there is much persecution, for conscience' sake, which is not fatal, though distressing.

ORACLE, a name sometimes given to the lid or covering of the ark, the mercy-seat, (see MERCY-SEAT,) and also to those supernatural communications of which such frequent mention is made in Scripture.

Among the Jews we distinguish several sorts of oracles. (1.) Those delivered vivâ voce; as when God spake to Moses face to face, and as one friend speaks to another, Numb. xii. 8. (2.) Prophetic dreams; as those which God sent to Joseph, foretelling his future greatness, Gen. xxxvii. 5, 6. (3.) Visions; as when a prophet in an ecstasy had supernatural revelations, Gen. xv. 1; xlv. 2. (4.) The response of Urim and Thummim, which accompanied the ephod, or the pectoral worn by the high-priest, Numb. xii. 6; Joel ii. 28. This manner of inquiring of the Lord was often used, from Joshua's time to the erection of the temple at Jerusalem, (1 Sam. xxiii. 9; xxx. 7.) after which they generally consulted the prophets.

The Jews pretend that upon the ceasing of prophecy, God gave them what they call Bath-kol, the daughter of the voice, which was a supernatural manifestation of the divine will, either by a strong inspiration or internal voice, or by a sensible and external voice, heard by a number of persons sufficient to bear testimony to it; such as the voice heard at the baptism of Christ.

In the early period of the Christian church the gifts of prophecy and inspiration were frequent; after that time the greater part of the heathen oracles fell into contempt and silence.

Some have ascribed to demons all the oracles of antiquity; others impute them to the knavery of the priests and false prophets.

The most famous oracle of Palestine was that of Baal-zebub, king of Ekron, which the Jews themselves consulted, 2 Kings i. 2, 3, 6, 16. There were also oracular Teraphim, as that of Micah; (Judg. xvii. 1, 5,) the ephod of Gideon, (viii. 27, &c.) and the false gods adored in the kingdom of Samaria, which had their false prophets, and consequently their oracles. Hosea (chap iv. 12.) reproaches Israel with consulting wooden idols, as does the book of Wisdom, (xiii. 16, 17.) and the prophet Habakkuk, ii. 19.

The Hebrews, living in the midst of idolatrous people, accustomed to receive oracles, to have recourse to diviners, [magicians and interpreters of dreams, would have been under a more powerful temptation to imitate these impieties and superstitions, if God had not afforded to them certain means of knowing some future events by priests and prophets, in their most urgent necessities. Thus, when Moses had forbidden the Israelites to consult magicians, witches, enchanters and necromancers, he promised to send them a prophet of their own nation, who should instruct them, and discover to them the truth, Deut. xviii. 10, 11, 15, &c. These oracles of truth had no necessary connection with time or place, or any other circumstance; or with the personal merit of the individual by whom they were uttered. The high-priest, clothed with the ephod and pectoral, gave a true answer, whatever may have been his personal character.

The fathers inform us, that at the coming of the Messiah, the oracles of the heathen were struck dumb; and it is certain that since the preaching of the gospel, the empire of the devil is much contracted and weakened, and the most famous oracles are fallen into disuse. This silence of the oracles, however, did not happen all at once; John, (Rev. xiii. 5, 6, 13.) describing a persecution of the church, speaks of signs, wonders and delusions, which the deceiver and his accomplices should produce, to excite men to worship the image of the beast, and to entice them to idolatry.

It may, however, assist us in forming a right notion of oracles, to separate them into two classes; those which are proper oracles, and those which are oracles in a qualified sense only. The witch of Endor was no oracle, though irregularly applied to by Saul, when he could obtain no answer from the instituted means of consulting the Lord. The hag Ericho, in Lucan's Pharsalia, was no oracle, as no temple, &c. was extant in her cave. Nor is that properly an oracle, which consists in catching up words which fall from certain persons. Most persons will recollect that Alexander the Great, by the false pronunciation of a Greek word by the priest of Ammon, (Ὠ παῖ-διος instead of Ὠ παῖ-διου.) was made to pass for son of Jupiter, διος, says Plutarch. When, too, he visited the Delphic prophetess on a wrong day, and urged her, she at length complied, saying, "Thou art irresistible, my son!" "That is all I want," answered Alexander; "to be irresistible is enough." These are not oracles; though policy and flattery might make them pass for such.

The most ancient oracle on record, probably, is that given to Rebekah, (Gen. xxv. 22.) but the most complete instance is that of the child Samuel, 1 Sam. iii. The place was the residence of the ark, the regular station of worship. The manner was by an audible and distinct voice: "The Lord called Samuel; and the child mistook the voice for that of Eli, (and this more than once,) for he did not yet know the word of the Lord:" the subject was of high national importance; no less than a public calamity, with the ruin of the first family in the land. Nor could the child have any inducement to deceive Eli; as in that case, he would have rather invented something flattering to his venerable superior. This communicative voice, issuing from the interior of the sanctuary, was properly an oracle.

The highest instances of oracles are those voices which, being formed in the air by a power superior to nature, bore testimony to the celestial character of the divine Messiah; as at his baptism, (Matt. iii. 17; Mark i. 2; Luke iii. 22.) and again at his transfiguration; (Matt. xxii. 2; Luke ix. 29.) "And this voice that came from heaven," says Peter, "we heard," 2 Epist. i. 18. Nothing can exceed the grandeur and majesty of these oracles; and they could not but forcibly impress the minds of all who witnessed them.

Now, it should be observed, that these communications were marked by simplicity and distinctness: they were the most remote possible from ambiguity and double meaning: they spake out their purport explicitly.

Prophetic impulses, or communications, are with less propriety called oracles: as when Samuel went to Bethlehem, to anoint the future king of Israel, his own opinion fixed on Eliab, "Surely, the Lord's anointed is before him;" but the Lord corrected his judgment; not by an audible voice, which must have been heard by all the company, but by some internal monition, 1 Sam. xvi. 6. It will appear, also, that in the time of Saul and David, when application for advice was made to the oracle, it could only be given in a regular manner to one party, as there were not two tabernacles, and two arks of the covenant, with which sacred objects the oracle was connected. Neither were there two high-priests' pectorals, on which the names of the tribes were written. The priest who did not wear these names on his breast, could not inquire as representative of the tribes of the whole nation; and by what means he received an answer is uncertain. It could not be, as some have supposed, by radiation of the letters on the precious stones; since he did not wear them. We read very little, or nothing, of oracles given by the high-priest, in succeeding ages. When Jehoshaphat desired Ahab to "inquire at the word of the Lord to-day," there is no mention of an oracle, as connected with the established worship in Israel, (1 Kings xxii.) nor do we read that when the copy of Moses' law was found in the temple at Jerusalem, king Josiah applied to the oracle for advice. Neither did Zedekiah, king of Judah, though the very existence of his country depended on the policy he adopted; and no crisis could have been more important.

Dreams, visions, the bath-kol, &c. are not properly oracles; nor is the sentiment uttered by Caiaphas, which recommended the policy of cutting off one man, even though no malefactor, rather than hazarding the fate of the nation, an oracle. It was a maxim of a statesman, applicable to the designs of Providence; but not properly an oracle. It is probable, that oracles are extremely ancient among the heathen: they were known before the Trojan war, as appears from Homer; and Ovid makes Deucalion consult an oracle, immediately after his deluge.

The reader will perceive in all this the intention to establish a strong distinction between the oracles of the Bible, and those promulgated by the heathen. When Cræsus applied to the oracle of Apollø at Delphi, to know whether he should attack Cyrus, he received for answer,

Cræsus transgressus Halym maxima regna perdet:
or, as Cicero quotes it,

Cræsus Halym penetrans magnam pervertet opum vim:

"If Cræsus crosses the river Halys he will overthrow a great empire." This he understood of the empire of Cyrus; the event proved his own overthrow.

The same ambiguity attends the famous reply of the same oracle to Pyrrhus:

Aio te, Æacida, Romanos vincere posse;

I do pronounce that Rome
Pyrrhus shall overcome;

which may be interpreted to mean, either that Rome should overcome Pyrrhus, or that Pyrrhus should overcome Rome. Whoever reads Herodotus and Pausanias carefully, will find most of their oracles—and they record many—either so dark as to be unintelligible, or so equivocal as to bear whatever interpretation policy might be pleased to impose upon them.

The heathen drew auguries from almost every thing: from the flight of birds; from the manner of certain chickens feeding; and above all from the entrails of victims, offered in sacrifice. This most ridiculous superstition was not lawfully practised among the Jews; their sacrifices were simply offered to the Deity. It was, however, customary in the East. Thus, the king of Babylon not only divined by arrows, and consulted images, but he looked in the liver, Ezek. xxi. 21. Nor should we forget, that it is equally to the credit of Christianity, that surrounded, as the Christians were, by the most inveterate of oracular prejudices and impostures, no such mummery profaned their assemblies. The reader has only to compare Lucan's description of the violences practised on the priestess at Delphi, the furious contortions of her person, or Virgil's of the Sybil at Cumæ, with the calm observation of the apostle, "The spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets," with his injunctions of order, on various occasions, and with his strict prohibition of indecent forwardness in women, while at worship, indecorous exposure of their persons, disorderly dress, &c. to evince this.

It is well to know, that in the remains of several heathen temples, though in ruins, there are traces of the secret ways of access, which the priests possessed, undiscovered by the spectators. Dr. E. D. Clarke found such in a temple at Argos; also a secret chamber, in an oracular cave at Telmessus. A private staircase still exists, leading to the Adytum, in the temple of Isis, at Pompeii; undoubtedly for oracular purposes. To do this subject justice here, is impossible; some able pen, well acquainted with the charlatanerie of ancient days, might render it equally amusing and instructive to not a few among our own nation, who have opportunities of knowing better—very much better—than their practice implies.

ORDINANCE, an institution established by lawful authority. Religious ordinances must be instituted by the great institutor of religion, or they are not binding: minor regulations are not properly ordinances. Ordinances, once established, are not to be varied by human caprice, or mutability. The original ordinance seems to have been sacrifice, to which praise and prayer were naturally appended. Circumcision was an ordinance appointed to Abraham and his family: baptism and the eucharist are ordinances under the gospel.

Human ordinances, established by national laws, may be varied by other laws, because the inconveniences arising from them can only be determined by experience. Yet Christians are bound to submit to these institutions, when they do not infringe on those established by divine authority; not only from the consideration, that if every individual were to oppose national institutions, no society could subsist, but by the tenor of Scripture itself. Nevertheless, Christianity does not interfere with political rights, but leaves individuals, as well as nations, in full enjoyment of whatever advantages the constitution of a country secures to its subjects.

The course of nature is the ordinance of God; and every planet obeys that impulse which the divine Governor has impressed on it, Jer. xxxi. 36.

OREB, a prince of the Midianites, killed with Zeeb, another prince of the same people, Judg. vii. 25.

ORIENTAL LANGUAGES, see LANGUAGE, p. 605.

ORION, one of the brightest constellations of the southern hemisphere. The Heb. כְּשִׁיל, Chesil, signifies, according to the best interpreters and the ancient versions, the constellation Orion, which, on account of its supposed connection with storms and tempests, Virgil calls nimbosus Orion. In Job xxxviii. 31, fetters are ascribed to him; and this coincides with the Greek fable of the giant Orion, bound in the heavens. R.] It also marks the west. Hence the LXX on Job ix. 9, and Theodotus on Amos v. 8, translate it vesperum.

ORPAH, a Moabitess, wife of Chilion, son of Elimelech and Naomi. Chilion, the husband of Orpah, being dead, she lived with Naomi, her mother-in-law; who returning into her own country, Orpah was prevailed on to stay in Moab, but Ruth followed Naomi to Bethlehem, Ruth i. 9, 10, &c. See RUTH.

ORPHAN. The customary acceptation of the word orphans is well known to be that of "children deprived of their parents;" but the force of the Greek word ὀρφανός; (rendered comfortless in our translation, John xiv. 18.) implies the case of those who have lost some dear protecting friend; some patron, though not strictly a father: and in this sense it is used, 1 Thess. ii. 17, "We also, brethren, being taken away from our care over you," ἀπορφανισθέντες. Corresponding to this import of the word, it might be used by our Lord, in the passage of John's Gospel referred to; and a very lively comment on it may perhaps be inferred from the following remark; especially if there were in the court of Herod, or of the kings of Syria, or other western Asiatic monarchs, an order of soldiery of the same description; which is by no means impossible. "The soldiers of Nadir Shah are obliged to keep Yetims at their own expense. Yetim signifies an orphan: but these are considered as servants, who, when their masters die, or fall in battle, are ready to serve as soldiers." (Hanway's Travels in Persia, vol. i. p. 172.) May we now paraphrase our Lord's sentiment?—"You are about to see your master die, fall, as it were, in battle; and might imagine that it would be your duty to succeed into my place, and to maintain the bloody conflict, till you also fell, as I had fallen; but I will not (long) leave you in that anxious situation: I will again return to you, and lead you on to victory under my protection and patronage: I will not now leave you Yetims; though most of you may, at distant periods, close your lives as gallant soldiers in this noble warfare, after your master's example." There seems nothing inconsistent with the affection of Jesus to his followers, in this explanation.

OSPREY, a kind of eagle, whose flesh is forbidden, Lev. xi. 13. It is thought to be the black eagle; perhaps the Nisser Tookoor described by Bruce. See BIRDS, p. 186.

OSSIFRAGE, (פֶּרֶס, peres), an unclean bird, (Lev.

xi. 13; Deut. xiv. 12.) but as to its identity interpreters are not agreed. Some read vulture, others the black eagle, others the falcon. The name peres denotes to crush, to break; and this name agrees with our version, which implies "the bone-breaker;" a name given to a kind of eagle, from its habit of breaking the bones of its prey, after it has eaten the flesh. Onkelos uses a word which signifies naked, and leads us to the vulture: and, indeed, if we were to take the classes of birds in any thing like a natural order, in Lev. xi. the vulture should follow the eagle as an unclean bird. The Septuagint interpreter also renders vulture; and so do Munster, Schindler, and the Zurich versions. See BIRDS, p. 186.

OSTRICH. This singular bird is designated by three several appellations in the Hebrew Scriptures, each of which is, as usual, taken from some particular quality which it possesses, or habit to which it is addicted.

The first of these, יָעֵן, yâén, is frequently translated in our version, most improperly, by owl; a rendering which deprives several passages in which it occurs of all their strength and propriety. (See Job xxx. 29; Isa. xlii. 21; Mic. i. 8.) In Lev. xi. 16, and Deut. xiv. 12, this bird is called בַּת הַיַּעֲנָן, "the daughter of the ostrich;" in both these passages our translation reads "owl." In Job xxxix. 13, &c. where the ostrich is particularly described, it is called רָגַן, a name which seems to be taken from its cry, or from the whirring noise made by its wings when it runs.

The ostrich is considered to be the largest of birds, and the connecting link between quadrupeds and fowls. Its head and bill somewhat resemble those of a duck; and the neck may be compared to that of a swan, but that it is much longer; the legs and thighs resemble those of a hen; but are very fleshy and large. The end of the foot is cloven, and has two very large toes, which, like the leg, are covered with scales. These toes are of unequal sizes; the largest, which is on the inside, being seven inches long including the claw, which is near three fourths of an inch in length, and almost as broad; the other toe is but four inches long, and is without a claw. The height of the ostrich is usually seven feet, from the head to the ground; but from the back it is only four; so that the head and the neck are above three feet long. From the head to the end of the tail, when the neck is stretched in a right line, it is seven feet long. One of the wings, with the feathers stretched out, is three feet in length. The plumage is generally white and black, though some of them are said to be gray. There are no feathers on the sides of the thighs, nor under the wings. The lower half of the neck is covered with smaller feathers than those on the belly and back, and the head and upper part of the neck are covered with hair: at the end of each wing, there is a kind of spur, resembling the quill of a porcupine, about an inch long; and about a foot lower down the wing is another of the same description, but something smaller.

The ostrich has not, like most other birds, feathers of various kinds; they are all bearded with detached hairs or filaments, without consistence and reciprocal adherence. The consequence is, that they cannot oppose to the air a suitable resistance, and therefore are of no utility in flying, or in directing the flight. Besides the peculiar structure of her wings, the ostrich is rendered incapable of flight by her enormous size, weighing seventy-five or eighty pounds; a weight which would require an immense power of wing to elevate into the air.

The ostrich is a native only of the torrid regions of Africa and Arabia, and has furnished the sacred writers with some of their most beautiful imagery.

The ostrich was aptly called by the ancients a lover of the deserts. Shy and timorous in no common degree, she retires from the cultivated field, where she is disturbed by the Arabian shepherds and husbandmen, into the deepest recesses of the Sahara. In those dreary wastes, she is reduced to subsist on a few tufts of coarse grass, which here and there languish on their surface, or a few other solitary plants equally destitute of nourishment, and, in the psalmist's phrase, even "withered before they are grown up." To this dry and parched food may perhaps be added, the great variety of land snails, which occasionally cover the leaves and stalks of these herbs, and which may afford her some refreshment. Nor is it improbable, that she sometimes regales herself on lizards and serpents, together with insects and reptiles of various kinds. Still, however, considering the voracity and size of this camel bird, (as it is called in the East,) it is wonderful how the little ones should be nourished and brought up, and especially how those of fuller growth, and much better qualified to look out for themselves, are able to subsist.

The attachment of this bird to the barren solitudes of the Sahara is frequently alluded to in the Holy Scriptures; particularly in the prophecies of Isaiah, where the word ya'en, as before observed, ought to be rendered the ostrich. In the splendid palaces of Babylon, so long the scenes of joy and revelry, the prophet foretold, that the shy and timorous ostrich should fix her abode; than which a greater and more affecting contrast can scarcely be presented to the mind.

When the ostrich is provoked, she sometimes makes a fierce, angry, and hissing noise, with her throat inflated, and her mouth open; when she meets with a timorous adversary that opposes but a faint resistance to her assault, she chuckles or cackles like a hen, seeming to rejoice in the prospect of an easy conquest. But in the silent hours of night, she assumes a quite different tone, and makes a very doleful and hideous noise, which sometimes resembles the roaring of a lion; at other times that of the bull and the ox. She frequently groans, as if she were in the greatest agonies; an action to which the prophet beautifully alludes: "I will make a mourning like the ostrich," Mic. i. 8. The Hebrew term is derived from a verb which signifies to exclaim with a loud voice: and may therefore be attributed with sufficient propriety to the ostrich, whose voice is loud and sonorous; especially, as the word does not seem to denote any certain, determined mode of voice or sound peculiar to any one particular species of animals, but one that may be applicable to them all.

Dr. Brown confirms this account in every particular: he says, the cry of the ostrich resembles the voice of a hoarse child, and is even more dismal. It cannot, then, but appear mournful, and even terrible, to those travellers who plunge with no little anxiety into those immense deserts, to whom every living creature, man not excepted, is an object of fear, and a cause of danger.

Not more disagreeable, and even alarming, is the hoarse moaning voice of the ostrich to the lonely traveller in the desert, than were the speeches of Job's friends to that afflicted man. Of their harsh and groundless censures, which were continually grating his ears, he feelingly complains: "I am a brother to dragons, and a companion to [ostriches] owls." Like these melancholy creatures, that love the solitary place, and the dark retirement, the bereaved and inourning patriarch loved to dwell alone, that he might be free from the teasing impertinence of his associates, and pour out his sorrows without restraint. But he made a wailing also like the dragons, and a mourning like the ostriches; his condition was as destitute, and his lamentations as loud and incessant, as theirs. Or he compares to those birds his unfeeling friends, who, instead of pouring the balm of consolation into his smarting wounds, added to the poignancy of his grief by their inhuman conduct. The ostrich, even in a domestic state, is a rude and fierce animal; and is said to point her hostility, with particular virulence, against the poor and destitute stranger that happens to come in her way. Not satisfied with endeavoring to push him down by running furiously upon him, she will not cease to peck at him violently with her bill, and to strike at him with her feet, and will sometimes inflict a very serious wound. The dispositions and behavior of Job's friends and domestics were equally vexatious and afflicting; and how much reason he had to complain, will appear from the following statement: "They that dwell in mine house, and my maidens, count me for a stranger; I am an alien in their sight. I called my servant, and he gave me no answer; my breath is strange to my wife, though I entreated for the children's sake of mine own body; yea, young children despised me, all my inward friends abhorred me. Upon my right hand rise the youth; they push away my feet, and they raise up against me the ways of their destruction. They mar my path, they set forward my calamity, they have no helper. They come upon me as a wide breaking in of waters, in the desolation they roll themselves upon me," ch. xxx. 12, 14.

We now pass on to the very correct and poetical description of the ostrich which is found in the thirty-ninth chapter of the book of Job. The version of the passage is from the pen of Dr. Harris, who has also furnished some of the illustrations: for the remaining part we are indebted to professor Paxton and Dr. Shaw.

The wing of the ostrich tribe is for flapping.

The word which our English Bible renders peacock, is one of the Hebrew names of the ostrich. The peacock was not known in Syria, Palestine, or Arabia, before the reign of Solomon, who first imported it. It was originally from India. Besides, the ostrich, not the peacock, is allowed on all hands to be the subject of the following parts of the description. And while the whole character, says Mr. Good, precisely applies to the ostrich, it should be observed, that all the western Arabs, from Wedinoon to Senaar, still denominate it enim, with a near approach to the Hebrew name here employed. Neither is the peacock remarkable for its wing, but for the beauties of its tail; whereas, the triumphantly expanded, or as Dr. Shaw terms it, the quivering expanded wing, is one of the characteristics of the ostrich. "When I was abroad," says this entertaining writer, "I had several opportunities of amusing myself with the actions and behavior of the ostrich. It was very diverting to observe with what dexterity and equipoise of body it would play and frisk about on all occasions. In the heat of the day, particularly, it would strut along the sunny side of the house with great majesty.

It would be perpetually fanning and priding itself with its quivering expanded wings, and seem, at every turn, to admire and be in love with its own shadow."

But of the stork and falcon for flight.

The argument drawn from natural history advances from quadrupeds to birds; and of birds, those only are selected for description which are most common to the country in which the scene lies, and, at the same time, are most singular in their properties. Thus, the ostrich is admirably contrasted with the stork and the eagle, as affording an instance of a winged animal totally incapable of flying, but endued with an unrivalled rapidity of running, compared with birds whose flight is proverbially swift, powerful and persevering. Let man, in the pride of his wisdom, explain or arraign this difference of construction! Again, the ostrich is peculiarly opposed to the stork, and to some species of the eagle, in another sense, and a sense adverted to in the verses immediately ensuing; for the ostrich is well known to take little care of its eggs or its young; while, not to dwell upon the species of the eagle just glanced at, the stork has ever been, and ever deserves to be, held in proverbial repute for its parental fondness.

It may be remarked, that "the eagle spreading abroad her wings, and taking her young upon them," is mentioned, Deut. xxxii. 11, as an example of care and kindness. So that this passage may imply, that the wings of the ostrich, however wonderful for their plumage, are neither adapted for the flying of the possessor, nor for the shelter of her young; and so are peculiarly different from those of all other birds, and especially those most remarkable for their flight and other particulars.

She leaveth her eggs on the ground,
And warmeth them in the dust;
And is heedless that the foot may crush them,
Or the beast of the field trample upon them.

As for the stork, "the lofty fir-trees are her house;" but the improvident ostrich depositeth her eggs in the earth. She buildeth her nest on some sandy hillock, in the most barren and solitary recesses of the desert, exposed to the view of every traveller, and the foot of every wild beast.

Our translators appear, by their version, which is confused, to have been influenced by the vulgar error, that the ostrich did not herself hatch her eggs by sitting on them, but left them to the heat of the sun; probably understanding היה as of a total dereliction; whereas the original word החמ signifies actively that she heateth them,—namely, by incubation. And Mr. Good, who also adopts this opinion, observes, that there is scarcely an Arabian poet who has not availed himself of this peculiar character of the ostrich in some simile or other. Let the following suffice, from Nawabig, quoted by Schultens:

There are who, deaf to nature's cries,
On stranger tribes bestow their food:
So her own eggs the ostrich flies,
And, senseless, rears another's brood.

This, however, does not prove that she wholly neglects incubation, but that she deserts her eggs, which may be because frightened away. The fact is, she usually sits upon her eggs as other birds do; but then she so often wanders, and so far in search of food, that frequently the eggs are addle by means of her long absence from them. To this account we may add, when she has left her nest, whether through fear or to seek food, if she light upon the eggs of some other ostrich, she sits upon them, and is unmindful of her own. Leo Africanus says, they lay about ten or a dozen at a time; but Dr. Shaw observes, that by the repeated accounts which he had received from his conductors, as well as from Arabs of different places, he had been informed that they lay from thirty to fifty. He adds, "We are not to consider this large collection of eggs as if they were all intended for a brood. They are the greatest part of them reserved for food, which the dam breaks, and disposeth of according to the number and cravings of her young ones."

Mr. Barrow denies that the ostrich lays so many eggs as is here stated; and remarks, that, being a polygamous bird, and several females laying their eggs in one nest, to the number of ten or twelve each, has occasioned this mistake as to the number of eggs laid by the female ostrich.

She hardeneth herself for that which is not hers;
Her labor is vain, without discrimination.

Our translation renders this verse, "She is hardened against her young ones, as though they were not hers," &c.; whence it has been inferred, that she is destitute of all natural affection toward her young; an opinion which has been zealously controverted by Buffon. Mr. Vansittart, in his remarks upon this clause, argues that the text is not intended to indicate any want of care for her young; but, as the eggs are set upon by several female ostriches alternately, the young are the joint care of the parent birds, without discrimination. The same Hebrew word, he remarks, occurs but once, besides in this place, throughout the Old Testament, and that is Isa. lxiii. 17, where the prophet refers to God's casting off his people, and taking strangers in their place, and is exactly what is applicable to this passage in Job.

We think, however, that this nice criticism upon the text is altogether uncalled for, since the very facts cited by Buffon, from Leo Africanus and Kelbè, are decisive against the French naturalist's reasoning, and corroborative of the accuracy of the English translators. The testimony of Dr. Shaw is still more to the purpose:

"On the least noise or trivial occasion," says the doctor, "she forsakes her eggs, or her young ones; to which, perhaps, she never returns; or if she does, it may be too late either to restore life to the one, or to preserve the lives of the others. Agreeable to this account, the Arabs meet sometimes with whole nests of these eggs undisturbed; some of them are sweet and good, others are addle and corrupted; others, again, have their young ones of different growth, according to the time it may be presumed, they may have been forsaken of the dam. They often meet with a few of the little ones no bigger than well-grown pullets, half starved, straggling and moaning about, like so many distressed orphans, for their mother. In this manner the ostrich may be said to be hardened against her young ones, as though they were not hers; her labor, in hatching and attending them so far, being vain, without fear, or the least concern of what becomes of them afterwards. This want of affection is also recorded, Lam. iv. 3, 'The daughter of my people is become cruel, like the ostriches in the wilderness;' that is, by apparently deserting their own, and receiving others in return. Hence, one of the great causes of lamentation was, the coming in

of strangers and enemies into Zion, and possessing it. Thus, in the twelfth verse of this chapter, it is said, "The kings of the earth, and all the inhabitants of the world, would not have believed that the adversary and the enemy should have entered into the gates of Jerusalem;" and in ch. v. 2, "Our inheritance is turned to strangers, our houses to aliens."

With reference to the phrase, "her labor is vain," Mr. Vansittart remarks, while eggs are laid, and young ostriches produced, it can never be correct; and if the mother did even drive her young ones from her, still it could not be said that her labors had not been successful; because, while there was a young brood remaining, it would be evident that she had been prosperous. Labor in vain, he further remarks, must either be that which is not productive, or else what profits not the person who labors, or otherwise, what profits another who does not labor. This, he conceives, is the case with the ostrich in the interpretation here suggested; and is, moreover, the true signification of the Hebrew phrase. The same phrase occurs, Lev. xxvi. 16, "Ye sow your seed in vain, for another shall reap it," not yourselves. Likewise, Isa. lxx. 21—23, "They shall build houses and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them. They shall not build, and another inhabit; they shall not plant and another eat; they shall not labor in vain:" that is, profitless for themselves, and for the good of others. And again, ch. xlix. 4, "Then I said, I have labored in vain; I have spent my strength for nought and in vain;" that is, when he had departed from the worship of Jehovah, and had been given up to the service of the gods of the nation, and consequently to their advantage, and not his own. It is in this sense that Mr. Vansittart proposes to understand the Hebrew word, which is not a forced signification, and is moreover the exact peculiarity and property of the ostrich intended to be marked.

Because God hath made her feeble of instinct,
And not imparting to her understanding.

Natural affection and sagacious instinct are the grand instruments by which Providence continueth the race of other animals; but no limits can be set to the wisdom and power of God. He preserveth the breed of the ostrich without those means, and even in a penury of all the necessaries of life.

In her private capacity, she is not less inconsiderate and foolish, particularly in the choice of food, which is often highly detrimental and pernicious to her; for she swallows every thing greedily and indiscriminately, whether it be pieces of rags, leather, wood, stone or iron. They are particularly fond of their own ordure, which they greedily eat up as soon as it is voided; no less fond are they of the dung of hens and other poultry. It seems as if their optic, as well as their olfactory nerves, were less adequate and conducive to their safety and preservation, than in other creatures. The divine Providence in this, no less than in other respects, "having deprived them of wisdom, neither hath it imparted to them understanding." This part of her character is fully admitted by Buffon, who describes it in nearly the same terms.

Yet at the time she haughtily assumes courage;
She scorneth the horse and his rider.

Dr. Durell justifies this translation, observing, that the ostrich cannot soar as other birds; and therefore the words in our version, "when she lifteth up herself," cannot be right; besides, the verb אָרַב occurs only in this place; and in Arabic it signifies to take courage, and the like.

Notwithstanding the stupidity of this animal, says Dr. Shaw, its Creator hath amply provided for its safety, by endowing it with extraordinary swiftness, and a surprising apparatus for escaping from its enemy. They, "when they raise themselves up for flight, laugh at the horse and his rider." They afford him an opportunity only of admiring at a distance the extraordinary agility, and the stateliness, likewise, of their motions, the richness of their plumage, and the great propriety there was in ascribing to them an expanded quivering wing. Nothing, certainly, can be more entertaining than such a sight; the wings, by their rapid but unwearied vibrations, equally serving them for sails and oars; while their feet, no less assisting in conveying them out of sight, are no less insensible of fatigue.

The surprising swiftness of the ostrich is expressly mentioned by Xenophon, in his Anabasis; for, speaking of the desert of Arabia, he states that the ostrich is frequently seen there; that none could take them, the horsemen who pursue them soon giving it over; for they escaped far away, making use both of their feet to run, and of their wings, when expanded, as a sail to waft them along." This representation is confirmed by the writer of a voyage to Senegal, who says, "She sets off at a hard gallop; but, after being excited a little, she expands her wings as if to catch the wind, and abandons herself to a speed so great, that she seems not to touch the ground." "I am persuaded," continues that writer, "she would leave far behind the swiftest English courser." Buffon, also, admits that the ostrich runs faster than the horse. These unexceptionable testimonies completely vindicate the assertion of the inspired writer.

OTHNIEL, son of Kenaz of Judah, Josh. xv. 17. Scripture says, Othniel was brother to Caleb, (Judg. i. 13.) meaning, probably, near relations, as cousins; for it is not likely they were literally brothers, since Othniel married the daughter of Caleb. See ACHSAH.

After the death of Joshua, the Israelites not exterminating the Canaanites, and not continuing in their fidelity to the Lord, he delivered them to Chushan-Rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia, to whom they continued in subjection eight years, Judg. iii. Then they cried to the Lord, who raised them up for a deliverer Othniel, who, being filled with the Spirit of God, judged Israel; and the country had rest forty years. That is to say, it was in peace the fortieth year after the peace that Joshua had procured for it, A. M. 2960, ten years before his death. The year of Othniel's death is unknown.

OVEN, see BREAD, p. 208.

OWL, an unclean bird, Lev. xi. 17. When Isaiah speaks of Babylon as reduced to a wilderness, he says that the owls shall answer one another there, (chap. xiii. 22.) and the psalmist says, that in his affliction, he was as the owl sitting alone on the house-top, Ps. cii. 7. Interpreters, however, are not agreed on the signification of the Hebrew words translated owl, as may be seen under the article OSTRICH. The owl was consecrated to Minerva, and on this account was honored by the Athenians, who represented it on their medals.

PAL

PADAN ARAM, the plains of Aram, or Syria. See MESOPOTAMIA, and SYRIA.

PALESTINE, taken in a limited sense, denotes the country of the Philistines, or Palestines; which was that part of the Land of Promise extending along the Mediterranean sea, from Gaza south to Lydda north. The LXX were of opinion that the word Philistim which they generally translate Allophyti, signified strangers, or men of another tribe. Palestine, taken in a more general sense, signifies the whole country of Canaan, as well beyond, as on this side, Jordan; though frequently it is restrained to the country on this side that river: so that in later times the words Judea and Palestine were synonymous. We find also the name of Syria-Palestina given to the Land of Promise, and even sometimes this province is comprehended in Cœle-Syria, or the Lower Syria. Herodotus is the most ancient writer known who speaks of Syria-Palestina. He places it between Phœnicia and Egypt. See CANAAN.

PALM, a measure of a hand's, or four fingers' breadth, or 3.648 inches, Hebr. פָּהַךְ, Tephach; LXX, ἰσάκις, Exod. xxv. 25. The Heb. Zereth, זֶרֶת, (LXX, Σπυρίδι), Exod. xxviii. 16.) is often translated palm, though it signifies a span or half-cubit, and contains three ordinary palms; which ought to be observed, that two measures so unequal may not be confounded. Jerome sometimes translates Tephach by four fingers, and sometimes by a palm; but he always renders Zereth by palms; and the Septuagint by Spithame. Goliath was in height six cubits and a Zereth; that is, six cubits and a half, making eleven feet ten inches and something more. We find in Isa. xl. 12, an expression that proves the Zereth, or palm, to signify the extent of the hand from the end of the thumb to the end of the little finger. "Who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand, and meted out heaven with a span?" a Zereth.

PALMER-WORM. Bochart is of opinion that the Hebrew גָּזָאֵם, gázám, is a kind of locust, furnished with very sharp teeth, with which it gnaws off grass, corn, leaves of trees, and even their bark. The Jews support this idea, by deriving the word from gázaz, to cut, to shear, to mince; and Pisdias compares a swarm of locusts to a sword with ten thousand edges. Such is also the opinion of most commentators. But notwithstanding this, the LXX read ζούρι, and the Vulgate cruca, or caterpillar, which rendering is supported by Fuller. Michaëlis also agrees with this notion, and thinks the sharp and cutting teeth of the caterpillar, which, like a sickle, clear away all before them, might give name to this insect. Caterpillars also begin their ravages before locusts, which seems to coincide with the nature of the creature here intended: "That which the palmer-worm hath left hath the locust eaten; and that which the locust hath left hath the cankerworm eaten; and that which the cankerworm hath left hath the caterpillar eaten," Joel i. 4.

PALM-TREE. This tree is called תָּמָר, támár, from its straight, upright growth, for which it seems more remarkable than any other tree: it sometimes rises to the height of a hundred feet.

The palm is one of the most beautiful trees of the vegetable kingdom. The stalks are generally full of rugged knots, which are the vestiges of the decayed leaves: for the trunk is not solid like other trees, but its centre is filled with pith, round which is a tough bark, full of strong fibres when young, which, as the tree grows old, hardens and becomes ligneous. To this bark the leaves are closely joined, which in the centre rise erect, but after they are advanced above the vagina that surrounds them, they expand very wide on every side the stem, and, as the older leaves decay, the stalk advances in height. The leaves, when the tree has grown to a size for bearing fruit, are six or eight feet long; are very broad when spread out, and are used for covering the tops of houses, and similar purposes.

The fruit, which is called "date," grows below the leaves in clusters; and is of a sweet and agreeable taste. The learned Kæmpfer, as a botanist, an antiquary and a traveller, has exhausted the whole subject of palm-trees. The diligent natives, says Mr. Gibbon, celebrated, either in verse or prose, the 360 uses to which the trunk, the branches, the leaves and the fruit were skilfully applied. The extensive importance of the date-tree, says Dr. Clarke, is one of the most curious subjects to which a traveller can direct his attention. A considerable part of the inhabitants of Egypt, of Arabia and Persia, subsist almost entirely on its fruit. They boast also of its medicinal virtues. Their camels feed upon the date stone. From the leaves they make couches, baskets, bags, mats and brushes; from the branches, cages for their poultry, and fences for their gardens; from the fibres of the boughs, thread, ropes and rigging; from the sap is prepared a spirituous liquor; and the body of the tree furnishes fuel: it is even said, that from one variety of the palm-tree, the "phœnix farinafera," meal has been extracted, which is found among the fibres of the trunk, and has been used for food.

Several parts of the Holy Land, no less than of Iduumæa, that lay contiguous to it, are described by the ancients to have abounded with date-trees. Judea, particularly, is typified in several coins of Vespasian, by a disconsolate woman sitting under a palm-tree. Upon the Greek coin, likewise, of his son Titus, struck upon a like occasion, we see a shield suspended upon a palm-tree, with a victory writing upon it. The same tree, upon a medal of Domitian, is made an emblem of Neapolis, formerly Sichem, or Naplôsa, as it is now called; as it is likewise of Sephoris, or Sepphoury, according to the present name, the metropolis of Galilee, upon one of Trajan's. It may be presumed, therefore, that the palm-tree was formerly much cultivated in the Holy Land.

In Deut. xxxiv. 3. Jericho is called "the city of palm-trees, because, as Josephus, Strabo and Pliny have remarked, it anciently abounded with them: and so Dr. Shaw states that there are several of them yet at Jericho, where there is the convenience they require of being often watered; where likewise the climate is warm, and the soil sandy, or such as they thrive and delight in. At Jerusalem, Sichem, and other places to the northward, however, Dr. Shaw states that he rarely saw above two or three of them together; and even these, as their fruit rarely or ever comes to maturity, are of no further service, than (like the palm-tree of Deborah) to shade the retreats or sanctuaries of their sheikhs, as they might formerly have been sufficient to supply the solemn processions with branches. (See John xii. 13.) From the present condition and quality of the palm-trees in this part of the Holy Land, Dr. Shaw concludes that they never were either numerous or fruitful here, and that, therefore, the opinion of Reland and others, that Phœnicia is the same with "a country of date-trees" does not appear probable; for if such a useful and beneficial plant had ever been cultivated there to advantage, it would have still continued to be cultivated, as in Egypt and Barbary.

In the latter country, in the maritime, as well as in the inland parts, there are several large plantations of the palm-tree; though such only as grow in the Sahara bring their fruit to perfection. Dr. Shaw, to whom we are so greatly indebted for our acquaintance with the natural history of the East, informs us that they are propagated chiefly from the roots of full grown trees, which, if well transplanted, and taken care of, will yield their fruit in the sixth or seventh year; whereas those which are raised immediately from the kernels, will not bear till about the sixteenth year. This method of raising the qourîz, or palm, and particularly the fact that when the old trunk dies, there is never wanting one or other of these offsprings to succeed it, may have given rise to the fable of the phoenix dying, and another arising from its ashes.

It is a singular fact that these trees are male and female, and that the fruit which is produced by the latter will be dry and insipid without a previous communication with the former. In the month of March or April, therefore, when the sheaths that respectively enclose the young clusters of the male flowers, and the female fruit, begin to open, at which time the latter are formed, and the former are mealy, they take a sprig or two of the male cluster, and insert it into the sheath of the female; or else they take a whole cluster of the male tree, and sprinkle the meal or farina of it over several clusters of the female. The latter practice is common in Egypt, where they have a number of males; but the trees of Barbary are impregnated by the former method, one male being sufficient for four or five hundred females.

The palm-tree arrives at its greatest vigor about thirty years after transplantation, and continues so seventy years afterwards, bearing yearly fifteen or twenty clusters of dates, each of them weighing fifteen or twenty pounds. After this period, it begins gradually to decline, and usually falls about the latter end of its second century. "To be exalted," or "to flourish like the palm-tree," are as just and proper expressions, suitable to the nature of this plant, as "to spread about like a cedar," Ps. xcii. 11.

The root of the palm-tree produces a great number of suckers, which, spreading upward, form a kind of forest. It was under a little wood of this kind, as Calmet thinks, that the prophetess Deborah dwelt, between Ramah and Bethel, Judg. iv. 5. And probably to this multiplication of the palm-tree, as he suggests, the prophet alludes, when he says, "The righteous shall flourish like a palm-tree," (Ps. xcii. 12; comp. Ps. i. 3.) rather than to its towering height, as Dr. Shaw supposes.

The palm is much fonder of water than many other trees of the forest, and this will account for its flourishing so much better in some places than others. When Moses and his people on their way to the promised land arrived at Elim, they found twelve wells of water by the side of seventy palm-trees, Exod. xv. 27. And we learn from sir Robert Wilson, (History of the Expedition to Egypt, p. 18.) that when the English army landed in Egypt, in 1801, to expel the French from that country, sir Sidney Smith assured the troops that wherever date-trees grew, water must be near; and so they found it on digging usually within such a distance that the roots of the tree could obtain moisture from the fluid. Burchardt confirms this statement in several places. (Travels in Syria, &c. p. 473, 523, 531, 562, &c.)

The prophet Jeremiah, describing, in a fine strain of irony, the idols of the heathens, says, "They are upright as the palm-tree," (chap. ix. 5.) which Calmet takes to be an allusion to their shape, remarking, from Diodorus Siculus, that the ancients, before the art of carving was carried to perfection, made their images all of a thickness, straight, having their hands hanging down, and close to their sides, the legs joined together, the eyes shut, with a very perpendicular attitude, and not unlike the body of a palm-tree. Such are the figures of those ancient Egyptian statues that still remain. The famous Greek architect and sculptor Dædalus set their legs at liberty, opened their eyes, and gave them a more free and easy attitude.

The straight and lofty growth of the palm-tree, its longevity and great fecundity, the permanency and perpetual flourishing of its leaves, and their form, resembling the solar rays, makes it a very proper emblem of the natural, and thence of the divine light. Hence in the holy place or sanctuary of the temple, (the emblem of Christ's body,) palm-trees were engraved on the walls and doors between the coupled cherubs, 1 Kings vi. 29, 32, 35; Ezek. xli. 18, 19, 20, 25, 26. Hence, at the Feast of Tabernacles branches of palm-trees were to be used, among others, in making their booths. (Comp. Lev. xxiii. 30; Neh. viii. 15.) Palm branches were also used as emblems of victory, both by believers and idolaters. The reason given by Plutarch and Aulus Gellius, why they were so among the latter, is the nature of the wood, which so powerfully resists incumbent pressure. But, doubtless, believers, by bearing palm-branches after a victory, or in triumph, meant to acknowledge the supreme Author of their success and prosperity, and to carry on their thoughts to the Divine Light, the great conqueror over sin and death. (Comp. 1 Mac. xiii. 51; 2 Mac. x. 7; John xii. 13; Rev. vii. 9.) And the idolaters, likewise, probably used palms on such occasions, not without respect to Apollo or the sun, to whom, among them, they were consecrated. Hence, probably, we have the name of a place, "Baal-Tamar," (Judg. xx. 33.) Tamar being, as we have said, the name of the palm-tree; it being so called in honor of Baal or the sun, whose image, it may be, was there accompanied by this tree. Herodotus states that there were many palm-trees at Apollo's temple, at Brutus, in Egypt; and that at Sais, in the temple of Minerva, or Athena, (a name for the solar light,) there were artificial columns in imitation of palm-trees.

In Cant. vii. 7, the statue of the bride is compared to a palm-tree, which conveys a pleasing idea of her gracefulness and beauty. So Theocritus compares Helen to a cypress-tree in a garden; but Ulysses makes almost the very same comparison as that of Solomon, by likening the princess Nausicaa to a young palm-tree growing by Apollo's altar in Delos.

It is probable that Tamar, (Ezek. xlvii. 19, &c.) or Tadmor, (1 Kings ix. 18.) built in the desert by Solomon, and afterwards called Palmyra by the Greeks, obtained its name from the number of palm-trees which grew about it.

As the Greek name for this tree signifies also the fabulous bird, called the phoenix, some of the fathers have supposed that the psalmist (xcii. 12.) alludes to the latter, and on his authority have made the phoenix an emblem of a resurrection. Tertullian calls it a full and striking emblem of this hope. But the tree, also, seems to have been considered as emblematical of the revivification of the human body, from its being found in some burial places in the East. In our colder climate, we have substituted the yew-tree in its place.

PALSY, a disorder which deprives the limbs of motion, and makes them useless to the patient. Our Saviour cured several paralytics by his word alone. (See Matt. iv. 24; viii. 6; ix. 2; Mark ii. 3, 4; Luke v. 18.) The sick man who was lying near the pool at the sheep-market, for thirty-eight years, was a paralytic, John v. 5.

PAMPHYLIA, a province of Asia Minor, having Cilicia east, Lycia west, Pisidia north, and the Mediterranean south. It is opposite to Cyprus, and the sea between the coast and the island is called the sea of Pamphylia. The chief city of Pamphylia was Perga, where Paul and Barnabas preached, Acts xiii. 13; xiv. 24.

PAPER, PAPHYRUS, see BOOK, p. 200, 201.

PAPHOS, a famous city of the isle of Cyprus, where Paul converted the proconsul Sergius Paulus, and struck with blindness a Jewish sorerer, called Bar-jesus, who would have hindered his conversion. Paphos was at the western extremity of the island, Acts xiii. 6, A. D. 44.

PARABLE, Παράβολοι, (Heb. מִשְׁלֵי, Meshalim), from the verb παραβάλλειν, which signifies to compare things together, to form a parallel or similitude of them with other things. What we call the Proverbs of Solomon, which are moral maxims and sentences, the Greeks call the Parables of Solomon. And when Jerome would express the poetic and sententious style of Balaam, (Numb. xxiii. 7, 18, &c.) he says, he began to speak in a parable. In like manner, when Job answers his friends, it is said, he began to take up his parable, Job xxvii. 1; xxix. 1. The parabolical, enigmatical, figurative and sententious way of speaking, was the language of the eastern sages and learned men; and nothing was more insupportable than to hear a fool utter parables, Prov. xxvi. 7.

The prophets employed parables, the more strongly to impress prince and people with their threatenings or their promises. Nathan reproved David under the parable of a rich man who had taken away and killed the lamb of a poor man, 2 Sam. xii. 2, 3, &c. The woman of Tekoah, who was hired by Joab to reconcile the mind of David to Absalom, proposed to him the parable of her two sons who fought together, and one having killed the other, they were going to put the murderer to death, and so to deprive her of both her sons, 2 Sam. xv. 2, 3, &c. Jotham, son of Gideon, addressed to the Shechemites the parable of the bramble of Libanus, whom the trees chose for king, Judg. ix. 7, 8, &c. Our Saviour most frequently addressed the people in parables; thereby verifying the prophecy of Isaiah, (vi. 9,) that the people should see without knowing, and hear without understanding, in the midst of instructions. Jerome observes, that this manner of instructing and speaking by similitudes and parables, was common in Syria, and especially in Palestine. It is certain that the ancient sages employed this style almost to affectation.

Some parables in the New Testament may perhaps be supposed to be true histories; as that of Lazarus and the wicked rich man; that of the good Samaritan; and that of the Prodigal Son. In others, our Saviour seems to allude to some points of history in those times; as that describing a king who went into a far country, to receive a kingdom; which may hint at the history of Archelaus, who, after the death of his father Herod the Great, went to Rome, to receive from Augustus the confirmation of his father's will, by which he had bequeathed the kingdom of Judea to him.

The word parable is sometimes used in Scripture in a sense of reproach and contempt. God threatens his people to scatter them among the nations, and to make them a parable (English translation, a proverb) to the people, 2 Chron. vii. 20. So that when any one would express a nation hated of God, and which has suffered his fierce anger, he shall say, May you become like Israel!

PARACLETUS, a title given to the Holy Spirit by our Saviour, John xiv. 16. See COMFORTER.

PARADISE. This word signifies a garden or forest of trees, a park, in which sense it is used, Neh. ii. 8; Eccles. ii. 5; Cant. iv. 13.

The Septuagint use the word Paradisus, (Gen. ii. 8.) when they speak of the garden of Eden, in which the Lord placed Adam and Eve. This famous garden is indeed commonly known by the name of "the terrestrial paradise," and there is hardly any part of the world in which it has not been sought. See EDEN.

In the New Testament, paradise is put for a place of delight, where the souls of the blessed enjoy happiness. Thus our Saviour tells the penitent thief on the cross, (Luke xxiii. 43.) "To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise;" i. e. in the state of the blessed. Paul, speaking of himself in the third person, says, (2 Cor. xii. 4.) "I knew a man that was caught up into paradise, and heard unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter." And again our Lord says, (Rev. ii. 7.) "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God." The Jews commonly call paradise "the garden of Eden;" and they imagine that at the coming of the Messiah they shall here enjoy an earthly felicity, in the midst of delights; and that, till the resurrection, and the coming of the Messiah, their souls shall continue here in a state of rest.

PARALLELISM, see POETRY.

PARAN, EL-PARAN, or PHARAN, a desert of Arabia Petraea, south of the Land of Promise, and northwest of the gulf Elanitis. (See the situation of this desert fully discussed under EXODUS, p. 418.) Chedorlaomer and his allies ravaged the country, to the plains of Paran, (Gen. xiv. 6.) and Hagar, being sent from Abraham, retired into the wilderness of Paran, where she lived with her son Ishmael, Gen. xxi. 21. The Israelites, having decamped from Sinai, came into this desert, (Numb. x. 12.) and thence Moses sent out spies to inspect the Land of Promise, ch. xiii. 3. When David was persecuted by Saul, he withdrew into the wilderness of Paran, near Maon, and south of Carmel, 1 Sam. xxv. 1, 2. The greater part of the habitations of this country, it is said, were dug in the rocks; and here Simon of Gerasa gathered together all that he took from his enemies.

Paran was also the name of a city of Arabia Petree, three days' journey from Elah, or Ailat, east, Deut. i. 1; 1 Kings xi. 18. But see EXODUS, p. 418.

PARCHMENT, see BOOK, p. 201.

PARDON, entire remission of punishment due to guilt. God extends mercy as his darling attribute, and mercy delighteth in pardoning. God is said to multiply pardons, to be ready to pardon, to pardon for his name's sake, &c. Various similes are used to denote the nature of pardon; as, to take away iniquity, to cover sin, to blot out sin, to cast sins behind the back, not to remember them, &c. Man is liable to recollect transgressions, after having pardoned them, but God pardons effectively and completely. The gospel furnishes the noblest motive to us to pardon others; "even as God for Christ's sake hath pardoned us."

PARENT, a name properly given to a father or a mother, but extended also to relations by blood, especially in a direct line, upward. Scripture commands children to honor their parents, (Exod. xx. 12.) i. e. to obey them, to succor them, to respect them, to give them all assistance that nature, and their and our circumstances, require. Christ (Matt. xv. 5, 6.) condemns that corrupt explication which the doctors of the law gave of this precept; by teaching that a child was disengaged from the obligation of supporting and assisting his parents, when he said, "It is a gift by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me; q. d. I am no longer master of my own estate; it is consecrated to the Lord." See COREAN.

Marriages among parents and relations were forbidden within certain degrees, Lev. xviii.

PARLOR, that room in a house where the master or his family customarily speak with visitors; but whether the word rendered parlor has always this import in the Hebrew, may be doubtful. (Compare Judg. iii. 20; 1 Sam. ix. 22.)

PARMASHITA, the seventh son of Haman; slain by the Jews, with his father, Esth. ix. 9.

PARMENAS, one of the first seven deacons, Acts vi. 5, 6.

PARSHANDATHA, the eldest son of Haman, put to death with his father, Esth. ix. 7.

PART, PORTION. "The Lord is the portion of mine inheritance," Ps. xvi. 5. "Thou art my refuge, and my portion in the land of the living," Ps. cxlii. 5. And Israel is the part, or portion of the Lord, his peculiar people: "The Lord's portion is his people, Jacob is the lot of his inheritance," Deut. xxxii. 9. But with this difference; God makes and constitutes the happiness of his people, but his people cannot augment God's happiness or glory. Part or portion also signifies recompense or correction. "This is the portion of a wicked man from God, and the heritage appointed unto him by God," Job xx. 29. "They shall be a portion for foxes," Ps. lxxiii. 10. "Upon the wicked he shall rain snares, fire, and brimstone, and an horrible tempest; this shall be the portion of their cup," Ps. xi. 6. This is their part or portion, and the just punishment of their iniquity. The Lord shall "appoint him his portion with the hypocrites," Matt. xxiv. 51.

PARTHIA is thought to have been originally a province of Media, on its eastern side, which was raised into a distinct kingdom by Arsaces, ante A. D. 250. It soon extended itself over a great part of the ancient Persian empire, and is frequently put for that empire in Scripture, and other ancient writings. Parthia maintained itself against all aggressors for nearly 500 years, but in A. D. 226, one of the descendants of the ancient Persian kings united it to the ancient empire, and Persia resumed its ancient name and dynasty.

The Parthians were celebrated, especially by the poets, for their mode of fighting, which consisted in discharging their arrows while they fled. They would seem to have borne no very distant resemblance to the modern Cossacks. It is said the Parthians were either refugees or exiles from the Scythian nations. Jews from among them were present at Jerusalem at the Pentecost, Acts ii. 9.

PARTRIDGE. The Hebrew name of this bird is קור, koré, the caller. Forskal mentions a partridge whose name, in Arabic, is kurr; and Latham says, that in the province of Andalusia, in Spain, its name is churr, both taken, no doubt, from the Hebrew. The German hunters also say of the partridge, "It calls." As this bird is so well known in every part of the world, a particular description is unnecessary. There are only two passages of Scripture in which the partridge is mentioned; but these will repay our attentive examination. The first occurs in the history of David, where he expostulates with Saul concerning his unjust and foolish pursuit: "The king of Israel is come out to seek a flea, as when one doth hunt a partridge on the mountains," 1 Sam. xxvi. 20. The learned Bochart objects to the partridge in this place, and contends that the KORE is more likely to be the woodcock, since the partridge is not a mountain bird. This, however, is a mistake; there is a species of the partridge which exactly answers to the description of David; and those of Barakonda, in particular, are said to choose the highest rocks and precipices for their residence.

"The Arabs have another though a more laborious method of catching these birds; for, observing that they become languid and fatigued after they have hastily been put up once or twice, they immediately run in upon them, and knock them down with their zeruaitys, or bludgeons." It was precisely in this manner Saul hunted David, coming hastily upon him, and putting him up from time to time, in hopes he should at length, by frequent repetitions, destroy him. In addition to this method of taking the partridge, Dr. Shaw states, that the Arabs are well acquainted with that mode of catching them which is called tunnelling; and to make the capture of them the greater, they will sometimes place behind the net a cage, with some tame ones within it, which, by their perpetual chirping and calling, quickly bring down the coveys that are within hearing, and thereby decoy great numbers of them. This, he remarks, may lead us into the right interpretation of Ecclus. xi. 30, which we render "like as a partridge taken [and kept] in a cage, so is the heart of the proud;" but should be, "like a decoy partridge in a cage, so is," &c.

The other passage in which this bird is mentioned, is Jer. xvii. 11: "As the partridge sitteth on eggs, and hatcheth them not; so he that getteth riches, and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at his end shall be a fool." It seems to be clear here that this bird sitteth on eggs not its own, to correspond to the getting of riches not by right; from these eggs it is driven away, leaving them in the midst of his days, before the time of hatching is expired. But why should it be said of the partridge, rather than any other bird, that it sitteth and hatcheth not? The reason is plain, when it is known that this bird's nest, being made on the ground, the eggs are frequently broken, by the foot of man or other animals, and she is often obliged to quit them, by the presence of intruders, which chills the eggs and renders them un-fruitful. Rain and moisture also may spoil them. Observing that Buffon makes a separate species of the bartavelle, or Greek partridge, Mr. Taylor proposes that as the proper bird meant in these passages. To the red partridge, and principally to the bartavelle, must be referred all that the ancients have related of the partridge. Aristotle must needs know the Greek partridge better than any other, since this is the only kind in Greece, in the isles of the Mediterranean; and, according to all appearance, in that part of Asia conquered by Alexander. Belon informs us, that the bartavelle keeps ordinarily among the rocks; but has the instinct to descend into the plain to make its nest, in order that the young may find at the birth a ready subsistence. It has another analogy with the common hen; this is, to sit upon (or hatch) the eggs of strangers for want of its own. This remark is of a long standing, since it occurs in the sacred book. Now if, in the absence of the proper owner, this bartavelle partridge sits on the eggs of a stranger, when that stranger returns to her nest, and drives away the intruder before she can hatch them, the partridge so expelled resembles a man in low circumstances, who had possessed himself, for a time, of the property of another, but is forced to relinquish his acquisition, before he can render it profitable; which is the simile of the prophet, and agrees, too, with this place.

PARVAIM, the name of a region, (2 Chron. iii. 6.) thought to be the same as Ophir.

PASDAMMIM, a place in the tribe of Judah, (1 Chron. xi. 13.) called Ephes-dammim, 1 Sam. xvii. 1.

PASSION. This word has several very different significations. First, it signifies the passion or suffering of Christ: "To whom also he showed himself alive after his passion," Acts i. 3. Secondly, it signifies shameful passions, (Rom. i. 26.) to which those are given up, whom God abandons to their own desires, Rom. vii. 5; 1 Thess. iv. 5.

PASSOVER, (Pascha, פסח, a passing over,) a name given to the festival established in commemoration of the coming forth out of Egypt, (Exod. xii.) because, the night before their departure, the destroying angel, who slew the first born of the Egyptians, passed over the houses of the Hebrews without entering them, they being marked with the blood of the lamb, which, for this reason, was called the Paschal lamb.

The month of the exodus from Egypt (called Abib in Moses, afterwards called Nisan) was ordained to be thereafter the first month of the sacred or ecclesiastical year; and the fourteenth day of this month, between the two evenings, that is, between the sun's decline and its setting—according to our reckoning, between three o'clock in the afternoon and six in the evening, at the equinox—they were to kill the paschal lamb, and to abstain from leavened bread. The day following, being the fifteenth, reckoned from six o'clock of the preceding evening, was the grand feast of the passover, which continued seven days; but only the first and the seventh day were peculiarly solemn. The slain lamb ought to be without defect, a male, and of that year. If no lamb could be found, they might take a kid. They killed a lamb or a kid in each family; and if the number of the family were not sufficient to eat the lamb, they might associate two families together.

With the blood of the lamb they sprinkled the door-posts and lintel of every house, that the destroying angel, beholding the blood, might pass over them. They were to eat the lamb, the same night, roasted, with unleavened bread, and a salad of wild lettuces, or bitter herbs. It was forbidden to eat any part of it raw or boiled; nor were they to break a bone; but it was to be eaten entire, even with the head, the feet, and the bowels. If any thing remained to the day following, it was thrown into the fire, Exod. xii. 46; Num. ix. 12; John xix. 36. They who ate it were to be in the posture of travellers, having their loins girt, shoes on their feet, staves in their hands, and eating in a hurry. This last part of the ceremony was but little observed; at least it was of no obligation after the night in which they came out of Egypt. During the whole eight days of the passover, no leavened bread was to be used. They kept the first and last days of the feast; but it was allowed to dress victuals, which was forbidden on the sabbath day.

The obligation of keeping the passover was very strict; so much so, indeed, that Calmet thinks, whoever should neglect it was condemned to death, Num. ix. 13. Those who had any lawful impediment, as a journey, sickness, or uncleanness, voluntary or involuntary, were to defer the celebration of the passover till the second month of the ecclesiastical year, the fourteenth day of the month Jiar (which answers to April and May.) We see an example of this postponed passover under Hezekiah, 2 Chron. xxx. 2, &c.

We may add, that the oriental Christians, and especially the Syrians, insist that on the year that Christ died, the feast was celebrated on the thirteenth of Adar, being Saturday, that it began at the conclusion of the Friday before, and that our Saviour anticipated it by a day, celebrating it on the Friday, (beginning from the evening of the Thursday before,) because he was to suffer on the Friday.

The ceremonies with which the modern Jews celebrate their passover are described by Leo of Modena. (Part iii. cap. 3.) The feast continues a week, but the Jews out of Palestine extend it to eight days, according to an ancient custom, by which the Sanhedrim sent two men to observe the first appearance of the new moon, who immediately gave notice of it to the chief of the council. For fear of error, they kept two days of the festival. One was called dies latentis lune; the other, dies apparentis lune. So that the first two days of the passover, and the last two also, are sacred, both from labor and business. But it is allowed to prepare victuals, and to remove from place to place whatever they have occasion for. For the four intervening days it is only forbidden to work; and they are distinguished from working-days only by some particulars. Will not these two days reconcile the day on which our Saviour kept the passover, with that of other Jews?—It cannot be thought that the priests at the temple would kill the lamb for any body before the proper time.

During the eight days of the feast, the Jews eat only unleavened bread, and it is not allowed them to have in their custody any leaven, or bread leavened. They examine all the house with a very scrupulous care, to reject whatever may have any ferment in it. See LEAVEN.

While the temple was in being, the Jews sacrificed a lamb in the temple, between the two evenings; (that is, after the noon of the 30th of Nisan, from about two o'clock to six in the evening;) private persons brought them to the temple, and there slew them; they then offered the blood to the priests, who poured it out at the foot of the altar. The person himself, or a Levite, on this occasion, might cut the throat of a victim, but the effusion of the blood at the foot of the altar was appropriate to the priest.

As to the Christian passover, the Lord's supper, it was instituted by Christ, when, at the last passover supper he ate with his apostles, he gave them a sign of his body to eat, and a sign of his blood to drink, under the species of bread and wine; prefiguring that he should give up his body to the Jews and to death. The paschal lamb which the Jews killed, tore to pieces, and ate, and whose blood preserved them from the destroying angel, was a type and figure of our Saviour's death and passion, and of his blood shed for the salvation of the world. There has been a diversity of sentiment, and of practice, about the celebration of the Christian passover. From the time of Polycarp the churches of Asia kept Easter-day on the fourteenth day of the moon of March, whatever day that might happen upon, in imitation of the Jews; whereas the Latin church kept it on the Sunday following the fourteenth day of the moon of March. Polycarp came to Rome and conferred with Anicetus on this subject; but neither of them being able to convince the other, they thought they ought not to disturb the peace of the church about a matter of mere custom. The dispute, however, grew warm under the pontificate of Victor, about A. D. 188, and the Asiatics continuing their practice, and Polyerates, bishop of Ephesus, with the other bishops of Asia, having written to the pope a long letter in support of their opinion, Victor sent letters through all the churches, by which he declared them excommunicated! The other churches did not approve of this rigor, and notwithstanding his sentence, they continued in communion with those who still kept Easter on the fourteenth day of the moon of March. At the council of Nice, A. D. 325, the greater part of the churches of Asia were found to have insensibly fallen into the practice of the Romans. The council, therefore, ordained, that all the churches should celebrate Easter-day on the Sunday following the fourteenth day of the moon of March; and the emperor Constantine caused this decree to be published through the Roman empire. Those who continued the old practice were treated as schismatics, and had the name of Quarto-decimans, or partisans of the 14th day, given them.

It has been thought a famous question, whether our Saviour kept the legal and Jewish passover the last year of his life. Some have thought that the supper he ate with his disciples on the evening when he instituted the sacrament of his body and blood, was an ordinary meal, without a paschal lamb. Others, that he anticipated the passover, keeping it on the Thursday evening, while the other Jews kept it on the Friday. Others have advanced that the Galileans kept the passover on Thursday, as Christ did; but that the other Jews kept it on Friday. It is, however, the most general opinion of the Christian church, as well Greek as Latin, that our Saviour kept the legal passover on the Thursday evening, as well as the rest of the Jews. The principal difficulty in the way of this opinion is found in the Gospel of John, who says that Jesus being at the table with his disciples, "before the feast of the passover, when Jesus knew that his hour was come," &c. John xiii. 1, &c. And afterwards, when the Jews had led Jesus to Pilate, he observes, that "they themselves went not into the judgment-hall, lest they should be defiled, but that they might eat the passover," John xviii. 28. And again, that Friday was "the preparation of the passover," and that the Saturday following was the great day of the feast, "the sabbath day; for that sabbath day was a high day,"

John xix. 14, 31.—Why so, if not because it was the passover? Hence Calmet, in a very elaborate dissertation on our Saviour's last passover, has endeavored to show, that our Saviour did not celebrate the passover the last year of his life; or, at least, that the Jews celebrated it on Friday, the day of Christ's death, and that he died on Calvary at the same hour that the Jews offered the paschal sacrifice in the temple; so that the substance and the shadow coincided. In this opinion he is supported by several of the ancients.

The word pascha, or passover, is taken, (1.) For the passing over of the destroying angel. (2.) For the paschal lamb. (3.) For the meal at which it was eaten. (4.) For the festival instituted in memory of the coming out of Egypt, and the passage of the destroying angel. (5.) For all the victims offered during the paschal solemnity. (6.) For the unleavened bread eaten during the eight days of the passover. (7.) For all the ceremonies of this solemnity.

PASTOR, a shepherd who watches, defends, feeds, heals, &c. a flock, whether his own property, or committed to his charge. The office of shepherd is applied figuratively to God and to Christ, Gen. xlix. 21; Ps. xxiii. 1; lxxx. 1; Isa. xl. 11; Zech. xiii. 7; John x. 14. Christ is the shepherd, inspector, or overseer and guardian of souls, 1 Pet. ii. 25. Ministers of God's word are shepherds, Jer. xxiii. 4; Eph. iv. 11; 1 Pet. v. 1—4; Ezek. xxxiv. 1, &c. Kings are in Homer called "shepherds of men," &c. and governors are alluded to under this character, Jer. x. 21; xii. 10. See an instance, 2 Sam. vii. 8; "I took thee (David) from following sheep, to be ruler—royal shepherd—over my people Israel," &c.

PATARA, a maritime city of Lycia, where Paul, going from Philippi to Jerusalem, found a ship bound for Phœnicia, in which he sailed, Acts xxi. 1, A. D. 58.

PATH, the general course of any moving body. So we say, the path of the sun in the heavens; and to this the wise man compares the path of the just, which is, he says, like day-break; it increases in light and splendor till perfect day. It may be obscure, feeble, dim, at first, but afterwards it shines in full brilliancy, Prov. iv. 18. The course of a man's conduct and general behavior is called the path in which he walks, by a very easy metaphor: and as when a man walks from place to place in the dark, he may be glad of a light to assist in directing his steps, so the word of God is a light to guide those in their course of piety and duty, who otherwise might wander, or be at a loss for direction. Wicked men and wicked women are said to have paths full of snares. The dispensations of God are his paths, Ps. xxv. 10. The precepts of God are paths, Ps. xvii. 5; lxxv. 4. The phenomena of nature are paths of God; (Ps. lxxvii. 19; Isa. xliii. 16.) and to those depths which are beyond human inspection, the course of God in his providence is likened. If his paths are obscure in nature, so they may be in providence, and in grace too. May he show us, with increasing clearness, "the path of life!" See CAUSEWAY.

PATHROS, (Jer. xlv. 1, 15; Ezek. xxix. 14; xxx. 14.) one of the three ancient divisions of Egypt, viz. Upper Egypt, which Ezekiel speaks of as distinct from Egypt and the original abode of the Egyptians; as indeed Ethiopia and Upper Egypt really were. Ezekiel threatens the Patrusim with entire ruin. The Jews retired thither, notwithstanding the remonstrances of Jeremiah; and the Lord says, by Isaiah, that he will bring them back from thence.

PATIENCE, endurance, calmness of mind, under disappointment or suffering. The patriarch Job is commended, because, amid the misfortunes which God permitted to afflict him, he did not behave impatiently, James v. 11. The patience of God, (1 Pet. iii. 20.) which invites our conversion, and delays to punish us, is the effect of his mercy, and of his infinite power. The patience of the poor, which shall not be lost (Ps. ix. 18.)—also, thou art my patience and my God (Ps. lxxi. 5.)—is another thing; for patience in this place rather signifies hope and expectation. The hope which the poor has placed in God, shall not be in vain, Matt. xviii. 26; Luke xviii. 7. They bring forth fruit with patience; (Luke xviii. 15.) i. e. amid sufferings, which exercise their patience, and perfect it; with perseverance. Not unlike this is the expression, “In your patience possess ye your souls,”—keep your minds quiet; and your self-possession shall enable you to save your lives out of pressing dangers.

PATMOS, an island of the Ægean sea, to which the apostle and evangelist John was banished, A. D. 94, Rev. i. 9. In this island he is said to have had his revelation, recorded in the Apocalypse. (But see under APOCALYPSE.) The island is between the island of Icaria, and the promontory of Miletus, or between Samos and Naxos, and is now called Patimo, or Patnosa. Its circuit may be five and twenty or thirty miles. It has a city called Patnos, with a harbor, and some monasteries of Greek monks, who show a cave, now a chapel, where they pretend that John wrote his Revelations.

PAVEMENT, see GABBATHA.

PAUL, originally named Saul, was of the tribe of Benjamin, a native of Tarsus in Cilicia, and a Pharisee by sect. He was first a persecutor of the church, but afterwards a disciple of Christ, and the apostle of the Gentiles. He was a Roman citizen, (Acts xxii. 27, 28.) because Augustus had given the freedom of Rome to the freemen of Tarsus, in consideration of their firm adherence to his interests. His parents sent him to Jerusalem, where he studied the law at the feet of Gamaliel, a famous doctor, Acts xxii. 3. He made very great progress in his studies, and his life was blameless before men; being very zealous for the full observation of the Mosaic law. His zeal persecuted Jesus Christ in his members, (1 Tim. i. 13.) and when the proto-martyr Stephen was stoned, Saul was not only consenting to his death, but he even stood by, and took care of the clothes of those who stoned him, Acts vii. 58, 59. This happened A. D. 33, some time after our Saviour's death. At the time of the persecution against the church, after the death of Stephen, Saul was one who showed the most violence in distressing believers, Gal. i. 13; Acts xxvi. 11. He entered their houses, and forcibly seized men and women, and sent them to prison, Acts viii. 3; xxii. 4. In the synagogues he caused those to be beaten who believed in Jesus Christ, compelling them to blaspheme the name of the Lord. Having received credentials from the high-priest Caiaphas, and the elders of the Jews, to the chief Jews of Damascus, with power to bring with him to Jerusalem all the Christians he should find there, he departed, full of threats, and breathing out slaughter. But on the road, near Damascus, and about noon, himself and his company were encompassed by a great light from heaven, the splendor of which struck them to the ground, and Saul heard a voice saying to him, “Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?” Saul answered, “Who art thou, Lord?” The Lord replied, “I am Jesus of Nazareth, whom thou persecutest; it is hard for thee to kick against the pricks.” Saul, in consternation, asked, “Lord, what is it that thou wouldest have me to do?” Jesus bade him go to Damascus, where he should learn his will.

Saul now, though his eye-lids were open, yet had no sight; his companions, therefore, led him by the hand to Damascus, where he continued three days, unable to see, or to take nourishment. On the third day, the Lord commanded Ananias, a disciple, to find him out, to lay his hands on him, and to cure his blindness. This was done, and Saul was baptized, and filled with the Holy Ghost; after which he continued some time with the disciples at Damascus, preaching in the synagogues, and proving that Jesus was the Messiah.

Saul subsequently went into Arabia, (Gal. i. 17.) probably in the neighborhood of Damascus, then under the government of Aretas, king of Arabia. After a while, he returned to Damascus, and preached the gospel; but the Jews, unable to bear its growing progress, resolved to put Saul to death. The apostle, however, escaped, by being let down along the wall in a basket, (Acts ix. 24. A. D. 37.) the third year after his arrival at Damascus. Visiting Jerusalem to see Peter, the disciples were fearful of intercourse with Saul, not believing him to be a real convert, Gal. i. 18. But Barnabas having introduced him to the apostles, Saul related to them the manner of his conversion, &c. From Jerusalem he went to Cæsarea of Palestine, and thence to his own country, Tarsus.

Here he continued for five or six years, from A. D. 37 to 43; when Barnabas being sent to Antioch by the apostles, and finding many Christians there, he went to Tarsus to seek Saul, and brought him to Antioch, where they continued a year, Acts xi. 20, 25, 26. During this time there happened a great famine in Judea, and the Christians of Antioch having made collections to assist their brethren at Jerusalem, they deputed Paul and Barnabas to carry their offering thither, A. D. 44. Having returned to Antioch, it was intimated to them by the prophets in this church, that God had appointed them to carry his word into other places. The church, therefore, after fasting and prayer, with the prophets Simeon, Lucius and Manaen, laid their hands on them, and sent them to preach whither the Holy Ghost should conduct them. It is thought to have been about this time, (A. D. 44.) that Paul, being enraptured into the third heaven, saw ineffable things, 2 Cor. xii. 2—4.

Paul and Barnabas went first to Cyprus, preaching in the synagogues of the Jews. At Paphos (A. D. 45.) they found a Jewish magician called Bar-jesus, who did all he could to prejudice the proconsul, Sergius Paulus, against the Christian faith. As a punishment, Paul deprived him of sight for a time, and the proconsul, who had witnessed the miracle, became a convert. From Cyprus Paul and his company went to Perga in Pamphylia, where John Mark, Barnabas's cousin, left them to return to Jerusalem. Making no stay at Perga, they came to Antioch in Pisidia, where, being desired to speak in the synagogue, Paul, in a long discourse, showed that Jesus was the Messiah foretold by the prophets; and that he rose again the third day. He was desired to speak upon the same subject the next sabbath day, when almost all the city came together to hear. The Jews, seeing this concourse, and being moved with envy, opposed what Paul said, upon which the apos-ties turned from them to go to the Gentiles. From Antioch they went to Iconium, preached in the synagogue, and converted a number both of Jews and Gentiles, God confirming their mission by many miracles. In the mean time the Jews having incensed the Gentiles against them, and threatening to stone them, they retired to Lystra and Derbe, cities of Lycaonia. At Lystra they restored a cripple called Æneas, in consequence of which the people declared, that "the gods had descended in human shape;" and were with much difficulty restrained from offering sacrifice to them.

Shortly after, however, some Jews of Antioch in Pisidia and of Iconium, coming to Lystra, animated the people against the apostles, and the rabble stoned Paul, and drew him out of the city, thinking him to be dead. But the disciples gathering about him, he rose up, and the next day went for Derbe. Having here also preached the gospel, they returned to Lystra, to Iconium, and to Antioch of Pisidia; to Pamphylia, and Perga, thence they went down to Attalia, and sailed for Antioch in Syria, whence they had departed a year before. Upon their arrival, they related to the church the great things God had done by their means.

Luke omits the actions of Paul, from A. D. 45 to the time of the council at Jerusalem, A. D. 50. There is great probability that, during this interval, the apostle preached from Jerusalem to Illyricum, as he asserts, (Rom. xv. 19, 20.) without making any stay in places where others had preached before him. He says, in general, that he had endured more labors than any other apostle, and had suffered in more prisons; was often very near to death, sometimes on the water, sometimes among thieves; sometimes from the Jews, and sometimes from false brethren and perverse Christians. He was exposed to great hazards, as well in cities as in deserts. He suffered hunger, thirst, nakedness, cold, fastings, watchings, and the fatigues inseparable from long journeys, undertaken without any prospect of human succor; in this very different from the good fortune of some who lived by the gospel, and who received subsistence from those to whom they preached it. He made it a point of honor to preach gratis, working with his hands, that he might not be chargeable to any; he having learned a trade, (as was usual among the Jews,) which was, to make tents for soldiers. During this course of preaching, he five times received from the Jews thirty-nine stripes; was twice beaten with rods by the Romans; thrice he suffered shipwreck, and had passed a night and a day in the deep. This is differently interpreted. Some think he was actually a night and a day at the bottom of the sea, God having there miraculously preserved him, as heretofore Jonah. Others that he was hidden for a night and a day at the bottom of a well, after his danger at Lystra, where he had been stoned. Others, that at Cyzicus he was put into a prison called Bythos, or the deep—for this is the term used by Paul, without adding sea to it, as in the Vulgate. But the greater part of the fathers, and several moderns, suppose that after a shipwreck the apostle was a day and a night in the sea, struggling against the waves; which seems to be the most reasonable opinion. Paul had suffered all this before A. D. 58, when he wrote his Second Epistle to the Corinthians, 2 Cor. xi. 25.

Paul and Barnabas were at Antioch, when some persons, coming from Judea, presumed to teach, that it was essential to salvation to use circumcision, and other legal ceremonies. Paul and Barnabas withstood these new doctors, and it was agreed to send a deputation to Jerusalem, about this question. Paul and Barnabas were deputed, and at Jerusalem they reported to the apostles the subject of their mission, who decreed, that the Gentiles should only avoid idolatry, fornication, the eating of things strangled, and blood. Being returned to Antioch, the deputies assembled the disciples, and read the decree, A. D. 51. Some time afterwards, Peter, also coming to Antioch, lived with the converted Gentiles, without scruple; but certain brethren coming from Jerusalem, he separated himself from the Gentiles, for which Paul publicly censured him, Gal. ii. 11—16.

On this journey to Jerusalem, Paul declared the doctrine he preached among the Gentiles, in the presence of Barnabas and Titus, with Peter, James and John; who could find nothing exceptionable in it. They saw with joy the grace that God had given to him, and recognized his appointment as apostle of the Gentiles. After he and Barnabas had continued some time at Antioch, Paul proposed to his companion to visit the cities where they had planted the gospel. Barnabas consented; but wished to take John Mark with them. This was opposed by Paul, and caused a separation between them. Barnabas and John Mark went together to Cyprus; and Paul, taking Silas, crossed Syria and Cilicia, and came to Derbe, and afterwards to Lystra. Here they found a disciple called Timothy, son of a Jewish mother, but of a Gentile father, whom Paul circumcised, that he might not offend the Jews, and took him with him. They went over the provinces of Lycaonia, Phrygia, and Galatia, to Mysia; and coming to Troas, the apostle had here a vision of a man habited like a Macedonian, who entreated him to pass over into that province. Embarking, therefore, at Troas, they sailed to Neapolis, a city of Macedonia, near the frontiers of Thrace, and came to Philippi, where they found some religious women, among whom was Lydia. On another day, meeting with a maid-servant, who was possessed with a spirit of Python, Paul commanded this spirit, in the name of Jesus Christ, to come out of her. The spirit obeyed; but her masters, who made a great profit by her enthusiastic powers, accused Paul and Silas before the magistrates, who ordered them to be whipped with rods, and sent to prison. Towards midnight, as they were singing hymns to God, there was a great earthquake, the foundations of the prison were shaken, all the doors flew open, and the fetters of the prisoners were burst asunder. The jailer awoke, and seeing all this, drew his sword with intention to kill himself, but was prevented by Paul; and upon a profession of his faith in Christ, was baptized, with his family. In the morning the magistrates sent orders to release his prisoners: but Paul refused to depart, unless the magistrates, who had publicly whipped them, being Roman citizens, came themselves and fetched them out. This having been done, Paul and Silas went first to Lydia, and comforted the brethren at her house; and then departed from Philippi.

Passing through Amphipolis and Apollonia, they came to Thessalonica; where Paul, according to his custom, preached in the synagogue on three sabbath days. The Jews having raised a tumult in the city, the brethren conducted Paul and Silas towards Berea, where a great number were converted. The Jews from Thessalonica, however, having followed them thither, and animated the mob against them—they were forced to withdraw; and went on to Athens.

Disputing with the Athenian philosophers, they brought Paul before the Areopagus, (see AREOPAGUS, and ALTAR,) where he made his defence; meaning to instruct them respecting the "Unknown God." While here, Timothy came from Berea to Athens, according to the request of Paul, and informed him of the persecution which afflicted the Christians of Thessalonica, which obliged the apostle to return him to Macedonia, that he might comfort them. After this, he went to Corinth, where he lodged with Aquila, a tent-maker; and being of the same trade, the apostle worked with him. Here he made several converts, and baptized Stephanus and his family, with Crispus and Gaius, 1 Cor. i. 14, 16, 17; xvi. 15. Silas and Timothy came to Corinth, (Acts xviii. 5; 1 Thess. iii. 6, 9, A. D. 52.) and brought him great comfort, by acquainting him with the prosperous state of the disciples of Thessalonica. Shortly after this, he wrote his First Epistle to the Thessalonians, A. D. 52.

The Second Epistle to the Thessalonians was written not long after the first, and Paul, encouraged by the presence of Silas and Timothy, prosecuted the work of his ministry with new ardor. The Jews, however, opposing him with blasphemous and opprobrious words, he shook his clothes at them, and said, "Your blood be upon your own head. From henceforth I go to the Gentiles." He then quitted the house of Aquila, and went to lodge with one Titus Justus, originally a Gentile, but one that feared God. In the mean time, the Lord encouraged him by a vision, and told him, that he had much people in Corinth.

Gallio, proconsul of Achaia, being at Corinth, the Jews brought Paul to his tribunal; but Gallio would not meddle with disputes foreign from his office. After having been at Corinth eight months, Paul sailed for Jerusalem, to be present at the Feast of Pentecost. Before he went on board the vessel, he cut off his hair at Cenchrea, a port of Corinth; because he had completed a vow of Nazariteship. He arrived at Ephesus with Aquila and Priscilla, whence he went to Cæsarea of Palestine, and thence to Jerusalem. Having performed his devotions, he came to Antioch, and made a progress through the churches of Galatia and Phrygia, returning to Ephesus, where he abode three years; from A. D. 54 to 57, Acts xix. At Ephesus he found some disciples who had been initiated into the baptism of John the Baptist. Paul instructed them, baptized them with the baptism of Jesus Christ, and laying his hands on them, they received the Holy Ghost. He taught daily in the school of one Tyrannus, and omitted no opportunity, either by night or by day, to visit private houses, to confirm believers, and convince unbelievers; working with his hands, that he might not be burthensome to any. During his abode here, he suffered much, so that, as he informs us, he, after the manner of men, "fought with beasts." Here he wrote his Epistle to the Galatians, and also his First Epistle to the Corinthians.

Before he left Ephesus, the Christians were disturbed by a sedition raised by Demetrius, a silversmith, whose chief trade consisted in making little models of the temple of Diana. This man, fearing that the labors of the apostle would destroy his craft, tampered with the other workmen and silversmiths; the spirit of mutiny spread among the people, and presently the whole city was in an uproar. The town-clerk by his happy address appeased the tumult, and Paul, taking leave of the disciples, departed with Timothy into Macedonia. Here Titus visited him, and informed him of the good effects of his letter among the Corinthians; which induced him to write a second letter to that church.

Having passed through Macedonia, Paul came into Achaia, visited the church at Corinth, and having received their alms, as he was on the point of returning into Macedonia, he wrote his Epistle to the Romans. At last he came into Macedonia, intending to be at Jerusalem at the Pentecost. He staid some time at Philippi, where he celebrated the passover; from hence he embarked, and came to Troas, where he continued a week, edifying the disciples. At Miletus, the elders of the church of Ephesus came to see him, to whom he delivered an admirable charge, and then embarked for Tyre, whence he proceeded to Cæsarea. While here, the prophet Agabus arrived from Judea; and having taken the apostle's girdle, he bound his own hands and feet with it, saying, "Thus shall the Jews of Jerusalem bind the man who owns this girdle, and shall deliver him up to the Gentiles." The brethren upon hearing this would have dissuaded the apostle from going up to Jerusalem, but he resisted their entreaties, and declared his readiness to die in the service of the Lord Jesus.

At Jerusalem the brethren received him with joy; and the day following he went to see James, at whose house he gave an account of what God had done among the Gentiles by his ministry. James informed him, that the converted Jews were strongly prejudiced against him, and advised that he should join himself to four men in Jerusalem, who had a vow of Nazariteship, contribute to the charges of their purification, and offer with them the offerings and sacrifices ordained in such cases. See NAZARITE.

Paul, following this advice, went the next day into the temple, and made known to the priests his intention. The Jews of Asia, however, observing him in the temple, inflamed the people against him, and would have killed him, had not Lysias, the tribune of the Roman garrison, rescued him. Paul desired permission to speak to the people. Having obtained this, the apostle related the manner of his conversion, and his mission from God to preach to the Gentiles. At his mentioning the Gentiles, the Jews cried out, "Away with this wicked fellow out of the world, for he is not worthy to live!" Perceiving the people to be further exasperated by the apostle's address, the tribune brought him into the castle, and ordered that he should be put to the question by scourging; but being bound, Paul asked the tribune whether it were lawful to scourge a Roman citizen before he had been heard. This appeal produced its desired effect; the apostle was unbound, and the tribune, assembling the priests and chiefs of the Jews, brought Paul before them, that he might know the occasion of this tumult. After having surveyed the assembly, the apostle said, "Brethren, I have lived in all good conscience before God until this day." At which words, Ananias, son of Nebedens, the chief-priest, ordered him to be smitten on the face. Indignant at this unlawful proceeding, Paul exclaimed, "God shall smite thee, thou whited wall; for sittest thou to judge me after the law, and forgetting the duty of a judge, commandest me to be smitten contrary to the law?" Those present rebuked him for reviling God's high-priest, but the apostle excused himself by saying, that he did not know he was the high-priest. Perceiving that he had no hope of obtaining an impartial judgment, the apostle availed himself of a circumstance to break up the sitting. Knowing that part of the assembly were Sadducees, and part Pharisees, he cried out, "Brethren, I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee; for the hope and resurrection of the dead I am now called in question." This increased the clamor to such a degree that the tribune interfered, and with his soldiers brought Paul out of the assembly into the castle; and the following night the Lord appeared to the apostle to encourage him. Having learnt that more than forty Jews had engaged themselves by oath not to eat or drink till they had killed him, the apostle acquainted the tribune with it, who gave orders that the night following he should be sent to Cæsarea, to Felix the governor. Five days after his arrival, Ananias the high-priest, with a deputation of the council, came to Cæsarea, bringing with them Tertullus, an advocate, to plead against Paul, who easily refuted all their calumnies; and Felix put off the cause. Some days afterwards the governor and his wife Drusilla, who was a Jewess, desired to hear Paul. The apostle was brought before them, and spoke of justice, charity, and of the last judgment, so earnestly, that Felix was terrified, cut short his discourse, and referred him to a leisure time. In hopes that Paul would purchase his liberty, he used him well; and had frequent conversations with him.

Two years thus passing away, Felix transferred the government to Portius Festus; and being willing to oblige the Jews, he left Paul in prison. Festus, being come into his province, after three days went up to Jerusalem, whither the chief priests desired him to send for Paul, they having plotted to destroy him by the way; but Festus told them they might come to him at Cæsarea. Here the Jews accused the apostle of several crimes; but he so well defended himself, that Festus could find nothing that deserved punishment. He proposed to him to go to Jerusalem, and be tried there; but Paul answered, that he was now at the emperor's tribunal, where he ought to be tried; and he appealed to Cæsar.

King Agrippa, with his queen Berenice, having come to Cæsarea to salute Festus the governor, mentioned Paul's case, observing that he did not know in what his guilt consisted, nor how he should represent his affair to the emperor. Agrippa desiring to hear him, Festus sent for him publicly, on the morrow, and Paul related to Agrippa the manner of his conversion; spoke to him of Jesus Christ, of his character, and his resurrection. While he was enlarging on these things, Festus exclaimed, "Paul, you are beside yourself; overmuch learning distracts you!" "I am not distracted, most noble Festus," replied the apostle, "but speak the words of sober truth." Paul continued his discourse, and such was the power with which he appealed to the conscience of the king, that he at length declared, "Almost thou persuadest me to become a Christian!" "I would to God," said Paul, "that you and all were, not only almost, but altogether, such as I am, except these bonds."

As it was resolved to send Paul into Italy, he was taken on board a ship of Adramyttium, for Myra in Lycia, where having found a ship bound for Italy, they sailed. But the season being far advanced, (it was at least the latter end of September,) and the wind proving contrary, they arrived with difficulty at the Fair-havens, in Crete. Paul advised them to winter here; but the master resolved to steer for Phenice, another harbor of the same island. As they proceeded, the wind increased to a violent storm, and after fourteen days, the vessel was wrecked on the island of Malta, where the inhabitants received them with great humanity, Acts xxviii.

Having remained on the island three months, during which time the apostle wrought several miracles, they again embarked, and arrived at Puteoli, where Paul found some Christians, who detained him seven days. The Roman Christians, having been informed of Paul's approach to their city, came to meet him as far as Appii-Forum, and the Three-Taverns. At Rome he was allowed to dwell where he pleased, having a soldier to guard him, joined to him with a chain. Soon after his arrival, Paul met the chief of the Jews, to whom he explained the kingdom of God, endeavoring to convince them, from Moses and the prophets, that Jesus was the Messiah.

Paul dwelt two years at Rome, in a hired lodging, where he received all who would visit him, preaching the kingdom of God, and the religion of Christ, without interruption. His captivity contributed to the advancement of religion, and he converted several persons even of the emperor's court, Phil. i. 12, 14, 18; iv. 22. It has been said, that he had a correspondence by letter with Seneca, the philosopher; but the letters now extant are rejected by every body, as utterly unworthy either of the writers. The Christians of Philippi in Macedonia, having sent Epaphroditus, with money and other assistance, in their name, (Phil. ii. 25; iv. 18.) the apostle returned by him a letter to the Philippians, in which he thanks them for their reasonable relief, &c. Onesimus, a slave of Philemon, at Colosse, in Phrygia, having run away from his master, came to Rome, found out Paul, and was very serviceable to him. Being converted, the apostle sent him back to his master with a letter, (about A. D. 62.) and also a letter to the believers in the city of Colosse.

It is not known by what means Paul was delivered from prison, though there is great probability that the Jews durst not prosecute him before the emperor. It is certain, however, that he was set at liberty A. D. 63, when he went over Italy, and, according to some of the Fathers, passed into Spain. He also went into Judea; to Ephesus, where he left Timothy; to Crete, where he preached, and fixed Titus. Probably, he also visited the Philippians, according to his promise; (Phil. ii. 24; i. 25, 26.) and it is believed, that from Macedonia he wrote his First Epistle to Timothy, about A. D. 64. Some time afterwards, he wrote to Titus, in Crete; desiring him to come to him at Nicopolis, A. D. 64. The year following he went into Asia, and at Troas he left a cloak and some books, with Carpus his host. Thence he visited Timothy, at Ephesus; and at Miletum, he left Trophimus sick, 2 Tim. iv. 20. He again went to Rome, A. D. 65. (See the additions below.)

Chrysostom says, it was reported that the apostle, going to see a cup-bearer and a concubine of Nero, made a convert of the concubine, which so provoked the emperor, that he put Paul in prison. At his first appearance the apostle was forsaken by all, (2 Tim. iv. 16.) but in his prison he was greatly assisted by Onesiphorus, who found him after much inquiry. In this prison he wrote his Second Epistle to Timothy, which Chrysostom regards as the apostle's last testament. It is, perhaps, the most sublime and most difficult of all his writings.

The great apostle at last consummated his martyrdom, about A. D. 66, being beheaded at a place called the Salvian Waters. He was buried on the Ostian way, where a magnificent church was afterwards built.

It is well known that commentators have differed on the reason of the change of name of the apostle from Saul to Paul, Acts xiii. 9. Some have supposed that he adopted the name of his illustrious convert Sergius Paulus: others, as Origen, that he was called Saul among the Jews, but Paul, his Roman name, among the Gentiles; may it not, however, be an admissible conjecture, that he chose the name of Paul by which to be baptized; and thereby showed his entire renunciation of his former Jewish notions, and his renovation into Christian life under a new appellation? This new name, signifying "little," was probably taken from the same motives as induced the apostle afterwards to describe himself as "one born out of due time; the least among the apostles;" and "less than the least" of all saints. To this it may be answered, that long after his baptism we find him still called by the name of Saul, so that under this idea, we must allow that he went by either name, indifferently; or by both names, for a time. Luke's words seem best to agree with this, "Saul, who also is Paul;" the custom of having, and using, two names, was not uncommon at the time; so Luke was Lucius, John was Mark, Simon was Peter, &c. But whether the change of name at baptism be strictly applicable to the instance of Paul or not, it should seem to be derived from the earliest ages, and practised, as a demonstrative proof of a desire to manifest that "old things were passed away, and all things were become new." The party who received new life, received also a new name; he contracted new relations, and esteemed himself, in more than a metaphorical sense, "a new man." This explains how easy it was for some to err, by "saying that the resurrection was past already."

[The foregoing is all from Calmet, with the exception of the last paragraph, which is from his English editor. It must, however, be remembered, that in regard to the events of Paul's life after he had "dwelt two whole years in his own hired house" at Rome, we have no certain accounts; and that the stories above alluded to of his subsequent travels in Italy, Spain, and even Britain, all rest on uncertain traditions. Still, it was a very generally received opinion, in the earlier centuries, that the apostle was acquitted and discharged from his imprisonment at the end of two years; and that he afterwards returned to Rome, where he was again imprisoned and put to death. (Euseb. Hist. Ecc. ii. 22; Jerome de Script. Eccles. cap. v.) This would seem, however, to be not so much tradition, as an exegetical assumption in order to explain certain passages in the Second Epistle to Timothy; e. g. 2 Tim. iv. 6, compared with Phil. ii. 24. In respect to what Paul undertook between his first and supposed second imprisonment, there is no certain tradition. That sooner or later he died as a martyr under Nero's reign, seems to be generally admitted. (Euseb. Hist. Ecc. ii. 25; Clemens, Rom. Ep. 1 ad Corinth, c. v.) It is said above that Paul was set at liberty A. D. 63, which would require the beginning of his imprisonment to be placed in A. D. 61; and Lardner adopts the same chronology. Other interpreters, however, as Hug, De Wette, etc. fix the commencement of his imprisonment at Rome in A. D. 63, and his acquittal in A. D. 65.]

The following chronological table of the principal events in Paul's life may be of use in directing and assisting inquiries into this most interesting portion of history. The different chronologies of Hug, De Wette, Kuinoel and Lardner are here presented side by side; and thus the table, while it shows the general agreement of chronologers, shows also that it is impossible to arrive at entire certainty in this respect; or, indeed, any nearer than to assign the principal dates to an interval of two or three years, within which the events may be regarded as having certainly taken place.

Epistles of Paul.—There are fourteen Epistles in the New Testament usually ascribed to Paul, beginning with that to the Romans and ending with that to the Hebrews. Of these the first thirteen have never been contested; as to the latter, many good men have doubted whether Paul was the author; although the current of criticism seems now to be turning in favor of this opinion. (Compare Bibl. Repos. vol. ii. p. 409.) These epistles are among the most important of the primitive documents of the Christian religion, even apart from their inspired character; and although they were all evidently written without great premeditation, and have reference mostly to transient circumstances and temporary relations; yet they every where bear the stamp of the great and original mind of the apostle, as purified, elevated and sustained by the influences of the Holy Spirit.

The order in which these epistles stand in our Bible, seems to have arisen from a sort of assumed or supposed rank among the various churches to which they were addressed.

The following is Lardner's arrangement of the epistles of Paul, with the places where they were written, and the date:—

Character of Paul.—The apostle was in all respects an extraordinary man. Educated in the strictest sect of the Jewish religion, and trained in all the dogmas and severe discipline of the Pharisees, his ardent mind could rest satisfied with no ordinary attainments; he aspired to a high degree of learning and sanctity, and was accordingly, as he informs us, (Phil. iii. 6.) "touching the righteousness that is in the law, blameless." When, therefore, he was first brought in contact with the teachers of Christianity, and found them disregarding and opposing that morality and those dogmas which he had embraced and been taught to venerate, he "verily thought in himself that he ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus," Acts xxvi. 9. Nor could he, now or afterwards, ever rest satisfied with a mere speculative sense of duty; his burning zeal burst forth in energetic action; and it was in the midst of the "havoc" which he made of the church, that the Lord Jesus met him on the way to Damascus, and at a stroke subdued his haughty spirit. No change could be more sudden; yet it was total and permanent. The whole current of his ardent and powerful feelings was arrested; and henceforth rolled onward with no less energy and power in the opposite direction. The persecutor was now ready and willing to suffer persecution. In perils on the land and on the sea, in daily exposure to death, his bold, undaunted, irrepressible ardor knew neither interruption nor decay. It bore him onward unwearied and undismayed; while his only support and hope was in that Lord whom once he persecuted; his only business, to spread wide abroad the knowledge of that Saviour's love; his only object, the salvation of immortal souls; and the only prize at which he aimed, a crown of glory beyond the skies.

Paul appears to have surpassed most, or perhaps all, of the other apostles, in his enlarged views of the spiritual nature of the religion of Christ, and of its purifying and ennobling influence upon the heart and character of those who sincerely profess it. Most of the other apostles and teachers appear to have clung to Judaism, to the rites and ceremonies and dogmas of the religion in which they had been educated, and to have regarded Christianity as intended to be engrafted upon the ancient stock, which was yet to remain as the trunk to support the new branches. Paul seems to have been among the first to rise above this narrow view, and to regard Christianity in its true light, as a universal religion. While others were for converting all those who embraced the new religion into Jews, by imposing on them the yoke of all the Jewish observances, it was Paul's endeavor to break down the middle wall of separation between Jews and Gentiles, and show them that they were all "one in Christ." To this end all his labors tended; and, ardent in the pursuit of this great object, he did not hesitate to censure the time-serving Peter, and to expose his own life to the prejudices of his countrymen. Indeed, his five years' imprisonment at Jerusalem, Cæsarea and Rome arose chiefly from this cause. *R

PAVILION is a word which usually gives the idea of an edifice, small but handsome ; it is therefore unhappily used in 1 Kings xx. 12, 16, "Benhadad and others were drinking in pavilions," where the Heb. is booths. The sutling booths of the army is much more likely to be the proper description of those places of intemperance. This Benhadad must have been a man of an unworthy spirit ; a braggadocio, as appears by his inconsiderate orders ; a drunkard, as appears from his history ; and a coward, as appears from his hiding place.

PEACE is a word used in Scripture in different senses. Generally, for quiet and tranquillity, public or private ; but often for prosperity and happiness of life ; as To "go in peace ;" To "die in peace ;" "God give you peace ;" "Peace be within this house ;" "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem." Paul in the titles of his Epistles generally wishes grace and peace to the faithful, to whom he writes. Our Saviour recommends to his disciples, to have peace with all men, and with each other. God promises his people to water them as with a river of peace, (Isa. lxxi. 12.) and to make with them a covenant of peace, Ezek. xxxiv. 25. [The Hebrew word shalom, usually translated peace, means, properly, health, prosperity, welfare. It is the same as the salam of the modern Arabs, and is in like manner used in salutations. R.

PEACOCK. The fleet of Solomon that went to Ophir brought a great number of peacocks, (1 Kings x. 22.) but whether from Ophir itself, or from any other place on their return, is uncertain. The peacock is a tame and well-known bird, distinguished by the beauty of its plumage. It has a very long tail, diversified with several colors, and adorned with marks at equal distances, in the form of eyes. It has a little tuft or crown on its head ; and its wings are mixed with azure and gold color. Its cry is so very harsh and disagreeable, that it is said to have the head of a serpent, the train of an angel, and the voice of a devil.

PEARL. The Arabians, Persians and Turks, use the word Merovarid to signify pearls, from which the word Margarites, or Margarita, used by the Greeks and Latins, seems to be derived. The finest pearls are fished up in the Persian gulf, and on the coast of Bahrein, so called from the city of that name, on the borders of Arabia ; and, Idumæa and Palestine being not far distant, it is not to be wondered at that pearls were well known to Job, and the Hebrews. They are also found in other places ; and many are now brought from America. They are sometimes found in common oysters. It is an ancient error, that pearls are formed of the dew, and that they are soft in the sea.

Our Saviour forbids his apostles to cast their pearls before swine, (Matt. vii. 6.) i. e. Expose not the sacred truths and mysteries of religion to the railery of profane libertines and hardened atheists. The author of Ecclesiasticus means the same thing, where he advises us not to speak when we find the persons to whom we speak are not disposed to hear, Ecclus. xxxii. 6.

Pearls are certainly very different things from precious stones ; yet the Greek term, margarites, seems to be used, in a more general sense for jewels, or splendid gems. So, above, cast not your pearls—jewels, diamonds, if known to the ancients, would answer the import of the passage as well as pearls. So, the parts of a building, pearls ; but pearls are unfit things for walls and gates ; (Rev. xxi.) many kinds of precious stones are more suitable ; and perhaps the parable of the merchant seeking goodly pearls, (Matt. xiii.) might be understood in a more extensive sense, as importing valuable jewels of whatever kind. Such appears to be the application of the Chaldee and Arabic words, which yet properly signify pearls.

PEKAH, son of Remaliah, and general of the army of Pekahiah, king of Israel. He conspired against his master, (2 Kings xv. 25.) A. M. 3245, attacked him in the tower of his royal palace of Samaria, being seconded by Argob and Arieh, (perhaps the cities of Argob and Areopolis,) and having slain him, he reigned in his place twenty years. Under the reign of this wicked king, Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, came into the country, and took Ijon, Abel-beth-maacah, Janoah, Kedesh, Hazor, Gilead, and all the country of Naphtali, and carried the inhabitants into Assyria. Hoshea, son of Elah, at length conspired against Pekah, slew him, and reigned in his stead.

PEKAHIAH, son and successor of Menahem, king of Israel, (2 Kings xv. 22, 23. A. M. 3243,) was a wicked prince, and reigned but two years. Pekah, son of Remaliah, conspired against him, and killed him in his own palace.

PELEG, son of Eber, was born A. M. 1757. His father named him Peleg, (division), because in his time the earth was divided, Gen. x. 25 ; xi. 16. Whether Noah had begun to distribute the earth among his descendants, some years before the building of Babel ; or that Peleg was born the year that Babel was begun ; or that Eber, by a spirit of prophecy, named his son Peleg, some years before this time ; or that the name was given to him at a later period of his life, as a commemorative appellation, on recollection, is not certainly known ; though it seems most likely that he was not born at the time of the dispersion. At the age of 30 years Peleg begat Reu ; and died at the age of 239.

PELETHITES. The Pelethites and the Cherethites were famous under the reign of David, as the most valiant men of his army, and the guards of his person. [The name comes from the Hebrew עָבָר, to run, to go swiftly ; and they seem, therefore, to have been the royal messengers ; just as the Cherethites (from עָבָר, to cut, to cut off, etc.) were the king's executioners. The Pelethites and Cherethites are always mentioned together, and appear to have constituted the king's body-guard. See CHERETHITES. R.

PELICAN. The Hebrew name of this curious bird, קָאָת, kaath, a vomiter, is evidently taken from its manner of discharging the contents of its bag or pouch, for the purpose of satisfying its own hunger or that of its young. The pelican is a bird much larger than the swan, and something resembling it in shape and color. The principal difference, and that which distinguishes it from all others, is its enormous bill and extraordinary pouch. From the point of the bill to the opening of the mouth, there is a length of fifteen inches ; and under the chap is a bag reaching the entire length of the bill to the neck, and capable, it is said, of holding fifteen quarts of water. When this pouch is empty it is not seen ; but when filled, its great bulk and singular appearance may easily be conceived. The pelican, says Labat, has strong wings, furnished with thick plumage of an ash color, as are the rest of the feathers over the whole body. Its eyes are very small when compared to the size of its head ; there is a sadness in its countenance, and its whole air is melancholy : it is as dull and reluctant in its motions as the flamingo is sprightly and active. It is slow of flight ; and when it rises to fly performs it with difficulty and labor. Nothing, as it would seem, but the spur of necessity could make these birds change their situation, or induce them to ascend into the air; but they must either starve or fly. When they have raised themselves about thirty or forty feet above the surface of the sea, they turn their head with their eye downwards, and continue to fly in that posture. As soon as they perceive a fish sufficiently near the surface, they dart down upon it with the swiftness of an arrow, seize it with unerring certainty, and store it up in their pouch. They then rise again, though not without great labor, and continue hovering and fishing, with their head on one side as before. In feeding its young, the pelican squeezes the food deposited in its bag, into their mouths, by strongly compressing it upon its breast with the bill; an action, says Shaw, which might well give occasion to the received tradition and report that the pelican, in feeding her young, pierced her own breast, and nourished them with her blood. See BIRDS, p. 187.

This writer is of opinion, that the Hebrew kaath cannot mean the pelican, because that bird is described in Ps. cii. 6; Isa. xxxiv. 11, and Zeph. ii. 14, as a bird of the wilderness, where this fowl must inevitably starve; because its large webbed feet, and capacious pouch, with the manner of catching its food, which can only be in the water, show it to be entirely a water fowl. But this objection, as Bochart has shown, proceeds upon a supposition, that no water was to be met with in the deserts; which is a mistake, since Ptolemy places three lakes in the inner parts of Marmorica, which was extremely desert. Besides, it is well known that the ono-crotalus, or pelican, does not always remain by the water; but sometimes retires far from it, as Damir affirms; and in a passage from Isidore, in which this bird is said to live in the solitude of the river Nile, an inhospitable desert; and, indeed, its monstrous pouch seems to be given it for this very reason, that it might not want food for itself or its young ones, when at a distance from the water.

The writer of the hundred and second psalm alludes to the lonely situation of the pelican in the wilderness, as illustrative of the poignancy of his grief at witnessing the desolation of his country, and the prostration of her sacred altars.

PELLA, a city beyond Jordan, placed by Pliny in the Decapolis, and by Stephanus in Cœle-Syria. There is nothing inconsistent in this, however, nor in what others affirm, that Pella was in Perea, in Batanea, or in the country of Basan. Perhaps, also, when Josephus (Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 23.) speaks of Pella, in the country of Moab, he means the city of which we are speaking, which was situated in Perea, in Batanea, in the country of Basan, which profane authors sometimes call Cœle-Syria, and in the country which belonged to the Ammonites, the brethren and allies of the Moabites; unless he confound Pella with Abila, in the country of Moab, called by Moses Abel-Shittim, (Numb. xxxiii. 49.) and by Josephus, Abila. Pella was situated between Jabesh and Gerasa, six miles from the former. It was also one of the ten cities of the Decapolis, Matt. iv. 25; Mark v. 20. It is not otherwise mentioned in the Scriptures.

Josephus relates, that under the reign of Alexander Jannæus, the Jews were masters of Pella, and destroyed it because the inhabitants would not embrace Judaism. The first Christians having been forewarned by our Saviour that Jerusalem should be demolished, took refuge at Pella, as related by Eusebius, as soon as they saw the fire of war against the Romans kindled.

PEN, a well known instrument for writing with. Reeds were formerly employed for this purpose instead of quills. The third book of the Maccabees says, that the writers employed in making a list of the Jews in Egypt, produced their reeds quite worn out. Baruch wrote his prophecies with ink; (Jer. xxxvi. 4.) and, in 3 John 13, the apostle says, he did not design to write with pen (reed) and ink. The Arabians, Persians, Turks, Greeks, and other orientals, still write with reeds.

From the size and general appearance of some of the ancient reeds, as preserved in pictures found at Herculaneum, we may perceive how easily the same word (שֶׁבֶט, shebet) might denote the sceptre, or badge of authority, belonging to the chief of a tribe, and also a pen for writing with. For, although the two instruments are sufficiently distinct among us; yet, where a long rod of cane, or reed, perhaps, was (like a general's truncheon, or baton, in modern days) the ensign of command, and a lesser rod of the same nature, was formed into a pen and used as such, they had considerable resemblance. This may account for the phraseology and parallelism, in Judg. v. 14:

Out of Machir, came down governors (legislators):
Out of Zebulun, they that hold the shebet of writers.

The ancients also used styles to write on tablets covered with wax. The psalmist says, (Ps. xlv. 1.) "My tongue is the pen of a ready writer." The Hebrew signifies rather a style, which was a kind of bodkin, made of iron, brass, or bone, sharp at one end, the other formed like a little spoon, or spatula. The sharp end was used for writing letters, the other end expunged them. The writer could put out, or correct what he disliked, and yet no erasure appear, and he could write anew as often as he pleased on the same place. On this is founded that advice of Horace, of often turning the style, and blotting out, "Sæpe stylum vertas iterum, quæ digna legi sint scripturus."

Scripture alludes to the same custom; (2 Kings xxi. 13.) "I will blot out Jerusalem as men blot out writing from their writing tablets." I will turn the tablets, and draw the style over the wax, till nothing appear; not the least trace. Isaiah (viii. 1.) received orders from the Lord, to write in a great roll of parchment, with the style of a man, what should be dictated to him. It is asked, What is meant by this style of a man? It could not be one of these styles of metal; they were not used for writing on parchment. It is probable, that the style of a man, signifies a manner of writing which is easy, simple, natural and intelligible. For generally the prophets expressed themselves in a parabolical, enigmatical and obscure style. Here God intended that Isaiah should not speak as the prophets, but as other men used to do. Jeremiah says, (viii. 8.) the style of the doctors of the law is a style of error, it writes nothing but lies. Literally, "The pen of the scribes is in vain." They have promised you peace, but behold war. He says, "The sin of Judah is written with a pen of iron and with the point of a diamond. It is graven upon the table of their heart;" or, engraven on their heart, as on writing tablets. The Hebrew says, a graver of shamir.

PENIEL, or PENUEL, a city beyond Jordan, near the ford on the brook Jabbok, where Jacob, on his return from Mesopotamia, rested, and wrestled with an angel, Gen. xxxii. 30. Subsequently, the Israelites built a city in this place, which was given to the tribe of Gad. Gideon, returning from the pursuit of the Midianites, overthrew the tower of Peniel, (Judg. viii. 17.) and slew the inhabitants, for having refused sustenance to him and his people, in a very insulting manner. Jeroboam, son of Nebat, rebuilt the town, 1 Kings xii. 25, A. M. 3030.

PENINNAH, the second wife of Elkanah, the father of Samuel, 1 Sam. i. 2, &c. See HANNAH.

PENNY is usually put in the English translation for the Greek drachma and the Roman denarius, both of which were equal in value to seven-pence three farthings, sterling, or about 14 cents. As this was a single coin, perhaps we should do well, in translating, to express it by a coin of our own, as near to it in value as possible; say, for instance, a six-pence, or a shilling. Read in this way, the passages—"When the Lord of the vineyard had agreed with the laborers for six-pence (or a shilling) a day;"—"Show me the tribute money; and they showed him a six-pence (or shilling);"—"Two hundred shillings' worth of bread is not enough for this multitude;" the good Samaritan took out two shillings, and gave them to the keeper of the khan. Something like this is absolutely necessary in Rev. vi. 6, "A small measure (or pint) of wheat for a shilling." As the passage now stands it indicates great plenty to an English reader; whereas, it really is descriptive of a most distressing scarcity. Let this article stand in proof of the propriety of being acquainted with the minutæ in Scripture; for who sees any hint at a famine in "a measure of wheat for a penny?" Former times, indeed, even in England, have given a laborer his choice of a measure of wheat, or a penny, for his wages; but the difference in the value of money renders this recollection very improper in our days. Nor is it less improper, at the present time, to suppose the Lord of the vineyard would so greatly undervalue the hire of laborers, as to pay them only a penny for the day's work; it sounds like an avaricious advantage taken of the necessities of the poor; when, in fact, it is directly the reverse, a bounty, a liberality.

PENTATEUCH, the five books, the books of Moses; that is, Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy. (See their proper articles, and also MOSES.) Some critics have disputed that Moses was the author of the Pentateuch, upon the following grounds:—

There are in it, (1.) several things that agree neither to the age nor the character of this legislator. The author speaks of Moses much to his advantage; (see Numb. xii. 3.) and he speaks always in the third person. (2.) The author sometimes abridges his narration, like a writer who collected from ancient memoirs. Sometimes he interrupts the thread of his discourse; e. g. he makes Lamech the bigamist say, (Gen. iv. 23.) "Hear my voice, ye wives of Lamech, hearken unto my speech; for I have slain a man to my wounding, and a young man to my hurt;" without informing us previously to whom this relates. (3.) Such observations as Gen. xii. 6, cannot be reconciled to the age of Moses, since the Canaanites continued masters of Palestine during all the time of Moses. So, also, the passage out of the book of the Wars of the Lord, quoted Numb. xxi. 14, seems to have been inserted afterwards, as also the first verses of Deuteronomy. (4.) The account of the death of Moses, at the conclusion of the same book, cannot have proceeded from his own pen; and the same may be observed of other passages, in which it is said, that the places mentioned lay beyond Jordan; that the bed of Og was at Ramah to this day; that the Havoth, or cities, of Jair, were known to the author, though probably they had not that name till after the time of Moses, Numb. xxxii. 41; Deut. iii. 14. (5.) It is observed, also, that some parts are defective. Thus, in Exod. xii. 8, we find Moses speaking to Pharaoh, where the author omits the beginning of his discourse, which is found in the Samaritan copy. In other places, also, the Samaritan adds what is deficient in the Hebrew text; and its additions seem to be so well connected with the rest of the discourse, that it is difficult to separate them. (6.) There are, it is said, certain expressions in the Pentateuch, which can hardly agree with Moses, who was born and educated in Egypt; as, what he says of the earthly paradise, of the rivers that watered it; of the cities of Babylon, Erech, Resen and Calneh; of the gold of Pison; of the bdellium, and of the stone of Sohem, found in that country. These particulars, it is thought, prove that the author of the Pentateuch lived east of the Euphrates.

These objections, however, are easily disposed of. The additions, the dislocations, and the omissions, referred to, will not determine that Moses was not the author of the books. They only prove that some amendments have been made, either by adding, or by expunging. God has suffered that the sacred books should not be exempted from such alterations as proceed from the hands of copiers, or which are consequences of great length of time. If a slight addition, or change, in the text of an author, be thought sufficient to deprive him of his labors, what writer could remain in possession of his work even a single century? Besides, to divest Moses of a possession he has maintained for so many ages, as author of the Pentateuch; a possession supported by the joint testimony both of the synagogue and the church; of the sacred writers both of the Old and New Testaments; of Jesus Christ and his apostles, certainly requires proofs beyond reply, i. e. conclusive demonstrations; whereas the objections are even below convincing arguments.

So far Calmet, but since his time, the question of the originals of the Pentateuch has been discussed, with great acumen, and much critical investigation. The result seems to be not that those documents were composed, or arranged, since the days of Moses, (except so far as concerns Ezra's revision for his edition,) but that they existed before Moses, and were combined and regulated by him; perhaps, some of them were translated from more ancient memoirs, preserved in the families of Shem, Abraham, and the Hebrew patriarchs. As these came far east of the Euphrates, the objections derived from that incident are completely obviated by this supposition; and the others dwindle into insignificance, by our better acquaintance with the ancient history of persons and places.

It may be admitted, for instance, (1.) that the book of Genesis contains various repetitions, or double narratives of the same early events; (2.) that these duplicate narratives, when closely compared, present characteristic differences of style; (3.) that these differences are too considerable, and too distinct, to admit of any other explanation, than that of different originals, taken into association. This may be justified by a short extract from Eichhorn's comparison of the two supposed original documents used by Moses containing histories of the deluge.

Record in which the name JEHOVAH occurs.

Record in which the name for God is ELOHIM.

Gen. vi. 5. And Jehovah saw that the wickedness of man was great on the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually.

7. And Jehovah said, I will destroy man whom I have created, from the face of the earth, both man and beast, and the creeping thing, and the fowls of the air; for it repenteth me that I have made them.

vii. 2. Of every clean beast thou shalt take to thee by sevens, the male and his female; and of beasts unclean, by two, the male and his female.

3. Of fowls also of the air by sevens, the male and the female, to keep seed alive on the face of the earth.

5. And Noah did according to all that Jehovah had commanded him.

1. And Jehovah said unto Noah, Come thou, and all thy house, into the ark.

8. And Noah was six hundred years old, when the flood of waters was upon the earth.

In this manner the ingenious author of this hypothesis proceeds to compare other passages. The reader will remark, that the most particular account is contained in that document in which the deity is denoted by the term Elohim; and this is its general character throughout. The system, however, is not without its difficulties; but for a discussion of these we must refer to those writers who have professedly treated on the subject.

PENTECOST, (Πεντηκοστή, the fiftieth; day is understood,) a feast celebrated the fiftieth day after the sixteenth of Nisan, which was the second day of the feast of the passover, Lev. xxiii. 15, 16. The Hebrews call it the feast of weeks, (Exod. xxxiv. 22.) because it was kept seven weeks after the passover. They then offered the first-fruits of their wheat harvest, which at that time was completed, Deut. xvi. 9, 10. These first-fruits consisted in two loaves of unleavened bread, of two assarons of meal, or of three pints of meal each, Lev. xxiii. 16, 17. Some interpreters think, that each family was obliged to give two loaves for first-fruits; but others maintain, with more reason, that they offered but two loaves in the name of the whole nation. This is sufficiently marked by Josephus, who puts but one loaf of two assarons. In addition to these, they presented at the temple seven lambs of that year, one calf, and two rams, for a burnt-offering, two lambs for a peace-offering, and a goat for a sin-offering. We do not find that the Pentecost had an octave, though it was one of the three great solemnities, in which all the males were to appear before the Lord.

The Feast of Pentecost was instituted, first, to oblige the Israelites to repair to the temple of the Lord, and there to acknowledge his dominion over their country, and their labors, by offering to him the first-fruits of all their harvests. Secondly, to commemorate, and to render thanks to God for, the law given from mount Sinai, on the fiftieth day after their coming out of Egypt.

The Christian church also celebrates the Feast of Pentecost, fifty days, or seven weeks, after the passover, or the resurrection of our Saviour. After the ascension of Christ, the apostles having retired to a

Gen. vi. 12. And the Elohim saw the earth, and behold it was corrupt; for all flesh had corrupted his way on the earth.

15. And the Elohim said to Noah, the end of all flesh is come before me; for the earth is filled with violence through them; and behold, I will destroy them from under heaven.

vi. 19. And of every living thing, of all flesh, two of every sort shalt thou bring into an ark, to keep them alive with thee; they shall be male and female.

20. Of fowls after their kind, and of cattle after their kind, of every creeping thing upon the earth after his kind: two of every sort shall come unto thee, to keep them alive.

22. Thus did Noah; according to all that the Elohim had commanded him, so did he.

18. And thou shalt come into the ark, thou and thy sons, and thy wife, and thy sons' wives with thee.

vii. 11. In the six hundredth year of Noah's life, in the second month, the seventeenth day of the month, the same day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened.

house at Jerusalem, (which, it is said, was that of Mary the mother of John, on mount Sion,) they there waited for the Holy Ghost, which our Saviour had promised. On the day of Pentecost, about the third hour of the day, (nine o'clock in the morning,) suddenly they heard a great noise, like the rushing of a mighty wind, from heaven, which filled the whole house where the apostles were assembled. At the same time there appeared among them, as it were, tongues of fire, parted, or cloven, and resting on each of them; they were all immediately filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak different tongues or languages, as the Spirit gave them utterance, Acts ii. 1—3. There were then at Jerusalem some pious Jews of all nations, who were astonished to hear such a variety of languages; but others (probably Jews of Jerusalem) mocked, saying, "These people are full of new wine." Peter, therefore, took up their defence, and said, "These persons are by no means drunk, for it is yet but the third hour of the day: (on festival days they did not eat before noon, especially they tasted nothing before nine in the morning, which was an hour of prayer:) but this is the accomplishment of what was spoken by Joel," (ii. 28.) "I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh," &c. And then, "whoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved," &c. Those who heard Peter were moved with compunction, and said, "Brethren, what must we do?" Peter answered them, "Repent, and be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ, to obtain the remission of sins, and ye shall also receive the Holy Ghost," &c. They submitted, and that day were baptized about 3000 souls. A. D. 33.

PEOR, or PHOGOR, a famous mountain beyond Jordan, which Eusebius places between Heshbon and Livias. The mountains Nebo, Pisgah and Peor, were near one another, and probably of the same chain of mountains; and Cocceius thinks it imports a naked height, or, as we say, an open prospect, so a mountain free from impediments; what stands unsheltered; plainly to be seen; the vertex of a high hill. It was the name of a mountain, standing very favorably for a distant prospect; "a prospect station in an open place," Numb. xxiii. 28. We may say the same of Beth Peor, (Deut. iii. 29.) which appears to have been on an eminence; as the valley in which Israel abode was over against it, chap. iv. 46. It was a temple, we may suppose, with a village at least around it.

PEREA, from Gr. πέραν, beyond, signifies the country beyond Jordan, or east of that river, especially on the south. Josephus says that it had its limits, at Philadelphia east, the Jordan west, Macheron south, and Pella north. Sometimes the word Perea is taken in a more extensive signification, for the whole country beyond Jordan. It was enclosed on the east by mountains, which divided it from Arabia Deserta. The name does not occur in Scripture.

PEREZ-UZZA, the breach of Uzza, the name of a place, 2 Sam. vi. 8. Uzzah is spelt differently, where the reason of the appellation is assigned, 1 Chron. xiii. 11. See Uzza.

PERFECTION. The Son of God commands his disciples (Matt. v. 48.) to be perfect, even as their Father in heaven is perfect. Not that we can ever attain his perfection, but we ought constantly to be making advances towards it: we ought always to propose it to ourselves as our pattern, in the exercise of all virtue, and especially his mercy and charity. Hence Luke says, in the parallel passage, "Be ye, therefore, merciful, as your Father also is merciful," Luke vi. 36. In Matt. xix. 21, our Saviour says, that he who would be perfect must forsake all and follow him; and in Luke vi. 40, that the disciple who would arrive at perfection must become like his master. Paul often exhorts his disciples to be perfect; that is, to acquire the perfection of Christianity, to be convinced of the excellence of it, and to practise its truths, 1 Cor. i. 10; xiv. 10, &c.

In the Old Testament, the words perfect and perfection answer to the Hebrew words Thâm and Thâmmim, which properly signify entire and complete; without blemish or defect; irreprehensible, perfect. Thus it is said, (Gen. vi. 9.) "Noah was a just man, and perfect in his generations." And God says to Abraham, (Gen. xvii. 1.) "I am the Almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect." And speaking to his people, (Deut. xviii. 13.) "Thou shalt be perfect with the Lord thy God." In all these places, perfect is put for a character without reproach; unprovable, sincere. So to serve God with a perfect heart, is to serve him faithfully, purely, not admitting a rival. Perfect joined with knowledge, law, charity, work, &c. signifies whatever may make those things complete, finished, entire, without deficiency. Paul says, (Heb. vii. 19.) "The law made nothing perfect;" i. e. it may be said to give only sketches of things; to enjoin things of less perfection than what the gospel requires.

PERFUMES; the use of perfumes was common among the Hebrews, and the orientals generally, before it was known to the Greeks and Romans. Moses also speaks of the art of the perfumer, in Egypt, and gives the composition of two perfumes, (Exod. xxx. 25.) of which one was to be offered to the Lord, on the golden altar; and the other (Exod. xxx. 34, &c.) to be used for anointing the high-priest and his sons, the tabernacle, and the vessels of divine service, Exod. xxx. 23. The former of these, called incense, was composed of stacte, the onyx, or odoriferous shell-fish, of galbanum, and incense, each of equal weight. It was sacred and inviolable, and it was forbidden, on pain of death, for any man whatever to use it. The other perfume was rather an unction, to anoint the priests and sacred vessels of the tabernacle. It was composed of the best myrrh 500 shekels, of cinnamon 250 shekels, of canna aromatica a like quantity, of cassia aromatica 500 shekels; and 1 hin of oil-olive. God reserved this ointment, or perfume, for his own service; and whoever should make it, either for himself or another, was to be cut off from his people.

The Hebrews had also perfumes for embalming their dead. The composition is not exactly known, but they used myrrh, aloes and other strong and astringent drugs, proper to prevent infection and corruption. See EMBALMING.

In addition to these perfumes, there are others noticed in Scripture. Those, for example, which king Hezekiah preserved in his repositories. "The spices and precious ointment;" (2 Kings xx. 13.) and those burned with the body of king Asa, 2 Chron. xvi. 14. Judith perfumed her face when she was to appear before Holofernes; and they prepared the virgins which were to appear before the kings of Persia, for six months together, by the use of oil of myrrh, and for six other months, by various perfumes and sweet-scented oils, Esth. ii. 12. The spouse in the Canticles commends the perfumes of her lover; who in return says, that the perfumes of his spouse surpass the most excellent odors. He names particularly the spikenard, the canna aromatica, cinnamon, myrrh and aloes, as composing these perfumes. The voluptuous woman described by Solomon (Prov. vii. 17.) says, that she had perfumed both her duan and her bed with myrrh, aloes and cinnamon. The book of Wisdom (ii. 7.) encourage one another to the use of the most luxurious and costly perfumes. Isaiah reproaches Judea, whom he describes as a faithless spouse to God, as being painted and perfumed to please strangers: (Isa. lvii. 9.) "Thou wentest to the king with ointment, and didst increase thy perfumes;" and Ezekiel (xxiii. 41.) seems to accuse the Jews with having profaned the odors and perfumes, whose use was reserved to sacred things, by applying them to their own use: "Thou satest upon a stately bed, and a table prepared before it, whereupon thou hast set mine incense and mine oil." Amos (vi. 6.) inveighs against the rich men of Ephraim, who drank costly wines, and perfumed themselves with the most precious oils. The woman-sinner (Luke vii. 37.) and Mary Magdalen (John xii. 3.) anointed our Saviour's feet with costly perfume. That of Mary Magdalen was spikenard.

These instances show the taste of the ancient Hebrews, which was, and still is, the taste of the orientals, who made much use of scents and perfumes. They prove, also, that both men and women used them, and that wise and serious men condemned the too frequent and affected use of them. It may also be observed, that to abstain from perfumes, scents and unctions, was esteemed a part of mortification. (See Esth. xiv. 2; Dan. x. 3.)

Solomon says, "that dead flies cause the ointment of the apothecary to send forth a stinking savor:" i. e. as one dead fly is sufficient to spoil the scent of a whole box of perfumes; so one fault is enough to destroy a man's good name.

PERGA, a city of Pamphylia, Acts xiii. 14. This is not a maritime city, but situated on the river Cestus, at some distance from its mouth. It was one of the most considerable cities in Pamphylia; and when that province was divided into two parts, this city became the metropolis of one part, and Sidé of the other. There was, on a neighboring mountain, a very famous temple of Diana, surnamed Pergæa, from the city.

PERGAMOS, (now Bergamo,) a city of Mysia, in Asia Minor, and the residence of the Attalian princes. There was here collected by the kings of this race a noble library of 200,000 volumes, which was afterwards transported to Egypt by Cleopatra, and added to the library at Alexandria. Hence the Latin name pergamenum for parchment. Our Lord (Rev. ii. 12.) speaks to the angel, or bishop, of Pergamus thus: "I know thy works, and where thou dwellest, even where Satan's seat is; and thou holdest fast my name," &c.

PERJURY. The law of God severely condemned perjury, false oaths, vows and promises made without an intention to perform them, Lev. xix. 12; Exod. xxiii. 13. Perjury offends against the veracity and justice of God himself, and is a great insult on his majesty, by appealing to him as a witness to a lie, and engaging his mighty name in commission of a crime. Moses (Lev. v. 4, 5, 6; vi. 2, 3.) seems to appoint sacrifices to atone for perjury; which is contrary to Paul, who assures us, that the sacrifices and ceremonies of the law did not really remit sins, but only purify legal faults, Heb. vii. 18; Gal. ii. 16; Rom. viii. 3; Heb. ix. 9, 13. It must, therefore, be presumed, that the sacrifices ordained by Moses, regarded only the ignorance or temerity of him who had made a rash promise, or a secret oath, or promise. Or he supposes, that he who was permitted to offer such a sacrifice, had already expiated his sin, by a perfect repentance and contrition; of which the prescribed external sacrifice is only the public acknowledgment, or ratification, as we may say, to satisfy for faults committed, by approaching holy things in a state of defilement. The wilful perjurer was punished by the sentence of the judges, when he was found guilty. (See Lev. v. 1; xix. 8; xx. 17, 19, 20; xxiv. 15; Numb. ix. 13.)

PERIZZITES, or PHERESÆI, ancient inhabitants of Palestine, who had mingled with the Canaanites, or were themselves descendants of Canaan. They appear to have had no fixed habitations, and lived sometimes in one country and sometimes in another. There were some of them on each side of the river Jordan, in the mountains, and in the plains. In several places of Scripture the Canaanites and Perizzites are mentioned as the chief people of the country; as in the time of Abraham and Lot, Gen. xiii. 7. The tribe of Ephraim complaining to Joshua, that they were too much confined in their possession, he bade them go, if they pleased, into the mountains of the Perizzites and Rephaim, and there clear the land, cultivate and inhabit it, Josh. xvii. 15. Solomon subdued the remains of these people, which the Israelites had not rooted out, and made them tributary, 1 Kings ix. 20, 21; 2 Chron. viii. 7. The Perizzites are mentioned by Ezra, after the return from Babylon; and several Israelites had married wives from among them, Ezra ix. 1. See CANAANITES, p. 244.

PERSECUTION has in all ages been the portion of good men. Cain persecuted Abel; Joseph was persecuted by his brethren; David by Saul; Elijah and Elisha by Ahab; the prophets by the kings and people of their time; our Saviour by Herod, and the chief of the Jews; John the Baptist and the apostles by the enemies of piety, truth and justice of every description. It is a maxim laid down by the apostle that all those who will lead a godly life shall suffer persecution; (2 Tim. iii. 12.) but our Lord pronounces them happy, Matt. viii. 3—10.

PERSIA, (in Heb. פרס, Phars, Ezek. xxvii. 10.) a vast region in Asia, the south-western province of which appears to have been the ancient Persia, and is still called Pharsistan, or Fars. The Persians who became so famous after Cyrus, the founder of their monarchy, were anciently called Elamites; and in the time of the Roman emperors, Parthians. See PARTHANS.

The Arabians say, that Fars, the father of the Persians, was son of Azaz, or Arphaxad, son of Shem. Others derive him from Japheth; but the Persians derive their origin from Kaimarath, who is among them what Adam is with us. They assure us that they have always had kings of their own nation, whose succession has never been long interrupted. The Dilemites, the Curdes, and even the oriental Turks, according to some authors, are descended from the Persians. The Dilemites inhabit the shores of the Caspian sea, called also the sea of Dilem, from that nation; the Curdes are scattered in Assyria, to which they give the name of Kurdistan; and the Turks have withdrawn beyond the river Oxus, into Turkestan.

Authors speak differently of the religion of the ancient Persians. Herodotus says, "They had neither temples, nor statues, nor altars. They look on it as folly to make or to suffer any, because they did not believe, as the Greeks, that the gods were of human origin." They sacrificed to Jupiter on the highest mountains, and gave the name of God to the whole circuit of the heavens. They sacrificed also to the sun, and the moon, and the earth; to the fire, and the water, and the winds. They originally knew no other gods but these, but subsequently they have learned from the Assyrians and the Arabians, to sacrifice to Urania, or celestial Venus; whom the Assyrians call Militta, the Arabians, Alitta, and the Persians, Mithra.

The modern Persians refer their religion to Abraham, whom some confound with Zoroaster, and others will have to be the master of Zoroaster. They think the world was created in six days; that in the beginning God created a man and a woman, from whom mankind are derived: that there are several terrestrial paradises, one universal deluge, one Moses, one Solomon. All this, without doubt, is taken from the history of the Jews, and from the traditions of the Mahometans.

They hold, says D'Herbelot, one eternal God, called in their language Jesdan, or Oromazdes, who is the true God, called by the Arabians Allah, the author of all good; also another god, produced by darkness, whom they name Aherman, (properly the Eblis of the Arabians, or the devil,) the author of all evil. They have a very great veneration for light, and a great aversion from darkness. God the Creator of all things has produced light and darkness, and from a mixture of these two, of good and evil, of generation and corruption, the composition and decomposition of the parts of the world is effected and will always continue, till light withdrawing itself on one side, and darkness on the other, shall cause a destruction and dissolution. This is the substance of the doctrine of Zoroaster, which is still maintained by the Magians, or Guebres, who worship fire; and who always, when they pray, turn themselves towards the rising sun.

The early history of the Persians, like that of most of the oriental nations, is involved in doubt or perplexity. We have already suggested their descent from Shem, through his son Elam, after whom they were originally named. It is probable that they enjoyed their independence for several ages, with a monarchical succession of their own; until they were subdued by the Assyrians, and their country attached as a province to that empire. This event is admired in Persian history by the invasion of a foreign tyrant, named Zobruk. From this period, both sacred and profane writers distinguish the kingdom of the Medes from that of the Persians. It is not improbable that, during this period, petty revolutions might have occasioned temporary disjunctions of Persia from its sister kingdom, and that the Persian king was quickly again made sensible of his true allegiance. Such an event appears to have occurred in the reign of Pharaoh, who defeated the revolted Persians, and reduced them to a more complete subjection.

Dejoces, the father of Phraortes, is said to have built the city of Ecbatana, and to have established its government. But it is probable that it was founded before this alleged period, and only strengthened and extended by Dejoces. Dejoces was killed in an action with Nebuchadnezzar king of Assyria, as related in the book of Judith, and was succeeded by his son Phraortes. Phraortes afterwards subdued the Persians and other Asiatic nations. He ultimately was killed before the walls of Nineveh.

Cyaxares, his son, succeeding to the throne of Media, undertook to be revenged upon the Assyrians. He defeated them, and led the Medes a second time to the walls of Nineveh. His success was impeded by his being called off by some invading Scythians; but he afterwards renewed his attempts, and destroyed that great city, 612 B. C. See MEDIA.

Media, having vanquished her great rival, enjoyed a long interval of peace, during the reign of Astyages, son of Cyaxares. But his successor, Cyaxares the second, united with the Persians against the Babylonians, and gave the command of the combined armies to Cyrus, who took the city of Babylon, killed Belshazzar, and terminated that kingdom, 538 B. C.

Cyrus succeeded to the thrones of Media and Persia, and completed the union between those countries. He extended his dominion beyond the greatest limits of that of the kings of Assyria. It may be worthy of remark, that, previous to this union, Daniel speaks of the law of the Medes and Persians being the same. The union was effected B. C. 536. The principal events, relating to Scripture, which occurred during the reign of Cyrus, were the restoration of the Jews, the rebuilding the city and temple, and the subduetion of Babylon. Of the successors of Cyrus, different accounts are given by different histories. The Persian annals give four, from Cyrus to Artaxerxes; the sacred annals five, and the Grecian six. The order of princes as given in the book of Ezra is, Cyrus, Ahasuerus, Artaxerxes, Darius, Artaxerxes; Xerxes, who reigned between Darius and Artaxerxes, being omitted to be mentioned, because nothing important in the Jewish history occurred during his reign. Ahasuerus was Cambyse, the son of Cyrus. He was too much engrossed with Egyptian affairs to pay much regard to the Jews; and during his reign the progress of their works at Jerusalem was nearly suspended. His successor, Artaxerxes, was the usurper Smerdis the Magian, by whose decree a total stop was put to the buildings at Jerusalem. The next, according to Scripture succession, is Darius, called, by profane historians, Darius Hystaspes. He empowered the Jews to resume the works at Jerusalem, and likewise granted them other privileges; by virtue of which, the temple, which had been twenty years in building, was completed.

Xerxes, the successor of Darius, is briefly mentioned in Scripture, by Daniel, as the fourth king from Cyrus, who, "by his strength, and through his great riches, should stir up all against the realm of Grecia." That he invaded Greece with an immense army, is known to every one in the least acquainted with ancient history. He continued the privileges which his father Darius had granted to the Jews.

Artaxerxes, called by the Greeks Longimanus, from the length of his hands, and Ahasuerus in the book of Esther, is rendered memorable principally on the account of the friendship he evinced to the Jews, which it is thought proceeded from the intercession of Esther, his queen.

[Later interpreters, however, have come to different results in regard to several of these kings. These may be seen under the articles ARTAXERXES I. and particularly under AHAUERUS II. R.]

With Artaxerxes the history of Persia, as relating to the Scriptures, terminates. Persia, however, is still a country to which we may recur for an illustration of the manners and usages described in the Scriptures. The character of the Persian government is absolutely despotic. The fiat of the king, which in reality is the law of the Medes and Persians which altereth not, is as positive and immutable as at the period when Daniel wrote; and has exerted a corresponding and very marked influence on the manners and customs of the people.

PERSIS, a Roman lady, whom Paul salutes, (Rom. xvi. 12.) and calls his beloved sister.

PESTILENCE, or PLAGUE, in the Hebrew tongue, as in most others, expresses all sorts of distempers and calamities. The Hebrew דבר, Deber, which properly signifies the plague, is extended to all epidemical and contagious diseases. The prophets generally connect together the sword, the pestilence and the famine, as three evils which generally accompany each other.

The pestilent man (Prov. xv. 12. Vulg.) is the scorner, the pretended free-thinker, who diverts himself with the simplicity of good people, and with the timidity of pious souls. The seat of the scorner, mentioned in the first Psalm, is the seat of such pernicious people. Solomon in many places cautions his readers against their discourses. The scorner loves not him that reproves him, Prov. xix. 25. The correction of such scoffers is great instruction for the weak, the low, the foolish, and, generally, those that want light and understanding. Tertullus, the advocate of the Jews, says, (Acts xxiv. 5.) that Paul was a pestilent fellow, a common disturber and mover of sedition, because he maintained that Jesus was the Christ. Jeremiah gives to Babylon the name of the contagious mountain, because it spread the infection of idolatry and superstition through the whole world. The Messiah says, (Hosea xiii. 14.) "O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction." Jerome translates it. And in Psalm xci. 3, the Hebrew has, "He shall deliver thee from the snares of the hunter, and from the dangerous pestilence."

PETER, the apostle, was born at Bethsaida, and was son of John, Jona, or Joanna, and brother of Andrew, John i. 42, 43. His original name was Simon or Simeon, but when our Saviour called him to the apostleship, he added the name Cephas, that is, (in Syriac,) a stone or rock; in Greek and Latin, Petra, whence Peter. He was married; and dwelt with his mother-in-law, and his wife, at Capernaum, on the lake of Gennesareth, Mark i. 29; Matt. viii. 14; Luke iv. 38. Andrew, having been called by Christ, met his brother Simon, and prevailed upon him to come to Jesus, John i. 41. (A. D. 30.) After having passed one day with our Saviour, they returned to their ordinary occupation, of fishing, though it is thought they were present with him at the marriage of Cana in Galilee. Towards the end of the same year, Jesus, being on the shore of the lake of Gennesareth, while Peter and Andrew were busy washing their nets, (Luke v. 1, &c.) entered their boat, and bade Peter throw out his nets into the sea, in order to fish. Peter obeyed, though he had been fishing the whole night without success. The fish taken at this draught were so many, that their own vessel, and that of James and John, the sons of Zebedee, were filled. The miracle so impressed the mind of Peter, that he threw himself at the feet of Jesus, and said, "Depart from me, Lord, for I am a sinner." Jesus, however, bade them follow him, and promised to make them fishers of men. The four quitted their boats and followed him.

Jesus, coming to Capernaum some time after this, (Luke iv. 38; Matt. viii. 14.) entered the house of Peter, where his mother-in-law lay sick of a fever. He immediately healed her; and she assisted to serve them. A little while before the feast of the passover of the following year, (A. D. 32.) after he returned into Galilee, he chose twelve apostles, among whom Peter has the first place.

Upon one occasion, as our Saviour was near Cæsarea Philippi, he asked his apostles, whom men took him to be, Matt. xvi. 13, 14. They answered, some took him for John the Baptist, others Elias, others Jeremiah, or one of the old prophets. "But whom do you say that I am?" inquired Jesus. Simon Peter answered, "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God." Jesus said to him, "Happy are you, Simon, son of Jona, for flesh and blood has not revealed this to you, but my Father who is in heaven. Your name is Peter, [rock,] and on this rock I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever you shall bind on earth, shall be also bound in heaven, and whatsoever you shall loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven." (See KEY.) About eight days after this, he was signified on a mountain, and had with him Peter, James and John, whom he showed a glimpse of his glory. Peter, being in an ecstasy, and seeing Moses and Elias with Jesus, exclaimed, "Lord, it is good for us to be here; if you please, we will make three tents, one for you, one for Moses, and one for Elias!" Matt. xvii. Luke ix. 28.

One day, as Jesus was speaking concerning the forgiveness of injuries, (Matt. xviii. 21, 22,) Peter asked him how often they must forgive; whether seven times. Jesus answered, Seventy times seven. On another occasion, (Matt. xix. 27,) as he was speaking of the danger of riches, Peter said to him, "Lord, we have left all to follow thee; what reward shall we have?" Jesus answered, "An hundred-fold, even in this world, and in the other world eternal life."

On the Wednesday before his passion, as they sat on the mount of Olives, he, with the other apostles, asked Jesus, when the temple was to be destroyed. On Thursday he was sent with John to prepare for the passover; and in the evening, when Jesus was at table, and began to speak of him who should betray him, Peter made signs to John, to ask him who this could be. After supper, the disciples disputed who should be the greatest; upon which Jesus, laying aside his garments, washed their feet, to give them an example of humility. Peter reluctantly consented, and that not till after Jesus had told him that if he did not wash his feet, he could have no part in him, John xiii. 6—10. Just before the apprehension of our Lord, he cautioned Peter of his danger: "Peter, Satan has desired to sift you as men sift wheat:—but I have prayed for you, that your faith may not fail; and when you are converted, confirm your brethren." Peter declared he was ready to follow his Master every where, even to death; but Jesus foretold to him, that he would abjure him three times that very night, before the cock should crow. When supper was ended, our Saviour went to the garden of Olives, taking Peter, James and John apart, as witnesses of his agony. Here Peter, though he had lately shown so much resolution, fell asleep with the rest; which occasioned Jesus' affectionate reproof:—"Do you sleep, Simon? Could you not watch with me one hour?" Mark xiv. 37; Matt. xxvi. 40, &c.

Judas having come out with the soldiers to seize Jesus, Peter drew his sword, and cut off the right ear of Malchus, servant to the high-priest; which Jesus perceiving, bade him put up his sword, adding, those who fight with the sword perish by the sword; and at the same time healing Malchus's ear, John xviii. 10, &c. Jesus being led to the house of Caiaphas, Peter followed at a distance, and mingled with the soldiers and servants in the hall. While warming himself at the fire, a maid-servant said, "Surely this man was with Jesus of Nazareth!" But Peter answered, "I know not what you say; I do not so much as know the man." A short time afterwards, another maid recognized him. But Peter denied it with an oath; as he did a third time. At this moment the cock crowed the second time, and Jesus, being in the hall, and not far from Peter, turned and looked on him, which bringing to his remembrance that Jesus had said to him, before the cock crowed twice he should deny him thrice, he rushed out of the house and wept bitterly, Matt. xxvi. 73, 75; Mark xiv. 30, 72.

It is said that his compunction was so acute that he remained in secret, and in tears, during the whole time of our Saviour's passion (Friday and Saturday;) but on Sunday morning Jesus being risen, and Mary having been at the tomb, and not finding the body of Jesus, she ran into the city, to tell Peter and John that their Master was taken away. The two disciples ran to the sepulchre, and Peter saw the linen clothes in which the body had been wrapped. They returned to Jerusalem, not understanding what had come to pass; but on the same day our Saviour appeared to Peter, John xx.; Luke xxiv. 12, 34, &c.; Mark xvi. 7.

Some days after this, while Peter with some others of the apostles were fishing on the lake of Gennesareth, Jesus visited and dined with them; and after dinner gave to Peter the memorable and impressive charge, "Feed my sheep;" adding, "I tell you for a truth, that when you were young, you girded yourself and went where you pleased; but now you are old, another shall gird you, and lead you where you would not go."

From this time, Peter's zeal in his Master's service was unabating, and his boldness not to be subdued. On the day of Pentecost, he stood forth in the defence of his brethren, who were charged by the unthinking Jews with drunkenness, and so powerfully urged the completion of the prophecies in the person of Jesus, that a great number were converted," Acts ii. When taken before the Sanhedrim, with his companion John, in consequence of having healed the cripple, at the Beautiful gate of the temple, he boldly and undauntedly charged that corrupt body with having crucified the Messiah, and refused, at the risk of his life, to refrain from preaching the truth to the people, Acts iv.

Upon several other occasions, Peter was subjected to imprisonment and scourging, in consequence of his zeal and fervor in the service of his divine Master; but none of these things moved him, nor retarded his labors in publishing the gospel. After having visited Samaria, where Philip had been declaring the word of life, and conferring the Holy Spirit upon many of those who had believed, Peter visited the disciples from city to city. At Lydda, he cured Æneas, who had been paralytic for eight years. At Joppa, he restored Tabitha to life. And at Cæsarea of Palestine, he opened the door of faith to the Gentiles, by converting and baptizing the family of Cornelius, a man who feared God, and desired to be instructed in the gospel, Acts ix. 10.

Upon his return to Jerusalem, his fellow apostles, who did not yet fully understand the economy of God, in his purposes toward the Gentiles, charged him with a violation of the law, in his intercourse with the uncircumcised; Peter, however, related the whole affair to them from the beginning, which led them to rejoice and glorify God, in that he had also granted to the Gentiles repentance unto life, Acts xi.

It is thought that soon after this, Peter went to Antioch, where he founded a Christian church, A. D. 36; and after visiting Asia Minor, Bithynia, Cappadocia, Pontus, and perhaps some of the provinces further north, he returned to Jerusalem, where he was, A. D. 44, at the passover. In this year, Herod Agrippa began a persecution against the church, in which James the greater, brother of John, was slain, and Peter apprehended for the purpose of being put to death. On the very night before he was to have been executed, however, and while he was sleeping loaded with chains, between two soldiers, the angel of the Lord awoke him, opened the prison, and brought him out into the street. At the house of Mary the mother of John, he found many of the faithful assembled at prayer, on his behalf, and they all glorified God for his deliverance, Acts xii.

He soon afterwards left Jerusalem, and we lose sight of him, till the council at Jerusalem, A. D. 51. At Antioch, Peter, as his custom had been, ate and drank with the Gentiles, without regarding the Mosaic distinctions of meats. But when some converted Jews from Jerusalem arrived, being unwilling to offend them, he separated himself from the converted Gentiles. Paul, however, fearing this might be interpreted as if meant to revoke and annul what he had determined in the council of Jerusalem, expostulated with him on the impropriety of such a course, and Peter submitted to his judgment, Gal. ii. 11.

From this time, little is known of Peter. Eusebius informs us that Origen, in the third tome of his Exposition on Genesis, wrote to this purpose: "Peter is supposed to have preached to the Jews of the dispersion in Pontus, Galatia, Bithynia, Cappadocia and Asia. And at length, coming to Rome, was crucified with his head downwards; himself having desired that it might be in that manner." Some learned men think, that Peter, in the latter part of his life, went into Chaldea, and there wrote his First Epistle; because the salutation of the church at Babylon is sent in it. But their opinion is not supported by the testimony of ancient writers. Lardner says, "It seems to me, that when Peter left Judea, he went again to Antioch, the chief city of Syria. Thence he might go into other parts of the continent, particularly Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia, which are expressly mentioned at the beginning of his First Epistle. In those countries he might stay a good while. It is very likely that he did so; and that he was well acquainted with the Christians there, to whom he afterwards wrote two epistles. When he left those parts, I think he went to Rome; but not till after Paul had been in that city, and was gone from it."

Many ancient writers have said, that Peter was crucified at Rome, while Nero persecuted the Christians. And their opinion has been espoused by learned men, both Papists and Protestants. Some, however, particularly Scaliger, Sahmasius, Spanheim, and others, deny that Peter ever was at Rome. If the reader wishes to see the evidence from antiquity, on which Peter's having been at Rome rests, he will find it fully set forth by Lardner, who concludes his inquiry as follows: "This is the general, uncontradicted, disinterested testimony of ancient writers in the several parts of the world, Greeks, Latins, Syrians. As our Lord's prediction concerning the death of Peter is recorded in one of the four Gospels, it is very likely that Christians would observe the accomplishment of it, which must have been in some place. And about this place, there is no difference among Christian writers of ancient times. Never any other place was named, besides Rome; nor did any other city ever glory in the martyrdom of Peter. It is not for our honor, nor for our interest, either as Christians or Protestants, to deny the truth of events ascertained by early and well-attested tradition. If any make an ill use of such facts, we are not accountable for it. We are not, from a dread of such abuses, to overthrow the credit of all history, the consequences of which would be fatal." (Macknight.)

EPISTLES OF PETER.—We have two epistles attributed to Peter, by the common consent of the Christian church. The genuineness of the First has never been disputed, and is referred to as his accredited work, by several of the apostolical fathers. Commentators have been divided in opinion, as to the persons to whom this Epistle was primarily addressed; the best sustained hypothesis is, that it was intended for the Jewish and Gentile believers, indiscriminately, who were resident in the provinces enumerated in the introductory verses. It was written from Babylon, but whether the Chaldean or the Egyptian Babylon, cannot be determined. (See BABELON.) The Second Epistle was addressed to the same persons as the former one; its general design being to confirm the doctrines which had been delivered in that, and to excite the Christian converts to a course of conduct becoming in every respect their high profession of attachment to Christ.

Mr. Taylor conjectures that the First Epistle of Peter might be a kind of response to the Epistle of Paul to the Galatians. It is remarkable, he observes, that the tenor of this address is altogether independent of any respect to the Mosaic economy; that is scarcely alluded to, certainly, it is not recommended. Nevertheless, it is evident from the energy of the writer's expressions, (chap. v. 12.) "I have written to you, exhorting you, and strongly testifying that this is the true grace of God in which ye stand," that he felt a constraining necessity for clearly stating, as it were, under his hand, those principles which some, in their excess of zeal for legal observances, had confused, not to say impaired. And these persons were known to him: he does not mention them, but he corrects them: neither does he mention Paul, but he supports him. In his Second Epistle, however, he names Paul explicitly, and reminds his readers that this apostle had written an epistle "to them," iii. 15. We have no evidence, however, of any epistle written by Paul to Pontus, Cappadocia, Asia or Bithynia: he wrote to the Galatians, and to them only. [But if Paul wrote to the Hebrews, they were of the same nation as those to whom Peter writes in their dispersion. See the Bibl. Repository, vol. ii. p. 412, seq. R.] It is a hazarded opinion of Mac-knight, that "the persons to whom Peter's Epistles were sent were, for the most part, Paul's converts." Surely not. Peter says, (i. 16.) "We made known to you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ," and then he alludes to the transfiguration; which he repeats, as what he had heretofore related to them. Paul could not do this.

There is no mark of time in the First Epistle by which to fix its date. The Second fixes itself to a period not long before the decease of the writer. The interval between them might be longer or shorter. If we assign an early date to the First, we must consider well where Sylvanus, if he were Paul's Silas, could be at the time: if we assign a later date, we must find circumstances so adjusted as to allow that Paul should receive, from the Sylvanus of Peter, the satisfaction of perusing Peter's Epistle, and of seeing corrected the errors of those who were misleading the Galatians. Each of these propositions has its difficulty, and must not be rashly determined on. It is clear, that Peter, when he wrote his Second Epistle, knew that Paul's writings were numerous; though it seems advisable to take the term all 'his Epistles,' rather generally than absolutely, rather loosely than strictly.

PHARAOH. It has generally been supposed, that the term "Pharaoh" is not employed by any Greek authors, prior to the establishment of Christianity; but only occurs in Scripture, and in the works of the Jewish historian, Josephus. Dr. Willan, however, has shown, from some passages in the Euterpe of Herodotus, that this ancient writer intended to express in Grecian characters the same word, which is originally Egyptian; and that he has also very satisfactorily explained its meaning. Josephus, in his Jewish Antiquities, (b. viii. ch. vi.) says, "The title of Pharaoh was applied to the kings of Egypt, from Menes to the time of Solomon, but not afterwards; the word signified a king, in the Egyptian language." According to the information received by Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, from the Hierophants of Egypt, that country had been governed during a period of 18,000 years, first by its principal divinities, and afterwards by a dynasty of heroes, or demi-gods, the offspring of the former; and lastly, by a series of mortal princes, who reigned during another period of more than 14,000 years, commencing with Menes, and terminating with Psammenitus, when Egypt became a province of the Persian empire. Herodotus says, from Menes, the first mortal king, to Sethos, priest of Vulcan, (contemporary with the Assyrian monarch Sennacherib and with Hezekiah, prince of Judah,) the Egyptian priests told him, "a period of 11,340 years, or 341 generations, had elapsed, in which there had been as many high-priests, and the same number of kings; and, during that time, no divinity had appeared under a human form." The mortal princes, who are said to have succeeded the gods, were denominated by the Egyptians, Pharaohs, or Pharaons; or, as Herodotus writes it, Pirôms, Heb. פִּרְוִים, Parôh. He saw colossal statues of them, and their contemporary high-priests, in the spacious temple at Thebes, where the priests informed him, "that each of those colossal figures was a Pirôms, descended from a Pirômis; and further asserted, that this had uniformly occurred to the number of 341, in which series there was neither a god nor a hero." He further remarks, that Pirômis, in the Egyptian language, is expressive of dignity and excellence (Καλοζυναγία): it seems, therefore, analogous to the title of Augustus, conferred by the Roman senate on Octavius Cæsar, and retained by his successors in the empire.

Mr. Bryant, in his "Analysis of Ancient Mythology," has made a distinction between Pharâôn, as the word is written by Josephus, and the Pirôn of Herodotus. The former term, he thinks, is compounded of Phi and ourah, implying "the voice of Orus;" because "it was no unusual thing, among the ancients, to call the words of their prince, the voice of God." The observations of Herodotus and Josephus, so far, however, coincide, as to make it evident they meant the same title, or denomination, although they may have both, perhaps, somewhat altered the original word, by expressing it in the characters of their respective languages. The Greek writers, in general, disfigure the names of foreign places and persons, by adding the usual terminations of their own nouns, by transposing consonants, and by inserting vowels, in order to soften words of a harsh sound; thus, the name of the Persian king, Khosrou, is by them expressed Kôuros; Ardsbir is Artaxerxes; Baal is Belus; Addir-Dag is Athergatis; Zeratust is Zoroaster; Phrat, or Aphrat, is Euphrates; Ashur is Assyria; Ashdod is Azotus; and Japha is expressed Joppé. An instance of a change similar to that of Pharaoh and Pirôn, occurs in the name of the Egyptian king Hophra, who is called by Herodotus and Diodorus, Apries. In a treatise "On Providence," written by Synesius, the celebrated bishop of Cyrene, there is a passage which coincides with and illustrates the observations of Herodotus. He says, "The father of Osiris and Typhon was, at the same time, a king, a priest, and a philosopher. The Egyptian histories, also, rank him among the gods; for the Egyptians are disposed to believe, that many divinities reigned in succession, before their country was governed by men, and before their kings were reckoned in a genealogical series by Peirôn, after Peirôm."

Hence it appears that Pharaoh is a title signifying dignity, honor, exaltation. May it not be analogous to the title of PRINCESS among ourselves? The reader will notice the customary, and perhaps inevitable, variations made by the Greeks, in writing, and, no doubt, in pronouncing, oriental names; because it may tend to moderate our surprise at those variations of certain names of the Old Testament, which occur in the New Testament, and which is especially noticeable in the genealogies of Matthew and Luke.

[The word Pharaoh, according to Josephus, (Ant. viii. 6. 2.) and in the Coptic, (Jablonsky, Opusc. i. p. 374.) signifies king; and comes from the Coptic word ouro with the article pi, viz. pi-ouro, pouro, phouro, i. e.

THE KING. The Hebrews, in adopting this word into their own language, (as also in the name Moses), gave it a form adapted to a Hebrew etymology, and preserving at the same time, as nearly as possible, the original signification of the name. Hence they wrote it פֶּרֶעִי, as if from פָּרַע, leader, prince. (See the Bibl. Repository, vol. i. p. 581.)

Bochart supposes that Pharaoh signifies a crocodile; and it is a somewhat striking coincidence, that Champollion has found, that the word ouro, with the article pi-ouro, is the Egyptian name of the serpent or dragon Uraeus, which is pointed out on all the monuments as a characteristic sign of Egyptian sovereigns. This is a singular congruity; and it seems to explain the true signification of the title Pharaoh, and the reason why this symbol is placed upon the royal head-dresses. (See Greppo's Essay on the Hieroglyphic System, &c. p. 85.) Does not this afford some illustration of the passage in Ezek. xxix. 3? "Behold I am against thee, Pharaoh king of Egypt, the great dragon that lieth in the midst of his rivers," &c.

Of the kings of Egypt there are not less than eleven or twelve mentioned in Scripture, all of whom bore the general title of Pharaoh, except three. Along with this title, two of them have also other proper names, Necho and Hophra. The following is their order: some of them have been identified, by the labors of Champollion, with kings whose proper names we know from other sources; while others still remain in obscurity.

1. PHARAOH, (Gen. xii. 15, seq.) in the time of Abraham. (Greppo, p. 89.)
2. PHARAOH, the master of Joseph, Gen. xxxviii. 36; xli. &c. Some suppose that the Pharaoh to whom Joseph became prime minister, was the son of the one mentioned in Gen. xxxviii. 36. (Greppo, p. 91, seq.)
3. PHARAOH, who knew not Joseph, and under whom Moses was born; perhaps Ramses Meiamoun, Ex. i. 8, seq. (Greppo, p. 94.)
4. PHARAOH, under whom the Israelites left Egypt, and who perished in the Red sea, Ex. v.—xiv. Probably Amenophis. (Greppo, p. 97, seq.)
5. PHARAOH, in the time of David, 1 Kings xi. 19—21. Perhaps Psonsenes. (Greppo, p. 112, seq.)
6. PHARAOH, the father-in-law of Solomon; 1 Kings iii. 1; vii. 8; ix. 16, 24. Probably Osochor. (Greppo, p. 114.)
7. SHISHAK, near the end of Solomon's reign, and under Rehoboam, 1 Kings xi. 40; xiv. 25, 26; 2 Chron. xii. 3. Sesonchosis. (Greppo, p. 117.) From this time onward the proper names of the Egyptian kings are mentioned in Scripture.
8. ZERAH, the Ethiopian, 2 Chron. xiv. 9, seq. Rosenmüller, with good reason, supposes him to have been a chief of the Arabian Ethiopia, having no connection with Egypt. (See CUSH, p. 323. Greppo, p. 120.)
9. SO, or Sevechus, contemporary with Ahaz, 2 Kings xvii. 4. (Greppo, p. 124.)
10. TIRHAKA, king of Ethiopia and Egypt, in the time of Hezekiah, 2 Kings xix. 9; Isa. xxxvii. 9. Probably the Tearcho of Strabo, and the Taracles of Manetho. (Greppo, p. 125.)
11. PHARAOH NECHO, in the time of Josiah, 2 Kings xxiii. 29, 30, seq.; 2 Chron. xxxv. 20—24, seq. Necho, the son of Psammetichus. (Greppo, p. 127.) See EGYPT, p. 373.
12. PHARAOH HOPHRA, contemporary with Nebuchadnezzar, Jer. xliv. 30. He was the grandson of Necho, and is the Apries of Herodotus. See APRIES. (Greppo, p. 129.)

(See, in respect to all these kings, the article EGYPT, p. 373, seq. and Rosenmüller's Bibl. Geograph. vol. iii.) *R.

PHARISEES. This was the most celebrated and influential of the Jewish sects in the time of our Saviour, but its origin, like that of its antagonist and rival body the Sadducees, is involved in obscurity. The prophet Isaiah, indeed, as Brücker remarks, found among the Jews in his time several appearances of the spirit and character which afterwards distinguished this sect; (Isa. lviii. 2, 3; lvi. 5.) but, as he adds, we have no proof that they existed as a distinct body in the prophetic age; nor do we find any traces of them prior to the time of the first Ptolemies, when oral traditions, together with allegorical interpretations of the written law, were introduced. Although we meet with no satisfactory evidence of the existence of the sect of the Hasidei, which Scaliger (Eleuch. Trihæres, cap. xxii. p. 170. Reland. Antiq. Sac. p. 2. cap. ix. § 13.) supposes to have been the foundation of the Pharisaic sect, the writer just cited thinks there can be little reason to doubt that it arose soon after the return from the Babylonish captivity, in consequence of the introduction of traditinary institutions and allegorical interpretations. That it was established, and had acquired great authority, in the time of Hyrcanus, and of his sons, Aristobulus and Alexander, has already been stated in the article ALEXANDER, III. The Jewish historian, who was himself of this sect, speaks of it as flourishing in the time of Jonathan the high-priest, together with those of the Sadducees and Essenes, which invalidates the conjecture of Basnage, that the Pharisaic sect owed its rise to the separation which took place between the schools of Hillel and Shammai; for the Jewish writers agree that these celebrated doctors did not flourish earlier than a hundred years before the Christian era.

But although the exact time of the first appearance of the Pharisaic sect cannot be ascertained, its origin may easily be traced back to the same period when the Sadducean heresy arose. From the time that the notion of supernumerary acts of self-denial, devotion and charity was introduced under the sanction of the traditinary law, a wide door was open for superstition, religious pride and hypocrisy. Whilst, on the other hand, some would despise the weakness, or the affectation, of professing to be pious and holy beyond the prescription of the written law, others, through a fanatical disposition, or that they might provide themselves with a convenient cloak for their vices, would become scrupulous observers of the traditional institutions. And when these pretenders to extraordinary sanctity saw that many of those who observed only the written law, not only disclaimed all works of supererogation, but even renounced the hope of future rewards, they would think it necessary to separate themselves into a distinct body, that they might the more successfully display their sanctity and piety. These conjectures are confirmed by the name of the sect, which is derived from the word פָּרַע, to separate. Their separation consisted chiefly in certain distinctions respecting food, clothing, and religious ceremonies. But this does not seem to have interrupted the uniformity of religious worship, in which the Jews of every sect appear to have always united.

The peculiar character and spirit of Pharisaism consisted in the strict observance of the oral law, which they believed to have been delivered to Moses by an archangel, during his forty days' residence in mount Sinai, and to have been by him committed to seventy elders, who transmitted it to posterity. Their superstitious reverence for this law, and the apparent sanctity of manners which it produced, rendered them exceedingly popular. The multitude, for the most part, espoused their interest; and the great, who feared their artifice, were frequently obliged to court their favor. Hence they obtained the highest offices both in the state and the priesthood, and had great weight both in public and private affairs: in some instances they proved so troublesome to the reigning powers, as to subject themselves to severe penalties. Hyrcanus and Alexander restrained their increasing influence, and treated them with great rigor. Under Alexander, they regained their consequence; the dissensions between the schools of Hillel and Shammai, (see ALEXANDRA,) a little before the Christian era, increased their number and power; and they continued, till the destruction of Jerusalem, to enjoy the chief rooms in the Sanhedrim and the synagogue. After that period, when the other sects were dispersed, the Pharisees resumed their authority; and though the name has been dropped, their tenets and customs have ever since prevailed among the Jewish rabbinites; so that, at this day, except the Karaites, scarcely any Jews are to be found who are not, in reality, of the Pharisaic sect.

The principal dogmas of the sect were these:—The oral law, delivered from God to Moses, on mount Sinai, by the angel Metraton, and transmitted to posterity by tradition, is of equal authority with the written law. By observing both of these laws, a man may not only obtain justification with God, but perform meritorious works of supererogation. Fasting, alms-giving, ablutions and confessions are sufficient atonements for sin. Thoughts and desires are not sinful, unless carried into action. God is the Creator of heaven and earth, and governs all things, even the actions of men, by his providence. Man can do nothing without divine influence; which does not, however, destroy the freedom of the human will. The soul of man is spiritual and immortal. In the invisible world, beneath the earth, rewards and punishments will be dispensed to the virtuous and vicious. The wicked shall be confined in an eternal prison, but the good shall obtain an easy return to life. Besides the soul of man, there are other spirits, or angels, both good and bad. The resurrection of the body is to be expected. (Joseph. Ant. Jud. l. xiii. c. 9; l. xviii. c. 2. Bell. J. l. ii. c. 12.)

It appears, from many passages in the Jewish rabbins, that they held the doctrine of the migration of souls from one body to another; and it is probable that they derived it from the ancient Pharisees, and these from the oriental philosophers. This metempsychosis is, however, to be understood in the Pythagoric, and not in the Stoic, sense. The Jews, probably, borrowed this error from the Egyptians. There is no reason, as some writers have done, to consider the sect of the Pharisees as a branch of the Stoic school. For though the Pharisees resembled the Stoics in their affectation of peculiar sanctity, their notion of Divine Providence was essentially different from the Stoical doctrine of Fate; and their cast of manners arose from a different source; that of the Stoics being derived from their idea of the nature of the soul, as a particle of the divine nature; and that of the Pharisees, from a false persuasion that the law might be fulfilled, and justification with God obtained, by ceremonial observances.

The peculiar manners of this sect are strongly marked in the writings of the evangelists, (Matt. vi. ix. xv. xxiii.; Luke vii. &c.) particularly their exactness in observing the rites and ceremonies of the law, both written and traditional; the rigor of their discipline in watchings, fastings and ablutions; their scrupulous care to avoid every kind of ritual impurity; their long and frequent prayers, made not only in the synagogues and temple, but in the public streets; their broad phylacteries on the borders of their garments, in which were written sentences of the law; their assiduity in making proselytes; their ostentatious charities; and, under all this show of zeal and piety, their vanity, avarice, licentiousness and impiety, which called forth many severe rebukes from our Saviour. These representations are confirmed by the testimony of the Jewish writers themselves. The Talmudic books mention several distinct classes of Pharisees, under characters which show them to have been deeply immersed in the idlest and most ridiculous superstitions. Among these were the Truncated Pharisee, who, that he might appear in profound meditation, as if destitute of feet, scarcely lifted them from the ground; the Mortar Pharisee, who, that his meditations might not be disturbed, wore a deep cap in the shape of a mortar, that would only permit him to look upon the ground, at his feet; and the Striking Pharisee, who, shutting his eyes as he walked, to avoid the sight of women, often struck his head against the wall. Such wretched expedients did some of these hypocrites make use of to captivate the admiration of the vulgar. (Brücker's Philosophy, by Enfield.)

The sect of the Pharisees, as already hinted, was not extinguished by the destruction of Jerusalem, and the dispersion of the Jews; for the greater part of those now extant are of this sect, and equally devoted to their traditions, which they call the oral law. They leave every thing to destiny, except what depends on human liberty. They say that all things are in the hand of heaven, except the fear of God; that is, that in the exercise of acts of piety they have free will, and may voluntarily determine themselves to good or evil.

Mr. Taylor, in his additions to Calmet, (whose account of this sect we have altogether rejected, because of its prolix and unsatisfactory nature,) suggests, that we are so much accustomed to consider the Pharisees as public and leading men in the Jewish government, that we usually overlook the circumstance, that the people also, the mass of the nation, were Pharisees;—that is, of that party, as contradistinguished from the Sadducees, the Essenes, &c. So Paul says, "I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee;" (Acts xxiii. 6.) but we have no reason to suppose that he, or his family, had ever had any share in the government. He appeals to one of their distinguishing tenets—"For the hope and resurrection of the dead, I am now called in question." This was felt by those of the Pharisees who were in office; who took this occasion to triumph over their antagonists the Sadducees, by arguing, "If a spiritual existence, whether a pure spirit, or a departed human spirit, have spoken to this man—as he affirms—let us not fight against God." This was not the first mortification suffered by the Sadducees, on account of Christianity, for we read (Acts iv.) that "the priests, the captains of the temple, and the Sadducees, [not the Pharisees,] imprisoned the apostles, being grieved that they taught, in the recent instance of Jesus, to which they appealed in proof of their doctrine, the resurrection of the dead." Hence we find Gamaliel, a Pharisee, speaking in behalf of the apostles; whereas, we never find a Sadducee uttering a syllable in their favor, or showing them any mercy; it was, no doubt to a certain degree, favorable to the church at Jerusalem, that the power of the Sadducees was counterbalanced by their fear of the Pharisees.

It will naturally be imagined, that a sect which held the existence of spirits separate from the body, would be best disposed towards the doctrine of a risen Saviour, and accordingly we find, that the Jewish Christian church was greatly composed of Pharisees, (Acts xv. 5.) who insisted on the universal necessity of observing the Mosaic institutions. They would have imposed on the Gentiles those rituals which themselves adhered to, being Hebrews. The same spirit animated the body of Jewish believers long after; "Thou seest, brother, said James to Paul, (Acts xxi. 20.) how many thousands of Jews there are who believe, and they are all zealous of the law;" that is, zealous Pharisees, though Christian believers. Nor was this disposition subdued, till after the destruction of Jerusalem had rendered the observance of the legal ceremonies impossible. The Pharisæic Christians retained the national rites: the bishops of their church were circumcised; and the children were both circumcised and baptized; as they are at this day, where the churches are descendants of ancient Jewish converts.

It would seem, from the Talmud, that there were at least seven distinctions, or sects, among the Pharisees. So Paul says, "according to the most strict, the strictest sect of our religion, I lived a Pharisee." Some were, probably, less severe in their opinions than others.

PHARPAR, a river of Damascus. See in ABANA.

PHASAEL, eldest son of Antipater the Idumæan, and brother of Herod the Great. See ANTIPATER, I. PHEBE, see PHEBE.

PHENICE, or PHENICIA, see PHENICIA.

PHILADELPHIA, a city of Lydia, in Asia Minor, where was one of the seven Asiatic churches, Rev. iii. 7. Philadelphia was so called from Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamus, by whom it was founded. It stood on a branch of mount Tmolus, by the river Cogamus, about twenty-eight miles east of Sardis. It greatly suffered by frequent earthquakes, owing to its vicinity to Catakekaumene; and it was anciently matter of surprise, that it was not on this account abandoned. It is now a mean but considerable town, of large extent, with a population of about 1000 Greek Christians, who have a resident bishop, and about 20 inferior clergy. (See Missionary Herald, 1821, p. 253, seq.)

PHILEMON, a rich citizen of Colosse, in Phrygia, who, Calmet thinks, was converted to the Christian faith, with Apphia his wife, by Epaphras, a disciple of Paul; but it would appear from the expression in Philem. verse 19, "Thou owest to me even thy ownself, besides," that Philemon was really a convert of Paul; unless we could admit that the apostle had formerly been the means of saving his life; for which we have no warrant. Some have supposed that Archippus was son to Philemon; and as the apostle terms him, "our fellow soldier," it is possible, that the connection had been of long standing, and consequently, much intercourse might have taken place between Paul and Philemon, distinct from any reference to Philemon's situation at Colosse. Lightfoot has this thought; and Michaëlis adopts it; but if Archippus were companion of Paul the aged, he was too old to be son to Philemon: not to insist, that no reason can be assigned why this son is distinguished from the rest of Philemon's family. He might be brother to Philemon, (or to Apphia,) and, living with him, is placed after Apphia; but before the young members of the family, to whom he was uncle. This conjecture seems to be the most probable; and it agrees with the supposable time of life at which Archippus had (lately) been chosen to an office of deaconship.

Though it is usually said that Paul had converted and baptized Onesimus, the run-away slave of Philemon, (see ONESIMUS,) at Rome; yet from the phrase (Col. iv. 9.) "who is one of you," it is natural to infer, that Onesimus had professed Christianity before his elopement; (so Epaphras is called one of themselves, chap. i. 7.) otherwise, he could be no member of the church at Colosse: and very likely, this transgression of a professor had not only mortified Philemon extremely, but had scandalized the church, and had become publicly notorious among the heathen also.

Philemon was undoubtedly a man of property; and like Gaius, the lady Eclecta, and Phœbe, he exercised great hospitality towards Christian brethren, especially evangelists. But from the direction of the apostle "to prepare him a lodging" (comp. Mac-knight, et al. in loc.) in a hired house, in the city, where he might receive all visitors, it would appear that Philemon's premises were not very extensive.

Philemon might have been a deacon in or of the churches at Colosse, but the term "fellow laborer" is not sufficient to prove that he was a bishop; though it implies a previous personal knowledge, and perhaps much confidential communication, between the parties. If we might add a personal knowledge of Philemon, by those also who salute him in Paul's letter,—Timothy, Epaphras, Mark, Aristarchus, Demas, Luke,—it would greatly heighten our conception of this good man's character, and suggest a variety of occasions on which he might have rendered the brethren services equally extensive and important.

PHILETUS, an apostate Christian, mentioned by Paul in connection with Hymenæus, 2 Tim. ii. 16.

I. PHILIP, or HEROD-PHILIP, (Mark vi. 17; Luke iii. 19; Matt. xiv. 3.) son of Herod the Great. See HEROD-PHILIP.

II. PHILIP, the apostle, was a native of Bethsaida, in Galilee, and was called by our Saviour, at the beginning of his ministry, (John i. 43, 44,) and about a year afterwards was appointed an apostle. He is several times mentioned in the Gospels, but the incidents in his life do not require to be enlarged upon.

III. PHILIP, the second of the seven deacons, (Acts vi. 5.) is thought to have been of Cæsarea in Palestine. (See Acts xxi. 8, 9.) After the death of Stephen, nearly all the Christians, except the apostles, having left Jerusalem, and being dispersed in several places, Philip went to preach at Sebaste, or Samaria, where he performed several miracles, and converted many persons, Acts viii. He baptized them; and sent to the apostles at Jerusalem, that they might come and communicate the Holy Ghost to them. Some time after this, Philip was by an angel commanded to travel on the road that leads from Jerusalem to Old Gaza in the way to Egypt. Philip obeyed, and there met with an Ethiopian eunuch, belonging to Candace, queen of Ethiopia, whom he converted and baptized. (See Acts viii. 26.) Being come out of the water, the Spirit of the Lord took him away, and we subsequently find him at Azotus. He preached the gospel in all the cities he passed through, till he returned to Cæsarea of Palestine, where he probably spent the remainder of his days.

PHILIPPI, a city of Macedonia, so called from Philip, king of Macedon, who repaired and beautified it; whence it lost its former name of Dathos. In Acts xvi. 12, Luke says, "We came to Philippi, which (say our translators) is the chief city of that part of Macedonia, and a colony;" but this translation requires correction, to this effect: "Philippi, a city of the first part of Macedonia;" Macedonia Prima. The province of Macedonia had undergone several changes, and had been divided into various portions, which had received various names. At one time it was in six divisions; at another, it was united with Achaia, as Sextus Rufus observes; and on its conquest by Paulus Emilius, it was divided into four provinces, as appears from Livy. We have however nothing to do with any other than the first division of it. Luke says, "They came to Philippi, a city of the first part of Macedonia;" and Mr. Taylor has produced a medal which reads, ΜΑΚΕΔΟΝΩΝ ΠΡΩΤΗΣ, "of the first part of Macedonia;" which is a complete justification of the evangelist's description of this district. We ought further to observe, says Mr. Taylor, that though our present copies read πρώτη της, the Syriac version and Chrysostom read πρώτης, and as this is the reading of the medal, as it agrees with matter of fact, and delivers us from some ambiguities, we risk little in recommending this reading; and its correspondent rendering "Philippi, a city of the first part of Macedonia;" for, in fact, Amphipolis was (or had been) the chief city of the district in which Philippi stood. (Livy, lib. xlv. c. 29.) Further, the sacred writer says, Philippi was "a colony;" intending, no doubt, a Roman colony; but as this was a favor Philippi seems to have had little reason to expect, having formerly opposed the interest of the Cæsarean imperial family, the learned have been embarrassed by the title here given it. However, after long perplexities among the critics, Providence brought to light some coins, in which it is recorded under this character: and one of which makes express mention, that Julius Cæsar himself had bestowed the dignity and advantages of a colony on the city of Philippi, which Augustus afterwards confirmed and augmented. The legend is, COLONIA AUGUSTA JULIA PHILIPPI. This corroborates the character given to Philippi by Luke; and proves that it had been a colony for many years, though no author but himself, whose writings have reached us, has mentioned it under that character; or has given us reason to infer at what time it might be thus honorably distinguished. [It is, however, more probable that the reading of the Greek is correct, since there are no various readings; and Philippi is called the "first or chief city" of that part of Macedonia, perhaps from some peculiar privileges bestowed upon it, and not as being the capital of that division of the country; since this honor belonged to Amphipolis in the first division, and to Thessalonica in the second. (See Kuinoel on Acts xvi. 12.) R.

Paul preached here A. D. 52, and converted several inhabitants; among others, Lydia, a seller of purple. He also cast out a Pythonic spirit from a servant maid, in consequence of which her masters stirred up the whole city against him, and the magistrates caused him and Silas to be seized, whipped, and put into the prison.

This ill treatment seems to have been recollected by Paul, with a resentment not common to him. He says to the Thessalonians, "We had suffered before, and were shamefully entreated at Philippi." It should seem that the military officers of the colony had assumed a power that did not belong to them; and Paul resented their proceedings with the feelings of a soldier, as well as of a Roman citizen:—he therefore humbled them in a public manner; but he did not forget their shameful usage of him and his companion, Silas.

The converted Philippians were always full of gratitude for the faith they had received from God, by the ministry of Paul. They assisted him on several occasions; (Phil. iv. 16.) sent him money while in Achaia; and being informed that he was a prisoner at Rome, they sent a deputation to him by Epaphroditus, their bishop, (Phil. iv. 12, 18. A. D. 61,) who went a second time, and carried with him the Epistle which is still remaining; and in which the apostle commends their liberality, and shows great acknowledgment for their readiness. This church was left by Paul and Silas, under the ministrations and direction of Luke, whose age and experience qualified him for that difficult office. He continued there a long while, probably several years, though he modestly omits all mention of his services. (Comp. Acts xvi. 11, et seq. with chap. xx. 6.)

PHILISTINES, a people that came from the isle of Caphtor (see ΚΑΠΤΟΡ) into Palestine, (Amos ix. 7; Jer. xlvii. 4,) being descendants from the Caphtorim, who were derived from the Casluhim, children of Mizraim, (Gen. x. 13, 14.) father of the Egyptians. Moses says (Deut. ii. 23.) that the Caphtorim, being come out of Caphtor, drove out the Avim, which dwelt from Hazerim to Azzah, (or Gaza,) and dwelt in their stead. It is therefore only since the time of the Avim, (or Avites,) or Canaanites, that the Philistines came into Palestine, and possessed that country.

The name of these people is not Hebrew. The Septuagint generally translate it by Ἀλλόφυλοι, strangers. The LXX sometimes translate Cherethim by Cretai, Cretes, (כריתים, Kořitai.) See Ezek. xxv. 16; Zeph. ii. 5, 6.

The Philistines were a powerful people in Palestine, even in Abraham's time, (A. M. 2083.) since they had then kings, and considerable cities. They are not enumerated among the nations devoted to extermination, whose territory the Lord assigned to the Hebrews, probably because they were not of the cursed seed of Canaan. Joshua, however, did not hesitate to give their land to the Hebrews, and to attack them by command from the Lord, because they possessed various districts promised to Israel. But these conquests must have been ill-maintained, since under the Judges, at the time of Saul, and at the beginning of the reign of David, the Philistines had their kings and their lords. Their state was divided into five little kingdoms, or satrapies, and they oppressed Israel during the government of the high-priest Eli, that of Samuel, and during the reign of Saul; for about 120 years, from A. M. 2848 to 2960. Shamgar, Samson, Samuel and Saul opposed them, and were victorious over them with great slaughter, at various times, but did not reduce their power. They maintained their independence till David subdued them, (2 Sam. v. 17; viii.) from which time they continued in subjection to the kings of Judah, down to the reign of Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat, (about 246 years,) from A. M. 2960 to A. M. 3116, when they revolted, 2 Chron. xxi. 16. Jehoram made war against them, and probably reduced them to his obedience; because it is observed that they revolted again from Uzziah, who kept them to their duty during his whole reign, 2 Chron. xxvi. 6, 7. During the unfortunate reign of Ahaz, the Philistines made great havoc in the territory of Judah; but his son and successor Hezekiah again subdued them, 2 Chron. xxviii. 18; 2 Kings xviii. 8. They regained their full liberty, however, under the later kings of Judah; and we see by the menaces uttered against them by the prophets Isaiah, Amos, Zephaniah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel, that they brought many calamities on Israel, for which God threatened to punish them with great misfortunes. They were partially subdued by Esarhaddon, king of Assyria, and afterwards by Psammetichus, king of Egypt; and there is great probability that they were reduced by Nebuchadnezzar, as well as the other people of Syria, Phœnicia and Palestine, during the siege of Tyre. They afterwards fell under the dominion of the Persians, then under that of Alexander the Great, who destroyed Gaza, the only city of the Phœnicians that dared to oppose him. After the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, the Asmoneans took several cities from them, which they subjected, and Tryphon, regent of the kingdom of Syria, gave to Jonathan the government of the whole coast of the Mediterranean, from Tyre to Egypt; consequently, all the country of the Philistines. The name Palestine comes from Philistine, although these people possessed but a small part of this country. See PALESTINE.

PHILOSOPHY. Paul cautions the Colossians lest any man spoil them through philosophy, Col. ii. 8. In Acts xvii. 18, it is related, that when this apostle came to Athens, he there found Epicurean and Stoic philosophers, who made a jest of his discourses; and in many places of his Epistles, he opposes the supposed wise men, and the false wisdom of the age—that is, the pagan philosophy—to the wisdom of Jesus Christ, and the true religion, which to the philosophers and sophists seemed to be mere folly, because it was built neither on the eloquence nor the subtlety of those who preached it, but on the power of God, and on the operations of the Holy Ghost, which actuated the hearts and minds of believers.

About the time that the several sects of philosophers were formed among the Greeks, as the Academics, the Peripatetics, and the Stoics, there arose also among the Jews several sects, as the Essenes, the Pharisees and the Sadducees. The Pharisees had some resemblance to the Stoics, the Sadducees to the Epicureans, and the Essenes to the Academics. The Pharisees were proud, vain and boasting, like the Stoics: the Sadducees, who denied the immortality of the soul, and the existence of spirits, freed themselves at once, like the Epicureans, from all solicitude about futurity: the Essenes were more moderate, more simple and religious, and therefore approached nearer to the Academics.

The philosophers, against whom Paul inveighs, in his Epistle to the Romans, boasted the extent of their knowledge, the purity of their morality, the eloquence of their writings, the strength of their reasonings, and the subtlety of their arguments. Their weaknesses were pride, curiosity, presumption, hypocrisy, ambition. They ascribed every thing to human reason, and would be thought superior in all things. Although their lives were disorderly, shameful, and even injurious to human nature, yet they would pass on the world for good men; and while boasting of their knowledge of God, they dishonored him by their actions. To them the apostle opposed the humility of the cross of Christ, the force of his miracles, the purity of his moral doctrines, the depth of his mysteries, and the evident proofs of his mission.

Many of the ancient fathers maintain, that the ancient heathen philosophers had nothing valuable but what they borrowed from the Hebrews:—that they had drawn from the fountain of the prophets; that by the subtle artifice of the devil, some principles of truth slipped into their writings, in order to undermine the truth at such time as God should manifest it to the world. Eusebius has devoted two entire books, (lib. xi. xii.) of his great work of the Gospel-Preparation, to show that Plato had taken the principal things of his philosophy and theology from the sacred books of the Jews.

I. PHINEHAS, son of Eleazar, and grandson of Aaron, was the third high-priest of the Jews, (A. M. 2571, to about A. M. 2590,) and is particularly commended in Scripture for zeal, in vindicating the glory of God, when the Midianites had sent their daughters into the camp of Israel, to tempt the Hebrews to fornication and idolatry, Numb. xxv. 7. For his conduct upon this occasion, the Lord promised the priesthood to Phinehas by a perpetual covenant; evidently including this tacit condition, that his children should continue faithful and obedient. It continued in the race of Phinehas, down to the high-priest Eli, for about 335 years, when it passed into the family of Ithamar; and again reverted to the family of Eleazar under the reign of Saul, who, having put to death Abimelech and the other priests of Nob, gave the high-priesthood to Zadok, of the race of Phinehas. The priesthood continued in his family until after the captivity of Babylon, and even to the destruction of the temple.

We read also of another memorable and zealous action of Phinehas, (Josh. xxii. 30, 31,) when the Israelites beyond Jordan had raised upon the banks of the river a vast heap for an altar, those on the other side, fearing they were going to forsake the Lord, and to set up another religion, deputed Phinehas and other chief men, to inform themselves of their reason for erecting this monument. When they found that it was only in commemoration of their union and common origin, Phinehas praised the Lord, saying, We now know that the Lord is with us, since you are not guilty of that prevarication of which we suspected you.

Under the pontificate of Phinehas the story of Micah happened, (Judg. xvii.) also the conquest of Laish by the tribe of Dan, (Judg. xviii. 27.) and the enormity committed on the wife of the Levite of mount Ephraim, Judg. xix. Phinehas's successor was Abiezer, or Abishuah, Judg. xx. 28.

II. PHINEHAS, son of Eli, the high-priest, and brother of Hophni. See ELI, and HOPHNI.

PHŒBE, a deaconess of the church in the eastern port of Corinth, Cenchrea. It is most likely, from what the apostle says of Phœbe, that "she had been a succorer of many, and of myself also," (Rom. xvi. 1, 2,) that she was a woman of property, not to say, of distinction. Cenchrea was a port of considerable commerce; and as it is clear that Phœbe went to Rome on important business in which the faithful at Rome might assist her, it is probable also, that she was engaged in trade on her own account; something like Lydia of Philippi. That she was much in the confidence of the apostle, cannot be doubted; and, we think, from the import of the term rendered succorer, (patroness,) she may be taken for the counterpart of the hospitable Gaius, "mine host, (says Paul,) and the host of the whole church." (Compare the second and third Epistles of John.) A laudable emulation! Gaius at Corinth; and Phœbe at its neighboring port, Cenchrea.

PHŒNICIA, or PHŒNICE, a province of Syria, which, in its more ancient and extended sense, comprehended a narrow strip of country extending nearly the whole length of the eastern coast of the Mediterranean sea, from Antioch to the borders of Egypt. But Phœnicia Proper was included between the cities of Laodicea and Tyre, and comprehended only the territories of Tyre and Sidon. Before Joshua conquered Palestine, this country was possessed by Canaanites, sons of Ham, divided into eleven families, of which the most powerful was that of Canaan, the founder of Sidon, and head of the Canaanites, properly so called, whom the Greeks named Phœnicians. Only these preserved their independence under Joshua; also under David, Solomon, and the succeeding kings: but they were subdued by the kings of Assyria and Chaldea. Afterwards, they successively obeyed the Persians, Greeks and Romans. At this day, Phœnicia is in subjection to the Ottomans, not having had any national or native kings, or any independent form of government, for more than two thousand years. The name Phœnicia is not in the books of Hebrew Scripture; but only in the Maccabees and the New Testament. The Hebrew always reads Canaan. Matthew, who wrote perhaps in either Hebrew or Syriac, calls the same person a Canaanitish woman, (chap. xv. 22.) whom Mark, writing in Greek, calls a Syro-phœnician, or a Phœnician of Syria; because Phœnicia then made a part of Syria; also to distinguish the people from the Phœnicians of Africa, or the Carthaginians, which was a colony from the original country. See further under TYRE.

PHRYGIA was the largest kingdom of Asia Minor; it had Bithynia north, Pisidia and Lycia south, Galatia and Cappadocia east, and Lydia and Mysia west. Christianity was planted in this country by Paul, Acts xvi. 6; xviii. 23.

PHUT, the third son of Ham, (Gen. x. 6.) is thought to have peopled either the canton of Phtemphu, Phtemphi, or Phtembuti, of Pliny and Ptolemy, whose capital was Thara in Lower Egypt, inclining towards Libya; or the canton called Phtenotes, of which Buthas was the capital. The prophets often speak of Phut. In the time of Jeremiah, (xli. 9.) this province was subject to Necho king of Egypt; and Nahum (iii. 9.) reckons them among those who ought to come to the assistance of No-Ammon. The Arabic versions by Phut understand a people in Southern Egypt, if not rather in Nubia: these might come down the Nile, to assist No-Ammon. According to Josephus, (Ant. i. 6, 2.) Phut is Mauritania, where there is a river of that name.

PHYGELLUS, a Christian of Asia, who, being at Rome while Paul was there in prison, (A. D. 65.) forsook him with Hermogenes, in his necessity, 2 Tim. i. 15.

PHYLACTERIES were little rolls of parchment, in which were written certain words of the law, and were worn upon their foreheads, (see FRONTLET), and upon the wrist of their left arm, by the Jews. The custom was founded on a mistaken interpretation of Exod. xiii. 9: "And it shall be for a sign unto thee upon thine hand, and for a memorial between thine eyes." And verse 16: "And it shall be for a token upon thine hand, and for frontlets between thine eyes."

Leo of Modena informs us particularly about these rolls. (Ceremonies of the Jews, p. i. cap. 11. n. 4.) Those that were to be fastened to the arms were two rolls of parchment written in square letters, with an ink made on purpose, and with much care. They were rolled up to a point, and enclosed in a sort of case of black calf-skin. They then were put upon a square bit of the same leather, but something stiffer, whence hung a thong of the same, of about a finger's breadth, and a cubit and a half long. These rolls were placed at the bending of the left arm, and after the thong had made a little knot in the form of the letter  $\gamma$ , Yodh, it was wound about the arm in a spiral line, which ended at the top of the middle finger. It was called Teffila shel-yad, or the Teffila of the hand.

PI-HAHIROTH, the mouth or pass of Hiroth, one of the stations of the Israelites in the wilderness. See EXODUS, p. 401.

PILATE was sent to govern Judea in the room of Gratus, (A. D. 26 or 27,) and governed this province ten years. He was of an impetuous and obstinate temper, and gave occasion to troubles and revolts among the Jews. Luke (xiii. 1.) acquaints us, that he had mingled the blood of some Galileans with their sacrifices, but the occasion on which this was done is not known.

Pilate repeatedly endeavored to deliver our Saviour from the Jews, knowing that they accused him capitally only from malice and envy. His wife also, who had been disturbed with dreams, sent and desired him not to participate in condemning that just person. In order to effect his purpose, he adopted several expedients: (1.) He required legal accusation, evidence, and conviction; and in default of these, he proposed to refer his condemnation to the Jews; who had not, as he well knew, the power of inflicting a capital punishment, John xviii. 29, 31. (2.) He attempted to appease the Jews, and to give them some satisfaction, by whipping our Saviour. (3.) He tried to take him out of their hands, by offering to deliver him, or Barabbas, on the festival day of the passover. (4.) He wanted to discharge himself from pronouncing judgment against him, by sending him to Herod king of Galilee. (5.) When he saw all this would not satisfy the Jews, and that they even threatened him, saying he could be no friend to the emperor, if he let Jesus go, he caused water to be brought, washed his hands before all the people, and publicly declared himself innocent of the blood of that just person. Yet at the same time he delivered him up to the soldiers, that they might crucify him. This was enough to justify Christ, and to show that Pilate held him to be innocent; but it was not enough to vindicate the conscience and integrity of a judge, whose duty it was, as well to assert the cause of oppressed innocence, as to punish the guilty criminal.

He ordered to be put over our Saviour's cross, as it were, an abstract of his sentence, and the motive of his condemnation, "Jesus of Nazareth, king of the Jews," written in Latin, Greek and Hebrew. Some of the Jews reproached Pilate, that he ought to have written "Jesus of Nazareth, pretended king of the Jews." But Pilate answered them peremptorily, "What I have written, I have written." Towards evening he gave leave to take the bodies down from the crosses, that they might not continue there the following day, being the passover, and a sabbath day. He also granted the body of Jesus to Joseph of Arimathea, that he might pay the last duties to it. When the priests came to desire him to set a watch about the sepulchre, lest the disciples should steal Jesus away by night, he answered, they had a guard, and might place it there themselves. This is the substance of what the Gospels relate concerning Pilate.

Justin Martyr, Tetrullian, Eusebius, and several others, ancients and moderns, assure us, that it was the custom for Roman magistrates to send to the emperor copies of all verbal processes and judicial acts which passed in their several provinces; and that Pilate, in compliance with this custom, having reported to Tiberius what had occurred relating to Jesus, the emperor wrote an account of it to the senate, in a manner which induced a suspicion that he thought favorably of Jesus, and was not unwilling they should decree divine honors to him. But the senate differed from this opinion, and the matter dropped. It appears by what Justin says of these Acts, that they mentioned the miracles of Christ; and even that the soldiers had divided his garments among them. Eusebius intimates that they spoke of his resurrection and ascension. Tertullian and Justin refer to these documents with so much confidence, as would induce a belief that they had copies of them in their hands. Neither Eusebius nor Jerome, however, who were both inquisitive and understanding persons, nor any later author, seems to have seen them; at least, not the true and original Acts. For those now extant are not authentic, being neither ancient nor uniform. (See Fabricius, Cod. Apoc. N. T. p. 214, seq.)

Pilate became odious both to the Jews and Samaritans, for the severity and cruelty of his administration; and being accused by the latter before Vitellius, the governor of Syria, he was removed from his office, and sent to Rome to answer their accusations before the emperor. (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. c. 3, and c. 4, 1.) Before his arrival, Tiberius was dead; and Pilate is said to have been banished by Caligula to Vienna, in Gaul, and there to have died by his own hand. (Euseb. Hist. Ecc. ii. 7, 8.) He is described, by Philo the Jew, as a judge accustomed to sell justice; and for money to pronounce any sentence that was desired. He mentions his rapines, his injuries, his murders, the torments he inflicted on the innocent, and the persons he put to death without form or process. In short, he seems to have been a man that exercised excessive cruelty during all the time of his government.

PILGRIM denotes, properly, one who is going forward to visit a holy place, with design to pay his solemn devotions there. Whether pilgrimages are as ancient as the days of Jacob, we know not; but if they were, it gives a very expressive sense to the words of that good old man, who calls the years of his life "the days of his pilgrimage;" and is perfectly consistent with the apostle's observation, that the ancient patriarchs "confessed they were strangers and pilgrims on earth," Heb. xi. 3.

PILLAR, a column or supporter. A pillar of cloud, a pillar of fire, a pillar of smoke, signify a cloud, a fire, a smoke, which, rising up toward heaven, forms an irregular column. The pillars of heaven, (Job xxvi. 11.) and the pillars of the earth, (Job ix. 6; Ps. lxxv. 3.) are metaphorical expressions, by which the heavens and the earth are compared to an edifice raised by the hand of God, and founded upon its basis or foundation. This appears from the passage in Job, (xxxviii. 4—6.) "Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? Declare, if thou hast understanding. Who hath laid the measures thereof, if thou knowest? or who hath stretched the line upon it? Whereupon are the foundations thereof fastened, or who laid the corner-stone thereof?"

James, Cephas and John "seemed to be pillars of the church," Gal. ii. 9. "Him that overcometh, will I make a pillar in the temple of my God;" (Rev. iii. 12.) i. e. he shall be the support, strength and ornament of the house of God. The church of Jesus Christ is called by Paul (1 Tim. iii. 15.) "the pillar and ground of the truth." When the Lord sent Jeremiah to preach to the nations, he said to him, (Jer. i. 18.) "Behold, I have made thee this day a defended city, and an iron pillar, and brazen walls, against the whole land; able to withstand all the efforts of thine enemies, and incapable of yielding to their violence."

PILLOW, a cushion for the head or arm. See BED, p. 155.

PINE, a well-known tree, of the nature of the fir. It is spoken in Scripture of a tree growing on mount Lebanon, (Isa. xli. 19; lx. 13.) which the Vulgate calls ulmus, elm; probably a species of platanus or plane-tree. In Isa. xlv. 14, the Vulgate reads pinus, but the English Bible has ash. *R.

PINNACLE of the temple. When the devil had tempted Jesus in the desert, (Matt. iv. 5.) "he took him up into the holy city, and set him on a pinnacle of the temple; and said to him, If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down," &c. This pinnacle Calmet supposes to be the gallery, or parapet, on the top of the buttresses, which surrounded the roof of the temple, properly so called; and he remarks, that in Palestine the roofs of all houses were covered with terraces, or platforms; around which was a low wall, to prevent any one falling down, Deut. xxii. 8. Josephus, too, says, the roof of the temple was defended by tall golden spikes, to hinder birds from alighting upon it, that they might not defile it with their dung. It is by no means probable, however, that the temptation of Jesus to throw himself down among the people at worship, took place on any part of the high roof of the temple. It is much more likely that the place was in some more accessible part, to which there was a passage by stairs; for, as to the very vague, though common notion, of the person of Jesus being carried through the air by the power of the devil, it is by no means credible. The account given by Hegippus of the death of James the less, may illustrate this incident of the temptation. He went up into a gallery, whence he could be heard by the people, and from whence he was thrown down, without being instantly killed. [The summit or roof of the principal porch of the temple, next the southern wall of the court of the Gentiles, is said by Josephus (Antiq. xv. 11. 5. B. J. v. 5. 2.) to have been 500 cubits above the bottom of the valley below, and may well be considered as the pinnacle spoken of. R.]

PIRATHON, a city of Ephraim in mount Analek, whence came Abdon, judge of Israel, Judg. xii. 15. Bacehides caused it to be fortified. It is called Pharaohon, in 1 Mac. ix. 50.

PISGAI, a mountain beyond Jordan, in Moab, a summit, or peak, rising from, or among, a series of lower hills, and probably Nebo, Pisgah and Abarim make but one chain, over against Jericho, on the road from Livias to Heshbon. (See ABARIM.) In the Hebrew text, (Deut. xxxiv. 1—3.) the prospect enjoyed by Moses from Pisgah reaches from Dan, north, to Zoar, south; but in the Samaritan Pentateuch, it is much more extensive: "All the land from the river of Egypt, to the river, the great river Euphrates, to the utmost sea." This was the extent of Solomon's dominions; and the utmost bounds of the royal power of the kings of Israel. But another use may be made of this passage, not without its importance. Could this whole district be seen from any other mountain than Pisgah? Was this the same extent as was shown by the tempter to our Lord, when exciting his ambition? "All this, the utmost bounds that ever were enjoyed by the ancient kings of thy nation, from whom thou art descended; all the whole kingdom and dominion of thine ancestors, will I give thee, if," &c. This may account for the term used by Luke, (iv. 5.) rendered in our version, "all the world."

PISIDIA, a province of Asia Minor, lying mostly on mount Taurus, and having Lycæonia on the north, Pamphylia south, Cilicia and Cappadocia east, and the province of Asia west. Paul preached at Antioch, its capital, (Acts xiii. 14.) and throughout Pisidia, xiv. 24.

PISON, or PHISON, one of the four great rivers that watered paradise, (Gen. ii. 11, 12.) and which ran through all the land of Havilah, where excellent gold is found. It has, of course, been placed as variously as the garden of Eden, to which article the reader is referred. Eusebius and Jerome call it the Ganges; Josephus calls it Gotha; and Solomon, the commentator, calls it the Nile.

PITHOM, one of the cities built by the children of Israel for Pharaoh in Egypt, during their servitude, Exod. i. 11. This is probably the Pathumos mentioned by Herodotus, (lib. ii. 158.) which he places on the canal made by the kings Neebo and Darius, to join the Red sea with the Nile. We find also, in the ancient geographers, that there was an arm of the Nile called Pathmeticus, Phatmicus, Phaticus, or Phatniticus. Bochart says that Pithom and Rameses are about five leagues above the division of the Nile, and beyond this river; but this assertion has no proof from antiquity. Marsham will have Pithom to be the same as Pelusium, or Damietta. (See Rosenmüller Bibl. Geogr. iii. p. 269.)

PLAY, To PLAY. The Hebrews use this word to express all kinds of diversions, as dancing, sportive exercise, toying, and amusements proper for recreating and diverting the mind. The word פָּחַק, tsahhak, which signifies to play, is commonly used for laughing, mocking, jeering, insulting. When Sarah saw Ishmael play with her son Isaac, she was offended at it: it was a play of mockery and insult, or, perhaps, of squabbling, as in 2 Sam. ii. 14. Let the young people (or soldiers) get up and play before us—show their skill at their weapons—let them fight, as it were, by way of play; but the event shows that they fought in good earnest, since they were all killed. We see another kind of play in Exod. xxxii. 6. When the Israelites had set up the golden calf, they began to dance about it, and to divert themselves: "The people sat down to eat and drink, and rose up to play." When Samson was delivered by Dalilah into the hands of the Philistines, they bored out his eyes, put him in prison, and some time after made him play before them; that is, divert them by the tricks they played him, and by the motions he was forced to make, to avoid them, and to screen himself from their insults, Judg. xvi. 25. The women who came out to meet David and Saul, when they returned victorious from the slaughter of Goliath, danced and played on instruments, and showed their mirth after a thousand manners, 1 Sam. xviii. 6, 7. In the procession at the removal of the ark from the house of Obed-Edom to the palace of David, he danced with great alacrity, played on instruments, and testified his joy before the Lord, 2 Sam. vi. 5, 21. And when Michal upbraided him for not observing the gravity suitable to his rank, he answered, "I will play before the Lord, and will be still more vile in my own eyes." Sarah, the daughter of Raguel, opening her heart before the Lord, says, I have never associated myself with those that play, Tob. iii. 17. And Jeremiah, (xv. 17.) "I have never haunted the assemblies of those that are given to play and diversion." The same prophet, comforting the daughter of Sion, tells her the time shall come in which she shall be rebuilt, and again shall divert herself in dancing with her equals, ch. xxxi. 4. Solomon represents Wisdom as playing before the Lord, and taking her pleasure in living among men, Prov. viii. 30, 31.

There is no mention in Scripture of any particular sorts of plays; neither games of hazard, nor theatrical representations, nor races either of horses or chariots, nor combats of men or of beasts. The Israelites were a laborious people, who confined almost all their diversions to the pleasures of the country, and to those of the festivals of the Lord, their religious journeys, and their enjoyments in the temple.

This observation, however, refers to the time when the law was maintained; the ancient periods of the Hebrew republic. For when they grew irregular, they adopted the utmost excesses of idolatrous nations; their wicked and shameful sports and diversions. From the time of the Grecians, after the death of Alexander the Great, under the government of the kings of Syria in Judea, they began to study the sports and exercises of the Grecians. There were gymnasia, or schools of exercise, in Jerusalem, and places where they practised the exercises of the Greeks, wrestling, racing, quoits, &c. 1 Mac. v. 16; 2 Mac. iv. 13—15. And when the Romans succeeded the Greeks, Herod built theatres and amphitheatres in the cities of Palestine, and instituted all sorts of games.

PLEDGE, a security or assurance given for the performance of a contract. When a man of veracity pledges his word, his affirmation becomes an assurance that he will fulfil what he has promised. But as the word of every man is not equally valid, in matters of importance, it becomes necessary that a valuable article of some kind should be deposited, as a bond on his part. So Judah gave pledges to Tamar, Gen. xxxviii. 17. Under the law the taking of pledges was regulated: the mill-stone was not to be taken in pledge, (Deut. xxiv. 6.) nor was the person taking a pledge to enter the house to fetch it, (ver. 10.) nor to detain necessary raiment after sunset; (ver. 12.) nor was the widow's raiment to be taken in pledge, ver. 17. How mild, how benevolent are these directions! and we find some reproached that they take their brother's pledge, (Job xxii. 6.) that they take the widow's ox in pledge, (xxiv. 3, 9.) that they do not restore the pledge, (as the law directed, Deut. xxiv. 18.) Ezek. xviii. 7, 12; xxxiii. 15. To understand Amos ii. 8, "They lay themselves down on clothes laid to pledge, by every altar," observe, how galling this must be to the owners, to see carpets, &c. used in idolatry, carried abroad, laid under idolatrously sacred trees, &c. What insolence in the lender who held these pledges! what mortification to the borrower who had delivered them! to see his property (1.) published and (2.) profaned. (See Harmer, vol. iv. p. 377.)

tail; but on modern globes in the shoulder, and which appear at the beginning of spring. Job speaks of the Pleiades, (chap. xxxviii. 31; ix. 9.) and of the Hyades, which are seven other stars in the Bull's head, and mark out the east point and the spring: "Canst thou bind the sweet influence of the Pleiades?" Hebrew חִמָּה, Chimah; Can you hinder the Pleiades from rising in their season? He gives them the name—the sweet influences of Chimah, because of the agreeableness of the spring season. Jerome has translated Chimah, by Hyades, (Job ix. 9.) and by Pleiades, (Job xxxviii. 31.) and by Arcturus, the Bear's tail, Amos v. 8. Aquila sometimes translates it in the same manner. The Bear is one of the most northern constellations; but Chimah rather signifies the Pleiades.

POETRY of the Hebrews. No point of criticism has been more discussed among the learned than that concerning Hebrew poetry; and yet we cannot say the matter is exhausted, or the difficulty cleared. We cannot pretend to know the true pronunciation of the Hebrew language; and consequently we cannot perceive either the harmony of the words, or the quantity of the syllables, which constitute the beauty of the verses. Nor have we in Hebrew, as we have in Greek and Latin, rules for ascertaining the quantity of the syllables, the number of feet, or the cadence and construction of verses; and yet it is plain that the Hebrews observed these things, at least in some measure, since in their poems we observe letters added to, or cut off from, the ends of words; which evinces submission to the rhythm, the number, or the measure of syllables.

From the manner in which Josephus, Origen, Eusebius and Jerome have spoken of the Hebrew poetry, it should seem that in their time the beauty and rules of it were well known. Josephus affirms in several places, that the songs composed by Moses are in heroic verse, and that David composed several sorts of verses and songs, odes and hymns, in honor of God; some of which were in trimeters, or verses of three feet, and others in pentameters, or verses of five feet. Origen and Eusebius adopted the same sentiment; but whether out of deference to the opinion of Josephus, or whether of their own judgment, is uncertain. Origen well understood the Hebrew, and Eusebius was one of the most learned men of his time.

Le Clerc composed an ingenious dissertation, to show, that the Hebrew poetry was in rhyme much like the French or English. Others maintain, that in the old Hebrew verses there is neither measure nor feet; and Scaliger affirms, that this language, as well as that of the Syrians, Arabians and Abyssinians, is not capable of the restraint of feet or measures. Much of the Arabic poetry bears evidence of an origin cognate with the Hebrew; nor are the maxims of our British Druids, conveyed in sententious verses, for the greater accuracy of memory—and they were committed to memory, not to writing—altogether dissimilar.

The first thing remarkable, in Hebrew poetry, is a duplication of phraseology, so constructed, that the memory, by recollecting one member of the sentence, could not fail of recollecting the other. The earliest specimen extant exemplifies this throughout. Lamech, the first man who married two wives, intent on calming their apprehensions for his safety, does not say, in plain prose, "No one will be so unjust as to kill me for this trifling transgression;" but he puts his argument into verse; and by this means it has been preserved, because the memory retained it with ease and certainty; and the names of the parties, once known, recall the whole when repetition is contemplated.

*Adah and Zillah,
Ye wives of Lamech,
Have I slain a man
A young man
If Cain shall be avenged
Much more Lamech*

hear my voice;
hearken to my speech;
in bloody contest,
in violent assault?
seven times,
seventy-seven times.

The first column, if read separately, opens the history; but the second column, by its duplication of phraseology, perfects the series of thoughts, and converts the whole into verses, and poetry. This duplication is so proper to Hebrew poetry, that a Hebrew poet would not be content to say, "Youth and beauty shall be laid in the dust;" but he would singularize these qualities; he would distinguish and repeat them: e. g.

Youth shall be laid in the dust;
And beauty shall be consumed in the grave.

This is more explicit, has greater strength, as well as greater correctness; for beauty is not invariably conjoined with youth; and there is beauty proper to mature life, and even to old age. The ideas, then, are not precisely the same; yet they are so exquisitely similar, that the recollection of one brings the other to mind, instantly. Something like this we have in Isa. lv. 10. He does not say, "As the rain and the snow (plural) descend (plural) from heaven, and thither they (plural) do not return;" but he keeps the entire passage in the singular, and thereby much increases its strength.

Verily, like as the rain descendeth from above,
And the snow descendeth from the heavens;
And thither it doth not return;—
So shall my word be.—

The reader will observe the brevity, the compactness obtained by the poet, in this construction of his verse; to express his thoughts completely requires the insertion of the words marked in italics; yet the omission of these words occasions no confusion, no interruption, because the property of descending from the atmosphere is common both to rain and snow. To the original readers, in the Hebrew language, this was still clearer; yet in translation, similar supplements or repetitions are often necessary to a correct view of the poet's intention. So Balaam says, Micah vi. 5:

Wherewith shall I come before Jehovah?
Wherewith shall I bow myself unto the High God?
Shall I come before him with burnt-offerings?
Shall I bow myself unto him with calves of a year old?

This supplementary repetition gives the sentiment at full; and in very many places of Scripture the critic must observe these elisions of words, and feel them too; though the poet may disregard them; and even deem the critic fastidious. This may be further evinced by an instance in which the supplement is taken, not from a preceding, but from a following, sentence: Samson says,

With the jaw-bone of an ass, heaps upon heaps have I smitten;
With the jaw-bone of an ass, a thousand men have I smitten.

The sense of the first verse is imperfect, till the close of the second verse completes it. There can be no doubt but what this parallelism was esteemed a beauty ; we find it practised by the polite and sagacious Solomon, to a considerable extent, in the preface to his Proverbs ; the intention of which book is, he tells us,

To know wisdom and instruction ;
 To perceive the words of understanding ;
 To receive the instruction of wisdom,
 Justice, and judgment, and equity :
 To give subtilty to the simple ;
 To the young man knowledge and discretion :
 A wise man will hear, and will increase learning ;
 And a man of understanding shall attain unto wise counsels ;
 To understand a proverb, and the interpretation ;
 The words of the wise and their dark sayings.

The ear sufficiently judges, that in these verses there is rhythm, though not rhyme ; consequently there must be in the original, metrical feet, and poetical cadence : though we know not how to demonstrate them, having no adequate information to guide us in the correct pronunciation of the language. If what may be called private, simple, or personal poetry, be metrical, undoubtedly that which was intended for musical accompaniment, was emphatically so ; and especially, when the tune, or air, existed before the poem, the poem was bound to conform to the progress, the extent, and the expression, of the previously fixed notes, or intonations, whether vocal or instrumental ; by these it was absolutely governed. And if such composition were also intended for public performance, by a numerous band, by various instruments playing in concert, the connection between the poetry and the music must needs be intimate and entire. This appears to have been the case, in the instances of several of the psalms ; and as these were performed in two parts, by responsive choirs, and possibly a third part was performed by a still fuller chorus, the necessity of metrical arrangement was imperative ; for, if this were neglected, the whole would present a mass of inexpressibly discordant confusion.

Among those psalms which demonstrate this alternation of song, is the cxxxvi. where the burden, "for his mercy endureth for ever," certainly was not uttered by the same persons, or band, as uttered the leading theme. So we read, Ezra iii. 13, the Levites, &c. sang this song, together, by course, or alternately ; and the people shouted with a great shout when they praised the Lord ; that is, Hallelujah ! Ps. cxxxv. also, evidently was performed in several parts. In short, we find this responsive manner in the time of Moses, who, with the men, sang one part of his ode, while Miriam, with the women, sang the answering strains ; and this, no doubt, continued to be the custom, to the latest period of the Hebrew polity.

Of the longer poems of Sacred Writ, Solomon's Song is a beautiful performance ; while the book of Job, the longest of all the Hebrew poems, is most sublime. Late writers have done much to illustrate it ; yet much remains to be done. We must here conclude these brief and imperfect hints on the subject of Hebrew poetry. Those who desire further information, may consult bishop Hare's Metrical Version of the Psalms, supported by Drs. Grey, Edwards, &c. and opposed by bishop Lowth, whose Lectures on Hebrew Poetry deservedly enjoy an established reputation : to these should be added bishop Jebb's Sacred Literature, sir W. Jones's Dissertation on the Asiatic Poetry, with others.

[The subject of Hebrew poetry is too important to the biblical student, to be passed over with the meagre notice above given. Indeed, of all the fine arts, poetry alone was cultivated among the Hebrews ; and was carried to a high degree of perfection. The poetry of this people was almost wholly lyric ;—whether didactic, sententious, or prophetic, it was still LYRIC. Now the essence of lyric poetry is the vivid expression of internal emotions. It is, therefore, subjective ; in opposition to epic poetry, which treats of external objects, and is therefore objective. The chief subject of Hebrew poetry was religion, and then patriotism ; which, under the theocracy, was very nearly allied to religion. The most obvious and striking characteristic of the poetry of the Hebrews, is sublimity. Religious poetry was in ancient times almost peculiar to the Jews ; the little that is found among other ancient nations, as e. g. the Orphic Hymns, is not worthy of comparison with it. So also the Koran, which is an attempted imitation of the poetical parts of the Old Testament. The present prevailing views of the nature of Hebrew poetry, of its rhythm, &c. were first proposed by bishop Lowth in his Lectures on the Poetry of the Hebrews. (Lect. xviii.—xx.) He was followed by Herder, in his Spirit of Hebrew Poetry ; sir William Jones, on Asiatic Poetry ; and more recently by Thomas Campbell, in the first volumes of the New Monthly Magazine. Mr. Campbell, however, has drawn chiefly from Herder. (See also De Wette's Commentar über die Psalmen, Einleitung.)

Diction and Rhythm.—Hebrew poetry differs from Hebrew prose in three respects. (1.) In the peculiar poetical nature of the contents ; of which the characteristics are sublimity, boldness, abruptness, lofty metaphors, &c. (2.) In the peculiarities of the poetic dialect or diction, which, however, are not so striking as among the Greeks and Romans. They consist in the use of different words, significations of words, grammatical forms ; and in syntactical peculiarities, in which latter the difference is greater than in Latin, or in modern languages. For the most part, the poetical idioms of the Hebrew are the common ones in the kindred dialects, the Chaldee, Syriac and Arabic. This circumstance goes to show the importance of an acquaintance with these latter. (3.) In rhythm, which differs from metre ; the latter importing a measure of syllables or feet, the former a harmonious arrangement of words and members. The question has been much agitated in modern times, whether the Hebrews had any measure of syllables, or prosody, or metre. Josephus and Jerome affirm that they had ; and some have thought they had discovered it. (See De Wette, Einl. § vii.) The best theories on this side are those of Jones and Bellermann ; but something new appears on this general topic, in Germany at least, almost every year. It is, however, the opinion of those best acquainted with the subject, that the Hebrews had no prosody, i. e. no measure of syllables. Their rhythm consisted only in the symmetry or correspondence of the larger members.

Rhythm may be of three species, viz. (1.) It may consist merely in the syllables, or in a succession of poetical feet, as dactyles, &c. without any larger pauses or members. (2.) It may also exist, where the poetical feet or measures of syllables are neglected, but a certain measure of the larger members or clauses is found. This last is the rhythm of the Hebrews ; as also of the old German Meistersingers. (3.) The third and most perfect form of rhythm comprises both the others, and appears in Greek, Roman and modern poetry.

The rhythm of Hebrew poetry, then, consists in the PARALLELISM of the members, (as it is called by Lowth,) of which the fundamental principle is, that every verse must consist of at least two corresponding parts or members. (See Lowth, Lect. xix. De Wette, Einl. §. vii.)

Laws of Parallelism.—The parallelism of Hebrew poetry occurs either in the thought, or solely in the form. Of the former there are three kinds, viz.

1. Synonymous; where the two members express the same idea in different, but closely, and often literally, corresponding words: e. g.

Ps. viii. 4. What is man, that thou art mindful of him?
And the son of man, that thou dost visit him?

ii. 1. Why do the heathen rage?
And the people imagine a vain thing?

ii. 4. He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh;
The Lord shall have them in derision.

Job vi. 5. Doth the wild ass bray when he hath grass?
Or loweth the ox over his fodder?

So also the song of Lamech, quoted above, Gen. iv. 23. and Job vii. 1, seq.

2. Antithetical; where an antithesis of thought is expressed by corresponding members: e. g.

Prov. xiv. 11. The house of the wicked shall be overthrown;
But the tabernacle of the upright shall flourish.

xv. 1. A soft answer turneth away wrath;
But grievous words stir up anger.

(Compare Virgil. Ecl. iii. 8.)

3. Synthetic; which is a mere juxtaposition; or rather the thought is carried forward in the second member with some addition; the correspondence of words and construction being as before: e. g.

Ps. xix. 7. The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul:
The testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple.

8. The statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart:
The commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes.

9. The fear of the Lord is clean, enduring for ever;
The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether.

Mere rhythmical parallelism is that in which no similarity or correspondence of thought exists: but the verse is divided by the cæsura, as it were, into corresponding members. This is the most imperfect species of parallelism; and may be compared with the hexameter, divided by the cæsura: e. g.

Ps. ii. 6. Yet have I set my king Upon my holy hill of Zion.

iii. 2. Many there be which say of my soul,
There is no help for him in God.

This is most common in the book of Lamentations; where there is hardly any other species of parallelism.

Thus far we have had regard to the simplest and most perfect parallelisms of two members; such as are more usually found in the Psalms, Job, &c. But in the prophets and a few of the psalms, we find a less regular, and sometimes compound parallelism. Thus the parallelism is irregular, when one member is shorter than the other; as Hosea iv. 17:

Ephraim is joined to idols:
Let him alone.

Of compound parallelisms there are various kinds; as when the verse has three members; and the two first correspond to the third: e. g.

Ps. liii. 6. O that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion!
When God bringeth back the captivity of his people,
Jacob shall rejoice and Israel shall be glad.

Or when the verse has four members; of which the first and third correspond to the second and fourth: e. g.

Ps. xxxi. 10. For my life is spent with grief,
And my years with sighing;
My strength faileth because of mine iniquity,
And my bones are consumed.

Or the verse may have four parallel members; as

Ps. i. 1. Blessed is the man
Who walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly,
Nor standeth in the way of sinners,
Nor sitteth in the seat of scorners.

We may name Psalms ii. and xv. as affording examples of most of the species of poetic parallelism.

In the common manuscripts and editions of the Hebrew Bible, the members of the parallelisms in the poetical parts are not written or printed separately; but the accents serve to divide them. In the editions of Kennicott and Jahn, however, the members are printed separately. It is matter of regret, that this mode was not adopted in our English version; since the common reader has now often no means of distinguishing, whether that which he reads is Hebrew poetry, or Hebrew prose. Indeed, a good translation ought to adhere closely to the form of the original, and not give it a foreign costume. Hence the mere parallelism should be exhibited, without metre, and generally without accents.

The preceding principles refer solely to the rhythm of Hebrew poetry. Besides this, there are other peculiarities; e. g. the strophe, as in Ps. xlii. xliii; where verses 5, 11, and 5, are a burden or refrain, repeated at the end of each strophe. So also the alphabetic psalms and poems; (see LETTERS); and the psalms of degrees, in which the chief words of each verse are taken up and repeated at the beginning of the next verse. (See DEGREES, and PSALMS.) Paronomasia, or the correspondence of like sounding words, a species of rhyme, occurs seldom in the Psalms; it seems too feeble and trivial for lyric poetry. The prophets employ it more frequently. *R.

POETS. The Hebrew poets were men inspired of God; and among them we find kings, lawgivers and prophets. Moses, Barak, David, Solomon, Hezekiah, Job, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and most of the prophets, composed poems, or pieces in verse; the most pompous, the most majestic, and the most sublime. The expression, the sentiments, the figures, the variety, the action, every thing is surprising.

Paul gives a pagan poet the name of prophet; (Tit.

i. 12, "One of themselves, even a prophet of their own, said," &c.) because, among the heathen, poets were thought to be inspired by Apollo. They spoke by enthusiasm. Oracles were originally delivered in verse. Poets were interpreters of the will of the gods. The poet quoted by Paul, is Epimenides, whom the ancients esteemed to be inspired, and favored by the gods.

The same apostle quotes the poet Aratus, a native, as well as himself, of Cilicia: (Acts xvii. 28.) We are the children (the race) of God. This is part of a longer passage, whose import is, "We must begin from Jupiter, whom we must by no means forget. Every thing is replete with Jupiter. He fills the streets, the public places, and assemblies of men. The whole sea and its harbors are full of this god, and all of us in all places have need of Jupiter." It was certainly not to prove the being or to enhance the merit of Jupiter, that Paul quotes this passage. But he has delivered out of bondage, as we may say, a truth which this poet had uttered, without penetrating its true meaning. The apostle used it to prove the existence of the true God, to a people not convinced of the divine authority of the Scriptures, and who would have rejected such proofs as he might have derived from thence.

The son of Sirach, intent on praising eminent men, enumerates bards or poets; who were, he says, "Leaders of the people by their counsels, and by their knowledge of learning meet for the people; wise and eloquent in their instructions: such as found out musical tunes, and recited verses in writing," Eccles. xlv. 4. It is evident that he considered them as of great importance to the community; and we know that they were of great antiquity, for Moses, himself a poet, refers to those who spoke in proverbs, (Numb. xxi. 27.) of which he inserts a specimen. Jacob was a poet, as appears from his farewell benediction on his sons. And it appears to be extremely probable that the honorable appellation Nebi, equally denoted a prophet, a poet, and a musician, as the poets principally were.

Poets, like other men, could only draw comparisons from objects with which they were conversant; hence we have in Scripture many allusions to the phenomena of nature, as extant in the countries where the writers resided—storms, tempests, earthquakes, thunder and lightning, &c. The shepherd king describes the Lord as his shepherd, who leads him in security; not as his steersman, who brings him safely into port; for he was little acquainted with nautical affairs. Very few are the descriptions of the sea, or its inhabitants, in Job, although the writer ransacks earth and heaven, with wonderful science. Poets who dwell in tents have little reference to extensive architecture. But to understand their language, it is necessary to acquire as intimate a knowledge as possible of the things they knew; and even when they treat of things spiritual or celestial; because these are signified by means of terrestrial objects or incidents; and the just understanding of one may lead to a just understanding of the other. Divine inspiration itself, however superhuman it may be, must, nevertheless, speak to men in the language of men, or the instruction it means to convey will continue a perfect blank.

POMEGRANATE, the punica granatum of Linnæus; called also malum granatum, that is, granate apple, (pomme granate,) whence its name. The tree grows wild in Palestine and Syria, as generally in the south of Europe, and north of Africa. It is low, with a straight stem, reddish bark, many and spreading branches, lancet-formed leaves, bearing large and beautiful red blossoms. The fruit is of the size of an orange, of a tawny brown, with a thick astringent coat, containing abundance of seeds, each enveloped in a distinct, very juicy, crimson coat, whose flavor in a wild state is a pure and very strong acid; but in the cultivated plant, sweet and highly grateful. (Compare Cant. iv. 13; Numb. xiii. 23; Deut. viii. 8.) Artificial pomegranates were also used as ornaments on the robe of the high-priest, (Ex. xxviii. 33.) and also as an architectural ornament, 1 Kings vii. 18. *R.

PONTUS, a province in Asia Minor, having the Euxine sea north, Cappadocia south, Paphlagonia and Galatia west, and the Lesser Armenia and Colchis east. It is thought that Peter preached here, because he addresses his First Epistle to the faithful of this and of the neighboring provinces.

POOR. This word often denotes the humble, afflicted, mean in their own eyes, low in the eyes of God. Not so much a man destitute of the good things of the earth, as a man sensible of his spiritual misery and indigence, who applies for succor to the mercy of God. In this sense the greatest and richest men of the world are level with the poorest, in the eyes of God.

In Exodus xxiii. 3, Moses forbids the judges "to countenance a poor man in his cause;" or as in Lev. xix. 15, "Thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honor the person of the mighty; but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbor." In a word, judge without respect of persons; have only truth and justice before your eyes; consider that you stand in the place of God on the earth.

One of the characters of the Messiah was, to judge the poor, (Ps. lxxii. 2, 4.) and to preach the gospel to them, Isa. xi. 4; Matt. xi. 5. Hence, Jesus chose disciples that were poor, and the greater part of the first believers were really poor men, as we may see in their history.

Solomon says, (Prov. xxii. 2.) "The rich and poor meet together;" they are like each other in one thing—God created them both; and both riches and poverty are of his bestowing. Hence the rich should not be supercilious, nor the poor despondent; both are equal in the eyes of God, Prov. xxix. 13. Amos (viii. 6.) reproaches the Israelites with having sold the poor for a contemptible price; as for shoes and sandals. Probably the rich actually thus sold their poor debtors, for things of no value. James (ii. 1.) seems to carry the obligation of not respecting persons so far as to allow no mark of distinction to persons in power, or in civil dignities, in the public assemblies of religion. But this ought to be understood of an inward preference, and of the sentiments of the heart, rather than of external marks of respect. It is never allowed a Christian to prefer a rich man before a poor man, only because he is rich, and to think better of him, to judge him more worthy of esteem and consideration, rather than he who has not the same advantages of the goods of fortune.

Poverty was considered by the Jews as a great evil and a punishment from God. Job speaks of it as of a prison, and a state of bondage, chap. xxxvi. 8. And Isaiah (xlvi. 10.) compares it to a furnace or crucible, wherein metals are purified. God tried Job and Tobit by poverty: they looked beyond the old covenant; they knew the value of suffering, of humiliation, of indigence; they knew how to make a right use of them, and to convert them to their greatest advantage. They were poor in spirit, in the disposition of their hearts, before God made them suffer actual poverty. Comp. HUMILITY.

Nothing is more earnestly recommended in Scripture than alms and compassion to the poor. Moses would have them admitted to the religious feasts celebrated in the temple, Deut. xvi. 11, 12. He ordered, that in the fields, in the vineyards, and upon the trees, something should be left for them; (Lev. xix. 10; xxiii. 22.) that in the sabbatical years, and the years of jubilee, all should be left for the poor, the widow, and the orphan, Exod. xxiii. 11. He commanded to lend to the poor, and observed, that they should never be wanting in the country, but that the people should always have opportunity to bestow their alms, Deut. xv. 8, 9. That if any pledge were taken from the poor, the lender shall not enter the house to take it by force, (Deut. xxiv. 12, 14.) and that if the poor be forced to give his goods or his clothes, they shall be restored to him at night, that he may have wherewith to cover himself. Our Saviour has carried this point of the law, concerning almsgiving, to its perfection; he practised it himself, recommended it to his disciples, and has inspired his servants with the tenderest charity towards the poor. He advised those who would in earnest become his disciples, to sell all they had, and give to the poor, Matt. xix. 21. He gives excellent rules for practising charity and avoiding vain-glory and ostentation, which otherwise may occasion our losing all the fruits of our charity, Matt. vi. 1—4.

POTIPHAR, an officer of the court of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, (Gen. xxxvii. 36,) general of his troops, according to the Vulgate; but chief of his executioners or body-guards, according to the Hebrew. Potiphar bought Joseph as a slave from the Midianites, who had taken him of his brethren; and seeing all things prosper in his hands, he gave him the superintendance of his whole property. His wife, however, taking an unlawful liking to Joseph, solicited him to the crime of adultery; and, Joseph repulsing her, her love changed into hatred, and she accused him to her husband, who put Joseph into prison; where his delegate, who had charge of the prisoners, transferred this care to Joseph. See JOSEPH.

POTSHERD, a broken fragment, or piece of an earthen vessel; is not a brittle pot only, but a piece of a pot; a pot already broken, Isa. xlv. 9.

POTTER, a maker of earthen vessels, of which there is frequent mention made in Scripture. Jeremiah (xviii. 3,) represents him while at work as sitting on two stones; and Ecclesiasticus (xxxviii. 29, 30.) says, "So doth the potter sitting at his work, and turning the wheel about with his feet; who is always carefully set at his work, and maketh all his work by number; he fashioneth the clay with his arm, and boweth down his strength before his feet." When God would show his dominion over men, and his irresistible power over their hearts, he has recourse to the similitude of a potter, who makes what he pleases of his clay; of this a vessel of honor, of that a vessel of dishonor: now forming it, then breaking it; now preserving it, and then rejecting it. (See Ps. ii. 9; Eccles. xxxiii. 13; Rom. ix. 21; Jer. xviii. 2, 3, &c.)

POTTER'S-FIELD, a piece of ground that was bought with the money for which Judas sold our Saviour Christ, but which he brought back again to the temple. (See ACELDAMA.) It is south of mount Sion, about a stone's cast from the pool of Siloam, and is surrounded by walls, in length seventy cubits, in breadth fifty; and is covered with a vault, with seven openings above, to let down the bodies which are to be there buried.

We read in the Mishna (Tract. de Sanhedr. cap. vi. n. 14, 15.) that they did not allow malefactors, or such as were executed for crimes, to be buried in the tombs of their fathers, except their flesh had first been consumed in other places, appointed for the punishment of such offenders. For this reason, perhaps, Joseph of Arimathea begged the body of Jesus from Pilate that he might deposit it in a private sepulchre, before it could be taken to this public burying-place; where he might have been undistinguished from common criminals.

POVERTY has been sanctified by Christ in his own person, and in that of his parents; in that of his apostles, and of the most perfect of his disciples. Agur besought the Lord to give him neither poverty nor riches, (Prov. xxx. 8.) looking on each extreme as a dangerous rock to virtue. See POOR.

POWER, the ability of performing a thing. It is in a sovereign degree an attribute of Deity. God is all-powerful. It means sometimes a right, privilege, or dignity; (John i. 12.) sometimes absolute authority; (Matt. ix. 6.) sometimes the exertion, or act of power, as of the Holy Spirit, (Eph. i. 19.) of angels, or of human governments, magistrates, &c. (Rom. xiii. 1.) and perhaps it generally includes the idea of dignity, superiority. So the body is sown in weakness, but raised in power, dignity, honor. (For the word power in 1 Cor. xi. 10, see the article VEIL.)

PRAISE is one of the noblest acts of worship, and one which seems to be a direct, simple, unsophisticated dictate of nature; inasmuch that it is wonderful how any possessed of rational powers can omit this delightful duty. If prayer, to which praise is the counterpart, can be neglected; if a sense of wants, necessities, transgressions and dangers, may not be sufficiently strong to excite prayer, yet it is surely very ungrateful not to notice the benefits we have enjoyed or are enjoying. What we are in the actual possession of, ought at least so far to affect us, as to render us grateful to that hand which bestows them, that hand which might bestow far different distributions to us. What character is so odious among men as that of the ungrateful? What so common in respect to God? Those who deny the being of God may, to be sure, withhold thanks for mercies received; but that any who acknowledge the divine attributes should be thus insensible, is most astonishing!

PRAYER, directed to God, is the ordinary conveyance of graces received from him. The prayers of a just man are of great power, Jam. v. 16, 17. The saints under both covenants prayed; Jesus Christ himself, our great example, taught us to pray, to show that thereby we honor God, and draw on ourselves his favors and graces. Paul, in most of his Epistles, entreats the faithful to pray for him; or offers to God his prayers for them.

From the promulgation of the law, the Hebrews did not intermit public prayer in the tabernacle, or in the temple, as opportunity returned. It consisted in offering the evening and morning sacrifices, every day, accompanied by prayers by the priests and Levites in that holy edifice. Every day they offered sacrifices, incense, offerings, and first-fruits; they performed ceremonies for the redemption of the first-born, or the purification of pollutions; in a word, the people came thither from all parts to discharge their vows, and to satisfy their devotions, not only on great and solemn days, but also on ordinary days ; but nothing of this was performed without prayer.

The psalmist (cxix.) says, he prayed to God, or praised him, seven times a day. And, (Ps. lv.) "Evening, and morning, and at noon, will I pray and cry aloud, and he shall hear my voice." Daniel (vi. 10.) bent his knees three times a day, and worshipped the Lord, opening his windows, and turning himself toward Jerusalem. The Levites, appointed to guard the temple, lifted up their hands in the night-time, and encouraged one another to adore the Lord, Ps. cxxxiv. 2. The psalmist says, (Ps. cxix. 62.) that he arose in the middle of the night, to praise the Lord, and Nehemiah (ix. 3.) mentions four hours of prayer on a fast-day.

During the captivity, Ezra, observing that several Jews mingled foreign terms with their prayers, which were not suitable to the sanctity of that exercise, composed eighteen benedictions, which every Israelite is obliged to learn, and to repeat daily. A little before the destruction of the temple, the rabbi Gamaliel added a nineteenth, against apostates and heretics ; under these names meaning the Christians. Ezra also fixed the time for prayer, according to Maimonides.

In the Jewish prayers we observe, in general, their length, and their battology, or tedious repetitions, which Christ reproves : (Matt. vi. 7.) "When ye pray, use not vain repetitions as the heathen do ; for they think they shall be heard for their much speaking." Secondly, as to their posture. They generally pray sitting, or stooping with their faces toward the ground. They stretch out their feet and their hands, and make a loud cry. Christ prayed thus in the garden of Olives : "Who in the days of his flesh, when he had offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears," Heb. v. 7. Thirdly, they think that prayers supply the place of sacrifices, which ceased at the destruction of the temple and its altars ; they give them the same name, and impute to them the same efficacy.

It is very likely that the prayers of the first Christians were formed on the model of those of the Jews. In the Lord's prayer, our Saviour principally intended to oppose its brevity to their battology. Paul (Ephes. vi. 18 ; 1 Thess. v. 17 ; 1 Tim. ii. 8.) directs that believers should pray in all places, and at all times, lifting up pure hands towards heaven, and blessing God for all things, whether in eating, drinking, or any other action ; and that every thing be done to the glory of God, 1 Cor. x. 31. In a word, our Saviour has recommended to us to pray without ceasing, Luke xviii. 1 ; xxi. 36.

PREDESTINATION, To PREDESTINATE, sometimes signifies merely a designation, or appointment of a particular thing to a particular use ; or of a certain person to a certain office or employment. But, in theological language, predestination expresses the design formed by God, from all eternity, of bringing by his grace certain persons to faith and salvation, while he leaves others to their infidelity. Divines agree, that predestination to salvation is of mere favor, but opinions are divided concerning it. Some regard it as merely gratuitous ; others believe that God formed his predestination on a view of future merits in the elect. Austin, and the most celebrated schools of the Latin church, hold predestination to be of mere favor. Some Greek fathers, and some Latin divines, adhere to predestination founded on foreknowledge. Augustin says, predestination is a foreknowledge and preparation of efficacious means, in virtue of which, the elect are most certainly saved ; and he was fully persuaded of the gratuitousness of predestination, in its uttermost extent.

The ancient Hebrews were persuaded, as well as we are, that God had foreknowledge of what every person should be, do and become. This is included in the very notion of God, his providence, and his infinite knowledge. God says to Jeremiab, (i. 5.) "Before I formed thee in the belly, I knew thee ; and before thou camest forth out of the womb, I sanctified thee, and I ordained thee a prophet unto the nations." But when we endeavor to form a just idea of their system of predestination, and how they reconciled grace and free-will, the attempt is not very easy. The author of the book of Wisdom, whom several have thought to be Philo, make Solomon thus speak : (chap. viii. 19, 20.) "I was a witty child, and had a good spirit : yea, rather, being good, I came into a body undefiled." The apostles (John ix. 2.) proposed a question to Christ, when they saw a man born blind, whether his condition was as a punishment for his own sins, or for those of his parents. They therefore had a notion, that his soul had a previous existence, and had offended God, before it animated the present body.

Chrysostom, who may be considered as the oracle and the mouth of the Greek church, maintained, that God did not reject nor predestinate men on account of their past good or bad actions, but on foreknowledge of their future merits or demerits : "Whence is it (says he, on Rom. ix. 13.) that Jacob is beloved, and Esau hated ? It is because one is good, and the other is bad. And whence is it, that, before their birth, God determined that the elder should be in subjection to the younger ? It is because God has no need to stay for the event of things, as we must do, to judge whether a man shall be good or bad ; he sees that even before he is born. It was by the effect of his prescience, that he chose Jacob and rejected Esau. He knew before their birth what they would one day prove. When he chose Matthew, there were several persons who appeared better than he : but by his infinite penetration, he knew how to discover the value of that jewel, that then lay upon a dunghill." In another place (Homil. lxxx. in Matt. xxv.) he says, that the kingdom of heaven was prepared for the elect from the beginning of the world, and before they were born, because God foreknew what they would be. And writing on those words of the psalmist, (cxxxix. 2.) "Thou understandest my thought afar off;" he thus reasons : Some people are absurd enough to say, such an one is a good man, because God has chosen him and loved him ; and such another is wicked, because God hated him. But the prophet here tells us, on the contrary, that God proves us by our works. He knows whether we will be virtuous or no, even before our birth ; and by that he gives us proofs of his prescience : he confirms it by our works, for fear it should be imagined, that his prescience was the cause of our virtue.

The Greek fathers, after Chrysostom, have expressed themselves much in the same manner, and the modern Greeks have followed the sentiments of the fathers before them.

This, however, is a very difficult subject. We may certainly conclude, that when God proposes an end, he also proposes the means ; when he appoints an effect, he also appoints the causes. Now where is the essential difference, if we say, God foresaw the elect would be holy, therefore chose them ; or

God chose the elect, to make them holy? because since their holiness is not from themselves, but from him, he must determine to bestow on them that which they have not of themselves. The difference, therefore, is in the order only, that is, whether God determined to elect A. B., purposing his holiness, or determined to make A. B. holy, purposing his election. But observe, that God's determination to render A. B. holy is, in fact, an election of him; an election which implies salvation; and since this principle places an election of the party previous to its effects, it seems to be much more reasonable than contingency in any shape. Especially, considering that all things are known to God, from the beginning to the end, so that he has no need to stay till a certain event has taken place before he can adjust the following event, but in his divine, infinite and intimate foreknowledge of things, that which is to follow is equally present with him, as that which is to precede. And, doubtless, we had better on this subject not only think and speak with the most profound reverence, feeling our ignorance, and our scanty powers; but endeavor to persuade ourselves thoroughly of the infinite goodness, wisdom and love of God, and bind ourselves to submit heartily to these attributes, and their operations, rather than to perplex ourselves, and to render ourselves unhappy, about appointments whose concatenation and universal influence are infinitely beyond our ken. If we see one single link in the chain of the divine government, considered as compounded of cause and effect, what proportion does this bear to that infinitely prolonged combination of things, of which the divine mind only is capable of surveying at once both the extremes, and, together with the extremes, every connecting link, every acting cause, and every produced effect, from the most trivial, as we call it, to the most considerable, in our estimation! We say, in our estimation, because there is no lesser and greater in the sight of God; but each, being appointed by him, is of equal consequence in his appointment, and is equally valued by his infinite wisdom.

PRESS. This word is often used in Scripture not only for the machine by which grapes are squeezed, but also for the vessel, or vat, into which the wine runs from the press; that in which it is received and preserved. Whence proceed these expressions: he digged a wine-press in his vineyard;—your presses shall run over with wine; thy presses shall burst out with new wine; to draw out of the press; Zech they strew at the wine-press of Zech. It was a kind of subterraneous cistern, in which the wine was received and kept, till it was put into jars or vessels, of earth or wood.

We read in several titles of the Psalms, as viii. lxxxii. lxxxiv. "for the presses," (on Githith, Eng. tr.) which is differently explained. Some think that these Psalms are songs of rejoicing for the vintage, and were chiefly sung at the Feast of Tabernacles, after the harvest and the vintage. Others suppose, that githith signifies an instrument of music, invented or used, perhaps, at Gath, and hence called Githith. See the article GITHITH.

PRETORIUM, a name given in the Gospels to the house in which dwelt the Roman governor of Jerusalem, Mark xv. 16. (Compare Matt. xxvii. 27; John xviii. 28, 33.) Here he sat in his judicial capacity, and here Jesus was brought before him. This was properly the palace of Herod at Jerusalem, near the tower of Antonia, with which it had communication. Here the Roman procurators resided whenever they visited Jerusalem; their head-quarters being properly at Cesarea. The pretorium or palace of Herod (Engl. tr. judgment hall) at Cesarea is also mentioned, Acts xxiii. 35. (See Joseph Antiq. xv. 9. 3.) Paul speaks also of the pretorium (or palace) at Rome, in which he gave testimony to Christ, Phil. i. 13. Some think, that by this he means the palace of the emperor Nero; and others, that he means the place where the Roman prætor sat to administer justice, that is, his tribunal. It is certain that the emperor's palace did not bear the name of tribunal; but Paul, being accustomed to call by this name the governor's palace at Jerusalem, might give it to the emperor's at Rome. Others have maintained, with greater probability, that under the name of the pretorium at Rome, Paul would express the camp of the pretorian soldiers, whither he might have been carried by the soldier that always accompanied him, and who was fastened to him by a chain, as the manner was among the Romans.

PRICKS. The Greek word ζέρινον signifies properly a stimulus, a goad, with which oxen were driven from behind. Hence the proverbial expression, πρός ζέρινον λακτίζειν, to kick against the goad, applied to those who rashly offer resistance to one who is more powerful than themselves, and thus expose themselves to severe retribution, Acts ix. 5; xxvi. 14. The expression is common to the Greeks, Romans and Hebrews, e. g. Pindar, Pyth. ii. 193. Æschyl. Agam. 1633. Eurip. Bacch. 791. Terent. Phormio i. 2. 27. Ammian. Marcell. xviii. 5. (See Kninoel on Acts ix. 5.) *R.

PRIDE is a sin very odious to God and man, and Scripture condemns it in a multitude of places. What, indeed, is displayed in the whole sacred history but the pride, presumption and vanity of men overthrown? What else, but the humility, the meekness, the acknowledgment of human weakness, exalted, supported and recompensed. "God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble. A man's pride shall bring him low; but honor shall uphold the humble in spirit. Pride goeth before destruction; and a haughty spirit before a fall. Better is it to be of a humble spirit with the lowly, than to divide the spoil with the proud."

"Pride" is also put for the hardness and insolence of a sinner, in opposition to sins of infirmity or ignorance: "But the soul that doeth aught presumptuously, the same reproacheth the Lord; and that soul shall be cut off from among his people," Numb. xv. 30. And Deut. xvii. 12, "And the man that will do presumptuously, and will not hearken unto the priest, or unto the judge, even that man shall die." The Lord treated the Egyptians with rigor, because they acted with pride and insolence toward the Hebrews, Exod. xviii. 11. Job and the psalmist have distinguished Pharaoh by the name of the proud, (Job xxvi. 12; Ps. lxxxix. 10.) and Isaiah (li. 9.) uses the same expression, to mark his destruction. Ezekiel says (xxxii. 12.) the Chaldeans shall destroy the pride, the insolence, the cruelty of Egypt. (See Neh. ix. 16, 29.)

Scripture reproaches the Moabites with their pride; and points them out under the name of children of haughtiness, or pride; for so we translate Numb. xxiv. 17, "He shall destroy all the children of pride," (Eng. Sheth;) or haughtiness; which is confirmed by Jer. xlvi. 29, "We have heard the pride of Moab, (he is exceeding proud,) his loftiness and his arrogance, and his pride and the haughtiness of his heart." (Comp. Numb. xxi. 28, with Jer. xlvi. 45. Heb. Also Isa. xvi. 6.)

that river, Jer. xii. 5; xiii. 9; xlix. 19; Zech. xi. 3. See JORDAN.

The pride and the proud often represent Babylon and the Babylonians; Isa. xiii. 19, "And Babylon, the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah." Jeremiah, (1. 31, 32.) speaking of the king of Babylon, says, "Behold, I am against thee, O thou most proud, saith the Lord of hosts; for the day is come, the time that I will visit thee. And the most proud shall stumble and fall, and none shall raise him up: and I will kindle a fire in his cities, and it shall devour all round about him." (See Ps. cxix. 21, 51, 69, 78, 85, 122.)

PRIEST, from the Greek, Presbyter, properly signifies an elder, or old man. The Hebrew is כהן, Cohen. In the Old Testament, the priesthood was not annexed to a certain family, till after the promulgation of the law by Moses. Before that time, the first-born of each family, the fathers, the princes, the kings were born priests, in their own cities, and in their own houses. Cain and Abel, Noah, Abraham and Job, Abimelech and Laban, Isaac and Jacob, offered, personally, their own sacrifices. In the solemnity of the covenant made by the Lord with his people, at the foot of mount Sinai, Moses performed the office of mediator, and young men were chosen from among Israel to perform the office of priests, Exod. xxv. 5, 6. But after the Lord had chosen the tribe of Levi to serve him in his tabernacle, and the priesthood was annexed to the family of Aaron, then the right of offering sacrifice to God was reserved to the priests of this family, Numb. xvi. 40. The punishment of Uzziah, king of Judah, (2 Chron. xxvi. 19.) is well known, who, having presumed to offer incense to the Lord, was suddenly smitten with a leprosy. However, it seems that on certain occasions the judges and kings of the Hebrews offered sacrifice to the Lord, especially before a constant place of worship was fixed at Jerusalem. See 1 Sam. vii. 9, where Samuel, who was no priest, offered a lamb for a burnt-sacrifice to the Lord. See also chap. ix. 13, where it is said, that this prophet was to bless the offering of the people; which should seem to be a function appropriate to a priest. Lastly, 1 Sam. xvi. 5, he goes to Bethlehem, where he offers a sacrifice at the anointing of David.

Saul himself offered a burnt-offering to the Lord, perhaps as being king of Israel, 1 Sam. xiii. 9, 10. Elijah also offered a burnt-offering on mount Carmel, 1 Kings xviii. 33. David sacrificed at the ceremony of bringing the ark to Jerusalem, (2 Sam. vi. 13.) and at the floor of Araunah, 2 Sam. xxiv. 25. And Solomon went up to the brazen altar at Gibeon, and there offered sacrifices, 2 Chron. i. 6. We know that such passages are commonly explained, by supposing that these princes offered their sacrifices by the hands of the priests; but the text by no means favors such explication; and it is very natural to imagine, that in the quality of kings and heads of the people, they had the privilege of performing some sacerdotal functions on certain extraordinary occasions. So we see David consulted the Lord, by the priestly ephod; and on another occasion he gave a solemn benediction to the people. His son Solomon did the same, 1 Sam. xxiii. 9; xxx. 7; 2 Sam. vi. 14, 18; 1 Kings viii. 55, 56.

The Lord having reserved to himself the first-born of Israel, because he had preserved them from the hand of the destroying angel in Egypt, by way of exchange and compensation, he accepted the tribe of Levi for the service of his tabernacle, Numb. iii. 41. Thus the whole tribe of Levi was appointed to the sacred ministry, but not all in the same manner; for of the three sons of Levi, Gershom, Kohath and Merari, the heads of the three great families, the Lord chose the family of Kohath, and out of this family the house of Aaron, to exercise the functions of the priesthood. All the rest of the family of Kohath, even the children of Moses, and their descendants, remained among the Levites.

The high-priest was at the head of all religious affairs, and was the ordinary judge of all difficulties that belonged thereto, and even of the general justice and judgment of the Jewish nation, Deut. xvii. 8—12; xix. 17; xxi. 5; xxxiii. 9, 10; Ezek. xlv. 24. He only had the privilege of entering the sanctuary once a year, on the day of solemn expiation, to make atonement for the sins of the whole people, Lev. xvi. 2, &c. He was to be born of one of his own tribe, whom his father had married a virgin; and was to be exempt from corporal defect, Lev. xxi. 13. In general, no priest who had any defect of this kind could offer sacrifice, or enter the holy place, to present the shew-bread. But he was to be maintained by the sacrifices offered at the tabernacle, Lev. xxi. 22.

God had appropriated to the person of the high-priest the oracle of his truth: so that when he was habited in the proper ornaments of his dignity, and with the urim and thummim, he answered questions proposed to him, and God discovered to him secret and future things. He was forbidden to mourn for the death of any of his relations, even for his father or mother; or to enter into any place where a dead body lay, that he might not contract, or hazard the contraction of uncleanness. He could not marry a widow, nor a woman who had been divorced, nor a harlot; but a virgin only of his own race. He was to observe a strict continence during the whole time of his service.

The ordinary priests served immediately at the altar, killed, skinned and offered the sacrifices. They kept up a perpetual fire on the altar of burnt-sacrifices, and in the lamps of the golden candlestick in the sanctuary: they kneaded the loaves of shew-bread, baked them, offered them on the golden altar in the sanctuary, and changed them every sabbath day. Every day, night and morning, a priest, appointed by casting of lots at the beginning of the week, brought into the sanctuary a smoking censer of incense, and set it on the golden table, otherwise called the altar of incense.

The priests were not suffered to offer incense to the Lord with strange fire; that is, with any fire but what was taken from the altar of burnt-sacrifices, Lev. x. 1, 2. God chastised Nadab and Abihu with severity for having failed in this. The priests and Levites waited by the week, and by the quarter, in the temple. They began their week on the sabbath, and ended it on the next sabbath, 2 Kings xi. 5, 7. Moses fixed the age at which they were to enter on the sacred ministry at twenty-five or thirty years, and they were to end it at fifty, Numb. viii. 24; iv. 3; 1 Chron. xxiii. 24; 2 Chron. xxxi. 17; Ezra iii. 8. Those who dedicated themselves to perpetual service in the temple, were well received, and maintained by the daily offerings, Deut. xviii. 6—8.

The Lord had given no lands of inheritance to the tribe of Levi, in the Land of Promise. He intended that they should be supported by the tithes, the first-fruits, the offerings made in the temple, and by their share of the sin-offerings and thanksgiving-offerings, sacrificed in the temple; of which certain parts were appropriated to them. In the peace-offerings they had the shoulder and the breast; (Lev. vii. 33, 34.) in the sin-offerings they burnt on the altar the fat that covers the bowels, the liver and the kidneys; the rest belonged to themselves, Lev. vii. 6, 10. The skin or fleece of every sacrifice also belonged to them; and this alone was no mean allowance. When an Israelite killed any animal for his own use, he was to give the priest the shoulder, the stomach and the jaws, Deut. xviii. 3. He had also a share of the wool when sheep were shorn, Deut. xviii. 4. All the first-born, both of man and beast, belonged to the Lord, that is, to his priests. The men were redeemed for five shekels, Numb. xviii. 15, 16. The first-born of impure animals were redeemed or exchanged. The clean animals were not redeemed, but were sacrificed to the Lord, their blood being sprinkled about the altar; the rest belonged to the priest. The first-fruits of trees, that is, those of the fourth year, belonged also to the priests, Numb. xvi. 13 Lev. xix. 23, 24.

The people offered at the temple the first-fruits of the earth; the quantity being fixed by custom to between the fortieth and sixtieth part. They offered also whatever any one had vowed to the Lord. They gave also to the priests and Levites an allowance out of their kneaded dough. They also had the tithes of the fruits of the land, and of all animals which passed under the shepherd's crook, Lev. xxvii. 31, 32. When the Levites had collected all the tithes and all the first-fruits, they set apart the tithes of this for the priests, Numb. xviii. 26. Thus, though the priests had no lands or inheritances, they lived in great plenty. God also provided them houses and accommodations, by appointing forty-eight cities for their residence, Numb. xxxv. 1-3. In the precincts of these cities they possessed a thousand cubits beyond the walls. Of these forty-eight cities, six were appointed as cities of refuge, for those who had committed casual and involuntary manslaughter. The priests had thirteen of these cities; the others belonged to the Levites, Josh. xxi. 10.

A principal employment of the priests, next to attending on the sacrifices and the temple service, was the instruction of the people, and the deciding of controversies; distinguishing the several sorts of leprosy, divorce causes, the waters of jealousy, vows, causes relating to the law and uncleanness, &c. "For the priest's lips should keep knowledge, and they should seek the law at his mouth: for he is the messenger of the Lord of hosts," Mal. ii. 7. They publicly blessed the people in the name of the Lord. In time of war their duty was to carry the ark of the covenant, to consult the Lord, to sound the holy trumpets, and to encourage the army, Numb. x. 8, 9; Deut. xx. 2.

The consecration of Aaron and of his sons was performed by Moses in the desert with great solemnity, he performing the office of consecrating priest, Exod. xl. 12; Lev. viii. It is doubtful whether at every new consecration of a high-priest all these ceremonies were repeated. It is probable they contented themselves with clothing the new high-priest in the habit of his predecessor, as at the death of Aaron, Numb. xx. 25, 26. Yet some think they gave him unction also, which might be till the Babylonish captivity, though there is no proof of the fact. We know, that after this, Jonathan the Asmonean contented himself with putting on the high-priest's habit at the Feast of Tabernacles, in order to take possession of this dignity, 1 Mac. x. 21. (Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 5.)

As to the ordinary priests, we know not of any particular ceremony used at their consecration. They were admitted to the exercise of their function by "filling their hands," as Scripture speaks; that is, by making them perform the offices of their order. Nor is it certain whether any thing was required more than ordinary sanctification, that is, exemption from legal defilements and uncleanness. But when the priests had fallen away from the Lord, or had been long without performing their office, (as under some of the later kings of Judah, as Ahaz, Amon and Manasseh,) they thought it necessary to sanctify again such absentee priests. This happened under Hezekiah and Josiah; when the number of them that were sanctified not being sufficient for the great number of sacrifices offered, they were forced to employ the Levites in flaying the sacrifices; for the Levites were much sooner sanctified than the priests, 2 Chron. xxix. 34; xxxv. 11. The Hebrew reads, "For the Levites were upright of heart, to sanctify themselves, rather than the priests;" that is, they showed more zeal and readiness.

The Hebrew priesthood passed from the family of Ithamar into that of Eleazar, as the Lord had declared to the high-priest Eli, 1 Sam. ii. 30. (See ELI.) But the family of Eli possessed it long. This high-priest was succeeded by his third son Ahitub, or, according to others, Ahijah, to whom succeeded Ahimelech, slain by Saul, with the other priests at Nob. Saul then gave the high-priesthood to Zadoc. But Abiathar, son of Ahimelech, having adhered to the interests of David, was continued in possession of the high-priesthood in the kingdom of Judah. So that for a good part of David's reign, the high-priesthood was exercised by two high-priests, Zadoc and Abiathar; Zadoc of the family of Eleazar; Abiathar of the family of Ithamar. Towards the end of David's reign, Abiathar having adhered to the party of Adonijah against Solomon, he was disgraced and, Zadoc alone was acknowledged as high-priest. He then began to exercise his high-priesthood at Jerusalem, having before only performed the functions of it on the altar at Gibeon, 1 Kings ii. 26, 27; 1 Chron. xvi. 39.

The Hebrew word cohen, which signifies priest, is sometimes used for a prince. In Exod. ii. 16, it is said that Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, was priest (כהן, cohen) of Midian; that is, according to some, prince, or governor, of his city. In 2 Sam. viii. 18, it is said, the sons of David were priests, (cohenim), that is, princes; and considered in the country as priests. The Septuagint say, they were ἄρχοντες, principal courtiers; chiefs of the court. The author of the first book of Chronicles (xviii. 17.) explains this, by saying, they were the nearest at the king's hand. They had the chief employments at court.

The Christian priesthood is the substance and truth, of which that of the Jews was but a shadow and figure. Christ, the everlasting priest, according to the order of Melchisedec, abides for ever, as Paul observes; whereas the priests, according to the order of Aaron, were mortal, and therefore could not continue long, Heb. vii. 23, &c. The Lord, to express to the Hebrews what great favors he would confer on them, says he would make them kings and priests, Exod. xix. 6. And Peter repeats this promise to Christians, or rather he tells them, that they are in truth what Moses promised to Israel, 1 Pet. ii. 9. (See also Rev. i. 6.)

79. Jesus, son of Gamaliel; the same year, A. M. 4067.
80. Matthias, son of Theophilus; made in A. M. 4068, till 4073, A. D. 70.
81. Phannias, son of Samuel; made in A. M. 4073, A. D. 70; which is the year of the destruction of the temple of Jerusalem by the Romans, and of the abolition of the Jewish priesthood.

PRIESTHOOD. We may distinguish four kinds of priesthood. (1.) That of kings, princes, heads of families, and the first-born. This may be called a natural priesthood, because nature and reason teach us, that the honor of offering sacrifices to God should belong to the most mature in understanding, and the greatest in dignity. (2.) The priesthood, according to the order of Melchisedec, which does not differ from that now mentioned, but in its dignity; because Melchisedec was raised up of God to represent the priesthood of Jesus Christ. Or the priesthood of Melchisedec combined in the same person the right of the kingly and of the priestly offices, with that of the first-born, to exercise the priesthood; or he was at once king, priest and prophet, that is, authoritative teacher, in every sense of the term. (See MELCHISEDEC.) (3.) The priesthood of Aaron and his family, which subsisted as long as the religion of the Jews. (4.) The priesthood of Jesus Christ, and of the new law, which is infinitely superior to all others, in its duration, its dignity, its prerogatives, its object, and its power. The priesthood of Aaron was to end, but that of Jesus Christ is everlasting. That of Aaron was limited to his own family, was exercised only in the temple, and among only one people; its object was bloody sacrifices and purifications, which were only external, and could not remit sins; but the priesthood of Jesus Christ includes the entire Christian church, spread over the face of the whole earth, and among all nations of the world. The Epistle to the Hebrews should be considered by those who would comprehend the excellence of the priesthood of the new law above that of the law of Moses, Heb. iv. 14, &c. also chap. v.—ix. (See 1 Pet. ii. 5—9.)

PRINCE is sometimes taken for the chief, the principal; as the princes of the families, of the tribes, of the houses of Israel; the princes of the Levites, of the people, of the priests; the princes of the synagogue, or assembly; the princes of the children of Reuben, of Judah, &c. Also, for the king, the sovereign of a country, and his principal officers: the princes of the army of Pharaoh; Plichol, prince of the army of Abimelech; Potiphar was prince or chief of the executioners or guards of the king of Egypt; and Joseph was in prison with the prince of the bakers, &c. The prince of the priests sometimes denotes the high-priest actually in office, (2 Mac. iii. 4; Matt. xxvi. 57.) or he who had formerly possessed this dignity. Sometimes, he who was at the head of the priests, waiting in the temple; (Jer. xx. 1; xxix. 25—27; 2 Chron. xxxv. 8.) or an intendant of the temple, or the head of the sacerdotal families. The prince of the city had in the city the same authority as the intendant of the temple had in the temple: he took care of the preservation of the peace, and good order, 2 Chron. xviii. 25; xxxiv. 8. The prince of this world is the devil, who boasts of having all the kingdoms of the earth at his disposal, John xii. 31; xiv. 30; xvi. 11.

PRISCA, or PRISCILLA, (2 Tim. iv. 19.) a Christian woman, well known in the Acts, and in Paul's Epistles; sometimes placed before her husband Aquila. Their house was so thoroughly Christianized, that Paul calls it a church. From Ephesus they went to Rome, where they were when this apostle wrote his Epistle to the Romans, A. D. 58. In chap. xvi. 5, he salutes them first, with great commendations. They returned into Asia some time afterwards, and Paul, writing to Timothy, desires him to salute them on his account, 2 Tim. iv. 19, A. D. 65. It is thought they died here. See AQUILA.

PROCHORUS, or PROCORUS, one of the first seven deacons, Acts vi. 5.

PRODIGAL, profuse, wasteful, extravagant. The reader, no doubt, has always discerned tenderness and affection in the manner in which the father, in the parable of the Prodigal Son, (Luke xv.) receives the young man, his son, when returning home; but the honor implied in some circumstances of his reception, acquires additional spirit, from an occurrence recorded by major Rooke. English readers, observing the "music and dancing," heard by the elder son, are ready to imagine that the family, or a part of it, was dancing to the music, because such would be the case among ourselves; whereas, the fact is, that not only a band of music, but a band of dancers also, according to eastern usage, was hired, whose agility was now entertaining the numerous company of friends, invited by the father on this joyful occasion. This, then, is an additional expression of honor done the prodigal; and to our Lord's auditory, would convey the idea, not merely of the delight expressed by the father on his son's arrival, but also, that he treated him as if he had come back from some honorable pilgrimage; (as from Mecca, in the subjoined extract; for so we find Hadje Cassim acting on account of his son's arrival from thence;) that he forgot his misbehavior in going away, and felt only his wisdom in returning; that besides treating him with the best in the house, he had put himself to further expenses, and had introduced him honorably, not only to his family again, but to his friends around, whom he had assembled to grace his reception. "Hadje Cassim, who is a Turk, and one of the richest merchants in Cairo, had interceded in my behalf with Ibrahim Bey, at the instance of his son, who had been on a pilgrimage to Mecca, and came from Juddah in the same ship with me. The father, in celebration of his son's return, gave a most magnificent fête on the evening of the day of my captivity, and, as soon as I was released, sent to invite me to partake of it; and I accordingly went. His company was very numerous, consisting of three or four hundred Turks, who were all sitting on sofas and benches, smoking their long pipes; the room in which they were assembled was a spacious and lofty hall, in the centre of which was a band of music, composed of five Turkish instruments, and some vocal performers; as there were no ladies in the assembly, you may suppose it was not the most lively party in the world; but being new to me, was for that reason entertaining." (Travels in Arabia Felix, page 104.) This, too, adds a spirit to the elder brother's expression: "Thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends:"—and as this fête was given in the evening, it agrees with the circumstance of the elder brother's return from the field; implying, no doubt, his labors there, which certainly are not forgotten by himself, when he says, "These many years do I serve thee." Now, if the Jews were alluded to in the person of the elder son, we may see how characteristic this language is of that nation; and if the Gentiles were meant by the prodigal, it cannot be displeasing to us, who are Gentiles by nature, to form a higher estimate than heretofore of the honors bestowed on that disobedient wanderer by his father.

PROFANE. (See DEFILE, and HOLY.) When Jerusalem is compared to the temple, the soil of the city is called profane; (Ezek. xlviii. 15.) that is, appointed to common uses, and for a habitation of laics. In 2 Mac. xii. 23, the heathen that composed the army of Timotheus, are called profane; and Paul marks as profane such novel words and expressions as are needlessly introduced into religion, 1 Tim. vi. 20. To profane the temple, to profane the sabbath, to profane the altar, are common expressions, to denote the violation of the repose of the sabbath; the entering of foreigners into the temple; irreverences committed there; impious sacrifices offered on the altar of the Lord, &c. To profane the statutes, or the commandments of God, is to transgress and violate them, Ps. lxxxix. 31. To profane the covenant, or promises sworn to by an oath, is to frustrate them, or not perform them, Ps. lxxxix. 34.

PROMISE, a declaration, or assurance of some future good. The word is, in the New Testament, usually taken for the promises made by God to Abraham and the patriarchs, to send them the Messiah. In this sense Paul commonly uses it, Gal. iii. 16; Rom. iv. 13. et passim. In Acts vii. 17, the time of the promise, is the time of the coming of the Messiah. The children of the promise are, first, the Israelites descended from Isaac, in opposition to the Ishmaelites descended from Ishmael and Hagar; (Rom. ix. 8; Gal. iv. 28.) secondly, the Jews converted to Christianity, in opposition to the unbelieving Jews. Christians enjoy the promises made to the patriarchs, from which the unbelieving Jews have fallen. The Holy Spirit of promise, which Christians have received, (Eph. i. 13.) is that which God has promised to those who believe, and which is the pledge of their everlasting happiness. The first commandment with promise, (Eph. vi. 2.) is, "Honor thy father and thy mother;" to which God has subjoined this promise, "Their days shall be multiplied on the earth." The promises, in general, denote eternal life, which is the object of a Christian's hope, Heb. xi. 13. The ancient patriarchs were heirs of the promises by their faith and their patience, Heb. vi. 12. All the promises of God are accomplished and fulfilled in Jesus Christ, 2 Cor. i. 20.

The word promise is sometimes taken in our English version for the thing promised, as well as for the terms in which the engagement to confer a favor is made. So we read, (Heb. xi. 13.) that the patriarchs died in faith, "not having received the promises;" whereas they certainly had received the promises, but not the things promised; and this is the more unfortunate, in this place, as we read immediately afterwards, that "Abraham had received the promises," that is, the birth of his son and heir, Isaac.

Promises always refer to future good; and in this they differ from threatenings, which always refer to evil: they differ also, inasmuch as threatenings may be alleviated; but promises must be fulfilled. No man would claim the execution of threatenings; but a promise gives a right of claim to the party to be benefited. The fulfilment of promises may be delayed, as that which assured Abraham of posterity: they may be executed by means not apparent at the time. Man should be extremely cautious in making promises, lest he may fail in power to accomplish them; not so God, who has all power, at all times, and cannot be taken unprepared.

PROOF, trial, temptation. God proved the Israelites to see if they would walk in his ways, Exod.

xx. 20. After he had proved them and afflicted them, he had pity on them, Deut. viii. 16. As gold and silver are tried in the furnace, so God proves the heart, Prov. xvii. 3.

PROPHECY, the foretelling of such events as could be known only to God. It is beyond dispute that there is a Power which governs the world; which raises one family to the throne, and one nation to the supremacy; and then, when this has answered the purposes for which it was exalted, transfers the sceptre of rule to a stranger, and produces, from obscurity into reputation and splendor, another person, or another people; maintains this also, during its appointed time, and when that time is expired, suffers it gradually to decay; or directs a new ambition to wrest from its enfeebled hand, and its palsied head, the ensigns of royalty, and the tokens of dignity.

It is said, "Kingdoms rise and fall by accident;" and it is asked, "If no superior power interfered, would not their changes be just the same?" It is sufficient for us, without adverting to what might be, to answer, by what is; and this subject deserves attention. We have seen infidel writers criticise books they had not read, (or had read years ago, and so criticise by memory; or had read them so superficially, as scarcely amounts to a reading,) and then retail unfounded observations and dogmatical remarks on what they should (by way of answer) be entreated first to understand.

We maintain, that if we find certain events predicted, long before they happened; if they be so clearly described, that when completed, the description determinately applies to the subject; if they be related by persons entirely unconcerned in the events, and expecting to be removed from the stage of life long before they take place; then we demonstrate that some power superior to humanity has been pleased to impart so much of its designs, and counsels, as are referred to in such predictions. And where is the unfitness of this? May not a king, if he please, acquaint a person with his intention, that after such an one has been governor of a province for so many years, he designs to send such another to be governor after him? or that after A has held such an office during his appointed time, B shall succeed him? If this be nothing startling, or uncommon, in human concerns, let us see how this simple idea applies to the divine government of the world. One clear instance may justify this statement; and this instance we select from the prophet Daniel, because its coincidence with history is unquestionable; but other subjects are capable of the same enumerative demonstration: we say demonstration; for who, by the power of mere human faculties, could foresee such contingencies?

INSTANCE OF PROPHECY COMPARED WITH HISTORY :

THE CHIEF INCIDENTS ONLY BEING SELECTED, AND NUMBERED.

Prophecy of Four Kingdoms, represented by Four Beasts.

Corresponding Events, in their Historical Order.

THE FIRST BEAST.

ASSYRIAN EMPIRE.

1. A lion,
2. having eagle's wings;
3. the wings were plucked.

1. The Babylonian empire;
2. Nineveh, &c. added to it—but
3. Nineveh was almost destroyed at the fall of Sardanapalus;

4. it was raised from the ground,
5. and made to stand on the feet as a man,
6. and a man's heart [intellect] was given to it.
Dan. chap. iv.

THE SECOND BEAST.

1. A ram,
2. which had two horns,
3. both high,
4. but one higher than the other,
5. the highest came up last ;
6. the ram pushed north, west, south,
7. did as he pleased, and became great.

THE THIRD BEAST.

1. A he goat
2. came from the west,
3. gliding swiftly over the earth ;
4. ran unto the ram in the fury of his power,
5. smote him,
6. brake his two horns,
7. cast him on the ground,
8. stamped on him, and
9. waxed very great.
10. When he was strong, his great horn was broken, and
11. instead of it came up four notable ones,
12. towards the four winds of heaven ;
13. out of one of them a little horn waxed great
14. toward the south and east ;
15. which took away the daily sacrifice, and cast down the sanctuary, &c.
Dan. chap. viii. 3—12.

These events are prefigured by different emblems, though to the same purpose, in other parts of this prophet ; and it is probable they refer to the heraldic insignia of the nations they concern. (Comp. MACE-DONIA.)

PROPHET. Scripture often gives to prophets the name of men of God, or of angels (that is, messengers) of the Lord. The verb nibba, which we translate to prophesy, is of very great extent. Sometimes it signifies to foretell what is to come ; at other times to be inspired, to speak from God. God says to Moses, (Exod. vii. 1.) "Aaron thy brother shall be thy prophet ;" he shall explain thy sentiments to the people. Paul, (Tit. i. 12.) quoting a heathen poet, calls him a prophet. Scripture does not withhold the name of prophet from impostors, although they falsely boasted of inspiration. As true prophets, when filled by the energy of God's Spirit, were sometimes agitated violently, similar motions were called prophesying when exhibited by persons who were filled with a good or evil spirit, 1 Sam. xviii. 10. Saul, being moved by an evil spirit, prophesied in his house. Dancing, or playing on instruments, is also sometimes called prophesying : "Thou shalt meet a company of prophets (says Samuel to Saul) coming down from the high place, with a psaltery, and a tabret, and a pipe, and a harp before them,

4. yet this empire was again elevated to power,
5. and seemed to acquire stability under Nebuchadnezzar,
6. who laid the foundation of its subsequent policy and authority.

PERSIAN EMPIRE.

1. Darius ; or the Persian power,
2. composed of Media and Persia,
3. both considerable provinces,
4. Media the more powerful : yet this most powerful
5. Median empire, under Dejoces, rose after the other ;
6. and extended its conquests under Cyrus over Lydia, &c. west ; over Asia north ; over Babylon, &c. south ; and
7. ruling over such extent of country, was a great empire.

GRECIAN EMPIRE.

1. Alexander, or the Greek power,
2. came from Europe (west of Asia) ;
3. with unexampled rapidity of success
4. attacked Darius furiously, and
5. beat him—at the Granicus, Issus, &c.
6. conquered Persia and Media, &c.
7. ruined the power of Darius,
8. insomuch that Darius was murdered, &c.
9. Alexander overran Bactriana, to India ;
10. but died at Babylon, in the zenith of his fame and power ;
11. his dominions were parcelled among Seleucus, Antigonus, Ptolemy, Cassander (who had been his officers) :
12. in Babylon, Asia Minor, Egypt, Greece.
13. Antiochus the Great succeeded by Antiochus Epiphanes,
14. conquered Egypt, &c.
15. and endeavored utterly to subvert the Jewish polity : polluting their temple, worship and sacrifices, to the utmost of his power.

and they shall prophesy. And the Spirit of the Lord shall come upon thee, and thou shalt prophesy with them, and shalt be turned into another man," 1 Sam. x. 5, 6. So we read, 1 Chron. xxv. 1, that the sons of Asaph were appointed to prophesy upon harps.

The term prophesy is also used (1 Cor. xi. 4, 5, xiv. 1 ; &c.) for "explaining Scripture, speaking to the church in public ; probably because they who exercised these functions were regarded as under the direction of the Holy Spirit. So it is said in Acts xiii. 1, that Judas and Silas were prophets ; that there were in the church at Antioch certain prophets and teachers ; that is, official instructors. God has set in the church, first, apostles, then prophets, 1 Cor. xii. 28. (See also Eph. ii. 20 ; Rev. xviii. 20 ; Acts xxi. 9.)

The usual way by which God communicated his will to the prophets was by inspiration, which consisted in illuminating the mind, and exciting them to proclaim what the Lord had dictated. In this sense we acknowledge as prophets all the authors of the canonical books of Scripture, both of the Old and New Testaments. God also communicated information to the prophets by dreams and visions. Joel (ii. 28.) promises to the people of the Lord that their young men should see visions, and their old men have prophetic dreams. Peter (Acts x. 11, 12.) fell into an ecstasy at noon-day, and had a revelation importing the call of the Gentiles. The Lord appeared to Abraham, to Job, and to Moses in a cloud, and discovered his will to them. His voice was sometimes heard articulately. Thus, he spoke to Moses in the burning bush, and on mount Sinai, and to Samuel in the night.

We have in the Old Testament the writings of sixteen prophets; that is, of four greater and twelve lesser prophets. The four greater prophets are Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Daniel. The Jews do not properly place Daniel among the prophets, because (they say) he lived in the splendor of temporal dignities, and led a kind of life different from other prophets. The twelve lesser prophets are, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Micah, Jonah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi.

Chronological order of the prophets, according to Calmet.

1. HOSEA, under Uzziah, king of Judah, who began to reign A. M. 3194; and under Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and under Jeroboam II. king of Israel, and his successors, to the destruction of Samaria, A. M. 3283.
2. AMOS, under Uzziah, A. M. 3219, and about six years before the death of Jeroboam II. king of Israel, A. M. 3220.
3. ISAIAH, at the death of Uzziah, and at the beginning of the reign of Jotham, king of Judah, A. M. 3246; to the reign of Manasseh, A. M. 3306.
4. JONAH, under the kings Joash and Jeroboam II. in the kingdom of Israel; about the same time as Hosea, Isaiah and Amos. Jeroboam II. died A. M. 3220.
5. MICAH, under Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, kings of Judah. Jotham began to reign A. M. 3235, and Hezekiah died A. M. 3306. Micah was contemporary with Isaiah, but began later to prophesy.
6. NAHUM, under Hezekiah, and after the expedition of Sennacherib, that is, after A. M. 3291.
7. JEREMIAH, in the thirteenth year of Josiah, king of Judah, A. M. 3375. Jeremiah continued to prophesy under Shallum, Jehoiakim, Jeconiah and Zedekiah, to the taking of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, A. M. 3416. It is thought he died two years afterwards in Egypt.
8. ZEPHANIAH, at the beginning of the reign of Josiah, and before the twenty-eighth year of that prince, A. M. 3381; and even before the taking of Nineveh, A. M. 3378.
9. JOEL, under Josiah, about the same time as Jeremiah and Zephaniah. [But see under JOEL. R.]
10. DANIEL was taken into Chaldea, A. M. 3398, the fourth year of Jehoiakim, king of Judah. He prophesied at Babylon to the end of the captivity, A. M. 3468, and perhaps longer.
11. EZEKIEL was carried captive to Babylon with Jeconiah, king of Judah, A. M. 3405. He began to prophesy in A. M. 3409. He continued till toward the end of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, who died A. M. 3442.
12. HABAKKUK, in Judea, at the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim, about A. M. 3394, and before the coming of Nebuchadnezzar in 3398.

13. OBADIAH, in Judea, after the taking of Jerusalem, A. M. 3414, and before the desolation of Idumea, (as we believe,) in 3410.

14. HAGGAI returned from the captivity A. M. 3468, and prophesied the second year of Darius, son of Hystaspes, A. M. 3484.

15. ZECHARIAH prophesied in Judea at the same time as Haggai, and seems to have continued after him.

16. MALACHI has no date to his prophecies. If he were the same as Esdras, which is very probable, he may have prophesied under Nehemiah, who returned into Judea, A. M. 3550. See the articles of these prophets.

Beside these, there are many whose names appear in Scripture, but of whom we have no writings remaining.

The PROPHETESSES are, (1.) Miriam, sister of Moses. (2.) Deborah. (3.) Hannah, the mother of Samuel. (4.) Abigail. (5.) Huldah. (6.) Esther. (7.) The midwives of Egypt, who preserved the first-born of the Hebrews.

After Malachi, there were no prophets in Israel, as before; so that in the time of the Maccabees, (1 Mac. iv. 46. ante A. D. 164.) when the altar of burnt-sacrifices was demolished, which had been profaned by the Gentiles, the stones thereof were set aside, till a prophet should arise to declare what should be done with them.

The prophets were the divines, the philosophers, the instructors, and the guides of the Hebrews in piety and virtue. They generally lived retired, in some country retreat, or in a sort of community, where they and their disciples were employed in study, prayer and labor. Their habitations were plain and simple. They exercised no trade for gain, nor did they undertake any work that was too laborious, or inconsistent with the repose their employment required. Elisha quitted his plough, when Elijah called him to the prophetic office, 1 Kings xix. 20. Zechariah (xiii. 5.) speaks of one who is no prophet, but a husbandman. Amos says (vii. 14.) he is no prophet, but a herdman, and a gatherer of sycamore fruit.

Elijah was clothed with skins, and girded with a girdle of leather, 2 Kings i. 8. Isaiah wore sackcloth, that is, a coarse rough habit, of a dark brown color, which was the ordinary clothing of the prophets. Zechariah says, (xiii. 4.) speaking of the false prophets who imitated externally the true prophets of the Lord, that "they should not wear a rough garment to deceive." In Rev. xi. 3, the two witnesses are clothed in sackcloth. Their poverty was conspicuous in their actions. They received presents of bread, fruits and honey; or the first-fruits of the earth; as being persons who possessed nothing themselves. The woman of Shunem, who entertained Elisha, put into the prophet's chamber no furniture but what was plain and necessary, 2 Kings iv. 10. The same prophet refuses the rich presents of Naaman, and drives away from his presence Gehazi, who had received them, 2 Kings v. 26. Their frugality appears throughout their history. It is well known what is related of the wild gourds, that one of the prophets caused to be boiled for the refreshment of his brethren, 2 Kings iv. 38, 40. The angel gave to Elijah only bread and water for a long journey, 1 Kings xix. 6. Obadiah, governor of Ahab's household, gave bread and water to the prophets whom he fed in the caves, 1 Kings xviii. 4.

The prophets were not observers of celibacy; Samuel had children, and Isaiah had a wife, called the prophetess, chap. viii. 3. HOSEA (i. 2, &c.) received orders to marry. (See HOSEA.) But there were no women, or wives, in the societies of the prophets. Neither Elijah nor Elisha had any that we hear of; and we see with what reserve the woman who entertained Elisha spoke to him; and that by the interposition of Gehazi, 2 Kings iv. 27. The prophets were exposed to the raileries, the insults, the persecutions, and the ill treatment both of kings and people, whose vices and irregularities they undertook to reprove; and Paul accuses us, that many of them died violent deaths, Heb. xi. 35, &c.

In several parts of the Old Testament we find mention made of "Books of the Prophets," which are quoted as authorities for certain histories; which books, thus referred to, are usually lives and actions of the kings; not records of any chronological period of time. The very same custom seems to be retained in Abyssinia, where a person is especially appointed to the office of Recorder; and, if the same consequence were anciently attached to that office among the Hebrews, as is now in that country, we may safely rely on the authenticity of the narration, and the integrity of the narrator. Perhaps, too, we may discern reasons why Scripture sometimes refrains from condemning certain crimes; as it is not the duty of the historiographer to comment on the king's actions; though we may safely add, that succeeding providences, recorded in such histories, are usually comments sufficiently explicit, independent of their connection as cause and effect. The following is from Bruce:—

"The king has near his person an officer who is meant to be his HISTORIOGRAPHER. He is also keeper of his seal: and is obliged to make a journal of the king's actions, good or bad, without comment of his own upon them.—This, when the king dies, or at least soon after, is delivered to the council, who read it over, and erase every thing false in it, whilst they supply every material fact that may have been omitted, whether purposely or not." (Travels, vol. ii. p. 596.)

It is remarkable that the title Seer occurs principally, if not altogether, under the regal government of Israel. We meet with it first in reference to the prophet Samuel, (1 Sam. ix. 9.) such persons having been previously called prophets. May it be questioned whether Samuel was not the first acknowledged official writer of annals? i. e. one attached to the king's person, so far at least as to be confessedly engaged as such, in the royal service. Indeed, as Saul was the first king, Samuel, alone, could be the first recorder under the crown. Hence probably his books are preserved, as the first of their kind, the exemplars of all others. Gad, "David's seer," (1 Chron. xxi. 9.) Heman, "the king's seer," (1 Chron. xxv. 5, perhaps after Gad's demise,) Iddo "the seer," (2 Chron. ix. 29; xii. 15.) and Jeduthun, "the king's seer," (2 Chron. xxxv. 15, &c.) all seem to have occupied the post of regal historiographer. Whence other writers of memoirs might also be called seers. This idea is corroborated by what is remarked of Manasseh; (2 Chron. xxxiii. 19.) "His prayer, and his pardon, his sin, his trespass, his high places, groves, graven images, &c. behold they are written among the remarks, words, of the seers." If this be admitted, then we see the importance of these officers, as "keepers of the king's seal;" and the reason for the distinction between prophet and seer; why a person might be a prophet only, i. e. from God; or a seer only, i. e. a writer of memoirs, or both together.

[The distinction here attempted to be made between prophet and seer, has no foundation in the biblical representations. For the character of the prophets generally, of their inspiration and of their prophecies, see an article by professor Haystenburg, in the Biblical Repository, vol. ii. p. 138; and another by professor Stuart, in the same work, vol. ii. p. 217. R.]

PROSELYTE, a name given by the Jews to those who come to dwell in their country, or who embrace their religion, not being Jews by birth.

They distinguish two kinds of proselytes. The first, proselytes of the gate; the others, proselytes of justice. The first dwelt in the land of Israel, or even out of that country, and without obliging themselves to circumcision, or to any other ceremony of the law, feared and worshipped the true God, observing the Mosaic rules, or what the rabbins call the seven precepts of Noah. Of this number was Naaman the Syrian, Nebuzar-adan, general of Nebuchadnezzar's army, Cornelius the centurion, the eunuch of queen Candace, and some others mentioned in the Acts.

The rabbins teach, that a proselyte of habitation, or of the gate, must promise under an oath, in the presence of three witnesses, to keep the seven precepts of the Noachidæ; that is, according to them, that law of nature to which all the nations of the world are obliged; the observation of which might secure them salvation. The Jews say, that proselytes of the gate have ceased in Israel, ever since the observation of the jubilee has been left off, and the tribes of Gad, of Reuben, and of Manasseh, on the other side Jordan, were led captive by Tiglath-pileser. But this is not accurate; since we see many proselytes in the time of Christ, who reproaches the Pharisees with compassing sea and land to make a proselyte; and, after this, making him a greater sinner than he was before, Matt. xxiii. 15. Luke (Acts ii. 11.) speaks of a great number of proselytes, and of those who feared God; at Jerusalem, when the Holy Ghost descended upon the apostles.

The privileges of proselytes of the gate were, first, that by the observation of the rules of natural justice, and by avoiding idolatry, blasphemy, incest, adultery and murder, they might through grace hope for eternal life. Secondly, they might dwell in the land of Israel, and share in the outward prosperities of it. It is said they did not dwell in the cities, but only in the suburbs and villages. But it is certain, that the Jews often admitted into their cities, not only proselytes of habitation, but also Gentiles and idolaters, as appears by the reproaches, on this account, throughout the Scriptures. In the time of Solomon there were in Israel 153,600 of these proselytes, whom he compelled to hew wood, to draw water, to cut stones, and to carry burdens for the building of the temple, 2 Chron. ii. 17, 18. They were Canaanites, who had continued in the country since Joshua's time.

Proselytes of justice were those converted to Judaism, who had engaged to receive circumcision, and to observe the whole law of Moses. Thus they were admitted to all the prerogatives of the people of the Lord, as well in this life as the other. The rabbins inform us, that before circumcision was administered to them, and they were admitted into the religion of the Hebrews, they were examined about the motives of their conversion; whether the change were voluntary, or whether it proceeded from interest, fear, ambition, &c. Maimonides assures us, that under the happy reigns of David and Solomon, they received no proselytes of justice, because there was reason to fear, that the prosperity of these princes, rather than any love to religion, made them converts to Judaism. The Talmudists say, that proselytes are, as it were, the canker and rust of Israel, and that very great caution must be taken not to admit them too readily.

When the proselyte had been well instructed, they gave him circumcision; and when the wound was healed, they gave him baptism, by plunging his whole body into a cistern of water, by one immersion. This ceremony, being a judicial act, was to be performed in the presence of three judges, and could not be done on a festival day. The proselyte also caused circumcision and baptism to be administered to his slaves, under thirteen years of age: those of that age, or older, could not be compelled; but he must sell them, if they were obstinate in not embracing Judaism. Female slaves were only baptized if they would become converts; if not, they were to be sold. Baptism was never repeated, neither in the person of the proselyte, though he should afterwards apostatize, nor in that of his children, born to him after baptism, unless they were born from a pagan woman; in which case, they were to be baptized as pagans, because they followed the condition of their mother. (See Buxtorf, Lex. Rab. Chald. Talm. col. 407, seq. Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. and Kuinoel on Matt. iii. 6. Selden de Jure Nat. et Gent. ii. 2.)

Boys under twelve years of age, and girls under thirteen, could not become proselytes, till they had obtained the consent of their parents, or in case of refusal, the concurrence of the officers of justice. Baptism in respect of girls, had the same effect as circumcision in respect of boys. Each of them by means of this, received (as it were) a new birth; so that those who were their parents before, were no longer regarded as such after this ceremony; and those who before were slaves, now became free. Children born before the conversion of their father, had no right to inherit. If a proselyte died without having had children after his conversion, his estate belonged to the first occupier, and not to the public treasury. When proselytes became Jews, the rabbins teach that they received from heaven a new soul, and a new substantial form.

It is thought that our Saviour alluded to the baptizing of proselytes, when he told Nicodemus, (John iii. 5—10,) that for those who would obey his law, it was necessary they should be born again. When Nicodemus appeared surprised at this, our Saviour replied, "Art thou a master of Israel, and knowest not these things?" as though he would infer, that his language had nothing extraordinary in it, since the baptism of proselytes was practised every day in Israel.

PROVERBS, a name given by the Hebrews, in common with that of parables or similitudes, to moral sentences, maxims, comparisons or enigmas, expressed in a poetical, figurative and sententious style. Solomon says, that in his time, maxims of this sort were the chief study of the learned: "A wise man will endeavor to understand a proverb, and the interpretation; the words of the wise, and their dark sayings," Prov. i. 6. Jesus, son of Sirach, says, (Eccles. xxxix. 1—3,) "He will keep the sayings of the renowned men, and where subtle parables are, he will be there also: he will seek out the secrets of grave sentences, and be conversant in dark parables." The queen of Sheba came to see Solomon, to prove him, and to propose dark riddles to him, 1 Kings x. 1.

Hiram, king of Tyre, (they say,) kept a correspondence, by letters, with Solomon, and also proposed enigmatical questions to him, and explained those that were proposed to him by Solomon.

The Proverbs of Solomon are, without doubt, the most valuable part of his works: he says they were fruits of his most profound meditations, and of his most excellent wisdom, Eccles. xii. 9. Here we find rules for the conduct of persons in all conditions of life; for kings, courtiers and men of the world; for masters, servants, fathers, mothers and children. Some have doubted whether Solomon alone were the author of the Proverbs. Grotius thinks he had a compilation made for his own use, of whatever was extant, excellent in point of morality, from all the ancient writers of his own nation; that under Hezekiah this collection was enlarged, by adding what had been written since Solomon; and Eliakim, Shebna and Joah, he thinks, completed the collection, 2 Kings xviii. 18. But these conjectures are not supported by proof. The fathers and interpreters ascribe the whole book to Solomon. True it is, we may observe some differences of style and method in this book. The first nine chapters, entitled "The Proverbs of Solomon," are written as a continued discourse, and may be considered as a preface. In chap. x., where we see the same title again, the style changes to short sentences, which have little connection with each other, and which, generally, contain a kind of antithesis. In chap. xxii. ver. 17, we find a new style, approaching nearer to that of the first nine chapters; to chap. xxiv. ver. 23, there is a new title; (To the wise; or, Further sayings of the wise;) and their style is short and sententious. Chap. xxv. we read, "These are also proverbs of Solomon, which the men of Hezekiah, king of Judah, copied out." And, doubtless, it was on this authority that Grotius advanced this collection to have been made by Eliakim, Shebna and Joah, famous men under the reign of Hezekiah. In chap. xxx. 1, we read, "The words of Agur, the son of Jakeli;" and the title of chap. xxxi. is, "The words of king Lemuel."

From all this it seems certain, that the book of Proverbs is a collection of Solomon, compiled by several hands: but we cannot conclude hence, that it is not the work of Solomon, who, being inspired by divine Wisdom, composed no less than three thousand proverbs, 1 Kings iv. 32. Several persons might make collections of them; Hezekiah among others, as mentioned chap. xxv., and Agur, Isaiah and Ezra might do the same. From these collections might be composed the work which we now have; and nothing is more reasonable than this supposition. It is no where said, that Solomon himself had made a collection of proverbs and sentences. The title, "Solomon's Proverbs," rather shows the author than the compiler. The rabbins generally maintain, that king Hezekiah, observing the abuse the people made of several works of Solomon, chiefly those which contained the virtues of plants, and secrets of natural philosophy, he suppressed several of these works, and only preserved those that are handed down to us.

PROVIDENCE, divine superintendence. It is a tenet of the Christian and Jewish religions, that God disposes and governs all things by his providence; that this providence is eternal and infinite; that it extends over every thing, to the hairs of our heads, to the most minute animals, to herbs of the field. The atheists, whose sentiments are combated by Solomon, in his book of Ecclesiastes; and the Sadduees, who arose afterwards, denied this providence, and maintained, that men are the only causes of their own happiness or misfortune, according to their good or ill use of their liberty.

But these notions are rejected by the generality of the Jews; though they do not agree among themselves in explaining the effects of providence. Maimonides seems to think, that providence does not act in the moving of a leaf; or in the production of a worm; but that whatever relates to the production of animals, or things of minor importance, is by chance. Moreover, the generality of the Jews hold, that mankind enjoy a perfect liberty as to good or evil; and that whatever happens to a man is in recompense for his good actions, or in punishment for his bad ones.

“Say not before the angel, There is no providence; lest God should be provoked against you, and destroy all the works of your hands.” Thus speaks the book of Ecclesiastes, v. 6. Take care how you deny in secret a providence; your angel will be a witness of your most secret thoughts, and God will punish you. The Hebrew expresses this: “Say not before the angel, It is a fault of ignorance;” why should you expose yourself to the anger of the Lord by your words, and lose all the labor of your hands? See ANGEL.

PSALMS, THE BOOK OF; in Hebrew, Sepher Tehillim, the book of hymns. In the Gospels it is variously named, “The Book of Psalms,” “The Prophet,” or “David,” from the name of its principal author. It is justly esteemed to be a kind of abstract of the whole Scripture; a general library, in which we may meet with whatever is requisite for salvation. The sacred history instructs us, says Ambrose, that the prophecies declare future events, the reproofs restrain the wicked, and the precepts persuade them, but the Psalms produce all these effects. Agreeableness and usefulness are here so happily blended, that it is not easy to decide which is most prevalent.

The Hebrews commonly divide the Psalter into five books; at the end of each of which we read the same conclusion, and which is thought to have been put there by Ezra, or by those who had the care of collecting the sacred books after the captivity of Babylon. The first book ends at our fortieth psalm; the second at the seventy-first; the third at the eighty-eighth; the fourth at the hundred and fifth; the fifth at the hundred and fiftieth. The first four books conclude with these words, “Amen, Amen.” The fifth with “Hallelujah.”

The number of canonical Psalms has always been fixed at 150; for the hundred and fifty-first (in the Greek) has never been received as canonical. But though the number of the whole has been agreed upon, there is a variety in their distribution. The Jews make two of the ninth, (according to the Vulgate and Sept.) and begin their tenth at ver. 22, Ps. ix. “Why standest thou afar off, O Lord?” so that from this place to Ps. cxiii. their citations and numbers are different from the Latin and Greek. The Protestant churches, and the English version, following this division of the Hebrews, quote the Psalms in like manner.

It is a tradition among the Hebrews and Christians, that Ezra is, if not the only, yet the principal, collector of the book of Psalms. Eusebius, Hilary, Theodoret, the author of the Synopsis printed under the name of Athanasius, venerable Bede, and several others, give him this honor. There was, before the captivity, however, a collection of the Psalms of David, since Hezekiah, when he restored the worship of the Lord in the temple, caused the Psalms of David to be sung there, 2 Chron. xxix. 25, 26, &c. In the library that Nehemiah erected at Jerusalem, he deposited the Psalms of David, 2 Mac. ii. 13.

Speculative men have given themselves much trouble on the order and disposition of the Psalms; but, as Jerome observes, it is impertinent to expect in the Psalter a chronological series of canticles, which have relation to certain events of history, since it is not the custom of authors of lyrics to observe such order; and indeed, a very little examination of the text and spirit of the Psalms will convince us, that those who made the collection had simply in view to preserve these canticles as they found them, with a religious and exact scrupulosity, without either retrenching what had been already repeated, or supplying what might seem deficient, or connecting what had been separated, or separating what had been improperly joined.

The authority and inspiration of the book of Psalms have always been acknowledged by both Jews and Christians.

One thing, however, creates a difficulty with many persons of piety; namely, that in the Psalms we sometimes find what seem to be imprecations against the wicked, and the enemies of the prophet. The fathers and interpreters, however, commonly explain these passages as predictions of their calamities; as if it were said, that they should certainly perish, if they continued in their disorderly courses; or let them perish, if they will not be converted. Chrysostom says, in these passages the psalmist does not so much deliver his own sentiments, as those of others.

According to the titles of the Psalms—which, however, are not to be implicitly relied upon, several of them having been added by transcribers and others—seventy-two bear the name of David; fifty are without the name of their author.

Psalms inscribed to the sons of Korah, are from xlii. to xlix. also lxxxiv. to lxxxviii.

Inscribed to Solomon, lxxv. and cxxvii.

Imputed to Ethan, lxxxix.

To Jeduthun, lxxvii.

To Moses, xc.

To Asaph, l. and lxxiii. to lxxxiii.

Ascribed in the SEPTUAGINT and VULGATE to Adam, xci.

To Melchizedec, cix.

To Jeremiah and Ezekiel, lxiv.

To Jeremiah, cxxxvi. which is also ascribed to David.

To Haggai and Zechariah, cxi. and cxlv.

[The book of Psalms is the poetical anthology of the Hebrew nation, containing productions of different authors in different ages. The Hebrew name is תהלים, tehillim, praises; which is not altogether appropriate, because many of the psalms are rather elegiac; but this name was probably given, because hymns in praise of God constitute the greater part of the book. Most of the psalms have the superscription מִזְמוֹר, mizmor, a poem, song. This word is rendered in the Septuagint by ψαλμός, psalm, i. e. a song sung to music, a lyric poem. The Greek ψαλτήριον, psalterion, means a stringed instrument; hence by a metaphor the book of Psalms is called Psalter. (For the poetical characteristics of the Psalms, see the article POETRY, p. 751.) Our attention will here be principally directed to their arrangement and classification, and to the inscriptions, the authors, and the general characteristics of the Psalms.

Classification.—Some writers, as Augusti, have classified the Psalms according to their æsthetic or prosodic character, into odes, elegies, etc. The method of De Wette is preferable, who divides them according to their contents. In this way we may make six classes. (Compare De Wette's Commentar, Einl. § i.)

I. Hymns in praise of Jehovah; Tehillim in the proper sense. These are directed to Jehovah from various motives and views; e. g. as the God of all nature, and the Creator of the universe, Ps. viii. civ.; as the Protector and Patron of Israel, Ps. xix. xxix. xxxiii.; or of individuals, with thanksgiving for deliverance from evils, Ps. xviii. xxx. xli. xlvii.; while others refer to the more special attributes of Jehovah, Ps. xc. cxxxix. These psalms express thoughts of the highest sublimity in respect to God, nature, etc.

II. Temple Hymns; sung at the consecration of the temple, the entrance of the ark, etc. or intended for the temple service, Ps. xxiv. cxxxii. So also pilgrim songs, sung by those who came up to worship in the temple, etc. e. g. the so called Songs of Degrees, Ps. cxlii. seq. See DEGREES.

III. Religious and moral songs of a general character; containing the poetical expression of emotions and feelings, and therefore subjective; e. g. confidence in God, Ps. xxiii. lxii. cxxv.; devotedness to God, Ps. xvi.; longing for the worship of the temple, Ps. xlii. xliii.; prayers for the forgiveness of sin, Ps. li. etc.—So also didactic songs; the poetical expression of some truth, maxim, etc. Ps. i. xxxiv. cxxviii.—xv. xxxii. l. etc. This is a numerous class.

IV. Elegiac Psalms, i. e. lamentations, psalms of complaint; generally united with prayer for help. This class has several subdivisions, viz.

(1.) The lamentations of particular individuals, Ps. vii. xvii. xxii. lii. lv. lvi. &c.

(2.) National lamentations; where the poet laments over the circumstances of the nation, mostly in a religious view. Most of these psalms are of a late date; and none of them are from David; Ps. xlv. lxxx. cxxxvii. etc. Some are both individual and national, Ps. lxxvii. cii.

(3.) These sufferings of the nation and of individuals inspire a melancholy view of life in general; hence many psalms are general complaints against a wicked world, Ps. xii. xiv. xxxvi.

(4.) Psalms, the authors of which attempt to reply to the complaining views of the preceding class, and satisfy them of the goodness of God, etc. Ps. lxxiii. lxxiii. So the Book of Job. This whole class comprises about one third of the whole number of Psalms.

V. Odes to kings, patriotic hymns, etc. Ps. xlv. lxii.—xxi. cx.—xx. etc.

VI. Historical Psalms, in which the ancient history of the Israelites is repeated in a hortatory manner, Ps. lxxviii. cv. cvi. cxiv.

The prophetic psalms are here distributed among these various classes. Perhaps they might with more propriety constitute another separate class.

Inscriptions.—With the exception of twenty-five psalms,—hence called orphan psalms,—all the rest have inscriptions of various kinds, and often very difficult of interpretation. They refer to the different kinds of song, the melody or rhythm, the instrumental accompaniment, the choir who shall perform, etc. These are mostly very obscure; because the music and musical instruments of the Hebrews are almost wholly unknown to us. Of more particular importance are those inscriptions, which profess to designate the author or historical occasion of many of the psalms. The genuineness of these has been much contested in modern times; the principal arguments on both sides are the following, viz.

For the genuineness of the inscriptions it is said: (1.) That it is the custom of oriental poets to prefix their names to their various poems; so the Arabians. This is no doubt true in a sense; but then, the manner of doing this is different from that of the Psalms; Arabic poems commence with "The poet saith," &c.—(2.) The inscriptions are found in the Septuagint. But this merely proves that they are as old as the Septuagint, i. e. about 330 years before Christ. (See (4.) in the next paragraph.)

Against the genuineness of the inscriptions, or at least of many of them, it is said: (1.) That many of them are in direct contradiction with the contents of the psalms to which they are prefixed, and therefore cannot have proceeded from the author; as e. g. when those are ascribed to David, which have reference to the exile; as Ps. xiv. 7; li. 18; lxix. 36; or when a psalm ascribed to David exhibits Chaldee words and forms, as Ps. cxxxix. David's style was pure.—(2.) Others do not well accord with the contents and occasion of the Psalms; as Ps. l. lii. liv. lvi. lvii. lix.—(3.) In several instances it can be shown how the error, which lies at the bottom, arose. Thus in Ps. cxxvii. which is ascribed to Solomon, the first verse speaks of a building, which was assumed to be the temple; hence the transition was easy to Solomon as the author. Psalm xxx. is said to be for the "dedication of the house of David;" which has arisen out of the 7th verse.—(4.) The Septuagint has many more inscriptions than the Hebrew text. Hence it follows, that as the collectors or translators of the Psalms certainly affixed some inscriptions according to their own conjectures, so they may probably have prefixed others, if not all, in the same manner. Thus the Septuagint and Vulgate ascribe some psalms to Adam, Melehisadek, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Haggai, Zechariah, &c. (See the list given above, p. 768.)

The result of the whole is, that many of the inscriptions cannot well be genuine; and therefore the others become suspicious. We cannot rely upon any one, when it does not accord with the contents of the psalm. They are probably conjectural assumptions of the later collectors, possessors, etc. of the book of Psalms; perhaps mostly out of the exile, or not long after it. On these grounds, our English translators have very properly separated the inscriptions from the body of the Psalms; (in the Hebrew they are united with them;) and given them merely as inscriptions.

Authors and Age of the Psalms.—Most of those psalms which are assigned to an author, are ascribed to David and to his contemporaries, chiefly Levites and singers out of David's school. Psalm xc. is attributed to Moses. To David are assigned seventy-one psalms in the Hebrew, and in the Septuagint eleven more; of these many cannot be his. The character of David's psalms is generally elegiac and expressive of a soft and pensive melancholy; but he is also, on various occasions, sublime; as in Ps. xviii. xxix. &c.—Twelve are ascribed to Asaph; eleven to the sons of Korah; two to Solomon; and one to each of the singers Heman and Ethan. (lxxxviii. lxxxix.) Those which are anonymous or pseudonymous, (e. g. xiv.) are probably all later than David; and are imitations of his style and manner. The rabbins have the custom to reckon all anonymous psalms to that author who has been last named; thus Ps. xci.—c.

which are orphan Psalms, they assign to Moses, because he is named as the author of Ps. xc. which next precedes these. Many of these later psalms are probably from pious, persecuted prophets and others in the time of the kings; some from the exile, and others later still, containing recollections of the exile; (compare Ps. cxxiii. cxxiv. cxxvi. cxxxvii.) Later than about this period, none would seem to have been written; though some interpreters have, as they thought, found traces of the Maccabean age in the book of Psalms.

The language of the Psalms in the Hebrew is very pure; and exhibits the characteristics of the best ages of the Hebrew literature. Still there is a perceptible difference between the earlier and later psalms; in the former, the language is harsher and more difficult; as is the case also in the older Latin writers, Ennius and Plautus;—in the latter, the language is more easy and flowing. The same difference is perceptible in the earlier and later prophets. In the later psalms there are also, here and there, Chaldaisms. They resemble most, in this respect, the books of Job, Proverbs, Isaiah, etc.

Arrangement.—The whole collection of the Psalms appears to have first existed in five books; after the example, perhaps, of the Pentateuch. Each book closes with a doxology.

Book I.	comprises	Psalms	i.—xli.
“ II.	“	“	xlii.—lxxii.
“ III.	“	“	lxxiii.—lxxxix.
“ IV.	“	“	xc.—cvi.
“ V.	“	“	cvii.—cl.

The original collection would seem to have comprised Psalms i.—lxxii. (See the subscription, Ps. lxxii. 20.) As to arrangement, there seems, in part, to have been a plan; and in part it is accidental. (1.) Psalms of the same author are placed together; though other psalms of the same authors also stand separately. So also psalms of similar contents are sometimes together, and sometimes separate. Thus Ps. iii.—xli. are all ascribed to David; Ps. xlii.—xlix. are songs of the Korahites; Ps. lxxiii.—lxxxiii. all belong to Asaph. But there are other psalms of all these authors. (2.) One psalm occurs twice, Ps. xiv. comp. Ps. liii. Some occur as parts of other psalms, e. g. Ps. lxx. forms also a part of Ps. xl. So also some psalms are repeated from other books of Scripture; thus Ps. xviii. is the same with 2 Sam. xxii. A few psalms are compiled by bringing together verses out of other psalms and poems,—a sort of cento; e. g. Ps. cxliv. All these general appearances are best explained by the hypothesis of a gradual origin of the whole book out of particular collections, each smaller collection preserving its own arrangement. Thus, if we suppose Ps. i.—lxxii. to have been the principal collection, then the other three books may have been collected at different times, and appended to it. The time of these collections cannot be determined. It would seem, however, to have been not before the exile; since the first book contains psalms apparently of that date.

The Septuagint and Vulgate differ from the Hebrew in the division and enumeration of the Psalms. They unite Ps. ix. and x. of the Hebrew into one, as Ps. ix; hence the numbering of the Septuagint and Vulgate, from Ps. ix. onward, is one behind the Hebrew. In like manner they unite Ps. cxiv. and cxv. into one, as Ps. cxiii; but also divide Ps. cxvi. into two, as Ps. cxiv. and cxv. Again they divide Ps. cxlvii. into two, as Ps. cxlvi. and cxlvii.; so that from Ps. cxlviii. inclusive, their enumeration is the same with that of the Hebrew. The English, and most other modern versions follow the Hebrew; and indeed some editions of the Septuagint, as that of Mill, have also been accommodated to the Hebrew. The above difference should be borne in mind in examining references to the Psalms, made by Catholic writers.

The character and value of the Psalms, so far as they contain the expression of religious and moral affections, are, perhaps, higher than those of any other book of the Old Testament. They exhibit the sublimest conceptions of God, as the Creator, Preserver and Governor of the universe; to say nothing of the prophetic character of many of them, and their relation to the Messial, and the great plan of man's redemption. They present us, too, with the most perfect models of child-like resignation and devotedness, of unwavering faith, and confidence in God. Luther, in his preface to the Psalter, has the following beautiful language: “Where canst thou find nobler words of joy, than in the Psalms of praise and thanksgiving? There thou mayst look into the hearts of all good men, as into beautiful and pleasant gardens; yea, as into heaven itself. How do grateful and fine and charming blossoms spring up there, from every kind of pleasing and rejoicing thoughts towards God and his goodness!—Again, where canst thou find more deep or mournful words of sorrow, than in the Psalms of lamentation and wo? There thou mayst look again into the hearts of all good men, as upon death, yea, as if into hell. How dark and gloomy is it there, from anxious and troubled views of the wrath of God!—I hold, however, that no better or finer book of models, or legends of saints and martyrs, has existed, or can exist on earth, than the Psalter. For we find here, not alone what one or two saints have done, but what the Head of all saints has done, and what all holy men still do; in what attitude they stand towards God, and towards their friends and enemies; and how they conduct themselves in all dangers and sufferings. And besides this, all sorts of divine doctrines and precepts are contained in it.—Hence it is, that the Psalter is THE BOOK of all good men; and every one, whatever his circumstances may be, finds in it psalms and words suited to his circumstances, and which are to him just as if they had been put there on his very account; and in such a way, that he himself could not have made or found or wished for better.” *R.

PSALMS OF DEGREES is a name given to fifteen psalms, from cxx. to cxxxiv. In the Hebrew, it is A song of Ascents; in the Chaldee, A song that was sung upon the steps of the abyss. This explication is founded on a tradition of the Hebrews, which relates that, when they were laying the foundations of the temple, at the return from the captivity, there came out of the earth a prodigious quantity of water, to the height of fifteen cubits; and would have drowned the whole world, if Achitophel—the famous Achitophel who hanged himself in the time of David, about five hundred years before—had not stopped its progress, by writing the ineffable name of Jehovah on the fifteen steps of the temple! To the same event they refer Psalm cxxx. But whence have these Psalms this denomination? Some interpreters think it is because they were sung on the steps of the temple; others translate the Hebrew by Psalms of Elevation; because (they say) they were sung with an exalted voice, or because at every psalm the voice was raised. Calmet however, refers them to the ascent of Israel from the captivity of Babylon; remarking that Scripture commonly applies the phrase, to ascend, to express this return. Thus Cyrus, in his proclamation, (Ezra i. 3, 5; ii. 2; vii. 5, 6.) says, "Who is among you of all his people? His God be with him, and let him go up to Jerusalem." And a good number of persons presented themselves to go up, says Ezra, i. 11; ii. 1. Sheshbazzar brought up—with them of the captivity, that were brought up from Babylon to Jerusalem. "Now these are the children of the province, that went up out of the captivity," Ezra vii. 6, 7, 9. "This Ezra went up from Babylon. And there went up some of the children of Israel. For on the first day of the first month, was the beginning of the going up from Babylon." In Psalm cxxii. which is one of the Psalms of Degrees, it is said, "whither the tribes go up" (to Jerusalem). And Jeremiah, (xxvii. 22,) foretelling the return from the captivity, says, "Then will I bring them up, and restore them to this place." Ezekiel (xxxix. 2.) expresses himself in the same manner. These expressions, showing that the Hebrews used the term to go up, when they spoke of their journeying from Babylon to Jerusalem, Calmet thinks it is very natural to call those Psalms of Ascent which were composed on occasion of their deliverance from the captivity of Babylon; whether to implore this deliverance from God, or to return thanks for it after it had taken place. It is certain that they have all some relation to this great event. They mention it in several places; and the greater part of them cannot be otherwise explained.

[The above is the opinion of Calmet. Other more probable ones see under the article DEGREES. R.]

PTOLEMAIS, see ACCHO.

PTOLEMY, the name of all the kings of Egypt, from Ptolemy, son of Lagus, to the conquest of Egypt by the Romans; that is, from A. M. 3631 to 3974; or from the death of Alexander to the death of Cleopatra, spouse of Mark Antony. See EGYPT.

PUBLICAN, an officer of the revenue, employed in collecting taxes. Among the Romans there were two sorts of tax receivers: some were general receivers, who in each province had deputies, who collected the revenues of the empire, and accounted to the emperor. These were men of great consideration in the government; and Cicero says, that among these were the flower of the Roman knights, the ornament of the city, and the strength of the commonwealth. But the deputies, the under-farmers, the commissioners, the publicans of the lower order, were looked upon as so many thieves and pickpockets. Theocritus being asked, Which was the most cruel of all beasts, answered, "Among the beasts of the wilderness, the bear and the lion; among the beasts of the city, the publican and the parasite." Among the Jews, also, the name and profession of a publican was excessively odious. They could not, without the utmost reluctance, see publicans exacting tributes and impositions laid on them by foreigners—the Romans. The Galileans, or Herodians, the disciples of Judas the Gaulonite, especially submitted to this with the greatest impatience, and thought it even unlawful. Those of their own nation who undertook this office, they looked upon as heathen. (See Matt. xviii. 17.) It is even said, they would not allow them to enter the temple, or the synagogues: to partake of the public prayers, or offices of judicature; or to give testimony in a court of justice.

There were many publicans in Judea in the time of our Saviour; Zaccheus, probably, was one of the principal receivers, since he is called "chief among the publicans;" (Luke xix. 2.) but Matthew was only an inferior publican, Luke v. 27. The Jews reproached Jesus with being a "friend of publicans and sinners, and eating with them," Luke vii. 34. And our Saviour told the Jews, (Matt. xxi. 31.) that harlots and publicans should be preferred before them in the kingdom of heaven. In the parable of the publican and Pharisee, who prayed at the same time in the temple, we see with what humility his condition inspired the publican, Luke xviii. 10. He keeps afar off; and probably dared not so much as enter the court of the people. Zaccheus assured our Saviour, who had done him the honor to visit his house, that he was ready to give half of his goods to the poor, and to return fourfold whatever he had unjustly acquired, (Luke xix. 8.) in conformity with the Roman laws, which required, that when any farmer was convicted of extortion, he should render four times the value of what he had extorted.

PUBLIUS, a wealthy inhabitant of Malta, when Paul was shipwrecked on that island, A. D. 60, Acts xxviii. 7—9. Publius received the apostle and his company into his house very kindly, and entertained them three days with great humanity. In acknowledgment, Paul restored to health the father of Publius, who was ill of a fever and bloody flux. It is said, that not only Publius and his father, but the whole island also, was converted to the Christian faith.

PUDENS, mentioned by Paul, (2 Tim. iv. 21.) is thought by the ancients to have been a Roman senator, converted by Peter. But there is reason to think they confound him with another Pudens, a senator, said to be father of Praxedus and Prudentiana, in the time of pope Pius, above a hundred years afterwards. The Greeks put him in the list of the seventy disciples, and say, that after the death of Paul, he was beheaded by Nero. Some think that Claudia, mentioned by Paul after Pudens, was his wife.

I. PUL, king of Assyria, (2 Kings xv. 19.) came into the land of Israel in the time of Menahem, to assist him, and confirm him in the kingdom, Hos. v. 13. The king of Israel gave him a thousand talents of silver, and Pul continued in the country till it was paid. He is the first king of Assyria mentioned in Scripture. See ASSYRIA, p. 113.

II. PUL, a people and district of Africa, supposed by Bochart to be the island Philæ, in the Nile, not far from Syene, (Isa. lxvi. 19.) on which are remains and ruins of very noble and extensive temples, built by the ancient Egyptians. Its Egyptian name was Pilak; whence the Greek name, and probably the Hebrew, is derived.

PULSE, all those grains or seeds which grow in pods, as beans, peas, &c. The ancient Hebrews used parched chick-peas as a common provision when they took the field, 2 Sam. xvii. 28.

PUNON, or PHENOX, a station of the Hebrews in the wilderness, (Numb. xxxiii. 42, 43.) called Phæno, Phaino, and Metallo-phenon, because of its mines of metals. Eusebius says, it was between Petra and Zoar. Athanasius says, these mines of Phanos were so dangerous, that murderers, condemned to work there, lived but a few days. We find bishops of Phenos in the subscriptions of the councils.

PUR, or PURIM, that is, lots, is a solemn feast of the Jews, on the 14th and 15th of the month Adar, instituted in memory of the lots cast by Haman, the enemy of the Jews, (Esth. iii. 7.) for the execution of his design to destroy all the Jews of Persia, but which issued in causing his own ruin, and the preservation of the Jews, who had time to avert the blow, by means of Esther. See ESTHER, HAMAN, and MORDECAI.

This feast, as the Jews observe it, has much resemblance to the ancient Bacchanalia of the pagans. Pleasures, diversions and excess make, as it were, the very essence of it. The spirit of revenge which animated the Jews of Shushan against their enemies has passed undiminished to their posterity, who abandon themselves to it without measure and without bounds. They allow the drinking of wine to excess, because they say it was by making king Ahasuerus drink that Esther procured the deliverance of the Jews. They compel all to be present at the synagogue, man, woman, child and servant, because all shared in the deliverance, as all were exposed to the danger.

PURIFICATIONS were of many kinds among the Hebrews, according to the several kinds of impurities contracted. See BAPTISM, LEPROSY, DEAD, NAZARITES, &c.

PURITY, see HOLY.

PURPLE. It is related that the fine purple color was discovered by Hercules Tyrius, whose dog having by chance eaten a shell-fish called murex, or purpura, and returning to his master with his lips tinged with a purple color, occasioned the discovery of this previous dye. Purple, however, is much more ancient than the Tyrian Hercules, since we find it mentioned by Moses in several places. It comes from the sea-mussel, πορφύρα purpura, and is of reddish or crimson purple hue, Heb. אַרְבָּנָה. There was another species of bluish purple, or purple blue, made from a species of snail, conchylium, helix ianthina, of Linnæus, Heb. הַבְּלֵי. This word is usually rendered in the English Bible by blue. Moses used much wool of this crimson purple color in the work of the tabernacle, and in the ornaments of the high-priest. It was the color used by princes and great men, by way of distinction, Judg. viii. 26; Luke xvi. 19; Dan. v. 7. We see by Jeremiah and Baruch, that the Babylonians clothed their idols in habits of a purple and azure color, Jer. x. 9; Baruch vi. 12, 71.

PUTEOLI, the wells; now Pozzuoli, a city in the Campania of Naples, on the northern side of the bay, eight miles north-west from that city. It was a colony. Here Paul abode seven days, Acts xxviii. 13.

PYGARG, Sept. πύγαργος, white-rump. This is properly the name of a species of eagle, (see Rees' Cyclop.) but is applied in Deut. xiv. 5, to a quadruped, apparently a species of gazelle or antelope, Heb. אֲרִיָּאן. So the Syriac version and Targums. Both the Arabic versions give it by a species of mountain goat. See ANTELOPE. *R.

QUAIL

QUAIL. There has been a difference of opinion among learned men with respect to what creature is intended by the Hebrew selavim, which we render quails, Exod. xvi. 13, &c. Our English translators are supported by the Septuagint, Josephus, Philo, Apollinarius, and the rabbins, among the ancients; and by Bochart, Hasselquist, Shaw, Harmer, Gesenius, Rosenmüller, and the majority of commentators among the moderns. On the other hand, the learned Ludolph insists these selavim were locusts, in which he has been followed by Scheuchzer, bishop Patrick, Niebuhr and others. To institute an inquiry into the respective claims of these conflicting opinions, would occupy more space than we can appropriate to the subject. The arguments which have been adduced in favor of the bird, we believe to have a decided advantage over those on the other side, independent of the testimony of the psalmist, which we think should be regarded as conclusive. Describing the merciful interposition of God in behalf of his chosen people, during the time that they were wandering in the great desert, this sacred writer refers in unequivocal language to the miraculous supply of the selavim, which he denominates feathered fowls, oph canaph, a term never applied to insects. "He caused an east wind to blow in the heaven; and by his power he brought on the south wind; he rained flesh also upon them as dust, and feathered fowls like the sand of the sea; and let fall in the midst of their camp, and round about their habitations." Ps. lxxviii. 26—28.

The oriental quail is a bird of passage, and about the size of a turtle-dove. Hasselquist states that it is plentiful near the shores of the Dead sea and the Jordan, and in the deserts of Arabia; and Diodorus affirms that it is caught in immense numbers about

QUE

Rhinocolura; countries through which the Israelites passed in their way to the Promised Land.

On two occasions the demands of the murmuring Hebrews were supplied with quails; and, on each occasion, the event is distinctly referred to the miraculous interposition of God, Exod. xvi. 12, 13; Numb. xi. 31. On the former occasion, the birds were scattered about the camp only for a single day; but on the latter, they came up from the sea for the space of an entire month. The great numbers of the selavim which are said to have been provided for the people, has been regarded as almost incredible; but without sufficient reason, as may be shown, without resorting to the supposition that they were created for this express occasion. Varro asserts that turtles and quails return from their migrations into Italy in immense numbers; and Solinus adds, that when they come within sight of land, they rush forward in large bodies, and with so great impetuosity, as often to endanger the safety of navigators, by oversetting the vessels. Hence it appears that this part of the narrative is perfectly credible; and that the miracle consisted in these immense flocks being directed to a particular spot, in the extreme emergency of the people, by means of "a wind from the Lord," Numb. xi. 31.

QUARREL, a brawl or contest. Solomon compares him who meddles with the quarrels of people unknown, to one who takes a dog by the ears, and so rashly exposes himself to be bitten. This is generally the case; but it should not be concluded from hence, that we ought never to try to reconcile neighbors. It must be attempted, however, with much prudence, caution and charity, for fear of increasing the evil we undertake to appease.

QUEEN, a king's wife. This is the general ac-ception of the term queen; but it seems to be used by the orientals in another sense, and corresponds to the official title of "king's mother." A knowledge of this circumstance will remove several discrepancies in the historical books of the Old Testament, which have greatly perplexed the commentators. See the article KING'S MOTHER.

QUEEN OF HEAVEN, a name which the Hebrew idolaters gave to the moon. Jeremiah (vii. 17. &c.) says, "The children gather wood, and the fathers kindle the fire, and the women knead their dough, to make cakes to the queen of heaven." And chap. xlv. 16—18, the disobedient Israelites say to the same prophet, "We will certainly do whatsoever thing goeth out of our own mouth, to burn incense unto the queen of heaven. For since we left off to burn incense to the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink-offerings unto her, we have wanted all things, and have been consumed by the sword and by famine." Calmet thinks it to be the Meni of Isa. lxx. 11, who was worshipped as the moon, Astarte, Trivia, Hecate, Diana, the heavenly Venus, and Isis, according to different superstitions. They placed altars to her on the platforms or the roofs of their houses, at the corners of the streets, near their doors, and in groves. They offered her cakes kneaded with oil or honey, and made libations to her, with wine and other liquors. The rabbins think they printed on these cakes the resemblance of a star or half-moon. See IDOLATRY.

RAB

RAAMAH, the fourth son of Cush, who peopled a country of Arabia, whence were brought to Tyre spices, precious stones and gold. This country is thought to have been in Arabia Felix, at the entrance of the Persian gulf, Gen. x. 7; Ezek. xxvii. 22. The Sept. in Genesis have Regma; according to Ptolemy, a city on the Persian gulf.

RAAMESSES, or RAMESSES, a city built by the Hebrews, during their servitude in Egypt, and which probably took its name from a king of Egypt, Gen. xlvii. 11; Exod. i. 11. It was situated in the land of Goshen; and appears to have been the capital of that country. It was most probably the same with Heropolis, situated on the great canal between the Nile and Suez, where are now the ruins of Aboukeyshid. See in EXODUS, p. 400.

RAB, RABBI, RABBIN, RABBAN, or RABBAM; a name of dignity among the Hebrews, given to masters and doctors, to chiefs of classes, and to the principal officers in the court of a prince: e. g. Nebuzaradan, general of the army of king Nebuchadnezzar, is always called Rab Tabachim, master of the executioners, or guards, 2 Kings xxv. 8, 20, et passim; Jer. xxxix. 9, 10, et passim. Esther (i. 8.) says, that Ahasuerus appointed a Rab of his court over every table of his guests, to take care that nothing should be wanting. Daniel (i. 3.) speaks of Ashpenaz, the Rab Sarisim, that is, Rab of the eunuchs of Nebuchadnezzar, and of the Rab of the Saganim, or chief of the governors, or peers, chap. ii. 48. This prophet was himself preferred to be chief interpreter of dreams, or Rab of the Chartumim, Dan. v. 11. It appears that the title came originally from the Chaldees; for before the captivity, when mention is made of Judea, we find it used only in reference to the officers of the king of Babylon.

Rab, or Rabban, properly signifies master, or one who excels in any thing; Rabbi, or Rabbani, is my master. Rabbin is the plural. Thus Rab is of greater dignity than Rabbi. There were several gradations among the Jews before the dignity of Rabbi, as among us before the degree of doctor. The head of a school was called Hacham, or wise; he who aspired to the doctorship had the name of Bachur, or Elou; and he frequented the school of the Hacham. When further advanced he had the title of Chabar of the Rab, or master's companion, and when perfectly skilled in the knowledge of the law and traditions, he was called only Rab, or Rabin, and Morena, our master. There seems to be an allusion to something of this sort in Matt. x. 24; Luke vi. 40: "The disciple is not above his master; but it is enough for the finished disciple to be as his master," or to be his master's companion.

The Hacham Rab, or master Rabbi, decided differences, determined things allowed or forbidden, and judged in religious and even in civil controversies. He celebrated marriages, and declared divorces. He preached, if he had a talent for it; and was head of the academies. He had the first seat in the assemblies, and in the synagogues. He reprimanded the disobedient, and could even excommunicate them. In the schools they sat on raised chairs, and their scholars were seated at their feet. Hence (Acts xxii. 3.) Paul is said to have studied at the feet of Rabbi Gamaliel. Philo affirms that among the Essenes, the children sat in the schools at the feet of their masters. Ambrosiaster, on the First Epistle to the Corinthians, observes, that in their schools the Rabbins sat in their chairs, the most advanced of their scholars sat by them on benches, and the juniors sat on the ground on mats. Hence the Jews are used to say to their children, by way of proverb, "Roll yourselves in the dust of your master's feet;" instead of saying, Frequent their schools diligently, and sit down at their feet. Our Saviour upbraids the Rabbins and masters of Israel with vanity, and eagerness to occupy the first places at feasts, and the head seats in the synagogues; also, with their being saluted in the streets, and desiring to be called Rabbi, my master.

The studies of the Rabbins are either the text of the law, or the traditions, or the Cabala; these three objects form so many different sorts of Rabbins. Those who chiefly apply to the letter of Scripture, are called Caraites, i. e. Literalists. Those who chiefly study the traditions and oral laws of the Talmud, are called Rabbinists. Those who give themselves to their secret and mysterious divinity, letters and numbers, are called Cabalists, i. e. Traditionaries.

RABBATH, or RABBAT-AMMON, or RABBATH OF THE CHILDREN OF AMMON, afterwards called Philadelphia, by Ptolemy Philadelphus, the capital of the Ammonites, was situate in the mountains of Gilead, near the source of the Arnon, beyond Jordan. It was famous even in the time of Moses, Deut. iii. 11. When David declared war against the Ammonites, his general, Joab, laid siege to Rabbath-Ammon, where the brave Uriah lost his life by a secret order of his prince; when the city was reduced to the last extremity, David himself went thither, that he might have the honor of taking it. From this time it became subject to the kings of Judah; but the kings of Israel subsequently became masters of it, with the tribes beyond Jordan. Towards the conclusion of the kingdom of Israel, Tiglath-pileser having taken away a great part of the Israelites, the Ammonites were guilty of many cruelties against those who remained; for which the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel pronounced very severe prophecies against Rabbath, their capital, and against the rest of the country, which probably had their completion five years after the destruction of Jerusalem. Antiochus the Great took the city about A. M. 3786. It is now called Amman, and is about 15 miles S. E. of Szaet. Burckhardt found three extensive ruins, which he has described. (Trav. in Syria, etc. p. 357.)

RABBATH-MOAB, see AR.

RABBI, see RAB, and DOCTOR.

RABBITH, a city of Issachar, Josh. xix. 20.

RABBONI, a diminutive from Rabbi, (John xx. 16.) or my master. See RAB.

RAB-MAG, a general officer of Nebuchadnezzar's army, at the taking of Jerusalem, Jer. xxxix. 3. A. M. 3416. It means more probably chief of the magi, a dignitary who had accompanied the king of Babylon in his campaign.

RAB-SARIS, or RAB-SARES, an officer sent with Rab-shakeh and Tartan, to summon Hezekiah, 2 Kings xviii. 17; Jer. xxxix. 3. It signifies the chief of the eunuchs.

RAB-SHAKEH, or RAB-SACES, that is, the chief butler or cup-bearer, was an officer sent by Sennacherib, king of Assyria, to summon Hezekiah to surrender to his troops, which he did, in a very haughty and insolent manner, telling him, in Hebrew, that he ought not to put confidence, either in the king of Egypt, or in the Lord, who had ordered Sennacherib to march against Judea, 2 Kings xviii. 17. After this Rab-shakeh returned to his master, who had quitted the siege of Lachish to meet the king of Egypt, then coming to assist Hezekiah. But in this march the destroying angel slew 185,000 of the army of Sennacherib; and he was obliged to hasten back to Nineveh, where he was slain by his own sons, Isa. xxxvii. 36, &c.; 2 Kings xix. 35—37. See SENNACHERIB.

RACA, a word derived from the root רַק, rik, vain, trifling, witless, brainless; otherwise, beggarly, worthless. It is thus translated by the Vulgate, in Judg. xi. 3. in the English, vain men. The word includes a strong idea of contempt. Christ says, (Matt. v. 22.) whoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be condemned by the council, or Sanhedrim. Lightfoot assures us, that in the Jewish books, the word Raca is a term of the utmost contempt; and that it used to be pronounced with certain gestures of indignation, as spitting, turning away the head, &c.

RACE, RUNNING. The numerous allusions in the writings of Paul to the races and games established in Greece, require some acquaintance with the nature and laws of those institutions, to render such passages intelligible. It may therefore be proper to adduce a few remarks concerning them.

The apostle says, (1 Cor. ix. 24.) "Know ye not that they who run in a race, run all, but one (only) receiveth the prize? so run that ye may obtain. And every one who striveth is temperate," &c.

Also 2 Tim. ii. 5. "If a man strive for masteries, yet is he not crowned except he strive lawfully." (See also Heb. xii. 1; Gal. v. 7, &c.)

"Such as obtained victories in any of these games, especially the Olympic, were universally honored, nay, almost adored. At their return home they rode in a triumphal chariot into the city, the walls being broken down to give them entrance; which was done (as Plutarch is of opinion) to signify, that walls are of small use to a city that is inhabited by men of courage and ability to defend it. At Sparta they had an honorable post in the army, being stationed near the king's person. At some towns they had presents made to them by their native city, were honored with the first place at shows and games, and ever after maintained at the public charge. Cicero reports, that a victory in the Olympic games was not much less honorable than a triumph at Rome. Happy was that man esteemed, who could but obtain a single victory; if any person merited repeated rewards, he was thought to have attained the utmost felicity of which human nature is capable; but if he came off conqueror in all the exercises, he was elevated above the condition of men, and his actions styled wonderful victories! Nor did their honors terminate in themselves, but were extended to all about them; the city that gave them birth and education was esteemed more honorable and august: happy were their relations, and thrice happy their parents. It is a remarkable story which Plutarch relates of a Spartan, who, meeting Diagoras, that had himself been crowned in the Olympic games, and seen his sons and grand-children victors, embraced him, and said, 'Now die, Diagoras; for thou canst not be a god!' By the laws of Solon, a hundred drachms were allowed from the public treasury to every Athenian who obtained a prize in the Isthmian games; and five hundred drachms to such as were victors in the Olympian. Afterwards, the latter of these had their maintenance in the Prytaneum, or public hall of Athens."

The Πένταθλον, Pentathlon, or Quinquertium, (five games,) consisted of the five exercises contained in this verse:

Ἄλμα, ποδοκείνη, δίσκος, ἄροιστα, πύλην.

leaping, running, throwing, darting, wrestling.

Instead of darting, some mention boxing; others speak of exercises different from those mentioned. For Pentathlon seems to have been a common name for any five sorts of exercise performed at the same time. In all of them there were some customs that deserve our observation. Dromos, ἄρμιος, the exercise of running, was in great esteem among the ancient Grecians, inasmuch, that such as prepared themselves for it, thought it worth their while to use means to burn or parch their spleen, because it was believed to be a hinderance to them, and retard them in their course. Homer tells us, that swiftness is one of the most excellent endowments a man can be blessed withal:—

No greater honor e'er has been attained,
Than what strong hands, or nimble feet, have gained.

Indeed, all those exercises that conducted to fit men for war, were more especially valued. Swiftness was looked upon as an excellent qualification in a warrior, both because it serves for a sudden assault and onset, and likewise for a nimble retreat and therefore it is not to be wondered at, that the constant character which Homer gives of Achilles is, that he was swift of foot; and in the Holy Scripture, David, in his poetical lamentation over those two great captains, Saul and Jonathan, takes particular notice of this warlike quality of theirs: "They were swifter than eagles, stronger than lions," 2 Sam. i. 23.

Those persons who designed to contend in these games were obliged to repair to the public gymnasium, at Elis, ten months before the solemnity, where they prepared themselves by continual exercises. No man who had omitted to present himself in this manner was allowed to contend for any of the prizes; nor were the accustomed rewards of victory given to such persons, if by any means they introduced themselves, and overcame their antagonists. No person who was himself a notorious criminal, or nearly related to any such, was permitted to contend; and further, if any person were convicted of bribing his adversary, a severe fine was laid upon him. Nor were these precautions alone thought a sufficient guard against evil and dishonorable contracts and unjust practices, but the contenders were obliged to swear, that they had spent ten whole months in preparatory exercises; and both they, their fathers and brethren, took a solemn oath, that they would not, by any sinister or unlawful means, endeavor to stop the fair and just proceedings of the games. (Potter's Antiq. Græc.)

The rewards given in these games have been thus rendered into English by Addison, from the Greek:—

Greece, in four games thy martial youth were trained,
For heroes two, and two for gods ordained;
Jove bade the olive round his victor wave;
Phæbus to his an apple-garland gave;
The pine Palæmon; nor with less renown,
Archemorus conferred the parsley crown.

(Anc. Med. Dial. 2.)

Compare with these fading vegetable crowns that immortal life which the gospel offers as a prize to the victor; in order to understand the apostle's comparison, 1 Cor. ix. 25; 1 Pet. v. 4.

RACHAL, a city of Judah, to which David sent some of the spoil taken from those enemies who had plundered Ziklag, 1 Sam. xxx. 29.

RACHEL, a daughter of Laban, and sister of Leah, was married to Jacob, by whom she had Joseph and Benjamin. She died in childbirth with the latter, whom she named Ben-oni, son of my pain; but Jacob named him Benjamin, or the son of my right hand. See JACOB.

The prophet Jeremiah, (xxx. 15.) and after him Matthew, (ii. 18.) have, as it were, revived Rachel, in the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, descended from Joseph, son of Rachel. "In Rama (or, on the high-places) was there a voice heard, lamentation and weeping, and great mourning, Rachel weeping for her children, and would not be comforted, because they are not." This was fulfilled, when these tribes were carried into captivity beyond the Euphrates; but Matthew has accommodated the words to the lamentations of the mothers in Bethlehem, when Herod slew their children. Then Rachel, who was buried there, might be said to renew her cries and lamentations for the death of so many infant innocents, sacrificed to his jealousy and cruelty!

It may be well to notice the objection which Mr. Levi and others have urged against this application of the prophet's language. It is said that the lamentation of Rachel, referring only to the carrying away of captives to Babylon, and being connected with a promise of their return, is not of that description to justify such an application of it. The passage stands thus, Jer. xxxi. 15:—

Thus saith the Lord;

A voice was heard in Ramah,
Lamentation and bitter weeping;
Rachel weeping for her children,
Refused to be comforted, because they were not.

Thus saith the Lord;

Refrain thy voice from weeping,
And thine eyes from tears:
For thy work shall be rewarded, saith the Lord:
And they shall come again from the land of the enemy.

And there is hope in thine end, saith the Lord,
That thy children shall come again to their own border.

This passage certainly closes with hopeful and grateful ideas; so far, therefore, as the prophet apostrophizes the tender mother of the tribes of Joseph and Benjamin, he addresses consolation to her: not so the evangelist; whose metaphorical Rachel deplores her children hopelessly cut off, and departed for ever. To remove this seeming discrepancy, Mr. Taylor offers the following remarks, on the authority of Le Bruyn—(1.) that it is customary for mothers in the East to seek the graves of their deceased children, in order to weep over them; meaning to infer, that this being a custom in the East at present, it was the same anciently; so that, in point of lamentation, any mourning mother might have answered the allusion of the evangelist as Rachel: (2.) that it is probable high places or hills, a little way out of the towns, were usually the scenes of such lamentations, anciently; as we find by several passages in the Old Testament; and that such weepings are now maintained in the same places; the same customs, for the most part, prevailing in modern as in ancient times: (3.) that the word Ramah signifies high places in general; and that any high place, the usual scene of such maternal lamentation, would have answered the evangelist's purpose in reference to mourning mothers: (4.) that Rachel was buried at, or near, Ramah, (Gen. xxxv. 9; xlvii. 7; 1 Sam. x. 2.) where the Israelites were assembled to be carried into captivity; (Jer. xl. 1.) (5.) that the same custom of women's weeping for their children was probably maintained in the evangelist's time at Ramah near Bethlehem, as Le Bruyn found at Ramah near Lydda; and that Ramah being a high place fit for the purpose, and such high places being selected as scenes of maternal lamentation.

From these considerations it will follow, that there is nothing forced or constrained in the reference of Matthew, to a mourning of mothers over their children, and refusing to be comforted; since such was, as it still is, the custom of the vicinity. The allusion to this custom would be still more conspicuous, if it were, as no doubt it was, maintained at Rachel's Ramah; and the apostrophe to Rachel would be still more impressive, if those mournings were exhibited in an open and high place, or spot of ground, adjacent to her tomb, or the memorial of it. To call such mournings, mournings of Rachel, (not to say that this name might actually be given to them, by the people, in the days of Matthew, who, as he wrote in the language of the country, certainly was acquainted with the customs of the country, as well local as general,) from the place in which they were performed, can scarcely be called a poetical license.

These remarks set in a very easy light the accommodation employed by the evangelist; who, certainly, selects Rachel as a mother of the most affectionate character; and instances in her, though long since dead, that grief which living mothers felt, and under which living mothers lamented. This seems to justify, also, the expression of the evangelist, "Then was fulfilled the language of Jeremiah the prophet;" for if Rachel lamented, according to the usage of the vicinity, on account of the departure of her children into captivity; if, when they were not slain, but only departed, she was, as it were, raised by the impulse of poesy, out of her tomb, to grieve, to lead with elevated hands, and plaintive voice, the lamentations of the weeping mothers; surely when her children were really slain, she might well break the bonds of silence, by loud and bitter cries, expressing those agonies which rent her sympathetic bosom: she might preside over the sorrows, the public sorrows, which such occasion demanded, and which, after similar privations, were expected, according to established usage. In short, if the prophet had any right to raise the dead, on account of a circumstance of temporary, but not hopeless, distress, the evangelist had at least equal, not to say greater, right to employ the same metaphor, on occasion of a slaughter, neither alleviated by hope of return, nor by possibility of future restoration; but in every sense fatal: a cruel instance of tyrannical jealousy, and of vindictive anticipation. This was a fulfilment of the allusion and intent of Jeremiah, much beyond that marked by the prophet himself; it was a deeper completion of his words; a more entire termination of his sentiment, founded, like his, on local custom, and, like his, supported by the daily occurrences of time and place, and by the general manners of the readers for whom his narration was intended.

To conclude, we are justified by the evidence adduced, in assuming that the mothers of the infants slaughtered at Bethlehem did subsequently, and certainly, visit their tombs, and lament with loud exclamations over the remains of their tenderly beloved offspring. Admitting this, where is the incongruity of imagining, that the mother of the adjacent tribe, though interred many years ago, should be recalled from that interment, by the poetical imagination of the prophet, to officiate in the distress of her daughters deprived of their children? And if this be permitted to the prophet, on what principle shall it be refused to the evangelist?

It is impossible to place any dependence on the antiquity of the tomb now shown as that of Rachel, near Bethlehem. It stands within six or seven paces of the field of Ephrata; about forty paces out of the high road. On a hill a little farther on, to the right, are ruins of a tower and houses; "They told us," says D'Arvieux, "that they were the remains of the little town of Ramah, of which Jeremiah speaks in his 'Lamentations;' and where Herod caused the innocent babes to be slain; as also in the neighborhood." If this tradition be correct, and the evangelist's words incline to support it, then the poetical resuscitation of Rachel has a closer alliance with the facts of the history than has been usually imagined.

RAGAU, (Luke iii. 35.) the same with REU, which see.

RAGUEL, see JETHRO.

I. RAHAB, a woman of Jericho, who received and concealed the spies sent by Joshua, Josh. ii. 1.

She is called a harlot. When the spies had entered her house, notice was given to the king of Jericho, who sent to her to produce the men; but she extended to them the protection of hospitality, hid them, and told the messengers, that such men had been at her house, but that when the gates of the city were shutting, they went out. When the messengers had returned, Rahab went up to the terrace, or roof of her house, where the spies were concealed, and obtained from them an oath, that when the Lord had delivered the country into their hands, they would save the lives of her and her family. She then let them down by a rope, her house adjoining the walls of the city, advising them to return by the mountains, for fear of meeting those who had been sent in quest of them; and to continue on the mountains three days, in which time the messengers would return, after which they might proceed. The spies followed her counsel, and arrived at Joshua's camp, to whom they related all they had discovered at Jericho, and their promises to Rahab. When Joshua took the city, he sent the two spies to the house of Rahab, to bring her and her family out safe. Rahab is supposed afterwards to have married Salmon, a prince of Judah, by whom she had Boaz; from whom descended Obed, Jesse and David. Thus Christ condescended to reckon this Canaanitish woman among his ancestors. Paul magnifies her faith, Heb. xi. 31.

II. RAHAB. The psalmist speaks of another Rahab: (Ps. lxxxvii. 4.) "I will make mention of Rahab and Babylon, to them that know me." Also, Ps. lxxxix. 10: "Thou hast broken Rahab in pieces." Isaiah (li. 9; and xxx. 7.) uses the same word to denote the destruction of Pharaoh and his army in the Red sea. And Job xxvi. 12: "By his understanding he smiteth through the proud;" (Heb. Rahab.) It seems thus to be a poetical appellation for Egypt, particularly of the Delta, which is still called Rib, or Rif. M. D'Herbelot says, that the name Rif is given to that part of Egypt which begins at Cairo, and lies to the north, that is, the Delta. Jerome and the ancient Greek interpreters have often translated Rahab by pride, or the proud. But many have misunderstood the original, as referring to Rahab, the woman of Jericho.

RAIN. It would seem by several expressions in Scripture, that the ancient Hebrews imagined rain to be derived from certain great reservoirs above the heavens, which Moses calls the superior waters, in contradistinction from the inferior waters of the sea. He says, that, at the deluge, "All the fountains of the great deep were broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened." And Hosea affirms, (ii. 21.) that in times of great drought the clouds cry to the Lord, beseeching him to permit the waters which he keeps in his treasures and repositories to fall into and replenish them. In other places of Scripture, the clouds are described as great bodies, filled with waters, supplied to them from the firmament. Even the dews are represented as proceeding from the superior waters, "His heavens shall drop down dew," Dent. xxxiii. 28; Job xxxvii. 11; xxxviii. 37; Ps. xviii. 11; 2 Sam. xxii. 12. The sacred writers often speak of the former rain, and the latter rain, Deut. xi. 14. (So Hos. vi. 3.) The rabbins, and the generality of interpreters, are of opinion, that the former rain, called in Hebrew joreh, signifies the rain of the autumn, which falls from the middle of October to the first of December; and that the latter rain, called in Hebrew malkash, signifies the rain of the spring, which falls in March and April. The Jews began their year at autumn, which gives probability to this opinion; but Calmet thinks that joreh signifies the rain of spring, and malkash that of autumn. In Judea it commonly rained but in two seasons, spring and autumn. Joreh is always put first, and malkash afterward. The Septuagint have taken it in the sense of Calmet; and Hesiod has expressed the rain of the spring and autumn in words of the same import as those used by the Septuagint. He calls ὄμιον ἄνοιον, the rain of the spring; and ὄμιον ἄνοιον ἄνοιον, the rain of autumn. (Oper. et Dies, lib. ii.)

Moses, describing the land of Canaan, and its advantages over Egypt, says, (Deut. xi. 10, 11.) it is a country of hills and valleys, watered by rain from heaven. Hence it is that God promised the Israelites, to send them rain in due season, Lev. xxvi. 3. On the other hand, he threatens them, if they depart from their fidelity to God, that he will send them showers of sand and dust, Deut. xxviii. 24. See DUST.

The Hebrews often compare wise and instructive discourses to rain, Deut. xxxii. 2; Ecclus. xxxix. 9; Job xxix. 21.

RAM, or BATTERING RAM, a well known engine of war, mentioned in Ezek. iv. 2; xxi. 22. and used by Nebuchadnezzar at the siege of Jerusalem.

RAMAH. This word signifies an eminence; from hence are so many places in Palestine named Ramah, Ramath, Ramatha, Ramoth, Ramathaim, and Ramathan. Sometimes the same place is called by one or other of these names indiscriminately, all signifying the same. Sometimes Rama, or Ramoth, is joined to another name, to determine the place of such city, or eminence; and it is sometimes put simply for a high place, and signifies neither city nor village.

I. RAMAH, a city of Benjamin, between Gaba and Bethel, toward the mountains of Ephraim, six miles from Jerusalem north, and on the road from Samaria to Jerusalem. Baasha, king of Israel, caused it to be fortified, to obstruct the passage from the land of Judah into that of Israel. This is probably the Ramatha, or Ramathaim-zophim, of the prophet Samuel, 1 Sam. i. 1, 19; ii. 11, &c. (See RAMATHAIM.) It was on the frontiers of Ephraim and Benjamin; and frontier cities were often inhabited by both tribes. It is also very probable, that Jeremiah speaks of this Ramah, (chap. xl.) when he says, Nebuzaradan, who commanded the Chaldean army, having found him among the captives at Ramah, whither they had been all brought, set him at liberty. Of the same place he explains the prophecy (chap. xxxi. 15—17.) in which the Lord comforts Rachel, on account of the taking her children of Ephraim and Manasseh into captivity. See RACHEL.

II. RAMAH, a city in mount Ephraim, the birth-place of Samuel; probably identical with the Ramah of Benjamin. (See Rosenmüller's Bibl. Geogr. II. ii. p. 186, and also the preceding article.)

III. RAMAH, a city about thirty miles north-west of Jerusalem, on the road to Joppa. M. le Bruyn describes the fine reservoirs of water to be seen here, and many other marks of antiquity. He says it is but four leagues from Jaffa, or Joppa, and stands in a plain and even country: he also says, that Lydda is on one side, and about three miles from Rama. (See ARIMATHAEA.) Eusebius and some others seem to have thought that this city is the Ramath of Samuel, or Ramathaim-zophim, of the mountains of Ephraim. But this opinion cannot be supported.

RAMATHAIM, the two Ramathas; probably, because the city was divided into two parts. It was also called Zophim, because of a family of Levites dwelling there, who were descended from Zoph. It was probably the same with RAMAH I. and II.

RAMATH-LEHI, or RAMATH-LECHI, the height of the jaw-bone, or the cast of the jaw-bone, the name of the place where Samson threw the jaw-bone on the ground, with which he had beaten the Philistines. Probably this is the Lehi of Judg. xv. 9. See LEHI.

RAMESSES, see RAAMESSES.

RAMOTH, a famous city in the mountains of Gilead; often called Ramoth-Gilead; and sometimes Ramoth-mizpeh, or the Watch-tower, Josh. xiii. 26. The Vulgate makes it two cities, Ramoth and Masphe. It belonged to Gad, was assigned to the Levites, and became one of the cities of refuge beyond Jordan, Deut. iv. 43; Josh. xx. 8; xxi. 38. It was famous during the reigns of the later kings of Israel, and was the occasion of several wars between these princes and the kings of Damascus, who had conquered it, and from whom the kings of Israel endeavored to regain it, 1 Kings xxii; 2 Kings viii. 28, 29; 2 Chron. xxii. 5. Jehoram, king of Judah, was dangerously wounded at the siege of this place; Jehu, son of Nimshi, was here anointed king of Israel, by a prophet sent by Elisha; (2 Kings ix.) and Ahab was killed in battle with the Syrians before it, 2 Chron. xviii. 3. Eusebius says, Ramoth was fifteen miles from Philadelphia, east; but Jerome places it in the neighborhood of Jabbok, and, consequently, north of Philadelphia.

RANSOM, a price paid to recover a person or thing, from one who detains that person or thing in captivity. Hence prisoners of war, or slaves, are said to be ransomed, when they are liberated in exchange for a valuable consideration. Whatever is substituted or exchanged, in compensation for the party, is his ransom; but the word ransom is more extensively taken in Scripture. A man is said to ransom his life, (Exod. xxi. 30.) to substitute a sum of money instead of his life; (chap. xxx. 12; Job xxxvi. 18; Ps. xlix. 7.) and some kinds of sacrifices might be regarded as ransoms, that is, as substitutes for the offerer. In like manner, Christ is said to give himself a ransom for all; (1 Tim. ii. 6; Matt. xx. 28; Mark x. 45.) a substitute for them, bearing sufferings in their stead, undergoing that penalty which would otherwise attach to them. (See Rom. iii. 24; vii. 23; 1 Cor. i. 30; Ephes. i. 7; iv. 30; Heb. ix. 15.) Comp. REDEEMER.

RAPHAEL, one of the seven archangels which stand continually before the throne of God, ready to perform his commands, Tobit xii. 15.

RAPHIA, a famous city on the Mediterranean, between Gaza and Rhinocorura, famous for the victory of Philopator, king of Egypt, over Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, 3 Mac. i. 11.

RAVEN, a well-known bird of prey; unclean by the law, Lev. xi. 15. When Noah sent the raven out of the ark, to see if the waters were withdrawing from covering the earth, it did not return to him, Gen. viii. 6, 7. When the prophet Elijah retired near the brook Cherith, the Lord fed him for some time by means of ravens, who brought him bread and flesh, morning and evening, 1 Kings xvii. 5. See ELIJAH.

The blackness of the raven is proverbial: "His locks are bushy and black as a raven," Cant. v. 11.

The wise man says, (Prov. xxx. 17.) "The eye that mocketh at his father, and despiseth to obey his mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out, and the young eagles shall eat it."

RAVISH, the taking away of any thing from any one by violence, Prov. xi. 24; Gen. xxxiv. 2; xxi. 21.

RAZOR, an instrument for shaving the hair from the face, head, &c. The psalmist compares the tongue of Doeg (Ps. lii. 2.) to a sharp razor, starting aside from what should be its true operation, to a bloody purpose and effect. The prophet threatens to shave, that is, to scrape with violence, to despoil very closely, to leave nothing untouched, with a hired razor, that is, by a person who will be paid, a power who fights for plunder, the cities and provinces of Judah, &c. every part of them; the hair of the head, the hair of the beard, and the hair of the feet, Isa. vii. 20. (See FOOT.) Shaving was a sign of mourning; (see SHAVING;) but shaving by a stranger, a foreigner, an enemy, was a sign of captivity; and it probably alludes to a custom of the heathen priests, who (at least those of Egypt, as Herodotus testifies) shaved themselves every day or two, all over, as well the body, as the head and beard. If this were also a custom among the Babylonians, as is very credible, then the application and force of this metaphor is clear.

In reference to this "shaving by a razor that is hired," Mr. Taylor thinks it likely that there is an implication of contempt as well as suffering included in it, as the office of a barber ambulant has seldom been esteemed of any dignity, either in the East or in the West. That the allusion is not unknown at present in Asia, appears from a song, whose versification, if none of the best, yet was popular, "being bawled about the streets of Aleppo, after the retreat of Nadir Shah from Mosul, in the year 1743."

Tahmas, where is he? where is he?
An iron mace between his shoulders;
May a razor shave his beard!
And a sword cut off his head!
Tahmas, where is he? where is he?

(Russell's Aleppo, note 5. vol. ii. p. 393.)

As Nadir had failed of his purpose, contempt was likely to be vented by his enemies in this triumphant ballad.

REAPING is such a natural employment in agriculture, that it almost glides of itself into a metaphorical action, at once expressive, and easily understood. To cut down corn, to gather fruits, when come to maturity; to receive the natural effects, or consequences, or rewards, of good or bad actions, have many points of similitude, which are readily comprehended by all, and furnish frequent allusions in Scripture.

REASON is that intellectual power by which we apprehend and discover truth, whether contained in first principles of belief, or in the arguments and conclusions from those principles, by which truth not intuitive is investigated. Much has been written by some theologians against the use of reason in matters of religion; but we apprehend that their reasoning has, in many cases, proceeded on a false assumption. If theology be considered as a science, just like any other series of truths connected as principles and conclusions, it must evidently be the work of reason to apprehend and connect them. On religious as well as other subjects, faith can never go beyond the principles on which reason, in one way or other, more or less directly, can judge of truth. Any other opinion would involve the monstrous proposition, that we may, agreeably to a rational nature, believe without a reason; a proposition, which does not offer greater violence to our constitution than to the spirit of that religion which is not of fear, but of power, and love, and a sound mind.

The term reason has a diversified application in the sacred writings. It signifies that faculty of the soul by which we apprehend and judge of truths, (Dan. iv. 36.) a proof, ground, or argument, (1 Pet. iii. 15.) the act of conferring, disputing, or arguing, (Matt. xvi. 8.) and the fitness of things, Acts vi. 2; xviii. 14.

REBA, REBE, or REB, a prince of the Midianites, killed in the war that Moses, by order from the Lord, waged against them by the hand of Phinehas, son of the high-priest Eleazar, for the punishment of their crime in seducing Israel, Numb. xxxi. 8; Josh. xiii. 21.

REBEKAH, a daughter of Bethuel, and wife of Isaac, Gen. xxiv. 15, &c. She lived with her husband twenty years without having children; but, in answer to his prayers, she became pregnant with two children. These struggling together in her womb, and giving her great uneasiness, she consulted the Lord, who told her that two nations were in her womb, and that the elder should be subject to the younger. At the birth of the children, the first, being ruddy and hairy, they named Esau; the other holding in his hand the heel of his brother, they called him Jacob, the Heeler. Esau delighted in hunting; but Jacob was a plain, homely man. See JACOB, ESAU, and ISAAC.

The conduct of Rebekah in reference to her sons was highly culpable. The year of her death is uncertain; but she certainly died before Isaac, because it is said that he was put into the tomb with Rebekah his wife; which tomb was the same with that in which Abraham and Sarah were buried, and afterwards Jacob and Leah, Gen. xlix. 31; xxxv. 29.

I. RECHAB and BAANAH, assassins of Ishbosheth, son of Saul, 2 Sam. iv. 2, seq.

II. RECHAB, the father of Jonadab, and of the Rechabites. It is not known in what time this Rechab lived, nor what was his origin. We read, in 1 Chron. ii. 55, that the Rechabites were originally Kenites, and that they were singers in the house of God. The Hebrew has, "porters and the obedient, that dwell under tents; these are those that are called Kenites, who are descended from Hemath, chief of the house of Rechab." The Kenites descended from Midian, son of Cush, by Hobab, or Jethro, father-in-law of Moses. They entered the Promised Land with the Hebrews, and dwelt in the tribe of Judah, about the Dead sea. They were distinguished from the Israelites by their retired life, and by their dislike of cities and houses. Some have thought that Hobab, or Jethro, was the founder of the Rechabites; that Rechab was one of his names; that Jonadab, in the time of Jehu, was one of his posterity; and that Heber the Kenite followed the customs of the Rechabites. Serrarius distinguishes the ancient Rechabites, descended from and instituted by Jethro, from the new Rechabites of Jonadab, son of Rechab, in the time of Jehu. However this may be, Scripture acquaints us, (Jer. xxxv. 6, 7.) that Jonadab, son of Rechab, in the time of Jehu, king of Israel, laid an injunction on his posterity not to drink wine, not to build houses, not to plant vineyards, to have no lands, and to dwell in tents all their lives. This they continued to observe for above 300 years; but in the last year of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, Nebuchadnezzar coming to besiege Jerusalem, the Rechabites were forced to take refuge in the city, still, however, lodging in tents. During this siege, Jeremiah received orders from the Lord, to invite them into the temple, and to offer them wine to drink. But they answered, "We will drink no wine; for so Jonadab the son of Rechab, our father, commanded us," &c. Then came the word of the Lord unto Jeremiah, reproving Judah, saying, "The words of Jonadab, the son of Rechab, that he commanded his sons not to drink wine, are performed; yet I have spoken unto you, rising early and speaking, but ye hearkened not unto me." And then, directing his discourse to the Rechabites, he says, "Because ye have obeyed the commandment of Jonadab your father, Jonadab, the son of Rechab, shall not want a man to stand before me for ever," Jer. xxxv. 2, seq.

The Rechabites were, probably, led captive, after the taking of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans; since we read in the title of Ps. lxx. that it was sung "by the sons of Jonadab, and by the principal captives," which were Ezekiel and Mordecai, carried away by the Chaldeans beyond the Euphrates, after the taking of Jerusalem under king Jehoiakim. They returned from their captivity, and settled in the city of Jabez, beyond Jordan; as appears by 1 Chron. ii. 55. No further mention is made of the Kenites in the books written after the captivity of Babylon.

Some have suggested that the Assideans of the Maccabees, (1 Mac. ii. 42; vii. 13; 2 Mac. xiv. 6.) were successors and followers of the Rechabites. Others have confounded them with the Essenes. But certain it is, that the manner of life of the Essenes, which is well known, was very different from that of the Rechabites. The former had fields, and dwelt in houses; but had neither wives nor children; and performed no religious ceremonies with the other Jews at Jerusalem: all which was contrary to the practice of the Rechabites.

RECONCILIATION, see EXPIATION, and ATONEMENT.

REDEEMER, a name given by way of eminence to Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world. In the law of Moses, (Lev. xxv. 25, 47, 48.) it is given to him who has the right of redemption in an inheritance, or even to a near kinsman, who may redeem it from a stranger, or any Jew who had bought it. Moses ordained, that neither estates in land, nor the persons of the Hebrews, should be sold for ever; but that every one might resume the possession of his estate, or his personal liberty, in the sabbatical year, and at the jubilee. But without waiting for these years, when any relation was rich enough, and had power to redeem the goods or liberty of his brother, the law enabled him to do so. And this it calls the right of redemption; giving also the name of redeemer to the relation who claimed this right, Lev. xxv. xxvii.

We see an instance of the practice of this law in the history of Ruth, Ruth ii. 20; iii. 9, &c. Boaz, being one of the nearest relations of Elimelech, married Ruth, the heiress of Elimelech, and thereby re-entered into the possession of her estate. Jeremiah redeemed the field of his nephew Hanameel, which was on the point of being sold to another, Jer. xxxii. 7, 8.

The same person was also called The Redeemer of Blood, (Eng. tr. The Revenger of Blood), who had a right to revenge the blood of his murdered kinsman, Numb. xxxv. 12, 19, 21; Deut. xix. 6, 12. To curb the resentment of these avengers, or redeemers, God appointed cities of refuge throughout Israel. See REFUGE, and FIRST-BORN.

RED HEIFER. The particulars relative to this sacrifice, which was an eminent type of our Saviour, (Heb. ix. 14.) will be found in Numb. xix. Spencer thinks, that the ceremony was designed in opposition to the Egyptian superstitions. But Mr. Taylor remarks, that though the Apis of Egypt was black, yet the Apis of India is "red-colored;" and consequently, the Hebrew red heifer could not be in opposition to this; which is the original of the Egyptian superstition. (See APIS.) The virtue of purifying from defilement by contact with a dead body, did not reside in the abundance of water with which the person previously washed himself; but in the ashes of the heifer, however small their quantity, with which he was baptized by sprinkling, Heb. ix. 10, 13, 14. It is no improbable conjecture, that the dispute between the disciples of John and the Jews about purifying (John iii. 25.) turned on this point, "How could simple water—water having no ashes in it—purify?" and the Baptist, in another place, pleads the authority of "him who sent me to baptize with simple water." As no heifer can be burnt under the present condition of the Jews, it follows, that they cannot, on their own legal principles, be fully purified from the defilement communicated by the dead; they wash their clothes, the furniture of their apartments, their rooms, &c. but the ashes are still wanting, for the purification of their persons. See HEIFER.

RED SEA, see SEA.

REED. Ezekiel (xl. 3.) and John (Rev. xi. 1.) speak of a measuring-reed; the former saying, it was in length six cubits and a hand-breadth; or rather, six cubits and six hand-breadths; that is, six Hebrew cubits, each larger by a hand-breadth than the Babylonish cubit.

REFUGE, CITIES OF. To provide security for those who should undesignedly kill a man, the Lord commanded Moses to appoint six cities of refuge, or Asyla, that whoever should have thus spilt blood, might retire thither, and have time to prepare his defence before the judges; and that the kinsmen of the deceased might not pursue and kill him, Exod. xxi. 13; Numb. xxxv. 11, &c. Of such cities there were three on each side Jordan. On the west, were Kedesh of Naphtali, Hebron and Shechem; on the east, Bezer, Golan and Ramoth-Gilead, Josh. xx. 7, 8. These cities served not only for Hebrews, but for all strangers who resided in the country, Deut. xix. 1—8. The Lord also commanded, that when the Hebrews should multiply and enlarge their land, they should add three other cities of refuge. As this command was never fulfilled, the rabbins say, that the Messiah will accomplish it.

Maimonides, from the traditions of the ancients, assures us, that all the forty-eight cities, appointed for habitations of the priests and Levites, were also cities of refuge; and that all the difference between them was, that the six cities appointed by the law, were obliged to receive and lodge refugees gratis; whereas the other cities might refuse to admit such as fled to them, and were not obliged to lodge them gratuitously. Besides the cities of refuge, the temple, and especially the altar of burnt-offerings, enjoyed the privilege of an asylum. Those who took sanctuary in the temple, were immediately examined by the judges; and, if found guilty of murder, they were forced away, even from the altar, and put to death without the temple. But if found innocent, they had a guard appointed, to conduct them safely to some city of refuge.

The cities of refuge were to be of easy access ; and every year, on the fifteenth of Adar, the magistrates inspected the roads, to see that they were in good condition, and that there were no impediments. At every division of the road was a direction-post, on which was written, Refuge, Refuge, for the guidance of him who was fleeing for security. They were to be well supplied with water and provisions. It was not allowed to make any weapons there, that the relations of the deceased might not procure arms to gratify their revenge. It was necessary that whoever took refuge there should understand a trade, that he might not be chargeable. They used to send some prudent and moderate persons, to meet those who were pursuing the culprit, in order to dispose them to clemency and forgiveness, and to await the decision of justice.

At the death of the high-priest, the refugee might quit the city in which he was. But though the manslaughter had fled to the city of refuge, he was not exempt from the power of justice, Numb. xxxv. 12. An information was lodged against him ; and he was summoned before the judges and the people, to prove that the murder was truly casual and involuntary. If found innocent, he dwelt safely in the city to which he had retired ; if otherwise, he was put to death, according to the law. Scripture is not very express, whether the affair came under the cognizance of the judges of the place where the murder was committed, or of the judges of the city of refuge, to which the murderer had fled. (Comp. Deut. xix. 11, 12 ; Josh. xx. 4, 5, 6 ; Numb. xxxv. 25.) But it appears from the passage of Joshua, that the fugitive underwent two trials : first in the city of refuge, where the judges summarily examined the affair ; secondly in his own city, where the magistrates examined the cause more strictly. If the latter judges declared him innocent, they reconducted him under a guard to the city of refuge.

In Europe we do not discover that distinguished wisdom in the institution of the cities of refuge which there really is. With us, murder or manslaughter is prosecuted so regularly, that we are apt to overlook the policy of this national appointment. It deserves notice, too, that the appropriation of certain cities for the purposes of refuge, seems peculiar to the Mosaic dispensation : we read nothing of it in Egypt ; and there is at this time no trace of it in the East, notwithstanding the utility of such appointments might deservedly have preserved the custom among those who had once known it. Travellers inform us, that such is the irritable and vindictive spirit of the Arabs and other inhabitants of hot climates, that if one sheikh should seriously say to another, "Thy bonnet is dirty," or "The wrong side of thy turban is out," nothing but blood can wash away the reproach ; and not merely the blood of the offender, but that also of all the males of his family ! In several districts in Arabia, the relations of a person who has been slain, have leave either to accept a composition in money, or to require the murderer to surrender himself to justice, or even to wreak their vengeance upon his whole family. They think little of making an assassin be punished, or even put to death, by the hands of justice ; for this would be to deliver a family of an unworthy member, who deserved no such favor at their hands. Hence "the Arabs rather avenge themselves as the law allows, upon the family of the murderer, and seek an opportunity of slaying its head, or most considerable person, whom they regard as being properly the person guilty of the crime, as it must have been committed through his negligence, in watching over the conduct of those under his inspection. In the mean time, the judges seize the murderer, and detain him till he has paid a fine of two hundred crowns. Had it not been for this fine, so absurd a law must have been long since repealed. From this time, the two families are in continual fears, till some one or other of the murderer's family be slain. No reconciliation can take place between them, and the quarrel is still occasionally renewed. There have been instances of such family feuds lasting forty years. If, in the contest, a man of the murdered person's family happens to fall, there can be no peace until two others of the murderer's family have been slain." (Niebuhr's Travels in Arabia, p. 197, &c.)

How much milder, more considerate, more politic, more humane, was the institution of cities of refuge ! which not only gave opportunity to the aggressor to escape, and to the avenger to cool ; but took from either the determination of the case, and, after a proper hearing, adjudged the accidental slayer of his neighbor to security, yet to confinement, till the high-priest died ; at which period, not only might the offence be in part forgotten, but be regularly and honorably passed over ; especially, among the general mourning on that event, and the general interest of the nation in it. We see that the spirit of revenge disquiets both parties ; but on such a solemn occasion, both parties might honorably forego their animosity, without any "fear of fighting, or any disturbance of sleep ;" so that this appointment was, perhaps, of equal advantage to both culprit and avenger.

[The custom of blood-revenge appears to have been an institution, or we may almost say a principle, very early introduced and practised among the nomadic oriental tribes. So firmly was this practice established among the Israelites before their entrance into the promised land, and probably also even before their sojourning in Egypt, that Moses was directed by Jehovah not to attempt to eradicate it entirely ; but only to counteract and modify it by the institution of cities of refuge. The custom of avenging the blood of a member of a family or tribe, upon some member of the tribe or family of the slayer, still exists in full force among the modern Bedouins ; the representatives, in a certain sense, of the ancient Israelites in the desert. This indeed is stated in the extract from Niebuhr above quoted ; and is confirmed by the following extract from Burekhardt. During his journey in the peninsula of mount Sinai, Burekhardt employed two Arab guides ; Hamd, a young man of great courage, resolution and fidelity ; and his uncle Szaleh, who proved to be dishonest and a coward. On the northern part of the eastern coast, towards Akaba, he had also employed an old fisherman, Ayd, as guide, one of the most intelligent and trustworthy Arabs he had met. The next day, after turning back, without reaching Akaba, this little party was attacked by four Bedouins ; but saved through the presence of mind displayed by Ayd and Hamd ; whilst Szaleh fled as fast as possible. In the fray, one of the robbers was stabbed by Hamd, and afterwards died. (Travels in Syr. &c. p. 513, seq.) The following was the result of the affair : (ibid. p. 539, seq.)

"Hamd, afraid of being liable to pay the fine of blood, if it should become known that the robber had fallen by his hand, had made us all give him our solemn promise not to mention any thing of the affair. When I discharged him and Ayd at the convent, [of mount Sinai,] I made them both some presents, which they had well deserved, particularly Hamd; this he was so imprudent as to mention to his uncle Szaleh, who was so vexed at not receiving a present, that he immediately divulged all the circumstances of our encounter. Hamd, in consequence, was under the greatest apprehensions from the relations of the robber; and having accompanied me on my return to Cairo, he remained with me some time there, in anxious expectation of hearing whether the robber's blood was likely to be revenged. Not hearing any thing, he then returned to his mountain; four months after which, a party of Omran, to which tribe the robbers had belonged, came to the tent of the sheikh of the Towara, to demand the fine of blood. The man had died a few days after receiving the wound; and although he was a robber, and the first aggressor, the Bedouin laws entitled his relations to the fine, if they waived the right of retaliation. Hamd was therefore glad to come to a compromise, and paid them two camels (which the two principal sheikhs of the Towara gave him for the purpose) and twenty dollars, which I thought myself bound to reimburse to him, when he afterwards called on me at Cairo. This was the third man Hamd had killed in skirmish; but he had paid no fine for the others, as it was never known who they were, nor to what tribe they belonged.

"Had Hamd, whom every one knew to be the person who had stabbed the robber, refused to pay the fine, the Omran would, sooner or later, have retaliated upon himself or his relations; or perhaps upon some other individual of the tribe; according to the custom of these Bedouins, who have established among themselves the law of 'striking sideways.'" How far superior to this was the Mosaic institution of cities of refuge! *R.

REGENERATION is used in two senses by the sacred authors of the New Testament: (1.) for that spiritual birth received from grace; (2.) for that new life we expect at the resurrection. Properly speaking, there are only two places where the term regeneration (παλιγγενεσία) occurs; Matt. xix. 28. and Titus iii. 5: the first refers to a change of state, the second to a change of profession. It will be of advantage, therefore, to notice the import of this term in other writers. It is compounded of πάλιν, again, and γένεσις, generation, or origin. It is used by Greek writers to express the state of the earth in the spring, when the face and appearance of nature is renovated, and the crops and vegetables, corn, &c. are regenerated in the successors of those of the last year. Trees, however, are not regenerated; but their leaves and fruits are; nature having formed the buds and germs previous to the winter, which, after the winter, put themselves forth, open, and spread themselves. Cicero, writing to Atticus, expresses the state and dignity to which he was re-appointed after his return from exile, by the term regeneration. Josephus, speaking of the Jews who were made acquainted by Zorobabel with the edict of Darius, permitting their return to Jerusalem, says,—“They gave thanks to God—and for seven days they continued feasting, and kept a festival for the rebuilding and restoration, regeneration, of their country.” It is this last passage, principally, that induces Schleusner to interpret Matt. xix. 28, of a renovation of the minds and characters of the Jews and Gentiles by means of the gospel. The Syriac translates, in the new age. This is perfectly agreeable to the phrases, the age to come, the world to come, the Father of the future age, the age of the Messiah, &c. which were familiar and customary among the Jews, previous to and at the time of Christ. In this acceptation, the term regeneration must be construed with the preceding words; and it is consistent with 2 Pet. iii. 13; 2 Cor. v. 17. But others incline to construe these words with the following part of the sentence, and so refer them to the grand renovation of all things, at Christ's second coming; (comp. Acts iii. 21.) and particularly to God's children being born again, as it were, from their graves: that is, resurrection is regeneration. (Comp. Acts xiii. 33.) Either way the passage is metaphorical; but, as it was intended to be understood by the hearers, it seems most proper to explain it in that sense which was most likely to strike those hearers as consonant with phrases then current. This seems to establish the verbal meaning in coincidence with Schleusner. A more exalted meaning might be couched under the term, and might even be present to the mind of the speaker; but the hearers would be most likely to understand its import according to its application by their native historian Josephus.

The second place in which the word occurs (Titus iii. 5.) alludes, beyond all question, to the rite of baptism. Our translators have taken the term connected with it, for the fluid with which that rite is administered; or the action by which it is performed; but the general course of the Greek language rather leads to the vessel containing the fluid. But in whatever sense that term might be taken, it is clear that regeneration, in this place, means a professional or ritual change of life, of personal habits, of objects, purposes and endeavors. It is the external profession of those intentions of which the renewing of the Holy Spirit, mentioned in connection with it, is the prime mover and promoter; the outward and visible sign, of which the actuating principle is the inward and spiritual grace. The fathers have uniformly employed the term regeneration to signify baptism; and this is so evident, that Phavorinus says expressly, referring to this place, the holy rite of baptism is called regeneration. It is so used by Justin Martyr, and other early Christians. Baptism was always thought to denote a resurrection, a transplantation, a change of manners, of society, of interests and of cares, as those who are “risen with Christ,” who are “alive from the dead,” with whom “old things are passed away, and all things are become new,” &c.

Very different is the term used, (John iii. 4, 5, &c.) it is there γεννηθῆναι ἄνωθεν, born again, or, as some prefer, born from above. But this latter acceptation seems inconsistent with the following conversation, and the objections raised by Nicodemus, “How can a man (γεννηθῆναι) be born again when he is old? Can he enter a second time into his mother's womb, and be born?” “He must,” says Jesus, “be born of water and Spirit.” Ritually, professionally, or externally, of water; internally, or actuatingly, of the Spirit; that is, renewed in the spirit, disposition or habit of his mind; in this sense he is “a child of God;” “born of God;” God is his father, &c.

Though these terms are currently used promiscuously and indiscriminately, yet this appears to be an incorrectness; which probably would appear more striking, if proper care were taken to distinguish accurately between the terrestrial and the celestial kingdom of God; the professional or temporal kingdom of grace, and the ultimate or eternal kingdom of glory, &c.

The term used by Peter, (1 Epist. i. 3.) who thanks God for his abundant mercy by which he regenerates us, (ἀναγεννησάς) in a lively or life-giving hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, seems to come very near to the import of παλιγγενεσία. It seems to imply, that mankind, the Jews especially, had once possessed the hope of a glorious immortality, but had lost it; this is revived, re-animated, re-begotten in us, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ; nor should it be forgot, that whoever was baptized, professed conversion to, and commemoration of, a risen Saviour. A man totally dead could be no Saviour; the resurrection of the body, and the life everlasting, were, in that case, no better than cunningly devised fables, and the "hope of worms," as the Christians were reproached by their adversaries.

REHABIAH, eldest son of Eliezer, and grandson of Moses, 1 Chron. xxiii. 17; xxvi. 25. He and his brethren were Levites, and treasurers of the temple.

I. REHOB, father of Hadadezer, king of Syria, of Zobah, 2 Sam. viii. 3.

II. REHOB, also BETH-REHOB, a city or district of Asher, (Josh. xix. 28.) given to the Levites of the family of Gershon, 1 Chron. vi. 75; Josh. xxi. 31. It was in Syria, on the road to Hamath, (Numb. xiii. 21; 2 Sam. x. 6, 8.) and, probably, between Libanus and Anti-libanus, or at the foot of Anti-libanus. The city of Laish, or Dan was situate in the canton of Rehob, or, as the Hebrews call it, Rechob, Judg. xviii. 28.

REHOBOAM, the son and successor of Solomon, by Naamah, an Ammonitess, 1 Kings xii. xiv. 20, 21; 1 Chron. xi. xii. He was forty-one years old when he began to reign; and was therefore born in the first year of his father's reign. He ascended the throne A. M. 3029, and reigned seventeen years at Jerusalem. He died A. M. 3046.

The indiscretion of this prince caused ten of the tribes to revolt, and thus occasioned the founding of the kingdom of Israel. (See JEROBOAM.) Rehoboam, finding the reunion of the tribes hopeless, applied himself to the strengthening his kingdom against Jeroboam. He fortified and stored several cities; as Bethlehem, Etam, Tekoa, Beth-zur, Shoco, Adullam, Gath, Mareshah, Ziph, Adoraim, Lachish, Azekah, Zorah, Ajalon and Hebron. The number of his subjects was considerably increased by the priests and Levites, from the cities and territories of Jeroboam, who, seeing that this new king abolished the established worship of the Lord, and made priests for his golden calves, withdrew into the land of Judah and Benjamin, that they might attend in the temple at Jerusalem. Rehoboam and his people, however, did not continue faithful to the Lord above three years. They did evil, and provoked him by their wickedness, more than their fathers had done; committing all the wickedness and abominations of the Canaanites, whom the Lord had driven out.

Rehoboam married 18 wives, and had 60 concubines; by whom he had 28 sons, and 60 daughters. In the fifth year of his reign, God sent against Judah Shishak, (or Seseac,) king of Egypt, who carried off all the treasure of the house of the Lord, the king's treasures, and the golden bucklers made by Solomon, laying waste also the whole country, 2 Chron. xii; 1 Kings xiv. 25. The prophet Shemaiah went to attend Rehoboam, and the princes of Judah who were with him in Jerusalem, and said to them from the Lord, "You have forsaken me, and I, in my turn, have forsaken you, and delivered you into the hands of Shishak." The princes being convinced of the justice of these reproaches, humbled themselves; and God promised to Shemaiah, that he would not utterly abandon them, but only make them sensible of the difference between serving the Lord, and being subject to a foreign power.

After the departure of Shishak, Rehoboam made brazen bucklers, instead of those of gold, which the king of Egypt had taken away; and when he went to the temple, his guards carried them before him. The history of Rehoboam was written at length, by the prophets Shemaiah and Iddo; but their accounts are not come to our hands; nor any particulars of those constant wars which were between him and Jeroboam. Rehoboam was buried in the city of David, and was succeeded by his son Abijah, who, speaking of his father, says, he was an ignorant prince, unskilled in the art of government, a weak man, and without courage, 2 Chron. xiii. 7. Solomon seems to have had this son, his successor, before his eyes, when he said, (Ecl. ii. 18, 19.) "Yea, I hated all my labor which I had taken under the sun, because I should leave it unto the man that should be after me; and who knoweth whether he shall be a wise man or a fool? Yet shall he have rule over all my labor wherein I have labored, and wherein I have showed myself wise under the sun. This is also vanity."

REHOBOTH, one of the cities of Assyria, Gen. x. 11.

REHUM, a chief officer of the king of Persia at Samaria. His title of dignity in Hebrew is Bell Team, Lord of the decree, probably chancellor, or chief secretary, &c. He was the chief officer of the king of Persia, who commanded in Samaria and Palestine. He wrote to Artaxerxes, (Smerdis,) the successor of Cambyses, to oppose the re-building of the temple of Jerusalem, Ezra iv. 9.

REINS, or KIDNEYS. The Hebrews often make the reins the seat of the affections, and ascribe to them knowledge, joy, pain, pleasure; hence in Scripture it is so often said, that God searches the heart and the reins. Elsewhere, the Scripture imputes to the reins, love and the fountain of generation, 1 Kings viii. 19. God upbraids the Jews with having him enough in their mouths, but not in their reins and hearts, Jer. xii. 2. In trouble and in fear the reins are disturbed and tremble. They faint away, (Nah. ii. 10.) and are relaxed, Dan. v. 6; Ezek. xxix. 7. The psalmist says, that his reins have encouraged and excited him to praise the Lord, (Ps. xvi. 7.) and Jeremiah, (Lam. iii. 13.) that the Lord had sent the daughters of his quiver into his reins; that is, he has pierced me with his arrows; he hath exhausted his whole quiver upon me: the daughters of the quiver is a poetical expression for arrows. Metaphorically it is said, (Deut. xxxii. 14.) the fat of the reins of wheat, to signify the finest flour: Vulgate, marrow of wheat.

REKEM, a king of the Midianites in Arabia, who gave his name to the city afterwards called by the Greeks Petra. He was slain by Phinehas, for the abomination of Baal-peor, Numb. xxxi. 8.

RELIGION is taken in three senses in Scripture: (1.) For the external and ceremonial worship of the Jewish religion, Exod. xii. 43. (2.) For the true religion; the best manner of serving and honoring God, Jam. i. 27. (3.) For superstition, which see.

REMALIAH, father of Pekah, king of Israel, 2 Kings xv. 25.

REMEMBRANCE, or MEMORY. God requires that we should keep his commandments in remembrance. He tells Moses (Exod. xvii. 14.) that he "will utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven;" that is, he will destroy him so entirely, that no further mention shall be made of him, as a people. He says, (Ps. xxxiv. 16.) that "the face of the Lord is against them that do evil, to cut off the remembrance of them from the earth." And Ps. ix. 6, "Thou hast destroyed cities, their memorial is perished with them." On the contrary, God has promised to the righteous and just, that their memory shall be blessed, and shall never perish.

REMISSION is sometimes taken for the year of jubilee, or the sabbatical year, in which the slaves were set at liberty, and in which every one returned into his own inheritance. (So in the Vulgate, Lev. xxv. 10; Numb. xxxvi. 4; Deut. xv. 1.) It is also used for pardon of sin. The gospel says, that "John did baptize in the wilderness, and preach the baptism of repentance, for the remission of sins, Mark i. 4; Luke iii. 3. And that the blood of Jesus Christ was shed, to procure remission of our sins, Eph. i. 7; Col. i. 14; Matt. xxvi. 28.

It is somewhat remarkable, says Mr. Taylor, that the term pardon of sin, does not occur in the New Testament; but we read of remission and forgiveness. Certainly these words, with the ideas they represent, are allied; yet there seems to be some distinction preserved between them. When the observation is made, "This man who takes upon him to forgive sins, blasphemeth: who can forgive sins but God?" it should seem as if our Lord had said, "Thy sins are remitted;" but that term would not have justified the inference made. When John preached the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins, and when our Lord gave power to his apostles, "Whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted;" we cannot suppose that either of these parties invaded an acknowledged prerogative of God. If the remission of sins by the apostles was declaratory, if John the Baptist was the prophet of the Highest, to give the knowledge of salvation to his people, by the remission of their sins; if, in consequence of the confession of sins made previous to baptism by John, that prophet remitted sins by baptism, that is, declared them to be remitted; if Peter advised the Jews to be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins; then we must admit that the exercise of this power by men, was by no means identical with the forgiveness of sins, which appertains to God only. Under the law there was no remission of sins without shedding of blood; that is, until the proper sacrifices were offered, the priest could not pronounce the transgressor free from the consequences of his transgressions: under the gospel no blood was shed by John, or by the apostles; but the blood of Jesus Christ was shed for many, for the remission of sins; and remission of sins was preached in his name.

The term ἀφεσις, rendered remission, signifies to announce liberty to the captive, (Luke iv. 18,) to release the obligation of a debt, as in the sabbatical year, Deut. xv. 3. The term ἀφίημι, rendered forgive, is, with the greatest propriety, addressed to God; "Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors"—"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do;" and the power of forgiving, "Son, be of good cheer, thy sins be forgiven thee, assumed by our Lord, was greatly superior to that of announcing remission, conferred on the apostles; and could be becoming only in a personage infinitely above them in dignity and power.

REMPHAN. Amos (v. 26.) upbraids the Hebrews with having carried, during their wanderings in the wilderness, "the tabernacle of their Moloch, the image of their idol, and the star of their god." Stephen, (Acts vii. 43.) quoting this passage, says, "Ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch, and the star of your god Remphan." See CHIRUS, and MOLOCH.

REPENTANCE is generally taken for that contrition, compunction, regret, or sorrow which rises in us, after having done something contrary to our duty; joined to a sincere resolution of avoiding the like in future. It is also taken for the works of penitence; fasting, weeping, alms, and works of satisfaction; that is, retribution. There is a false repentance, as that of Antiochus Epiphanes, of Judas Iscariot, of Pharaoh, of Saul, of Ahab. Judas wanted confidence in the mercy of God, and therefore fell into despair. Antiochus had no sincere contrition. Pharaoh and Saul were terrified, but not moved by a true repentance; they continued hardened, and changed neither their minds nor their manners. Ahab was indeed touched, but he wanted perseverance in rectitude.

Samuel says to Saul, (1 Sam. xv. 29.) "The strength of Israel will not lie, nor repent, for he is not a man, that he should repent." That is, he will not change his resolution, as men make resolutions, and then repent of them, and perform them not. He has passed his sentence against you, and will not annul it. Paul says, in the same sense, the gifts and calling of God are without repentance. That is, God does not revoke his favors; he never forsakes us first; never changes his mind.

The Book of Wisdom (v. 3.) represents the wicked in another life, as repenting and bewailing; seized with compunction and despair, at seeing good men in honor, while they themselves are in trouble. We know that in another life, repentance and remorse are useless. See the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, Luke xvi. 24.

The sacred writers often represent God as a king, moved with regret or repentance, or relenting for having suffered, or having resolved on certain things. So Moses says, (Gen. vi. 6, 7.) God repented that he had made man, seeing the wickedness of his actions had proceeded to such extremity. So (1 Sam. xv. 11.) he repented of having made Saul king; not as if he had conceived any regret at what he had done, or that he repents of having taken a false step, as a man does when he perceives he has committed an error. God is not capable of repentance in this sense. But sometimes he changes his conduct towards those who are unfaithful to him, and, after having treated them with disregarded mercy, he corrects them with deserved severity.

God is said to repent of evil he was about to inflict, when, moved with compassion toward the miserable, or entreated by their prayers, or affected by their repentance, he remits the punishment of their sins, and does not execute his threatenings against them. Thus it is said, (Ps. cvi. 45,) that he repented according to the multitude of his mercies, and that he caused his people to find favor in the eyes of those to whom he had given them up into bondage. And in Jeremiah xviii. 8, the Lord declares, that if his people repent of their evil doings, he will also repent of the evil which he designed to inflict on them; that is, he would treat them favorably; but, on the contrary, if his people would not obey his commands, he would repent of the good he intended them.

These expressions are used after the manner of men, and in accommodation to human language, because in no other way can we conceive of the actions of Deity. When human passions are ascribed to God, there is no intention of representing him as affected by such weaknesses; but those ascriptions are intelligible to us, and are understood as metaphors, and figures of speech; always remembering that threatenings are conditional, and may be either revoked or abated. Not so promises, unless expressed; they may be depended upon for full realization.

The baptism of repentance is that which John the Baptist preached to the Jews, when he baptized them in Jordan, and exhorted them to "bring forth fruits worthy of repentance," Matt. iii. 11; Mark i. 4; Luke iii. 3.

REPHAIM, ancient giants of Canaan, of whom there were several families. It is commonly supposed they descended from an ancestor called Rephah, or Rapha; but others imagine that the word properly signified giants, in the ancient language of this people. There were Rephaim beyond Jordan, at Ashtaroth Karnaim, in the time of Abraham, Gen. xiv. 5. Also some in the time of Moses. Og, king of Bashan, was of the Rephaim. In the time of Joshua, some of their descendants dwelt in the land of Canaan, (Josh. xii. 4; xvii. 15.) and we hear of them in David's time, in the city of Gath, 1 Chron. xx. 4—6. The giants Goliath, Sippai, Lahmi and others, were remains of the Rephaim. Their magnitude and strength are well known in Scripture.

THE VALLEY of the REPHAIM, or giants, was famous in Joshua's time, and also in David's, Josh. xv. 8; xviii. 16; 2 Sam. v. 18, 22; 1 Chron. xi. 15; xiv. 9. It is placed as one limit of the portion of Judah. It was near Jerusalem, and it may be doubted whether it belonged to Judah or to Benjamin, because of the contiguity of these two tribes. Eusebius places it in Benjamin; but Josh. xviii. 16, and those passages of the books of Samuel where it is mentioned, hint that it belonged to Judah, and was south or west of Jerusalem, towards Bethlehem and the Philistines.

REPHIDIM, a station or encampment of Israel in the desert, Exod. xvii. 1. Here the people wanting water, began to murmur against Moses, saying, "Why have you brought us out of Egypt, to kill us with thirst in this desert?" Moses then cried to the Lord, who said, "Take the people to the rock of Horeb, with the elders: I shall be there on the rock before you; you shall strike it with your rod, and water shall gush out, that the people may drink." This Moses did, and the place was called Temptation, because of the complaints of Israel, who there tempted the Lord, saying, Is the Lord among us or not?

Rephidim could not be far from Horeb, because God ordered Moses to go from thence to the rock of Horeb, to give the people water. And this same water seems to have served the Israelites, not only in the encampment of Rephidim, and in that of mount Sinai, but also in other encampments. Paul says, (1 Cor. x. 4.) that this rock followed them in their journey; and that it was a figure, or type of Christ. "For they drank of that spiritual rock that followed them, and that rock was Christ." This miracle at Rephidim happened A. M. 2513, in the second month after the departure from Egypt. And here Joshua obtained a famous victory over the Amalekites, while Moses lifted up his hands toward heaven, Exod. xvii. 8—10. See EXODUS, p. 400.

REPROACH is used in two senses; (1.) for the disgrace or confusion that any one suffers in himself; (2.) for that which he causes in another. Among the Hebrews, to be uncircumcised was a reproach:

and when Joshua circumcised those born in the wilderness, he tells them, "I have rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you," Josh. v. 9. Barrenness was a reproach; and hence Rachel, on the birth of a second son, says, "The Lord has taken away my reproach," Gen. xxx. 23. Isaiah says, (iv. 1.) that the time shall come when men shall be so scarce in Israel, that seven women shall lay hold of one man, and shall say to him, "We ask you nothing for our maintenance, only deliver us from the reproach of sterility and a single life: take us as wives," &c. The Lord struck the Philistines with a shameful malady in ano, and thereby loaded them with reproach, Ps. lxxviii. 66.

Servitude, slavery, poverty, subjection to enemies, extraordinary diseases, as the leprosy, &c. were reckoned reproaches, because they were supposed to be the effect of cowardice, or idleness, or bad management; or to be inflictions sent from God, to punish injustice and impiety. The Lord, in many places, threatens his people to make them a reproach and a proverb, which has been fulfilled in numerous instances, by the servitudes with which the Jews have been overwhelmed, and by the misfortunes which have happened to them. The psalmist often complains, that God had made him a reproach to those about him; who insulted over his misfortunes and disgrace.

"Not to take up a reproach against our neighbor," (Ps. xv. 3.) is not to listen to slanders and calumnies brought against him. David took away the reproach from Israel, by slaying Goliath, 1 Sam. xvii. 26; Eccles. xlvii. 4. Jeremiah says, "I was ashamed, yea, even confounded, because I did bear the reproach of my youth," chap. xxxi. 19. "Thou hast brought the shame of my youthful faults upon me; thou hast showed me the horror of them, and hast made me bear the pain and confusion arising from them." And Isaiah, (liv. 4.) "Thou shalt forget the shame of thy youth, and shalt not remember the reproach of thy widowhood any more." He speaks to the tribe of Judah, after the return from the captivity. Thou shalt no longer remember the reproach thou hast suffered among foreign nations.

REPROBATION is equivalent to rejection, which always implies a cause—"Reprobate silver shall men call them;" (Jer. vi. 30.) that is, they are base metal, counterfeit coin. Where all are equally unworthy, if some be preferred to honor, the rest may be said, in a sense, to be reprobated, that is, left where they were; their condition is not worse, but it is not improved; nevertheless, those only can be said to be rejected, who have been offered, either by themselves, or by others; God never rejects any who offer themselves, but those who, by continuing in sin, reject the offered mercy of God, reprobate themselves; they say unto God, "Depart from us, for we desire not the knowledge of thy ways."

REPTILES, animals that have no feet, or such short ones, that they seem to creep, or crawl, on the ground. Serpents, worms, locusts and caterpillars are taken for reptiles. The Hebrews put fishes also among reptiles, (they having no feet,) whatever be their nature, or shape, Gen. i. 21; Lev. xi. 46; Ps. lxxix. 34, &c. This name is sometimes also extended to such land animals, as are not of the same nature with the great beasts for service, nor of the larger wild beasts. In a word, "to creep upon the earth" is sometimes used for moving, or going to and fro, as all four-footed creatures do.

RESEN, a city of Assyria, between Nineveh and Calah, (Gen. x. 12.) on the river Chaboras in Mesopotamia.

RESEPH, a city taken by the king of Assyria, 2 Kings xix. 12; Isa. xxxvii. 12.

RESPECT OF PERSONS. God appointed that the judges should pronounce sentence without respect of persons, Lev. xix. 15; Deut. xvi. 17, 19. That they should consider neither the poor nor the rich, the weak nor the powerful; but should attend only to truth and justice. God has no respect of persons. And the Jews complimented our Saviour, that he told the truth, without respect of persons, without fear, Matt. xxii. 16. (See Isa. xxxii. 1—16.) Jude, (ver. 16.) instead of the phrase, "to have respect of persons," has "to admire persons."

Our English term respect seems to imply some kind of deference or submission to a party: but this is not always the proper meaning to be annexed to it in Scripture. When we read, (Exod. ii. 25.) "God had respect to the children of Israel," it can only express his compassion and sympathy for them: when God had respect to the offering of Abel, (Gen. iv. 4.) it imports to accept favorably, to notice with satisfaction. (Comp. 1 Kings viii. 28; Numb. xvi. 15.)

REST, or REPOSE, was enjoined upon the Israelites on the sabbath-day, for the glory of God; in that he rested after the six days of creation. See SABBATH.

Rest also signifies a fixed and secure habitation. You shall go before your brethren, "until the Lord shall give rest to your brethren, as well as to you, in the land which they are going to make a conquest of," Deut. iii. 20. And Deut. xii. 9, "For ye are not as yet come to the rest and to the inheritance which the Lord your God giveth you." You are not as yet settled in that land which you are to possess. Naomi says to Ruth, "My daughter, shall I not seek rest for thee, that it may be well with thee?" (Ruth iii. 1.) i. e. I shall endeavor to procure you a settlement. David, speaking of the ark of the covenant, which till his time had no fixed place of settlement, says, "Arise, O Lord, into thy rest, thou and the ark of thy strength," Ps. cxxxii. 8. And Eccles. xxxvi. 15, "O be merciful unto Jerusalem, thy holy city, the place of thy rest."

In a moral and spiritual sense, rest denotes the fixed and permanent state of repose enjoyed by the blessed in heaven; and to this Paul makes an application of what is said of the settlement of the Israelites in the Land of Promise; "I swear to them in my wrath, that they should not enter into my rest," that is, into the land of Canaan, Ps. xcvi. 11. Therefore, says Paul, (Heb. iii. 17—19; iv. 1—3.) as they could not enter therein by reason of their unbelief, let us be afraid of imitating their example: for we cannot enter but by faith, &c.

RESTITUTION. Natural justice requires that we should repair whatever injuries we have done to our neighbor, whether in his person, property, or reputation. The law of Moses prescribed, (Exod. xxi. 23—25; Lev. xxiv. 20; Deut. xix. 21.) "life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe." Also, that they should render five oxen for one ox, and four sheep for one sheep; (Exod. xxii.) or that the thief should be sold, to make restitution for his theft: that if he had taken away any beast of service, as an ox, an ass, or even a sheep, he should restore it two-fold; that whoever should damage the field of another, should repair the damage, according to an estimate. He who, by ignorance, should omit to give to the temple what was appointed by the law, for example, in the tithes or first-fruits, was obliged to restore it to the priests, and to add a fifth part beside; over and above which, he was bound to offer a ram, for his expiation. Nehemiah prevailed with all those Israelites to make restitution, who had taken interest of their brethren, (Neh. v. 10, 11.) and Zaccheus (Luke xix. 8.) promises a four-fold restitution to all from whom he had extorted, in his office as a publican. The Roman laws condemned to a four-fold restitution all who were convicted of extortion or fraud. Zaccheus here imposes that penalty on himself, to which he adds the half of his goods; which was what the law did not require.

He who had killed a beast, as an ox, was to render another for it, or the value of it, Lev. xxiv. 18, 21.

The Jews expected Elias in the day of the Messiah, who was to restore all things, Matt. xvii. 11; Mal. iv. 5, 6. And Peter (Acts iii. 21.) calls the last day the day of restitution of all things. At the end of the world Christ will unite the church with the synagogue, the Jew with the Christian, the Christian with the Gentile: then all things will be restored to a perfect union, and there will be but one shepherd and one flock.

RESURRECTION, revival from the dead. The belief of a resurrection is an article of religion common to Jew and Christian; and is expressly taught in both Testaments. We speak not here of that miraculous resurrection, which consists in reviving for a time, to die again afterwards; as Elijah, Elisha, Christ, and his apostles, raised some from the dead; but of a general resurrection of the dead, which will take place at the end of the world, and which will be followed by an immortality either of happiness or of misery. So the psalmist says, (xvi. 10.) "For thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, [the grave,] neither wilt thou suffer thine holy one to see corruption." Job xix. 25—27, "For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand in the latter day upon the earth. And though after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh I shall see God: whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another: though my reins be consumed within me." Ezekiel, also, in his vision of a great quantity of bones in a large field, which, at the breath of the Spirit of the Lord, began to unite, to be covered with flesh, nerves and skin, and at last to revive, has left us a proof and an assurance of a general resurrection, Ezek. xxxvii. (See also Isa. xxvi. 19.) The Book of Wisdom (chap. iii. iv. 15.) speaks of it in a very lively manner; and in the Maccabees, we see the same truth maintained still more expressly, 2 Mac. vii. 9, 14, 23, 29; Heb. xi. 35.

When our Saviour appeared in Judea, the resurrection from the dead was received as a principal article of religion by the whole Jewish nation, except the Sadducees, whose error our Saviour has effectually confuted. He has promised his faithful servants a complete state of happiness after the general resurrection; and he arose himself from the dead, to give, among other things, a proof in his own person, a pledge, a pattern of the future resurrection. Paul, in almost all his Epistles, speaks of a general resurrection; refutes those who denied or opposed it; proves it to those who had difficulties about it; in some degree explains the mystery, the manner, and several circumstances of it; says, that to deny it, is the same as to deny our Saviour's resurrection; and that, if we were not to rise again from the dead, we should be of all men the most miserable, 1 Cor. xv.

Some of the ancient fathers acknowledged a twofold resurrection: (1.) that which is to precede the Messial's reign of a thousand years upon earth; (2.) that which is to follow the reign of a thousand years, and to begin the reign of the saints in a state of everlasting happiness. This sentiment they borrowed from the Jews; it is found clearly enough in the second book of Esdras, iv. 35; vi. 18, &c. in the Testament of the twelve patriarchs, and in several of the rabbins.

It is inquired, what will be the nature of bodies when raised, what their stature, their age, their sex? Christ tells us, (Matt. xxii. 30.) that after the resurrection men shall be as the angels of God; that is, according to the fathers, they shall be immortal, incorruptible, and in some sort spiritual; yet without losing the qualities of bodies, as we find our Saviour's body, after his resurrection, was tangible, and had flesh on his bones, Luke xxiv. 39.

The schoolmen have discussed the doctrine of the resurrection with great subtlety and minuteness; but there are several questions connected with it, as it appears in Scripture, which comprise much greater importance than those so assiduously treated by them. That some notion of a resurrection was in circulation among the Jews, appears from the perplexity of Herod the tetrarch, Matt. xiv. When he heard of the fame of Jesus, he said, "This is John the Baptist; he is risen from the dead, and therefore mighty works do show forth themselves in him." How could he conceive of a resurrection of John, when he knew that he had been decollated, that his head was in the keeping of Herodias, and that his body had been buried by his disciples? verse 12. It could not be a corporeal resurrection; the body without the head was undoubtedly imperfect, and incapable of life. And if Herod supposed (as some say) that the soul of John animated the body of Jesus, how was that a resurrection; and what could be his reasons for imagining that, in such a case, "mighty works" would be wrought by a soul returned to earth from the abode, or the state, of separate spirits?

Very confused, undoubtedly, were the notions of the best instructed of the disciples of Jesus on this subject. When Peter, James and John, as they came down from the mount of Transfiguration, were charged to preserve secrecy as to what they had witnessed, "till the Son of man should be risen from the dead," they cross-examined each other as to the import of this phrase. They could not think themselves enjoined to silence till the general resurrection; undoubtedly they should all be dead long enough before that: and as to the particular resurrection of the Son of man, they were completely at a loss, since they, in common with other Jews, had heard out of the law, that the Messiah abideth for ever. This was explained to John (first, apparently) and to Peter, (John xx. 8.) and this "questioning among themselves," might be no bad preparative for that conviction. In the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, (Luke xvi.) the passage of a separate spirit from a state of felicity to this world, is plainly supposed to be possible; and the phrase "rising from the dead," is used in a manner to show that it was common and current at that time among that people.

The doctrine of a general resurrection as an article of faith, is expressly acknowledged by Martha, at the grave of Lazarus, (John xi. 24.) and it is clear, that no individual can receive according to the deeds done in the body, unless the body be party to the sentence, as well as to the deeds.

But the conceptions of both Jews and Gentiles were exceedingly gross and obscure on a doctrine so contrary to universal experience. They inclined too much to the notion of a corporeal resurrection, to a renovated term of sensual enjoyment, to terrestrial pleasures, a freedom from the evils of life, but a participation in its joys and advantages; a prolongation of being, in its favorable sense, on earth; but again to close and terminate. Of a resurrection of the body to eternal life, properly speaking, and in a state of perfect holiness and glory, superior to the delights of sense, they appear to have had no idea: hence the Gentiles, especially, both ridiculed and hated the doctrines held and enforced by the disciples of Jesus.

It was the opinion of Chrysostom, that the philosophers addressed by Paul at Athens, (Acts xvii. 18.) took Jesus and the resurrection, Ἀνάστασις, for a god or deified man, and a goddess or deified principle. Dr. Hammond adopts this idea, and is followed by later writers. It is countenanced by their expression—"he seems to be a setter forth of foreign demons," that is, of departed spirits existing in a separate and more exalted state, but exercising great power in this lower world.

Undoubtedly, Paul was the best qualified of all men to describe the glories of the resurrection-body of Christ; for, during his abode on earth, Christ suspended, or suppressed, those glories; and the appearances of Christ, seen by the writers of the Apocalypse, being in vision, and that vision emblematical and mysterious, they will not bear arguments so cogent as the manifestation in the way to Damascus. Paul repeatedly asserts that "he had seen the Lord,"—that he had been commissioned by him; he reports a long communication that took place, (Acts xxvi. 13—18.) and he affirms the excessive refulgence of the splendor from the body of Jesus, its effects on his companions, and more especially on himself, in whom it produced blindness; that is, perhaps, the cornea of the eye was so greatly indurated, that its transparency was lost; nor was the power of seeing restored to the eye, till after the original cornea had peeled off, in the form of scales.

It may well be supposed that preëminence in point of splendor is conferred on the resurrection-body of Christ; nor should we press too closely the words of John, "We shall be like him, when we shall see him as he is." Nevertheless, we may modestly conjecture, that a glory somewhat similar will be attached even to the bodies of saints; though it becomes us to confess that our ignorance on all celestial subjects is rendered the more sensible, by the very communications with which we have been favored by divine revelation itself. We are more conscious of our ignorance, incompetency and weakness, than the uninstructed heathen, or the partially instructed Hebrews, could possibly be. We repose our confidence on the infinite power of our Maker, we receive the doctrine simply as an article of divine revelation; and, notwithstanding the difficulties of the subject, and the power of opposing appearances, we rejoice in hope of the glory of God.

REU, or RAGAU, (Luke iii. 35.) son of Peleg, Gen. xi. 18, 19. His father was then thirty years old. He begat Serug, being thirty-two years old, A. M. 1819, and died at the age of two hundred and thirty-nine years, A. M. 2026. It is not impossible, that the city of Rages, and the plain of Ragau, might take their names from Reu, or Ragau; for these are the same in the Hebrew. The difference depends on the pronunciation of the letter y ain, or gnain, Gen. xi. 18; 1 Chron. i. 25.

REUBEN, (behold! a son); so called in reference to the sentiment of his mother, "The Lord hath looked on my affliction;" the eldest son of Jacob and Leah; born A. M. 2246, Gen. xxix. 32. Reuben, having defiled his father's concubine Bilhah, lost his birth-right, and all the privileges of primogeniture, Gen. xxxv. 22. When Joseph's brethren had taken a resolution to destroy him, Reuben endeavored by all means to deliver him. He proposed to them, to let him down into an old water-pit, which had then no water; that afterwards he might take him up again, and restore him to his father Jacob. His brethren took the advice; but while Reuben was at some distance, they sold Joseph to a party of Ishmaelites. Reuben going to the pit, and not finding him there, tore his clothes, and bewailed his brother's loss.

Jacob, when dying, warmly reproached Reuben with his crime committed with Bilhah; saying, "Reuben, thou art my first-born, my might, but unstable as water, thou shalt not excel, because thou wendest up to thy father's bed; then defiledst thou it." Moses, before his death, said of Reuben, (Deut. xxxiii. 6.) "Let Reuben live and not die, yet let his number be but small." His tribe was never very numerous, nor very considerable in Israel. They had their inheritance beyond Jordan, between the brooks Arnon south, and Jazer north, having the mountains of Gilead east, and Jordan west. (See CANAAN.) The time of Reuben's death is unknown.

REUEL, son of Esau and Bashemath, daughter of Ishmael, was father of Nabath, Zerah, Shammah and Mizzah, Gen. xxxvi. 4, 17.

REUMAH, concubine to Nahor, the brother of Abraham; was mother of Tebah, Gaham, Thahash and Maachah, Gen. xxii. 24.

REVELATION, an extraordinary and supernatural discovery made to the mind of man; whether by dream, vision, ecstasy, or otherwise. Paul, alluding to his visions and revelations, (2 Cor. xii. 1, 7.) speaks of them in the third person, out of modesty; and declares, that he could not tell whether he were in the body or out of the body. Elsewhere he says, that he had received his gospel by a particular revelation: (Gal. i. 12.) again, that he did not go to Jerusalem after his conversion by the mere motion of his own mind, but in consequence of a revelation, Gal. ii. 2.

"Revelation" is used to express the manifestation of Jesus Christ to Jews and Gentiles; (Luke ii. 32.) the manifestation of the glory with which God will glorify his elect and faithful servants at the last judgment; (Rom. viii. 19.) and the declaration of his just judgments, in his conduct both towards the elect, and towards the reprobate, Rom. ii. 5—16. There is a very noble application of the word revelation to the consummation of all things, or the revelation of Jesus Christ in his future glory, 1 Cor. i. 7; 1 Pet. i. 13.

REVELATION, BOOK OF, see APOCALYPSE.

REVENGE, the return of an injury, from a desire of hurting the object. Hence it is generally said, that when Scripture says that God revenges himself, it speaks after a popular manner: the meaning is, he vindicates the injuries done to his justice and his majesty, and to the order established by him in the world; yet without any emotion of displeasure. He revenges the injuries done to his servants, because he is just, and because order and justice must be preserved. It may, however, be remarked, that our language maintains a distinction between the terms revenge and avenge, although it is too often overlooked. That God may avenge, that is, punish in proportion to sins committed, is the indefeasible consequence of his infinite justice, of his moral government, holiness, &c. but to revenge seems rather the act of a man when he inflicts an injury on another, commensurate, in his estimation, to the injury he has received from that other, and in this he is likely to be guilty of excess. It is, therefore, not without pain that we read of God's revenging, since a disposition to revenge, or a spirit of revenge, is very improperly imputed to Deity, and we cannot be too cautious on this subject. To avenge a broken law, to avenge the injuries sustained by the widow and fatherless, that is, to punish those who oppress them in proportion to demerit, is no more than justice, and may be accomplished in various ways; possibly, even without inflicting evil on the culprit—but by bringing him to a penitent sense of his misconduct, inducing him to make restitution, to make amends, to compensate for damages, and to resolve on better conduct for the future, &c. In short, it should seem that determination to avenge, is a pure and simple wish to do justice or to see justice done; while the desire to revenge springs from pride, or self-love, and is a human infirmity actuated by passion, vehemently assuming the character of retaliation, vexing, or injuring the object of it.

In the Old Testament, God appears to have tolerated revenge in certain cases, to avoid greater evils: "An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, &c. Exod. xxi. 24. The relations of a man who had been killed might take revenge on the murderer, Numb. xxxv. 16—18, &c. (See REFUGE.) However, God has sufficiently declared, that vengeance belongs only to him, Deut. xxxii. 35. He forbids malice and revenge in express terms; he will not allow us to keep any resentment in our hearts against our brethren, Lev. xix. 17, 18. And when God seems to have established the lex talionis, he does not thereby allow of revenge, but sets limits to it. He does not, as Augustin remarks, intend to provoke to anger, but to stop the progress and consequences of it.

"The day of vengeance" sometimes expresses the day of judgment, in which God will take vengeance on all his enemies; sometimes the day of vengeance stands for the punishment God exercises on his enemies, when their iniquities have attained their full measure, Exod. xxxii. 34; Isa. xxxiv. 8; lxi. 2; lxiii. 4; Luke xxi. 22.

REVENGER, or REVENGER OF BLOOD, is a name given in Scripture to the man who had the right, according to the Jewish polity, of taking revenge on him who had killed one of his relations. If a man had been guilty of manslaughter, involuntarily and without design, he fled to a city of refuge. See the subject fully treated under REFUGE.

REVERENCE, a respectful, submissive disposition of mind, arising from affection and esteem, from a sense of superiority in the person revered. Hence children reverence their fathers, even when their fathers correct them by stripes; (1 Heb. xii. 9.) hence subjects reverence their sovereign; (2 Sam. ix. 6.) hence wives reverence their husbands; (Eph. v. 33.) and hence all ought to reverence God. We reverence the name of God, the house of God, the worship of God, &c.; we reverence the attributes of God, the commands, dispensations, &c. of God; and we ought to demonstrate our reverence by overt acts, such as are suitable and becoming to time, place and circumstances; for though a man may reverence

God in his heart, yet unless he behave reverentially, and give proofs of his reverence by demeanor, conduct and obedience, he will not easily persuade his fellow mortals, that his bosom is the residence of this divine and heavenly disposition; for, in fact, a reverence for God is not one of those lights which burn under a bushel, but one of those whose sprightly lustre illuminates wherever it is admitted.—Reverence is, strictly speaking, perhaps, the internal disposition of the mind, φρόνησις; (Rom. xiii. 7.) and honor, τιμὴ, the external expression of that disposition.

REWARD, a recompense, requital, retribution for some service done; the fruit and benefit of labor. It is of several kinds: as mental,—the reward of a good action is enjoyed in reflection, satisfaction, a sense of having been useful, &c.—pecuniary, or profitable, such as is due to laborers for their work; (1 Tim. v. 18; Job vii. 2.) a gift, or acquisition to counterbalance an injury, Prov. xxi. 14; xxii. 4. Rewards are not always conferred by Providence on good men in this life, but their reward is in heaven, Matt. v. 12; Luke vi. 23. The essence of reward being satisfaction, a reward given freely, a reward prompted by grace and favor, is a donation not claimable by the party who receives it, on account of his own merit, but is bestowed in kindness by the giver; and therefore, though in strictness it is not reward for work done, yet it is no less a remuneration, and is at once a gift and a satisfaction. “Raphelius has shown, (says Dr. Doddridge,) that μισθός not only signifies a reward of debt, but also a gift of favor; and that the phrase μισθὸν δοῦναι occurs in Herodotus: so that a reward of grace, or favor, is a classical as well as a theological expression.” (Note on Rom. iv. 4.)

I. REZIN, a king of Syria, who combined with Pekah, king of Israel, to invade Judah, 2 Kings xv. 37, 38; xvi. 5, 6. A. M. 3262. (See also 2 Chron. xxviii. 5—7.) The first year of Ahaz they besieged Jerusalem; but not being able to take it, they wasted the country around, and withdrew. The year following they returned, and the Lord delivered up to them the army and the country of Ahaz. After this, they separated their troops; and Rezin carried away much plunder and many captives to Damascus. About the same time, he took Elath, on the Red sea; whence he drove out the Jews, and settled Idumeans in their room, who, probably, had engaged him to undertake the war. The Hebrew and the Vulgate (2 Kings xvi. 6.) seem to intimate, that he conquered Elath for the Syrians. But the tenor of the discourse sufficiently shows, that we ought to read, “for the Idumeans:” and that the Hebrew should be read Edom, not Aram. The difference between these two words in the original, is hardly perceivable: עֲדוּמִי, Leedom, instead of אַרָמִי, Learam. Ahaz, finding himself not strong enough to withstand Rezin and Pekah, applied to Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, and with a very large sum of money bought his assistance. Tiglath-pileser marched against Damascus, took the city, and slew Rezin: he also carried away his people to Kir; probably the river Cyrus in Iberia, 2 Kings xvi. 9.

II. REZIN, a Jew, who returned from Babylon, Ezra ii. 48; Neh. vii. 50.

REZON, son of Eliadah, revolted from his master Hadadazer, king of Zobah, while David made war against him; and, heading a band of robbers, made inroads into the country about Damascus, 1 Kings xi. 23. He at last became master of that city, and was acknowledged king. Whether this was during the reigns of David and Solomon, Rezon being tributary to them; or whether it was not till near the end of Solomon’s reign, we have no means of determining.

RHEGIUM, a city of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, on the coast near the south-west extremity of Italy, opposite to Messina in Sicily. It is now called Reggio. The ship in which Paul was on his way to Rome, touched here, Acts xxviii. 13, 14.

RHODA, a young maid of the household of Mary, the mother of John Mark, Acts xii. 13, 14.

RHODES, an island and famous city of the Levant, the ancient name of which was Asteria, Ophiussa and Etheria. Its modern name alludes to the great quantity and beauty of the roses that grew there. It is chiefly famous for its brazen Colossus, which was 105 feet high, made by Chares of Lyndus: it stood across the mouth of the harbor of the city Rhodes, and continued perfect only fifty-six years, being thrown down by an earthquake, under the reign of Ptolemy Euergetes, king of Egypt, who began to reign ante A. D. 244. When Paul went to Jerusalem, A. D. 58, he visited Rhodes, Acts xxi. 1.

RIBLAH, a city of Syria, in the country of Hamath, the situation of which, however, is unknown. Jerome has taken it for Antioch of Syria, or for the country of Hamath, or Emmas, which was still in his time the first stage of those who travelled from Syria into Mesopotamia. However, this lies under great difficulties. Antioch was at a distance from Emesa; nor was it on the road from Judea to Mesopotamia. When Moses describes the eastern limits of the Land of Promise, (Numb. xxxiv. 10.) he says, “Ye shall point out your east border from Hazar-enan to Shepham. And the coast shall go down from Shepham to Riblah, on the east side of (the fountain) Ain; and the border shall descend, and shall reach unto the side of the sea of Cinnereth (Tiberias) eastward. And the border shall go down to Jordan; and the goings out of it shall be at the Salt sea (or the Dead sea).” The name of Daphne is not in the Hebrew: but the Chaldee paraphrasts and Jerome explain the fountain of Riblah by that of Daphne, near Antioch. Ezekiel draws the northern bounds of the Land of Promise from the Mediterranean sea to Hazar-enan, or Atrium Enan. He says, the city of Hamath limits the Holy Land toward the north; and its southern limits go through the middle of Hauran, Damascus, and the mountains of Gilead. He does not mention Riblah, but Hamath, in the territory of which Riblah was situate, Ezek. xlvi. 16, seq.

[The Babylonians, in their incursions into Palestine, were accustomed to take their way over Hamath and Ribla. Mr. Buckingham mentions a place Rebla, about 30 miles south of Hamath, on the Orontes, in which the ancient Riblah is doubtless to be recognized. (Travels among the Arab tribes, Lond. 1825, p. 481.) R.

Riblah, as a residence, was one of the most agreeable of Syria; whence it was selected by the kings of Babylon. Pharaoh Necho, king of Egypt, stayed here, on his return from his expedition against Carchemish; (2 Kings xxiii. 33.) and having sent for Jehoahaz, king of Judah, he here deprived him of the royal dignity, and promoted Jehoiakim. Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, continued at Riblah, while his general Nebuzardan besieged Jerusalem; and after the reduction of that city, Zedekiah, with the other prisoners, was brought to Riblah, where his eyes were put out, 2 Kings xxv. 6, 20; Jer. xxxix. 5; lii. 9.

RIGHT-HAND denotes power, or strength; whence Scripture generally imputes to God’s right-hand, the effects of his omnipotence, Exod. xv. 6. Ps. xxi. 8; xlv. 3, &c.; Matt. xxvi. 64; Col. iii. 1; Heb. i. 3; x. 12.

The right-hand commonly denotes the south, as the left-hand denotes the north. For the Hebrews speak of the quarters of the world in respect of a person, whose face is turned to the east, his back to the west, his right-hand to the south, and his left-hand to the north. Thus Kedem, which signifies before, denotes also the east; and Achor, which signifies behind, marks the west; Yamin, the right-hand, is the south; and Shemol, the left-hand, the north. For example; "Doth not David hide himself with us in strong holds in the wood, in the hill of Hachilah, which is on the south of Jeshimon?" Heb. on the right-hand of Jeshimon, 1 Sam. xxiii. 19, 24.

The accuser was commonly at the right-hand of the accused, (Ps. cix. 6.) and hence, Satan stands at the right-hand of the high-priest Joshua, to accuse him, Zech. iii. 1. But, often, in a quite contrary sense, to be at any one's right-hand, signifies to defend, to protect, to support him. Ps. xvi. 8; cix. 31; cviii. 6.

"To depart from the law of God, neither to the right-hand nor to the left," is a frequent Scripture expression, meaning a strict adherence to it: neither attempting to go beyond it, and doing more than it requires; nor doing less: we must observe it closely, constantly, invariably: as a traveller, who does not quit his way, either to the right or the left, lest he should lose it entirely.

Our Saviour, to show with what privacy we should do good works, says, (Matt. vi. 3.) "That our left-hand should not know what our right-hand does." Above all things we should avoid vanity and ostentation in alms and beneficence.

To give the right-hand is a mark of friendship. Paul says, that James, Cephas and John gave him the right-hand of fellowship, Gal. ii. 9. And in the Books of the Maccabees this expression occurs very often. See HAND.

In taking an oath, the Hebrews lifted up their right-hand, Isa. lxii. 8; Gen. xiv. 22; Deut. xxxii. 40. See OATH.

This article might be extended to an inconvenient length; it is, however, worth while to become acquainted with some of the distinctions allotted by Scripture to the right-hand. When Jacob called Benjamin the son of my right-hand, as the margin reads, it certainly denoted a special degree of affection for that child of his beloved Rachel; and when he purposely crossed his hands, so as to lay his right-hand on the head of Ephraim, (Gen. xlviii. 14.) this token, indicating greater prosperity, was readily understood by Joseph, as it was intended by his father. When we read (1 Chron. xxix. 24.) on occasion of the inauguration of Solomon, that "all the sons of David gave the hand unto Solomon as king;" we should understand the right-hand, given in token of allegiance and submission. In like manner of Babylon, (Jer. l. 15.) "She has given her hand," that is, her right-hand, has pledged her fidelity; and the same in Lam. v. 6, "We have given the hand, the right-hand, protesting thereby our submission, to the Egyptians, and to the Assyrians, to be satisfied with bread." When Abraham says, (Gen. xiv. 22.) "I have lifted up my hand to the Lord, and I cannot retract," he certainly means that he had sworn to the Lord, by lifting up his right-hand. What, then, can we think of those of whom it is alleged, (Ps. cxliv. 8.) their right-hand is a right-hand of falsehood; their oath is not to be taken; or of those who are so besotted as to worship gods of their own making, and never to question whether there be no lie in their right-hand; where truth, fidelity, and even scrupulous accuracy, should be maintained without intermission, Isa. xlv. 20.

The right-hand was stretched forth as an action of address, whether of entreaty, (as Prov. i. 24; Isa. lxx. 2.) or of oratory, (as Acts xxvi. 1.) or of protection, direction, &c.

The right-hand, especially, was lifted up in prayer; and it deserves notice that every figure delineated by the early Christians, remaining in their sepulchres, or elsewhere, intended to represent the action of prayer, has the hands—but especially the right-hand—lifted up, solemnly and steadily.

As much of the labor of life is performed with the right-hand, and as most of our Lord's hearers were laboring men, we ought not to pass without notice the emphatic nature of his advice—"If thy right-hand cause thee to offend, cut it off," Matt. v. 30. The inducement could not be slight, nor the conviction trivial, that could effect a loss and a suffering expressed by this figurative language.

To seat a person at the right-hand is a token of peculiar honor; so Bathsheba, as the king's mother, was placed at the right-hand of Solomon: (1 Kings ii. 19; comp. Ps. xlv. 9.) and when Christ is said to be seated on the right-hand of God, (Acts vii. 55; Rom. viii. 34; Col. iii. 1.) it imports unequalled dignity and exaltation.

It is evident, that when a hand, or the right-hand, is attributed to Deity, the expression should be taken only after the manner of men. Deity has neither right-hand nor left-hand; but the strength, the skill, the power of man lying much, and principally, in his right-hand, the idea is transferred to God, by an inevitable, and therefore a justifiable, liberty of speech.

RIGHTEOUS, and RIGHTEOUSNESS, are terms taken in several senses in Scripture. As for (1.) absolute perfection of rectitude and holiness; in which sense they are applied to God, who always observes the very strictness of equity, as well from the justice of his own nature, as in regard to his creatures, Job xxxvi. 2; John xvii. 25. (2.) The truth and faithfulness of God, in performing his promises, the rectitude by which he is governed in making and in fulfilling his promises. (3.) The righteousness of Christ, the righteousness acceptable to God, the manner of becoming righteous in the sight of God, are other acceptations of the words. (4.) Righteous is spoken comparatively of men. No man is absolutely righteous; but he who practises justice, equity, integrity, in his conduct, behavior, dealings, &c. is comparatively righteous. Whoever in his course of life "walks in all the ordinances and commandments of the Lord, blameless," is so far righteous. Hence some persons in Scripture are called righteous, as Noah; (Gen. vii. 1—9.) that is, a man of integrity and holy manners. So Abraham supposes (Gen. xviii. 23.) there might be fifty righteous in Sodom, men who were not profligates like the Sodomites in general; and this sense is frequent in the Psalms, &c. Alms are called righteousness, Matt. vi. 1. (5.) Righteousness in the New Testament is applied to God; to Christ the righteous, (1 John ii. 1.) and to men; but as men have, at best, but a broken, damaged, and imperfect righteousness, this word is applied to men in a very limited and qualified sense; and also with respect to a better righteousness than merely human; that obtained by faith; that freely bestowed by God, and as bestowed, so received, through Christ. (6.) Righteousness denotes the ordinances of God, Matt. iii. 15; xxi. 32. (7.) Righteousness is sometimes much the same as holiness, Acts x. 35; Eph. v. 9. The righteousness of the Pharisees, which was in their own eyes excellent, was precise to superstition, yet was imperfect and worthless before God, Luke xviii. 9; Matt. ix. 13. To acknowledge as righteous, to pronounce righteous, that is, to acquit. See JUSTIFICATION.

I. RIMMON, a city of Zebulun, 1 Chron. vi. 77. The same with RIMMON-METHOAR, Josh. xix. 13.

II. RIMMON, a rock to which the children of Benjamin retreated, Judg. xx. 45; xxi. 13; 1 Sam. xiv. 2.

III. RIMMON, an idol of Damascus, where he had a temple, 2 Kings v. 18. It is thought this god was the sun, named Rimmon, or high, because of his elevation. Grotius takes it for Saturn, because that planet is the most elevated.

IV. RIMMON, a city in the tribes of Judah and Simeon, Josh. xv. 32; xix. 7; 1 Chron. iv. 32; Neh. xi. 29; Zech. xiv. 10.

V. RIMMON, the father of Baanah and Rechab, the murderers of Ishbosheth, 2 Sam. iv. 5, 9.

RIMMON-METHOAR, a city of Zebulun, Josh. xix. 13. The same with RIMMON I. above.

RIMMON-PAREZ, an encampment of Israel in the wilderness; from Rithmah they came to Rimmon-parez, and from hence went to Libnah, Numb. xxxiii. 19. See EXODUS.

RINGS, ornaments for the ears, nose, legs, or fingers. The antiquity of rings appears from Scripture and from profane authors. Judah left his ring with Tamar, Gen. xxxviii. 18. When Pharaoh committed the government of Egypt to Joseph, he gave him his ring from his finger, Gen. xli. 42. After the victory of the Israelites over the Midianites, they offered to the Lord the rings, the bracelets, and the golden necklaces, taken from the enemy, Numb. xxxi. 50. The Israelitish women wore rings, not only on their fingers, but also in their nostrils and their ears. (See BRACELETS.) James distinguishes a man of wealth and dignity by the ring of gold on his finger, Jam. ii. 2. At the return of the prodigal son, his father ordered a handsome apparel for his dress, and that a ring should be put on his finger, Luke xvi. 22. And when the Lord threatened king Jeconiah with the utmost effects of his anger, he tells him, that though he wore the signet or ring upon his finger, yet he should be torn off, Jer. xxii. 24. See SEAL.

The ring was used chiefly to seal with, and Scripture generally assigns it to princes and great persons; as the king of Egypt, Joseph, Abaz, Jezebel; king Ahasuerus, his favorite Haman, Mordecai, king Darius, &c. 1 Kings xxi. 8; Esth. iii. 10, &c.; Dan. vi. 17. The patents and orders of these princes were sealed with their rings or signets, an impression from which was their confirmation.

The ring was one mark of sovereign authority. Pharaoh gave his ring to Joseph, as a token of authority. When Alexander the Great gave his ring to Perdicas, it was understood as nominating him his successor. When Antiochus Epiphanes was at the point of death, he committed to Philip, one of his friends, his diadem, his royal cloak and his ring, that he might give them to his successor, young Antiochus, 1 Mac. vi. 15. Augustus, being very ill of a distemper which he thought mortal, gave his ring to Agrippa, as to a friend of the greatest integrity.

We read of magical rings, to which several extraordinary effects were ascribed, either as preservatives against certain evils, or for procuring certain advantages and good fortune.

The rings and pendants for the ears, so frequent in Palestine and Africa, were probably superstitious rings, or talismans. When Jacob arrived at Canaan, on his return from Mesopotamia, he ordered his people to deliver to him "all the strange gods which were in their hand, and all their ear-rings which were in their ears," (Gen. xxxv. 4.) which seems to insinuate, that those strange gods were superstitious and magical figures, engraven on their rings, their bracelets, and the pendants in their ears. Some commentators, however, think that these rings and pendants were upon the hands and in the ears of their false gods. See EAR-RINGS, and AMULETS.

RIPHATH, second son of Gomer, and grandson of Japhet, Gen. x. 3; 1 Chron. i. 6. The learned are not agreed what country was peopled by the descendants of Riphath.

RISSAH, an encampment of Israel in the wilderness. They came from Libnah to Rissah, and from Rissah they went to Kehelathah, Numb. xxxiii. 22. See EXODUS.

RITHMAH, another encampment of Israel. From Hazeroth they arrived at Rithmah, whence they went to Rimmon-parez, Numb. xxxiii. 18. See EXODUS.

RIVER, a running stream of water. The Hebrews give the name of THE RIVER, without addition, sometimes to the Nile, sometimes to the Euphrates, and sometimes to the Jordan. The tenor of the discourse must determine the sense of this uncertain and indeterminate way of speaking. They give also the name of river to brooks and rivulets that are not very considerable.

The principal rivers and brooks of Palestine were the JORDAN, the ARNON, the Jabbok, the Cherith, the Sorek, the Besor, the Kishon, the brook of Jezreel, the brook of Reeds or of Kanah, the Barrady, or Abanah and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus. See their proper articles.

The name of river is sometimes given to the sea; hence Jonah says (ii. 5.) he was surrounded by the rivers; that is, the waters of the sea, currents. Habakkuk, (iii. 8, 9.) speaking of the passage through the Red sea, says, "The Lord divided the waters of the rivers." So the psalmist, (lxxiv. 15.) "The Lord dried up the rapid rivers," or the rivers of strength. And Psalm xvii. 2, "The Lord hath founded the earth upon the sea, and established it upon the rivers;" which signifies the same in both places. Herodotus relates, that when Xerxes cast bonds into the Hellespont, and ordered it to be whipped, he said to it, "It is with good reason that nobody offers sacrifices to thee, O thou deceitful and turbulent river." See SEA.

RIZPAH, the daughter of Aiah, concubine to Saul; soon after whose death, Abner, the general of his army, fell in love with Rizpah, and took her. Ishbosheth, the son of Saul, who reigned at Mahanaim, and was supported in his regal state, only by the credit of Abner's valor, resented this act, and upbraided him with it. Abner was so irritated at his reproaches, that he vowed to ruin Ishbosheth, and join David, 2 Sam. iii. 7, 11.

Saul having put to death, upon some occasion, a great number of the Gibeonites, God, to punish their massacre, sent a famine into Israel, which lasted three years, 2 Sam. xxi. 1, 3, &c. from A. M. 2983 to 2986. To expiate this guilt, David delivered to the Gibeonites Armoni and Mephibosheth, two sons of Saul by Rizpah, and five sons of Michal, daughter of Saul, by Adriel, son of Barzillai; or rather by Phaltiel; (1 Sam. xxv. 44.) all of whom were hanged on the mountain near Gibeah, at the beginning of barley-harvest. Rizpah, upon receiving the intelligence, took a sackcloth and spread it upon the rock, where she continued from the beginning of harvest, till water from heaven fell on them; or till the Lord sent his rain on the earth, and restored its former fertility. She hindered the birds from tearing the bodies by day, and the ravenous beasts from devouring them by night. When this was related to David, he was moved with compassion, and sent for the bones of Saul and Jonathan, which were at Jabesh-gilead, and deposited them in the tomb of Kish, the father of Saul, at Gibeah; together with the bones of the seven men who had been executed by the Gibeonites.

ROCK, a large and natural mass of stone. Palestine, being a mountainous country, had many rocks, which were part of the strength of the country; for in times of danger the people retired to them, and found refuge against sudden irruptions of their enemies. When the Benjamites were overcome and almost exterminated by the other tribes, they secured themselves in the rock Rimmon: (Judg. xx. 47.) and, during the oppression of Israel by the Midianites, they were forced to hide themselves in cavities of the rocks, Judg. vi. 2.

Samson, we are told, (Judg. xv. 8.) took his station in the rock Etain, whence he suffered himself to be dislodged by the persuasion of his brethren, not by the force of his enemies; and David, it is said, repeatedly hid himself in the caves of rocks. It appears that rocks are still resorted to, in the East, as places of security, and some of them are even capable of sustaining a siege, at least equal to any the Philistine army could have laid to the residence of Samson. So we read in De la Roque: (p. 205.) "The grand seignior, wishing to seize the person of the emir, gave orders to the pacha to take him prisoner: he accordingly came in search of him, with a new army, in the district of Choui; which is a part of mount Lebanon, wherein is the village of Gesin, and close to it the rock which served for retreat to the emir. It is named in Arabic Magara Gesin, i. e. 'the cavern of Gesin,' by which name it is famous. The pacha pressed the emir so closely, that this unfortunate prince was obliged to shut himself up in the cleft of a great rock, with a small number of his officers. The pacha besieged him here several months; and was going to blow up the rock by a mine, when the emir capitulated." Thus David might wander from place to place, yet find many fastnesses in rocks, or caverns, in which to hide himself from Saul. Observe, too, that this cleft in the rock is called a cavern; so that we are not obliged always to suppose that what the Scripture calls caves or caverns were under ground; though such is the idea conveyed by our English word. We may remark also, that before the invention of gunpowder, fastnesses of this kind were, in a manner, absolutely impregnable; and, indeed, we have in Bruce accounts of very long sieges sustained by individuals and their families, or adherents, upon rocks; and which at last terminated by capitulation. The idea of retiring to rocks for security; of considering the protection of God as a rock, &c. which often occurs in Scripture, will now appear extremely natural.

The number of caves, and dwelling places in rocks, which late travellers have discovered, as well in parts of Judea as in Egypt, greatly exceeds what had formerly been supposed. Many of these are still occupied as retreats by the inhabitants; and Denon gives an account of skirmishes and combats, fought in the grottoes or caverns of Egypt, by the Arab residents, against their invaders under Buonaparte. On the east of the Jordan, as Seetzen reports, entire families, with their cattle and flocks, take possession of caves and caverns in rocks and secluded places, where they are not easily discovered, and whence they could not easily be dislodged. The people inhabiting on the Persian gulf lived in the same manner. For this reason they were called in Greek Τρογλοδιται, Troglogytes, that is, people who dwell in caves and mountain grottoes. Those that inhabited the desert about Tekoah, lodged in caverns dug in the earth, says Jerome. The Idumeans had their abodes in clefts of the rocks. Jer. xlviii. 28, "O ye that dwell in Moab, leave the cities and dwell in the rock, and be like the dove that maketh her nests in the sides of the hole's mouth." Hither the Moabites used to retreat, in times of calamity. The Kenites, who dwelt south of the Dead sea, had similar dwellings: "And he looked on the Kenites, and said, Strong is thy dwelling place, and thou puttest thy nest in a rock," Numb. xxiv. 21.

In Isa. li. 1, God says to the Jews, "Look unto the rock whence ye are hewn, and to the hole of the pit whence ye are digged;" that is, to Abraham and the patriarchs, your ancestors.

Moses says, that God would give the Hebrews a country, whose rocks and stones should supply them with plenty of honey and oil, Deut. xxxii. 13. "He made him to suck honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock." The psalmist says, (lxxxvi. 16.) speaking of the miracle by which Moses drew water out of the rock, "With honey out of the rock should I have satisfied thee." In Palestine the bees often store up their honey in holes of the rocks; and it is to this that the Scripture alludes. Job says, (xxix. 6.) in the same sense, that in his prosperity, "the rock poured out rivers of oil," because olive-trees generally grew on stony mountains.

For a description of the most eminent rocks mentioned in Scripture the reader is referred to their respective articles. See also SEPULCHRE, and TOMB.

ROD. This word is variously used in Scripture. (1.) For the branches of a tree; (Gen. xxx. 37.) (2.) For a staff or wand; (Exod. iv. 17, 20.) (3.) For a shepherd's crook; (Lev. xxvii. 32.) (4.) For a rod, properly so called, which God uses to correct men; (2 Sam. vii. 14; Job ix. 34.) (5.) For a royal sceptre, Esth. iv. 11; Ps. xlv. 6; Heb. i. 8. The empire of the Messiah is represented by a rod of iron, to express its power and might, Ps. ii. 9; Rev. ii. 27; xii. 5; xix. 15. (6.) For a young sprout, or branch, to distinguish the miraculous birth of the Messiah from a virgin mother, (Numb. xxiv. 17.) "There shall come a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre (or rod) shall rise out of Israel." And Isaiah says, (xi.) "There shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a branch shall grow out of his roots." In Jer. i. 11, the watchful rod, according to the Hebrew, is a branch or rod of an almond-tree. This tree flourishes the earliest of any; and the Lord intended to denote by it Nebuchadnezzar, who was just then ready to pour his forces upon Judea. (7.) For a tribe or people, Ps. lxxiv. 2; Jer. x. 16.

ROE. It is probable that the Hebrew רֹאשׁ, tzebi, which is translated roe, in the English Bible, is the gazelle, or antelope. See ANTELOPE.

ROGEL, a fountain near Jerusalem, in Judah, Josh. xv. 7; xviii. 16; 2 Sam. xvii. 7; 1 Kings i. 9. It was the fullers' fountain, in which, probably, the articles were washed, by treading with the feet. It seems to have been not far from the fountain Siloam. (See Rosenmüller's Bibl. Geogr. II. ii. p. 253.)

ROGELIM, a place in Gilead, beyond Jordan, where Barzillai, the friend of David, lived, 2 Sam. xvii. 27; xix. 32.

ROLL, see BOOK.

ROME, ROMANS. Jerome seems to have thought that Chittim was put for Italy in Numb. xxiv. 24, where Balaam says, "And ships shall come from the coasts of Chittim, and shall afflict Ashur and Eber." He translates, "Ships shall come from Italy." But this ought rather to be referred to the Greeks, who, under Alexander the Great, invaded the Hebrews, at that time under the Persians. The Greeks overthrew the Persian empire, but were themselves overthrown by the Romans. Jerome says, (on Ezek. xxvii. 6.) that the workmen of Tyre used what came from the isles of Italy, to make cabins for the captains of Tyrian ships. But what rarities could there be in these islands of Italy, that were not in Phœnicia and the neighboring provinces? (See CHITTIM.) Bochart has displayed all his learning to support the opinion of the rabbins, who by Chittim understand Rome and Italy; and he shows, that in this country are found cities named Cethim and Echetia, as also a river called Cethus; but he also brings good proofs that Chittim imports Macedonia.

The Jews, according to the rabbins, generally called the Romans Idumeans; and the Roman empire, the cruel empire of Edom. It is difficult to conceive their reason, since Italy and Rome are far from Idumea, and have never had any affinity with the Idumeans. When the more learned rabbins are asked for a reason, they maintain, with great assurance and obstinacy, that the Idumeans embraced Christianity, settled themselves in Italy, and there extended their dominions.

The Roman empire is generally thought to be denoted in Dan. ii. 40, by the kingdom of iron, which bruises and breaks in pieces all other kingdoms; but Calmet thinks it is rather the empire of the Lagide in Egypt, and of the Seleneidæ in Syria.

In the books of the Old Testament written in Hebrew, we find no mention of Rome, Romans, or Italy. But in the Maccabees, and in the New Testament, they are often mentioned. 1 Mac. viii. 1, 2, "Judas had heard of the fame of the Romans, that they were mighty and valiant men, and such as would lovingly accept all that joined themselves unto them, and make a league of amity with all that came unto them; and that they were men of great valor. It was told him also of their wars and noble acts, which they had done among the Galatians, and how they had conquered them, and brought them under tribute." Judas had also been informed of their conquests in Spain, &c. that they had subdued Philip and Perseus, kings of Macedonia, or Chittim, and Antiochus the Great, king of Syria; that they had deprived him of various provinces; and had also reduced the Greeks, who attempted to resist them; in a word, that they confirmed in their kingdoms all whom they desired should reign, or deprived those of their crowns whom they intended to punish. Nevertheless, that none of them wore the diadem or the purple, but that they had a senate, consisting of three hundred and twenty senators, who consulted every day about the affairs of the republic; and that they committed every year the sovereign magistracy to one person, who commanded through all their territories, and thus all were obedient to one, without envy or jealousy.

The first alliance between the Jews and the Romans was made ante A. D. 162.—Some years after this, (ante A. D. 144.) Jonathan, brother of Judas Maccabeus, finding the opportunity favorable, sent a deputation to Rome, to renew this alliance. Simon Maccabeus, also, sent to Rome an ambassador called Numenius, with a present of a great golden buckler, 1 Mac. xiv. 24, ante A. D. 149. Before this, (ante A. D. 163, 2 Mac. xi. 34—36.) Quintus Memmius and Titus Manilius, the Roman legates, being sent into Syria to settle some affairs with Antiochus Eupator, interested themselves in promoting the tranquillity of the Jews.

The Romans took the city of Jerusalem three times: first by the arms of Pompey, ante A. D. 63; by Sossius, ante A. D. 37; by Titus, A. D. 70, when both the city and the temple were destroyed. They reduced Judea into a province; that is, they took from it the privilege of being a kingdom, and of having kingly government. First, after the banishment of king Archelaus, son of Herod the Great, A. D. 16, and this continued to A. D. 37. It was again reduced to a province after the death of king Agrippa, A. D. 43; and it remained in this condition till it was entirely overthrown.

The term Roman is used (1.) as denoting a person native or inhabitant of the city of Rome; or at least, of the country around that metropolis; as in the Epistle to the Romans. (2.) For the power of the Roman government: (John xi. 48.) "The Romans shall come and take away both our place and nation." Acts xxv. 16, "It is not the manner of the Romans to deliver any man to die, till we have heard his defence," chap. xxviii. 17, &c. (3.) For a person who possessed the privileges attached to the citizenship of Rome: (Acts xxii. 25.) "Is it lawful for you to scourge a man who is a Roman, he being as yet uncondemned?" Paul, who pleads this privilege, was not actually a Roman, by having been born at Rome, or in Italy. Some think, that being born in a city favored with the communication of the privileges of the imperial city, he was competent to claim Roman exemptions by his birth-right; being a native of a municipium—a city thus favored, and born of parents thus entitled. Others think that Paul's father had been rewarded with this privilege, for services rendered to the Romans, whether of a military or other nature; which would render it so much the more disgraceful to degrade, by the treatment of a slave, a man entitled to especial marks of honor. This might be the fact, as such a reward was received by many Jews, about this time.

The Valerian law forbade that a Roman citizen should be bound: the Sempronian law forbade that he should be scourged, or beaten with rods. If any man falsely claimed the privileges of a Roman citizen, he was severely punished; by the emperor Claudius with death.

ROMANS, EPISTLE TO THE.—This is placed before the other Epistles of Paul, not because it was first composed in order of time, but because of the dignity of the imperial city, to which it is directed, or of the excellence of its contents; or of the magnificence and sublimity of the mysteries of which it treats. It passes for the most exalted and the most difficult of all Paul's Epistles. Jerome (Epist. 151. cap. 8.) was of opinion, that not one book only, but many volumes were necessary, for a full explanation of it. And some have thought, that Peter had chiefly this Epistle in his eye, when he said, (2 Pet. iii. 15, 16.) "As our beloved brother Paul also, according to the wisdom given unto him, hath written unto you. As also in all his epistles, speaking in them of these things; in which are some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, unto their own destruction." But others, with good reason, think Peter rather refers to Paul's Epistle to the Hebrews. (See Bibl. Repository, vol. ii. p. 412, seq.) Or, perhaps, to what were earlier written, and to countries nearer to those addressed by Peter. The dates of the Epistles must be considered in this reference.

Paul's design, in his Epistle to the Romans, is to terminate certain domestic disputes, which then prevailed among the believers at Rome, and divided the converted Jews and Gentiles into two parties. The Jews insisted on their birthright, and the promises made to their fathers; on account of which they assumed a certain priority or preference over the converted Gentiles, whom they regarded as foreigners and interlopers, out of pure favor admitted into the society of believers, and to the participation of Christian privileges. The Gentiles, on the other hand, maintained the merit of their sages and philosophers, the prudence of their legislators, the purity of their morality, and their exactness in following the law of nature. They accused the Jews of infidelity toward God, and violation of his laws. They aggravated their faults, and those of their fathers, which had excluded the greater part of them from the inheritance of the saints, from the faith, &c. as witnessed by their own Scriptures, &c.

To terminate these contentions, Paul applies himself to restrain the presumption of both parties. He shows that neither could pretend to merit, or had reason to glory, or boast of their calling; which proceeded from the mere grace and mercy of God. He proves that even if the Jews had observed the law of Moses, and the Gentiles the law of nature, this could not have merited for either the grace they had received. That nothing but faith in Jesus Christ, enlivened by charity and good works, can justify us. He answers objections by arguments taken from these principles, e. g. the gratuitous vocation, or the non-vocation, of Jew and Gentile; the insufficiency of the works of the law without faith; the superiority of the Jews above the Gentiles; and the infallibility of the promises of God. This introduces a discussion of predestination and reprobation, which makes a principal part of this Epistle, and contains some of the greatest difficulties in it.

In chapters xii.—xv. the apostle gives excellent rules of morality, concerning mutual harmony, mutual forbearance, and reciprocal condescension to infirmities, for fear of scandalizing or offending one another by indiscreet liberties. He describes the false apostles, and exhorts believers to avoid them. Chap. xvi. contains salutations and commendations, addressed to particular persons.

This Epistle was written A. D. 58, in Corinth, whence Paul was immediately to depart, to carry to Jerusalem some collections made for the saints. Phœbe, a deaconess of the church of Cenchrea, near Corinth, was the bearer of it. No doubt has ever been made of its authenticity; and though it was addressed to the Romans, yet it was written in Greek. Tertius was Paul's secretary on this occasion.

The Marcionites made great defalcations in the Epistles of Paul, especially in this to the Romans, of which they suppressed the last two chapters. There is much probability that Paul designed to finish this Epistle at the end of the fourteenth; but afterwards added the concluding chapters. At the end of the fifteenth chapter, we find this conclusion: "Now the God of peace be with you all. Amen;" which seems to show that the letter was then finished. We see the same conclusion no less than three times in the sixteenth chapter, (verses 20, 24, 27.) which leads us to imagine that these additions were composed at intervals. Probably, while waiting for an opportunity of sending it off, whether by Phœbe, or by any other safe hand.

Paul is supposed to have visited Rome twice. First, A. D. 61 or 63, when he appealed to Cæsar; and then A. D. 65, a year before his martyrdom, which happened in A. D. 66. See PAUL.

ROOT. Covetousness is the root of all evil, 1 Tim. vi. 10. That is, the origin, the cause, the occasion. Let any root of bitterness trouble you, Heb. xii. 15.

The root may also denote the race, the posterity, Prov. xii. 3. The root of the just shall not be disturbed, shall not fail. And Jeremiah, (xii. 2.) "Whence do the wicked prosper in all things? Thou hast planted them, and they have taken root." In Daniel, and in the Maccabees, Antiochus Epiphanes, the persecutor of the Jews, is represented as a young sprout or sucker, or root of iniquity, proceeding from the kings, the successors of Alexander the Great. And Jesus Christ, in his humiliation, is described as a root ill nourished, growing in a dry and barren soil, Isa. liii. 2. Chap. xi. 1, 10, he is called the root of Jesse. (See Rom. xv. 2.)

In the contrary sense, Paul says, (Rom. xi. 16—18.) that the Jews are, as it were, the root that bears the tree into which the Gentiles are grafted. And that the patriarchs are the pure and holy root of which the Jews are, as it were, the branches. Jesus Christ is the root on which Christians depend, and from which they derive life and subsistence, Col. ii. 7.

ROSE, a well-known shrub. It is evident from Ecclus. xxiv. 14, that the rose was a favorite with the Jewish people, and also, that "the rose of Jericho" was a very different plant from that now bearing the same name. In Cant. ii. 1, Solomon has chosen the rose to represent the matchless excellences of the bride: "I am the rose of Sharon;" but the Septuagint and Jerome, instead of rose, render, "the flower of the fields." The Chaldee, however, which has been followed by most western interpreters, calls it (in Canticles) the rose; and circumstances seem to determine it to be the wild rose, the uncultivated flower, which thereby corresponds to the lily in the next verse. But beside this rose, Scheuchzer refers to Hillerus, who rather seeks this flower among the bulbous-rooted plants, and declares for the asphodel, whose flowers resemble those of the lily. It is very fragrant, and Homer and Hesiod praise it. Hesiod says it grows commonly in woods; and Homer calls the Elysian fields, "meads filled with asphodel;" words which agree with the sentiment of Solomon here, if we take Sharon (as seems proper enough) for the common fields: "I am the asphodel of the meadows (or woods); the lily of the valleys," or places not cultivated as a garden is. [Gesenius pronounces for the derivation from šz, a bulb, with n prefixed, as is often the case. The ancient versions, as the Septuagint, Vulgate, and also the Targum on Isaiah, render it by Lily, or Narcissus; of which the latter is to be preferred. The Syriac, however, renders it by a word signifying the Colchicum autumnale, a bulbous, crocus-like plant, with flowers of white and violet. We may, therefore, assume it to be either the Narcissus or the Colchicum. R.

RUE, a well-known garden herb. Our Saviour reproaches the Pharisees with their superstitious affectation of paying the tithe of rue, which was not in reality subject to the law of tithe, while they neglected the more essential parts of the law, Luke xi. 42.

RUFUS, son of Simon the Cyrenian, who assisted our Saviour in carrying his cross, Mark xv. 21. Rufus probably was famous among the first Christians, since Mark names him with distinction. Is this the Rufus whom Paul salutes with his mother? Rom. xvi. 13. Polycarp, in his letter to the Philippian, written A. D. 107, proposes Ignatius and Rufus as models and patterns of patience.

There is more attached to the character of the Rufus mentioned in Rom. xvi. than appears at first sight; inasmuch as Paul calls the mother of Rufus "his mother." Now, she could not be the natural mother of Paul, unless Paul and Rufus were brothers; nor could she be the mother-in-law of Paul by natural relation to his wife, unless Rufus were brother-in-law to Paul; but of such connection we have no account, nor even surmise. It should seem to follow, that the term mother, in this place, imports that a great degree of intimacy had existed between Paul and the mother of Rufus, and that she had favored him with those attentions and services, truly maternal, which a mother might have done; and therefore the apostle salutes her son Rufus and herself under this affectionate recollection.

This leads again to an inquiry where this intimacy could have taken place. To answer which, we must recollect, that if Rufus were son of Simon the Cyrenian, as Mr. Taylor maintains, and if Simeon the teacher at Antioch were that Simon, then, as we know that Paul was long at Antioch, where the wife of Simeon was with her husband, we see the time, place and occasion of the services rendered by the mother of Rufus to Paul; and of the mutual kindness and intimacy between them. We know that Simon must have been at Antioch, an old man, the oldest of all the teachers settled there; for which reason he is placed first on the list; doubtless, his wife also was well stricken in years; and very probably, her son Rufus and Paul were about the same age; so that, relatively, they might both by familiarity be called by her, her sons; and both might pay her that respect, which in one was duty, and in the other deference and regard.

As to the residence of this pious woman at Rome with her son Rufus, we may well suppose that her husband Simon was dead at Antioch; and that she accompanied her son to the capital of the empire, where many Jews had settled. In what capacity Rufus dwelt at Rome, we have no means of determining. If he were a Christian teacher, as his father was, it should appear that he visited Philippi in his journeyings, where he suffered many adversities; for Polycarp speaks of—"patience, which ye have seen set forth before your eyes, in the blessed Ignatius, and Zozimus, and Rufus, and in Paul himself." This association of persons contributes to confirm to Rufus the character of teacher; and to mark him as the same Rufus, elect in the Lord, with whom Paul was familiar;—his brother, not only by profession and grace, but also by intimacy, and, perhaps, by constant residence in the same family.

RULE, RULERS. These words are applied to different stations of authority. God ruleth over all, and the proud Nebuchadnezzar was degraded from his throne till he acknowledged this truth, Dan. iv. 26. The Messiah rules among the sons of men, and even rules, in power, over his enemies, (Ps. ex. 2.) but in goodness over his people. Adam ruled over the creatures in paradise, as their superior; over his wife, after the fall, as the guardian sex, and the regulator of propriety and restraint. He reigned also over his posterity, as their king and judge, governing their social conduct as their common father. Husbands rule their wives and their own families. Pastors rule the churches which they teach. Princes and nobles rule to wherever their power extends; and sovereign rule is over all for the benefit and advantage of its subjects. In proportion as the sphere of regulating authority is enlarged, it requires greater energy of mind, greater capability of apprehension, greater fortitude, and greater rectitude, to discharge the duties attached to its importance, its dignity and its influence.

Nothing can describe greater unhappiness than to be subject to the rule and caprice of babes, (Isa. iii. 4.) of servants, (Lam. v. 8.) of women, (Isa. iii. 12.) of the wicked, Prov. xxviii. 15; xxix. 2.

The ruler of Joseph's house (Gen. xliii. 16.) is his house steward; his domestic inspector and regulator: the ruler of the people is the civil or judiciary magistrate: (Exod. xxii. 28.) thou shalt not revile the ruler of thy people, especially in the discharge of his office.

RUMA, a city spoken of by Josephus, as a village of Galilee, 2 Kings xxiii. 36. Probably the same with ARUMAH, Judg. ix. 41.

RUMP of the sacrifices. Moses ordained that the rump and fat of the sheep offered for peace-offerings should be given to the fire of the altar, Exod. xxix. 22; Lev. iii. 9; vii. 3; viii. 25; ix. 19. The rump was esteemed the most delicate part of the animal, being the fattest. Travellers, ancient and modern, speak of the rumps or tails of certain breeds of sheep in Syria and Arabia, as weighing twenty or thirty pounds. Herodotus says that some may be seen three cubits, or four feet and a half long; they drag upon the ground; and for fear they should be hurt, or the skin torn, the shepherds put under the tails of these sheep little carriages, which the animals draw after them. The pagans had also such regard for the rumps or tails, that they always made them a part of their sacrifices. In the Description de l'Egypte, (large folio, Paris, 1820,) is inserted a plate of an Egyptian ram, remarkable for the enormous size of the tail; the weight of which exceeds forty-four pounds, Fr.

To RUN is used metaphorically not only for rapidity, but for perseverance: "So run that ye may obtain" the crown, the reward. "I therefore so run, as not incoherently," not passing over the boundaries, the limits of the course. Heb. xii. 1, "Let us run with patience, perseveringly, steadily, the race set before us." To run to excess of riot, (1 Pet. iv. 4.) is to pursue with avidity, to follow, with prolonged attention, sensual gratifications, indulgences, &c. As men when running, especially when running for a prize, labor with great diligence, earnestness and intensity, the apostle uses this word to run, to express the course of his conduct among his Christian converts; his continued behavior towards them, (Gal. ii. 2.) "lest by any means I had run, or should hereafter run, in vain"—lest my ministerial labors should suffer under the imputation of improper motives, conduct or management. The same apostle also says to his Galatian converts, (chap. v. 7.) "Ye did run well, who did hinder you?" Ye did run with speed and vigor; who came across your course, and so drove you back in your Christian race, your profession of godliness? See RACE.

RUSH, see FLAG.

RUTH, a Moabitess, who, having married Chilion, son of Elimelech and Naomi, who had settled in Moab, was left a widow, without children. Naomi, having lost her husband and two sons, was desirous to return to Bethlehem, her own country. Her two daughters-in-law offered to attend her. Orpah, however, was persuaded to continue in Moab, but Ruth accompanied Naomi to Bethlehem. This happened, according to Usher, under Shangar, about 120 years after Joshua. At Bethlehem, Ruth went out to glean, and providentially entered the field of a rich citizen of Bethlehem, named Boaz, related to Elimelech, her father-in-law. When Boaz came to see his harvesters, he found Ruth, and bestowed favors upon her. In the evening she told Naomi of his civilities, who blessed God that he had put such sentiments in Boaz's heart, and acquainted Ruth that this was their kinsman. At the end of harvest she desired Ruth to go and lie at the feet of Boaz, who winnowed his corn; and to do what he should advise. She went accordingly, and Boaz, awaking in the night, became alarmed. His kinswoman, however, said, "I am Ruth, thine handmaid; spread, therefore, thy skirt over thine handmaid, for thou art a near kinsman." Boaz acknowledged her right, but suggested that there was a nearer than himself, adding, that if he should refuse to marry her, he would himself take her to wife. The next day Boaz went to the gate of Bethlehem, and cited before the elders of the city the nearest kinsman to Elimelech; on whom the duty devolved of marrying Ruth, the widow of Chilion. This person declining it, Boaz insisted that he should renounce his right, which he willingly did, and then Boaz declared his resolution to marry her himself.

Thus Ruth became the wife of Boaz, by whom she had a son called Obed, who was father to Jesse, and grandfather to king David.

THE BOOK OF RUTH, which contains this history, is placed in our Bibles between the book of Judges and the books of Samuel, as being the sequel of the former, and an introduction to the latter. Jerome informs us that the Jews added it to the book of Judges, because the transactions it relates happened in the time of the Judges of Israel, Judg. i. 1. And several of the ancient fathers make but one book of the Judges and Ruth. But the modern Jews commonly place in their Bibles, after the Pentateuch, the five Megilloth; (1.) The Song of Solomon; (2.) Ruth; (3.) The Lamentations of Jeremiah; (4.) Ecclesiastes; (5.) Esther. Sometimes Ruth is placed the first of the five, sometimes the second, and sometimes the fifth.

The scope of the author of this book, is to trace the genealogy of David; and in all probability, he was the same author as composed the first book of Samuel; in which, because he could not conveniently place this genealogy of David, he chose rather to give it separately. The writer observes, at the beginning of his work, that the history he was about to relate happened when the Judges governed Israel; therefore, they ceased to govern it when he wrote. He also speaks of David at the end of his book; which shows, that, at the earliest, it must have been written in the time of David. Besides, we have observed two ways of speaking in it, or particular phrases, which are only found in the books of Samuel and of the Kings: the first is, "The Lord do so to me, and more also," Ruth i. 17. (Comp. 1 Sam. iii. 17; xiv. 44; xx. 23; 2 Sam. iii. 9, 35; xix. 13; 1 Kings ii. 23; xix. 2; xx. 10; 2 Kings vi. 31.) The second, "I have discovered to your ear;" for I have told you, Ruth iv. 4. (Comp. 1 Sam. xx. 2; 2 Sam. vii. 27.)

The canonicalness of this book was never disputed; and Ruth the Moabitess is in the genealogy of our Saviour, Matt. i. 5.

SABBATH

SABAOTH, or rather Tsabaoth, a Hebrew word, signifying hosts or armies; Jehovah Sabaoth, is The Lord of Hosts; whether we understand the host of heaven, or the angels and ministers of the Lord, or the stars and planets, which, as an army ranged in battle array, perform the will of God; or, lastly, the people of the Lord, both of the old and new covenants, which is truly a great army, of which God is the general and commandr.

The Hebrew Tsaba is often used, also, to signify the service his ministers perform to God in the temple; because they are there, as it were, soldiers or guards, attending the court of their prince, Numb. iv. 3, 23, 30, &c. This word is also used to express the duty of the women who watched at the door of the tabernacle, and kept guard there during the night-time, Exod. xxxviii. 8.

SABBATH, rest; God, having created the world in six days, rested on the seventh; (Gen. ii. 2, 3.) that is, he ceased from producing new beings in this creation; and because he had rested on it, he blessed or sanctified it, and appointed it in a peculiar manner for his worship. The Hebrews, afterwards, in consequence of this designation, and to preserve the memory of the creation, sanctified, by his order, the sabbath day, or the seventh day of the week, abstaining from all work, labor and servile employment, and applying themselves to the service of the Lord, to the study of his law, and to prayer.

The days of sabbath are taken sometimes for all the Jewish festivals. "Keep my sabbaths," (Lev. xix. 3, 30.) that is, my feasts; as the Passover, Pentecost, Feast of Tabernacles, &c.

It is disputed, whether, from the beginning of the world, God gave the law of the sabbath; and whether this day was also observed, at least among the more pious of the first men, as the patriarchs, before the promulgation of the law;—whether this be the sense of those words, (Gen. ii. 2.) "And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it?"—Some fathers, and some Jewish doctors, have asserted the affirmative; and Manasseh Ben-Israel assures us that, according to the tradition of the ancients, Abraham and his posterity, having preserved the memory of the creation, observed the sabbath also, in consequence of the natural law to that purpose. It is also believed that the religion of the seventh day is preserved among the pagans, and that the observation of this day is as old as the world itself. Philo says that the sabbath is not a festival peculiar to any one people or country, but is common to the whole world; and that it may be named the general and public festival, and that of the nativity of the world; and Josephus advances, that there is no city, Greek or barbarian, nor any nation, where the religion of the sabbath was not known. Aristobulus quotes Homer and Hesiod, who speak of the seventh day as sacred and venerable. Clemens Alexandrinus speaks of the sabbath in the same terms as Aristobulus, and he adds some passages from the ancients, who celebrate the seventh day. Some believe that Job observed the sabbath day; because at the end of seven days he offered a sacrifice to the Lord on account of his children, Job i. 2, 5. Some rabbins inform us that Joseph also observed the sabbath in Egypt.

But the contrary opinion is not without its supporters. The greater part of the fathers and commentators hold, that the sanctification of the sabbath, mentioned by Moses in the beginning of Genesis, signifies only that appointment then made of the seventh day, to be afterwards solemnized and sanctified by the Jews; nor does it appear from any passages of Scripture, that the ancient patriarchs observed the sabbath; or that God designed to oblige them thereto, before the law. Philo says that the Hebrews, having forgotten the day of the creation of the world, were again reminded of it, when God, having caused it to rain manna all the other days of the week, withheld it on the sabbath day. As to the seventh day, which was honored by some pagans, and of which they have spoken, as of a holy day, it was either dedicated to Apollo, or it was an imitation of the Jewish sabbath, which some pagans held in honor, either out of superstition or devotion.

Ezekiel (xx. 12, 20.) says expressly, that the sabbath, and the other feasts of the Jews, are signs given by God to his people, to distinguish them from other nations; "I gave them my sabbaths, to be a sign between me and them, that they might know that I am the Lord that sanctify them." And again, "Hallow my sabbaths, and they shall be a sign between me and you, that ye may know that I am the Lord your God." And Moses, (Deut. v. 15.) "The Lord hath brought thee out of Egypt, therefore the Lord thy God commanded thee to keep the sabbath day." Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Eusebius and Bernard advance, as a matter not to be doubted, that neither the patriarchs before the deluge, nor those after, observed the sabbath. Irenæus says expressly, that Abraham had faith, and was called the friend of God, yet neither was circumcised, nor observed the sabbath. (See Selden, de Jure Nat. et Gent. lib. iii. cap. 13—15; and Spencer, de Legibus Heb. lib. i. cap. iv. sec. 7.)

God gave the precept of the sabbath to the Hebrews at Marah, one month after their coming out of Egypt, Abib 15, A. M. 2513. Manna began to fall, according to several of the fathers, on the Sunday, six days before the sabbath; but according to others, on the very eve of the sabbath. However this may be, it was probably on occasion of the manna, that God commanded the Hebrews to observe the seventh day; and not to go out to gather any on that day, for that none would fall. The same command of celebrating the sabbath occurs several times in the law, Exod. xx. 8—11; Lev. xxiii. 3; Deut. v. 12.

In Exod. xxxi. 13; xxxv. 2, it is said, that God established his sabbath among the children of Israel, as a sign to make them remember that he is the Lord who sanctifies them. Adding that whosoever shall profane the sabbath shall be punished with death. We see the execution of this law on the man who, having gathered wood on the sabbath day, and was stoned, Numb. xv. 32, 35. On other holy days it was allowed to light a fire, and to dress victuals; but this was expressly forbidden on the sabbath day, Exod. xxxv. 2, 3. The rabbins confine this prohibition to servile works only; as to bake bread, to dress meat, to forge metals, &c. They suppose that for such sort of works, it is forbidden to light a fire, but not for one to warm himself.

On the sabbath day the ministers of the temple entered on their week; and those who had attended the foregoing week, went out. They placed on the golden table new loaves of shew-bread, and took away the old ones, Lev. xxiv. 8. Also, on this day were offered particular sacrifices of two lambs for a burnt-offering, with the wine and the meal. The sabbath was celebrated, as the other festivals, from evening to evening.

The first obligation of the sabbath expressed in the law, is to sanctify it; (Numb. xxviii. 9, 10; Exod. xx. 8.) "Remember to sanctify the sabbath day." It is sanctified by doing good works in it; by prayers, praises and thanksgivings, by public and private worship of God, by the study of his law, by justice and innocence, and tranquillity of mind. The second obligation is that of rest: "Thou shalt do no work on the sabbath." Meaning any servile or laborious work, that might fix the mind, and interrupt that attention which is due to God, and which is necessary when we pay acceptable worship to him. The Jews have varied about the manner in which they ought to observe the rest of the sabbath. In the time of the Maccabees they durst not so much as defend themselves from an enemy on this day, even in the most pressing necessity, 1 Mac. ii. 32, 33, &c. Since that time they have not scrupled to take arms, and stand on their necessary defence. But it may be seen by Josephus, that they would not attack their enemies, nor hinder them from advancing their works; nor would they march with their armies, even in time of war, or in the enemy's country, on the sabbath day. (Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 3; xiii. cap. 1. 16.) In the time of our Saviour, they would water their cattle, or take out of a ditch a beast that had happened to fall in on the sabbath day; but by a false delicacy they could not bear with our Saviour's healing the sick on that day, Matt. xii. 11, 12. Since that time they have determined, that a man might give food to a beast that had fallen into a pit, but might not take him out on that day. The Jews complained of our Saviour's disciples, who, passing through the corn-fields on the sabbath day, gathered some ears of corn, and rubbed them between their hands, in order to eat the grain. This action, however, our Saviour excused, from the necessity of the thing, and because they had need of nourishment; adding, that the priests themselves in the temple do work, which, every where else, and in every one else, would be esteemed a violation of the sabbath; that the Son of man was Lord of the sabbath; and that the sabbath was made for man, not man for the sabbath.

The rabbins reckon thirty-nine primary prohibitions, which ought to be observed on the sabbath, and several other secondary ones dependent on them. Their number is, in fact, so great, that it is almost impossible to keep them all; and the rabbins affirm, that if the people of Israel could keep but two sabbaths as they ought to be kept, they should soon see themselves delivered from the evils under which they groan. Their scrupulosity even forbids to peel or to roast an apple; to kill a flea, a fly, or other insect, if it is so big that the sex may be distinguished; to sing, or to play on an instrument, so loud as to awaken a child. Yet, notwithstanding all this, the Samaritans pretend, that the Jews are not religious enough in their observation of the sabbath. As for them, they will not light a fire on this day: they abstain from the use of marriage: they do not stir from their places, save only to go to the house of the Lord: they employ themselves wholly in reading the law, in prayers and thanksgivings. (Letter of the Samaritans to Mr. Huntington.)

Of all the festivals God has enjoined, there are none of which the Jews are so jealous, or of which they speak so magnificently, as of the sabbath. They call it their spouse, because God has given it to them, specially, exclusive of all other nations. Leo of Modena, who alone is equivalent to all the modern Jews, says, the rabbins have reduced all that is forbidden on the sabbath day, to thirty-nine heads, each of which have their circumstances and dependences. But they are of little importance, and their enumeration would occupy much space.

Such profane authors as have ventured to speak of the origin of the sabbath, have shown their ignorance of Jewish affairs. Tacitus thought they observed the sabbath in honor of Saturn, to whom Saturday was consecrated by the pagans. But Plutarch asserts that it was kept in honor of Bacchus, who is called Sabbos; and because in the festivals of this false deity they used to cry Saboi. Apion, the grammarian, maintained that the Jews celebrated the sabbath in memory of their being cured of a shameful disease, which in the Egyptian language was called Sabbosis. Pagan authors speak pretty frequently of the fast of the sabbath; as if the Jews had ordinarily fasted on this day; whereas fasting was utterly forbidden on the sabbath.

The obligation of devoting a portion of our time to God, to be employed in his worship and service, is founded on natural right and reason. The law had fixed this to the seventh day, that is, the sabbath, for the nation of the Jews. It is believed by some that the apostles, to honor the day of our Saviour's resurrection, determined it to every seventh day, and fixed it on the Sunday, that is, the first day of the week among the Hebrews; and the day dedicated to the sun among the pagans. The change of the day, however, is rather to be gathered from the practice of the Christian church, than as clearly enjoined in the New Testament. It appears that believers came together on this day to break bread, that collections for the poor were then made, and put into the general treasury of the church; (as we understand 1 Cor. xvi. 2.) that on this day exhortations and discourses were made to the people; and in short, we have the various parts of public worship noted, as being performed on this day. It will follow, that we may safely imitate those examples which the apostles and primitive Christians have left us; and whatever obligations the Jews might lie under to the observance of the Saturday sabbath, they do not bind Christians; because those obligations were natural, not general; and were commemorative, in some degree, of Israelitish events, in which others have no interest; whereas, the resurrection sabbath commemorates an event in which all Christians throughout the world are interested, and for which no equal mode of commemoration can be devised. We have then good example and strong propriety in behalf of our observation of the Lord's day, as a religious festival, though not as a Jewish sabbath; and the same principles influenced the Christians of early ages.

We are informed by Eusebius, that from the beginning the Christians assembled on the first day of the week, called by them the "Lord's day;" for the purposes of religious worship, "to read the Scriptures, to preach, and to celebrate the Lord's supper;" and Justin Martyr observes, "that, on the Lord's day, all Christians in the city, or country, meet together, because that is the day of our Lord's resurrection, and then we read the writings of the apostles and prophets; this being done, the president makes an oration to the assembly, to exhort them to imitate and to practise the things they have heard; then we all join in prayer, and after that we celebrate the sacrament. Then they who are able and willing give what they think proper, and what is collected is laid up in the hands of the president, who distributes it to orphans and widows, and other necessitous Christians, as their wants require." (See 1 Cor. xvi. 20.) A very honorable conduct and worship! would to God it were more prevalent among us; with the spirit and piety of primitive Christianity!

John says, (Rev. i. 10.) "I was in the spirit on the Lord's day;" so called, doubtless, to preserve the remembrance of his resurrection, which was the completion of our redemption. Barnabas, in his Epistle, says, that we joyfully celebrate the eighth day, in memory of the resurrection of our Saviour, because it was on this day he rose again, and ascended into heaven; and Ignatius the martyr, in his letter to the Magnesians, would have us honor this day of the Lord, this day of the resurrection, as the first and most excellent of days.

A SABBATH DAY'S JOURNEY.—"Pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the sabbath day," says our Saviour to his disciples, when discoursing to them of the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, Matt. xxiv. 20. And Luke informs us, (Acts i. 12.) that the mount of Olives was distant from Jerusalem about a sabbath day's journey. The rabbins generally fix this distance at two thousand cubits. Josephus says, that the mount of Olives was five stadia from Jerusalem, which makes six hundred and twenty-five paces. Thus the journey that was allowable on a sabbath day was about six or seven hundred paces, or something more. Origen says that the journey of a sabbath day is one mile or two thousand cubits. The Jews also used to make a mile consist of two thousand cubits; so that their cubit must be two feet and a half, since their mile contains a thousand paces, or five thousand feet, taking their paces at five feet each. Maimonides will have it, that he who does not know exactly the distance of a place, may walk on the sabbath day two thousand moderate paces, which makes a thousand geometrical paces of five feet each. Epiphanius says, (Hæres. lxi.) that the Jews believe they are forbidden from walking on the sabbath day above six stadia, or seven hundred and fifty paces. The Syriac translator of the Acts of the Apostles puts about seven stadia for a sabbath day's journey; which is according to what some rabbins say, that a mile is seven stadia and a half.

THE SECOND SABBATH AFTER THE FIRST (LUKE vi. 1.) is an expression which has much divided commentators. Some have taken it for the second, others for the last, day of unleavened bread; and some, for the day of Pentecost. The Passover was the first sabbath, according to them, and Pentecost the second. Others have thought, that the first grand sabbath was the first sabbath of the civil year, in the month Tizri; and that the second grand sabbath was the first of the holy year, or of the month Nisan. But Joseph Scaliger, who is followed by most commentators, supposes it to have been the first sabbath which followed the second day of unleavened bread. Indeed, the Greek word δευτερόπρωτος properly means the first after the second. This second day of the Passover was a festival, in which the fruits of the harvest were offered to God, Lev. xxiii. 5, 9. From this second day, the Jews thus reckoned their sabbaths from the Passover to Pentecost; the first was called the first [sabbath] after the second [day of unleavened bread.] The second was called the second [sabbath] after the second [day of unleavened bread.] The third was called the third [sabbath] after the second [day of unleavened bread.] And so of the rest, as far as the seventh [sabbath] after the second [day of unleavened bread.] This seventh sabbath immediately preceded Pentecost, which was celebrated the fiftieth day after the second day of unleavened bread.

THE PREPARATION FOR THE SABBATH is the Friday before; for as it was forbidden to make a fire, to bake bread, or to dress victuals, on the sabbath day, they provided on the Friday every thing needful for their sustenance on the sabbath.

SABBATICAL YEAR was to be celebrated among the Jews from seven years to seven years, when the land was to rest, and be left without culture, Exod. xxiii. 10; Lev. xxv. 2, 3, &c. They were then to set slaves at liberty, and each was to re-enter on his inheritance that had been alienated. God appointed the observation of the sabbatical year, to preserve the remembrance of the creation of the world; to enforce the acknowledgment of his sovereign authority over all things, particularly over the land of Canaan, which he had given to the Hebrews, by delivering up the fruits of their fields to the poor and the stranger. It was a kind of tribute which they paid for it to the Lord. Besides, he intended to inculcate humanity on his people, by commanding that they should resign to the slaves, to the poor, to strangers and to brutes, the produce of their fields, of their vineyards, and of their gardens, Lev. xxv. 2, &c.

It has been much disputed, at what season of the year the sabbatical year began. Some have been of opinion, that it began on the first month of the sacred year, that is, Nisan, or in the spring. Others think it began at the first month of the civil year, or Tizri (September). Moses does not explain himself on this matter very clearly. He says only, that the land shall not be cultivated, and that there shall be no harvest that year. In Palestine, the time of sowing wheat and barley was in autumn; barley-harvest began at the Passover, and wheat-harvest at Pentecost. Therefore, to enter into the spirit of the law for observing the rest of the sabbatical year, that the land may not remain two years without cultivation, we must necessarily begin it at autumn, after the crops were gathered: they did not till the land in autumn, and they had no harvest after the winter; but the autumn following they began again to cultivate the land, that they might reap their harvests in the spring and summer following.

In the sabbatical year all debts were remitted, and slaves were set at liberty, Deut. xv. 12; Exod. xxi. 2. But were debts absolutely forgiven, or was the payment of them only suspended? Several think, that this remission was absolute, and that all debts were totally extinguished in the sabbatical year. The caution of rich men, noticed by Moses, (Deut. xv. 9.) who would not lend to their brethren at the approach of the sabbatical year, seems to prove, that after this year nothing was to be hoped for from their debtors. For if the payment of debts were only suspended till this year was over and past, it would not have been a sufficient motive to hinder them from lending. As there was no lending for interest in the case, which was forbidden to the Hebrews toward their brethren, as it could only be a simple loan, the creditor might require it again either before or after the sabbatical year, on the supposition of those who think that the remission was not absolute. Others, as the rabbins and Grotius, distinguish between debts mortgaged on security (the contracts of which included a clause of perpetual debt) and simple contracts; the last being for ever acquitted on the sabbatical year, but not the others. Menochius also thinks, that the remission of debts was general and absolute, but not of loans or deposits. This regarded only the natural Hebrews, or proselytes to Judaism, and not strangers.

I. SABLEANS, the inhabitants of the country called SEBA, Heb. סבא. This appears to have been the great island or rather peninsula of Meroë, in northern Ethiopia, or Nubia, formed between the Nile and the Astaboras, now Atbara. Upon this peninsula lay a city of the like name; the ruins of which are still visible a few miles north of the modern Shendy. (Rüppel's Reisen, p. 85.) Meroë was a city of priests, whose origin is lost in the highest antiquity. (See EGYPT, p. 373.) The monarch was chosen by the priests from among themselves; and the government was entirely theocratic, being managed by the priests according to the oracle of Jupiter Ammon. This was the Seba of the Hebrews, according to Josephus, (Antiq. ii. 10. 2.) who mentions, at the same time, that it was conquered by Cambyses, and received from him the name Meroë, after his sister. With this representation accord the notices of Seba and its inhabitants, in Scripture. In Gen. x. 7, their ancestor is said to be a son of Cush, the progenitor of the Ethiopians. In Isa. xliii. 3, and Ps. lxxii. 10, Seba is mentioned as a distant and wealthy country; in the former passage it is connected with Egypt and Ethiopia; and Meroë was one of the most important commercial cities of interior Africa, (Heeren's Ideen, II. i. p. 397.) Finally, in Isa. xlv. 14, the Sabeans are said to be tall of stature. In like manner, Herodotus (iii. 20.) says of the Ethiopians, among whom the Sabeans are to be reckoned, that they were "the tallest of men;" and Solinus affirms, (Polyhist. c. 30.) that "the Ethiopians are twelve feet high." This shows at least a coincidence between the accounts of Scripture and of profane writers; and goes to confirm the testimony of Josephus above given, that Seba was the same with Meroë. R.

II. SABLEANS, the inhabitants of the country called SNEBA, Heb. סבא. There are no less than three persons of the name of Sheba mentioned in Scripture as the ancestors of tribes. (1.) A grandson of Cush, Gen. x. 7.—(2.) A son of Joktan, Gen. x. 28.—(3.) A son of Jokshan, the son of Abraham by Keturah. The similarity of the names Joktan and Jokshan, in the two last cases, would almost lead to the supposition, that these two Shebas were the same person. At any rate, they all seem to have settled in Arabia Felix, probably in the southern part of it; and even if they were originally different persons, yet they would appear to have been at a later period confounded; and the name Sabæans to have been applied indiscriminately to the descendants of all. Indeed, in Job i. 15, where the Sabæans are said to have plundered Job, the name seems to stand for Arabians, or Arab robbers, generally.

The Sheba of Scripture appears to be the Saba of Strabo, (xvi. 4. 2.) situated towards the southern part of Arabia, at a distance from the coast of the Red sea, the capital of which was Mariaba, or Mareb; whence Abulfeda affirms that Mareb and Saba were synonymous names. (See Bibl. Repos. No. 8. Art. 2. fourth note.) The queen of Sheba, who visited Solomon, (1 Kings x. 1, seq; 2 Chron. ix. 1, seq.) and made him presents of gold, ivory and costly spices, was most probably the mistress of this region; indeed, the Sabæans were celebrated, on account of their important commerce, in these very products, among the Greeks also, (Strabo, ibid.) Isa. lx. 6; Jer. vi. 20; Ezek. xxvii. 22; Ps. lxxii. 10, 15; Joel iv. 8; Job vi. 19. The tradition of this visit of the queen of Sheba to Solomon, has maintained itself among the Arabs; who call her Balkis, and affirm that she became the wife of Solomon. The 27th Sura of the Koran has taken up this tradition and probably exaggerated it. She is also registered in the series of the sovereigns of Yemen. (Pococke's Specim. Hist. Arab. p. 277.)

It would seem that the two names Seba and Sheba, Heb. שֵׁבָא and שֵׁבַע, have often been confounded; and hence, Sheba has often been referred to Ethiopia, the proper location of Seba. In this way the queen of Sheba is also often regarded as queen of Ethiopia, even by the Ethiopians themselves, who also have traditions respecting her. See more on this subject under SHEBA; and also the article ETHIOPIA. *R.

SABTAM, the third son of Cush, (Gen. x. 7.) peopled part of Arabia Felix, where is a city called Sabta, and a people called Sabatheans.

SABTECIA, fifth son of Cush, who also peopled, as is thought, part of Arabia, or some country toward Assyria, or Armenia, or Caramania; for in all these regions are found traces of the name Sabtecha, Gen. x. 7.

SACK, SACK-CLOTH. These are pure Hebrew words, and have spread into almost all languages. Sack-cloth is a very coarse stuff, often of hair. In great calamities, in penitence, in trouble, they wore sack-cloth about their bodies, 2 Sam. iii. 31. "Gird yourselves with sack-cloth, and mourn for Abner."—"Let us gird ourselves with sack-cloth; and let us go, and implore the clemency of the king of Israel," 1 Kings xx. 31. Ahab rent his clothes, put on a shirt of hair cloth next to his skin, fasted, and lay upon sack-cloth, 1 Kings xxi. 27. When Mordecai was informed of the destruction threatened to his nation, he put on sack-cloth, and covered his head with ashes, Esth. iv. Job says, that he sewed a sack over his flesh, chap. xvi. 15. The prophets were often clothed in sack-cloth; and generally in coarse clothing. The Lord bids Isaiah put off the sack-cloth from about his body, and to go naked, Isa. xx. 2. Zechariah says, (xiii. 4.) that false prophets should no longer prophesy in sack-cloth, to deceive the simple. John (Rev. xi. 3.) says, that the two prophets of God should prophesy 1260 years, clothed in sack-cloth. Baruch intimates, that this habit of sack-cloth was that in which good people clothed themselves when they went to prayers, Baruch iv. 20. But sack-cloth was mourning, as appears from numerous passages of Scripture; and it is very credible, also, that it was used for emwrapping the dead, when about to be buried. So that its being worn by survivors was a kind of assimilation to the shroud, or dress, of the departed; as its being worn by penitents was an implied confession of what their guilt exposed them to, that is, death. This we gather from an expression of Chardin, who, in his description of Ispahan, says—Ker Anayet, the Shah's buffoon, made a shop in the seraglio, "which he filled with pieces of that coarse kind of stuff of which winding-sheets for the dead are made." And again—"the sufferers die by hundreds;—mortuary wrapping-cloth is doubled in price." So that, however, in later ages, some eastern nations might bury in linen, yet others still retained the use of a coarser material, that is, sack-cloth.

In times of joy, or on hearing good news, these who were clad in sack-cloth tore it from their bodies, and cast it from them, Ps. xxx. 11.

SACKBUT, a wind musical instrument, like a trumpet, which may be lengthened or shortened. Italian trombone. R.

SACRIFICE was an offering made to God on his altar, by the hand of a lawful minister. Sacrifice differed from oblation: in a sacrifice there was a real change or destruction of the thing offered; whereas an oblation was but a simple offering or gift. As men have always been bound to acknowledge the supreme dominion of God over them, and over whatever belongs to them, and as there have always been persons who have conscientiously acquitted themselves of this duty; we may affirm, that there have always been sacrifices in the world. Adam and his sons, Noah and his descendants, Abraham and his posterity, Job and Melchisedec, before the Mosaic law, offered to God real sacrifices. That law did but settle the quality, the number, and other circumstances of sacrifices. Before that, they offered fruits of the earth, the fat or the milk of animals; the fleeces of sheep; or the blood and the flesh of victims. Every one pursued his own mode of acknowledgment, his zeal, or his devotion: but among the Jews, the law appointed what they were to offer, and in what quantities. Before the law, every one was priest and minister of his own sacrifice; at least he was at liberty to choose what priest he pleased, in offering his victim. Generally, this honor belonged to the most ancient, or the head of a family, to princes, or to men of the greatest virtue and integrity. But after Moses, this was, among the Jews, confined to the family of Aaron.

It is disputed, whether, at first, there were any other sacrifices than burnt-offerings: no other appear in Scripture. The Talmudists assure us, that Abel offered only holocausts, consuming the flesh of the victim by fire; because it was not allowed to eat it. Grotius is of opinion, that this patriarch did not offer a bloody sacrifice. The text of Moses informs us, (Gen. iv. 4.) that he offered "of the firstlings of his flocks, and of the fat thereof."

We are told by Servius, that the ancients put no fire to sacrifices, but obtained it by their prayers; and most of the fathers think it was thus that God accepted the sacrifice of Abel: he consumed it, say they, by fire from heaven; which favor was not vouchsafed to Cain's sacrifice. In the same manner he consumed the sacrifices offered at Aaron's consecration, those offered by Gideon, those offered by Solomon, at the dedication of his temple, those of Elijah on mount Carmel, and those offered by the Maccabees, at restoring the worship of the temple, after the profanation by Antiochus Epiphanes.

The Hebrews had properly but three sorts of sacrifices; (1.) the burnt-offering or holocaust; (2.) the sacrifice for sin, or sacrifice of expiation; (3.) the pacific sacrifice, or sacrifice of thanksgiving. Beside these, were several kinds of offerings, of corn, of meal, of cakes, of wine, of fruits; and one manner of sacrificing, which has no relation to any now mentioned, that is, the setting at liberty one of the two sparrows offered for the purification of leprous persons; (Lev. xiv. 4, 5, &c.) also the scape-goat, which was taken to a distant and steep place, whence it was thrown, Lev. xvi. 10, 26. These animals, thus left to themselves, were esteemed victims of expiation, loaded with the sins of those who offered them.

The holocaust was offered and burnt up, on the altar of burnt-offerings, without any reserve to the person who gave the victim, or to the priest who killed and sacrificed it; only the priest had the skin; for before the sacrifices were offered to the Lord, their skins were flayed off, and their feet and entrails were washed. (See Lev. vii. 8.)

The sacrifice for sin, or for expiation, or the purification of a man who had fallen into any offence against the law, was not entirely consumed on the fire of the altar. No part of it returned to him who had given it, but the sacrificing priest had a share of it. If it were the high-priest who had offended through ignorance, he offered a calf without blemish; he brought it to the door of the tabernacle, put his hand on the head of the sacrifice, confessed his sin, asked pardon for it, killed the calf, &c. (See Lev. iv. v.) If it were the whole people which had offended, they were to offer a calf, in like manner. The elders shall bring it to the altar of the tabernacle, shall put their hands upon its head, confess their offence, &c. If it be a prince of the people who had offended, he shall offer a goat, shall bring it to the door of the tabernacle, shall put his hands upon its head, shall confess his sin, &c. Calmet remarks, that though Moses orders a goat, it is understood, that they might offer a ram. (See Lev. vii. 1—4, and compare Lev. v. 6, 7.) If it be a private person who has committed an offence, he shall make an offering of a sheep, or a she-goat without blemish, shall present it to the priest at the door of the tabernacle, shall put his hands upon the head of the sacrifice. The priest shall sacrifice it, &c. (See Lev. iv. v.) But if he be not of ability to offer a sheep, or a she-goat, he shall offer two turtles, or two young pigeons; one for his sin, the other for a burnt-offering. That which is for the burnt-offering, shall be entirely consumed on the fire of the altar. That which is to be offered for his sin, shall be presented to the priest, who shall kill it, &c. If the person was extremely poor, he might offer the tenth part of an ephah of meal, that is, a little more than a gallon of meal, without oil or spice. He presented it to the priest, who took a handful of it, and threw it on the fire: the rest was for himself. (For other circumstances belonging to this subject, see Lev. v. 15, 16; vi. 1—3.) When a ram was offered, his rump, or tail, was burnt along with the rest of the fat. But if it were a goat, the fat only was burnt, Lev. vii. 2, 3. See RUMP.

The peace-offering was offered to return thanks to God for benefits; or to solicit favors from him; or to satisfy private devotion; or simply, for the honor of God. The Israelites offered this when they pleased; no law obliged them to it. They were free to choose what animal they would, among such as were allowed to be sacrificed. No distinction was observed of age, or sex, of the victim, as in the burnt sacrifices, and the sacrifices for sin, Lev. iii. The law only required that the victim should be without blemish. He who presented it came to the door of the tabernacle, put his hand on the head of the victim, and killed it. The priest poured out the blood about the altar of burnt sacrifices: he burnt on the fire of the altar the fat of the lower belly, that which covers the kidneys, the liver and the bowels. And if it were a lamb, or a ram, he added to it the rump of the animal, which, in that country, is very fat. Before these things were committed to the fire of the altar, the priest put them into the hands of the offerer, then made him lift them up on high, and wave them toward the four quarters of the world, the priest supporting and directing his hands. The breast and the right shoulder of the sacrifice belonged to the priest that performed the service; and it appears, that each of them were put into the hands of him who offered them; though Moses mentions only the breast of the animal. After this, all the rest of the sacrifice belonged to him who presented it, and he might eat it with his family and friends, at his pleasure, Lev. viii. 30, &c.

The sacrifices or offerings of meal, or liquors, which were offered for sin, were in favor of the poorer sort, who could not afford to sacrifice an ox, or goat, or sheep, Lev. vi. 14, &c. They contented themselves with offering meal or flour, sprinkled with oil, with spice (or frankincense) over it. And the priest, taking a handful of this flour, with all the frankincense, sprinkled them on the fire of the altar; and all the rest of the flour was his own: he was to eat it without leaven in the tabernacle, and none but priests were to partake of it. As to other offerings, fruits, wine, meal, wafers, or any thing else, the priest always cast a part on the altar, the rest belonged to him and the other priests. These offerings were always accompanied with salt and wine, but were without leaven, Lev. ii.

Sacrifices, in which they set at liberty a bird, or a goat, were not properly such; because there was no shedding of blood, and the victim remained alive; e. g. the sparrow offered for the purification of a leper, or of a house spotted with leprosy, Lev. xiv. A couple of sparrows were presented to the priest, or two clean birds, with a bundle of hyssop, tied with a scarlet string. The priest killed one of the birds over running water, which was in a clean and new earthen vessel; afterwards, tying the living sparrow to the bundle of cedar and hyssop, with the tail turned towards the handle of the vessel, he plunged it in the water mingled with the blood of the first sparrow; sprinkled the leper, or the house, with it, and then set the living sparrow at liberty, to go where it pleased.

The other animal set at liberty was a goat; on the day of solemn expiation. See GOAT, SCAPE.

Sacrifices of birds were offered on three occasions. (1.) For sin, when the person offering was not rich enough to provide an animal for a victim, Lev. v. 7, 8. (2.) For purification of a woman after her lying-in, Lev. xii. 6, 7. When she could offer a lamb and a young pigeon, she gave both; the lamb for a burnt-offering, the pigeon for a sin-offering. But if she were not able to offer a lamb, she gave a pair of turtles, or a pair of young pigeons; one for a burnt-offering, the other for a sin-offering. (3.) They offered two sparrows for those who were purified from the leprosy; one was a burnt-offering, the other was a scape-sparrow, as above, Lev. xiv. 4, &c. 49—51.

For the sacrifice of the paschal lamb, see PASS-OVER.

The perpetual sacrifice (Exod. xxix. 38—40; Numb. xxviii. 3.) was a daily offering of two lambs on the altar of burnt-offerings; one in the morning, the other in the evening. They were burnt as holocausts, but by a small fire, that they might continue burning the longer. The lamb of the morning was offered about sunrise, after the incense was burnt on the golden altar, and before any other sacrifice. That in the evening was offered between the two evenings, that is, at the decline of day, and before night. With each of these victims was offered half a pint of wine, half a pint of the purest oil, and an assaron, or about three pints, of the finest flour.

Such were the sacrifices of the Hebrews; sacrifices, indeed, very imperfect, and altogether incapable, in themselves, to purify the soul! Paul has described these and other ceremonies of the law, "as weak and beggarly elements," Gal. iv. 9. They represented grace and purity, but they did not communicate it. They convinced the sinner of the necessity to purify himself, and make satisfaction to God; but they did not impart holiness to him. Sacrifices were only prophecies and figures of the true sacrifice, which eminently includes all their virtues and qualities; being at the same time holocaust, a sacrifice for sin, and a sacrifice of thanksgiving; containing the whole substance and efficacy, of which the ancient sacrifices were only representations. The paschal lamb, the daily burnt-offerings, the offerings of flour and wine, and all other oblations, of whatever nature, promised and represented the death of Jesus Christ. See further on COVENANT.

The sacrifice of a humble and contrite heart is that which, on our part, constitutes the whole merit of what we can offer to God, Ps. li. 17. "The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit; a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise." The Jews, without these dispositions, could not present any offering agreeable to God; and he often explains himself on this matter in the prophets, Ps. xl. 6: Isa. i. 11—14; Jer. xxxv. 15; Amos v. 21, 22; Hos. xiv. 2—4; Joel ii. 12, 13, &c.; Ps. li. 16.

The very natural notion common to mankind, that whatever we most value must be offered to God, has prevailed in several nations, so far as to induce them to offer human sacrifices. But it is not agreed who first introduced this custom. Some ascribe it to Ilus, or Saturn, who, they say, practised it among the Phœnicians, offering up to the gods his own son Jehoud, whom he had by the nymph Anabreth. Philo insinuates that the custom of offering such sacrifices was known in Canaan before Abraham; and some learned men think, that the example of these people abated much of that horror Abraham would otherwise have had, at the intention of sacrificing his own son. But it is much more probable, that Abraham's example, misunderstood and ill applied, gave rise to this custom. Some learned men have thought, that among the Canaanites and Moabites, they contented themselves with making their children pass through the flames, or between two fires, which they called lustrare per ignem. No doubt they often did so; but often they really consumed them in the flames. Moses (Lev. xviii. 21.) forbids this practice, though we afterwards read of a son of king Ahaz, who had been offered to Moloch, and yet reigned after his father, 2 Kings xvi. 3, compared with ch. xviii. 1.

In Lev. xx. 1—3, it is said, "Whosoever he be of the children of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn in Israel, that giveth any of his seed to Moloch, he shall surely be put to death, the people of the land shall stone him with stones. And I will set my face against that man, and will cut him off from among his people; because he hath given of his seed unto Moloch, to defile my sanctuary, and to profane my holy name. And if the people of the land do any ways hide their eyes from the man, when he giveth of his seed unto Moloch, and kill him not, then I will set my face against that man, and against his family, and will cut him off, and all that go a whoring after him, to commit whoredom with Moloch, from among their people." Moses repeats these prohibitions, Deut. xviii. 10. It appears, however, from Amos v. 26, that the people did not forbear, even in the desert, to carry with them a tent consecrated to Moloch.

It is beyond all doubt that the Canaanites put their children to death in honor of their gods, Ps. cvi. 37. Jeremiah (xix. 5.) says, "They have built also the high places of Baal, to burn their sons with fire, for burnt-offerings unto Baal." (See also chap. xxxii. 35.) For these crimes God drove out the Canaanites. (See Deut. xviii. 10, 12; Wisd. xii. 5.)

The Phœnicians, a remnant of the Canaanites, continued this barbarous custom, which they justified by the example of Ilus, or Saturn, as above; and carried it with their colonies into Africa, where it long continued. When Gelo, king of Sicily, conquered the Carthaginians, by the treaty he made with them, he obliged them to renounce the custom of sacrificing their children to Saturn; and Justin assures us, that Darius imposed the same commands on them by an embassy, to leave off human sacrifices. But notwithstanding this, they continued them till the proconsulate of Tiberius, who caused the priests of Saturn to be hanged on trees around their temples. Diodorus Siculus gives a description of Saturn, as adored by the Carthaginians: the figure was of brass; the hands of which were turned backward, and bending toward the ground; so that when they put upon his arms a child, to be consecrated to him, he immediately fell into a pan of burning coals beneath, and died miserably at the foot of the statue.

It would be to little purpose to accumulate examples of human victims. Porphyry assures us, that the book of Sanehoniaton was full of them. They were frequent, not only in Phœnicia, in Palestine, in the countries of Ammon and Moab, in Idumea, in Arabia, and in Egypt; but also in Gaul, among the Scythians, the Thracians, in the islands of Rhodes, Chios and Cyprus; even among the Athenians; and also in India, the South seas, and America. In fact, they have been practised in all parts of the world, with very few exceptions.

As to what is affirmed, that Ahaz had the same son for his successor, whom he had caused to pass through the fire in honor to Moloch, no proof can be given of this. It is true, his successor was Hezekiah; but he might have had several other sons. We know another of his sons, whose name was Maaseiah, who was put to death at the command of the king of Israel, 2 Chron. xxviii. 7.

SACRILEGE, the action of profaning holy things, or of committing outrage against holy things, or holy persons. Theft, or abuse, or profanation of sacred things, is sacrilege. Scripture gives the name of sacrilege to idolatry, and to other crimes which more directly insult the Deity. He is called sacrilegious, who commits an impiety, a profanation of holy things; who usurps sacred offices; who approaches the sacraments unworthily; who plunders or pillages things dedicated to God, &c.

SADDUCEES, one of the four principal sects of the Jews, and chiefly distinguished by their opinion concerning angels and spirits. They did not deny that man had a reasonable soul; but they maintained that this soul was mortal; and, by a necessary consequence, they denied the rewards and punishments of another life. They affirmed, also, that the existence of angels, and a bodily resurrection, were illusions, Acts xxiii. 8; Matt. xxii. 23; Mark xii. 18; Luke xx. 27. Epiphanius, and after him Augustin, advance, that they denied the Holy Spirit; but neither Josephus, nor the evangelists, accuse them of this error. It has been also imputed to them, that they thought God to be corporeal, and that they did not receive the prophets.

It is difficult to conceive how they could deny the existence of angels, yet receive the books of Moses, where frequent mention is made of angels, and of their appearance. The ancients do not acquaint us how they solved this difficulty. It may be they considered angels, not as individual beings, and subsisting of themselves, but as powers, emanations, or qualities inseparable from the Deity, much as the sun-beams are inseparable from the sun. Or they may have held angels to be mortal, as they thought human spirits to be.

But it is more likely, as Mr. Taylor remarks, that when the Sadducees are charged with denying the existence of angels, we misapply the term; intending by it celestial angels, whereas they meant it of disembodied human spirits. This accounts easily, he thinks, for their reception of the Pentateuch, in which appearances of celestial angels are recorded, and for our Lord's reference to the continued existence of the human spirits of Abraham, &c. His argument is—"the Deity declares himself God of Abraham—therefore, Abraham continues to exist—that is, in a state of spiritual, separate existence; for, if he were entirely dead, the Deity would be God of a non-existence, which is absurd." The Sadducees were constantly in opposition to the Pharisees, though they could agree when measures important to both were to be taken.

As the Sadducees acknowledged neither punishment nor recompense in another life, they were inexorable in chastising the wicked. They observed the law themselves, and caused it to be observed by others, with the utmost rigor. They admitted none of the traditions, explications, or modifications of the Pharisees: they kept only to the text of the law; and maintained, that only what was written was to be observed.

The Sadducees are accused of rejecting all the books of Scripture, except those of Moses; and to support this, it is observed, that our Saviour uses no Scripture against them, but passages out of the Pentateuch. But Scaliger produces good proofs to vindicate them from this. He observes, that they did not appear in Israel till after the number of the holy books was fixed, and that if they had been to choose out of the canon, the Pentateuch was less favorable to them than any other book, since it often mentions angels and their appearance. Besides, the Sadducees were present in the temple, and at other religious assemblies, where the books of the prophets were read, as well as those of Moses. They held the chief offices in the nation; and many of the priests were Sadducees. Would the Jews have suffered these employments to be filled by persons who rejected the greater part of their Scriptures? Besides, Manasseh-ben-Israel says expressly, that indeed they did not reject the prophets, but that they explained them in a sense very different from that of the other Jews.

Josephus assures us that they denied destiny, or fate; alleging, that these were only sounds void of sense, and that all the good or evil we experience, is in consequence of the good or evil side we have taken, by our free choice; that God was far from doing or from knowing evil; and that man was absolute master of his own actions. This was really to deny a Providence, and, on this foundation, we know not what could be the religion of the Sadducees; or what influence over terrestrial things they could ascribe to God. However, as it is certain they were not only tolerated, but admitted to the high-priesthood itself, we have strong proof of the low state of religion among the Jews.

John Hircanus, high-priest of the nation, separated himself in a signal manner from the sect of the Pharisees, and went over to that of the Sadducees. It is said, also, he strictly commanded all Jews, on pain of death, to receive the maxims of this sect. Aristobulus and Alexander Jannæus, son of Hircanus, continued to favor the Sadducees; and Abraham-bendior, Cabbala and Maimonides assure us, that under these princes they possessed all the offices of the Sanhedrim, and that there remained, on the part of the Pharisees, only Simon, son of Secra. Caiaphas, who condemned our Saviour, was a Sadducee, (Acts iv. 1; v. 17.) as was Ananus the younger, who put to death James, brother of our Lord. At this day, the Jews hold as heretics that small number of Sadducees which are found among them.

SADOC, son of Azor, father of Achim, and one of the ancestors of Jesus Christ, Matt. i. 14.

SAFFRON, a well-known flower, of a bluish color, in the midst of which are small yellow threads, of a very agreeable smell. Solomon (Cant. iv. 14.) joins it with other aromatics; and Jeremiah is made to speak of cloths of a saffron color, Lam. iv. 5. The passage, however, rather signifies purple or crimson.

SAINTE is a term sometimes put for the people of Israel, sometimes for Christian believers. The faction of Korah, Dathan and Abiram said to Moses and Aaron, (Numb. xvi. 3.) "Ye take too much upon you, seeing all the congregation are holy (or saints) every one of them, and the Lord is among them." And in several places of Scripture, the Hebrews are called a holy nation: "Ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation," Exod. xix. 6; 1 Pet. ii. 9; Deut. vii. 6; xiv. 2, 21. Nothing is more frequent in Paul than the name of saints given to Christians, Rom. i. 7; viii. 27, 28; xii. 13; xv. 25, 32; xvi. 2, &c. But it is, probably, never given to any, after the promulgation of the gospel, who had not been baptized. In this acception it continued, during the early ages of Christianity; nor was it applied to individuals declared to be saints by any other act of the church, till various corruptions had depraved the primitive principles. The church of Rome assumes the power of making saints, or of beatification; that is, of announcing certain departed spirits as objects of worship, and from which the faithful may solicit favors. A notion worthy of the dark ages in which it originated. Saints signifies, in particular, good men, and the servants of God. Prov. ix. 10 "The knowledge of the holy (or saints) is understanding." Prov. xxx. 3, "I neither learned wisdom, nor have the knowledge of the holy, or saints." Ps. xxxiv. 9, "O fear the Lord, ye his saints; for there is no want to them that fear him." Ps. xvi. 2, 3, "My goodness extendeth not to thee, but to the saints that are in the earth, and to the excellent, in whom is all my delight." Saints is often put for angels: (Job v. 1.) "To which of the saints wilt thou turn?"—"And, behold, he putteth no trust in his saints; yea, the heavens are not clean in his sight," chap. xv. 15. Daniel says, (iv. 13, 23.) "An holy one (or saint) came down from heaven." And Moses, (Deut. xxxiii. 2, 3.) "The Lord shined forth from mount Paran, and came with ten thousands of saints." See HOLY.

SALAH, or SALEH, son of Arphaxad, born in the thirty-fifth year of his father, A. M. 1693. He begat Eber at thirty years old, and died, aged 433 years, A. M. 2126, Gen. xi. 12, &c.

SALAMIS, the chief city of the isle of Cyprus, visited by Paul and Barnabas, A. D. 44, when they converted Sergius Paulus, Acts xiii. 5. It was situated on the south-east side of the island, and was afterwards called Constantia.

SALATHIEL, son of Jeconiah, and father of Zerubbabel, (1 Chron. iii. 17.) died at Babylon during the captivity. He was also son of Neri, according to Luke iii. 27, who makes him to have descended from Solomon by Nathan; whereas Matthew (i. 12.) derives him from Solomon by Rehoboam. In Salathiel were united the two branches of this illustrious genealogy; so that Salathiel was, according to Calmet, son to Jeconiah, according to the flesh, as appears from the Chronicles, which say, that Jeconiah had two sons, Assir and Salathiel, at Babylon; and son of Neri by adoption, or by having married the heiress of Neri's family; or as issue of the widow of Neri, he being dead without children. In either of these cases he would be son of Neri according to the law. Luke does not say in what sense he was son to Neri. See GENEALOGY, and ADOPTION.

SALCHAH, a city of the kingdom of Og, in the country of Bashan, beyond Jordan, toward the northern extremity of the portion of Manasseh, Deut. iii. 10; 1 Chron. v. 11; Josh. xii. 5; xiii. 11.

I. SALEM, peace, a name given to Jerusalem, which see.

II. SALEM, a city of the Shechemites, where Jacob arrived at his return from Mesopotamia, Gen. xxxiii. 18. Eusebius and Jerome notice this city; but some commentators translate the Hebrew, "Jacob came safe and sound to a city of Shechem." Shalem may signify, safe, in health, in peace, &c.

III. SALEM, or SALIM, a place where John the Baptist baptized on the Jordan, (John iii. 23.) the situation of which, however, is unknown.

SALMANESER, see SHALMANESER.

SALMON, son of Nahshon, married Rahab, by whom he had Boaz, A. M. 2553, 1 Chron. ii. 11, 51, 54; Ruth iv. 20, 21; Matt. i. 4. He is named "the father of Bethlehem;" that is, his descendants peopled Bethlehem; or he greatly improved and adorned it: he was, as we say, "the making of that town;" or he was the chief man, by office; the Abyssinian shum of a town.

SALMONE, or SALMONA, the name of a promontory which forms the eastern extremity of the isle of Crete, Acts xxvii. 7.

I. SALOME, daughter of Antipater, and sister of Herod the Great, one of the most wicked of women. She first married Joseph, whom she accused of fa-miliarities with Marianne, wife of Herod, and thus procured his death. She afterward married Costobarus; but being disgusted with him, she put him away, a license till then unheard of among the Jews, whose law (says Josephus) allows men to put away their wives, but does not allow women equal liberty. After this, she accused him of treason against Herod, who put him to death. She caused much division and trouble in Herod's family, by her calumnies and mischievous informations; and she may be considered as the chief author of the death of the princes Alexander and Aristobulus, and of their mother Marianne. She afterwards conceived a violent passion for an Arabian prince, called Silæus, whom she would have married against her brother Herod's consent; and even after she had married Alexas, her inclination for Silæus was notorious. Salome survived Herod, who left her by will, the cities of Jamnia, Azoth and Phasaelis, with 50,000 pieces of money. She favored Antipas against Archelaus, and died A. D. 9, a little after Archelaus had been banished to Vienne in Dauphiny. Salome had five children by Alexas—Berenice, Antipater, Calleas, and a son and a daughter, whose names are not mentioned. (Joseph. Antiq. lib. xv. 4—xvii. cap. 8.)

II. SALOME, a daughter of Herod the Great and Elpide, who married one of the sons of Pheroras. (Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 1.)

III. SALOME, the dancer, daughter of Herodias, and of Herod-Philip, first married Philip, her uncle, and afterwards Aristobulus, son of Herod, king of Chaleis, by whom she had three sons, Herod, Agrippa and Aristobulus. (Jos. Ant. xviii. 7.) When Herodias left Philip, her daughter Salome accompanied her, and by her cunning procured the death of John the Baptist. See ANTIPAS I, and HERODIAS.

Nicephorus and Metaphrastes state that Salome accompanied her mother Herodias, and her father-in-law Herod, in their banishment to Vienne in Dauphiny; and that the emperor having obliged them to go into Spain, as she passed over a river that was frozen, the ice broke under her feet, and she sunk in up to her neck; when the ice uniting again, she remained thus suspended by it, and suffered the same punishment she had made John the Baptist undergo. But none of the ancients mention this; and it is contrary to Josephus, who tells us, she first married Philip the tetrarch, son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra, who died about A. D. 33 or 34, and afterwards Aristobulus, son of Herod, king of Chalcis, her cousin-german, by whom she had several children. Thus she lived above thirty years after the exile of her father-in-law.

IV. SALOME, wife of Zebedee, mother of James Major and John the Evangelist, one of those holy women who attended our Saviour in his journeys, and ministered to him, Matt. xxvii. 56. She requested of Jesus, that her two sons, James and John, might sit one on his right hand, and the other on his left hand, when he should possess his kingdom; (comp. Matt. xxvii. 56, with Mark xv. 40.) but the Son of God answered, "Ye know not what ye ask; to sit on my right hand, and on my left, is not mine to give, but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared by my Father."

Salome gave a strong proof of her faith, when she followed Christ to Calvary, and did not forsake him even at the cross, Mark xv. 40; Matt. xxvii. 55, 56. She was also one of those women who brought perfumes to embalm him, and who came for this purpose to the sepulchre on Sunday morning early, Mark xvi. 1, 2. Entering into the tomb, they saw an angel, who informed them, that the Saviour was risen; and on their way back to Jerusalem, Jesus appeared to them, and said, "Be not afraid; go tell my brethren, that they go into Galilee, and there shall they see me."

Some give to Salome the name of Mary; but there is no proof of her being so called: and what some frivolous histories relate of the three Marys, Mary, the mother of Jesus, Mary, the mother of James, and Mary Salome, deserves no consideration.

SALT was appointed to season all sacrifices that were offered to God, Lev. ii. 13. Christ alludes to this, when, speaking of the sufferings of the damned, he says, "Every one shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt," Mark ix. 49. But though this may be the allusion, there is considerable difficulty in ascertaining its precise import. The phrase "salted with fire," is (to us, at least) unusual, especially as it stands in our version. Mr. Taylor suggests that the zai should be taken comparatively "as every sacrifice should be salted with salt;" or adversatively, as it often is, "but every sacrifice shall be salted with salt," to render it acceptable, according to the divine law. Possibly, a phrase used by Ignatius, in his Epistle to the Magnesians, may afford some light on the passage. "Lay aside therefore the old, and sour, and evil leaven, and be ye changed into the new leaven, which is Jesus Christ. Be ye salted in him, lest any one among you should be corrupted; for by your savor ye shall be judged." It is evident that the correct doctrines of the gospel are spoken of, as giving an agreeable savor to the "living sacrifices" of believers, whose good conduct, in consequence, evinces their entire preservation from corruption. In Syria, where there are salt lakes, it is most likely that comparisons, and even proverbs, were taken from the properties of the article they furnished. So we read, "Salt," that is in its genuine state, "is good; but, if it have lost its saltiness, wherewith will ye season it?" how restore it to any relish? The surface of the salt lakes, also, the thinner crust of salt, next the edges of the lakes, after rains, and especially after long-continued rains, loses the saline particles, which are washed away and dried off, yet it retains the form and appearance of salt, like the most perfect. For this reason, those who go to gather salt from the lakes, drive their horses and carts over this worthless matter, (and consequently trample it into mere mud and dirt,) in order to get some distance into the lake, where the salt is better; and often they are obliged to dig away the surface from thence, to obtain the salt pure and pungent.

We see from Ezek. xvi. 4, that anciently they rubbed new-born children with salt, which Jerome thought was to dry up the humidity, and to close the pores of the skin. Galen says, that salt hardens the skin of children, and makes them more firm.—Avicenna acquaints us, that they bathed children with water in which salt had been dissolved, to close up the navel, and to harden the skin. Others think, it was to hinder any corruption that might proceed from cutting off the navel-string.

The prophet Elisha, being desired to sweeten the waters of the fountain of Jericho, required a new vessel to be brought to him, and salt therein, 2 Kings ii. 21. He threw this salt into the spring, and said, "Thus saith the Lord, I have healed these waters; and in future they shall not occasion either death or barrenness." And in reality, the waters became good for drinking. Naturally the salt must have increased the brackishness of the fountain; but the prophet purposely selected a remedy that seemed contrary to the effect he would produce, that the miracle might become the more evident.

The wise man reckons salt in the number of things the most necessary for life; (Eccles. xxxix. 31.) and Job asks if any one could eat that which is not relished with salt? metaphorically, vigor of sentiment, understanding.

Salt is the symbol of wisdom: "Let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with salt," Col. iv. 6. And our Saviour says, "Have salt in yourselves, and have peace one with another." Hence we read of attic salt, that is, attic wit, or sharpness, mental intelligence, &c.

Salt is also the symbol of perpetuity and incorruption. Thus they said of a covenant, "It is a covenant of salt for ever, before the Lord," Numb. xviii. 19. And elsewhere, "The Lord God of Israel gave the kingdom over Israel to David for ever, even to him and to his sons, by a covenant of salt," 2 Chron. xiii. 5. See COVENANT OF SALT.

Salt is the symbol also of barrenness and sterility. When Abimelech took the city of Shechem, he destroyed it, and sowed the place with salt, that it might always remain desert, Judg. ix. 45. Zephaniah (ii. 9.) threatens the Ammonites and Moabites, from the Lord; "Moab shall be as Sodom, and the children of Ammon as Gomorrah, even the breeding of nettles, salt-pits, and a perpetual desolation." (See Ps. cvii. 34; Jer. xvii. 6.)

Lastly, salt is the symbol of hospitality; also of that fidelity due from servants, friends, guests and officers, to those who maintain them, or who receive them at their tables. The governors of the provinces beyond the Euphrates, writing to king Artaxerxes, tell him, "Because we have maintenance from the king's palace," &c. which, in the Chaldee, is, "Because we are salted with the salt of the palace," Ezra iv. 14.

SALT SEA, or DEAD SEA, see SEA.

SALT, VALLEY OF. Interpreters generally place this valley south of the Dead sea, towards Idumea; because it is said (2 Sam. viii. 13.) that Abishai there killed 18,000 Idumeans, and Joab 12,000; (1 Chron. xviii. 12; Ps. lx. title;) and long after that, Amaziah, King of Judah, killed 10,000, 2 Kings xiv. 7; 2 Chron. xxv. 11. David beat the Idumeans in the Valley of Salt, as he returned from Syria of Zobah. [This valley would seem to be either the northern part of the great valley El Ghor, leading south from the Dead sea; (see Exodus, p. 414;) or perhaps some smaller valley or ravine opening into it near the Dead sea. The whole of this region is strongly impregnated with salt, as appears from the reports of all travellers. According to captains Irby and Mangles, "a gravelly ravine, studded with bushes of acacia and other shrubs, conducts [from the west] to the great sandy plain at the southern end of the Dead sea. On entering this plain, the traveller has on his right a continued hill, composed partly of salt and partly of hardened sand, running south-east and north-west, till, after proceeding a few miles, the plain opens to the south, bounded, at the distance of about eight miles, by a sandy cliff from sixty to eighty feet high, which traverses the valley El Ghor like a wall, forming a barrier to the waters of the lake when at their greatest height." On this plain, besides the saline appearance left by the retiring of the waters of the lake, the travellers noticed, lying on the ground, several large fragments of rock-salt, which led them to examine the hill, on the right of the ravine by which they had descended to the plain, described above, as composed partly of salt and partly of hardened sand. They found the salt, in many instances, hanging from the cliffs, in clear perpendicular lines, resembling icicles. They observed also strata of salt of considerable thickness, having very little sand mixed with it, generally in perpendicular lines. During the rainy season, the torrents apparently bring down immense masses of this mineral. Was, then, this "gravelly ravine," perhaps, the particular "Valley of Salt?" or was this term applied more generally to this whole plain, which exhibits similar characteristics?

Strabo mentions, that to the southward of the Dead sea there are towns and cities built entirely of salt; and "although," add the travellers, "such an account seems strange, yet when we contemplated the scene before us, it did not seem incredible." The sea had thrown up at high-water mark a quantity of wood, with which the travellers attempted to make a fire, in order to bake some bread; but it was so impregnated with salt, that all their efforts were unavailing. The track, after leaving the salt-hill, led across the barren flats of the back-water of the lake, then left partially dry by the effects of evaporation. They passed six drains running into the sea; some were wet, and still draining the dreary level which they intersected; others were dry. These had a strong marshy smell, similar to what is perceivable on most of the muddy flats in salt-water harbors, but by no means more unpleasant. On the southern extremity of the eastern shore, salt is also deposited by the evaporation of the water of the lake. The travellers found several of the natives peeling off a solid layer of salt, several inches thick, with which they loaded their asses. At another point, also, where the water, being shallow, retires or evaporates rapidly, a considerable level is left, encrusted with a salt that is but half dried and consolidated, appearing like ice in the commencement of a thaw, and giving way nearly ankle deep. All these appearances are surely sufficient to justify the appellation of Plain or Valley of Salt. (See the Mod. Traveller, Palestine, p. 188, 199, seq. Amer. ed.) *R.

SALVATION. This word is taken in several senses in Scripture. (1.) For eternal happiness and salvation, the object of our hopes and desires. Thus it is said, "To give knowledge of salvation to his people," Luke i. 77. "The gospel of your salvation," Eph. i. 13. "Godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation," (2 Cor. vii. 10.) that is, leads to eternal life. (2.) For deliverance, or victory: "Shall Jonathan die, who hath wrought this great salvation in Israel?" 1 Sam. xiv. 45. (3.) For praise and benediction given to God: "Alleluiah, salvation, and glory, and honor, and power unto the Lord our God. . . . Salvation to our God which sitteth on the throne, and unto the Lamb," Rev. vii. 10; xix. 1.

The Hebrews rarely use concrete terms, as they are called, but often abstract terms. Thus, instead of saying, God saves them, and protects them; they say, God is their salvation. So, a voice of salvation, tidings of salvation, the rock of salvation, the shield of salvation, a horn of salvation, a word of salvation, &c. is equivalent to a voice declaring deliverance; the joy that attends escape from a great danger; a rock where any one takes refuge, and is in safety; a buckler that secures from the attack of an enemy; a horn or ray of glory, of happiness and salvation, &c. Thus, to work great salvation in Israel signifies to deliver Israel from some imminent danger, to obtain a great victory over enemies.

There is some difficulty, as Mr. Taylor remarks, in restraining the terms save and salvation, to their primitive import, in certain passages of Scripture. When Peter exhorts the Jews, (Acts ii. 40.) "Save yourselves from this untoward generation," he means, from the calamities with which their nation would soon be visited; and this expectation he authorizes by the declaration of the prophet Joel, of the wonders in heaven, &c. who adds, "Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord, shall be saved;" as, in fact, all Christians were, by withdrawing from Jerusalem, at the time of its siege. (Compare Matt: x. 22; xxiv. 13; Mark xiii. 13.) Yet Paul quotes this passage in a different sense, (Rom. x. 13.) implying that whoever, whether Jew or Greek, "shall call on the name of the Lord, shall be saved;" certainly not from the miseries of Jerusalem, but from the consequences of sin.

Nor is it less difficult to say, he adds, in what sense all Israel shall be saved, Rom. xi. 26. It cannot mean all the nation that ever existed; since thousands of them were marked by misery, within a few years from the date of this Epistle; neither can it mean eternal salvation, since not all Israel was worthy of that felicity. It may refer, he thinks, to that happy time, when the Jews, as a nation, shall acknowledge the gracious Deliverer come out of Sion; and shall be brought into a state of grace, leading to salvation, unless frustrated by personal transgression, &c. (Comp. chap. ix. 27, "a remnant shall be saved," &c.)

When we read (1 Tim. ii. 15.) that "women shall be saved in child-bearing," we must take the term in a qualified sense, since all women are not so saved. And when we are told (1 Cor. iii. 15.) that "if any man's work be burned, he himself shall be saved;" it is necessary to avoid the sense of certainty in the English term shall, and to consider the expression as importing may be saved rather than must be saved. It becomes, therefore, all students of the Bible, to examine carefully the intention of the writer, in passages where this term (or its cognates) occurs; and not to quote at random, as if to be saved always intended eternal salvation, since it may intend only temporal salvation, or a state of offered salvation, or a state of grace leading to salvation, or salvation begun but not yet completed. It may refer to personal safety, to spiritual deliverance, or to natural prosperity. Some may believe to the saving of the soul, (Heb. x. 39.) others, as Noah in his ark, may effect the saving, i. e. the preservation, of their families, chap. xi. 7.

THE GARMENTS OF SALVATION (Isa. lxi. 10.) refer to the habits of joy and festivity, worn on festival days, and after receiving a signal favor from God, as after deliverance from great danger.

SALUTATION, greeting, hailing. The antiquity of the salutation, "Peace be with you," and the understood conclusion, that if a person enjoy peace, all is well with him, appears from the earliest accounts we have of patriarchal behavior; as Gen. xxix. 6, "Is there peace (health) to him?" (Laban)—they answer, "Peace." So, Jacob directs Joseph, "Go, see the peace (welfare) of thy brethren," xxxvii. 14. So, the spies of Dan (Judg. xviii. 15.) "came and asked the Levite of peace;" i. e. saluted him; and even in the camp, David "asked his brethren of peace;" i. e. saluted them, 1 Sam. xvii. 22. The reader may recollect many instances of this phraseology, but none more memorable than our Lord's departing salutation, as recorded by the evangelists:—"Peace I leave with you; not as the world giveth," in their ordinary salutations, "give I unto you," but in a more direct, permanent, appropriate manner; on principles, and with authority, infinitely superior, I bless you with this heavenly gift, John xiv. 27.

"The Arabs of Yemen," says Niebuhr, "and especially the highlanders, often stop strangers, to ask whence they come, and whither they are going. These questions are suggested merely by curiosity; and it would be indiscreet, therefore, to refuse to answer." (Travels, vol. i. p. 302.) Does not this extract suggest the true import of that expression of our Lord, which has seemed, to some, to favor a rudeness of behavior; which, surely, so far from being congenial to the precepts and manners of the gospel, is inconsistent with them? We mean the passage, Luke x. 4: "Salute no man by the way."—Now the power of the word (ἀσπάζομαι) rendered "salute," implies, "to draw to one's self, to throw one's arms over another, and embrace him closely."—Less strictly taken, it signifies to salute, as rendered in our version; but may not the prohibition, in our Lord's directions to the seventy, have some reference to such a custom as we find among the Arabs of Yemen? q. d. "Do not stop any man, to ask him whence he comes, and whither he is going; do not loiter and gossip with any whom you may accidentally meet on your journey; do not stop strangers to receive information, of no value when you have received it; but rather make all proper speed to the towns whither I have sent you, and there deliver your good tidings?" Seen in this light, there is no breach of decorum, of friendship, or of good manners, implied in this command; but, on the contrary, merely a very proper prohibition of what, at best, is impertinence, and what, under the then circumstances, would have been injurious to matters of real importance.

Is there any allusion to such intrusive inquisitiveness in John xvi. 5, "None of you asketh me, Whither goest thou?"

SAMARIA, the capital city of the kingdom of Israel, that is, of the ten tribes. It was built by Omri king of Israel, who began to reign, A. M. 3079, and died 3086, 1 Kings xvi. 24. He bought the hill Samaria of Shemer, or Shomeron, for two talents of silver, about $3,000. Before Omri, the kings of Israel dwelt at Shechem, or at Tirzah.

Samaria was built on an agreeable and fruitful hill, in an advantageous situation, twelve miles from Dothain, twelve from Merrom, and four from Atharoth. Josephus says, it was a day's journey from Jerusalem. Though built on an eminence, it must have had water in abundance; since we find medals struck there, on which is represented the goddess Astarte, at whose feet is a river.

The kings of Israel omitted nothing to render this city the strongest, the finest, and the richest possible. Ahab here built a palace of ivory, (1 Kings xxii. 39.) and Amos (iii. 15; iv. 1, 2.) describes it under Jeroboam II. as a city sunk in excess of luxury and effeminacy. Ben-hadad, king of Syria, built public places or streets, probably for traffic, where his people dwelt, to promote commerce, 1 Kings xx. 34. His son Ben-hadad besieged it, under the reign of Ahab, but was defeated by a handful of young men. What is very remarkable, and yet very common, is, that the king of Syria's flatterers would ascribe the shame of their defeat, not to the pride and drunkenness of their king, but to the interposition of the gods of the Jews: "Their gods are gods of the hills, (say they,) therefore they were stronger than we; but let us fight against them in the plain, and surely we shall be stronger than they." The following year Ben-hadad brought an army into the field, probably with a design to march against Samaria; but his army was again destroyed, 1 Kings xx. 26, 27. Some years after this, (2 Kings vi. 24; vii. 1—4. A. M. 3119,) he came again before Samaria, and reduced it to such extremities by famine, that a mother was forced to eat her own child; but the city was relieved by a striking interposition of Divine Providence. It was besieged by Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, in the ninth year of Hoshea, king of Israel, which was the fourth of Hezekiah, king of Judah; (A. M. 3280;) and it was taken three years after, 2 Kings xvii. 6, 7, &c. The prophet Hosea (x. 4, 8, 9; xiv. 1.) speaks of the cruelties exercised by Shalmaneser; and Micah says, (i. 6.) the city was reduced to a heap of stones. The Cuthites sent by Esarhaddon to inhabit the country of Samaria did not think it worth their while to repair the ruins of this city, but dwelt at Shechem, which they made their capital.

However, the Cuthites rebuilt some part of Samaria, since Ezra speaks of its inhabitants, Ezra iv. 17; Neh. iv. 2. The Samaritans, being jealous of the favors Alexander the Great conferred on the Jews, revolted from him, while he was in Egypt, and burnt alive Andromachus, whom he had left governor. Alexander took Samaria, and sent Macedonians to inhabit it; giving the country around it to the Jews; and, to encourage them to cultivate it, he granted them exemptions from tribute. But the kings of Egypt and Syria, who succeeded Alexander, deprived them of this country.

Alexander Balas, king of Syria, restored to Jonathan Maccabæus the cities of Lydda, Ephrem and Ramatha, which he separated from the country of Samaria. And the Jews resumed the full possession of it under John Hircanus, who took Samaria, and ruined it, according to Josephus, so that the river ran through its ruins, A. M. 3995. It so continued to A. M. 3947, when Aulus Gabinus, proconsul of Syria, rebuilt it, and named it Gabiniana. But it was very inconsiderable, till Herod the Great restored it to its ancient lustre, and gave it the Greek name of Sebaste, (in Latin Augusta,) in honor of the emperor Augustus, who had given him the proprietary of it.

The New Testament speaks but little of Samaria; and when it does mention it, it is rather in respect of the country than of the city. When it is said (Luke xvii. 11; John iv. 4.) our Lord passed through the midst of Samaria; the meaning is, through the midst of the country of Samaria. And again, "Then cometh he to a city of Samaria called Sychar." Here Jesus had a conversation with a woman of Samaria, that is, with a Samaritan woman of the city of Sychar. After the death of Stephen, when the disciples were dispersed through the towns of Judea and Samaria, Philip the deacon withdrew into the city of Samaria, where he made converts, (Acts viii. 1—3.) and when the apostles heard that this city had received the word of God, they sent Peter and John thither, to communicate the Holy Ghost. Samaria is never called Sebaste in the New Testament, though strangers hardly knew it by any other name. Jerome says it was thought Obadiah was buried at Samaria. They also showed there the tombs of Elisha and of John the Baptist.

The country of Samaria lies between Judea and Galilee. It begins, according to Josephus, at a town called Ginea, in the great plain, and ends at the toparchy of Aerabatene. Samaria, under the first temple, was the name of a city; under the second, of a country. Rabbi Benjamin, of Tudela, says, "Sebaste is Samaria, where the palace of Ahab, king of Israel, is still known. Now that city was on a mountain, and well fortified, had springs, well watered land, gardens, paradises, vineyards and olive-yards. Distant eight miles is Neapolis, that is, Sychem, in mount Ephraim. It is seated in a valley between the mountains Gerizim and Ebal; in it are about a hundred Cutheans, observing the law of Moses only; they are called Samaritans; and have priests of the seed of Aaron. They sacrifice in the temple on mount Gerizim on the day of the passover, and on feast days on the altar built there of the stones set up by the children of Israel, when they passed over Jordan."

The following is the account of the modern city, as given by Richardson: "Its situation is extremely beautiful, and strong by nature; more so, I think, than Jerusalem. It stands on a fine large, insulated hill, compassed all round by a broad, deep valley; and, when fortified, as it is stated to have been by Herod, one would have imagined, that in the ancient system of warfare, nothing but famine would have reduced such a place. The valley is surrounded by four hills, one on each side, which are cultivated in terraces to the top, sown with grain and planted with fig and olive-trees, as is also the valley. The hill of Samaria, likewise, rises in terraces to a height equal to any of the adjoining mountains.

"The present village is small and poor, and, after passing the valley, the ascent to it is very steep; but, viewed from the station of our tents, is extremely interesting, both from its natural situation, and from the picturesque remains of a ruined convent of good Gothic architecture.

"Having passed the village, towards the middle of the first terrace, there is a number of columns still standing. I counted twelve in one row, besides several that stood apart, the brotherless remains of other rows. The situation is extremely delightful, and my guide informed me that they belonged to the serai or palace. On the next terrace there are no remains of solid building, but heaps of stone and lime, and rubbish mixed with the soil in great profusion. Ascending to the third, or highest terrace, the traces of former buildings were not so numerous, but we enjoyed a delightful view of the surrounding country. The eye passed over the deep valley that compasses the hill of Sebaste, and rested on the mountains beyond, that retreated as they rose with a gentle slope, and met the view in every direction, like a book laid out for perusal on a writing desk.

"From this lofty eminence we descended to the south side the hill, where we saw the remains of a stately colonnade, that stretches along this beautiful exposure from east to west. Sixty columns are still standing in one row; the shafts are plain, and fragments of Ionic volutes, that lie scattered about, testify the order to which they belong. These are probably the relics of some of the magnificent structures with which Herod the Great adorned Samaria. None of the walls remain."

SAMARITANS. The account given of these people by Calmet is extremely prolix, and by no means satisfactory. We shall, therefore, omit it entirely, and supply its place by a narrative deduced from sources, many of which were not known at the time when Calmet wrote.

The Samaritans were descended from the remnant of the Israelites not carried away into captivity, and afterwards intermixed with Gentiles from the neighboring parts of Assyria, especially the Cuthi, who had come to colonize and occupy the vacant situations of the former inhabitants. In this new colony idolatry was introduced and permitted from the very first; yet so as to worship Jehovah in conjunction with the false gods, 2 Kings xvii. 29. When, afterwards, Cyrus permitted the Jews to return from captivity and rebuild their temple, the Samaritans, who wished to form a union in religious matters with the Jews, requested that the temple might be erected at the common labor and expense of both nations. But Zerubbabel, and the other Jewish rulers, rejected their request, urging that Cyrus had committed the work to them only, and had charged the governors of Samaria to keep away from the place, and only assist the Jews out of the public revenues of the province. The Samaritans, however, said they were at liberty to worship there, since the temple had been erected for the worship of the Supreme Being by all the human race. When the Samaritans had received this repulse from the Jews, they felt much mortified, and laid wait for revenge; they endeavored to obstruct the restoration of the temple, and the increase and prosperity of the Jewish state by various methods. Hence originated a mutual hatred between the nations, which was afterwards kept up and increased by the revolt of Manasseh, and the erection of the temple on mount Gerizim. For Manasseh, a brother of Jaddus, the high-priest, had, contrary to the laws and customs of the nation, taken in marriage the daughter of Sanballat, the ruler of Samaria, (Neh. xiii. 23, seq.) and when the Jews, indignant at this, had ordered that he should divorce her as an alien, or no longer approach to the altar and the sacred institutions, he fled to his father-in-law, a high-priest, who alienated many from the religious worship of the Jews, and by gifts and promises drew over great numbers, and even some of the priests, to the Samaritan party. But now that the temple was erected on mount Gerizim, still greater contentions arose between the Jews and Samaritans concerning the place of divine worship. For the Samaritans denied that the sacred rites at Jerusalem were pure and of divine ordination: but of the temple on mount Gerizim they affirmed that it was holy, legitimate, and sanctioned by the presence of the Deity. The Samaritans, moreover, only received the books of Moses. The rest of the sacred books (since they vindicated the divine worship at Jerusalem) they rejected, as also the whole body of the traditions, keeping solely to the letter. From these causes the Jews were inflamed to the most rancorous hatred towards this rival nation; inasmuch that to many of them the Samaritans were objects of greater detestation than even the Gentiles. (See Luke x. 33.) It is no wonder, then, that there should have been such a constant reciprocation of injuries and calumnies as had served to keep up a perpetual exasperation between the two nations. The fault, however, was not all on the side of the Jews; for (as we learn from Bartenora ad Roschachana, ii. 2, cited by Schoettgen) the Samaritans inflamed this enmity by taking every opportunity of injuring, or at least offering provocations to the Jews. The following anecdote may serve as an example:—"When the time of the new moon was just at hand, the Jews had a fire kindled on the highest mountains, to warn those who were afar off of the exact time of the novilunium. What did the Samaritans do? Why, in order that they might lead the Jews into an error, they themselves, during the night-time, kindled fires on the mountains. Therefore, the Jews were obliged to send out trusty and creditable persons, who should give out the time of the new moon, as observed by the Jerusalemite Sanhedrim, or defined by other persons to whom that office was committed." The Samaritans, however, did not entertain so much hatred towards the Jews, as the latter did towards the former; nor did they deny towards them the offices of humanity. (See Luke ix. 53; x. 32.) Jesus, however, disregarded, nay discountenanced, this hatred, and as he did not hesitate to eat with tax-gatherers, so neither did he avoid intercourse with Samaritans.

Dr. Wait has a paper, in his Repertorium Theologicum, on the notions entertained by the Samaritans of a Messiah, which contributes some valuable information, derived from a correspondence which took place, some years since, between two Samaritan priests and two of our own countrymen, who, under a pious fraud, as it is termed, but which was wholly indefensible, elicited the religious opinions of the residents at Napolose, or Samaria, and also obtained copies of the Pentateuch and the Book of Joshua. From this correspondence, Dr. Wait remarks, it is evident that many of the opinions we have been accustomed to cherish respecting the Samaritans are decidedly false, having proceeded directly from the enmity of the Jews, and the fictions of the rabbinical pages; being utterly unauthorized by Josephus and his contemporaries, and absolutely repugnant to those conclusions, which the Scriptures would induce us to draw from the little which they have recorded of them.

That the Samaritans had a clear notion of the coming of a Messiah, is quite manifest from the conversation which occurred between our Saviour and a woman of this nation, as recorded in John iv. But the source whence they derived that knowledge it is somewhat difficult to determine. They could not, as Dr. Wait observes, have been indebted to the Pentateuch alone for it; they must have extracted this information from other sources, and forced isolated passages of the Pentateuch in subsequent times to have become its authorities. We vainly scrutinize the Pentateuch for a single prophecy of Christ's death and resurrection; and yet it appears from some of their MSS., that the Samaritans believed, that their Messiah should die and rise from the dead. If the Samaritans contemporary with our Saviour deduced these opinions at all from Scripture, they must have deduced them from prophecy; and if no such prophecy exists in the Mosaic books, it will follow, that they could not have been ignorant of the prophecies which were uttered after the institution of the monarchy, although the present race rejects these writings from the canon.

From all that Dr. Wait has been enabled to collect of their modern religious ceremonies, we find them strictly observant of the law; on the sabbath, they only go to the "house of Jehovah to pray, to give thanks, and to read the law." They still solemnize the passover with the most scrupulous attention; they eat unleavened bread for the space of seven days, and on the seventh repair to Gerizim. From the day succeeding the sabbath of the ordinance of unleavened bread, they count fifty days to that succeeding the seventh sabbath; they also celebrate the feast of first-fruits, on which they also go to the "Everlasting Mount." They observe the feast of the seventh month, the tenth day of which is the day of expiation, on which all, from man to child, afflict themselves and read the law. On the fifteenth day of the seventh month, they carry fruits and boughs of palms and other trees and thus proceed to Gerizim;—they likewise keep the feast of the eighth day, and purify themselves from occasional uncleanness. Every morning and evening they pray towards their sacred mountain, throwing their faces to the ground; and in whatever part of the globe they may be, thither they direct themselves at their prayers. In fact, they rigorously adhere to the letter of the law; but they are not Karaites, for their epistles mention this sect with contempt. Whence, then, did they receive the notion of a Messiah? We have seen, that they could scarcely have received it from the Pentateuch; for even the most determinate passages, which they cite as their authorities, would, if considered exclusively of others, hardly have suggested to a people denying the other canonical books, those minute ideas of the promised Prophet which they undeniably entertained. But these ideas are so approximated to the language of the Jewish prophets, that one of three hypotheses, says the doctor, must be correct: either that, at some unrecorded period, they were borrowed from thence, or, which is nearly equivalent, that these prophecies, by means of individuals travelling from the one kingdom to the other, were made known to the servants of the true God in Israel, or that the prophets of Israel themselves delivered oracles respecting the Messiah, which, though now lost, were nevertheless the sources of this Samaritan knowledge.

These three causes, he remarks, may have, indeed, produced conjointly the effect:—the two latter may be supported by the following arguments. The worship of Jehovah was never totally extinct in Israel;—in Elijah's days, many still adhered to the worship of their forefathers; and in the most degenerate times of Israelitish apostasy, the accredited prophets of Jehovah were even summoned, on emergencies, to give counsel to those monarchs who had proscribed the faith to which they were devoted. Some, therefore, among the severed tribes, remained true to the religion of Moses, even in the worst eras of defection; yet, however observant they may have been of the law, we can scarcely presume, that the political dissension between the kingdoms of Judah and Israel, would allow them to frequent the temple in Jerusalem at the divinely instituted festivals. For the erection of the golden calves at Dan and Bethel was expressly designed to prevent this national intercourse; nor is it any where recorded, that Elijah, or Elisha, or one of the sons of the Israelitish prophets, became an attendant on the worship of Jehovah within the holy city. Independently, however, of these particulars, we may argue, that the law was always rigidly observed by some members of the ten tribes. Hence Friedrich forcibly argues, that this preservation of the true religion, in whatever degree it may have been, affords a strongly presumptive evidence, that the [Samaritan] Pentateuch must have been edited before the days of Jeroboam; without this assumption, it would be difficult to imagine how the observance of the law could have survived the persecutions and turmoils of those ages, how otherwise it was not overwhelmed by the superstitious of the neighboring nations, and did not sink beneath the weight of ever-galling oppressions. Moreover, the same reason, which induced them to reject the other Scriptural books, (from which we should, perhaps, except that of Joshua,) would also have induced them to reject the Pentateuch itself, had they not been antecedently in possession of it, and therefore been most fully assured, that it was not a production of late date: since, therefore, their defection from Judah and Benjamin occurred in the reign of Jeroboam, we must, on this account, conclude it to have been edited long before, and to have been in circulation before the separation of the tribes. If then they thus had the books of Moses, we may argue them to have been acquainted with those Psalms of David, which had been sung in the tabernacle and the temple, and these Psalms were replete with the expectations of the Messiah. Consequently, after their abscission from Judah, they could not have failed to have carried away with them these vivid hopes and ardent expectations, and to have transmitted them to their descendants. What, then, is more natural, than to suppose, that when they rejected the other canonical books, they ingrafted these ideas, elsewhere received, on their interpretations of them?—for, in fact, they must have seen the promises partially accomplished in the extent of dominion which David and Solomon acquired. That passover, which was celebrated in the days of Josiah, which Israel attended at Jerusalem, (2 Kings xxiii; 2 Chron. xxxv.) manifestly proves to us, how deeply the true religion was rooted in those who had not deflected from it, and likewise offers to us an epoch, to which we may refer the first of the three hypotheses. To this we may also add that period, when the second temple was erected, during which there was an intercourse between the Jews and the Samaritans, (Jos. Ant. xiii. 17.) who, doubtless, imparted to the Samaritans those opinions, in which they had been educated. These periods, therefore, either separately or conjointly, are adequate to the solution of the difficulty; nor can we err in maintaining, that at one, or another, or all of these, the doctrines and expectations of Judah respecting the Messiah were circulated in Samaria.

We have no reason to believe, that those who selected Gerizim as their place of religious worship, in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah, were infected with idolatry: the sacred page authorizes us not in such a conclusion, nor can we retrace the allegation to a legitimate and historical source. We are no where informed to what deity Sanballat dedicated his temple; we nowhere read of its appropriation to idols. Josephus says nothing of Manasseh's apostasy; therefore, we presume the Samaritan temple to have been dedicated to the true God. Had it been dedicated to an Assyrian idol, or to the Baal-Berith, who once had a temple at Sichern, and like the Ζεὺς ἑσπέριος of the Greeks, and Deus Fidius of the Romans, was accounted the God of oaths and covenants, can we suppose, that so many Jews, just emigrated from Babylonian oppression, would have flocked to it, or have followed the priesthood and fortunes of Manasseh? More than one hundred and sixty years after its erection, the Jewish historian called it ἰδωλιον; could he have so called it, if it had been dedicated to an idol?

Our more immediate inquiry, however, respects the Samaritans after the erection of Sanballat's temple; between whom and the Jews the chief points of dispute lay, in their rejection of all the canonical books, except the Pentateuch, and their affirmation, that Gerizim was the only place where God could be acceptably worshipped. Cellarius, Hottinger, and even Reland, seem, in some degree, as Dr. Wait remarks, to have been led astray on this point; the fable of the brazen bird, which the Romans erected on Gerizim, on the authority of the Samaritan chronicle, if it were not the Roman eagle, was evidently a tradition compounded of the הַצִּבְיָה of the men of Hamath, and the נֶבֶךְ of those of Ava. Some of their statements, indeed, refer their first copy of the law to the thirteenth year after the settlement of the Israelites in Canaan, which they aver to have been made by Abishua the son of Phinehas; but this can only be regarded as an idle pretension, which is not even accredited by all the Samaritans. Of the antiquity of their copies there can be no doubt, any more than of the frauds, of which they were guilty in certain passages. Yet, although they have corrupted the Pentateuch by occasional interpolations, the value of their copy is evinced by some readings, which appear to supply lacunæ in the Hebrew, and by the great accordance between its chronology and that of the Septuagint. The Jews admit, that Ezra abandoned the old Samaritan characters, and introduced the Assyrian, or Chaldee, wherefore the Samaritans still call theirs the Hebrew, or the characters of the Sacred language, and say, that "the Jewish Books were written by Ezra." So violent has the animosity respecting the Pentateuch ever been between these two claimants of it, that when Saadiah's Arabic version appeared, (whom they designate as the doctor of Faium,) Abu Said was deputed to commence a Samaritano-Arabic version in opposition to it, a copy of which is in the Bibliothéque du Roi, at Paris.

Maimonides himself, who, perhaps, was the most unbiassed writer among the Jews, admits their rigid practice of the law, and, even whilst he is relating the tale of the dove, evidently seems disinclined to believe it. Josephus, also, (Ant. ix. 14.) bore the same testimony to them.

So scrupulous are they still respecting the institutes of the lawgiver, that on the sabbaths they kindle no fires, nor even on their festivals; they affirm their priests to be Levites, but regret that they have no high-priest of the race of Phinehas, offering, in their epistles, should such an individual be found, to install him in his office.

The separation, indeed, at the time of the erection of the second temple, was merely occasioned by the intermarriages with foreigners, which Ezra and Nehemiah forbade; those who were willing to repudiate their foreign wives remaining at Jerusalem—those who were resolved to retain them emigrating to Samaria. But however requisite this allowance may have been to the formation of a new state, it is no where recorded, that the Samaritans persevered in the practice; yet, from hence, they received in the Jewish writings the appellation of צִיְתִים Cuthites, and had the stigma indelibly fixed upon them by their rivals.

Had such been their practice in our Saviour's time, he assuredly would have alleged it against their national pretensions in his discourses with the Samaritan woman. His words are simply, "Ye worship ye know not what: we know what we worship; for salvation is of the Jews," John iv. 22. These, viewed in their connection, must have had a reference to their notions of a Messiah,—probably also to their application of biblical passages to his advent,—and accordingly, the woman (v. 25.) so understood them. They also partially related to the question, whether Gerizim or Jerusalem were the proper place of worship, and appear to have alluded to the indistinct conceptions of the legal types and ceremonies, which the Samaritans, unaided by the other books of Scripture, must have had. The Samaritans worshipped "they knew not what?" for, believing the advent of the Messiah, they rejected the prophetic books, which illustrated and determined it; they assented to the fact, without knowing either its nature or object, whereas the Jews, to whose line he was restricted, had opportunities of ascertaining from the prophets criteria, which would have designated him at his appearance to every unprejudiced reasoner. (Report. Theol. p. 1—10.)

(For the Samaritan language, see LANGUAGES, ORIENTAL, p. 606; and LETTERS, p. 618.) There exists a copy of the Hebrew Pentateuch preserved by the Samaritans in their own character; and also a Samaritan translation of the Pentateuch. The value of these has been critically discussed by Gesenius, in his work entitled de Pentateuchi Samar. origine, indole, et auctoritate, Hal. 1815; the results of which have also been given to the public by professor Stuart, in an article in the N. A. Review, April, 1826. Bibl. Repos. vol. ii. No. 8. (See also Winer, de Versionis Pent. Samar. indole, Leips. 1817; and the article VERSIONS below.)

It is well known that a small remnant of the Samaritans still exists at Naplous, the ancient Shechem. Great interest has been taken in them by the learned of Europe; and a correspondence has several times been instituted with them, which, however, has never led to results of any great importance. It was commenced by Joseph Scaliger in 1559; and again, after a century, by several learned men in England, in 1675; and by the celebrated Ludolf in 1685. Of late years, the orientalist De Sacy, of Paris, has again held correspondence with them; and has recently published all that is known respecting them, and all their letters, in a work entitled Correspondence des Samaritaines, &c. Paris, 1829. They have often been visited, of late years, by travellers; and the best account we have of them and of their present circumstances, is from the pen of the late American Missionary, the Rev. P. Fisk, under date of Nov. 19, 1823. (See Missionary Herald, 1824, p. 310.)

"After taking some refreshment, we went to visit the Samaritans, having first sent to the kohen, or priest, to know if a visit would be agreeable. His name is Shalnar ben Tabiah. His first name he sometimes pronounces Salomer. I believe it is the same as Solomon, which the Jews in Jerusalem now pronounce Shloma. He received us in a neat apartment, and we immediately entered into conversation. Ten or twelve other members of the sect soon came in. Our conversation was in Arabic. They represent the number of their houses to be 20 or 30,—about 60 pay the capitation tax. They say there are no other Samaritans in this country, but they are quite disposed to think they are numerous in other parts of the world. In Paris they suppose they were very numerous, until, in a time of war between the French and some other nation, the Samaritans were dispersed. They say that there are, however, four still living in Paris. They inquired whether there are any Samaritans in England, and seemed not at all gratified when we told them no. On learning that I was from America, they inquired if there are Samaritans there. I told them no; but they confidently asserted the contrary, and that there are also many in India. They maintain that they are the lineal descendants of Jacob: the kohen and his sons, only, of the tribe of Levi; one family from the tribe of Benjamin; four or five from Manasseh, and the rest from Ephraim. We asked what they would do for a priest, if the kohen and his sons should die, and thus the tribe of Levi become extinct. They replied, (bazah ma beseer), "This does not happen." They all speak Arabic, but their books and public prayers are in Samaritan. They call their language Hebrew, and that which we call Hebrew, they call Jewish; for they say their language is the true Hebrew in which the law was given. The difference consists in the use of a different alphabet and different pronunciation. They go three times a year to mount Gerizim to worship, but do not offer sacrifices there now, as they did formerly, lest they should be molested by the Turks. But they offer their sacrifices in a more private way, in the city. We understood them to say, that they have no daily sacrifice. We visited their synagogue. It is a small, dark, but neat room, with an altar, but without seats. We were obliged, before entering, to pull off not only our over-shoes, but also our slippers, which are not prohibited even in mosques; and Mr. Jowett was obliged to take off an outer garment, which he wears, that is lined with fur. No person can approach the altar, except the kohen and his sons. They expect a Messiah, who is to be a Prophet and King, but a mere man, to live 120 years, as Moses did, and to reign at Naplous over all the world. Those who do not receive him, are to be destroyed with the sword. The promise concerning the woman's seed does not, they believe, refer to the Messiah; but that, concerning a prophet like unto Moses, does refer to him, as does also that concerning Shiloh, Gen. xlix. 10. They admit the sense of this passage as given in our translation, and try to show that there is still a sceptre somewhere in the hands of Judah. The Messiah will come when Israel repent. They say the story of the separation between Israel and Judah, under Jeroboam and Rehoboam, is a lie of the Jews. The city of Luz, or Bethel, they say, was on mount Gerizim, Gen. xxviii. 19. Jebus, they say, was also on this mount, and that Judges xix. 10, as it stands in our copies, is not true.

"The next day we renewed our visit to the Samaritans. We had yesterday requested to see their ancient copy of the law. The kohen objected, but after much persuading, and indirectly presenting the motive which generally prevails in this country, i. e. the offer of money, he at last consented to show it to us this morning. In order to do it, he said he must first bathe, and then put on a particular dress for the occasion. On our arrival at the synagogue, we waited a short time, and he appeared, entered the synagogue, approached the altar, kneeled and put his face to the floor, then opened the little closet which contained the holy book, kneeled and put his face to the floor again, then brought out the brass case, which contained the roll, and opened it so as to show us the manuscript, but we were not allowed to touch it. It is in the Samaritan character, and the kohen says it was written by Abishua, the grandson of Aaron, thirteen years after the death of Moses, and 3260 years ago. (See 1 Chron. vi. 4.) Another brass case stood near this, containing an exact copy of the original manuscript, said to have been made 800 years ago. On a shelf, in the synagogue, were a exhibited in Vaillant, Numism. Imper. Græc." (Shaw's Travels, page 217.) In like manner, Pitts informs us—"They have [at Algiers] a comical sort of wrestling. . . . There comes one boldly into the ring of people, and strips all to his drawers: he turns his back to the ring, and his face towards his clothes on the ground. He then stretcheth on his right knee, and then throws abroad his arms three times, clapping his hands together as often, just above the ground: . . . then makes two or three good springs into the middle of the ring, and there he stands with his left hand to his left ear, and his right hand to his left elbow. This is his challenge; his antagonists do the same. After which the pilewans face each other, and then both at once slap their hands on their thighs, and then clap together, and then lift them up as high as their shoulders, and cause the palms of their hands to meet, and with the same dash their heads one against another three times, so hard, that many times the blood runs down. . . . They'll come as often within five or six yards one of another, and clap their hands to each other, and then put forward the left leg, bowing their body, and leaning with the left elbow on the left knee, for a little while looking one at the other like two fighting cocks, then at it they go. . . . At their byrams, or festivals, those which are their most famous pilewans, come in to show their parts, before the Dey, eight or ten together. They are the choice of all the stout wrestlers." (Account of Algiers, page 168.)

Do not these challengers well deserve the description of leg-and-thigh-men, or shoulder-and-thigh-men? Their very attitudes seem to have furnished their name, which seems, indeed, correctly expressive of them. Now, as we learn, that occasionally the most famous of these are selected and engaged, is there any thing unlikely in the supposition, that the Philistines assembled their best wrestlers, and most notorious combatants, to engage the famous Samson? that these, fighting in the manner described by Pitts and Dr. Shaw, are denoted by the expression, "hip-and-thigh-men?" i. e. those who made a profession of wrestling, and who were esteemed eminent in that exercise.

[After all, the expression he smote them hip and thigh, which occurs no where else in Scripture, seems here to be merely proverbial, implying that he smote them wholly, entirely. So Gesenius. R.]

After this, Samson retired into the rock Etam, in Judah; but was taken by the people of Judah and led bound to the Philistines. The Spirit of the Lord, however, animating Samson, he snapped his cords, and happening to find the jaw-bone of an ass, he, with this weapon, slew a thousand Philistines; and, throwing away the jaw-bone, he gave that place the name of Ramath-lehi, that is, the lifting up of the jaw-bone. Being overcome with extreme thirst, and crying to the Lord, the Lord opened a rock called Maktesh, that is, the jaw-tooth, whence water gushed out to assuage his thirst. See LEHI.

After this, Samson went to Gaza, a city of the Philistines, where he took up his lodgings with a harlot, or more probably a woman who kept a public house. The Philistines, knowing of his arrival, set a guard about the house, and another at the gates of the city, to kill him as he went out in the morning. But Samson, rising at midnight, went off, and took away the two gates of the city, and the gate-posts, bar and chain, and carried them up the hill which is towards Hebron.

Some time afterwards, he became attached to a woman called Delilah, who dwelt in the valley of Sorek. Many have thought, that Samson took her as his wife, but this does not appear to have been the fact. The Philistines bribed this woman, to discover in what his extraordinary strength consisted. He amused her for a considerable time, pretending that it lay sometimes in one thing, and sometimes in another; and when the Philistines were ready to seize him, he burst his bonds asunder. At last she obtained the secret, that his strength lay in his hair, which had never been shorn. This she cut off, as he lay sleeping in her lap, after the common oriental fashion; and the Philistines instantly seizing him, bound him, and put out his eyes. They took him to Gaza, shut him up in prison, and made him grind at the mill, as a base and contemptible slave.

In this usage we discover a degree of vindictive contempt, which perhaps was the ne plus ultra of contumely on the part of the Philistines. Samson being blind, yet of great strength, they made him grinder for the prison. Grinding was women's work, therefore severely degrading; it was simple work, requiring no art; it was laborious work, in which his strength was of service; and thus, by drudging for them, in this menial employment, he earned a mortifying livelihood for himself. In this view, Samson was worse used than Job (xxxi. 10.) supposes his wife might be; "Let my wife be so degraded that, instead of having her corn ground for her, she shall perform that servile office herself; not for herself, or for me, the lawful object of her affectionate care, but let her grind for another." Samson, the hero, employed on woman's work! a vilely fit employment for Delilah's deluded lover! he ground too for others, for those in prison with himself; Samson, the hero, labors, as Isaiah predicts the virgin daughter of Babylon should labor: "Come down, sit in the dust; sit on the ground; there is no chair for thee: take the mill-stones, and grind meal: nay more, whereas women who grind usually sing while grinding, sit thou silent, and get into darkness; retire into some dark hole and corner, endeavoring to obtain a partial concealment of thy vexation and disgrace," chap. xlvii. 1.

Samson continued in prison at Gaza about a year, and his hair growing again, (Judg. xvi. 22.) God restored to him his strength. Shortly afterwards the princes of the Philistines met in a general assembly, in the temple of their god Dagon, to return him thanks for having delivered them this their formidable enemy; and after they had ended their feast, they ordered Samson to be brought in that he might contribute to their sport. When they had insulted him as long as they thought fit, he desired his guide to let him rest himself against the pillars that supported the temple, which was then full of people, both above and below the galleries. (See HOUSE.) Calling on the name of the Lord, and laying hold of the two pillars, by which the temple was supported, one in his right hand and the other in his left, he said, "Let me also die with the Philistines;" and violently shaking the pillars, the temple fell, and killed about three thousand persons. Samson lived in the whole about thirty-eight years; and was judge of Israel about twenty, Judg. xvi. 20. A. M. 2867 to 2887.

SAMUEL, son of Elkanah and of Hannah, of the tribe of Levi, and of the family of Kohath, was a prophet and judge of Israel for many years, 1 Sam. i. 1, &c. 1 Chron. vi. 23. His father, Elkanah, dwelt at Ramathaim-Zophim, or the city of Ramath, inhabited by Levites of the family of Zophai, or Zuph.

a descendant of Kohath, and Samuel himself dwelt there the greater part of his time.

The circumstances connected with the birth and early life of Samuel are of a peculiarly interesting nature. It was at the time when Eli was presiding as high-priest at Shiloh, that Hannah, the wife of Elkanah, having gone to the usual sacrificial feast at Shiloh, availed herself of an opportunity to "pour out her soul" before God, at the tabernacle; requesting the removal of the reproach she daily suffered from Peninnah, her copartner in the embraces, though far her inferior in the affections, of Elkanah, by the bestowal of a son. The fervent, yet silent manner of her appeal induced Eli to mistake her emotions for intoxication, with which he precipitately accused her; but upon the circumstance being explained, he readily retracted, and changed the language of uncharitableness into that of benediction. The acceptance of Hannah's prayer was at length corroborated by the birth of a son, whom her piety and her gratitude concurred to name Samuel, that is, "asked of God." Having been devoted as a Nazarite from his infancy, in compliance with his mother's vow when she asked him of the Lord, he was, while in his infancy, presented to Eli, for the service of the tabernacle, by whom he was invested with the distinguishing ephod, ch. ii.

The extraordinary character of Samuel soon began to be developed, in a commission which he received immediately from heaven, to denounce his displeasure against Eli, for his criminal remissness with regard to his two sons, Hophni and Phinehas, whose libertine baseness was scarcely reprov'd, and not at all restrained, by parental authority. The spirit of the aged priest upon the occasion demands notice, and deserves imitation: "It is the Lord," he exclaimed, "let him do what seemeth him good." The appearance of a prophet like Samuel in this period of suspended revelations, awakening in the bosoms of the almost desponding Israelites the liveliest anticipations, they immediately adopted measures to disentrail themselves from Philistine subjugation; but they were defeated with the loss of four thousand men. As they imputed this disaster to the absence of the ark, it was fetched into the camp amidst great exultations, but a second overthrow involved the loss of thirty thousand foot, (among whom were Hophni and Phinehas,) and above all of the ark, which the enemy captured; intelligence of which latter calamity being suddenly communicated to Eli, he fell backwards, "and his neck brake, and he died." The Philistines had but little cause to triumph in the captivity of the ark. This sacred possession was carried into the temple of Dagon, to whom they ascribed their victory; and the priests, upon entering the national shrine, the next morning, found their god fallen to the ground before the ark. Imputing this circumstance to accident, they again set up the statue. The following day the image was discovered again fallen, and the head and hands broken upon the threshold of his own temple, so as to leave the trunk only remaining. The people themselves were smitten with grievous bodily diseases, which pursued them from city to city, wherever they transported the ark, until they restored it, with commemorative offerings, to the Israelites, (see ΔΑΓΩΝ,) chap. iv.—vi.

The captivity of the ark, and the consequent suspension of the public services at Shiloh, tended to the increasing debasement and degeneration of the people, which only stimulated our eminent prophet and ruler to exert his energies to accomplish a general reformation, by whose means an assembly was at length convened at Mizpeh, for the purpose of publicly renouncing their sins, and returning to God by fasting, humiliation, sacrifice and prayer. This solemnity excited the apprehensions of their enemies, who accordingly determined upon frustrating their plans, by coming suddenly upon them; but as their repentance was sincere, and their consequent reconciliation to offended goodness immediate, the Supreme Being declared himself in their favor after Samuel's sacrifice and intercession: the Philistines were panic-struck by a tremendous thunder-storm, and by their flight and dispersion enabled the pursuing Israelites ultimately to dictate terms of peace; in commemoration of which deliverance, Samuel erected a monumental memorial, which he called Ebenezer, or "the stone of help."

While victory had now rendered the Israelites secure from external attacks, the proper administration of justice, by their illustrious governor, conferred upon them internal prosperity and happiness. Samuel exercised his judicial authority with evident advantage to all classes of the community, and by annual circuits took upon himself the inspection and regulation of civil affairs. He moreover erected a public altar of worship, as the best substitution for the deserted ordinances of Shiloh; and to him have been ascribed those institutions which were called the schools of the prophets, of which we cannot at this distance of time collect any very exact information. They appear to have been originally established in the cities of the Levites, which were diffused through the different tribes, for the sake of facilitating the plan of general instruction. In these seminaries the prophets devoted themselves to the study of the law, were taught the art of psalmody, and awaited the call into public life under the superintendence of one of the same class, venerable for wisdom or years. Age, however, relaxed the vigor of his administration; and Samuel, in consequence of appointing his two sons, Joel and Abiah, to execute his office, soon found, by the complaints of the elders, that he had devolved it into unworthy hands. He was in consequence solicited to appoint a king over them, that they might enjoy a similar form of government to that of other nations. This was no doubt as offensive a request to Samuel, as it was an impious and ungrateful one toward their supreme Lord and Benefactor. He at once, therefore, applied to God, in the exigency, who directed him to comply with their desires, after a solemn protest against their proceedings, chap. vii. viii. '.

The introduction of Saul, the son of Kish, to Samuel, and the several circumstances which attended his election to royalty, furnish remarkable illustrations of the ever active agency of Providence; controlling every seeming casualty, and subordinating to its plans the most trifling coincidences. Saul and his servant were despatched in pursuit of his father's asses, which had strayed from home; and having arrived at Ramah, at the instigation of the latter, Samuel was inquired after, for information respecting them. The prophet had been already prepared for the visit, and instructed how to act by a divine intimation. Treating him, accordingly, with marked distinction and respect, he first held a conference with Saul in the evening, probably to explain the secret designs of Providence, and in the ensuing morning, after sending the servant to a proper distance, proceeded to anoint him the future king of Israel, giving him prophetic information of some other events in which he would be personally interested. This appointment, it must be remarked, was now only a private transaction, but calculated to satisfy him with regard to the divine decision of the lot by which he was subsequently chosen at Mizpeh. To that place, whither the ark was conducted, Samuel convened the people; and when the lot was cast, which successively pointed to the tribe of Benjamin, the family of Matri, and the person of Saul, his majestic appearance so well seconded the recommendatory speech of Samuel, that he at once gained, with few exceptions, the universal attachment. He very soon signalized himself by rendering prompt and effectual succor to the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead, who were besieged by the Ammonites, and on the very point of a surrender; a victory which, by enhancing his fame, gave him a triumph over his secret enemies. A general meeting was accordingly called by Samuel, at Gilgal, where the election of Saul was confirmed, with the accompaniment of public sacrifices and rejoicings. Having now wholly to resign the government into the hands of the person he had himself anointed for the office, Samuel concluded his more public life by an oration, truly characteristic of his integrity of principle and his piety of mind. He challenged the people to produce any instances of peculation or inequity during his administration; recapitulated some of the facts of their past history, which were illustrative of the consequences of disobedience, and intimated the impropriety of their conduct in desiring a king; appealing to a miraculous attestation of the displeasure of God, by calling for a thunder-storm in that season of wheat harvest, when it was so unusual; suggesting, at the same time, the goodness of God in determining not to forsake them if they did not finally renounce his authority, chap. ix.—xii.

In the second year of Saul's reign, hostilities were renewed against the Philistines. The king, having repaired to Gilgal, waited with impatience for Samuel to assist in presenting burnt-offerings, till at length, on the seventh day, the services were ordered to proceed before his arrival; which occasioned a severe rebuke from the prophet, and an assurance that his precipitation would ultimately prove subversive of his dominion. Shortly after this, another instance of Saul's disobedience occurred; he was commanded by God, through Samuel, to destroy utterly the nation of the Amalekites, but under the pretence of offering sacrifice, he spared the most valuable portion of the spoil, together with Agag, their king. This produced a severe remonstrance from Samuel, who turned abruptly away from his excuses; and when Saul seized his garment, which rent in his hands, Samuel took occasion to declare, that the Lord had rent the kingdom of Israel from him, and had bestowed it upon another. The king's urgent solicitations, however, induced at length a compliance with his wish that Samuel would join him in a public act of worship; after which the prophet slew Agag, and departed to Ramah, never more to hold any personal communication with Saul. Still, however, he retained an affection for the king, and long and deeply lamented his misconduct; till he was roused from unavailing grief by a message from heaven, desiring him to go to Bethlehem, and bestow the royal unction upon David, his distinguished successor, to whom we devote a subsequent article, ch. xiii.—xv.

After the lapse of a few years from this period, in which David was encountering the relentless malignity of Saul, we find Samuel still at Ramah, and accompanying David to Naioth, a school of the prophets, as a temporary asylum, where the Scripture narrative of his life closes. He died about four years before Saul, upwards of ninety years of age, A. M. 2944, deeply lamented by the whole nation. His remains were interred at Ramah, the place of his usual residence, ch. xix. 23, 24; xxv. 1.

Samuel was a character unquestionably of the very first class; of irreproachable integrity, undaunted fortitude, unabating zeal, unaffected and unblemished piety; sincere as a friend, gentle as a man, virtuous as a judge, and holy as a prophet. In the Chronicles he is stated to have assisted in distributing the Levites appointed by David for the temple service, and as having enriched the tabernacle by spoils taken from the enemies of Israel. He is said also to have written the history of David, in conjunction with the prophets Nathan and Gad, which, of course, can be understood only of his early transactions. The first twenty chapters of the first book that appears under his name, are with the utmost probability ascribed to him by the Talmudists; and he was the first in the unbroken chain of prophets, that extended to the days of Malachi, and that "foretold," according to the testimony of St. Peter, (Acts iii. 24.) "of" the final establishment and triumphs of Christianity. (Ency. Met. art. SAMUEL.)

About two years after the death of Samuel, the Philistines having invaded the territories of Israel with a powerful army, Saul with his troops took a position on the eminences of Gilboa; but being overcome by consternation at the multitude of his enemies, he resolved to consult some witch or sorceress, to foreknow the event of the war. His servants were therefore sent in quest of a woman possessed of a familiar spirit, the Lord having refused to answer him by dreams, or by urim, or by prophets. Having discovered an enchantress at En-dor, about two or three leagues from Gilboa, Saul disguised himself, and visited her, with a small attendance, and desired her to raise the ghost of Samuel. She had recourse to her charms, and when the ghost appeared, she screamed violently, and said, "Why have you deceived me, for you are Saul?" Saul, however, encouraged her to declare what she saw. "I see (said she) gods [elohim, in the sense of magistrate, chief, or prince, &c.] coming out of the earth;" adding, that he had the appearance of "an old man covered with a mantle." By this description Saul recognized Samuel, and bowed himself to the earth. Samuel inquired why he had been disturbed. To which Saul answered, that, being in great difficulties, and not knowing whom to address, because God gave him no answer, he had resorted to the present undertaking. Samuel confirmed all his fears, declaring that the kingdom should be taken from him, and given to David, his son-in-law; that Israel should be delivered into the hands of their enemies the Philistines; and that Saul and his sons should die on the morrow, 1 Sam. xxviii.

On this narrative there has been much controversy, first, as to whether the ghost of Samuel did really appear to Saul, and next, if the appearance were real, whether it was effected by the power of the devil, or the art of magic? Our limits, however, will not permit of even a mere outline of the arguments on either side. Calmet says the most probable opinion is, that Samuel really appeared to Saul; not by the magical charms of the sorceress, or by the power of the devil, but by the almighty power of God, who, to punish Saul, might permit Samuel to appear, and discover to him his last and greatest calamity. Mr. Taylor takes a different view of the subject, and in the article WITCH, has labored to prove that the supposed appearance was a mere juggling trick upon the part of the woman. The text, however, gives no countenance to this notion; but, on the contrary, it is said, in verse 14, that "Saul perceived that it was SAMUEL himself."

To Samuel are ascribed the Book of Judges, that of Ruth, and the First Book of Samuel. There is, indeed, great probability that he was the author of the first twenty-four chapters of the first of Samuel, since they contain nothing but what he might have written, and in which he was not a principal agent. However, in these chapters, there is some trifling additions, probably inserted after his death. We read, (1 Chron. ix. 22.) that he assisted in regulating the distribution of the Levites made by David for the service of the temple, which Calmet suggests may be explained by saying, that David pursued the order settled by Samuel, during his administration, after the death of the high-priest Eli; or, as Mr. Taylor thinks, he may have left in MS. some plan for such a purpose. We read also, (1 Chron. xxvi. 28.) that Samuel enriched the tabernacle of the Lord, by magnificent presents, and by valuable spoils, taken from the enemies of Israel. Also, (1 Chron. xxix. 29.) that he wrote the history of David, in conjunction with the prophets Nathan and Gad. Probably he might write the beginning of his history, which the other prophets continued and concluded; for Samuel was dead before David came to the throne. The first two Books of Kings bear the name of Books of Samuel; but, it must be evident that he could not be the author of the second of these Books, which contains transactions after his death. Neither could he write the latter end of the first, since his death is mentioned in chap. xxv. It is said (chap. x. 25.) of the First Book of Samuel, that this prophet wrote in a book, "the manner of the kingdom," describing the rights, prerogatives, and revenues of the king, and the extent of his power and authority; a repetition of what he had proposed, vis à voce, a little before to the people. See further under KINGS, Books of.

Samuel began the chain of the prophets which was never broken from his time to that of Zechariah and Malachi, Acts iii. 24.

SANBALLAT, chief, or governor, of the Cuthites, or Samaritans, and a great enemy to the Jews. When Nehemiah came from Shushan to Jerusalem, (Neh. ii. 10, 19. ante A. D. 454.) and began to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, Sanballat, Tobiah and Geshem taunted him, and sent to inquire on what authority he undertook this enterprise; and whether it were not a revolt against the king. Nehemiah, however, proceeded with vigor in his undertaking, and completed the walls of the city.

Finding that they could not succeed against the Jews by the course they had pursued, Sanballat, Tobiah and Geshem sent to Nehemiah, to desire him to meet them in the field, that they might make an alliance, and swear inviolable friendship. But Nehemiah perceived this was only a stratagem, as he did also a subsequent attempt to ensnare him, and escaped in both cases.

Nehemiah being obliged to return to king Artaxerxes at Shushan, (Neh. xiii. 6, 28. A. M. 3563, ante A. D. 441,) in his absence, the high-priest Eliashib married his grandson Manasseh, son of Joiada, to a daughter of Sanballat, and allowed Tobiah, a kinsman of Sanballat, an apartment in the temple. Nehemiah, at his return to Jerusalem, (the exact year of which is not known,) drove Tobiah out of the temple, and would not suffer Manasseh, the high-priest's grandson, to continue in the city, nor to perform the functions of the priesthood. Manasseh, being thus expelled, retired to his father-in-law, Sanballat, who provided him the means of exercising his priestly office on mount Gerizim, on the following occasion. See GERIZIM.

When Alexander the Great came into Phœnicia, and invested Tyre, Sanballat abandoned the interests of Darius, and went, at the head of 8000 men, to offer his service to Alexander, who readily received him, and gave him leave to erect a temple on mount Gerizim, where he constituted his son-in-law Manasseh the high-priest. Sanballat must have been at this time very old, for 120 years before (A. M. 3550) he was governor of the Samaritans. Indeed, some have been of opinion that the Sanballat who lived in the time of Alexander was different from he who so eagerly opposed Nehemiah; but Calmet sees no necessity for admitting this. However, Josephus makes Sanballat a Cuthite originally, and does not mention him who withstood Nehemiah. The wife of Manasseh he calls by the name of Nicaso, and says that Sanballat died nine months after he had submitted to Alexander.

Dr. Prideaux, however, rejects the solution of this difficulty, by two Sanballats, and endeavors to reconcile the history to truth and probability, by showing a mistake in Josephus. This author makes Sanballat to flourish in the time of Darius Codomannus, and to build his temple upon mount Gerizim by license from Alexander the Great; whereas it was performed by leave from Darius Nothus, in the fifteenth year of his reign. This removes the difficulty arising from the great age of Sanballat, and allows him to be contemporary with Nehemiah, as the Scripture history requires.

SANCTIFY often signifies to prepare. Thus Joshua says to the people, (chap. iii. 5.) "Sanctify yourselves, for to-morrow the Lord will do wonders among you." Prepare yourselves to pass over Jordan. In Isa. xiii. 3, the Lord calls the Medes his sanctified. I have appointed, and, as it were, consecrated them to be the executors of my vengeance against Babylon. (See also Numb. xi. 18; Josh. vii. 13; Jer. vi. 4; xii. 3; li. 27, 28; Joel i. 14; Mic. iii. 5; Zeph. i. 7.) Comp. HOLY.

We desire of God, that his name may be sanctified, or hallowed; that is, honored, praised and glorified throughout the world; especially by those who have the happiness of knowing him. Let them sanctify it by their good lives, their fidelity, their submission to his orders; and they who know him not, that they may obtain the knowledge of him, may hear his word, may become obedient to his instructions, &c. We may apprehend yet better what is meant by sanctifying the name of God, by the opposite to it; that is, profaning the name of God, by vain swearing, blaspheming, ascribing his name to idols; by furnishing wicked men and infidels with occasion of blaspheming it by our bad lives, and scandalous conversation, &c.

It is said, "I will be sanctified in them that come nigh me;" (Lev. x. 3.) in his priests, when, by the terrible and exemplary punishment of Nadab and Abihu, the Lord showed what purity he required in his servants, and what punctual exactness he expected in his service. The Lord complains, in another place, that Moses and Aaron did not sanctify him before Israel: "Because ye believed me not, to sanctify me in the eyes of the children of Israel, therefore ye shall not bring this congregation into the land which I have given them," Num. xx. 12. And how did they not sanctify him? By showing some distrust in his words: "Because ye believed me not." God sanctified the seventh day, that is, consecrated it to his service, Gen. ii. 3. He sanctified all the first-born; (Exod. xiii. 3.) he commands that they should be offered to him; as it were, consecrated to his service. Moses sanctifies the Israelites, and by bathing, by abstinence from the use of the marriage bed, by the purity of their clothes, he prepares them for appearing before the Lord, for entering into a covenant with him, Exod. xix. 10; xiv. 12.

Those who approach to holy things are sanctified; for example, it is allowed to the priest only to offer sacrifices at the altar, Exod. xxix. 37; xxx. 29; Lev. vi. 18, 27. Compare Lev. xxii. 15, 16, where God expressly forbids that the people should eat of the sanctified things.

We have in Haggai (ii. 12.) a remarkable instance of the contrariety between the communication of holiness or sanctification, and that of pollution. The prophet is directed to ask the priests concerning the law—"If one bear holy flesh in the skirt of his garment, and with his skirt do touch bread, or pottage, or wine, or oil, or any meat, shall it be holy?" And the priests answered, "No." "But," said Haggai, "if any one who is unclean by a dead body, touch any of these, shall it be unclean?" They said, "It shall be unclean." So that the principle of pollution was much more readily communicated than that of sanctification;—for instance, to persons and to things which were in the same apartment, or house with a dead body, though they had not touched it: but holy flesh did not communicate sanctification, beyond that which it touched: it might sanctify the skirt of the garment that carried it, but it communicated no virtue to any thing beyond it.

SANCTUARY. By this name that part of the temple of Jerusalem was called, which was the most secret and most retired; in which was the ark of the covenant; and where none but the high-priest might enter, and he only once a year, on the day of solemn expiation. The same name was also given to the most sacred part of the tabernacle set up in the wilderness, which remained till some time after the building of the temple. See TABERNACLE, and TEMPLE.

Sometimes the word sanctuary is used generally for the temple, or the holy place, the structure appointed for the public worship of the Lord. It should seem also, that Moses uses it instead of the Holy Land. Exod. xv. 17, "Thou shalt bring them in, and plant them in the mountain of thy inheritance, in the place, O Lord, which thou hast made for thee to dwell in; in the sanctuary, O Lord, which thy hands have established." And in Lev. xx. 3, of those who offer their children to Moloch, he says, they "defile my sanctuary, and profane my holy name." He forbids the high-priest to go out of the temple, to mourn for his relations, Lev. xxi. 12: "Neither shall he go out of the sanctuary, nor profane the sanctuary of his God." The temple is here denoted by its principal part. It is believed that sanctuary is put for heaven, in Deut. xxvi. 15: "Look from the dwelling of thy sanctuary," from the high heaven.

SAND. A similitude taken from the aggregate sand of the sea, is often used, to express a very great multitude, or a very great weight; or from a single sand, something very mean and trifling. God promises Abraham and Jacob to multiply their posterity as the stars of heaven, and as the sand of the sea, Gen.

xxii. 17; xxxii. 12. Job (vi. 3.) compares the weight of his misfortunes to that of the sand of the sea. Solomon says, (Prov. xxvii. 3.) that though sand and gravel are very heavy things, yet the anger of a fool is much heavier. And Ecclesiasticus says that a fool is more insupportable than the weight of sand, lead or iron, Eccles. xxii. 15.

The prophets magnify the omnipotence of God, who has fixed the sand of the shore for the boundaries of the sea, and has said to it, "Hitherto shalt thou come; but here thou shalt break thy foaming waves, and shalt pass no farther," Jer. v. 22.

Our Saviour tells us, (Matt. vii. 26.) that a fool lays the foundation of his house on the sand; whereas a wise man founds his house on a rock. Ecclesiasticus says, (xviii. 8.) that the years of the longest life of man are but as a drop of water, or as a grain of sand. And Wisdom says, (vii. 9.) that all the gold in the world, compared to wisdom, is but as the smallest grain of sand. See RAIN, and PILLARS.

SANDALS, [Heb. סָבָעִים; Gr. ὑποδήματα, σαρδάνια. The sandals or shoes of the orientals were in ancient times, and are still at the present day, merely soles of hide, leather, or wood, fastened to the bottom of the foot by two straps, one of which passes around the great toe, on the fore part of the foot, and the other around the ankle. Niebuhr says, (Descr. of Arabia, p. 63, Germ. ed.) "The shoes of the Arabs, of the middling and lower classes, consist only of a sole, with one or two straps over the foot, and one around the ankle. These straps are by no means so long as those which painters are accustomed to assign to the oriental costume. The Arabs sometimes wear in their houses wooden sandals or slippers with high heels, which are common throughout the East. These are worn also by ladies of rank in Egypt and Turkey." These were probably also not unknown among the Hebrews. It is easy to see now, why the Hebrew prophets could speak so contemptuously of the value of a pair of shoes, i. e. sandals, Amos ii. 6; viii. 6.

The sandals of females were often ornamented; and it is not impossible that these may have resembled the slippers or shoes of modern orientals, which cover also the upper part of the foot, and are usually made of morocco leather, Judith x. 6; xvi. 9; Ezek. xvi. 10. (Compare the article BADGERS' SKINS.)

It is not customary in the East to wear shoes or sandals in the houses; hence they are always taken off on entering a house, and especially temples and all consecrated places. Hence the phrase to loose one's shoes or sandals from off one's feet, Ex. iii. 5; Deut. xxv. 9, etc. To loose and bind on the sandals was the business of the lowest servants; and a slave, newly bought, commenced his service by loosing the sandals of his new master, and carrying them a certain distance. (Talmud Kiddush, 22. 2.) Disciples, however, performed this office for their master, and accounted it an honor; but the rabbins advise, not to do it before strangers, lest they should be mistaken for servants. Hence the expressions of John the Baptist, that he was "not worthy to loose or to bear the sandals of Jesus," Matt. iii. 11; Mark i. 7. As stockings are not worn in the East, the feet in sandals become dusty and soiled; accordingly, on entering a house and putting off the sandals, it was customary to wash the feet. This was also the business of the lowest servants. On visits, slaves presented the water; but to guests of distinction, the master of the house performed this office, Gen. xviii. 4, 5; Luke vii. 44. (Comp. John xiii. 4.) The poor, of course, often went barefoot; but this was not customary among the rich, except as a sign of mourning. See further under FOOT, the section WASHING OF THE FEET.

In contracts, the seller drew off his sandals and gave them to the buyer, in confirmation of the bargain, Ruth iv. 7. The loosing of the sandals was also a ceremony when a man refused to marry the widow of his deceased brother, Deut. xxv. 9. *R.

Writers say, that when Hercules became slave to Omphale, she used to give him correction with her sandal, which was the most degrading and effeminate kind of correction. So Lucian makes Venus say of Cupid, "Already I have given him some correction; and taking him on my knee, have chastised him with my sandal." But Mr. Morier, in his Second Journey to Persia, (p. 8.) mentions a servant of the ambassador who was "abundantly beaten on the back with a stick, and on the mouth with a shoe heel," which he further explains, p. 95. The king of Persia examined some of his officers, who not answering as he desired, he exclaimed, "Call the Ferashes, and beat these rogues till they die. The Ferashes came and beat them violently; and when they attempted to say any thing in their own defence, they smote them on the mouth with a shoe, the heel of which was shod with iron." He adds in a note, "This use of the shoe is quite characteristic of the eastern manners described in Scripture. The shoe was always considered as vile, and never was allowed to enter sacred or respected places; and to be smitten with it, is to be subjected to the last ignominy. Paul was smitten on the mouth by the orders of Ananias:" (Acts xxiii. 2.)—whether this were with a shoe, may deserve consideration; such ignominy, if that were the case, might well excite Paul's anger, and excuse his threat.

SANHEDRIM, or BETH-DIN, house of judgment, was a council of seventy-one or seventy-two senators, among the Jews, who determined the most important affairs of the nation. The room in which they met, according to the rabbins, was a rotunda, half of which was built without the temple, and half within; the latter part being that in which the judges sat. The Nasi or president, who was generally the high-priest, sat on a throne at the end of the hall, his deputy, or vice-president, called Ab-beth-din, at his right-hand, and the sub-deputy, or Hakam, at his left; the other senators being ranged in order on each side. Most of the members of this council were priests or Levites, though men in private stations of life were not excluded.

The authority of the Sanhedrim was very extensive. It decided causes brought before it by appeal from inferior courts; and even the king, the high-priest, the prophets, were under its jurisdiction. The general affairs of the nation were also brought before this assembly. The right of judging in capital cases belonged to it; and this sentence could not be pronounced in any other place, but in the hall called Lishcath-haggazith; from whence it came to pass, that the Jews were forced to quit this hall, when the power of life and death was taken out of their hands, forty years before the destruction of their temple, and three years before the death of Jesus Christ.

The rabbins insist that the Sanhedrim subsisted in their nation, constantly, from the time of Moses, (Numb. xi. 16.) to the destruction of the temple by the Romans. But this is strongly contested. Petau fixes its origin at the time when Gabinius, governor of Judea, erected tribunals in the five principal cities, of Jerusalem, Gadara, Amathus, Jericho, and Sephora, or Senhoris. (Joseph. Antiq. lib. xix. cap. 10; de Bello, lib. i. cap. 6.) Basnage fixes its origin to the time of Judas Maccabæus, or that of his brother Jonathan. This question, however, cannot be determined. We have no proof of its very early existence.

Our Saviour (Matt. v. 22.) distinguishes two tribunals: "Whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause, shall be in danger of the judgment;" that is, the tribunal of the twenty-three judges. "And whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council;" that is, of the great Sanhedrim, which had the right of life and death, at least generally, and before this right was taken away by the Romans. Some think that the jurisdiction of the council of twenty-three extended to life and death also; but it is certain that the Sanhedrim was superior to that council. (See also Mark xiii. 9; xiv. 55; xv. 1; Luke xxii. 52, 66; John xi. 47; Acts iv. 15, 21, where mention is made of the Synedrion.)

[The Talmudists do, indeed, speak of a tribunal or Sanhedrim of twenty-three judges; but no such tribunal is mentioned by Josephus. He, however, speaks of a tribunal of seven judges, which existed in each town, and took cognizance of smaller offences, which is called ἑξήκοντα, judgment or court of justice in Matt. v. 21, 22; and which also seems intended by ουδὲν ἄλλο, council, in Matt. x. 17; Mark xiii. 9. (See Joseph. Antiq. iv. 8, 14; Jahn's Bib. Archæol. § 245.) R.

SAPPHIRA, a Christian woman, and wife of Ananias. They having conjointly sold a field, which was their property, brought a part of the price, and hid it at the feet of the apostles, as if it had been the whole, reserving the rest. For this prevarication they were both struck with sudden death, Acts v. See ANANIAS.

SAPPHIRE, a precious stone often mentioned in Scripture, Exod. xxviii. 18; xxxix. 11. Job says (xxviii. 6.) there are places whose stones are sapphires; that is, sapphires are very common there. Pliny says that the best come out of Media; perhaps out of the country of the Sapires, or from the mount of Sephar mentioned by Moses, Gen. x. 30; Ezek. i. 26; x. 1. The oriental sapphire is of a sky blue color, or a fine azure; hence, the prophets describe the throne of God, as the color of a sapphire; that is, of a celestial blue or azure, Exod. xxiv. 10. It is next in hardness and value to the diamond.

I. SARAH, or SARAI, wife of Abraham, and daughter of Terah his father, but by another mother; since Abraham asserts, (Gen. xii. 13; xx. 12.) that she was really his sister, the daughter of his father, but not the daughter of his mother. Terah might have had several wives at once, according to the custom of the country; or he might have married again, after the death of Abraham's mother, by which latter wife he might have had Sarai. This opinion Calmet prefers to that which makes Sarah the same as Iscah, daughter of Haran, niece of Abraham, and granddaughter of Terah, (Gen. xi. 29.) which is the opinion of Josephus, and many commentators.

Sarai was born A. M. 2018, and married Abraham before he left Ur; upon quitting which he agreed with Sarah, that she should call herself his sister, being afraid she should be taken away from him, and that he might be put to death on her account, if she were known to be his wife.

The principal incidents in Sarah's life having been detailed in the article ABRAHAM, it is unnecessary to repeat them here.

When God made a covenant with Abraham, and instituted circumcision, he changed the name of Sarai, or My Princess, into that of Sarah, or Princess; and promised Abraham a son by her, which was fulfilled in due time. Sarah lived to the age of 127 years. She died in the valley of Hebron, and Abraham came to Beer-sheba to mourn for her, after which he bought a field of Ephron the Hittite, wherein was a cave hewn in the rock, which the Hebrew calls Machpelah, where Sarah was buried.

II. SARAH, daughter of Raguel and Anna, of the tribe of Naphtali, and wife of Tobit, Tob. iii.

SARDIS, now called Sart, a city of Asia Minor, formerly the capital of Cræsus, king of the Lydians, is situated at the foot of the famous mount Tmolus, on the north, having a spacious and delightful plain before it, watered with several streams that flow from the neighboring hill to the south-east, and with the Pactolus, rising from the same, on the east, and increasing with its waters the stream of Hermus, into which it runs. It is now a pitiful village; but, for the accommodation of travellers, it being the road for the caravans that come out of Persia to Smyrna with silk, there is a large khan built in it, as is usual in most of these towns. The inhabitants are for the most part shepherds, who look to those numerous flocks and herds which feed in the plains.

To the southward of the town are very considerable ruins still remaining, which reminds us of what Sardis was, before earthquake and the sword had caused those desolations which have visited it.

The Turks have a mosque here, which was formerly a Christian church; at the entrance of which are several curious pillars of polished marble. Some few Christians live among them, working in gardens, or otherwise employed in such like drudgery. The church in Sardis was reproached by our Saviour for its declension in vital religion. It had a name to live, but was really dead, Rev. iii.

Mr. Taylor has collected several medals of Sardis, which show that this city was the seat of various games, and other exercises of a popular nature.

SARDIUS, or RUBY, the Hebrew סַרְדִּיּוֹן, Odem, redness. The Sardius is reddish, approaching to white, as a man's nail, Exod. xxviii. 17; xxxix. 10; Ezek. xxviii. 13; Rev. xxi. 20. It is more commonly known by the name of carnelian.

SARDONYX; as if a sardius united to an onyx; a species of gem exhibiting the reddish color of the carnelian (sardian) and the white of the chalcidony, intermingled, either in shades, or in alternate stripes, Rev. xxi. 20. (See Rees' Cyclop. art. GEMS.) R.

SARGON, a king of Assyria, successor of Shalmaneser, Isa. xx. 1. See ASSYRIA, p. 114, col. 1.

SARID, a boundary city of Zebulun, Josh. xix. 10, 12.

SATAN. This Hebrew word is used in the general sense of an adversary, an enemy, an accuser. (See 1 Sam. xxix. 4; 1 Kings xi. 14, 23, 24; v. 4.) At other times Satan is put for the devil, Job i. 6, 7, 11; Ps. cix. 6; Zech. iii.

Mr. Taylor has some remarks as to the probability of loyal angels being, occasionally, agents of punishment; and also makes a distinction between loyal and rebellious angels—hinting that loyal angels may punish for crimes committed, though they may not tempt to their commission. (Compare ANGEL.) This suggests the idea that punishment, in itself, may be perfectly free from malice toward the party suffering under it; and may even consist with much sorrow on account of the necessity for its infliction, and much sympathy with the sufferer. Whereas, to propose temptations, to provoke and stimulate to the commission of evil, by delusive representations of its pleasures or its profits;—or by taking advantage of natural passions, propensities, &c. or of accidental circumstances, of time, place, situation, character, opportunity, &c. is utterly abhorrent from the character, station, duty, nature and disposition of a holy and loyal angel. Mr. Taylor applies these ideas also in reference to Satan, and thence endeavors to ascertain the precise import of several passages of Scripture, where the agent of punishment, simply taken, seems to be the person referred to, by the term Satan. The following are some of his remarks:—

The Prologue to the Book of Job certainly supposes that the angel of punishment by office, appeared in the court of heaven; and if Satan be simply considered as the minister of punishment, under divine direction, and sometimes (as in the case of Job) the minister of probation only, rather than of punishment (though even Job deserved some punishment, as he acknowledges)—there is no reason why he should be ashamed of his office, any more than judges are, who, though frequently ministers of punishment, are not, therefore, excluded from the royal presence; but, on the contrary, their office is considered as dignified and honorable: i. e. punishment without malvolence does not pollute the inflicter. Consider also the destruction of Sodom, Gen. xix.—of Egypt, Exod. xii.—of Sennacherib, 2 Kings xix. 35, also, Josh. v. 13; Job xxxiii. 22; Ps. vii. 13.

The following passages are from the New Testament. Will this distinction explain 1 Cor. v. 5, q. d. "As the design of punishment is reformation of the sufferer, I command you—not, yourselves, to molest the party, but—to deliver such a transgressor unto Satan, the proper angel of punishment; that he, by his castigations and afflictions, may bring the criminal to a sense of his duty; even should those afflictions terminate in the destruction (of his person; perhaps, rather, of his fleshly powers, or appetite) of the flesh, in order that the more important part of the man, the spirit, may be saved in the day of the appearance of our Lord Jesus." This passage seems to include an allusion to the same principles as those above suggested, because, (1.) The criminal is he who had committed fornication; and such fornication as the Gentiles abominated; (2.) the sense of ὀλεθρον, rendered destruction, is loss, injury, eritium strages; whatever is pernicious; and ultimately deadly; death:—so that it seems closely to correspond to the consumption, and wasting debility of person, of the former article, (though indeed there, we conceive, the allusion is both to person and property,) as it arises from the same cause, and (without repentance) would have the same fatal issue. (3.) That σαρξ, flesh, has the meaning here intended needs no proof; and this affords a glimpse of the punishment inflicted on the Corinthian; he suffered defeat, impotence, in that very article by which he had transgressed.—Is this the import of 1 Tim. i. 20? Hymeneus and Alexander, I have delivered, put into the hands of Satan, the angel of punishment, that they may learn the lesson (as we teach children at school, by the terror of the rod, τῆς αἰδέσεως) not to blaspheme.—Is this what the apostle had in view in his own case? 2 Cor. xii. 7, Lest I should be exalted above measure, there was given, favorably, kindly, to me a thorn in the flesh, a bodily infirmity, an agent of Satan, (ὄργανος Σατάν,) of punishment, or rather of probation, and exercise of patience, faith, &c. to produce humility. Upon this infirmity, i. e. for its removal, or at least its modera- tion, that it might not appear to be, nor be prolonged as a punishment, nor operate as an impediment to the usefulness of my ministry, I besought the Lord repeatedly. If so, this case is analogous to the probation of Job, under the agency of Satan. Hence we see, as the pious Mr. Henry might say, that afflictions, i. e. sufferings, are not always infiictions, i. e. punishments.

Having concluded, from these instances, that we risk nothing in supposing that loyal angels may sometimes be employed in offices of punishment—punishment included in the kind purpose of reformation—Mr. Taylor proceeds to inquire whether some things are not said of a Satan of a different kind; or, at least, whether Scripture does not allude to circumstances utterly irreconcilable with the character of holy and happy spirits, under any official capacity or employment whatever.

Matt. iv. 1, 3, &c. "Jesus was tempted of the devil," i. e. to sin; to despair, to pride, &c. Matt. v. 37, "Let your discourse be simple and direct: for oaths and swearing, &c. come from the evil one." So the words may signify as they stand; but some copies read explicitly, from the devil. Matt. xii. 26, "If Satan cast out Satan;" this cannot signify two messengers of punishment sent from the same beneficent Deity; as it implies a contradiction, an opposition, in the purposes of these Satans. Matt. xiii. 39, "The enemy that sowed the tares, which shall be burned, is the devil." Mark iv. 15, "Satan cometh and taketh away the word sown in their hearts," &c. John viii. 44, "The devil was a murderer from the beginning; he is a liar, and the father of it," verse 41. "Ye do the deeds of your father; who prompts you to murder me," verse 40. Acts v. 3, "Why has Satan filled thine heart,—to lie to the Holy Ghost?" Rom. xvi. 20, "The God of peace shall shortly bruise Satan under your feet."—Not the holy angel of punishment, but an adversary of the soul, &c. 1 Cor. vi. 3, "We—human persons—shall judge—condemn—angels:"—surely not holy angels;—but, "though we are but men, yet our piety shall condemn the impiety of our superiors by nature." 2 Cor. xi. 14, "False apostles transforming themselves into apostles of Christ, and no marvel; for Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light"—consequently he is no holy angel; for a holy angel can neither need, nor suffer, such transformation; which is, evidently, spoken of as contrary to nature. 2 Thes. ii. 9, "The working of Satan with all lying wonders, and deceivableness of unrighteousness." Jam. iv. 7, "Resist the devil, and he will flee from you." 2 Pet. ii. 4, "God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell; and delivered them into chains of darkness, until the judgment." Jude 6, "The angels which kept not their first estate, he hath reserved in everlasting chains, under darkness, unto the judgment of the great day." The passage, Rev. xx. 2. (τοὺς δαίμονα τὰ τὸν ὄφιν τὸν ἄσχατον, ὅς ἐστι διάβολος καὶ Σατανᾶς ὁ πλανῶν) as Mr. Taylor somewhat quaintly remarks, might almost pass for a modern indictment, in which special care is taken to identify the culprit, by a sufficient number of aliases. An angel from heaven having the key of the prison of the abyss, and a great chain, to secure his prisoner, "apprehended the dragon, alias, the serpent, the old one; alias, the devil; alias the Satan; alias the seducer of the world"—who was sentenced to a thousand years' imprisonment. Can this passage possibly be descriptive of a loyal and honest character? Throughout the book the same idea may be observed.

Now it is demonstrable that no holy angel would tempt the Son of God, nor promote lies, murders, deceivableness, unrighteousness, cursing and swearing, hypocrisy, &c. all which are attributed to a Satan, i. e. the devil. Perhaps, after we have well considered this double usage of the word Satan, we shall more readily attend to its probable history. Much has been said respecting the word Satan; and that the ideas connected with it are subsequent to the Babylonish captivity; in proof of the contrary, the late bishop of Llandaff has referred to Ps. cix. 6, "Let Satan stand at his right hand;" as well as to the "Satans the sons of Zeruiah," 2 Sam. xix. 22. Mr. Taylor adds, that it appears, by the story of Balaam, above quoted, that the word was used long before; and that it answers perfectly well to the sense of adversary. Nor is it clear on what principles, in the case of Baalam, it can be rendered accuser, unless it might be understood thus—"the angel of the Lord stood in the way, to remonstrate against his proceeding;" i. e. to accuse him of his criminal intention; for so we find he does; and, indeed, he rather remonstrates and accuses, than punishes. . . . It may be queried, therefore, (1.) Whether in early ages, e. g. under the Hebrew republic, the word Satan signified much, if any thing, more, than simply an adversary, an accuser, a remonstrant; one who "takes to task," as our familiar expression is; but, (2.) After the institution of monarchy, such an agent of punishment being a constant attendant on a court, the capigi, bacha, mezuwar, or chief executioner; (see 1 Sam. xxii. 17; 2 Kings xxv. 8; Jer. xxxix. 11, 12; lii. 12; Dan. ii. 14.) often also the accuser, was an idea which became involved in the word Satan: then, (3.) Because this accuser received a profit from the spoils of criminals condemned, the sense of rejoicing in the condemnation of those accused became gradually connected with the word: and, (4.) It being notorious that such an one who had exercised this office of punisher, had beheld with pleasure the commission of crimes, and had laid temptations in the way of culprits, whom he hoped afterwards to punish, and to turn their spoils to his profit; all these ideas at length united in the word Satan; an adversary, who accuses, and who takes such delight in accusation, that he tempts unwary souls to transgress, for the sake of enjoying the gratification attending their punishment.

If this history of the word be admissible, we may perceive much stronger ideas attached to it in later ages than anciently; or, perhaps, a milder and a stronger sense, according to circumstances; and this statement not only refutes those who affirm that it was altogether a Babylonish term, and of Babylonish import; but it shows, (1.) How an adversary, a Satan, might "rise up against Israel, and prompt David to number the people;" how David might be "a Satan to the Philistines;" (1 Sam. xxix. 4.) how "Hadad and Rezon might be Satans against Solomon;" (1 Kings xi. 23.) and in this simple original sense of the word, how Peter might be "a Satan" to Christ (Matt. xvi. 23.)—he might take him to task, remonstrate, &c. unseasonably. (2.) It shows how a loyal angel might perform the office of a minister of punishment; and be honored while so doing, and this supposition cannot be relinquished:—and, (3.) Since these are human ideas transferred to celestial and spiritual existences, and since we have found so great depravity among mankind as rejoicing in the sufferings of others, what forbids our transferring this idea also to a spiritual being? We should remember, that even in treating celestial subjects, we must conform to human ideas, as we must adopt human language; notwithstanding we are aware that whatever is human is absolutely incompetent to the subject under discussion. This sense of an accuser, seeking for materials and occasions of accusation, illustrates 2 Cor. ii. 11, "To whom ye forgive, I forgive; lest Satan should circumvent us;" should explore, and discover, a somewhat which he may form into an accusation, (should libel us, as the Scotch law-term is,) and should find it in our want of harmony, and concord: "for we are not ignorant of his devices," his meditations and plots, which are always directed to the discovery of imperfections and faults among brethren, and to deriving advantage from them in the way of accusation. The apostle seems to reason on the same principle: (1 Cor. vii. 5.) "If married persons separate by consent for a time, yet let it not be for too long; lest before the expiration of that time, Satan should, in some unguarded moment, take advantage of natural passions, and tempt by soliciting to incontinency—either, (1.) of the parties with each other; who thereby might break the vow or engagement, by which they were separated, and so their consciences be wounded, as for a crime; or, (2.) either of the parties with another person." But, perhaps, this passage should be read thus: "Defraud not one the other, (except with consent, &c.) lest Satan tempt you, and the issue of his temptation be incontinency; to the commission of which, over-prolonged or enforced continency might furnish him an advantage; though designed to the very contrary by the parties."

Satan is also said "to go about seeking whom he may spoil, as a lion prowls around a habitation or a fold, seeking whom he may devour." These ideas, with some others, the reader may perhaps discover in the following quotation, which seems to be strongly descriptive of some parts, at least, of the character of Satan: "The Bostandgi Bachi, who, of all the exterior officers of the seraglio, is most frequently in the presence of his master, and whose duty it is to give him an account of all irregularities and disorders; and who frequently goes his rounds to discover them, in one of his maritime excursions happened to come as far as Buyukdera. (Compare the Prologue to the Book of Job.) The moon began to appear, and a dead calm invited us to go upon the water; when the confused cries at a distance, of persons beaten, and others beating them, proclaimed the arrival of the Bostandgi Bachi. Mice are not more in haste to run away at the approach of a cat, than all the women now were to hide themselves. The dragoman's lady, and Madame du Tott, who had nothing to fear, alone dared to abide the coming of this great officer, who quickly made his appearance in a barge manned with four-and-twenty rowers. He had been to chastise the irregularities of some drunken persons, and lay hold of some women, a little too gay, who had fallen under his notice. . . . A fisherman, being interrogated which way the Bostandgi Bachi had taken, spread a still greater alarm, by informing us, that after having landed, without noise, at the kiosk of a Grecian lady, and listened for some minutes to the conversation which passed in it, that officer, accompanied by several of his attendants, had sealed the windows. . . . Further intelligence relieved the company from the anxiety of impatient curiosity—'Lay aside your fears,' said the bringer of it, to one of the strangers of our party; 'your cousin and her friend have been let off for all the diamonds, trinkets and money they had about them; there was no room for hesitation; the Bostandgi Bachi surprised them; ordered them to be taken on board his barge, and conveyed to prison; his avarice at length rendered him tractable, but he has left them much less pleased with their evening's entertainment than they expected to have been.' As we passed by the houses on the shore, we amused ourselves by making remarks on their possessors, who, from their kiosks, made the like remarks on us; and I collected, as we went along, a great deal of information, which had it been known to the Bostandgi Bachi, he would have derived from it a considerable advantage." (Du Tott, part i. 43, 101.)

If we knew precisely how closely the assemblies of the first Christians were watched by the heathen, probably we might better understand the term angels in 1 Cor. xi. 10. Pliny's letter to Trajan, (A. D. 106,) seems to hint at spies of more than one description; he mentions libellus sine auctore, an information without a name annexed: alii ab indice nominati, Christians were not accused by name by a regular informer, and Trajan's answer apparently alludes to secret agents sent out. Conquirendi non sunt, they are not to be sought for. Were not these spies, whose object was cruel profit, derived from detected improprieties, Satans? The vile reports afterwards raised of Christian worship possibly originated in neglect of the apostle's caution.

THE SYNAGOGUE OF SATAN (Rev. ii. 9, 13.) probably denotes the unbelieving Jews, the false zealots for the law of Moses, who at the beginning were the most eager persecutors of the Christians. They were very numerous at Smyrna, where Polycarp was bishop, to whom John writes.

THE DEPTHS OF SATAN (Rev. ii. 24.) were the mysteries of the Nicolaitans, and of the Simonians, who concealed their errors under deep abstruseness; they spoke of certain intelligences which created the world, but were in opposition to the Creator. They taught a profound knowledge of the nature of angels, and their different degrees. They had secret books written in an abstruse and mysterious manner; and these it is thought John calls "depths of Satan."

SATYRS, wild men, or imaginary animals, half man and half goat, poetically introduced by Isaiah, (xiii. 21; xxxiv. 14.) as dancing among the ruins of Babylon. It is remarkable, that the present inhabitants of that country still believe in the existence there of Satyrs. (See under BABYLON, p. 134, col. 1.) R.

I. SAUL, king of Idumea, (Gen. xxxvi. 37.) was of Rehoboth, and succeeded Samlah of Masrekah.

II. SAUL, son of Kishi, of the tribe of Benjamin, was the first king of the Israelites. His history being so intimately connected with that of SAMUEL and DAVID, has been, in many respects, very fully given under those articles; but there are a few additional particulars which call for notice.

When Saul had strengthened himself in the kingdom, he carried his arms abroad, against the enemies of his nation, among whom were Moab, Ammon, Edom, Philistia, and the kings of Zobah in Syria. In all his expeditions he was victorious; but having at length disobeyed the orders of God, relative to the Amalekites, Samuel declared his rejection, and the appointment of another to the throne of Israel.

In Saul's last battle with the Philistines, his sons Jonathan, Abinadab and Malchishua were slain. He was himself dangerously wounded; and believing his state to be desperate, he desired his armor-bearer to kill him. This being refused, he fell upon his own sword, and died, after a reign of forty years.

His armor was carried by the Philistines to the temple of Ashtaroth; and they hung his body against the walls of Beth-shan, probably opposite to the chief street; because it is said in 2 Sam. xxi. 12, that his body was hung up in the street of this city; and in 1 Chron. x. 10, that his head was fastened in the temple of Dagon. When the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead were informed of these indignities, they went by night and took down the bodies, and brought them into their city beyond Jordan, where they burnt the remains of the flesh, and buried the bones, which were, several years afterwards, removed by David into the sepulchre of Kish, at Gibeah, 2 Sam. xxi. 12—14. Ish-bosheth, the fourth son of Saul, succeeded him in the kingdom, and reigned beyond Jordan, over eleven tribes; David reigning over the tribe of Judah.

The character of Saul is that of a gloomy, apprehensive, melancholy man; and after taking, without success, what remedies were customary, his servants, or physicians, (see Gen. i. 2.) finding his case beyond the reach of their art, thought proper to represent it as a visitation from on high; yet to recommend the use of music, as a recipe whose effects might be favorable. The event justified their expectations; and the amusement, the sympathy, and the enjoyment of Saul, while his attention was engaged, produced an interval of disease, which gradually improved to convalescence. Calmet does not consider Saul as a maniac, but as an hypochondriac, whose low spirits were relieved by the cheerful and animating vibrations of the young shepherd's careless harp: the sprightly effusions

Of linked sweetness long drawn out,
With wanton heed, and giddy cunning,
The melting voice through mazes running,
Untwisting all the chains that tie
The hidden soul of harmony.

How well adapted the unstudied strains of a shepherd swain, whose harp, at the same time, was bold through the courage of its master, free through his "native wood-notes wild," and sedate through his piety; how well such a remedy was adapted to the cure of Saul, may be estimated by a moment's reflection. See 2 Kings iii. 15, for the tranquillizing effects of the harp in the instance of the prophet Elisha.

It is a singular fact, that there is preserved in the second volume of the Asiatic Researches, in a translation from the Persian, an abridgment of the history of the Afghans, a people of India, generally admitted to be of Israelitish origin, in which they are represented to be the descendants of Saul, the first king of Israel. The extract is too long to be introduced here; it must suffice to say, that it comprises a tolerable abridgment of the history, as recorded in Samuel; resembling it in many particulars, yet varying from it in others. We have clearly mentioned, among other incidents, the loss of the ark, the presumption of the Philistines, the fall of Dagon, the cattle which brought the ark to Bethshemesh, the application of the people to Samuel for a king, the description of the person of Saul, the loss of the asses, (or cow, as it is here,) Saul seeking them, the behavior of the sons of Belial to him, the valor of David, the death of Saul, and the appointment of David to the kingdom of Israel.

It is said, (1 Sam. xv. 12.) that Saul, after the defeat of the Amalekites, "set him up a place," i. e. a monument on Carmel. This was, probably, some heap of stones, or a column, to preserve the memory of his victory. The author of the Hebrew traditions on the Books of Kings says, that Saul's triumphal arch was composed of branches of myrtle, palm and olive-trees.

SAUL, the Hebrew name of PAUL. See PAUL.

SAVIOUR is a name eminently appropriated to our Lord Jesus Christ, who was prefigured by those to whom the Old Testament gives the appellation, as Joshua, the judges of Israel, the kings David, Solomon and Josiah, and the other great men raised up to deliver the people of God, as Mattathias, Judas Maccabæus, and the rest. The prophets have described Jesus under the name of Saviour in many places: as Isa. xii. 3, "With joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation," or of the Saviour. "The Lord shall send them a Saviour, even a great one, and he shall deliver them," chap. xix. 20. "I, even I, am the Lord, and beside me there is no Saviour," chap. xliii. 11. And the apostles and sacred writers of the New Testament generally give to him the name of "the Saviour," by way of eminence. When the angel foretold his birth, he said he should be called Jesus, that is, a Saviour, assigning, as the reason, that he should "save his people from their sins," Matt. i. 21. (See also John iv. 42; Acts xiii. 23; Philip. iii. 20, &c. See SALVATION.) The expression of the Samaritans, (John iv. 42.) with regard to our Saviour, is particularly strong. "We know that this is indeed the Christ, THE Saviour of the world," where the articles prefixed to the nouns have a special force in them, together with a general import. It is somewhat unhappy that the term prince has been adopted in connection with Saviour, in Acts v. 31, since it suggests the notion of temporal priority, not to say of temporal authority. It is rendered in the margin author, and seems to denote properly a leader, the first of a company, or body of followers. "Him (Jesus) hath God exalted to be leader—precursor of his followers into heaven—also Saviour, by giving repentance to Israel, and remission of sins." Christ is called the "Saviour of the body;" in Eph. v. 23, where the comparison is to the head, which is the protector, the guardian of the whole person; that which completes, governs and superintends the entire man. The Saviour is said to be expected from heaven, (Phil. iii. 20; Titus ii. 13.) and in short, the title of Saviour is so connected with Deity, that it seems to be impossible to separate them, and to draw the line of distinction between them, (Titus i. 3; ii. 10; iii. 4; 2 Pet. i. 1; Jude 35, et al.) and this, independent of the rule of Greek syntax, developed and applied by the late Mr. Grauville Sharpe, and subsequently by other writers, though strongly corroborated by it.

God often takes to himself the name of Saviour of Israel, (1 Sam. xiv. 39.) and David calls him, his strength and his Saviour, 2 Sam. xxii. 3. "There is no Saviour beside me," says the Lord, in the prophet Hosea, xiii. 4. And Isa. xvii. 10, "Thou hast forgotten the God of thy salvation," or thy Saviour. And in truth, God is the Saviour of saviours, the God of gods; without him there is neither salvation nor deliverance, nor succor. He raised up saviours to his people, in the persons of Othniel; (Judg. iii. 9.) Ehud, (iii. 15.) &c. Obadiah (21.) promises that the Lord will send saviours on the mountain of Sion, to judge the mountain of Esau; meaning, probably, the Maccabees, who subdued the Idumeans.

SCANDAL, a snare, an incumbrance. In Scripture, and in ecclesiastical authors, it is put for any thing that a man finds in his way, which may occasion him to trip. Thus Moses (Lev. xix. 14, apud LXX) "forbids to put a stumbling-block (or scandal) before the blind; that is, neither wood, stone, nor any thing else, that may make him stumble or fall. In Exod. xxiii. 33, he forbids the Israelites to make a covenant with the Canaanites, for fear they should be perverted to idolatry, which would be a great snare, or scandal to them. Calmet remarks that the Greek word Σκάνδαλον, or Πρόσζουμα, or Σκῶλον, answers to the Hebrew מִכְשׁוֹל, Micshol, which signifies fall, ruin, sin, what hinders from walking, and makes one fall; which comes from the root כָּשַׁל, cāshal, to fall, to tumble; and in the conjugation Hiphil, signifies to cause to fall, to overthrow, to lay snares, &c. In a moral sense there is active and passive scandal. The first is that which our words or actions may occasion to others; from their evil tendency, or their pernicious influence. Christ affirms, "It must needs be that offences come;" or scandals must of necessity arise. But he adds, "Wo to that man by whom the offence cometh. If your hand or foot is a cause of scandal to you, cut it off, and cast it from you; you had much better enter the kingdom of God without hand or foot, than be cast into outer darkness with all your limbs entire," Mark ix. 43. He says, "Moreover, have a care of offending (scandalizing) one of these little ones that believe in me; it were better for him who occasions a scandal to such, that a mill-stone were hung about his neck, and he were cast into the sea." Jesus Christ was to the Jews a scandal, and a rock of offence, against which they struck; on which they have fallen, against which they are broken. John says, (1 Epist. ii. 10.) "He who loveth his brother abideth in the light," and no scandal, no impediment, or obstacle, against which he might strike his foot, occurs to him, because he sees and avoids such things; whereas, he who walketh in darkness may strike himself against an impediment, a tree, or a post, or may fall into a ditch, or, at least, may kick his foot against a log of wood, or against a stone, because he does not discern those causes of injury which lie in his way.

Mr. Taylor suggests that an erroneous self-persuasion of safety, a delusive contempt of danger, seems to belong to the term scandal. So Ps. lxxix. 22; Rom. xi. 9, "Let their table—a good thing in their esteem—be made a snare, and a trap, and a scandal to them." So Deut. vii. 16, "Thou shalt not serve their gods—however beneficial such service might seem to thee—lest it become a snare (scandal, LXX) to thee." When we read, that the Jews were scandalized at the mean family of Christ, (Matt. xiii. 57; Luke vii. 23.) it implies mistake, since his family was truly royal; at the doctrine of the cross, (Gal. v. 11.) it implies mistake, since the resurrection had removed that cause of scandal; and also at the persecutions suffered by Christians, since that was really their glory, &c.

Christ has promised to remove out of his kingdom every thing that causeth scandal, Matt. xiii. 41.

SCAPE-GOAT, see GOAT.

SCARLET, a color much prized by the ancients; Exod. xxv. 4; xxvi. 1, 31, 36. It is assigned as a merit of Saul, that he clothed the daughters of Israel in scarlet, 2 Sam. i. 24. So the diligent and virtuous woman is said to clothe her household in scarlet, Prov. xxxi. 21. This color was obtained from the κόκκος, i. e. coccus ilicis of Linnæus, a small insect found on the leaves of the quercus cocciferus in Spain and the countries on the eastern part of the Mediterranean, which was used by the ancients for dyeing a beautiful crimson or deep scarlet color, and was supposed by them to be the berry of a plant or tree. It is the kermes of the Materia Medica. As a dye it has been superseded in modern times by the cochineal insect, coccus cactus, which gives a more brilliant but less durable color. (See Jahn, § 119. Rees' Cyclop. art. Coccus, and KERMES.) *R.

SCEPTRE. (שֵׁבֶט, Shebet.) This word properly signifies, (1.) A rod of any kind, as in No. 4. below. Thus a rod of command, a staff of authority, a sceptre; it is placed in the hand of kings, of governors of a province, or of the chief of a people. Jacob foretold that "the sceptre should not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come, and unto him shall the gathering of the people be;" (Gen. xlix. 10.) and Balaam, foretelling the coming of the Messiah, says, "A sceptre shall rise out of Israel, Numb. xxiv. 17. (See SHILOH.) Baruch speaks of the sceptre put by the Babylonians in the hands of their gods, chap. vi. 13. It is given also to scribes, and to commissaries, who keep a list of troops, Judg. v. 14. The prophets often speak of the sceptre of dominion; (Isa. xiv. 5; xix. 11, 14.) and Amos represents sovereign power by him that holds the sceptre, Amos i. 5, 8.

(2.) The sceptre is put for the rod of correction, for the sovereign authority that punishes and humbles. Ps. ii. 9, "Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron," that is, an iron sceptre. The wise man often uses the Hebrew word Shebet, to express the rod with which the disobedient son and the intractable servant are disciplined, Prov. xxii. 15.

(3.) The word Shebet is very often taken for a tribe; probably, because the princes of each tribe carried a sceptre, or a wand of command, to mark their dignity. The LXX and Vulgate generally translate tribe; but they sometimes preserve the word sceptre. (LXX, 1 Sam. ix. 21; x. 19—21; xv. 17; 1 Kings viii. 16; xi. 13, 32, 35; xii. 20, 21. Vulgate, see Numb. xviii. 2; Jer. li. 19. See also the English Bible.)

(4.) The Hebrew Shebet signifies a shepherd's wand, (Lev. xxvii. 32.) the truncheon of a warrior, or any common staff, (2 Sam. xxviii. 21.) the dart, javelin, or lance of a soldier, (2 Sam. xxviii. 14.) the rod or staff with which they thrash the smaller grain, Isa. xxviii. 27.

SCEVA, chief of the priests, (Acts xix. 14.) or of the synagogue, at Ephesus.

SCHISM, from Σχιζμα, which signifies rupture, or division. When Jeroboam revolted against Rehoboam, and was acknowledged king by the ten tribes, he made a schism, separated from the religion of the Lord, forsook the communion of Judah, and no longer frequented the temple, which was the chosen and appointed place, to offer worship to the Lord. The Jews at this day look on the Caraites as schismatics, because they do not receive their traditions.

The only passages in the New Testament where the word schism occurs, are, 1 Cor. i. 10; xi. 18, and xii. 25, and in each one of them it denotes alienation of affection among the members of the same body, or divisions in a church, and not separation from it.

SCHOOLMASTER. The Greek word pedagogue now carries with it an idea approaching to contempt: with no other word to qualify it, it excites the idea of a pedant, who assumes an air of authority over others, which does not belong to him. But among the ancients a pedagogue was a person to whom they committed the care of their children, to lead them, to observe them, and to instruct them in their first rudiments. Thus the office of a pedagogue nearly answered to that of a governor or tutor, who constantly attends his pupil, teaches him, and forms his manners. Paul (1 Cor. iv. 15.) says; "For though you have ten thousand instructors (pedagogues) in Christ, yet have ye not many fathers." Representing himself as their father in the faith, since he had begotten them in the gospel. The pedagogue, indeed, may have some power and interest of his pupil, but he can never have the natural tenderness of a father for him. To the Galatians, the apostle says, (iii. 24, 25.) "The law was our schoolmaster (pedagogue) to bring us to Christ." It pointed out Christ in the Scriptures, the figures, the prophecies, of the Old Testament: but since we are advanced to superior learning, and are committed to the tuition of the faith which we have embraced, we have no longer need of a schoolmaster, or pedagogue; as such are of no further use to young persons when advanced to years of maturity. "But after that faith is come, we are no longer under a schoolmaster—pedagogue." Mr. Taylor remarks, that the term schoolmaster by no means expresses a person employed to accompany youth to school from home, and from school to home again; and adds, that the Greek word διδασκαλος, or teacher, approaches much nearer to the notion of a schoolmaster, and is distinguished accordingly by Plutarch, de Puerorum Educatione, x. 9. Among the great number of slaves possessed by certain families, it was customary to intrust the care of the children of the family to some confidential slave, who superintended their conduct, and directed their proceedings. A domestic usher, then, may be thought to resemble the ancient pedagogue: and, for females, the duenna of foreign countries. That such an attendant is more proper to early youth than to mature manhood, is obvious. Another class of instructors were called by the Greeks paidomathis, teachers of children. (Quint. lib. i. cap. 11.)

SCORPION. It is generally admitted that the Hebrew word אֲרָבִי, akrâb, denotes the scorpion, which is the largest and most malignant of all the insect tribes. It somewhat resembles the lobster in its general appearance, but is much more hideous. Those found in Europe seldom exceed four inches in length, but in the tropical climates it is no uncommon thing to meet with them twelve inches long. There are few animals more formidable, and none more irascible, than the scorpion; but happily for mankind, they are equally destructive to their own species, as to other animals. Goldsmith states, that Maupertuis put about a hundred of them together in the same glass; and they scarcely came into contact, when they began to exert all their rage in mutual destruction; so that in a few days there remained but fourteen, which had killed and devoured all the rest. But their malignity is still more apparent in their cruelty to their offspring. He enclosed a female scorpion, big with young, in a glass vessel, and she was seen to devour them as fast as they were excluded. There was only one of the number that escaped the general destruction, by taking refuge on the back of its parent; and this soon after revenged the cause of its brethren, by killing the old one in its turn. Such is the terrible nature of this insect; and it is even asserted, that when placed in circumstances of danger, from which it perceives no way of escape, it will sting itself to death. Surely Moses, says Mr. Taylor, very properly mentions scorpions among the dangers of the wilderness, Deut. viii. 15. And what shall we think of the hazardous situation of Ezekiel, who is said to dwell among scorpions, (chap. ii. 6.)—people as irascible as this terrible insect; nor could our Lord select a fitter contrast; "If a son shall ask of his father an egg will he give a scorpion?" Luke xi. 11, 12. But the passage most descriptive of the scorpion, is Rev. ix. 3—10, in which it is to be observed, that the sting of these creatures was not to produce death, but pain so intense that the wretched sufferers should seek death, (ver. 6.) rather than submit to its endurance. Dr. Shaw states, that the sting of scorpions is not always fatal; the malignity of their venom being in proportion to their size and complexion. The torment of a scorpion when he striketh a man is thus described by Dioscorides, as cited by Mr. Taylor: "When the scorpion has stung, the place becomes inflamed and hardened; it reddens by tension, and is painful by intervals, being now chilly, now burning. The pain soon rises high, and rages sometimes more, sometimes less. A sweating succeeds, attended by a shivering and trembling: the extremities of the body become cold; the groin swells; the bowels expel their wind; the hair stands on end; the members become pale, and the skin feels throughout the sensation of a perpetual pricking, as if by needles." Our Saviour gave his disciples power to tread on these terrible creatures, and to disarm them of their power of hurting, Luke x. 19.

It may be necessary to remark on the contrast which our Lord draws between a scorpion and an egg, that the body of this insect is much like an egg; especially those of the white kind, which is the first species mentioned by Ælian, Avicenna, and others; and Bochart has shown that the scorpions of Judea were about the size of an egg.

The Jews used whips on some occasions, which were called, from the suffering they occasioned, scorpions. To these it is probable the haughty Rehoboam alluded, when he menaced the house of Israel with increasing their oppressions, 1 Kings xii. 11.

SCOURGE, or WHP. The punishment of scourging was very common among the Jews. Moses ordains, (Deut. xxv. 1—3.) that "if there be a controversy between men, and they come to judgment, then the judges may judge them. And if the wicked man were found worthy to be beaten, the judge was to cause him to lie down, and to be beaten before his face, according to his fault, by a certain number, but not exceeding forty stripes. There were two ways of giving the lash; one with thongs or whips, made of rope-ends, or straps of leather; the other with rods or twigs. The offender was stripped from his shoulders to his middle, and tied by his arms to a low pillar, that he might lean forward, and the executioner the more easily strike his back. Some maintain that they never gave more nor less than thirty-nine strokes, but that in greater faults they struck with proportionate violence. Others think, that when the fault and circumstances required it, they might increase the number of blows. Paul informs us (2 Cor. xi. 24.) that at five different times he received thirty-nine stripes from the Jews; which seems to imply that this was a fixed number, not to be exceeded. The apostle also clearly shows, that correction with rods was different from that with a whip; for he says, "Thrice was I beaten with rods." And when he was seized by the Jews in the temple, the tribune of the Roman soldiers ran and took him out of their hands; and, desiring to know the reason of the tumult, he ordered him to be tied and stretched on the ground, to put him to the question, by beating him with rods, (Acts xxii. 24, 25.) for thus the Romans commonly put prisoners to the question. The bastinado was sometimes given on the back, at others on the soles of the feet.

The rabbins affirm that punishment by the scourge was not ignominious; and that it could not be objected as a disgrace to those who had suffered it. They maintain, too, that no Israelite, not even the king, or the high-priest, was exempt from this law. This must be understood, however, of the whipping inflicted in their synagogues, which was rather a legal and particular penalty, than a public and shameful correction. Philo, speaking of the manner in which Flaccus treated the Jews of Alexandria, says, he made them suffer the punishment of the whip, which (he remarks) is not less insupportable to a free man, than death itself. Our Saviour, speaking of the pains and ignominy of his passion, commonly puts his scourging in the second place, Matt. xx. 19; Mark x. 34; Luke xviii. 32.

SCRIBE, (סֹפֵר, Sophér; LXX, Γραμματεὺς, Grammateus), a word very common in Scripture, and having several significations. (1.) A clerk, writer or secretary, which constituted an important employment in the court of the kings of Judah, in which Scripture mentions the secretaries as officers of the crown. Seraiah was scribe or secretary to David; (2 Sam. viii. 17.) Shemaiah exercised the same office under the same prince; (1 Chron. xxiv. 6.) Elihoreph and Ahiah were secretaries to Solomon; (1 Kings iv. 3.) Shebna filled the same office under Hezekiah, (2 Kings xix. 2.) and Shaphan under Josiah, 2 Kings xxii. 8—10.

(2.) A scribe is put for a commissary or muster-master of an army, who reviews the troops, keeps the list or roll, and calls them over. It is said, (Judg. v. 14.) that in the war of Barak against Sisera, "Out of Machir came down governors, and out of Zebulun they that bear the staff of a leader." In the reign of Uzziab, king of Judah, is found Jeil the scribe, who had under his hand the king's armies, 2 Chron. xxvi. 11. Jeremiah speaks of a scribe as prince or chief of the soldiers, who superintended the military exercises of the newly raised troops, chap. lii. 25; 2 Kings xxv. 19. (Heb.) the scribe, prince of the army, who made the people of the country go to war. Judas directed the scribes to stand on the banks of the brook that the army was to cross; to let no one remain beyond the water, but to cause all to pass over, to the war, 1 Mac. v. 42.

(3.) Scribe is put for an able and skilful man, a doctor of the law, a man of learning, or one who understands affairs. Jonathan, David's uncle by the father's side, was "a counsellor, a wise man, and a scribe," 1 Chron. xxvii. 32. Baruch, the disciple and secretary of Jeremiah, is called a scribe; so is Gemariah, son of Shaphan; and Elishama, who lived under the reign of Josiah, Jer. xxxvi. 10, 12, 20, 26. Jesus, son of Sirach, says, (Eccles. x. 5.) "In the hand of God is the prosperity of man, and upon the person of the scribe shall he lay his honor." Great commendation is given in Scripture to Ezra, who is celebrated as a skilful scribe, "a ready scribe in the law of Moses," Ezra vii. 6. The scribes of the people, frequently mentioned in the Gospels, were public writers, and professed doctors of the law, which they read and explained to the people.

Some place the origin of scribes under Moses; but the name does not appear till under the judges, Judg. v. 14. Others think that David instituted them, when he established the several classes of the priests and Levites, (1 Chron. xxiv. 6.) though Epiphanius places their origin at the same time with the sect of the Sadducees. Mention is made in Acts xxiii. 9, of scribes that were of the party of the Pharisees, which has induced some to believe, that all scribes were Pharisees. This is a mistake; they did not compose any particular sect.

He who is called a doctor of the law in Matt. xxii. 35, is called a scribe, or one of the scribes, in Mark xii. 28. As the knowledge of the Jews, at that time, chiefly consisted in Pharisaical traditions, and in applying them to explain Scripture, the greater number of doctors of the law, or scribes, were Pharisees; and we almost always find them united in Scripture. They all valued themselves on their knowledge of the law, and on their studying and teaching it; they had the key of knowledge, and sat in Moses's chair, Luke xi. 52; Matt. xxiii. 2.

SCRIPTURE, or WRITING, is a term generally used to denote the sacred books of the Old and New Testaments. "Did ye never read in the Scriptures?" Matt. xxi. 42. "How then shall the Scriptures be fulfilled?" Matt. xxvi. 54. "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness," 2 Tim. iii. 16. See BIBLE.

The reception of the books of the New Testament into the canon of Scripture, is of much importance to us, and it should be well understood, that in this the primitive Christians were extremely scrupulous. As the pieces which compose the New Testament were published at divers times, and were written in places very distant from one another, in languages, also, not mutually intelligible to the inhabitants of these distant countries, we cannot wonder that some should be slow in making their way to general reception; or that some were never generally received. Those published in the West were, for a time, little known in the East, and vice versa. In like manner, those written in the Syriac language, could be understood by the Greeks, only by means of an accurate translation; nor could the Syrians understand those written in Greek without similar assistance. It will follow, that the non-acquaintance of either party, or even the non-admission by either party, is not, in itself, a sufficient reason for rejecting a tract, that was generally acknowledged, where it was better known.

But by the early fathers, and by men the most competent to investigate the subject, and the most worthy of our confidence, the books of the present canon were not all esteemed to be equally authentic. By Eusebius of Caesarea, before any canon was established by authority, they were divided into three classes. (1.) Those universally received, as the four Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, thirteen Epistles of Paul, one Epistle of Peter, one of John. (2.) Those doubted of by some, as the Epistle to the Hebrews, and the Revelation. (3.) Those doubted of by many, or contradicted by most; as the Epistle of James, the Second Epistle of Peter, that of Jude, and the Second and Third of John. To this third class Eusebius seems, in another passage, to refer the Revelations. It was certainly doubted of by many; it has continued to be doubted of: and Luther, in the preface to his translation, strongly questions its canonical authority. The rule of the church seems to have been, to admit no book into the New Testament that was not the work of an apostle, or derived from an apostle; hence the Gospels of Mark and Luke were said to be derived from the apostles Peter and Paul, (though some suppose, that being historical only, and not dogmatical, they formed an exception to the rule.) The Epistle of James was doubted of, because some questioned whether it were written by James the apostle, or by another James. That of Jude was long excluded; and even lately, Michaëlis rather negatives its canonical authority, proof of its composition by an apostle being very deficient. The Second and Third Epistles of John, being written to private persons, were but little known in early ages; and we cannot wonder that they long continued not generally acknowledged. On the whole, the scrupulous diligence and judgment of the early Christians in selecting that series of books which afterwards formed the canon of the New Testament, must give us equal satisfaction and pleasure. Succeeding ages have gradually received what formerly was deemed questionable; and our present canon is certainly more complete than that of the first Christians, not only because of their hesitation, but because the difficulty of procuring copies of the New Testament entire was very great while they existed in manuscript only. See BIBLE.

SCYTHOPOLIS, a name of BETSHEAN, which see.

SEA. The Hebrews give the name of sea (yam, yam) to any great collection of water; as, (1.) to a lake or a pool. Thus we have the sea of Galilee or of Tiberias, the Dead sea, &c. (2.) To great rivers, as the Nile, the Euphrates, the Tigris, &c. which, by their magnitude, or by the extent of their overflowings, seem little seas, or great lakes. (See Isa. xi. 15; xviii. 1, 2; xxi. 1; Jer. li. 36, 42, &c.) The following are the principal seas mentioned in Scripture.

1. THE GREAT SEA, the western sea, or the sea of the Philistines, generally denotes the Mediterranean, which lay west of the Land of Promise. The sea is often put for the west, as the right is put for the south. Gen. xii. 8; xiii. 14, et passim. On the Mediterranean they floated the timber cut down from mount Libanus, which was brought to Joppa, for building the temple, &c.

2. The sea of Suph, or the Red sea, lies between Arabia on the east, and Egypt and Abyssinia on the west, and is in length about 1400 miles. It is by some thought to have been called the sea of Suph, or the weedy sea, because of the great quantity of reeds or sea-wrack found at its bottom, and on its shores. Others, however, and among them is Bruce, think it derived its name from the great quantity of coral found in it. Pliny says, it obtained the name of the Red sea, in Greek: Erythrea, from a king called Erythros, who reigned in Arabia, and whose tomb was seen in the island Tyrine, or Agyris. Several learned men believe, that this king Erythros is Esau, or Edom; Edom, in Hebrew, signifying red or ruddy, as Erythros does in Greek. But the dwelling of Edom was east of Canaan, towards Bozra; and Calmet is therefore of opinion, that this name was not given it till after the Idumeans, the descendants of Edom, had spread themselves westward as far as the Red sea. It might then receive the name of the sea of Edom, which the Greeks rendered Thalassa Erythrea, or the Red sea. That part of the sea where the Israelites passed, is thought to have been near Kolsum, the sea about which bears the name of Bahr al Kolsum, or the sea of destruction, and is in width about three leagues, and in depth varies from 9 to 14 fathoms.

The term Red sea appears to be improperly adopted in Numb. xxi. 14. (See in BIBLE, p. 170, col. 2.) So also in Deut. i. 1, where it should be in the plain "over against Suph." Here our translators confess, by their italics, that they have inserted the word sea between Paran, Topbel, &c. and by this insertion the geography is sadly confused. It is evident, that a station which was in any tolerable sense over against the Red sea, could not possibly be near to Paran, nor to Hazeroth; neither could it be "eleven days' journey from Horeb, by the way of mount Seir;" that is, at Kadesh Barnea.

3. The Dead sea, Salt sea, Eastern sea, sea of Sodom, or sea of the wilderness, or plain, is the lake Asphaltites, which is situated in the southern part of Judea, and which occupies the site of the cities of Sodom, Gomorrha, Admah and Zeboim. Its real size, we believe, is not yet ascertained, for we are not aware that any modern traveller has measured it; and the measurements of Josephus, who found it seventy-two miles long, and eighteen broad, are still referred to. Diodorus affirms that it is sixty-two miles long, and seven and a half broad; but the calculation of Pliny is much greater, for he says, it is one hundred long, and twenty-five wide, in the broadest part. Maundrell considers it seventy-two miles long, and eighteen or twenty in breadth. Pococke agrees with Diodorus, and Dr. Clarke with Josephus; and the abbe Mariti, who seems to have paid much attention to its peculiarities, maintains that it is one hundred and eighty miles in circuit. We cannot but consider it singular that its dimensions should not have been more perfectly ascertained.

The waters of the Dead sea are clear and limpid, but uncommonly salt, and even bitter. Their specific gravity exceeds that of all other waters known. Josephus and Tacitus say that no fish can live in it; and according to the concurring testimony of several travellers, those carried thither by the Jordan instantly die. Maundrell, nevertheless, states, that he found some shell-fish resembling oysters on the shore, and bishop Pococke was informed that a monk had seen fish caught in the water: these are assertions, however, that require further corroboration. The mud is black, thick and fetid, and no plant vegetates in the water, which is reputed to have a petrifying quality. Branches of trees, accidentally immersed in it, are speedily converted into stone, and the curious in Jerusalem then collect them. Neither do plants grow in the immediate vicinity of the lake, where every thing is dull, cheerless and inanimate; whence it is supposed to have derived the name of the Dead sea. But the real cause of the absence of animals and vegetables, Volney affirms, is owing to the saltness and acidity of the water, infinitely surpassing what exists in other seas. The earth surrounding it is deeply impregnated with the same saline qualities, too predominant to admit of vegetable life, and even the air is saturated with them. The waters are clear and incorruptible, as if holding salt in solution, nor is the presence of this substance equivocal, for Dr. Pococke found a thin crust of salt upon his face after bathing in the sea, and the shores where it occasionally overflows, are covered with a similar crust. Galen considered it completely saturated with salt, for it would dissolve no more, when thrown into it.

There are mines of fossil salt in the south-west bank, from which specimens have been brought to Europe; some also exist in the declivities of the mountains, and have provided, from time immemorial, for the consumption of the Arabs and the city of Jerusalem. Great quantities of asphaltum appear floating on the surface of the sea, and are driven by the winds to the east and west bank, where it remains fixed. Ancient authors inform us, that the neighboring inhabitants were careful to collect it, and went out in boats, or used other expedients for that purpose. On the south-east bank are hot springs and deep gullies, dangerous to the traveller, were not their position indicated by small pyramidal edifices on the sides. Sulphur is likewise found on the edges of the Dead sea, and a kind of stone, or coal, called musca, by the Arabs, which, on attrition, exhales an intolerable odor, and burns like bitumen. This stone, which also comes from the neighboring mountains, is black, and takes a fine polish. Mr. Maundrell saw pieces of it two feet square, in the convent of St. John in the wilderness, carved in bas relief, and polished to as great a lustre as black marble is capable of. The inhabitants of the country employ it in paving churches, mosques, courts, and other places of public resort. In the polishing its disagreeable odor is lost. The citizens of Bethlehem consider it as endued with antiseptic virtues, and bracelets of it are worn by attendants on the sick, as an antidote against disease. As the lake is at certain seasons covered with a thick dark mist, confined within its own limits, which is dissipated by the rays of the sun, spectators have been induced to allege that black and sulphureous exhalations are constantly issuing from the water. They have been no less mistaken in supposing, that birds attempting to fly across are struck with pestiferous fumes. Late and reputable travellers declare, that numerous swallows skim along the surface, and from thence take up water necessary to build their nests; and on this head Heyman and Van Egmont made a decisive experiment. They carried two sparrows to the shore, and having deprived them of some of the wing feathers, after a short flight both fell in, or rather on, the sea; but so far from expiring there, they got out in safety. An uncommon love of exaggeration is testified in all the older narratives, and in some of modern date, of the nature and properties of the lake. Chateaubriand speaks of a "dismal sound proceeding from this lake of death, like the stifled clamors of the people engulfed in its waters!"—that its shores produced fruit beautiful, but containing nothing but ashes; that it bears upon its surface the heavier metals. These and a thousand other stories of a like character, have been perpetually repeated with barely any foundation of truth. Among other facts apparently unaccountable, has been ranked that of this lake constantly receiving the waters of the Jordan without overflowing its banks, seeing that there is no visible outlet. Some have therefore conjectured the possibility of a subterraneous communication with the Red sea; others, more ingenious, are of opinion, that the daily evaporation is sufficient to carry off all the waters discharged into it, which is a simple solution of the apparent paradox. See JORDAN, p. 577, and ELATH, p. 380.

A small quantity of the water of the Dead sea, brought to Britain by Mr. Gordon of Clinie, at the request of the late sir Joseph Banks, was analyzed by Dr. Marcet. It was perfectly transparent, and deposited no crystals on standing in close vessels. Its taste was peculiar, bitter, saline and pungent. Solutions of silver produced from it a very copious precipitate, showing the presence of marine acid. Oxalic acid instantly discovered lime in the water. Solutions of barytes produced a cloud, showing the existence of sulphuric acid.

The specific gravity was ascertained to be 1.211, which is somewhat less than what had been found by Lavoisier, being 1.240, in a portion submitted to his examination. From different experiments in the analyses which we refer to, the result proved the contents of 100 grains of water to be

Muriate of lime . . . .	3.920
Muriate of magnesia . .	10.246
Muriate of soda . . . .	10.360
Sulphate of lime . . . .	0.054
	24.580

Whence it appears that this water contains about one fourth of its weight of salts in a state of perfect desiccation; but if these salts be desiccated only at the temperature of 180° they will amount to 41 per cent. of the water. (Edin. Cyclop. vol. ii. p. 559.)

The Dead sea is said, in sacred writ, to have arisen from the exercise of divine wrath against the cities of Sodom and Gomorrha, for their unexampled iniquity. Five cities, all governed by kings, were involved in the general destruction, then overwhelming the fertile vale of Siddim where they stood. Some writers, among whom is Mr. Horne, (Introd. vol. iii. p. 71, 2d edit.) are of opinion that these cities were destroyed by lightning having set fire to the bituminous substances with which they suppose the place to have abounded; or else to have been effected by a volcanic eruption in the neighborhood. This notion, however, seems to have been taken up without sufficiently considering that the existence of these materials in the neighborhood of the vale of Siddim is incompatible with the description which the inspired writer gives of the nature of the soil about these parts. Nothing can be more certain, than that those places where brimstone and salt are found, are naturally most barren and unfruitful. Hence the sacred writers, to represent unfruitful and desolate places, describe them as abounding with these materials. (See Deut. xxix. 22—24; Judg. ix. 45; Jer. xvii. 5, 6; Zeph. ii. 9.) On the contrary, the vale of Siddim is represented as a fruitful vale, well watered every where, and hence highly adapted to the pasturage of cattle; (Gen. xiii. 10, 11.) for which reason it was chosen by Lot in preference to any other part of the land, Gen. xiii. 9. From which it appears that the sulphur or brimstone, and the salt and saline matter, as well as the indications of subterraneous fires, which are to be found about the Dead sea now, are rather the effects of the destruction poured upon the spot, than the natural productions of the place before that event. (Wells's Geog. vol. i. p. 154, 8vo.)

[The general features of the Dead sea, and its shores, especially at the southern extremity, have been described in different articles. See, especially, CANAAN, p. 233; EXODUS, p. 414; SALT, VALLEY OF, p. 804. R.]

THE TONGUE OF THE SEA, is that which runs into the land; as we call that a tongue, or neck of land, which advances into the sea, Josh. xv. 5; xviii. 19; Isa. xi. 15.

THE BRAZEN OR MOLTEN SEA, made by Solomon

for the temple, was a vessel which stood in the temple, and contained three thousand baths, according to 2 Chron. iv. 5, or two thousand baths, according to 1 Kings vii. 26. Calmet thinks this may be reconciled, by saying that the cup or bowl contained two thousand baths, and the foot, which was hollow, a thousand more. It stood on its foot now mentioned, besides which it was supported by twelve oxen of brass.

Mr. Taylor expresses his dissatisfaction with the solution of the difficulty, relative to the capacity of this vessel, as just given from Calmet, and devotes a very considerable article (Fragm. 254) to its investigation; of which we shall give the substance.

Calmet, as we have seen, supposes that the bowl, or cavity, held 2000 baths, and the foot or hollow, 1000 more,—but what could be the use of this hollow? Not, surely, to contain so much water; it must have been for the purpose of furnishing it when it wanted; but in this case, the cocks should be placed at the bottom of it, which they are not in Calmet's engraving.

In proposing his solution, Mr. Taylor offers the following remarks:

(1.) No figure of this sea yet published has preserved a proper inlet and outlet for the necessary body of water, which was not stagnant, but flowing, as is evident from two considerations: (1.) that most, if not all, of the Jewish purifications, were performed over running water; (2.) the Jerusalem Talmud and Maimonides agree, that a pipe of water came into the Brazen sea out of the well or fountain Etam, and constantly flowed from it, for the use of the priests who ministered at the altar.

(2.) The construction of a fountain implies pipes, &c. for forcing the water upwards, and corresponding pipes for passing the water through (or at least among) the oxen, &c. around the basin. It seems plausible, therefore, he suggests, that the writer of the Chronicles does not merely state the quantity of water which the basin held, but that also which was necessary to work it, to keep it flowing as a fountain; that which was necessary to fill it and its accompaniments. This opinion he supports by pointing out the different phraseology used in the two passages. In 1 Kings vii. 26, it contained, comprehended, held 2000 baths; but in 2 Chron. iv. 5, two words are used, one as before, "it held," the other, "it received." Now the writer, as he remarks, would not have used two words, adding a second word, merely to signify the same thing; there was, then, a difference between this receiving and this holding. When playing as a fountain, and when all its parts were filled for that purpose, they, together with the sea itself received 3000 baths; whereas the sea exclusively held only 2000 baths when its contents were restricted to those of the circular basin: "It received, and held, three thousand baths."

But being unwilling to rest upon mere assumption, Mr. Taylor refers to the "Fountain of the Lions," now extant in the Moorish palace at Granada, usually called by its Arabic name, Al-hambra, and which bears a curious resemblance to the brazen sea.

This fountain is composed of twelve lions, holding the place of Solomon's twelve oxen, "their hinder parts turned inward;" and three toward each corner of the heavens, of course. Solomon's basin stood upon the oxen, and this basin is supported by pillars, which pillars enter the hinder parts of the animals, and through the pillars the water passes into the animals. Whether Solomon's basin had these pillars we know not; but as it stood upon the oxen, (no doubt, at their hinder parts, which were turned inward,) the opportunity for communication by pipes is obvious. In the centre of this basin rises a smaller one, or cup, which is indeed the fountain, and supplies water to the larger. It is impossible to determine whether Solomon's had any cup like this; but, if it had, the difference between 2000 baths and 3000 baths is accounted for at once, and with at least as much propriety as the "hollow foot" of Calmet accounts for it. Such a cup, adding nothing to the external measure of the basin, might be omitted in the account. However, not to insist on this, it must be recollected, says our author, that to supply the rising column of water, of considerable diameter, and, no doubt, of a majestic elevation; to supply also the discharge of twelve lesser fountains from the mouths of the oxen—as in this instance from the mouths of the lions—together with what was contained in the various pipes, may well be thought to require half as much water as was held by the basin itself; so that the water necessary to supply the whole, or what was received by the entire fountain when at work, was 3000 baths; while the basin alone held only 2000 baths.

Without affecting to determine whether Solomon's basin had a cup, Mr. Taylor inquires, whether it is absolutely certain, from the arrangement of the passages in the original, that the same brim which had knobs compassing it, "ten in eighteen inches," is the same as that which was "wrought like the brim of a cup, with flowers of lilies?" The ornaments of the cup of Al-hambra are like those of flowers; those of the basin are different; might it not be so in Solomon's brazen sea?

This solution seems greatly preferable to the supposition, that one writer means dry-measure baths, and the other liquid-measure baths; or that the bath had varied in its quantity after the time of Solomon; since the foundation of this explanation is matter of fact, and since the coincidence of ideas between Solomon's and the Moorish fountain is striking. (See Swinburne's Travels in Spain, p. 178.)

The fountain may serve to answer another question, which has been raised on the manner of casting Solomon's brazen sea—How such an immense body could be cast at once? This difficulty has arisen from taking as certain that the sea was strictly a circle; whereas the Arabian fountain, though circular, is divided into twelve faces, each face being itself a plane, and forming an angle with the next. If this were the fact also with respect to Solomon's sea, then we perceive how easily each face might be cast separately, and afterwards the whole be united; notwithstanding which few persons, if any, would hesitate in describing it as a round basin. This would determine, too, that Solomon's oxen stood, like the Moorish lions, one to each face, with equal intervals between them, all round the circumference, and not, as might be gathered from the description, three together, each three facing a cardinal point of the heavens, which has been the sentiment of the rabbins, and is adopted by Calmet and others.

Is there an allusion to the brazen sea as a fountain, in Zech. xiii. 1, "In that day there shall be a fountain opened, not merely to the priests in divine service in the temple, but it shall be free to the house of David, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem in general, to the whole nation, &c. for cleansing of sin and uncleanness," &c.?

SEAH, a Hebrew measure, containing about two gallons and a half, liquid measure; or about a peck and one pint, dry measure.

SEAL, SEALING. The allusions and references to seals and sealing are very frequent in the sacred writings. Seals or signets were in use at a very early period; and they were evidently of various kinds, so that the same expression, as it might at first sight be thought, has a diversity of meaning, determinable by its connection on application.

The principal use of seals was for authentication, and they appear to have been worn by the parties to whom they respectively belonged. The seal of a private person was usually worn on his finger, or on his wrist, or in a bracelet, being small in size. The seal of a governor was worn by him, or carried about his person, in the most secure manner possible. The royal seal was, (1.) personal, to the king; (2.) public, to the state; in other words, the seal of the king, and the seal of the crown: the first the king retained; the latter he delivered to the proper officer of state. So far our own usages enable us to comprehend clearly the nature of this important instrument.

The art of writing is so generally diffused among us, that we think meanly of an individual who has not acquired that noble qualification; and we can scarcely conceive of a governor, or a king, who is destitute of the accomplishment, being fit for discharging the duties of his office. We must, therefore, recollect, that in the East the art of writing is practised by a body of men whose skill is the mean of their livelihood, and who engross almost the whole of its practice. The civil governor may be considered as never authenticating by signature; but to give validity to an order, he stamps it with an impression of the seal which he wears, and this sufficiently denotes, to all who inspect it, that he has been informed of the contents, and has confirmed them by his stamp manual. This shows the vast consequence of this implement; for, should an order, under the governor's seal, command the death of A. B. that person would be treated as a criminal, and executed on the warrant thus authenticated. Or, should an order, thus authenticated, command the disbursement of a considerable sum of money, the treasurer would disburse it, and justify himself by this authority. So that, in fact, whoever possesses this seal possesses all the power of the real owner, all the resources of the country, &c. Hence we may in some degree estimate the incautious confidence of Judah, who gave his seal to Tamar, by which act he, with his property, was placed entirely in her power; and we may also perceive the fidelity of Tamar, who made no ill use of this authority.

Seals were usually made of silver, but others were of inferior metals; and some of precious stones. The form of their cutting must also be properly understood, because such seals as are in use among ourselves would very ill answer the purpose of stamping or marking. Were they dipped in a thick kind of ink, (printer's ink, for example,) they would imprint on paper the mark of their flat superficies, leaving blanks corresponding to the hollows which formed the letters. It is necessary, therefore, that seals which are to be thus dipped should have the inscriptions upon them raised, so that these inscriptions may hold the ink, and imprint on the paper the forms of the letters which compose them. In this manner the excise stamps on a variety of articles which pay duty in Britain are cut and conducted; also post-marks on letters, letters for marking linen, and, universally, types used for printing.

The nature of the inscription is another thing requiring notice. It is not enough that they consist of the initials of the owner's name; they contain, especially when they belong to a person of consequence, a description of his office, residence, &c. and, as a long line of ancestry is reckoned to increase the honor of an individual, this in the East is displayed on some of their seals with a parade (as we should call it) verging on affectation and ostentation. Some of them have additions which seldom occupy our cipher seals, such as inscriptions, mottoes, sentences, apophthegms of moral wisdom, and sentiments, pious or political; which answer in some measure to the mottoes of our coats of arms, but extended to lengths which custom among us forbids.

Mr. Taylor, from whom these remarks are abridged, has selected the following Scripture references to seals and sealing.

We read in Est. viii. 8, "Write in the king's name, and seal it with the king's [seal] ring; for the writing which is written in the king's name, and sealed with the king's ring, no man may reverse." (See also ver. 10.) It clearly appears that the king's ring [called טבאת tabaath] had a seal in it; this also is the name of Pharaoh's ring; and we read (chap. iii. 10.) that the king took off his ring from his hand, and gave it to Haman, empowering him thereby, at his pleasure, to authenticate his commands with the stamp of royal authority.

Precisely the same action is that of Pharaoh with respect to Joseph: (Gen. xli. 42.) "And Pharaoh took off his ring (tabaath) from his hand, and gave it, and placed it on the hand of Joseph;" from which moment the power of life and death, and of civil government, although vested in the king, was transferred to Joseph; and since this ring is called by the same name as the former, we may justly conclude that it was of the same nature. But here arises a query. It is said these rings were worn on the hand—were they worn on the wrist? or, being worn on the finger, are they said to have been worn on the hand?

We have, however, an earlier instance of a seal—and it should seem to be a seal-ring, as being the property of the wearer, known by an appropriate inscription—in the instance of Judah, (Gen. xxxviii. 18.) who left with Tamar his seal or signet, called (התם) hothâm. That this was a ring appears likely from the consideration of Judah's wearing it about his person. The word is used, too, in Jer. xxii. 24, "Though Coniah, son of Jehoiakim, were a (hothâm, התם) ring on my right hand;" and we have in Dan. vi. 17, (18, Heb.) the act of sealing described by it, "And a stone was brought and placed on the mouth of the den, and the king sealed it (התם) with his ring (תקת) and the princes also sealed with their rings." Hence it appears that we have three words to denote a seal, or rather three different kinds of seals, denoted by three very distinct and different words. (1.) Hothâm, which is used the earliest, we believe, in the instance of Judah; it denotes a seal of such a kind as a private person might carry about him. (2.) Tabaath, a seal which we find worn by kings, as by Pharaoh and Ahasuerus. (3.) Eka, a seal employed both by the king and his princes; and therefore not appropriate restrictively to royalty. It is not said that this article was worn about the person.

Hothâm, Mr. Taylor takes to be a general word for seal; and he thinks it means a precious stone, cut in the manner of seals. So we read, Exod. xxviii. 11: "Two onyx stones, the work of an engraver in stone, (seal-cutter,) engraved, or cut in, with the engravings, incisions, of a hothâm." The same, (ver. 21.) "The names of the children of Israel (twelve) were to be upon the twelve stones of the pectoral, like the engravings of a hothâm; each stone containing one name:" also ver. 36, "And thou shalt make a plate (flower) of pure gold, and shalt make incisions—openings; that is, shalt engrave upon it like the engraving of a hothâm, "Holiness to the Lord." The same phrase (chap. xxxix. 6.) expresses that the onyx stones were engraven with the engravings of a hothâm; (also ver. 14.) and it deserves remark, how carefully these articles are described as being wrought with a peculiar, or at least with a distinct, species of engraving. Now, certainly, there could have been no room for this distinction, if no more than one manner of engraving letters had been known at that time. This, we see, was cut into the metal, or jewel, or seal; it was used in engraving the name of the proprietor on the seal belonging to him; it was used by private persons; and it was commonly known and understood. This remark has its influence on the question of the origin of writing. But we read in Exod. xxxii. 16, that the tables of the law contained writing engraved (כִּתְּבֵנּוּ) upon them. What kind of engraving was this? It happens that the word occurs only in this place; the LXX render it νεκρολαβίην, which, if it be from the verb νεκρολαβειν, may signify cut out, or rather chiselled, that is, hollow lines, wrought in stone by a chisel, (or something answering the purpose of that instrument,) and driven by a mallet, as νεκρολαβειν is understood to signify; instrumentum lapicidarum malleo simile, a hammer. This, possibly, was the idea intended to be conveyed by those interpreters; at least it is the idea which arises from their rendering. But the apostle seems to have been dissatisfied with the term, for he says, (2 Cor. iii. 7.) "If the ministration of death written with letters engraven on stones (ἐπιτεταυρωμένη ἐν λίθοις) was glorious," he has preferred a word of more general signification; formed, imaged, typified, in any manner. Under this uncertainty the English word chiselled may express this manner till a better is suggested. The result of these inquiries is, that the devices, or marks, of certain seals, were incise cut into the metal; while those of others were raised for the purpose of stamping.

Among the representations of seals collected by Mr. Taylor, is one from Tavernier, being that of the first minister of state of some oriental prince. The seal, in the original, is set on the back of the patent, no man daring to affix his seal on the same side as the king's; and this Mr. Taylor thinks may give the true bearing of the apostle's expression: (2 Tim. ii. 19.) The foundation of God standeth sure, having this motto around the seal—this inscription, "The Lord knoweth them who are his." And this inscription is on the enclosed, the folded, side of the patent, not visible to us; whereas, on the open side, the exposed part of the patent, is the counter inscription, "Let all who name the name of Christ depart from iniquity;"—this character is conspicuous to all, and, as it were, a continuation of the former, its counterpart, and in perfect coincidence with it. The notion of a writing fully, amply confirmed, (that is, a royal patent,) suits this passage, he remarks, extremely well, even better than that of a foundation stone; for how can the inscription on such a stone be open for inspection? or why two mottoes? and, as appears, one on one side of it, the other on the other side? The security of God—his bond abideth sure, absolutely immovable; its seal-motto is, "The Lord knows, approves, them who are his." This idea of a seal on the back of a writing, seems to be that of the apostle John, also: (iii. 33.) "He who hath received his (the Messiah's) testimony has set to, added, his seal, vouching—not properly confirming—the veracity of God."

Circumcision was a seal, or a token in confirmation of a previous engagement. The Corinthians were seals of the apostle's ministry, conclusive evidences, like seals to a deed. In general the gifts of God, the Holy Spirit, &c. were tokens of validity, given for confirmation of a delegated power to parties possessing them.

SEALING.—It is necessary to observe, that the method of sealing, mentioned in the sacred writings, does not restrictively imply a waxen seal, or a seal for evidence only, but to close up, to secure, by some solid, or glutinous matter. So Deut. xxxii. 34, "Is not this laid up in store with me, and sealed up [closed up, secured, for preservation] among my treasures?" In Job xxxviii. 14, a seal is mentioned as being made of clay; which, indeed, is customary in the East; and in Jer. xxxii. 14, a similar practice seems referred to, with regard to a certain deed which was enclosed in a roll of some strong substance, pitched over, to protect it from water, or surrounded with a coat of firm clay, to the same purpose, and placed at the bottom of an earthen vessel; while a writing not thus enclosed, or coated over, was laid among a quantity of dry matters, "stones, bricks, or sea-sand," above the vessel.

That the word translated sealing may properly be understood of closing, or cementing, which is allied to sealing in the East, appears in part from the following extract from Niebuhr: (vol. ii. p. 261.)—"They sign their letters with a sort of cipher, to prevent the possibility of counterfeiting their signatures: at least the great and the learned do so. . . Their letters folded are an inch in breadth, and the leaves are pasted together at one end. They cannot seal them, for wax is so soft in hot countries, that it cannot retain an impression. See further under CLAY, and BOOK, p. 202.

SEAT. The seat of Moses, on which the scribes and Pharisees sat, expresses the authority of the doctors of the law, and their office of teaching. Our Lord commanded that they should be heard, and respected; but he forbade that their actions should be made precedents, or themselves taken for examples. The seat of the scribe, mentioned in the first Psalm, alludes to the abominable discourse, and the licentious manners, of libertines, who corrupt equally by their scandalous example and conduct, as by their loose principles. The Hebrew says scorners, revilers, those pretended free-thinkers, who deride the simplicity of plain and honest minds. Solomon often speaks of them in his Proverbs, and carefully guards his pupil against their dangerous tongues, Prov. i. 22; iii. 34; ix. 7, 8, 12; xiii. 1; xiv. 6; xv. 12; xix. 25; xx. 1, &c. The seat of honors, (Eccles. vii. 4.) is the chief places in the synagogues, which the Pharisees assumed; (Matt. xxiii. 6.) the seat prepared for Job in the assemblies; (Job xxix. 7.) the seat or throne of the king, and that of God, are clear enough. The throne belongs to God, and to the king; the seat of honor to the friends of the king, and to great men. (Compare BED.)

SEBA, or SABA, son of Cush, Gen. x. 7. See under SABEANS, I.

SEBASTE, see SAMARIA.

SEBAT, the fifth month of the Jewish civil year; and the eleventh of the ecclesiastical year; from the new moon of February to that of March; or, according to others, corresponding to our January, O. S. (See MONTH.) They begin in this month to number the years of the trees they planted, the fruits of which were esteemed impure till the fourth year, Zech. i. 7. See JEWISH CALENDAR, at the end of the volume.

SECACAH, a southern city of Judah, (Josh. xv. 61.) in the desert.

SECRET, see MYSTERY.

SECT, a Latin word which has the same signification as the Greek word Hæresis, though the sound is not so offensive to us. Among the Jews there were four sects, distinguished by their practices and opinions, yet united in communion with each other, and with the body of their nation, viz. the Pharisees, the Sadducees, the Essenians, and the Herodians. (See the respective articles.) Christianity was originally considered as a new sect of Judaism; hence Tertullus, accusing Paul before Felix, says, that he was chief of the seditious sect of the Nazarenes; (Acts xxiv. 5.) and the Jews of Rome said to the apostle, when he arrived in this city, that "as to this sect, it was every where spoken against," Acts xxviii. 22. Peter (2 Epist. ii. 1—10.) foretells that false teachers should arise among them, "who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, (or sects,) even denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction." He adds, that these people, being great lovers of themselves, are not afraid to introduce new sects; where the word sect is taken in the same sense as heresy.

Among the Greeks, the philosophers were divided into different sects; as the Academics, the Stoics, the Peripatetics, the Cynics, the Epicureans, &c. The Jews, in imitation of the Greeks, began to divide themselves into sects, about the time of the Maccabees; and it seems as if the Corinthians had a mind to introduce something like this into Christianity, when they boasted, I am a disciple of Peter, I of Paul, I of Apollos, 1 Cor. i. 12; iii. 22, &c.

SECUNDUS, a disciple of Paul, (Acts xv. 4.) but we know nothing of his life, further than that he was of Thessalonica, and followed the apostle from Greece into Asia, A. D. 58.

SEED, the prolific principle of future life, is taken in Scripture for posterity, whether of man, beasts, trees, &c. all of which are said to be sown and to fructify, as the means of producing a succeeding generation, Jer. xxxi. 27. Hence seed denotes an individual, as Seth, in the stead of Abel, (Gen. iv. 25. et al. freq.) and the whole line of descent; as the seed of Abraham, of Jacob, &c. the seed-royal, &c. much in the same acceptation as children. The seed of Abraham denotes not only those who descend from him, by natural issue, but those who imitate his character, (Rom. iv. 16.) for, if he be "the father of the faithful," then the faithful are his seed, by character, independent of natural descent; and hence the Messiah is said to see his seed, though in fact, Jesus left no children by descent, but by grace or conversion only, Isa. liii. 10. This is occasionally restricted to one chief, or principal, seed, one who by excellence is the seed; as the seed of the woman, (Gen. iii. 15; Gal. iii. 16.) the seed of Abraham, the seed of David, meaning the most excellent descendant of the woman, of Abraham, of David. Or, understand by the "seed of the woman," the offspring of the female sex only; as verified in the supernatural conception of Jesus, (Matt. i. 18, &c.; Luke i. 26, &c.) and of which the birth of Abraham's seed (Isaac) was a figure.

Seed is taken figuratively for the word of God; (Luke viii. 5; 1 Pet. i. 23.) for a disposition becoming a divine origin, (1 John iii. 9.) and for truly pious persons, Matt. xiii. 38.

SEEING, To SEE. This is said, not only of the sense of vision, by which we perceive external objects, but also of inward perception, of the knowledge of spiritual things, and even of the supernatural sight of hidden things; of prophecy, visions, ecstasies. Whence it is that those persons were formerly called seers, who afterwards were called Nabi, or prophets; and that prophecies were called visions. See PROPHET.

The verb to see, is used to express all kinds of sensations. It is said (Exod. xx. 18.) that the Israelites saw voices, thunder, lightnings, the sound of the trumpet, and the whole mountain of Sinai covered with clouds or smoke. To see good, or goods, is to enjoy them; "I believed to see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living," Ps. xxvii. 13, i. e. I hope that God will bring me back into my own country, into the land of Judea, where I shall live in peace and prosperity. Job says, (vii. 7.) "I shall die, and see no more; I shall no longer enjoy the good things of this world." And the psalmist says, (Ps. iv. 6.) "There be many that say, who will show us any good?" that is, to enjoy any happiness in this life.

To see the face of the king, is to be of his council, his household, or to approach him. The kings of Persia, to maintain their respect, and majesty, seldom permitted their subjects to see them, and hardly ever showed themselves in public; none but their most intimate friends, or their familiar domestics, had the honor of beholding their faces, Esth. i. 10, 14. Frequent allusion is made to this custom in Scripture, which mentions the seven principal angels that see the face of the Lord, and appear in his presence. See Rev. i. 4, and ANGEL.

SEER, see PROPHET.

I. SEGUB, son of Hezron, father of Jair, 1 Chron. ii. 21, 22.

II. SEGUB, a son of Hiel of Bethel, who, having undertaken to rebuild Jericho, was punished by the death of Abiram, his first-born son, who died as he was laying the foundation; and by the death of Segub his younger son, when he hung up the gates of the city, 1 Kings xvi. 34. See HIEL, and GERICO.

I. SEIR, the Horite, whose dwelling was east and south of the Dead sea, in the mountains of Seir, where at first reigned his descendants, Gen. xxxvi. 21—30; 1 Chron. i. 38, &c. The posterity of Esau afterwards possessed the mountains of Seir, and Esau himself dwelt there when Jacob returned from Mesopotamia, Gen. xxxii. 3; xxxiii. 14; xxxvi. 8, 9. Moses informs us, (Deut. ii. 12.) that Esau made war with the Horites, and destroyed them. Seir must have lived very early, since his children were already a powerful and numerous people in the time of Abraham, before the birth of Isaac, when Chedorloamer and his confederates came to make war against the kings of Pentapolis, Gen. xiv. 6.

II. SEIR, a mountainous tract, stretching from the southern extremity of the Dead sea, to the gulf of Ezion-Geber. Mount Hor formed part of Seir, and the only part that retained its original name. Mount Seir is more particularly described under the article EXODUS, p. 415.

There would seem to have been a mountain on the frontiers of Judah and Dan, bearing the name of Seir, Josh. xv. 10.

SELA, the name of a place mentioned in 2 Kings xiv. 7, where it is said that Amaziah, king of Judah, slew ten thousand men of Edom, in the valley of Salt, and took Sela by war, and called the name of it Joktheel. Sela, in Hebrew, signifies a rock, and answers to the Greek word Petra; whence it has been reasonably inferred that the city bearing this name, and which was the celebrated capital of Arabia Petraea, is the place mentioned by the sacred historian. There are two places, however, which contend for the honor of having been the capital of the Nabatheans, or Agareniens—Kerek, and Wady Mousa; but the extensive ruins which have been discovered in the latter place, has induced most writers to consider this as the site of the ancient Petra, though in opposition to the traditions of the people who inhabit the country. Mr. Mansford has followed those writers who think that both Kerek and Wady Mousa appear to have been called Petra by the Greeks, and each to have been the capital of the country, though in different ages. In proof that the former was so called, he remarks, that when the expedition of the Macedonian Greeks, which Antigonus sent against the Nabathæi, under the command of his son Demetrius, first penetrated into this country, we are informed by Diodorus that this people placed their old men, women and children, upon a steep rock, having only one access to the summit, and situated three hundred stadia beyond the lake Asphaltites. Now, both the description and position of this place agree with Kerek, as described by Burekhardt; while the city of Wady Mousa is twice the above-mentioned distance from the lake, and stood in a deep glen, instead of on a precipitous rock. He conceives, however, that in process of time, and probably from increase of commerce, or for better security, or as lying in a more direct route from the Red sea to the Mediterranean, the new city was built in Wady Mousa, the probable site of a former city of the Edomites, to which the name of the old capital was transferred, and with equal propriety, for here, too, all was rock; while the old city was distinguished by its indigenous name of Kerek, moulded by the Greeks into Charax.

The remains in the valley of Wady Mousa, which are described by Burekhardt and Legh, and by captains Irby and Mangles, attest the splendor of the former city. At the western end of the valley, the road ascends to the high platform on which mount Hor and the tomb of Aaron stand; in the vicinity of which Josephus and Eusebius agree in placing the ancient Petra. See a full description of Wady Mousa under CANAAN, p. 238, 239.

SELALI, a musical term, which occurs frequently in the Psalms, and is found also in Hab. iii. 3, 9, 13. It usually occurs at the end of a period or strophe; but sometimes at the end only of a clause. According to Gesenius, this difficult word may be explained in three different ways; either directly, as symphony, (so the Sept. διδρασμα.) or as pause of the song, when the instruments strike up, i. e. symphony, as before; or again, some suppose the word to consist of the initial letters of three words, signifying da capo, repeat, etc. This last mode Gesenius rejects, but does not decide in respect to the others. (See his Lexicon.) R.

I. SELEUCIA, a name given by king Seleucus to the city of Gadara, which see.

II. SELEUCIA, a city of Syria, on the Mediterranean, near where the river Orontes falls into it. Paul and Barnabas embarked at Seleucia, for Cyprus, Acts xiii. 4. The coins of this city are remarkable for exhibiting four different eras: first, that of the Seleucids, in the year of Rome, 442; that of its own laws, 645 of Rome, under the reign of Antiochus VIII.; that of Pompey, in the year of Rome, 690; and that of Augustus, in the year of Rome, 723.

SELLING. The Hebrews might sell their own liberty; and fathers might sell that of their children, Lev. xxv. 39. If your brother sells himself to you because of his poverty, you shall not oppress him, nor sell him again as a slave: he shall abide with you only as a workman for hire. Maimonides says, that a Hebrew could not sell his liberty, but in extreme necessity. Exod. xxi. 7, "If a man sell his daughter to be a maid-servant, she shall not go out as the manservants do." Her master shall not dismiss her, as a man-slave is dismissed at the sabbatical year. He shall take her as his wife, or shall marry her to his son. If he care to do neither of these, he shall set her at liberty." The Hebrews sold also insolvent debtors, and their children, Matt. xviii. 25; 2 Kings iv. 1. To sell freemen for slaves, was a crime which the law punished with death, Exod. xxi. 16; Deut. xxiv. 7. Esau sold his birthright; and for this, it appears, Paul calls him profane, Heb. xii. 16. "Thou hast sold thyself to work evil in the sight of the Lord," said the prophet Elijah to Ahab, (1 Kings xxi. 20, 25.) and the wicked Israelites mentioned in 1 Mac. i. 16, sold themselves as slaves to sin, being subject to their evil inclinations, as slaves are to their masters. These expressions were familiar to the Hebrews, and hence Paul, speaking of himself, or rather of mankind in his own person, says, (Rom. vii. 14.) "I am carnal, sold under sin; the slave of concupiscence and of sin by nature, but set at liberty by the grace of Jesus Christ." The difference is, that Ahab sold himself; that is, freely, voluntarily; whereas Paul was sold; that is, against his will, by force, by constraint of circumstances, not of choice.

SEMOOM, see WIND.

SENI, mount Hermon was so called by the Amorites, Deut. iii. 8, 9; 1 Chron. v. 23.

SENNACHERIB, king of Assyria, son and successor of Salmanser, began to reign, A. M. 3290; and reigned but four years, 3294. Hezekiah, king of Judah, having shaken off the yoke of the Assyrians, by which Ahaz, his father, had suffered under Tiglath-pileser, Sennacherib marched an army against him, and took all the strong cities of Judah. Hezekiah, seeing he had nothing left but Jerusalem, which he, perhaps, found it difficult to preserve, sent ambassadors to Sennacherib, then at the siege of Lachish, saying, "I have committed a fault; but withdraw your army out of my territories, and I will bear whatever you shall impose upon me." Sennacherib demanded three hundred talents of silver, and thirty talents of gold, which Hezekiah remitted to him. Sennacherib received the tribute, but refused to leave Judea. He sent from Lachish to Jerusalem three of his chief officers, Tartan, Rab-saris and Rab-shakeh, to summon Hezekiah to surrender; in doing which they uttered many blasphemies against God. In the mean time Sennacherib quitted the siege of Lachish, and went in person to that of Libnah, whence he wrote to Hezekiah, urging him to return to his duty, and to follow the example of so many other nations that had submitted. Hezekiah entreated the Lord, who sent a destroying angel against the Assyrian army, and slew in one night 185,000 men, 2 Kings xix. 35. Sennacherib returned with all speed to Nineveh, where, while he was paying adorations to his god Nisroch, in the temple, his two sons Adrammelech and Sharezer slew him, and fled into Armenia. Esar-haddon his son reigned in his stead, A. M. 3294, 2 Kings xix; 2 Chron. xxxii. 21.

Most commentators are of opinion, that the army of Sennacherib was destroyed before Jerusalem, preparing for the siege of this city. But Calmet seems to think, from Isa. x. 24—26, that he did not form the siege of Jerusalem; but that this calamity befell him in his march against Tirhakah.

The Babylonian Talmud affirms, that lightning was the agent employed upon this occasion; and the Targums, or Chaldee paraphrases, are quoted, as asserting the same thing. Other writers believe, that the Assyrians perished by means of a hot wind, which God caused to blow against them; a wind very common in those parts, (Thevenot, Voyage, part i. lib. ii. 20; part ii. lib. i. 20; ii. 16.) and which makes great ravages, stifling thousands of persons in a moment, as often happens to those great caravans of Mahometans, which go pilgrimages to Mecca. Jeremiah (li. 1.) calls it a destroying wind; and the threatening by Isaiah, (xxxvii. 7.) to Sennacherib, "Behold, I will send a blast upon him, and he shall hear a rumor," seems also to allude to it. [Many interpreters have thus referred the catastrophe of Sennacherib to the simoom, whose destructive ravages have been long celebrated by oriental travellers. More recent and accurate accounts, however, have shown the fallacy of these stories respecting the simoom; and this hypothesis, therefore, falls to the ground. See WINDS. R.]

SEPHER, probably the coast of Southern Arabia, Yemen. (See under MESH-A.) The sons of Joktan had their dwelling "from Mesha, as thou goest unto Sephar, a mount of the east," Gen. x. 30.

SEPHARVAIM. When Sbalmaneser, king of Assyria, carried away Israel from Samaria to beyond the Euphrates, he sent people in their stead into Palestine, among whom were the Sepharvaim, 2 Kings xvii. 24, 31. [That Sepharvaim was a small district under its own king, is apparent from 2 Kings xix. 13; Isa. xxxvii. 13. It may with most probability be assigned to Mesopotamia; because it is named along with other places in that region; and because Ptolemy (v. 18.) mentions a city of a similar name, Sipphara, as the most southern of Mesopotamia. Below this city, he adds, the Euphrates divides itself into two branches, of which the eastern goes to Selencia, and the western to Babylon. Probably the Sipphara of Ptolemy is the city of the Sipparenes mentioned by Abydemes, for whom he says Nebuchadnezzar caused a lake to be dug, and the water of the Euphrates turned into it. (Euseb. Præp. Evang. ix. 14.) R.]

SEPTUAGINT, the most ancient Greek version of the Scriptures. For a particular account of this, see the article VERSIONS.

SEPULCHRE, a place of burial. The Hebrews were always very careful about the burial of their dead. Many of their sepulchres were hewn in rocks; as that bought by Abraham for the burying of Sarah; (Gen. xxiii. 4, 6.) those of the kings of Judah and Israel; and that in which our Saviour was laid on mount Calvary. Sometimes their graves were dug in the ground; and commonly without their towns. Our Saviour (Matt. xxiii. 27.) says, that the Pharisees were like whited sepulchres, which appeared fine without, but inwardly were full of rottenness and corruption; and Lightfoot has shown, that every year, on the fifteenth of February, the Hebrews whitened them anew. In Luke (xi. 44.) Christ compares the Pharisees to "graves which appear not, so that men walk over them without being aware of it;" not knowing that these places are unclean; so that they contract an involuntary impurity. See BURIAL.

Mr. Taylor has devoted several Fragments to a consideration of the ancient sepulchres of various nations, and especially to the sepulchre of our Saviour on mount Calvary. He has collected much curious, and to the antiquarian and historian, much useful information; but a great deal of it is useless for the elucidation of Scripture. We shall make such selections as the nature of this work requires.

It is more than possible, that if we could discriminate accurately the meaning of words employed by the sacred writers, we should find them adapted with a surprising precision to the subjects on which they treat. Of this the various constructions of sepulchres might, probably, afford convincing evidence; and, perhaps, it is a leading idea in passages where it has not hitherto been observed. The numerous references in Scripture to sepulchres supposed to be well peopled, would be misapplied to nations which burned their dead, as the Greeks and Romans did; or to those who committed them to rivers, as the Hindoos; or to those who exposed them to birds of prey, as the Parsees: nor would the phrase "to go down to the sides of the pit" be strictly applicable to, or be, properly, descriptive of, that mode of burial which prevails among ourselves. Single graves, admitting one body only, in width, or in length, have no openings on the sides to which other bodies may be said to go down: nor are such excavated apartments customary in this country, as are found in the East.

Nor is it unlikely that the mode of burial is used as the means of distinction among certain nations or countries, by the sacred writers; as might be instanced in an almost singular passage of the prophet Ezekiel, chap. xxxii.

Son of man, lament over the multitude of Egypt,
And describe them as cast down, even herself,
And the daughters of the famous nations,
Unto the land of the regions below,
With them that go down to the pit.
Why wast thou so sprightly? in hopes of escaping,
Down; and lie with the uncircumcised:
In the midst of those slain by the sword, fall thou;
To the sword she is given;
Drag her down; and all her multitude shall follow.
The gods—heroes from the midst of the shades address him, with his coadjutors.
(They have (long since) gone down:
They lie uncircumcised, slain with the sword.)

Ashur is there, and all her assembly:
Encircling her in her sepulchral cavern;

All of them slain ; having fallen by the sword :
To whom are assigned each his grave, in the sides of the pit ;

So was her assembly around her sepulchre
(All of them slain, having fallen by the sword,)
Who communicated terror in the land of the living.
There is Elam and all her crowd, encircling her sepulchre ;

(All of them slain, having fallen by the sword ;)
Who have gone down uncircumcised into the regions below :

They communicated their terror in the land of the living,
Yet have they borne their shame with them that go down to the pit.

In the midst of the slain they have set her place of repose,

In the midst of her crowd, encircling her in her sepulchral cavern ;

All of them uncircumcised, slain by the sword ;
Although they caused terror in the land of the living,
Yet have they borne their shame with them that go down to the pit.

In the midst of the slain his place is appointed.

There is Meshech, Tubal, and all her multitude,
Her surrounding graves, her sepulchres ;
(All of them uncircumcised, slain by the sword ;)
Though they communicated their terror in the land of the living,

Yet they shall not lie with the heroes, the fallen of the uncircumcised,

Who [Meshech, Tubal] are gone down to the shades,
each with his weapons of war,

And they have given to their swords places under their heads ;

But their iniquities shall lie heavy upon their bones :
Though the terror of the mighty in the land of the living.

Yea, thou shalt be broken in the midst of the uncircumcised,

And shalt lie with those who are slain by the sword.

There is Edom, her kings, and all her princes, Which with their heroisms are given places beside those slain with the sword :

They shall lie down with the uncircumcised,
Even with them that go down to the pit.

There are the princes of the North [Zephon] all of them,

And all the Zidonians ;

Which are gone down with the slain, in their terrors,
Notwithstanding their heroisms they are ashamed ;
And they lie uncircumcised, among those slain by the sword,

And bear their confusion with those that go down to the pit.

These shall Pharaoh see,
And shall be comforted over all his multitude, slain
by the sword,

Pharaoh and all his army,
Saith the Lord God :

Because I have communicated my terror in the land
of the living ;

And have caused him to lie in the midst of the uncircumcised,

Among them who are slain by the sword,
Pharaoh, and all his multitude,

Saith the Lord God.

The changes of persons, and genders, and phrases in these verses are extremely perplexing, and equally unaccountable ; and a strict representation of the passage, verbatim, would be less intelligible than this looser version. Here we have Ashur or Assyria, Elam or Persia, Meshech and Tubal, the present Muscovy and Siberia, also Edom, the Zidonians and the countries adjacent, north of Sidon, perhaps as far as Antioch, &c. (certainly, not intending the north of Europe,)—and though the condition of these is described, generally, in nearly the same terms, yet there are remarkable variations introduced by the prophet. From the sepulchres of the kings, yet extant in Egypt, we know that the sovereigns were, as we may say, buried in society, many sepulchres encircling the area, and several chambers in one sepulchre. Of the Assyrian sepulchres we know but little, that country being almost new to our researches ; yet we have every reason to confide in the correctness of the prophet, who speaks of the sides of the pit (that is, the cells in those sides) as being inhabited. Persia, we know, cut sepulchres in rocks, of which evidences are yet remaining. Not so (probably) Meshech and Tubal ; they threw up vast barrows over their valiant leaders ; their followers who fell with them shared in the same highly raised mound : they made a point of honor of burying their weapons and military ornaments with the dead ; and their swords are found under the heads of their skeletons to this day :—Suaque arma viro, as Virgil speaks. Dr. Clarke's notices (and views) of the numerous barrows in the steppes of Russia, are sufficient evidence on this subject ; and the phrase "Iniquities (ravages, perhaps) shall lie heavy on their bones," is an allusion to the weight of earth under which they are deposited. It is the very contrary of the ancient wish ; "Light lie the earth upon thee." The sepulchres of Edom are illustrated by what our countrymen have found in the ancient Petra. The princes of the north of Syria and of Asia Minor have left wonderful proofs of their powers in excavating rocks, of which every day affords new discoveries. (See the publications of the Dilettanti Society of modern Travellers—Dr. Clarke, Burckhardt, Legh, Irby and Mangles, Beaumont, Walpole, &c.) Those of the Zidonians have been described by Maundrell, Shaw, and others. Dr. Shaw describes the cryptæ at Latikea, or Laodicea, in the northern part of Syria, as being sepulchral chambers, hollowed in the rocky ground, some of which are ten, others twenty or thirty, feet square, but not proportionate in height. The descent into them is artfully contrived. A range of narrow cells, wide enough to receive a sarcophagi, and long enough for two or three, runs along the sides of most of them, and appear to be the only provision that has been made for the reception of the dead. . . . The sepulchral chambers near Jebilee, Tortosa, and the Serpent mountain, together with those that are commonly called the Royal sepulchres at Jerusalem, are all of them exactly of the same workmanship and contrivance with the cryptæ of Latikea.

It is somewhat remarkable that the prophet omits the sovereign of Babylon. Was this because Babylon, being built on marshy ground, afforded no opportunity for excavating sepulchres in rocks ? It does not appear that such sepulchres could be formed in that city. What places of internment have hitherto been discovered, are in erections above ground. Mr. Rich mentions them ; but he found them in masses of brick work. Still, it is impossible to overlook the sublime ode of the prophet Isaiah, addressed to this potentate, an ode which has been often admired for its sublimity, chap. xiv. The prophet speaks of the king of Babylon as brought down to hell [the shades below] and to the sides of the pit. This, however, may be principally a poetical antithesis to the preceding verse, which records his desire of ascending above the heights of the clouds, and emulating the Most High. And, unless we take the passage in this qualified sense, we shall find it scarcely possible to reconcile it with the enlarged particulars in the following verses:—

All the kings of the nations—all of them
Lie in glory; every one in his own house—sepulchre,
But thou art cast out of thy grave, like an abominable branch;
Like the raiment of the slain, thrust through with a sword,
That go down to the stones of the pit;
As a carcass that is trodden under feet,
Thou shalt not be joined with them in burial.—

The strongest possible opposition is here intended by this elevated writer. Taking the sepulchre of Pharaoh Necho, as described by Belzoni, for an instance of the posthumous glory of the kings of the nations, of the house appertaining to each, respectively, we feel more sensibly the degradation of the monarch whose preponderance had been terrific to all his neighbors, and whose ambition urged him to aspire at divinity. The personification of Sheol, the region of the dead, appears to be more than ever striking; with the company roused to meet this dead monarch. The difference of personages imagined by these prophets as addressing the descending kings, would justify the investigation of critics, but demands a discussion too extensive for this place.

Dr. Clarke discovered, and has fully described, a number of sepulchres similar to those spoken of by Maundrell, which extend along the side of the ravine to the south-west and west of mount Sion. He describes them as a series of subterranean chambers, hewn with considerable art, each containing one or many repositories for the dead, like cisterns carved in the rock, upon the sides of the chambers. The doors are so low, that to look into any one of them, it is necessary to stoop, and in some instances to creep on hands and knees. (See Luke xxiv. 12.)

Mr. Maundrell's description of the sepulchre called that of the kings of Judah, may be useful for illustrating some passages of Scripture:—

“The next place we came to was those famous grotts called the sepulchres of the kings; but for what reason they go by that name is hard to resolve; for it is certain none of the kings, either of Israel or Judah, were buried here, the Holy Scripture assigning other places for their sepulchres: unless it may be thought perhaps that Hezekiah was here interred, and that these were the sepulchres of the sons of David, mentioned 2 Chron. xxxii. 33. Whoever was buried here, this is certain, that the place itself discovers so great an expense, both of labor and treasure, that we may well suppose it to have been the work of kings. You approach to it at the east side through an entrance cut out of the natural rock, which admits you into an open court of about forty paces square, cut down into the rock with which it is encompassed instead of walls. On the south side of the court is a portico nine paces long and four broad, hewn likewise out of the natural rock. This has a kind of architrave running along its front, adorned with sculpture, of fruits and flowers, still discernible, but by time much defaced. At the end of the portico, on the left hand, you descend to the passage into the sepulchres. The door is now so obstructed with stones and rubbish, that it is a thing of some difficulty to creep through it. But within you arrive in a large, fair room, about seven or eight yards square, cut out of the natural rock. Its sides and ceiling are so exactly square, and its angles so just, that no architect, with levels and plummets, could build a room more regular. And the whole is so firm and entire, that it may be called a chamber hollowed out of one piece of marble. From this room, you pass into, I think, six more, one within another, all of the same fabric with the first. Of these the two innermost are deeper than the rest, having a second descent of about six or seven steps into them. In every one of these rooms, except the first, were coffins of stone placed in niches in the sides of the chambers. They had been at first covered with handsome lids, and carved with garlands; but now most of them were broke to pieces, by sacrilegious hands.” (Travels, p. 76.)

The cave of Machpelah, which Abraham bought, (Gen. xxiii. 9.) was probably a double cave, an exterior chamber opening into another interior; not unlike those first described by Maundrell. If so, it might easily afterwards receive others of Abraham's family.

We have seen that these sepulchres are occasionally divided into chambers; and to such a chamber of death the wise man compares the chamber of the adulteress; (Prov. vii. 27.) “She causes to fall, like as, as surely as, many and great wounds cause him to fall who has received them: and even strong men are absolutely slain by her. The way to the sepulchre is her house, her first, or outer, chamber is like the open court that leads to the tomb; descending to the chambers of death” is the further entrance into her apartment: her private chamber, penetralia, is like a separate recess in a sepulchre. The writer varies this representation in chap. ix. 18, “And he (the thoughtless youth) is not aware that the Rephaim, giants, the most terrible of men, are there [in the house of the adulteress] inviting, calling him, soliciting him, to enter the tomb.” This is a bold prosopopeia, raising, as it were, the dead, which had been slain by means of prostitution, whose departed spirits entice the thoughtless youth to make one among them.

Some of the tombs in Egypt which Norden has copied, much resemble our country graves in England; some of them seem to be clusters of graves, occupied, it may be supposed, by individuals of the same family; others are buildings of at least one story in height, and, by their doors and windows, or openings, seem as if they might, on occasion, accommodate the living; as indeed we find by several travellers who have taken refuge in them that they do. This will elucidate the circumstances of the demoniaes, who dwelt among the tombs, (Matt. viii. 28, et al.) and we see how readily they might serve as habitations to those unhappy sufferers. They show, also, the propriety of our Lord's comparison of the Pharisees to whited, embellished, beautified, sepulchres; handsome without, but polluted within: and the opportunities which persons professing extraordinary zeal for God, or regard for his servants, might have, of "garnishing the sepulchres of the righteous," as well as of repairing, or "building, the tombs of the prophets;" (Matt. xxiii. 27.) while at the same time as they paid unsolicited, and even extravagant honors to the dead, they detracted, despised, or persecuted the living; who addressed them with messages of the divine will, with authority superior to that of those whom they professed, by such solicitous attentions, to admire and to venerate.

Some erection certainly, though probably of much smaller dimensions than many of these, did Jacob construct over the grave of Rachel; perhaps a simple pillar within an enclosure, Gen. xxxv. 20. That called the tomb of Rachel, near Bethlehem, has no just pretensions to such remote antiquity.

The reader will recollect the descriptive epithet of Job, (chap. xxx. 23.) which, perhaps, may be thus understood: "in like manner (that is, as the pillar of sand is dissolved) thou wilt turn my face, or direct my passage toward death; and toward the house which has long been, and ever is in continual preparation to receive all the living." Exactly conformable is the psalmist's idea: (v. 9.) "The throat of the wicked is an open sepulchre," ever ready to devour; constantly gaping to receive all comers: and to this Jeremiah very forcibly likens the quiver of the Chaldeans: "It is an open sepulchre"—certain death; insatiable; swallowing up all. Hell, the grave, and destruction, are never full, (Prov. xxvii. 20.) but keep continually crying, Give, give, ch. xxx. 15, 16.

The representations which Le Bruyn has given of some sepulchres, cut at considerable heights into the rock, at Naxi Rustam, near Persepolis, in Persia, shows that they must have been works of great labor and expense, beyond the powers of ordinary persons, and must have employed many laborers, and for a long time. Vain desire of somewhat permanent! Vain solicitude for a kind of terrestrial, posthumous immortality! This gives a spirit to the expostulation of the prophet Isaiah (chap. xxii. 16.) with Shebna the treasurer:—"What hast thou here? what lasting settlement dost thou expect? that thou hast hewn thee out a sepulchre, here, like as one heweth out at a great height his sepulchre; that cutteth out at a great expense a habitation, for himself, after death, a dwelling, a residence, in the solid rock: it shall be fruitless; for the Lord shall toss thee, as a ball, into a large country, where thou shalt die," &c. It may be thought, that Shebna had actually constructed a magnificent monument, sibi et suis, as the Latins speak: the contrast of such stability, with the rollings of a ball into a far country, is very strong. That Shebna meant to settle where he built his sepulchre; that he connected the idea of security with it, is very credible. Will this apply to the phraseology of Balaam: (Numb. xxiv. 21.) "He said of the Kenites, Strong is thy dwelling-place, where thou passest thy life: and thou placest in a rock thy nest, wherein thou dost propose to abide after thy decease, that is, thy sepulchre: notwithstanding this thou shalt be wasted," &c. It is by no means certain that this is the true sense; because, we often read in Scripture of inhabitants of rocks—nevertheless, this sense may be included; especially when we consider the strong affection of the orientals toward the places of sepulchre appropriated to their families. (See 2 Sam. xix. 33; Neh. ii. 3.)

From the general constructions of these sepulchres, we see the propriety of Scripture allusions to their various parts; as to the gates of hell—of hades, the unseen world; the lowest hell—hades, &c. We see also the attention bestowed on his sepulchre by the party himself, while living. It is very probable that sepulchres in gardens were generally cut into rocks; not dug (like graves) in the earth, but into the heart of a rock; hence Samuel was buried 'in his own house, that is, garden, probably, at Ramah, 1 Sam. xxv. 1. Manasseh was buried in the garden of his house, (2 Kings xxi. 18.) and (ver. 26.) Amon was buried in the sepulchre in the garden of Uzzah. Hence the sepulchre of Lazarus (John xi. 38.) is explained—distinguished—as being a cave; a chamber somewhat sunk into the ground; and hence, we find, Joseph of Arimathea had prepared his sepulchre in his garden, and had cut it into a rock; chamber within chamber, according to custom. See BURIAL.

It is customary, when a sepulchre is not in a garden, to surround it with fragrant herbs, flowers, &c.; hence the allusions to favorable situations for sepulchres, "The clods of the valley shall be sweet unto him."

If the reader will bear in mind these distinct kinds of sepulchres, he will find many places in Scripture become more intelligible by means of such discrimination, since what is descriptive of one kind, is inapplicable to others.

We find in Scripture various appellations given to the sepulchre; among others, that of the house appointed for all living—the long home of man—and the everlasting habitation. These are capable of much illustration from antiquity. The following are from Montfaucon: "We observed, in the fifth volume of our antiquity, a tomb, styled there, as here, Quietorium, a resting-place. There it is styled Clymenis Quietorium. Quiescere, to rest, is often said of the dead, in epitaphs. Thus we find, in an ancient writer, a man speaking of his master, who had been long dead and buried: Cujus ossa bene quiescant! May his bones rest in peace! We have an instance of the like kind in an inscription in Gruter, (p. 696.) and in another, (p. 954.) Fecit sibi quietorium; He made himself a RESTING-PLACE." (See Job iii. 13, 17, 18: xvii. 16.) "This resting-place is called frequently, too, AN ETERNAL HOUSE. 'In his life-time he built himself AN ETERNAL HOUSE,' says one epitaph, 'He made himself AN ETERNAL HOUSE with his patrimony,' says another. 'He thought it better (says another epitaph) to build himself AN ETERNAL HOUSE, than to desire his heirs to do it;' and another, 'He put an inscription upon HIS ETERNAL HOUSE.' And another, 'He made a PERPETUAL HOUSE for his good and amiable companion.' They thought it a misfortune, when the bones and ashes of the dead were removed from their place, as imagining the dead suffered something by the removal of their bones. This notion occasioned all those precautions used for the safety of their tombs, and the curses they laid on those who removed them."

This may be further illustrated by reference to those inscriptions on the tombs at Palmyra, which have been explained by Mr. Swinton; (Phil. Trans. vol. liii. p. 276, &c.) and it is important to remark, that the Palmyrenians were so strongly assimilated to the Jewish nation, as to be all but Jews in many of their peculiarities, as they really were Jews in some of them.

Solomon (Ecc. xii. 5.) calls the tomb (בית עלים, beth olam) the house of ages, or of long duration; and Mr. Swinton reads the beginning of a Punic inscription, found in the island of Malta, thus: (הדר בית עלים, heder beth olam) the chamber of long home. [This] "chamber of the house of ages [or the long home] is the sepulchre of an upright man deposited [here] in a most sound sleep.—The people, having a great affection for him, were vastly concerned when Hannibal, the son of Barmelec, was interred." This is the very expression of Solomon, and justifies the sense of the words, as used in our version. It is worthy of observation, too, that the figure to denote death is—a deep sleep; a sound sleep. In this sense our Lord spake, "Our friend Lazarus sleepeth; I go to awake him out of sleep (and this gives the spirit of the disciples' answer, "Lord, if he sleep, he shall do well;" sound sleep being a favorable symptom in sick persons.) "The maid is not dead, but sleepeth," &c. The word sleep, we suppose, was capable of so much ambiguity, as not instantly, or infallibly, to strike our Lord's hearers in the sense he intended by it.

The sepulchre, or tomb, of our Lord Jesus Christ was on mount Calvary, north-west of Jerusalem, and was, as already observed, hewn out of a rock, John xix. 41. What is now shown for it, is a kind of small chamber, the interior of which is almost square; its height from bottom to top is eight feet one inch, its length six feet one inch, and its breadth fifteen feet ten inches. The entrance, which looks towards the east, is but four feet high, and two feet four inches wide. The place where the body of our Saviour is said to have been laid, takes up one side of this cave; it is raised from the ground to the height of two feet four inches; its length is five feet eleven inches, and its breadth two feet eight inches, placed lengthwise from east to west, and is incrustated with white marble. Dr. Clarke has contested the location of our Lord's sepulchre in this place, but his objections have been replied to in the article CALVARY.

I. SERAIAH, a scribe, i. e. secretary of state, or register, to David, 2 Sam. viii. 17.

II. SERAIAH, father of Ezra, Ezra vii. 1. Several other persons of this name occur.

SERAPHIM denotes a kind of angels, which encircle the throne of the Lord. Those described by Isaiah (ch. vi. 2.) had each six wings; with two of which he covered his face, with two his feet, and with the two others flew. They cried to one another, and said, "Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of Hosts! the whole earth is full of his glory!"

SERGEANTS, (Acts xvi. 35) properly Roman victors, public servants who bore a bundle of rods before the magistrates of cities and colonies as insignia of their office, and who executed the sentences which they pronounced. (See Adam's Rom. Antiq. p. 178.) R.

SERGEUS PAULUS, proconsul or governor of the isle of Cyprus, was converted by the ministry of Paul, A. D. 44, or 45, Acts xiii. 7.

SERPENT. The craft and subtlety of this reptile are frequently dwelt on in the sacred writings, as qualities by which it is eminently distinguished. Moses says it was more subtle than any beast of the field which the Lord God had made; (Gen. iii. 1.) and our Saviour points to its wisdom as furnishing a model for imitation to his disciples, Matt. x. 16. We may enumerate seven kinds of serpents as known to the Hebrews, as follow: (1.) ΕΡΠΗΗ, ἕρπης, the viper, Isa. lix. 5. (2.) ΑCΗΣΗΒ, ἄκησεβ, the adder, Ps. cxl. 3. (3.) ΡΕΘΗΗ, ῥεθη, the adder, Ps. lviii. 4. (4.) ΤΖΕΡΦΑ, τζεφ, or ζεφτι, ΤΖΕΡΦΟΝΙ, not the fabulous cockatrice, but a common serpent, Isa. xi. 8. (5.) ΚΙΡΡΟΣ, κερ, according to Bochart, the Acontias, or dart-snake, Isa. xxxiv. 15. (6.) ΣΗΡΗΦΙΦΟΝ, σηρηφιφον, the Cerastes, Gen. xlix. 17. (7.) The ΣΑΡΑΦΗ, σαρη, a flying serpent, Numb. xxi. 8.

Some of these Mr. Taylor has illustrated; the others continue obscure.

(1.) The Ephēh, of the Hebrews, he takes to be the El Effah of the Arabs; of which Mr. Jackson observes, in his account of Morocco, "It is the name of a serpent remarkable for its quick and penetrating poison; it is about two feet long, and as thick as a man's arm, beautifully spotted with yellow and brown, and sprinkled over with blackish specks, similar to the horn-nosed snake. They have a wide mouth, by which they inhale a great quantity of air, and when inflated therewith, they eject it with such force as to be heard at a considerable distance. These mortal enemies to mankind are collected by the Aisawie [serpent-conjurers] in a desert of Suse, where their holes are so numerous, that it is difficult for a horse to pass over it without stumbling."

(2.) The Pethen is in all probability the Bætæn of the Arabs: it is described by M. Forskal as being "wholly spotted (in blotches) black and white. A foot in length; nearly two inches thick; oviparous. Its bite is instant death; the body of the wounded person swells greatly." See ASP.

Having suggested the idea that this Bætæn is the Peten of the Hebrew Scriptures, Mr. Taylor suggests that it may be strongly related to, if not a variety of, the Coluber Lebitinus of Linnæus; and under that persuasion, he extracts first M. Forskal's description of this serpent, and then adds something from Hasselquist. Linnæus was the first naturalist who mentioned it. The length of its body less than a cubit; its tail four inches; toward the neck thinner, an inch and a half thick. Head broad, depressed, subcordated. Scales of the back obtuse-oval, flat, a ridge rising in the middle, carinated. Back rising in dos d'ane [not round.] Color, upper part gray, or dinarily four transverse bands, alternately crossing. The middle of them verging to yellow, but the sides to deep brown, or black. Underneath whitish, and closely spotted with black dots. Scuta abdom. 152. Squamæ caud. 43." "Obs. Its bite produces lethargy, is fatal and incurable. Two of these serpents were sent me from Cyprus, by my friend Petr. Sjelvi, interpreter to the French embassy at Cairo. The species is not [but] small: is it therefore the Aspic of the ancients? so it is now called by the literati of Cyprus; but the common people call it Kufi, (κουφι,) deaf." (Forskal.) Hasselquist says, "I saw two kinds of vipers at Cyprus, one called Aspic, of which it is said, (1.) that it contains a venom so penetrating as to produce a universal gangrene, of which a man dies in a few hours; (2.) that the better to catch his prey, it takes the color of the ground on which it lies. They said of the other, (1.) that it has a great antipathy to the former, and destroys it; (2.) that they eat one another; (3.) that they feed on larks, sparrows, &c. of which I myself am witness." These serpents, Mr. Taylor thinks, are not unlike in size to the Bætan; one is a foot in length, the other is under eighteen inches; one is nearly two inches thick, the other, where narrow, one and a half. One is spotted, black and white, the other is gray, black and white in bands. Both are fatal. The gangrene follows their venom, as in other serpents. The epithet deaf is observable; for in Ps. lviii. 4, deafness is ascribed to the Peten. It is also mentioned in Job xx. 14.

(3.) The Sârâph, or flying serpent, derives its name from a root which signifies to burn, either on account of its vivid fiery color, or from the heat and burning pain occasioned by its bite. In Numb. xxi. 6, &c. we read that these venomous creatures were employed by God to chastise the unbelieving and rebellious Israelites, in consequence of which many of them died, the rest being saved from the effects of the calamitous visitation, through the appointed medium of the brazen serpent, which Moses was enjoined to raise upon a pole in the midst of the camp, and which was a striking type of the promised Saviour, John iii. 14, 15. In Isa. xiv. 29, and chap. xxx. 6, the same word, with an additional epithet, is used, and is translated in our Bible "fiery flying serpents;" and if we may rely on the testimony of the ancients a cloud of witnesses may be produced, who speak of these flying or winged serpents, although we do not find that any of them affirm they actually saw such alive and flying. Michaëlis, however, was so far influenced by these testimonies, that in his eighty-third question, he recommends it to travellers to inquire after the existence and nature of flying serpents. In conformity with these instructions, Niebuhr communicated the following information: (Description de l'Arabie, p. 186.) "There is at Bakra a sort of serpents which they call Heie sursurie, or Heie thiâre. They commonly keep upon the date-trees; and, as it would be laborious for them to come down from a very high tree in order to ascend another, they twist themselves by the tail to a branch of the former, which, making a spring by the motion they give it, throw themselves to the second. Hence it is that the modern Arabs call them flying serpents, Heie thiâre. I know not whether the ancient Arabs of whom Michaëlis speaks in his eighty-third question, saw any other flying serpents." Niebuhr refers also to lord Anson's report of flying serpents in the island of Quibo. The passage is as follows: "The Spaniards, too, informed us, that there was often found in the woods a most mischievous serpent, called the flying snake, which, they said, darted itself from the boughs of trees on either man or beast that came within its reach, and whose sting they took to be inevitable death." (Voyage, by Walter, p. 308. 8vo. 1748.) After citing these passages, we may conclude that the sârâph meôphêph mentioned in the passages we have referred to, was of that species of serpent, which, from their swift darting motion, the Greeks called Acontias, and the Romans Jaculus; and to these the term meôphêph seems as properly applicable in Hebrew, as Volucer, which Lucan applies to them in Latin, Jaculique volucres.

(4.) The Cerastes, or Horned Viper, is among the most deadly of the serpent tribe, and is distinguished by the peculiarity of its horns. It is numerous in Egypt and Syria, so that it could not escape the notice and allusions of the sacred writers. Mr. Bruce has published a figure of this serpent, with a considerable account of its manners, part of which we shall extract. He says "There is no article of natural history the ancients have dwelt on more than that of the viper, whether poets, physicians, or historians. All have enlarged on the particular sizes, colors, and qualities, yet the knowledge of their manners is but little extended.

"I have travelled across the Cyrenaicum in all directions, and never saw but one species of viper, which was the Cerastes, or Horned Viper; neither did I ever see any of the snake kind that could be mistaken for the viper. . . . One name under which the Cerastes goes, is equivocal, and has been misunderstood in Scripture; that is, tseboa, which name is given it in Hebrew from its different colors and spots. And hence the Greeks have called it by the name of hyæna, because it is of the same reddish color, marked with black spots, as that quadruped is. And the same fable is applied to the serpent and the quadruped, that they change their sex yearly. . . . The Cerastes hides itself all day in holes in the sand, where it lives in contiguous and similar houses to those of the jerboa; and I have already said, that I never but once found any animal in this viper's belly but one jerboa in a gravid female Cerastes.

"The Cerastes moves with great rapidity, and in all directions, forwards, backwards and sideways. When he inclines to surprise any one who is too far from him, he creeps with his side towards the person, and his head averted, till, judging his distance, he turns round, springs upon him, and fastens upon the part next to him; for it is not true what is said, that the Cerastes does not leap or spring. I saw one of them at Cairo, in the house of Julian and Rosa, crawl up the side of a box, in which there were many, and there lie still as if hiding himself, till one of the people who brought them to us came near him, and, though in a very disadvantageous posture, sticking, as it were, perpendicular to the side of the box, he leaped near the distance of three feet, and fastened between the man's fore finger and thumb, so as to bring the blood.

"Of the incantation of serpents, there is no doubt of its reality. The Scriptures are full of it. All that have been in Egypt have seen as many different instances as they chose. Some have doubted that it was a trick, and that the animals so handled had been trained, and then disarmed of their power of hurting; and, fond of the discovery, they have rested themselves upon it, without experiment, in the face of all antiquity. But I will not hesitate to aver, that I have seen at Cairo (and this may be seen daily without trouble or expense) a man who came from above the catacombs, where the pits of the mummy-birds are kept, who has taken a Cerastes with his naked hand from a number of others lying at the bottom of the tub, has put it upon his bare head, covered it with the common red cap he wears, then taking it out, put it in his breast, and tied it about his neck like a necklace; after which it has been applied to a hen, and bit it, which has died in a few minutes; and, to complete the experiment, the man has taken it by the neck, and beginning at its tail, has ate it as one would do a carrot or a stock of celery, without any seeming repugnance. . . . I can myself vouch, that all the black people in the kingdom of Sennaar, whether Funge or Nuba, are perfectly armed against the bite of either scorpion or viper. They take the Cerastes in their hand at all times, put them in their bosoms, and throw them to one another, as children do apples or balls, without having irritated them by this usage so much as to bite." See INCHANTMENTS.

The Cerastes is well known under the name of "Horned Viper," and is distinguished by two small horns, one over each eye. It was adopted as a hieroglyphic among the Egyptians, and appears not only on obelisks, columns of temples, statues, and walls of palaces, but on mummies also.

The Cerastes have always been considered as extremely cunning, both in escaping their enemies, and in seizing their prey; they have been named insidious; and it is reported of them that they hide themselves in holes adjacent to the highways, and in the ruts of wheels, in order more suddenly to spring upon passengers.

Calmet, as we have seen, thinks the Shephiphôn, to which the tribe of Dan is compared, (Gen. xlix. 17.) might be the Cerastes; and it is so rendered by the Vulgate. Michaëlis observes, that this serpent is called by the orientals, "the liar in ambush." Pliny says, that "the Cerastes hides its whole body in the sand, leaving only its horns exposed; which attract birds, who suppose them to be grains of barley, till they are undeceived, too late, by the darting of the serpent upon them."

Michaëlis, however, finds a difficulty in the mode of attack used by the Hebrew Shephiphôn on "the heels of a horse, so as to make his rider fall backward." He supposes that the phrase restrictively means, that the horse throws the rider off behind him; and says, "I should be curious to know how that is accomplished. Commentators commonly say, because the horse rears up when wounded in the heel. Perhaps they are bad horsemen. In such circumstances, a horse would kick rather than rear up on his hind legs; and the rider would be thrown over his neck, rather than over the crupper." Mr. Taylor admits the force of this observation, and therefore doubts whether the word rendered backward should be restrictively so taken. He proposes to explain the phrase by supposing, that when the Cerastes bites the horse in one of his legs, the horse kicking out that leg, and his rider perceiving the cause, would, to avoid the serpent, throw himself off on the further side of the horse from where the serpent was; and this, he thinks, sufficiently meets the meaning of the Hebrew word.

There is another circumstance in which Dan probably resembled the Cerastes—that of feeding full, and then sinking into torpidity. The inducements held out by the spies of the Danites, (Judg. xviii. 9, 10,) are precisely adapted to a tribe of this character; and the end of this chapter informs us, that they set up the graven image, had their priests, and here they remained, "till the day of the captivity of the land," that is, distant from interference with the general affairs of Israel, and determinately settled, apart from their brethren. (See verses 7, 28.)

For an account of the other serpents enumerated above, the reader is referred to the respective articles.

Interpreters have largely speculated concerning the nature of that serpent which tempted Eve: Some have thought, that serpents originally had feet and speech; but there is no probability that this creature was ever otherwise than it now is. Besides, it cannot be doubted, but that by the serpent, (Nachash;) we are to understand the devil, who merely employed the serpent as a vehicle to seduce the first woman, Gen. iii. 13. (See BALAAM.) In the curse of God on the serpent, he told him that the seed of the woman should bruise his head; (Rôsh;) because, the serpent having his heart under his throat, the readiest way to kill him is to crush or cut off his head.

Another part of the curse was, that it should feed on dust, Gen. iii. 14. Isaiah also says, (lxv. 15.) "Dust shall be the serpent's meat." And Micah, (vii. 37.) "They shall lick the dust like a serpent." It is true, that serpents eat flesh, birds, frogs, fish, fruits, grass, &c. But as they continually creep on the earth, it is impossible but that their food must often be defiled with dust and dirt. Some may really eat earth, out of necessity; or earth-worms, which they cannot swallow without much dirt.

The worship of the serpent is observable through all pagan antiquity. The Babylonians, in Daniel's time, worshipped a dragon, which was demolished by this prophet. It is well known that worship was paid to the serpent at Epidaurus; also the manner in which they pretended he was brought to Rome. The Egyptians sometimes represented their gods with the bodies of serpents; and they paid an idolatrous worship to those odious and dangerous creatures, which they called their good geniuses. They regarded them as symbols of medicine, of the sun, of Apollo. They were committed to the charge of Ceres and Proserpine; and Herodotus says that in his time, near Thebes, were to be seen tame serpents, consecrated to Jupiter.

One would have supposed, says Mr. Taylor, remarking upon this custom, that the entire brood of the serpent would have been execrated, and abhorred by all mankind; and that the mere proposal to worship this reptile would have raised the detestation of the whole human race; but fact justifies us in saying, that no kind of worship has been more popular. How can this be accounted for? This he proceeds to investigate, by considering, (1.) The serpent as denoting or producing evil: (2.) The serpent as denoting or producing good; which, contradictory as it may appear, yet is founded on fact. (3.) The serpent as denoting a family or nation; and, (4.) The serpent as denoting a being of supernatural powers.

That the serpent tribe, from possessing the most active powers of destruction, has been considered as a source of evil, or as producing calamity, is well known. In India the destroying power, or death, is signified by the serpent. In classic antiquity, the giants who attempted to scale heaven are figured as half serpents; and in the northern mythology, Lok, the genius of evil, is styled "the father of the great serpent: the father of death; the adversary, the accuser; the deceiver of the gods," &c. (Northern Antiq. vol. ii. p. 190.) The coincidence of these titles with those of the Satan of Scripture is very striking. Scripture descriptions of the serpent are notoriously applicable to a producer of evil.

On the other hand, the serpent has always been admired for its motion; possessing neither hands nor feet, nor other exterior members adapted for making progress, its action is nevertheless agile, speedy, and even rapid; it springs, leaps, and bounds, or climbs and glides, not merely with ease, but with alacrity. Solomon observes this, in Prov. xxx. 19, and others have equally remarked it as exciting surprise and wonder. The serpent, also, sheds its skin yearly, and after this mutation seems, by the splendor of its colors, and the vivacity of its motions, to have acquired new life.

The serpent is still domesticated in many of the dwellings of the natives of Eastern India; and the ladies of Western Africa carry him in their bosoms. It is true, the serpent tribe divides into those which are harmless, and those which are malignant; but the malignant in India, at least, enjoy equal privileges with the harmless. Pausanias says, "All the dragons, [large serpents,] and particularly that species which is of the clearest yellow, are esteemed sacred to Esculapius, and are familiar with mankind." (Lib. ii. cap. 23.) Pliny also speaks of the Esculapian snake, which is commonly fed, and resident in houses, &c. (Lib. xxix. cap. 4.) Esculapius was adored in Epidaurus under the form of a serpent; under which form he is said to have been brought to Rome, A. U. 463. The Egyptians, as we have said, had a small serpent which they called Agathodemon, that is, "good genius;" and Eusebius says the same of the Phœnicians.

From these and many other instances which might be referred to, it is evident that the serpent has been acknowledged under the contradictory characters of a promoter of good, and a promoter of evil; and has also been regarded as belonging to a rank of beings superior to man.

That Scripture usually presents the serpent under an evil designation is admitted; but possibly those embarrassments which have arisen from the history of the brazen serpent in the wilderness, might be removed, by accepting the benevolent character of the serpent. Why must his malignant powers be presented to us, when considering this instance of sanative virtue? Why should Israel be prohibited from considering him (symbolically) in the same light as other nations then and afterwards did? Why should he not be saviour to them, on this occasion, (symbolically,) as well as to Gentiles? Why may not Moses adopt the favorable notion of this reptile, as well as the unfavorable? Did not all antiquity do the same? And if all antiquity did so, why should we be startled at it here? We know well, that when pressed, by enemies to revelation, to explain how the serpent, the very essence of evil, could, on this occasion, be connected with the idea of restoration, Christian divines have given various answers, on other principles; all of which may be proper; nor are they superseded by this favorable reference of the symbol. If this be admitted, then we may discern, as Mr. Taylor observes, greater propriety in our Lord's allusion to this history than we have previously been aware of. "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up,"—add, "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw ALL men to me"—meaning, "They shall look unto ME, and be saved, even all the ends of the earth." Not merely the Jewish nation, to whom, in one instance, a symbolic serpent proved salutary, but the Gentiles also; ALL men; those who have been used to consider the serpent as a good genius, who have adopted it as their ensign and distinction, they shall in future "look to ME and be saved."

SERUG, the son of Reu, and father of Nahor, Gen. xi. 20—23.

SERVANT. This word, in Scripture, generally signifies a slave; because, among the Hebrews, and the neighboring nations, the greater part of the servants were such, belonging absolutely to their masters, who had a right to dispose of their persons, goods, and, in some cases, even of their lives. See SLAVE.

Sometimes, however, the word merely denotes a man who voluntarily dedicates himself to the service of another. Thus, Joshua was the servant of Moses, Elisha of Elijah, Gehazi of Elisha, and Peter, Andrew, Philip, &c. were servants of Jesus Christ. The servants of Pharaoh, of Saul, and of David, were their subjects in general; and their domestics in particular. So the Philistines, Syrians, and other nations were servants of David; i. e. they obeyed and paid him tribute.

The servants of God are those who are devoted to his service, and obey his written word.

SETH, a son of Adam and Eve, was born A. M. 130, (Gen. v. 3, 6, 10, 11.) and at the age of 125 begat Enos. He died A. M. 1042, and was the chief of "the children of God," (Gen. vi. 2.) who preserved the true religion and piety, which the descendants of Cain had abandoned.

SEVEN. As from the beginning this was the number of days in the week, so it has ever in Scripture a sort of emphasis attached to it, and is very often and generally used as a round number, or, as some would say, a perfect number. Clean beasts were taken into the ark by sevens, Gen. vii. The years of plenty and famine in Egypt were marked by sevens, Gen. xli. With the Jews, not only was there a seventh day sabbath, but every seventh year was a sabbath, and every seven times seventh year was a jubilee. Their great feasts of unleavened bread and of tabernacles, were observed for seven days; the number of animals in many of their sacrifices was limited to seven. The golden candlestick had seven branches. Seven priests with seven trumpets went around the walls of Jericho seven days; and seven times seven on the seventh day. In the Apocalypse we find seven churches addressed; seven candlesticks, seven spirits, seven stars, seven seals, seven trumpets, seven thunders, seven vials, seven plagues, and seven angels to pour them out.

Seven is often put for any round or whole number, just as we use ten, or a dozen. (So in Matt. xii. 45; 1 Sam. ii. 5; Job v. 19; Prov. xxvi. 16, 25; Isa. iv. 1; Jer. xv. 9.) In like manner seven times or seven fold means often, abundantly, completely, Gen. iv. 15, 24; Lev. xxvi. 24; Ps. xii. 6; lxxix. 12; Matt. xviii. 21. And seventy times seven is still a higher superlative, Matt. xviii. 22. *R.

SUAALABBIN, or SHAALBIN, a city of Dan, (Josh. xix. 42.) adjoining to Ajalon and Heres, (Judg. i. 35.) and near the cities of Makas and Bethshemesh.

SHAARAIM, a city of Simeon, (1 Chron. iv. 31.) apparently the Sharaïm of Judah, (Josh. xv. 36.) which was transferred to Simeon.

SHADDAI, one of the Hebrew names of God, which the LXX and Jerome generally translate Almighty. Job more frequently uses it than any other of the sacred writers. It is sometimes joined with El, which is another name of God, El-Shaddai, God-Almighty, Gen. xvii. 1.

Shaddai has been derived from the Arabic شَدَّ, to ascend, or sit in the highest place; and in this view it is synonymous with (שָׁרַיִם) Most High. It has also been derived from שָׁרַיִם, to prevail; which sense the Vulgate and our translators give, Gen. xvii. 1. Others derive it from שָׁרַיִם, he that is sufficient, all-bountiful, or all-sufficient. These derivations are far more suitable than that from שָׁרַיִם, to destroy, which Calmet adopts. But it seems the most natural to take the word שָׁרַיִם as the pluralis excellentiæ, of the singular form שָׁרַיִם, mighty; cognate with the Arabic shadid, שָׁרַיִם, mighty, violent.

SHADOW, the privation of light by an object interposed between a luminary and the surface on which the shadow appears. But it is credible that what we call spots in the sun are alluded to in 1 John i. 5, under the term shadows, or darkness; such defects, says the apostle, may be in the sun, but there are none in God. A shadow, falling on a plane, follows the course of the body which causes it: hence it is often extremely swift, as that of a bird flying, which very rapidly, indeed instantly, appears, and disappears from observation; human life is compared to this, 1 Cor. xxix. 15.

As the shadow of a man, &c. when it falls on the ground, is of different lengths at different times of the day, and as the time of the day was originally estimated by this, the first sun-dial, so it is very natural that the hireling, who wished his day of labor ended, should desire the shadow, (Job vii. 2.) meaning the long shadow falling on the ground, and issuing in the shadow of night itself. Indeed, it seems to have been customary in later ages, to estimate the time of the day by the length of the shadow; so we have in Aristophanes, Concion: "When the letter of the alphabet denoted the shadow to be ten feet long, it was time to think of dressing and going to supper," that is, the sun began to grow low; for twelve feet was the full length of the shadow. (Comp. Ps. cii. 11; Jer. vi. 4.)

An Arab, when relating the history of his day's march, says, "We started at day-break, we rested at noon near the water, we set out again, when a man's shadow was equal to his length, and after sunset we alighted and slept, in such or such a place." This is still the eastern phraseology, as remarked by Burekhardt, Trav. vol. i. p. 480.

Shadow is also taken for unsubstantial; so Job says, "My members are a shadow;" (xvii. 7.) that is, they are diminished to a total, or comparative, privation of substance. Hence, the Mosaic economy is called a shadow, a very obscure representation of things, which in the gospel are clearly revealed. But it is thought that this word (Heb. x. 1.) alludes to the sketch of an artist or painter, who first forms (with chalk) on his canvass, the rude outlines of his subject, a just visible, rough, merely indicative representation of what is to be afterwards finished correctly and carefully. To this is strongly opposed the complete image, the beautiful statue exhibited in the gospel; yet this statue, be it remembered, is not living, not animated; the full perfection of life, motion, sensibility and happiness is reserved for the world of bliss and glory, the celestial state.

Shadow is taken for the obscurity of night, for the total absence of light in a night of clouds; and hence "the shadow of death," intense darkness; to which add, the horror which naturally attends the tomb, and the unexplored regions of death; the valley of the shadow of death; gloom and dismal terrors, terrors fatal and perpetual.

Shadow is also taken in a sense directly contrary to this, because in countries near the tropics, every spot exposed to the burning heat of the sun is dangerous to health, therefore nothing is more acceptable than shade, nothing more refreshing, or more salutary; hence the shadow of a great rock is desirable in a land of weariness; (Isa. xxxii. 2.) hence shadow signifies protection; (Isa. xxx. 2; Dan. iv. 12; Hos. iv. 13.) hence the shadow of wings in a bird is protection also, and hence the shadow, that is, protection of God, (Ps. xvii. 8; lxiii. 7; xci. 1; Isa. xlix. 2. Perhaps the word shade, however, might in these places be preferable to shadow, and would preserve a distinction.

SHADRACH, the Chaldean name given to Ananias, a companion of Daniel, at the court of Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. i. 7. See ANANIAS.

SHALISHA, or BAAL-SHALISA, is mentioned in 1 Sam. ix. 4, and Baal-shalisha, 2 Kings iv. 42. It was fifteen miles from Diospolis, in the canton Thamnitica, north of Jerusalem. See BAAL-SHALISHA.

I. SHALLUM of Naphtali, chief of the family, Numb. xxvi. 49.

II. SHALLUM, son of Jabesh, or a native of Jabesh, who treacherously killed Zechariah, king of Israel, and usurped his kingdom. He held it only one month, when Menahem, son of Gadi, killed him in Samaria. Scripture says, that Shallum was the executioner of the threatenings of the Lord, against the house of Jehu, 2 Kings xv. 10. A. M. 3232.

III. SHALLUM, son of Tikvah, or Tickvath, or native of Tickvah, husband of the prophetess Huldah, who lived under Josiah, king of Judah, 2 Kings xxii. 14.

IV. SHALLUM, fourth son of Josiah, king of Judah, (1 Chron. iii. 15; Jer. xxii. 11.) and the same as Jehoahaz, was made king after the death of Josiah. The king of Egypt carried him prisoner into Egypt, 2 Kings xxiii. 30, 31, 34. See JEHOAHAZ.

V. SHALLUM, son of the high-priest Zadok, and uncle of Hilkiah the high-priest, 1 Chron. vi. 12, 13. He is called Meshallum in 1 Chron. ix. 11. He lived in the time of Hezekiah or of Ahaz. He seems to be the Salom of Baruch i. 7.

VI. SHALLUM, son of Korah, 1 Chron. ix. 19, 31. He was spared in the desert, when the earth opened and swallowed up his father, Numb. xvi. 31. His descendants had an office in the temple, to take care of the cakes that were fried there.—There are several other persons of the same name mentioned in the Old Testament; but nothing is known of them.

SHALMANESER, king of Assyria, succeeded Tiglath-pileser, and had Sennacherib for his successor. He ascended the throne A. M. 3276, reigned 14 years, and died A. M. 3290, 2 Kings xvii. 3. It is probable that he is called Enemessar, in the Greek of Tobit, (i. 2.) and Shalman, in Hosea x. 14. Scripture reports that he came into Palestine, subdued Samaria, and obliged Hoshea, son of Elah, to pay him tribute; but in the third year, being weary of this exaction, Hoshea combined secretly with So, king of Egypt, to remove the subjection. Shalmaneser brought an army against him, ravaged Samaria, besieged Hoshea in his capital; and notwithstanding his long resistance three years, (2 Kings xvii. xviii. 9, 10.) he took the city, put Hoshea into bonds, and carried away the people beyond the Euphrates. He thus ruined the city and kingdom of Samaria, which had subsisted 254 years, from A. M. 3030, to 3283.

Profane authors say, that this prince made war against the Tyrians. That Eleleus, king of Tyre seeing the Philistines were much weakened by their war with Hezekiah, king of Judah, took this opportunity of recovering to his obedience the city of Gath, which had revolted from him. The Gittites, fearing the power of the king of Tyre, had recourse to Shalmaneser, who marched with all his forces against the Tyrians. At his approach, the city of Sidon, Akko, afterwards Ptolemais, (now Acre,) and the other maritime cities of Phenicia, submitted to him. The Tyrians, however, with only twelve ships, having in a sea-fight defeated the united fleet of the Assyrians and Phenicians, acquired so great a reputation at sea, and became so formidable, that Shalmaneser durst no more engage them by sea. He withdrew, therefore, into his own dominions, but left a great part of his army to besiege Tyre. The besiegers made but a slow progress, in consequence of the brave resistance of the besieged. The troops of Shalmaneser stopped up the aqueducts, and cut the pipes that brought the water into the city, which reduced the Tyrians to the last extremity, but they dug wells, and by this means held out five years longer. In the mean time, Shalmaneser dying, they were delivered from the siege. Usher places this siege A. M. 3287. See AS-SYRIA, p. 114.

SHAME, a bashfulness arising from a self-conviction of guilt; an affliction of mind, occasioned by a sense of impropriety, whether of conduct or of appearance. This is the natural consequence of proper reflection on past misconduct, behavior, or turpitude of any kind. Shame in this sense is an expression of uneasiness. Shame is also an expression of contempt from others, a charge of misconduct, of impropriety, from some who endeavor to bring to shame, to render ashamed, the subject of their charge, whether such a charge be true or false.

Shame denotes an idol; a thing which will make ashamed those who trust in it; and of which they ought to be ashamed, even while they worship it. For the import of that shame, see BAAL-PEOR.

To uncover the shame, ignominy, or nakedness of a person, are synonymous terms, Lev. xviii. 15, 17, &c. Isaiah (xx. 4.) threatens the Egyptians, that they should be led away captive, without any thing to cover their shame or nakedness. The golden calf worshipped by the Israelites in the wilderness, is called by Moses, (Exod. xxxii. 25.) a filthy shame, an idol of dross and filth. Paul (Rom. i. 26.) calls shameful or vile affections, those ignominious and brutish passions, which were indulged by the carnal pagans. Prov. iii. 35, "Shame shall be the promotion of fools;" that is, their promotion shall be their own shame, and the disgrace of those who promote them. Prov. ix. 7, "He that reproveth a scorner, getteth to himself shame;" he loses his labor, and shall only get discredit or calumny, abuse and disgrace, a retort neither courteous nor considerate. Ps. lxxxiii. 16, "Fill their faces with shame;" reprove them, O Lord, and then let them fall into disgrace. When the Syrians took king Joash captive, they executed shameful judgments against him; they treated him shamefully, made him suffer corrections that were shameful, not befitting the dignity of a king, 2 Chron. xxiv. 24.

SHAMGAR, son of Anath, the third judge of Israel; after Ehud, and before Barak, Judg. iii. 31. Scripture only says that he defended Israel, and killed six hundred Philistines with an ox goad. From the peace obtained by Ehud, (A. M. 2679,) whom Shamgar succeeded, till the servitude under the Canaanites, A. M. 2699, are twenty years.

SHAMHUTH of Israh, a general of David and Solomon, who commanded 24,000 men, 1 Chron. xvii. 8.

I. SHAMIR, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 48. Some copies of the LXX read Saphir instead of Shamir.

II. SHAMIR, a city of Ephraim, in the mountains of this tribe, where dwelt Tola, judge of Israel, Judg. x. 1.

SHAMMAI, son of Rekem, and father of Maon, (1 Chron. ii. 44.) a city of Arabia Petrea, near Bethshur, on the south of Judah.

SHAPHAN, son of Azaliah, secretary of the temple in the time of Josiah, 2 Kings xxii. 12; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 20; Jer. xxix. 3; xxxvi. 1; Ezek. viii. 11. Shaphan informed Josiah of the discovery of the book of the law of the Lord in the temple. We find several sons of Shaphan, viz. Abikim, Elasa, Gama-riah and Jezoniah; but we cannot say they are all sons of the same Shaphan.

I. SHAPHAT, of Abel-meholah; father of the prophet Elisha, 1 Kings xix. 16; 2 Kings iii. 11.

II. SHAPHAT, son of Shemaiah, (1 Chron. iii. 22.) of the royal family of David, by Jechemiah.

III. SHAPHAT, son of Adlai, who had the chief care of David's cattle in Basan, 1 Chron. xxvii. 29.

SHAPHER, a mountain in the desert of Paran, an encampment of Israel in the desert, between Kehalathah and Haradah, Numb. xxxiii. 23.

SHARAIM, a city of Judah, afterwards given to Simeon, Josh. xv. 36; 1 Sam. xvii. 52; 1 Chron. ii. 54.

I. SHAREZER, second son of Sennacherib, 2 Kings xix. 37.

II. SHAREZER, see NERGAL-SHAREZER.

SHARON. This name was almost proverbial to express a place of extraordinary beauty and fruitfulness, Isa. xxxiii. 9; xxxv. 2. It was properly the name of a district south of mount Carmel, along the coast of the Mediterranean, extending to Cæsarea and Joppa. It was extremely fat and fertile, Josh. xii. 18; Cant. ii. 1; 1 Chron. xxvii. 29; Isa. xxxiii. 9; xxxv. 2; lxx. 10; Acts ix. 35. Some have unnecessarily assumed a Sharon beyond Jordan, in the country of Basan, and in the tribe of Gad, 1 Chron. v. 16. But Reland maintains, that there was no Sharon beyond Jordan, and that the tribe of Gad may have come to feed their flocks as far as Joppa, Cæsarea and Lydda; which, as Cabnet remarks, seems incredible, because of the distance of the places, and because the country of Basan was itself very fine and fruitful.

Modern travellers give the name of Sharon to the plain between Eedippe and Ptolemais.

SHAVEH, THE VALLEY OF, or "valley of the king" (Gen. xiv. 17.) was probably near Jerusalem, because Melchisedec, with the king of Gomorrrha, came to meet Abraham, at his return from the defeat of the five kings, as far as this valley.

SHAVING. The practice of shaving the beard and hair, and sometimes the whole body, was very common among the Hebrews, Numb. viii. 7; Lev. xiv. 8, 9. The Levites on the day of their consecration, and the lepers at their purification, shaved all the hair off their bodies. A woman taken prisoner in war, when she married a Jew, shaved the hair off her head, (Deut. xxi. 12.) and the Hebrews generally, and also the nations bordering on Palestine, shaved themselves when they mourned, and in times of great calamity, whether public or private, Isa. vii. 20; xv. 2; Jer. xli. 5; xlvi. 37; Baruch vi. 30. God commanded the priests not to cut their hair or beards, in their mournings, Lev. xxi. 5. It may be proper to observe, that among the most degrading of punishments for women, is the loss of their hair; and the apostle hints at this: (1 Cor. xi. 6.) "If it be a shame for a woman to be shorn, or shaven," &c. See HAIR, and BEARD.

SHEAF, Lev. xxiii. 10—12. The day after the feast of the Passover, the Hebrews brought into the temple a sheaf of corn, as the first-fruits of the barley-harvest, with accompanying ceremonies. On the fifteenth of Nisan, in the evening, when the feast of the first day of the Passover was ended, and the second day begun, the house of judgment deputed three men to go in solemnity, and gather the sheaf of barley. The inhabitants of the neighboring cities assembled to witness the ceremony, and the barley was gathered into the territory of Jerusalem. The deputies demanded three times, if the sun were set; and they were as often answered, It is. They afterwards demanded as many times, if they might have leave to cut the sheaf; and leave was as often granted. They reaped it out of three different fields, with three different sickles, and put the ears into three boxes, to carry them to the temple.

The sheaf, or rather the three sheaves, being brought into the temple, were thrashed in the court. From this they took a full omer, that is, about three pints of the grain; and after it had been well winnowed, parched and bruised, they sprinkled over it a log of oil, to which they added a handful of incense; and the priest who received this offering waved it before the Lord, toward the four quarters of the world, and cast part of it on the altar. After this every one might begin his harvest.

SHEAR-JASHUB, the remnant shall return, an allegorical name given by the prophet Isaiah to one of his sons, Isa. vii. 3.

I. SHEBA, son of Raamah, (Gen. x. 7.) who, it is thought, inhabited Arabia Felix, where his father Raamah dwelt. See SABEANS II.

II. SHEBA, son of Joktan, (Gen. x. 28.) whom Bochart places in Arabia Felix. See SABEANS II.

III. SHEBA, son of Jokshan, (Gen. xxv. 3.) probably dwelt in Arabia Deserta, or thereabouts. Calmet thinks, with Bochart, that they were the descendants of this Sheba, which took away Job's cattle. See SABEANS II.

IV. SHEBA, QUEEN OF, (1 Kings x. 2 Chron. ix.) called queen of the South, (Matt. xii. 42; Luke xi. 31.) was, according to some, a queen of Arabia; but according to others, a queen of Ethiopia. (See SABEANS II.) Josephus says, that Saba was the ancient name of the city of Meroë, and that the queen, of whom we are speaking, came thence; which opinion has much prevailed. The Ethiopians still claim this princess, as their sovereign, and say, that her posterity reigned there for a long time. The eunuch of queen Candace, who was converted and baptized by Philip, (Acts viii. 27.) was an officer belonging to a princess of the same country—Ethiopia.

Mr. Bruce has given the history of the queen of Sheba, and her descendants, from the Abyssinian historians; but he thinks the eunuch of Candace (Chandake) was an officer of the queen Hendaqui, whose territories lie beyond the great desert, south of Syene, in upper Egypt.

The visit of this queen to Solomon is one of the most remarkable events of his reign; and as it appears to have had important consequences in her own country, we insert Mr. Bruce's account, as related in the annals of Abyssinia:—

“It is now that I am to fulfil my promise to the reader, of giving him some account of the visit made by the queen of Sheba, (it should properly be Saba, Azab, or Azaba, all signifying South,) as we erroneously call her, and the consequences of that visit—the foundation of an Ethiopian monarchy, and the continuation of the sceptre in the tribe of Judah, down to this day. We are not to wonder, if the prodigious hurry and flow of business, and the immensely valuable transactions they had with each other, had greatly familiarized the Tyrians and Jews, with their correspondents the Cushites and Shepherds, on the coast of Africa. This had gone so far, as very naturally to have created a desire in the queen of Azab, the sovereign of that country, to go herself and see the application of such immense treasures that had been exported from her country for a series of years, and the prince who so magnificently employed them. There can be no doubt of this expedition, as Pagan, Arab, Moor, Abyssinian, and all the countries round, vouch it pretty much in the terms of Scripture.

“Many (such as Justin, Cyprian, Epiphanius and Cyril) have thought this queen was an Arab. But Saba was a separate state, and the Sabæans a distinct people from the Ethiopians and the Arabs, and have continued so till very lately. We know, from history, that it was a custom among the Sabæans, to have women for their sovereigns in preference to men, a custom which still subsists among their descendants. Her name, the Arabs say, was Belkis; the Abyssinians, Macqueda. Our Saviour calls her queen of the South, without mentioning any other name, but gives his sanction to the truth of the voyage. ‘The queen of the South (or Saba, or Azab) shall rise up in the judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it; for she came from the uttermost parts of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon; and, behold, a greater than Solomon is here,’ Matt. xii. 42; Luke xi. 31. No other particulars, however, are mentioned about her in Scripture; and it is not probable our Saviour would say she came from the uttermost parts of the earth, if she had been an Arab, and had near 50 deg. of the continent behind her. The gold, the myrrh, cassia and frankincense were all the produce of her own country.

“Whether she were a Jewess or a pagan is uncertain; Sabæism was the religion of all the East. It was the constant attendant and stumbling-block of the Jews; but considering the multitude of that people then trading from Jerusalem, and the long time it continued, it is not improbable she was a Jewess. ‘And when the queen of Sheba heard of the fame of Solomon concerning the name of the Lord, she came to prove him with hard questions,’ 1 Kings x. 1, and 2 Chron. ix. 1. Our Saviour, moreover, speaks of her with praise, pointing her out as an example to the Jews, Matt. xii. 42; Luke xi. 31. And, in her thanksgiving before Solomon, she alludes to God's blessing on the seed of Israel for ever, (1 Kings x. 9; 2 Chron. ix. 8.) which is by no means the language of a pagan, but of a person skilled in the ancient history of the Jews. She likewise appears to have been a person of learning, and that sort of learning which was then almost peculiar to Palestine, not to Ethiopia. For we see that one of the reasons of her coming was to examine whether Solomon was really the learned man he was said to be. She came to try him in allegories, or parables, in which Nathan had instructed Solomon.

“The annals of Abyssinia, being very full upon this point, have taken a middle opinion, and by no means an improbable one. They say she was a pagan when she left Azab, but being full of admiration at the sight of Solomon's works, she was converted to Judaism in Jerusalem, and bore him a son, whom she called Menilek, and who was their first king. However strongly they assert this, however dangerous it would be to doubt it in Abyssinia, I will not here aver it for truth, nor much less still will I positively contradict it, as Scripture has said nothing about it. The Abyssinians, both Jews and Christians, believe the forty-fifth Psalm to be a prophecy of this queen's voyage to Jerusalem; that she was attended by a daughter of Hiram's from Tyre to Jerusalem, and that the last part contains a declaration of her having a son by Solomon, who was to be king over a nation of Gentiles.

“To Saba, or Azab, then, she returned with her son Menilek, whom, after keeping him some years, she sent back to his father to be instructed. Solomon did not neglect his charge, and he was anointed and crowned king of Ethiopia, in the temple of Jerusalem, and at his inauguration took the name of David. After this, he returned to Azab, and brought with him a colony of Jews, among whom were many doctors of the law of Moses, particularly one of each tribe, to make judges in his kingdom, from whom the present Umbares (or supreme judges, three of whom always attend the king) are said and believed to be descended. With these came also Azarias, the son of Zadok the priest, and brought with him a Hebrew transcript of the law, which was delivered into his custody, as he bore the title of Nebrit, or high-priest; and this charge, though the book itself was burnt with the church of Axum in the Moorish war of Adel, is still continued, as it is said, in the lineage of Azarias, who are Nebrits, or keepers of the church of Axum, at this day. All Abyssinia was thereupon converted, and the government of the church and state modelled according to what was then in use at Jerusalem.

“By the last act of the queen of Sheba’s reign she settled the mode of succession in her country for the future. First, she enacted, that the crown should be hereditary in the family of Solomon for ever. Secondly, That after her, no woman should be capable of wearing that crown or being queen, but that it should descend to the heir male, however distant, in exclusion of all heirs female whatever, however near; and that these two articles should be considered as the fundamental laws of the kingdom, never to be altered or abolished. And, lastly, That the heirs male of the royal house should always be sent prisoners to a high mountain, where they were to continue till their death, or till the succession should open to them.

“The reason of this last regulation is not known, it being peculiar to Abyssinia; but the custom of having women for sovereigns, which was a very old one, prevailed among the neighboring shepherds in the last century, and for what we know prevails to this day. It obtained in Nubia till Augustus’s time, when Petreus, his lieutenant in Egypt, subdued her country and took the queen Candace prisoner. It endured also after Tiberius, as we learn from St. Philip’s baptizing the eunuch, (Acts viii. 27, 38.) servant of queen Candace, who must have been successor to the former; for she, when taken prisoner by Petreus, is represented as an infirm woman, having but one eye. (This shows the falsehood of the remark Strabo makes, that it was a custom in Meroë, if their sovereign was any way mutilated, for the subjects to imitate the imperfection. In this case Candace’s subjects would have all lost an eye, Strabo, lib. xvii. p. 777, 778.) Candace, indeed, was the name of all the sovereigns, in the same manner as Cæsar was of the Roman emperors. As for the last severe part, the punishment of the princes, it was probably intended to prevent some disorders among the princes of her house, that she had observed frequently to happen in the house of David, (2 Sam. xvi. 22; 1 Kings ii. 13.) at Jerusalem.

“The queen of Saba having made these laws irrevocable to all her posterity, died, after a long reign of forty years, in 986 before Christ, placing her son Menilek upon the throne, whose posterity, the annals of Abyssinia would teach us to believe, have ever since reigned. So far we must indeed bear witness to them, that this is no new doctrine, but has been steadfastly and uniformly maintained from their earliest account of time; first when Jews, then in later days, after they had embraced Christianity. We may further add, that the testimony of all the neighboring nations is with them upon this subject, whether they be friends or enemies. They only differ in name of the queen, or in giving her two names. As for her being an Arab, the objection is still easier got over. For all the inhabitants of Arabia Felix, especially those of the coast opposite to Saba, were reputed Abyssinians, and their country part of Abyssinia, from the earliest ages to the Mahometan conquest and after. They were her subjects; first Sabeans pagans like herself, then converted (as the tradition says) to Judaism, during the time of the building of the temple and continuing Jews from that time to the year 622 after Christ, when they became Mahometans.

“Of their kings of the race of Solomon descended from the queen of Saba, the device is a lion passant, proper upon a field gules, and their motto, Mo Anbasa an Nizilet Solomon Negadé Jude; which signifies, ‘The Lion of the Race of Solomon and Tribe of Judah hath overcome.’” (So far Mr. Bruce, vol. i. p. 471, &c.)

On the motto of the Abyssinian kings, Mr. Taylor remarks, that we find allusions to it in Scripture. It appears to have originated from the simile in Gen. xlix. 9, and to this motto, or title, a reference he thinks may be found in Ps. l. 22, “Consider this, ye that forget God, lest I tear you in pieces, and there be none to deliver:”—where the phrase differs from Ps. vii. 2, in which place, the psalmist speaks of being himself torn in pieces. (See Micah v. 8.) He also thinks there is a direct quotation of this motto in Rev. v. 8, “The lion of the tribe of Judah hath prevailed,” or overcome; so that the comparison of a chief of the tribe of Judah to a lion, is not only sanctioned by the original comparison in Genesis, but appears to have been constantly kept in memory, and preserved by a public and authoritative memorial; in fact, by national and royal insignia.

Mr. Bruce adds the following information, which shows the practicability of the queen of Sheba’s journey. Indeed journeys of a much greater length are now annually made, in order to visit Mecca; and it is very credible, that the antiquity of similar journeys is very great.

“In the gentle reigns of the Mamalukes, before the conquest of Egypt and Arabia by Selim, a caravan constantly set out from Abyssinia directly for Jerusalem. They had then a treaty with the Arabs. This caravan rendezvoused at Hamayen, a small territory abounding in provisions, about two days’ journey from Doharwa, and nearly the same from Masuah: it amounted sometimes in number to a thousand pilgrims, ecclesiastics as well as laymen. They travelled by very easy journeys, not above six miles a day, halting to perform divine service, and setting up their tents early, and never beginning to travel till towards nine in the morning. They had hitherto passed in perfect safety, with drums beating, and colors flying, and in this way traversed the desert by the road of Suakem.” (Travels, vol. ii. p. 158.)

V. SHEBA, a city of Simeon, Josh. xix. 2.

VI. SHEBA, son of Biehri, of Benjamin, a turbulent fellow, who, after the defeat of Absalom, when the tribe of Judah came to David, and brought him over the river Jordan, on his way to Jerusalem, sounded a trumpet, and proclaimed, “We have no share in David.” Israel, in consequence, forsook David, and followed Sheba, 2 Sam. xx. 1, &c. When the king arrived at Jerusalem, he sent Abishai in pursuit of the traitor. Joab also took soldiers, and, crossing the country north of Jerusalem, he arrived at Abel-beth-maacah, a city at the entrance of the pass between Libanus and Anti-libanus, to which Sheba had retired. Joab besieged the place; but a discreet woman inhabiting the city, having persuaded the people to cut off Sheba's head, and to throw it over the wall, Joab and his army retired.

SHEBARIM, a place near Ai and Bethel, Josh. vii. 5.

SHEBAT, see SEBAT.

SHEBNA, a secretary to king Hezekiah, who was sent with Joah and Asaph, to hear the proposals of Rabshakeh, 2 Kings xviii. 18, 26.

SHEBUEL, the eldest son of Gershom, son of Moses, had the care of the treasures of the temple, 1 Chron. xxiii. 16; xxvi. 24.

SHECHEM, son of Hamor, prince of the Shechemites, seduced Dinah, the daughter of Jacob, as she went to see a festival of the Shechemites, Gen. xxxiv. A. M. 2265. He afterwards obtained her in marriage, on condition that he, and all the men of Shechem, should be circumcised. This was agreed to; but on the third day, when the wounds of the circumcision were at the worst, Simeon and Levi, the two brothers of Dinah, entered Shechem, and slew all the males, and afterwards, with their brethren and domestics, plundered the city. It is probable that this prince gave name to the city of Shechem.

II. SHECHEM, SICHAR, or SYCHEM, (Acts vii. 16.) a city of Benjamin, Josh. xvii. 7. Jacob bought a field in its neighborhood, which, by way of overplus, he gave to his son Joseph, who was buried here, Gen. xlviii. 22. In its vicinity was Jacob's well or fountain, at which Christ discoursed with the woman of Samaria, John iv. 5. After the ruin of Samaria by Shalmaneser, Shechem became the capital of the Samaritans; and Josephus says, it was so in the time of Alexander the Great. At the present day, it is also the seat of the small remnant of the Samaritans. (See SAMARITANS.) It is 10 miles from Shiloh, and 40 from Jerusalem, towards the north. The following is Dr. Clarke's description of this city and its neighborhood:—

“The view of the ancient SICHEM, now called Naploose, otherwise Neapolis, and Naploos, surprised us, as we had not expected to find a city of such magnitude in the road to Jerusalem. It seems to be the metropolis of a very rich and extensive country, abounding with provisions, and all the necessary articles of life, in much greater profusion than the town of Acre. White bread was exposed for sale in the streets of a quality superior to any that is to be found elsewhere throughout the Levant. The governor of Naploose received and regaled us with all the magnificence of an eastern sovereign. Refreshments, of every kind known in the country, were set before us; and when we supposed the list to be exhausted, to our very great astonishment a most sumptuous dinner was brought in. Nothing seemed to gratify our host more, than that any of his guests should eat heartily; and, to do him justice, every individual of the party ought to have possessed the appetite of ten hungry pilgrims, to satisfy his wishes in this respect. There is nothing in the Holy Land finer than a view of Naploose, from the heights around it. As the traveller descends towards it from the hills, it appears luxuriantly embosomed in the most delightful and fragrant bowers, half concealed by rich gardens, and by stately trees collected into groves, all around the bold and beautiful valley in which it stands. Trade seems to flourish among its inhabitants. Their principal employment is in making soap; but the manufactures of the town supply a very widely extended neighborhood, and they are exported to a great distance, upon camels. In the morning after our arrival, we met caravans coming from Grand Cairo, and noticed others reposing in the large olive plantations near the gates.

“The history of Sichem, referring to events long prior to the Christian dispensation, directs us to antiquities, which owe nothing of their celebrity to any traditional aid. The traveller, directing his footsteps towards its ancient sepulchres, as everlasting as the rocks wherein they are hewn, is permitted, on the authority of sacred and indelible record, to contemplate the spot where the remains of Joseph, of Eleazar and of Joshua were severally deposited. If any thing connected with the memory of past ages be calculated to awaken local enthusiasm, the land around this city is preëminently entitled to consideration. The sacred story of events transacted in the fields of Sichem, from our earliest years, is remembered with delight; but with the territory before our eyes where those events took place, and in the view of objects existing as they were described above three thousand years ago, the grateful impression kindles into ecstasy. Along the valley we beheld “a company of Ishmaelites, coming from Gilead,” (Gen. xxxvii. 25.) as in the days of Reuben and Judah, “with their camels bearing spicery, and halm, and myrrh,” who would gladly have purchased another Joseph of his brethren, and conveyed him, as a slave, to some Potiphar in Egypt. Upon the hills around, flocks and herds were feeding, as of old; nor in the simple garb of the shepherds of Samaria was there any thing repugnant to the notions we may entertain of the appearance presented by the sons of Jacob. It was indeed a scene to abstract and to elevate the mind; and, under emotions so called forth by every circumstance of powerful coincidence, a single moment seemed to concentrate whole ages of existence. The Jews of the twelfth century acknowledged that the tomb of Joseph then existed in Sichem, although both the city and the tomb were the possession and boast of a people they detested. ‘The town,’ says rabbi Benjamin, ‘lies in a vale, between mount Gerizim and mount Ebal, where there are above a hundred Cuthæans, who observe only the law of Moses, whom men call Samaritans. They have priests of the lineage of Aaron, who rests in peace, and those they call Aaronites; who never marry but with persons of the sacerdotal family, that they may not be confounded with the people. Yet these priests of their law offer sacrifices and burnt-offerings in their congregations, as it is written in the law, (Dent. xi. 29.) ‘Thou shalt put the blessing on mount Gerizim.’ They therefore affirm, that this is the House of the Sanctuary; and they offer burnt-offerings both on the Passover, and on other festivals, on the altar which was built on mount Gerizim, of those stones which the children of Israel set up after they had passed over Jordan. They pretend that they are descended from the tribe of Ephraim, and have among them the sepulchre of Joseph the Just, the son of our father Jacob, who rests in peace, according to that saying, the bones also of Joseph, which the children of Israel brought up with them out of Egypt, buried they in Shechem.’ Maundrell notices the tomb of Joseph, still bearing its name, unaltered, and venerated even by the Moslems, who have built a small temple over it. Its authenticity is not liable to controversy; since tradition is, in this respect, maintained on the authority of sacred Scripture; and the veneration paid to it by Jews, by Christians, and by Mahometans, has preserved, in all ages, the remembrance of its situation. Having shown, on a former occasion, that tombs were the origin of temples, it is not necessary to dwell on the utter improbability of their being forgotten among men who approached them as places of worship. The tomb of Joshua was also visited by Jewish pilgrims in the twelfth century. This is proved by the Hebrew Itinerary of Petaelias, who was contemporary with Benjamin of Tudela; and its situation, marked by him with the utmost precision, is still as familiar to the Jews of Palestine, as the place where the temple of Solomon originally stood. It was, in fact, in the midst of a renowned cemetery, containing also the sepulchres of other patriarchs; particularly of one, whose synagogue is mentioned by Benjamin of Tudela, as being in the neighborhood of the warm baths of Tiberias. These tombs are hewn in the solid rock, like those of Telmessus in the gulf of Glaucus, and are calculated for duration, equal to that of the hills wherein they have been excavated." (p. 513.)

"The principal object of veneration is Jacob's well, over which a church was formerly erected. This is situated at a small distance from the town, in the road to Jerusalem, and has been visited by pilgrims of all ages; but particularly since the Christian era, as the place where our Saviour revealed himself to the woman of Samaria. The spot is so distinctly marked by the evangelist, and so little liable to uncertainty, from the circumstance of the well itself, and the features of the country, that, if no tradition existed for its identity, the site of it could hardly be mistaken. Perhaps no Christian scholar ever attentively read the fourth chapter of John, without being struck with the numerous internal evidences of truth which crowd upon the mind in its perusal. Within so small a compass it is impossible to find in other writings so many sources of reflection and of interest. Independently of its importance as a theological document, it concentrates so much information, that a volume might be filled with the illustration it reflects on the history of the Jews, and on the geography of their country. All that can be gathered on these subjects from Josephus seems but as a comment to illustrate this chapter. The journey of our Lord from Judea into Galilee, the cause of it, his passage through the territory of Samaria, his approach to the metropolis of this country, its name, his arrival at the Amorite field which terminates the narrow valley of Sichem, the ancient custom of halting at a well, the female employment of drawing water, the disciples sent into the city for food, by which its situation out of the town is obviously implied; the question of the woman referring to existing prejudices which separated the Jews from the Samaritans; the depth of the well, the oriental allusion contained in the expression, 'living water;' the history of the well, and the customs thereby illustrated, the worship upon mount Gerizim; all these occur within the space of twenty verses: and if to these be added, what has already been referred to in the remainder of the same chapter, we shall perhaps consider it as a record, which, in the words of him who sent it, 'we may lift up our eyes, and look upon, for it is white already to harvest.'" (Travels, p. 517.)

[The situation of the city is very romantic. The following is Dr. Jovett's notice of it in 1823; and is coupled with a scene illustrative of Scripture manners: (Chr. Researches in Syr. p. 147. Amer. ed.) "It was about an hour after mid-day that we had our first view of the city of Nablous, romantically situated in a deep valley, between the mountains of Ebal on our left and Gerizim on the right. There is a kind of sublime horror in the lofty, craggy and barren aspect of these two mountains, which seem to face each other with an air of defiance, especially as they stand contrasted with the rich valley beneath, where the city appears to be embedded on either side in green gardens and extensive olive-grounds, rendered more verdant, by the lengthened periods of shade which they enjoy from the mountains on each side. Of the two, Gerizim is not wholly without cultivation.

"We had always been informed, that the facility of passing by way of Nablous depended very much on the character of the governor of the city. Our case was singular; for we had to learn what kind of reception a city without a governor would give us, the governor having died this very morning. On coming within sight of the gate, we perceived a numerous company of females, who were singing in a kind of recitative, far from melancholy, and beating time with their hands. If this be mourning, I thought, it is of a strange kind. It had indeed, sometimes, more the air of angry defiance. But on our reaching the gate, it was suddenly exchanged for most hideous plaints and shrieks, which, with the feeling that we were entering a city at no time celebrated for its hospitality, struck a very dismal impression upon my mind. They accompanied us a few paces; but it soon appeared that the gate was their station; to which, having received nothing from us, they returned. We learnt, in the course of the evening, that these were only a small detachment of a very numerous body of cunning women, who were filling the whole city with their cries—taking up a wailing, with the design, as of old, to make the eyes of all the inhabitants run down with tears, and their eyelids gush out with waters, Jer. ix. 17, 18. For this good service, they would, the next morning, wait upon the government and principal persons, to receive some trifling fee." *R.

SHEEP. [The Hebrew name of this animal is צֶהָ, seh, a word which is merely a noun of unity, and has no plural. The noun of plurality or multitude is צֹהֵן, tsón, which includes all small cattle, as sheep, goats, &c. like the English word flocks. R.

In its present domestic state, the sheep is of all animals the most defenceless and inoffensive. With its liberty it seems to have been deprived of its swiftness and cunning; and what in the ass might rather be called patience, in the sheep appears to be stupidity. With no one quality to fit it for self-preservation, it makes vain efforts at all. Without swiftness it endeavors to fly; and without strength sometimes offers to oppose. But it is by human art alone that the sheep is become the tardy, defenceless creature that we find it. In its wild state it is a noble and active animal, and is every way fitted to defend itself against the numerous dangers by which it is surrounded.

Of the Syrian sheep there are two varieties: the one called Bedouin sheep, which differ in no respect from the larger kinds of sheep among us, except that their tails are something longer and thicker; the others are those often mentioned by travellers on account of their extraordinary tails; and this species is by far the most numerous. The tail of one of these animals is very broad and large, terminating in a small appendage that turns back upon it. It is of a substance between fat and marrow, and is not eaten separately, but mixed with the lean meat in many of their dishes, and also often used instead of butter. A common sheep of this sort, without the head, feet, skin and entrails, weighs from sixty to eighty pounds, of which the tail itself is usually fifteen pounds or upwards; but such as are of the largest breed, and have been fattened, will sometimes weigh above one hundred and fifty pounds, and the tail, alone, fifty; a thing to some scarcely credible. To preserve the tails from being torn by the bushes, &c. they fix a piece of thin board to the under part, where it is not covered with thick wool, and some have small wheels to facilitate the dragging of this board after them; whence, with a little exaggeration, the story of having carts to carry their tails. (Russell's Aleppo, p. 51.)

The sheep or lamb was the common sacrifice under the Mosaic law; and it is to be remarked, that when the divine legislator speaks of this victim, he never omits to appoint, that the rump or tail be laid whole on the fire of the altar. The reason for this is seen in the extract just given from Dr. Russell, from which it appears that this was the most delicate part of the animal, and therefore the most proper to be presented in sacrifice to Jehovah. Mr. Street, however, who is cited by Dr. Harris, considers this precept to have had respect to the health of the Israelites; observing, that "bilious disorders are very frequent in hot countries; the eating of fat meat is a great encouragement and excitement to them; and though the fat of the tail is now considered as a delicacy, it is really unwholesome."

In a domesticated state, the sheep, as already noticed, is a weak and defenceless animal, and is, therefore, altogether dependent upon its keeper for protection as well as support. To this trait in their character, there are several beautiful allusions in the sacred writings. Thus, Micah describes the destitute condition of the Jews as a flock "scattered upon the hills, as sheep that have not a shepherd;" (I Kings xxii. 17; see also Matt. ix. 36.) and Zechariah prophesied, that when the good shepherd should be smitten and removed from his flock, the sheep should be scattered, Zeel. xiii. 7. To the disposition of these animals to wander from the fold, and thus abandon themselves to danger and destruction, there are also several allusions made by the inspired writers. David confesses that he had imitated their foolish conduct: "I have gone astray like a lost sheep;" and conscious that, like them, he was only disposed to wander still further from the fold, he adds, "seek thy servant," Ps. cxix. 176. Nor was this disposition to abandon the paternal care of God peculiar to David, for the prophet adopts similar language to depict the dangerous and awful condition of the entire species: "All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way," Isa. liii. 6. It was to seek these "lost sheep," scattered abroad, and having no shepherd, that the blessed Redeemer came into the world. He is "the good shepherd, who gave his life for the sheep," (John x. 11.) and his people, though formerly "as sheep going astray," have now "returned to the shepherd and bishop of their souls," I Pet. ii. 25. His care over them, and their security under his protection, is most beautifully and affectingly described in the chapter which we just now cited. "He calleth his own sheep by name, and leadeth them out. And when he putteth forth his own sheep, he goeth before them, and the sheep follow him: for they know his voice. And a stranger will they not follow, but will flee from him: for they know not the voice of strangers. I am the door of the sheep. All that ever came before me are thieves and robbers; but the sheep did not hear them. I am the door: by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out, and find pasture. The thief cometh not, but for to steal, and to kill, and to destroy: I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly. I am the good shepherd; the good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep. But he that is an hireling, and not the shepherd, whose own sheep are not, seeth the wolf coming, and leaveth the sheep, and fleeth; and the wolf catcheth them, and scattereth the sheep. The hireling fleeth, because he is an hireling, and careth not for the sheep. I am the good shepherd, and know my sheep, and am known of mine. As the Father knoweth me, even so know I the Father; and I lay down my life for the sheep. And other sheep I have, which are not of this fold: them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one fold, and one shepherd," John x. 3—16.

The sprightly and playful inclination of the lamb has passed into a proverb. To their gambols in the pasture, there is an allusion in a bold but appropriate figure, in the cxiv. Psalm: "The mountains skipped like rams, and the little hills like lambs. What ailed thee—ye mountains, that ye skipped like rams; and ye little hills like lambs?" The meek and harmless disposition of this animal has occasioned it to be selected by the Holy Spirit, as a fit type of the Son of God and Saviour of the world. The lamb in the paschal feast, which was roasted whole, and feasted upon by each family of redeemed Israelites, and whose blood sprinkled upon the door posts of their houses, preserved them from the sword of the destroying angel, was a lively representation of him "who gave himself for our sins, according to the will of God and our Father;" whose blood has been shed for the expiation of human guilt; and upon whom every redeemed Israelite feeds and lives by faith, John vi. 51—55. He is "the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world," (John i. 29.) the necessity and efficacy of whose atonement was strikingly prefigured by the daily sacrifices of the Mosaic ritual.

There is a remarkable passage in the history of Jacob, as recorded in Gen. xxx. 31, &c. relative to the gestation and birth of these animals, which would perhaps, be deemed an unpardonable omission to pass by; and yet, we fear we shall be able to collect little that will satisfy the mind of the inquisitive on the subject. The reader is requested to have the passage before him, while perusing the following observations upon it, chiefly taken from Calnet and Dr. A. Clarke.

It is extremely difficult to find out, from the 32d and 35th verses, in what the bargain of Jacob with his father-in-law properly consisted. It appears from ver. 32, that Jacob was to have for his wages all the speckled, spotted and brown, among the sheep and the goats; and of course, that all these which were not parti-colored, should be considered as the property of Laban. But in ver. 35, it appears that Laban separated all the parti-colored cattle, and delivered them into the hands of his own sons; which seems as if he had taken these for his own property, and left the others to Jacob. It has been conjectured that Laban, for the greater security, when he had separated the parti-colored, which by the agreement belonged to Jacob, (see ver. 32.) put them under the care of his own sons, while Jacob fed the flock of Laban, (ver. 36.) three days' journey being between the two flocks. If, therefore, the flocks under the care of Laban's sons brought forth young that were all of one color, these were put to the flocks of Laban, under the care of Jacob; and if any of the flocks under Jacob's care brought forth parti-colored young, they were put to the flocks belonging to Jacob, under the care of Laban's sons. This conjecture is not satisfactory, and the true meaning appears to be this: Jacob had agreed to take all the parti-colored for his wages. As he was now only beginning to act upon this agreement, consequently none of the cattle as yet belonged to him; therefore Laban separated from the flock (ver. 35.) all such cattle as Jacob might afterwards claim in consequence of his bargain; for as yet he had no right; therefore Jacob commenced his service to Laban with a flock that did not contain a single animal of the description of those to which he might be entitled; and the others were sent away under the care of Laban's sons, three days' journey from those of which Jacob had the care. The bargain, therefore, seemed to be wholly in favor of Laban; and to turn it to his own advantage, Jacob made use of the stratagems afterwards mentioned. This mode of interpretation removes all the apparent contradiction between the 32d and 35th verses, with which commentators in general have been grievously perplexed. From the whole account we learn, that Laban acted with great prudence and caution, and Jacob with great judgment. Jacob had already served fourteen years, and had got no patrimony whatever, though he had now a family of twelve children, eleven sons and one daughter, besides his two wives and their two maids. It was high time that he should get some property for these; and as his father-in-law was excessively parsimonious, and would scarcely allow him to live, he was in some sort obliged to make use of stratagem to get an equivalent for his services; but this he pushed so far, as to ruin his father-in-law's flocks, leaving him nothing but the refuse. (See ver. 42.)

So far Dr. Adam Clarke: but from ch. xxxi. 12, &c. it seems clear that the stratagem which was resorted to by Jacob, and which we are about to consider, was adopted by him under divine direction, the reason for which is there distinctly assigned.

The expedient was this: "He took him rods of green poplar, and of the hazel and chestnut-tree, and pilled white streaks in them, and made the white appear which was in the rods. And he set the rods which he had pilled before the flocks in the gutters in the watering-troughs, when the flocks came to drink, that they should conceive when they came to drink." The consequence of this is stated to be, that "the flocks conceived before the rods, and brought forth cattle ring-straked, speckled and spotted," ch. xxx. 37—39. Now, in this process there does not appear to have been any thing miraculous, or out of the ordinary course of nature. It is a fact attested by both ancient and modern philosophers, as well as our constant experience, that whatever makes a strong impression on the mind of a female in the time of conception and gestation, will have a corresponding influence on the mind or body of the fetus. Nor is it any objection to this fact, that we know not how to account for the effect, on rational principles.

There is an art, which, in their piddness, shares
With great creating nature.—
Yet nature is made better by no mean,
But nature makes that mean:
The art itself is nature. WINTER'S TALE.

By the name of sheep, Scripture often understands the people. Ps. lxxix. 13, "We are thy people, and the sheep of thy pasture;" also, "O shepherd of Israel, thou that leddest Joseph like a flock." Our Saviour says, that he was sent only to the lost sheep of Israel, Matt. xv. 24. The righteous are often compared to sheep exposed to the violence of the wicked, to the fury of the wolves; to slaughter, Ps. xlv. 22. At the last judgment, the just (represented by sheep) shall be at the right hand of the sovereign Judge, and put in possession of heaven. Our Saviour describes deceivers as wolves in sheep's clothing, Matt. vii. 15.

The sheep-folds, among the Israelites, appear to have been generally houses, or enclosures, walled round, to guard the sheep from beasts of prey by night, and the scorching heat of noon. John x. 1—5 is a curious passage, in reference to the subject of this article, and deserves attention.

SHEKEL, to weigh, a Hebrew weight and money, Exod. xxx. 23, 24; 2 Sam. xiv. 26. The word is used to denote the weight of any thing, as iron, hair, spices, &c. Among the different opinions, concerning its weight and value, Calmet adheres to that of M. le Pelletier, who says it weighs half an ounce, or four Roman drachmæ; that is, nine pennyweights, three grains; and that the shekel of silver was worth two shillings three-pence farthing and a half, sterling, or about 50 cents; perhaps nearest 52½ cents. Moses and Ezekiel say, it was worth twenty oboli, or twenty gerah, Numb. xviii. 16; Ezek. xlv. 12.

The shekel of gold was half the weight of the shekel of silver; and was worth eighteen shillings and three-pence, sterling, or about $4. "The shekel of the sanctuary" has been thought to have been double the common shekel, but this wants proof. Calmet thinks it was the same as the common shekel, the words "of the sanctuary" being added to express a just and exact weight, according to the standard kept in the temple or tabernacle.

[The shekel was properly and only a weight, which it has been attempted to fix at 96 Paris grains, or also, as above stated, at 9 pwt. 3 gr. Troy. It was used especially in weighing uncoined gold and silver, Gen. xxiii. 15, 16. In such cases the word shekel is often omitted in the Hebrew, as in Gen. xx. 16; xxxvii. 23, where our translators have supplied the word pieces, but improperly, because coined money was not then known. (See MONEY.) Between the sacred shekel, (Ex. xxx. 15.) and the shekel after the king's weight, (2 Sam. xiv. 26.) there would seem to have been a difference; (see ABSALOM;) but this difference cannot now be determined. The first coin which bore the name of shekel was struck after the exile in the time of the Maccabees, (1 Mac. xv. 6.) and bore the inscription shekel of Israel. The value was about 50 cents; and it is the coin mentioned in the New Testament by the name of ἀργύριον. (Matt. xxvi. 15, etc.) where our translators have rendered it by pieces of silver. R.]

SHEKINAH, a word signifying the dwelling, the abiding. It does not occur in the Bible; but nothing is more frequently mentioned in the writings of the Jews, than the Shekinah, by which they understand the presence of the Holy Spirit. In the Targum, and Chaldee paraphrases, we find the names Jehovah, or

God; Memra, or the Word; and Shekinah, or the Holy Spirit. They suppose the Holy Spirit speaking and communicating itself to men by revelation; (1.) in the prophets; (2.) in the Urim and Thummim of the high-priest's breast-plate; (3.) in what the Hebrews call Bath-col, or the daughter of the voice. The Shekinah is the presence of the Holy Spirit, which resided in the temple of Jerusalem; and which, the rabbins say, drove thence the princes of the air, and communicated a particular sanctity.

The Shekinah was the most sensible symbol of the presence of God among the Hebrews. It rested over the propitiatory, or over the golden cherubim, which were attached to the propitiatory, the covering of the ark. Here it assumed the appearance of a cloud; and from hence God gave his oracles, as some think, when consulted by the high-priest on account of his people. Hence Scripture often says, God sits on the cherubim, or between the cherubim; that is, he gives the most evident tokens of his divine presence, by answering from hence the inquiries of Israel. The rabbins affirm, that the Shekinah first resided in the tabernacle prepared by Moses in the wilderness, into which it descended on the day of its consecration, in the figure of a cloud. It passed from thence into the sanctuary of Solomon's temple, on the day of its dedication by this prince, where it continued till the destruction of Jerusalem, and the temple, by the Chaldeans, and was not afterwards seen there.

The presence of the Holy Spirit, by the appearance of the Shekinah, is frequently referred to in the New Testament. It appeared at the baptism and transfiguration of Jesus, and is called the excellent glory by Peter, 2 Epist. ii. 10. The idea of a radiance, or glory, a mild effulgence, seems to be always annexed to it. The Shekinah may be "the glory of the Lord," spoken of 2 Cor. iii. 18, under the allusion of being distributed to believers, as it really was at the time of the descent of the "cloven tongues like as of fire," which sat on each of the hundred and twenty, (Acts ii.) and on the assembly at Cornelius's, Acts x. 44; xi. 15. It might also be "the glory of the Lord," (Luke ii. 9.) and "the tabernacle of God with men," Rev. xxi. 3. In short, we find it frequently; but always gentle, and, as it were, lambent; not fierce or vindictive, as exemplified at the burning bush, (Exod. iii.) where the whole was enveloped, but nothing consumed.

SHELOMITH, daughter of Dibri, of the tribe of Dan, was mother of that blasphemer who was condemned to be stoned, Lev. xxiv. 10, 11.

SHELUMIEL, son of Zurishaddai, the prince of Simeon, came out of Egypt at the head of 50,000 men who carried arms, Numb. i. 6; vii. 36; x. 19.

SHEM, son of Noah, (Gen. vi. 10.) was born A. M. 1558, 98 years before the deluge, and was, probably, younger than Japheth, and older than Ham. (See JAPHETH.) In consequence of his conduct upon the occasion of Ham's discovering his father's nakedness, Noah predicted blessings on Shem, saying, "The Lord God of Shem be blessed, and let Canaan be the slave of Shem." His great prerogatives were, that from his race was to proceed the Messiah, and that the worship of the true God was to be preserved among his posterity. At 100 years of age he begat Arphaxad, and died aged 600 years.

Shem had five sons, Elam, Asher, Arphaxad, Lud and Aram, who peopled the finest provinces of the East. (See their articles.) The principal design of Moses being to give the history and laws of the Jews, he has carried the genealogy of Shem further than the genealogies of the other sons of Noah, who were not his immediate object.

I. SHEMAIAH, a prophet who was sent to Rehoboam, king of Judah, with a message from God, to forbid his war against Israel, 2 Chron. xi. 2. Some years after this, Shishak, king of Egypt, came in hostile array into Judea, against Rehoboam, and took the best places of his kingdom. The prophet Shemaiah told Rehoboam, and the princes of Judah, who had retired into Jerusalem, that they had forsaken the Lord, and now he in his turn would forsake them, and deliver them into the hands of Shishak. The king and the princes, being in a consternation, answered, "The Lord is just;" but, they humbling themselves, God moderated his anger and their sufferings. Shemaiah wrote the history of Rehoboam, 2 Chron. xii. 15.

II. SHEMAIAH, son of Nathaniel, secretary of the temple, (1 Chron. xxiv. 6.) probably the same as Shemaiah, descendant of Elizaphan, 1 Chron. xv. 8, 11.

III. SHEMAIAH, son of Delaiah, a false prophet in the time of Nehemiah, who, being corrupted by Sanballat, and the other enemies of Nehemiah, would have persuaded him to retire into the temple, Neh. vi. 10.

IV. SHEMAIAH, a false prophet who lived at Babylon, Jer. xxix. 24, 31, 32. Jeremiaah having sent prophecies to the captive Jews at Babylon, Shemaiah wrote back to the people of Jerusalem to deery the prophet; and to Zephaniah, prince of the priests, and to the rest of the priests, to reproach them for not seizing and imprisoning Jeremiaah as an impostor. Jeremiaah in his turn wrote back to the Jews in captivity: "The Lord says, against Shemaiah the Nebelamite, and against his posterity;—none of his race shall ever sit in the midst of the people, and he shall not share in the happiness of my people." There are several other unimportant persons of the same name mentioned in the Old Testament.

SHEMEBER, king of Zeboum, and one of the five confederates defeated by Chedorlaomer and his allies, Gen. xiv. 2.

SHEMER was the name of the person who sold the mount of Somer to Omri, king of Israel, upon which he built the city of Samaria, 1 Kings xvi. 24. The name of Sumer, or Somer, is also given to the mountain itself. See SAMARIA.

SHEMIDA, son of Gilead, of Manasseh, and head of a family, Numb. xxvi. 32; 1 Chron. vii. 19.

SHEMINITH, in the titles of Ps. vi. xii. and in 1 Chron. xv. 21. It means properly octave, and seems to have been not an instrument, but a part in music; perhaps the lowest. *R.

I. SHEMUEL, son of Ammihud, prince of Simeon, Numb. xxxiv. 20.

II. SHEMUEL, a son of Thola, 1 Chron. vii. 2.

SHENIR, or SENIR, the name given to mount Hermon by the Amorites, Deut. iii. 9; 1 Chron. v. 23; Ezek. xxvii. 5.

SHEOL, see HELL.

SHEPHAM, apparently a city of Syria, and the eastern limit of the Land of Promise, Numb. xxxv. 10, 11.

SHEPHERDS, or PASTORS. When the patriarch Joseph invited his father and brethren to settle in Egypt, he bade them tell Pharaoh they were shepherds or breeders of sheep, that they might have the land of Goshen assigned for their habitation; because, he added, the Egyptians hold shepherds in abomination. See EGYPT.

Abel was a keeper of sheep, (Gen. iv. 2.) as were the greater number of the ancient patriarchs. When men began to multiply, and to follow different employments, Jabel, son of Lamech and his wife Adah, was acknowledged as father, that is, founder, of shepherds and nomades, Gen. iv. 20. God sometimes takes the name of Shepherd of Israel, (Isa. xl. 11.) and kings, both in Scripture, and ancient writers, are distinguished by the title of shepherds of the people. The prophets often inveigh against the shepherds of Israel, against the kings who feed themselves and neglect their flocks; who distress, ill-treat, seduce and lead them astray. (See Ezek. xxxiv. 10, sq.; Num. xxvii. 17; 1 Kings xxii. 17; Isa. xl. 11; xlv. 28; Judith xi. 15.)

The Lord says, (Isa. lxiii. 11.) that he brought his people through the Red sea, with their shepherds; that is, Moses, Aaron and the chief of the people at their head. Micah says, (v. 5.) that the Lord shall raise seven shepherds over his people, and an eighth over the land of Assyria, to bring from thence the people of Israel. These seven or eight shepherds are taken to be the seven princes confederate with Darius, son of Hystaspes, who killed Smerdis the Magian, who had seized the empire of Persia, after the death of Cambyses.

The Messiah is often called a shepherd. "I will set up shepherds over them, which shall feed them," Jer. xxiii. 4, 5. Isaiah (xl. 11.) speaks in the same manner: "He shall feed his flock like a shepherd, he shall gather the lambs with his arms, and gently lead those that are with young." And Zechariah (xiii. 7.) says, "Awake, O sword, against my shepherd, against the man that is my fellow, saith the Lord of hosts. Smite the shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered, and I will turn my hand upon the little ones." Christ refers this passage to his passion, (Matt. xxvi. 31.) and elsewhere takes on himself the title of the good shepherd, who gives his life for his sheep, John x. 11, 14, 15. Paul calls him the great shepherd of the sheep, (Heb. xiii. 20.) and Peter gives him the appellation of prince of shepherds, 1 Epis. v. 4.

In the passage just referred to, our Saviour says, the good shepherd lays down his life for his sheep; that he knows them, and they know him; that they hear his voice, and follow him; that he goes before them; that no one shall force them out of his hands, and that he calls them by their name. These, however, being all incidents taken from the custom of the country, are by no means so striking to us as they must have been to those who heard our Lord, and who every day witnessed such methods of conducting this domestic animal. The hireling, or bad shepherd, forsakes the sheep, and the thief enters not by the door of the sheep-fold, but climbs in another way.

SHEREZER, a Jew of Babylon, who, with Regem-melech, consulted the priests of the temple concerning the fast of the fifth month, Zech. vii. 2.

SHESHACH, see BABYLON, p. 129.

SHESHAI, a giant, a son or descendant of Anak, driven from Hebron, with his brethren Ahiman and Talmai, by Caleb, son of Jephunneh, Josh. xv. 14.

SHESHBAZZAR, a prince of Judah, to whom Cyrus restored the sacred vessels of the temple which had been carried to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, Ezra i. 8.

SHIBBOLETH. After Jephthah had beaten the Ammonites, the men of Ephraim were jealous of the advantage obtained by the tribes beyond Jordan, and complained loudly that they had not been called to that expedition. Jephthah answered with much moderation; but that did not prevent the Ephraimites from using contemptuous language toward the men of Gilead. They taunted them with being only fugitives from Ephraim and Manasseh, a kind of bastards, that belonged to neither of the two tribes. A war ensued, and the men of Gilead killed a great number of Ephraim; after which they set guards at all the passes of Jordan, and when an Ephraimite who had escaped, came to the river side, and desired to pass over, they asked him if he were not an Ephraimite? If he said No, they bade him pronounce Shibboleth; but he pronouncing it Sibboleth, according to the diction of the Ephraimites, they killed him. In this way there fell 42,000 Ephraimites, Judg. xii. This incident should not be passed over without observing, that it affords proof of dialectical variations among the tribes of the same nation, and speaking the same language, in those early days. There can be no wonder, therefore, if we find in later ages the same word written different ways, according to the pronunciation of different tribes, or of different colonies or residents of the Hebrew people: whence various pointings, &c. That this continued, is evident from the peculiarities of the Galilean dialect, by which Peter was discovered to be of that district.

The term Shibboleth signifies an ear of corn, and also stream. In this case it is probably to be taken in the latter sense, as the Ephraimites would thus be understood to ask permission to pass over the stream. (Comp. Ps. lxxix. 15; Isa. xxvii. 12. Heb.)

SHIBMAH, or SIBMAH, a city of Reuben, Numb. xxxii. 33; Josh. xiii. 19. Isaiah (xvi. 8, 9.) speaks of the vines of Sibmah, which were cut down by the enemies of the Moabites; for that people had taken the city of Sibmah, (Jer. xlviii. 32.) and others of Reuben, after this tribe was carried into captivity by Tiglath-pileser, 1 Chron. v. 26; 2 Kings xv. 29. Jerome says that between Heshbon and Sibmah there was hardly the distance of five hundred paces.

SHICRON, a city of Judah, (Josh. xv. 11.) thought to have been yielded to Simeon.

SHIELD, a piece of defensive armor. (See ARMOR.) God is often called the shield of his people, (Gen. xv. 1; Ps. v. 12.) as are also princes and great men, 2 Sam. i. 21.

SHIGGAION. (Ps. vii. title,) and ΣΙΓΓΙΟΝΟΝ, (Hab. iii. 1;) probably song, or song of praise; perhaps some particular species of ode. R.

SHILOAH, see SILOAM.

I. SHILOH. This term is used (Gen. xlix. 10.) to denote the Messiah, the coming of whom Jacob foretells in these words: "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come, and unto him shall the gathering of the people be." It must be admitted, however, that the signification of the word is not well ascertained. Some translate, "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah till he comes to whom it belongs." Others, till the coming of the peace-maker, or the pacific, or of prosperity, (shalah signifying to be in peace, or prosperity.) Some of the rabbins have taken the name Shiloh for a city of this name in Palestine, and render, "the sceptre shall not be taken from Judah, till it comes to Shiloh." "It has ceased, it has finished," says Le Clerc, "till it be taken from him, to be given to Saul, at Shiloh." But, as Calmet asks, where is it said, that Saul was acknowledged king, or consecrated at Shiloh? And if it be understood of Jeroboam, son of Nebat, the matter is equally uncertain. Scripture mentions no assembly at Shiloh that admitted him king.

The Septuagint read שֵׁלֹו, shellu, that is, (אשר לו) He whose it is, he to whom it belongs, meaning the sceptre before mentioned, as Capellus observes; for in the original and best edition of their version, as Justin Martyr affirmed, this שֵׁלֹו was rendered, He for whom it is reserved, as it now stands in the Alexandrian manuscript. The Samaritan copy has שֵׁלֹו, which is the same in the Chaldee dialect as שֵׁלֹו. Onkelos, the Jerusalem Targum, the Syriac, the Arabic and Aquila, speak the same sense. According to this reading, then, the sense is this: The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a governor from between his feet, until He shall have come, whose right the sceptre is, and until the nations shall obey him, that is, have been governed by him. A prediction which, as Mede well observes, was afterwards applied and explained by our Saviour himself, in those words, "And this gospel of the kingdom [of Christ] shall be preached in all the world, for a witness unto all nations, and then shall the end come;" (Matt. xxiv. 14.) that is, the end of the Jewish state.

But how did the sceptre depart from Judah when Shiloh came? First, it actually had departed in the transference of the public government to the Herod family, and by the intrusion of the Romans. This is usually held to be an adequate answer to the prophecy; but Mr. Taylor thinks there is a better:—Our Lord was the only branch of David's family entitled to rule, and he dying without issue, the ruling branch of David's family became extinct; so that, after his death, there was no longer any possibility of the continuance of the kingly office, in the direct proper line of David. The person who should have held the sceptre was dead: the direct descent of the family expired with him; and, consequently, the sceptre was bonâ fide departed: since, (1.) it was actually swayed by a stranger, and strangers, (Herod and the Romans,) and, (2.) no one who could possibly claim it, though he might have been of a collateral branch of David's house, could have been the direct legal claimant by birthright.

This statement appears to be supported by the manner in which the sons of David by Bathsheba are recorded: (2 Sam. v. 14.) "These sons were born to David, after he was king in Jerusalem, Shammuah, Shobab, Nathan, Solomon;" which, in 1 Chron. iii. 5. are thus reckoned, "Shimea, Shobab, Nathan, Solomon, four, of Bathshua [Bathsheba] the daughter of Ammiel." Now we know that David had promised Bathsheba that one of her sons should succeed him: Shimea died in his infancy; (2 Sam. xii. 15, &c.) nothing is recorded of Shobab; perhaps he also died young. This reduces the sons of Bathsheba to two—Nathan and Solomon. For what reason Solomon (the younger) was preferred before Nathan (the elder) we know not, unless on account of the promise of God referred to below; but we ought to consider, (1.) that none of the sons of David, born before he reigned in Jerusalem could claim succession to his whole kingdom, on the principles adopted in the East. (See GENEALOGY.) (2.) That the first sons born to him in Jerusalem, appear to be by his connection with Bathsheba: so that in one of them, as first born after he was there established king over all Israel, the natural right to the crown vested, by usage. But, (3.) we find (2 Sam. vii. 12.) that the son who should proceed out of the bowels of David, was to be his successor. The question is, whether Solomon was born at this time, or whether, as this promise respected a future event, Solomon was not begotten after it and in fulfilment of it? However that might be, it is very credible that the sons of David, by Bathsheba, were reduced to two, Nathan and Solomon; and that, whatever right Nathan might have to the crown, descending in his line, centred in Heli, the father of Mary; as Solomon having actually reigned, transmitted the crown in his posterity, in which line it centred in Joseph. The union of these two lines (and we know of no third line to oppose them) was completed in the person of Jesus; and when he expired, the claims of both lines of descent expired with him.

This agrees perfectly with the ancient rendering, "he whose right it is;" for, (1.) the right and title had long lain dormant, and involved in obscurity, till the enrolment at Bethlehem brought it forth, though, no doubt, very cautiously, to light: (2.) though it vested in the ancestors of Joseph, after the return from the captivity, yet another branch also had its claims: so that (3.) Jesus was the first person who, by uniting in himself the claim of both lines of descent from David, could be especially denoted and described, as he whose indisputable and unequivocal right it was to occupy the throne of the whole Hebrew nation. See GENEALOGY.

II. SHILOH, or SILO, a famous city of Ephraim, (Josh. xviii. xix. xxi.) 12 miles from Shechem, according to Ensebins, or 10, according to Jerome. Here Joshua assembled the people to make the second distribution of the Land of Promise, (Josh. xviii.) and here the tabernacle of the Lord was set up, when they were settled in the country, ch. xix. 51. The ark and the tabernacle continued at Shiloh, from A. M. 2500, to A. M. 2888, when it was taken by the Philistines, under the administration of the high-priest Eli. At Shiloh Samuel began to prophesy, (1 Sam. iv. 1.) and here the prophet Ahijah dwelt, 1 Kings xiv. 2. Jeremiah foretold that the temple of Jerusalem should be reduced to the same condition as Shiloh was, Jer. vii. 13, 14; xxvi. 6.

SHIMEAH, brother of David, and father of Jonathan and Jonadab, 2 Sam. xiii. 3; xxi. 21.—There were others of this name, of whom nothing particular is known.

SHIMEI, son of Gera, a kinsman of Saul, who, when David was obliged to retire from Jerusalem, began to curse him, and to throw stones, 2 Sam. xvi. 5. When he returned to Jerusalem, however, after the defeat and death of Absalom, Shimei hastened with the men of Judah, and with a thousand men of Benjamin, and threw himself at his feet, imploring him to forgive his fault. Abishai, son of Zeruiah, expostulated in an angry manner, but David disapproved Abishai's zeal, and promised Shimei, with an oath, that he would not put him to death. He kept his promise, but before his death he recommended to Solomon not to let Shimei go entirely unpunished, but to exercise his discretion upon him. Solomon confined Shimei to Jerusalem, where he dwelt for three years, when some of his slaves ran away, and took sanctuary with Achish in Gath. Shimei followed, and brought them to Jerusalem; but the king, being informed of it, had him put to death.

The conduct of both David and Solomon, in relation to Shimei, having been frequently carped at, the following remarks upon their conduct by Mr. Taylor are worthy attention:—

David's charge to Solomon refers to three persons of three different descriptions; (1.) to Jeab; who is clearly consigned to punishment; (2.) to the sons of Barzillai, who are clearly recommended to favor; and (3.) to Shimei, who is neither sentenced to punishment, absolutely, nor to safety, absolutely; but is recommended to be treated according to his eventual demerits. Thus understood, the passage reads to this effect:—"Shimei did not shed blood, as Joab did; he only cursed me with a grievous curse; and that I forgave him, swearing to him by the Lord. Now I would advise thee not to let him go at large with impunity, nor (3) to bring down his hoary head to the grave by bloody execution; but do as thy wisdom shall direct thee,"—i. e. steer a middle course. Solomon's subsequent conduct proves the accuracy of this view of the passage: he confined Shimei to Jerusalem, where he was under strict inspection and vigilance; and when he had violated the conditions of his safety, he was punished for his presumption; which illustrates the observation of David, "for thou art a wise sovereign, and knowest in what manner to treat a man who is a rebel in his heart, therefore dangerous to thy crown; yet one who has been solemnly pardoned by me for his former misconduct; and who has not misconducted himself towards thee." There are several other persons of the same name, but of no importance.

SHIMSIAL, a secretary who, with Rehum, the chancellor, wrote to Artaxerxes against the Jews, recently returned from captivity, Ezra iv. 8. A. M. 3470.

SHINAR, a province of Babylonia, and thought by some writers to be the plain between the rivers Euphrates and Tigris, Gen. x. 10; Is. xi. 11; Zech. v. 11. See MESOPOTAMIA.

SHIP. Among the perplexities which occur in reading the sacred Scriptures, none are greater than those which arise from the use of technical words and phrases, terms peculiar to certain professions, and employed in their own restricted and appropriate sense. Few persons of one business understand the directions, or the descriptive appellations, of another; few are the land-men who understand properly the terms used by seamen even in our own nautical country; and should a voyager insert verbatim the orders given by the captain or officers, on board the ship in which he sailed, what proportion of his readers, who were not maritime men, would comprehend their meaning? These remarks will suggest an apology for errors committed by men of learning in translation; and they may restrain those sneers, which unreflecting persons sometimes throw out against such descriptions of nautical affairs, in our version of the sacred writings, which involve obscurities or other difficulties. Among the most prominent of these instances is the history of Paul's voyage, in Acts xxvii. and which has been thought so utterly irreconcilable with the nature of things, that some writers, in exposing the ignorance of the author of this book on sea affairs, have exposed themselves to the imputation of, at least, equal ignorance in learning; and of more than equal inconsiderateness, if not perverseness of mind.

The sacred historian says, (verse 29.) "Fearing lest they should have fallen upon rocks, they cast four anchors out of the stern." This has been thought to be an insurmountable objection. Four anchors! when our largest men-of-war would have but two; and, certainly, would not cast four anchors, and all four from the stern! But, if we inquire into the form and construction of these anchors, and if it should appear, that they were not like our own, the subject will assume a different aspect. And such is the matter of fact. Instead of translating ἀγκύρις ἑσσαράς, "four anchors," it should have been rendered "the four-fluked anchor," the anchor which had four points, flukes, for holding the ground. We have such anchors represented in books of antiquities, and we know further, that such are used in the East, to this day, from representations furnished by Bruce and Norden. Understand Luke, therefore, as saying, "We threw out the best anchor we had; that most likely to hold the ground, and to keep us from driving; even the four-fluked anchor, that it might hold us back from striking against the rocks," and the supposed absurdity disappears at once. If the sailors let go but one anchor, from the stern, they might fairly enough, as verse 30 informs us, pretend to carry out other anchors (whether four-fluked, or not) from the prow of the ship: i. e. affecting to moor the vessel head and stern.

The next difficulty is well stated in Doddridge's note on the passage: (verse 40.) "When they had weighed the anchors, they committed the ship to the sea." Some rather choose to render this, that having cut [away] the anchors, they left them in the sea: and the original indeed is dubious, and will admit of either sense: περικείμεντες τὰς ἀγκύρας, εἰων εἰς τὴν θάλασσαν. (See De Dieu, in loc.) Loosing the rudder-bands; ἀνίπτες τὰς ζευκτηρίας τῶν πηδαλίων. Dr. Benson observes, agreeably to the judgment of Grotius, that their ships in those days had commonly two rudders, one on each side, which were fastened to the ship by bands or chains; and on loosing these bands, the rudders sunk deeper into the sea, and by their weight rendered the ship less subject to be overset by the winds. (Hist. vol. ii. page 256.) But it seems rather, that the rudders had been fastened before, when they had let the vessel drive; and were now loosened, when they had need of them to steer her into the creek: and after they had just been throwing out their corn to lighten the ship, it is not easy to suppose they should immediately contrive a method to increase the weight of it. That they had frequently two rudders to their ships, Bochart and Elsner have confirmed by several authorities. (See Bochart. Hieroz. Part. ii. lib. 4. cap. 1. page 453. and Elsner. Observ. vol. i. page 488, 489.)

The rudder-bands were, as Mr. Taylor has shown from the representations still extant of ancient ships, a kind of brace for the purpose of keeping the rudder steady, and preventing its action against the side of the vessel; in fact, without some such confinement a current of water rushing from under the ship, against the broad part of the rudder, would carry it away, in spite of the strongest arm that might endeavor to retain it. At the same time, the bands prevented that entire play, or freedom of the instrument, which was occasionally necessary. These, then, were knocked off, says Luke; so that the steersman had greater scope for the exertions of his arms, as circumstances required, than he could possibly have while they remained in their places.

There are two words used to describe vessels in Isa. xxxiii. 21. "Therein shall go no galley [Ani, ship] with oars; nor gallant ship" [Tzi addir]; where tzi seems to be the name of a capacious vessel, a vessel of considerable tonnage. (See also Numb. xxiv. 24; Ezek. xxx. 9; Dan. xi. 30.) In Jonah i. 5, we have another word, sephineh, for a ship: "Jonah had descended into the sides of sephineh;" but this seems to be a Chaldee word. Here are, then, several kinds of ships, which were known to the Hebrews.

The most complete description of an ancient ship, however, is that furnished by the prophet Ezekiel, (ch. xxvii.) when comparing the commercial city of Tyre to one of those magnificent constructions, by means of which she carried on her commerce.

For the SHIPS of TARSHISH, see TARSHISH.

SHIPRAH, one of the midwives of Egypt, who preserved the Hebrew children, Exod. i. 15.

SHISHAK, a king of Egypt, who declared war against Rehoboam king of Judah, in the fifth year of his reign. He entered Judea with an innumerable multitude of people, out of Egypt, the countries of Lubim, of Suelim, and of Cush, captured the strongest places in the country, and carried away from Jerusalem the treasures of the Lord's house, and of the king's palace, as well as the golden bucklers of Solomon. Jeroboam having secured the friendship of Shishak, his territories were not invaded, 2 Chron. xii.; 1 Kings xiv. 25, 26. See EGYPT, p. 373, and PHARAOH.

SHITTIM, a valuable kind of wood, of which Moses made the greater part of the tables, altars and planks belonging to the tabernacle. Jerome says, "The shittim wood grows in the deserts of Arabia, that it is like white thorn in its color and leaves, but not in its size, for the tree is so large, that it affords very long planks. The wood is hard, tough, smooth, without knots, and extremely beautiful; so that the rich and curious make screws of it for their presses. It does not grow in cultivated places, nor in any other places of the Roman empire, but only in the deserts of Arabia." He also says, that shittim wood resembles white thorn, and is of admirable beauty, solidity, strength and smoothness. From this description, it is thought he means the black Acacia, which is found in the deserts of Arabia, and the wood of which is very common about mount Sinai, on the mountains which border on the Red sea, and is so hard and solid as to be almost incorruptible. It is by no means certain, however, that the Acacia is the wood described by the Hebrew shittim. The LXX, unable to identify it, have rendered the word, "incorruptible wood."

SHOBACH, general of the army of Hadadezer, king of Syria, was defeated by David at Helam, 2 Sam. x. 16, &c.

SHOBI, son of Nahash, of the city of Rabbah, came with Barzillai to meet David when he fled from Absalom, and brought him refreshments, 2 Sam. xvii. 27.

SHOCH, see SOCH.

SHOES. Among the Hebrews, women of fashion and property wore very valuable shoes, of which the instance of Judith affords proof, chap. xvi. 9. The military shoe, as we see from Moses, was sometimes of metal, (Deut. xxxiii. 25.) and from the description of the armor of Goliath, we find he had boots of brass, 1 Sam. xvii. 6. Homer gives to his heroes boots of brass, others of copper. In the army of Antiochus the Great, luxury was so great, that most of the soldiers had golden nails under their shoes. See SANDAL.

SHOULDER. To give or lend the shoulder, for bearing a burden, signifies to submit to servitude; Gen. xlix. 15. The preacher advises his pupil to submit his shoulder to the yoke of wisdom, Ecclus. vi. 26. Barnah (ii. 21.) advises the captive Jews at Babylon to submit their shoulders to king Nebuchadnezzar, that they might live more comfortably under his government. In a contrary sense, Scripture calls that a rebellious shoulder, (Neh. ix. 29.) which will not submit to the yoke. (See Zeph. iii. 9.)

Marks of honor and command were worn on the shoulder; and Job, (xxx. 36.) when he desires of God to decide his cause: "Surely I would take it upon my shoulder, and bind it as a crown to me." Isaiah (ix. 6.) says, that the Messiah shall bear the insignia of his government on his shoulder; and God promises Eliakim, son of Hilkiah, to give him "the key of the house of David, and to lay it upon his shoulder."

The respect paid by offering the shoulder of animals to God, and to men of distinction, as the most delicate part, should not be overlooked. So the shoulder of the heave-offering, at the consecration of priests was to be sanctified, (Exod. xxix. 27.) and the shoulder of the Nazarite's offering was to be waved, Numb. xvi. 19. So Samuel showed a mark of the greatest respect to Saul, by reserving the shoulder for his eating, (1 Sam. ix. 24.) i. e. he treated him as king elect. It is probable that the right shoulder had the preëminence; and this became the property of the priest who officiated. (Compare Lev. vii. 32, 34; viii. 25; ix. 21; x. 14.)

I. SHUAH, of Asher, daughter to Heber, 1 Chron. vii. 32.

II. SHUAH, daughter of Hirah the Adullamite, and wife of the patriarch Judah. She was mother of Er, Onan, and Shelah, Gen. xxxviii. 2.

SHUAL, a country in Israel, which the Philistines invaded in the time of Saul, (1 Sam. xiii. 17.) but the situation of it is not known.

SHUBAEL, son of Anram, and father of Jehdeiah, (1 Chron. xxiv. 20.) was head of the thirteenth order among the twenty-four families of the Levites, 1 Chron. xxv. 20.

SHUHAM, son of Dan; head of a family, Numb. xvi. 42. In the parallel passage, Gen. xli. 23, it is HUSHIM.

SHULAMITE, or SULAMITH, the name of the bride in Canticles, vi. 13. See CANTICLES, p. 249.

SHUMATHITES were the inhabitants of Shema, (Josh. xv. 26.) or sons of Shobal, 1 Chron. ii. 53.

SHUNEM, a city of Issachar, Josh. xix. 18. The Philistines encamped at Shunem, in the great field or plain of Esdraelon; (1 Sam. xxviii. 4.) and Saul encamped at Gilboa. Eusebius places Shunem five miles south of Tabor. He also mentions a place called Samin, in Aerabatene, in the neighborhood of Sebaste, or Samaria.

SHUR, a city in Arabia Petraea, which gave name to the desert of Shur, Gen. xvi. 7; Exod. xv. 22; 1 Sam. xv. 7; xxvii. 8. See EXODUS, p. 464.

I. SHUSHAN, (Ps. lx.) or SHOSHANNIM, (Ps. xlv. lxix.) the name of a musical instrument. The word signifies a lily, or lilies; and if the instrument were so named from its similarity to this flower, we might understand the cymbal.

II. SHUSHAN, or SUSAN, the capital city of Elam, or Persia, (Dan. viii. 2.) on the river Ulai. It was the winter residence of the Persian kings, after Cyrus. Here Daniel had the vision of the ram and he-goat in the third year of Belshazzar, Dan. viii. Nehemiah was also at Shushan, when he obtained from Artaxerxes permission to return into Judea, and to repair the walls of Jerusalem, Neh. i. 1.

The present Shouster, the capital of Chuzistan, is generally believed to be the ancient Susa; but Mr. Kinneir rather thinks the ruins about thirty-five miles west of Shouster are those of that ancient residence of royalty, "stretching not less, perhaps, than twelve miles from one extremity to the other. They occupy an immense space between the rivers Kerah and Abzal; and, like the ruins of Ctesiphon, Babylon and Kufa, consist of hillocks of earth and rubbish covered with broken pieces of brick and colored tile.

The largest is a mile in circumference, and nearly one hundred feet in height; another, not quite so high, is double the circuit. They are formed of clay and pieces of tile, with irregular layers of brick and mortar, five or six feet in thickness, to serve, as it should seem, as a kind of prop to the mass. Large blocks of marble, covered with hieroglyphics, are not unfrequently here discovered by the Arabs, when digging in search of hidden treasure; and at the foot of the most elevated of the pyramids (ruins) stands the tomb of Daniel, a small and apparently a modern building, erected on the spot where the relics of that prophet are believed to rest." Major Rennel coincides in the opinion that these ruins represent the ancient Shusa; but Dr. Vincent determines for Shuster. The site of Shusa is now a gloomy wilderness, infested by lions, hyenas, and other beasts of prey, the dread of whom compelled Mr. Monteith and Mr. Kinnear to take shelter for the night within the walls that encompass Daniel's tomb, a small modern building, which is supposed to mark the site of the prophet's place of sepulture.

SIBBECHAI, a hero in David's army, who killed the giant Saph, in the battle of Gob, or Gazer, 2 Sam. xxi. 18.

SIBMAH, see SHIBMAH.

SIBRAIM, or SABARIM, the northern boundary of the Land of Promise. Ezekiel says, (chap. xlvii. 16.) it lay between the confines of Hamath and Damascus.

SICHAR, see SHECHEM.

SIDON, or ZIDON, now called Saïde, is a celebrated city of Phœnicia, on the Mediterranean sea, north of Tyre and Sarepta. It is one of the most ancient cities in the world, (Gen. xlix. 13.) and is believed to have been founded by Sidon, the eldest son of Canaan. In the time of Homer, the Sidonians were eminent for their trade and commerce, their wealth and prosperity. Upon the division of Canaan among the tribes by Joshua, Sidon fell to the lot of Asher; (Josh. xix. 28.) but that tribe never succeeded in obtaining possession, Judg. i. 31. The Sidonians continued long under their own government and kings, though sometimes tributary to the kings of Tyre. They were subdued, successively, by the Babylonians, Egyptians, Seleucidæ and Romans, the latter of whom deprived them of their freedom. Many of the inhabitants of Sidon became followers of our Saviour, (Mark iii. 8.) and there was a Christian church there, when Paul visited it on his voyage to Rome, Acts xxvii. 3. It is at present, like most of the other Turkish towns in Syria, dirty and full of ruins, though there is a considerable trade carried on there. Its present population is estimated at from 8000 to 10,000.

Among the medals of Sidon collected by Mr. Taylor, are some with a Greek inscription, "to the Sidonian goddess," which agrees exactly with the appellation in 1 Kings xi. 5, 33: "Ashtoreth, goddess of the Sidonians." They have also Phœnician inscriptions on them, and the date is supposed to be 155—183, from the era of the Seleucidæ.

SIGN, a token, or whatever serves to express, or represent, another thing. Thus the Lord gave to Noah the rainbow, as a sign of his covenant, (Gen. ix. 12, 13.) and for the same purpose he appointed circumcision to Abraham, Gen. xvii. 11. (See also Exod. iii. 12; Judg. vi. 17.) In Isa. vii. 18, the word is used for a prophetic similitude, "Behold, I and the children whom the Lord hath given me, are for signs and for wonders in Israel." (See also Ezek. iv. 3, and Eye, ad fin.)

SIHON, king of the Amorites, on refusing passage to the Hebrews, and coming to attack them, was himself slain, his army routed, (Numb. xxi. 21—24; Dent. i. 4; ii. 24, 26, 30; Ps. cxxxv. 11; cxxxvi. 19.) and his dominions distributed among Israel.

SIHOR, a river, by some thought to be the Nile; but more probably the little river in the south of Judah. (See Josh. xiii. 3, and EGYPT, RIVER OF.) [In Is. xxiii. 3, and Jer. ii. 18, this name must necessarily be understood of the Nile. R.]

SILAS, (Acts xv. 22.) and SILVANUS, (2 Cor. i. 19.) the former name being a contraction of the latter; one of the chief men among the first disciples, and thought by some to have been of the number of the seventy. On occasion of a dispute at Antioch, on the observance of the legal ceremonies, Paul and Barnabas were chosen to go to Jerusalem, to advise with the apostles; and they returned with Judas and Silas. Silas joined himself to Paul; and after Paul and Barnabas had separated, (Acts xv. 37—41. A. D. 51.) he accompanied Paul to visit the churches of Syria and Cilicia, and the towns and provinces of Lycania, Phrygia, Galatia and Macedonia, &c. See PAUL.

Silas was very useful in preaching the gospel, (2 Cor. i. 19.) and some refer to him what Paul says to the Corinthians: (2 Cor. viii. 18, 19.) "And we have sent with him the brother, whose praise is in the gospel, throughout all the churches; and not that only, but who was also chosen of the churches to travel with us, with this grace which is administered by us to the glory of the same Lord," &c. Peter conveyed his First Epistle to the persons to whom he addressed it by the hand of Silas, whom he calls "a faithful brother."

SILK. The question whether silk were known to the ancients may seem, at first sight, to have little relation to biblical inquiry; but it leads to matters of some importance. For when we read in the Acts, of Lydia, a seller of purple, we are naturally led to inquire what was the subject of that color; was it woollen, or linen, or cotton? To answer these questions properly, demands some previous inquiry. It is certain that silk was imported into Europe, ages before the silk-worm that produces it; and it much resembled the hanks, known at present, in form, color and substance. In this state it was called holoserica, or whole silk; and a method was discovered of separating the threads, and working them up again, in a thinner state, so that when woven the web resembled the modern gauze. It appears that Pampbila, a woman of Coa, first practised this art; and that the Coan vests, which were so transparent as to be called by a poet "woven air," were of this manufacture; though it is possible that they might originally be of cotton, or fine muslin. Silk was manufactured at Tyre and Berytus, as well singly, as intermixed with other materials. If so, it might easily form dresses for the use of the rich man in the parable, who wore purple. But this leads to inquiry, whether purple were silk.

It is well known that the dress of the Roman nobility was purple; but Ammianus Marcellinus complains that "the celebrated silk of the Seres anciently composed the dress of the Roman nobility, but was, in his days, the extravagant and indiscriminate clothing of the lower ranks." Here the silk is synonymous with purple; or it is stained with purple; as in the Hippolytus of Seneca, Act ii. sc. 1.

Juvenal says, that "formerly the provinces were not plundered of their property, of conchyliæ Coa, the purple dyed at Coa; vestes Coæ conchyliatæ, that is, purpura infectæ, says a commentator. These, as we have seen, might be of silk. It may well be thought, that silk, in different states, would receive different appellations; in its entire state holosericum, in another state byssus, in its thinnest and dyed state hysginum, or bombycinum, which certainly was a state of extreme thinness; whence we find Martial alluding to its transparency: (viii. 68.) "Femineum lucet sic per bombycina corpus." And Apuleius (Metam. x.) notices the same. Isidorus, in his Glossary, explains bombycinare, by "to make purple;" bombycinatores, by "those who dye purple." Suidas also says, "byssus is dye'd purple;" and Hesychius explains byssinon by porphyron, purple. It is true that these authorities are mostly later than Luke; yet, if we may rely on them, they prove sufficiently that the "purple" of that sacred writer might be silk.

If these notions be correct, they illustrate the extreme effeminacy of the rich man in the parable; they add to our acquaintance with the history of Lydia; they show the prodigality of the mother of harlots, (Rev. xvii. 4.) who was clad in purple and scarlet; silk of the most costly and gaudy colors, the favorite dress of public prostitutes; nor less the cause of the lamentations of the merchants, who had lost her custom for "purple, and silk, and scarlet;" (chap. xviii. 12.) that is to say, for silk in its thinner and dyed state, the bombycina already described; also silk in its more solid texture, and perhaps tissue or brocade; or rather enriched with gold, silver, and pearls, as Mr. Morier describes the dress of the queen of Persia: "rendered so cumbersome by the quantity of jewels embroidered on it, that she could scarcely move under its weight. Her trowsers, in particular, were so engrafted with pearl, that they looked more like a piece of mosaic than wearing apparel." (Trav. vol. ii. p. 61.)

That silk is expressly mentioned in this passage of the Revelation, under the term sericum, is clear; also, that the royal dress of Herod Agrippa, which reflected the rays of light in such a manner as to give him the appearance of a deity, though covered with gold, was of silk, is not improbable. Further evidence that silk was known, and in fact, was common, though costly, among the ancients, might be deduced from the Herculaneum pictures; the changing and interwoven colors of certain dresses—transparent dresses, worn by the women dancers, exceed what may be thought possible in cotton.

Further, our translators render Prov. xxxi. 22, "She maketh herself coverings of tapestry, [brocaded, suppose,] her clothing is silk and purple." Not purple in the sense of bombycina or gauze, perhaps, (unless any suppose this gauze was a transparency over the silk petticoat, as the term rendered "clothing" denotes,) but, referring to the Tyrian dye, the color. It seems difficult to deny that if Solomon's ships sailed to India, they might import specimens of silk; but how far the article could be used by "virtuous women" generally, may be questioned; however closely such good housewives might resemble "merchant ships which bring their lading from afar." Yet, if silk were known in Judea, in the days of Solomon, it might with much certainty be supposed to be known to Ezekiel, (chap. xvi. 10, 13.) or it might be known to him in Persia, although of great rarity in Judea; for Aristotle describes silk as an Assyrian manufacture. Our translators have with great judgment restricted to the margin of Gen. xli. 42, "Pharaoh arrayed Joseph in vestures of silk." It is more probable that "fine linen, as in the text, (or the calico muslin of modern days,) is the article there intended.

Perhaps, in those early days the production of silk was restricted to China.

SILOAM, SILOE, or SILOA, a fountain under the walls of Jerusalem, on the east, between the city and the brook Kidron. It is, no doubt, the same as Enrogel, or the fuller's fountain, Josh. xv. 7; xviii. 16; 2 Sam. xvii. 17; 1 Kings i. 9. Josephus often speaks of the waters of Siloam, and says, that when Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem, they increased; and that the same happened when Titus besieged the city. Isaiah (viii. 6.) intimates, that the waters of Siloam flowed gently and without noise: "Forasmuch as this people refuseth the waters of Siloah, that go softly."

Reland says (Antiq. Heb. part iv. cap. 6.) that there was a custom of drawing water out of the fountain of Siloam, and pouring it out before the Lord, in the temple, at the time of evening sacrifice; and to this there seems to be some allusion in John vii. 37. That Siloam was the nearest fountain, and not far from the temple, appears by our map of Jerusalem, which also contributes to the better understanding of the narrative of the man blind from his birth, who was directed by our Lord to "wash in the pool of Siloam." Whiston connected the last verse of John viii. with the first of chap. ix. thus—"Jesus concealed himself, and withdrew from the Jews, who would have stoned him, and went out of the temple, passing through the midst of them, and passed on—in that manner—and as he passed on, he saw a man blind from his birth . . . to whom he said, 'Go wash in the pool of Siloam.'"—Now, if our Lord went out of the temple by one of the west gates into the city, then he might meet with this blind man pretty close to the temple; and most likely he sent him to Siloam, as the nearest fountain in which he might wash: so that there was no affectation in our Lord's conduct, (such as directing him through the most public streets of the city, in order to give this cure the greater notoriety,) but a simplicity, readiness and neatness, very agreeable to his general character; while, at the same time, it continued that allusion to the benefits derivable from the pool of Siloam, (which is, by interpretation sent,) which our Lord had made in the former chapter.

[The following description of the fountain of Siloam is from the journal of Messrs. Fisk and King, under date of April 28, 1823: "Near the south-east corner of the city, [Jerusalem,] at the feet of Zion and Moriah, is the pool of Silcah, (See Neh. iii. 15.) whose waters flow with gentle murmur from under the Holy mountain of Zion, or rather from under Ophel, having Zion on the west, and Meriah on the north. The very fountain issues from a rock, twenty or thirty feet below the surface of the ground, to which we descended by two flights of steps. Here it flows out without a single murmur, and appears clear as crystal. From this place it winds its way several rods under the mountain, then makes its appearance with gentle gurgling, and, forming a beautiful rill, takes its way down into the valley, towards the south-east. We drank of the water, both at the fountain, and from the stream, and found it soft, of a sweetish taste, and pleasant. The fountain is called in Scripture the "Pool of Silcah." It was to this, that the blind man went, and washed, and came seeing, John ix. 7—11." (Missionary Herald, 1824, p. 66.) R.

SILVANUS, see SILAS.

SILVER, one of the precious metals. See MONEY and SHEKEL.

S. SIMEON, son of Jacob and Leah; born A. M.

The tribes of Simeon and Levi were scattered, and dispersed in Israel, in conformity with the prediction of Jacob, Gen. xlix. 5. Levi had no compact lot, or portion; and Simeon received for his portion only a district dismembered from the tribe of Judah, (Josh. xix.) with some other lands they overran in the mountains of Seir, and in the desert of Gedor, 1 Chron. iv. 21, 39, 42. The Targum of Jerusalem, and the rabbins, followed by some ancient fathers, believe, that the greater part of the scribes, and men learned in the law, were of this tribe; and as these were dispersed throughout Israel, we see another accomplishment of Jacob's prophecy; for although Jacob meant the dispersion of Simeon and Levi as an evil, a degradation, yet Providence might overrule it to be an honor. So Levi had the priesthood, and Simeon the learning, or writing authority, of Israel, whereby both these tribes were honorably dispersed among the nation.

The sons of Simeon were Jemuel, Jamin, Ohad, Jachin, Zohar, and Shaul, (Exod. vi. 15.) whose descendants amounted to 59,300 men at the exodus; (Numb. i. 22.) but only 22,200 entered the Land of Promise, the rest dying in the desert, because of their murmurings and impiety, Numb. xxvi. 14. The portion of Simeon was west and south of that of Judah; having the tribe of Dan and the Philistines north, the Mediterranean west, and Arabia Petraea south, Josh. xix. 1—9.

II. SIMEON, uncle of Mattathias, father of the Maccabees, of the race of the priests, and of the posterity of Phinehas, 1 Mac. ii. 1.

III. SIMEON, a pious old man at Jerusalem, full of the Holy Spirit, who was expecting the redemption of Israel, Luke ii. 25, &c. It had been revealed to him, that he should not die, before he had seen the Christ of the Lord; and he therefore came into the temple, prompted by inspiration, just at the time when Joseph and Mary presented our Saviour there, in obedience to the law. Simeon took the child in his arms, gave thanks to God, and blessed Joseph and Mary. We know nothing further concerning him.

IV. SIMEON, or SIMON, son of Cleophas and Mary, and probably the same whom Mark names Simon, ch. vi. 3. It is probable that he was among the first disciples of Christ. After the death of James (A. D. 62.) the apostles, the disciples, and the kindred of Christ assembled, to nominate a successor in the church of Jerusalem, and unanimously elected Simeon. (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. 32.) He probably withdrew with the rest of the faithful to Pella, beyond Jordan, during the war of the Jews against the Romans. Eusebius says that when the emperor Trajan made strict inquiry for all who were of the race of David, Simeon was accused before Atticus the governor of Palestine. He adds, that he endured many tortures, and at last was crucified, about A. D. 107, after he had governed the church of Jerusalem about 43 years.

I. SIMON THE JUST, high-priest of the Jews, was promoted to this dignity, A. M. 3702, or 3703, and died A. M. 3711. He was son and successor of Onias I. (Joseph. Ant. xii. 2.)

II. SIMON, another high-priest of the Jews, son of Onias II. was advanced to the high-priesthood, A. M. 3785, and died A. M. 3805, Eccles. i. 1, 2, 3. There are several other high-priests of the Jews bearing this name, mentioned by Josephus.

III. SIMON MACCABEUS, son of Mattathias, and brother of Judas and Jonathan, was chief, prince and pontiff of the Jews, from A. M. 3860 to 3869, and was succeeded by John Hircanus, his son. Simon contributed greatly by his valor and wisdom to advance the happiness of his nation, and to render it prosperous and secure. He took Joppa, and made a harbor of it to improve the trade of the Jews; and every way extended the limits of his country. He was at length treacherously killed by his son-in-law Ptolemy, son of Ambubus, 1 Mac. ii. 65, et passim.

IV. SIMON, of the tribe of Benjamin, and superintendent of the temple, 2 Mac. iii. 4, 5.

V. SIMON THE CYRENIAN, father of Alexander and Rufus, was compelled by the Jews to carry the cross after Jesus, Matt. xxvii. 32; Mark xv. 21. But nothing is known of him further.

VI. SIMON THE CANAANITE, or SIMON ZELOTES, an apostle of Jesus Christ. Luke gives him the surname of Zelotes, the zealot, (Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13.) which is supposed by some to be a translation of the surname Canaanite, given him by the other evangelists, Matt. x. 4; Mark iii. 18. The particulars of his life are unknown; nor does it appear where he preached, or where he died. See ZELOTES.

VII. SIMON THE PHARISEE, with whom Jesus dined, after he had raised the child of the widow of Nain, Luke vii. 36, A. D. 31. While they were at table, a woman, noted for her ill life, entered the room, poured perfume on the feet of Jesus, wiped them with her hair, and washed them with her tears. Simon was displeased with her conduct, but was reproved by Jesus; who forgave the sinner, and condemned the unforgiving Pharisee by a similitude.

VIII. SIMON THE LEPER dwelt at Bethany, near Jerusalem, (Matt. xxvi. 6; Mark xiv. 3; John xi. 12.) and Jesus, coming thither a few days before his passion, was invited to eat with him. Lazarus, who had been raised from the dead some time before, was at table with them, and Martha, his sister, was very busy in attendance. Mary, the other sister of Lazarus, to show her love and respect for our Saviour, brought a box of perfumes, which she poured on his feet.

IX. SIMON NIGER, or THE BLACK, (Acts xiii. 1.) was among the prophets and teachers of the Christian church at Antioch. Some think he was Simon the Cyrenian; but there is no other proof of this, than the similitude of names, which Calmet thinks is not a good one, since Luke always calls Simon the Cyrenian by the name of Simon; but Simon Niger, by the name of Simeon. Mr. Taylor remarks, however, that if Calmet could think, as he did, Simeon, bishop of Jerusalem, to be the same as Simon our Lord's cousin, it could require no great exertion to infer the identity of Simon the Cyrenian with Simon Niger. Besides, it is certain that Luke, who calls Simon Peter by the name of Simon, also calls him Simeon, in reporting the speech of James, Acts xv. 14. If, then, Simon and Simeon denote the same person in this instance, why may they not in the instance of Simon the Cyrenian and Simon Niger?

X. SIMON THE TANNER, a person at Joppa, in whose house Peter lodged, when the messengers from Cornelius the centurion came to him, Acts x.

XI. SIMON MAGUS, or THE SORCERER. Philip

the deacon, coming to preach at Samaria, (Acts viii. 5—13.) converted many, and among others this Simon also believed, and was baptized. The apostles Peter and John subsequently communicated the Holy Spirit to those baptized by Philip; at which Simon offered money to them, saying, "Give me also this power." Peter replied with great indignation, "Thy money perish with thee, . . . thou art in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity." Luke adds, (Acts viii. 9—11.) that Simon had addicted himself to magic before Philip came to Samaria, and by his impostures and enchantments had seduced the people, who said, "This man is the great power of God."

Irenæus says, that after Peter had rejected, with horror, his proposal of selling the power of imparting the Holy Spirit, Simon fell into much greater errors and abominations; applying himself to magic more than ever, taking pride in withstanding the apostles, and infecting a great number of persons with his impious errors. For this purpose, it is said, he left Samaria, and travelled through several provinces; seeking places where the gospel had not yet reached, that he might prejudice the minds of men against it.

At Tyre, Theodoret says, he bought a public prostitute, called Selene, or Helene, and carried her with him, committing crimes in secret with her. Having run through several provinces, and made himself admired by vast numbers of persons, for his false miracles and impostures, he came to Rome in the time of the emperor Claudius, about A. D. 41, where it is said by Justin that he was honored as a deity by the Romans, and by the senate itself, who decreed a statue to him, in the isle of Tiber, with this inscription—To Simon, the holy God. Simoni Deo sancto. This fact, however, is disputed by able critics, who think Justin mistook a statue dedicated to Semo Sancus, a pagan deity, for one erected Simoni sancto.

As to the heresies of Simon; in addition to those imputed to him, Acts viii. 10, the fathers accuse him of pretending to be the great power of God; of affirming that he came down as the Father in respect of the Samaritans, as the Son in respect of the Jews, and as the Holy Spirit in respect of the Gentiles; but that it is indifferent which of these names he went by. Jerome quotes these blasphemous expressions out of one of his books: "I am the word of God; I am the beauty of God; I am the comforter; I am the Almighty; I am the whole Essence of God." He was the inventor of the Æons, which were so many persons of whom they composed their deity. His Helene he called the first intelligence, the mother of all things, and sometimes, the Holy Ghost, Prunice, or Minerva. He said, that by this first intelligence he had originally a design of creating the angels; but that she, knowing this will of her father, had descended lower, and had produced the angels, and the other spiritual powers, to whom she had given no knowledge of her father; that these angels and powers had afterwards made angels and men; that Helen had passed successively into the bodies of various women; among others into that of Helen, wife of Menelaus, who occasioned the war of Troy; and at last into the body of this Helen of Tyre.

He did not acknowledge Christ to be the Son of God, but considered him as a rival, and pretended himself to be the Christ. He believed not the resurrection of the body, but barely a resurrection of the soul. He taught that men need not trouble themselves about good works, all actions being indifferent, and that the distinction of actions into good and evil was only introduced by the angels, to render men subject to them. He rejected the law of Moses, and said he had come to abolish it. He ascribed the Old Testament to the angels; and though he every where declared himself an enemy to angels, yet he paid them an idolatrous worship, pretending, that men could not be saved, without offering to the supreme Father abominable sacrifices, by means of the principalities that he placed in each heaven. He offered them his sacrifices; not to obtain assistance from them, but to prevail with them that they might not oppose men. The sect of heretics which were called Simonians were descended from him. (De Tillemont, Hist. Eccl. tom. ii. § 5.)

SIMOOM, see WINDS.

SIMPLE is sometimes taken in an ill sense, in Scripture. Paul (Rom. xvi. 19.) would have the Romans "wise unto good, and simple concerning evil; that is, discerning in their choice of good; but avoiding whatever has the appearance of evil, as children who, without much reasoning, fly from every thing that does but seem hurtful to them. We read, (Prov. xxiii. 3.) "A wise man foreseeth the evil; but the simple [the unthinking, the heedless] pass on and are punished." Simple is sometimes opposed to deception; to an unjust, or a wicked person. It stands for sincerity, fidelity, innocence, candor. In this sense Jacob is called a plain, or simple man, Gen. xxv. 27. Wisdom is given to the simple, Prov. i. 4; xxi. 11.

Simple is capable of a good, a bad, or an indifferent meaning. Simplicity of mind is integrity, innocence of intention, &c. (Rom. xvi. 19.) honesty, candor, xii. 8. Weak simplicity, on the contrary, is credulous, easily imposed on, easily deluded. Prov. xix. 15; xx. 3. The simple believe every word, report, rumor; the simple pass on and are punished: they do not look before them, or take proper steps to avoid evil. Wisdom invites the simple, the uninforming, the uneducated, to learn of her, to partake of her refreshments, and to be revived by her delicacies, Prov. ix. 4. (See also Ps. xix. 7; cxvi. 6; Ezek. xlv. 20; 2 Cor. i. 12; xi. 3.)

I. SIN, or ZIN, a desert south of the Holy Land, in Arabia Petrea, the wilderness of Sin. Scripture distinguishes two deserts of Sin, one being written סין, sin, with sanech; the other, זין, with tsade. The former was near Egypt, on the coast of the Red sea, Exod. xvi. 1; xvii. 1. The latter is also south of Palestine, but toward the Dead sea, Deut. xxxii. 51; Num. xiii. 21; xxvii. 14; xxxiv. 3; Josh. xv. 3. See EXODUS, p. 419.

II. SIN, (Ezek. xxx. 15, 16), the city Pelusium, in Egypt, the easternmost city of that kingdom, situated among marshes, and now inundated by the Mediterranean. (See ROSENNI, Bib. Geogr. iii. 244.) R.

III. SIN, or SIXIM, (Isa. xlix. 12.) is thought by Mr. Taylor, Dr. Morrison, and other writers, to be China, which Dr. Hagar, in two very learned tracts, has attempted to prove was well known to the Greeks, in early ages; and that the trade in silk was the life and soul of their intercourse with it. So also Gesenius.

SIN is any thought, word, desire, action, or omission of action, contrary to the law of God, or defective when compared with it. The Hebrews have several words for expressing sin. They think, for example, that (1.) חטאת, Chataath, signifies a sin committed against a positive precept; (2.) אשמה, Ashamath, a sin committed against a negative precept; and (3.) שגגה, Shegagah, a sin of ignorance, forgetfulness, omission, or inadvertency. But it is certain that these terms are often used interchangeably, and that Scripture seldom observes such a distinction. It often calls very great sins by the name of ignorance, or folly; and at other times gives the name of sin to faults of inadvertency.

Sin often denotes the sacrifice of expiation, or the sacrifice for sin—the sin-offering, Lev. iv. 3, 25, 29; v. 6; vii. 2; Ps. xl. 6; Rom. viii. 3. Paul says, for example, that God was pleased that Jesus, who knew no sin, should be our victim of expiation: “for he hath made him to be sin [a sin-offering: for, by analogy of ideas] for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him,” 2 Cor. v. 21. In conformity with this idea, some, for sin lieth at the door, (Gen. iv. 7.) read, thou shouldest lay a sin-offering.

God was not the author of sin, or of death, the consequence of sin; but sin and death entered the world by the malice of the devil, Wisd. i. 13, 14; ii. 24. Adam, by his disobedience, rendered all his posterity depraved, guilty before God: his sin involved them all in death; through him we are born children of iniquity, and are inclined to evil from the womb, 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22; Rom. v. 12; vi. 23; Ps. li. 5; Rom. iii. 23; Gen. viii. 21. Our Saviour, by his death, has recovered life for us; his obedience has reconciled us to God; and he has merited for us the character of children of God.

THE SIN AGAINST THE HOLY GHOST is differently explained by the fathers and interpreters. We believe Athanasius to have been the nearest to the truth. He thinks this sin was chargeable on the Pharisees, because they maliciously imputed the works of Christ to the power of the devil, though they could not but be convinced in their own minds, that they were effected by a good spirit. This also involved a denial of the divinity of the Son, which was clearly proved by his works, works performed by the divine power of the Holy Spirit.

SINAI, a mountain in Arabia Petrea, in the peninsula formed by the two northern arms of the Red sea, and rendered memorable as the spot where the law was given to Israel by the hand of Moses, Exod. xix. &c. There is considerable difficulty in determining the particular spot honored by the Deity for the promulgation of his will to his chosen people, and distinguished in the sacred writings as mount Sinai. According to Burekhardt, Sinai is a prodigious pile of mountains, comprehending many separate peaks, and extending thirty or forty miles in diameter. A peak in this mountain group, called Djebel Mousa, the mount of Moses, is pointed out by tradition as the scene of the wonderful occurrences recorded in Exod. xx. and a higher elevation, separated from it by a deep cleft, and called mount St. Catherine, from a ridiculous legend relative to the miraculous interment, on its summit, of the saint bearing this name, is considered to be the mountain called Horeb, and which is frequently spoken of as belonging to the same aggregation of mountains as Sinai. (Comp. Deut. v.; Exod. xx.) Mr. Conder (Med. Trav. Arabia, p. 144, seq. Amer. ed.) has carefully examined and compared the accounts of Burekhardt and other writers with the Scripture references to Sinai and Horeb, but without arriving at any satisfactory result. (For a full account of Sinai, see EXODUS, p. 412, seq.)

SINCERITY, truth and uprightness; an agreement of the heart and tongue. Sincerity is opposed to double mindedness, or deceit, when the sentiments of the heart are contrary to the language of the lips. The Latin word sincerus is derived from sine and sera, without wax; honey separated from the wax; that is, perfectly pure honey. In Scripture sincere signifies pure, without mixture. Paul (Phil. i. 10.) would have the Philippians to be pure, their behavior innocent, free from offence, “That ye may be sincere and without offence till the day of Christ.” And Peter (2 Epist. iii. 1.) exhorts the pure, sincere mind of the faithful. Paul speaks (1 Cor. v. 8,) of sincerity and truth, or of purity and truth, in opposition to the leavened bread of iniquity. He reproaches the false apostles with not preaching Jesus Christ sincerely, purely, with upright and disinterested sentiments, Phil. i. 15.

SINITE, the descendants of the eighth son of Canaan, who dwelt in the region of mount Lebanon, Gen. x. 17.

I. SION, a name given (Deut. iv. 48.) to one of the elevations of the mountain-ridge called Hermon, which see.

II. SION, the name of one of the mountains on which the city of Jerusalem was built, and on which the citadel of the Jebusites stood when David took possession of it, and transferred his court thither from Hebron, whence it is frequently called the city of David; and from his having deposited the ark here, it is also frequently called “the holy hill.” (See JERUSALEM.) When Dr. Richardson visited this spot, one part of it supported a crop of barley, and another was undergoing the labor of the plough, in which circumstance we have another remarkable instance of the fulfilment of prophecy—“Therefore shall Zion for your sakes be ploughed as a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps,” Mic. iii. 12.

SIRION, see HERMON.

SISERA, a general in the army of Jabin, king of Hazor, (Judg. iv. 2.) was sent by his master against Barak and Deborah, who occupied mount Tabor with an army. He marched with 900 chariots armed with scythes, and a great number of infantry; but, entangling himself among broken ground, was attacked by Barak, at the head of 10,000 men, and entirely routed. Sisera himself fled on foot towards Harosheth of the Gentiles. Approaching the tent of Heber, the Kenite, Jacl, wife of Heber, desired him to enter, and hide himself; but while he was asleep, she drove a tent nail through his temples with a hammer, and fastened him to the ground. See JACL.

SISTER. In the style of the Hebrews, sister has equal latitude with brother. It is used, not only for a sister by natural relation, from the same father and mother, but also for a sister by the same father only, or by the same mother only, or a near relation only, Matt. xiii. 56; Mark vi. 3. Sarah is called sister to Abraham, (Gen. xii. 13; xx. 12.) though only his niece, according to some, or sister by the father's side, according to others. In Leviticus, (chap. xviii. 18.) it is forbidden to wed the sister of a wife; i. e. to marry two sisters; or, according to some interpreters, to marry a second wife, having one already. Literally, “Thou shalt not take a wife over her sister to afflict her;” as if to forbid polygamy. Sometimes the word sister expresses a resemblance of conditions and of inclinations. Thus the prophets call Jerusalem the sister of Sodom, and of Samaria, because that city delighted in the imitation of their idolatry and iniquity, Jer. iii. 8, 10; Ezek. xvi. 45. So Christ describes those who keep his commandments as his brothers and his sisters, Matt. xii. 50.

SITTING, see BED, and EATING.

SIVAN, the name of a Hebrew month; the third of the holy year; the ninth of the civil year, Baruch i. 8. See JEWISH CALENDAR, infra.

SLANDER, an evil report not justly founded; or a rumor without authority, to the disadvantage of another. This is a much greater sin, and more opposed to the true charities of Christianity, than many, to judge by their unregulated discourses, seem to be aware of. (Compare SCANDAL.)

SLAVERY, compulsory servitude. To punish the indignity received from his son Ham, Noah foretold the slavery of his descendants, Gen. ix. 25. The descendants of Abraham always valued themselves on their liberty. "We have never been servants to any," said the Jews, John viii. 33. And Paul magnifies the liberty of the true children of Abraham, as being really free, born of a free mother, in opposition to the race of Ishmael, born of a mother who was a slave, Gal. iv. 31. The Hebrews have, however, been subject to several princes; to the Egyptians, the Philistines, the Chaldeans, the Grecians, and the Romans. But this is not slavery, in the strict sense of the word.

Moses notices two or three sorts of slaves among the Hebrews; who had foreign slaves, obtained by capture, by purchase, or born in the house. Over these, masters had an entire authority; they might sell them, exchange them, punish them, judge them, and even put them to death, without public process. In which the Hebrews followed the rules common to other nations.

In Exodus xxi. Moses enacts regulations concerning Hebrew slaves: "If thou buy a Hebrew servant, six years he shall serve, and in the seventh he shall go out free for nothing." He adds, "He shall have at going out the same clothes he had at coming in, and his wife shall go out with him." The Hebrew has it, "If he come in by himself [with his body] he shall go out by himself; if he were married, then his wife shall go out with him. If his master have given him a wife, and she hath borne him sons or daughters, the wife and her children shall be her master's, and he shall go out by himself" [with his body.] "If the servant shall plainly say, I love my master, my wife, and my children, I will not go out free; then his master shall bring him unto the judges [Heb. gods]; he shall also bring him to the door, or unto the door-post, [of his master's house,] and his master shall bore his ear through with an awl, and he shall serve him for ever;" (Deut. xv. 17.) according to the commentators, till the year of jubilee; for then all slaves, without exception, recovered their liberty. The rabbins add, that slaves were set free also at the death of their masters, and did not descend to their heirs.

"If a man sell his daughter to be a maid-servant, [or a slave,] she shall not go out as the men-servants do," Exod. xxi. 7. The laws just mentioned do not concern her. There is another kind of jurisprudence for Hebrew girls, than for men or boys. A father could not sell his daughter for a slave, according to the rabbins, till she was at the age of puberty, and unless he were reduced to the utmost indigence. Besides, when a master bought an Israelite girl, it was always with presumption that he, or his son, would take her to wife. Hence Moses adds, "If she please not her master," and he does not think fit to marry her, he shall set her at liberty; or, according to the Hebrew, "He shall let her be redeemed." To sell her into a strange nation he shall have no power, seeing he hath dealt deceitfully with her," as to the engagement intimated, at least, of taking her to wife.

"If he hath betrothed her unto his son, he shall deal with her after the manner of daughters," Exod. xxi. 9, 10. He shall take care that his son uses her as his wife, that he does not despise or maltreat her. If he make his son marry another wife, he shall give her her dowry, her clothes, and compensation for her virginity; or, according to the Hebrew, "If he make his son marry another wife, he shall not diminish the clothes, the maintenance, or the habitation of the former;" intending, it is thought, that the master who bought her, and made his son marry her, if his son marries a second wife, he shall take care that he treats this first woman as his wife; that he allow her food and raiment, and perform the duties of marriage to her as to his true wife; if he do not, "then shall she go out free without money." If the father of a family who had bought an Israelite maid did not marry her, nor make his son marry her; or if he would dismiss her after he had kept her for some time, he was bound to find her a husband, or to sell her to another Hebrew master, on the same conditions that he had taken her himself; giving her a portion, her clothes, and the price of her virginity, agreeable to custom, or as regulated by the judges.

A Hebrew might fall into slavery several ways: (1.) If reduced to extreme poverty, he might sell himself; Lev. xxv. 39. (2.) A father might sell his children as slaves, Exod. xxi. 7. (3.) Insolvent debtors might be delivered to their creditors as slaves, 2 Kings iv. 1. (4.) Thieves not able to make restitution for their thefts, or the value, were sold for the benefit of the sufferers, Exod. xxii. 3. (5.) They might be taken prisoners in war. (6.) They might be stolen, and afterwards sold for slaves, as Joseph was sold by his brethren. (7.) A Hebrew slave redeemed from a Gentile by one of his brethren, might be sold by him to another Israelite.

When Samuel declares to the Hebrews the rights and prerogatives of a king, (1 Sam. viii. 16, 17.) he says, "He shall take your slaves, and your maids, and you yourselves shall be subject to him as slaves." And Goliath says to the Israelites, (1 Sam. xvii. 8, 9.) "Am not I a Philistine, and you servants to Saul? Choose you a man for you, and let him come down to me. And if he be able to fight with me, and kill me, then will we be your servants. But if I prevail against him, and kill him, then shall ye be our servants, and serve us." See SERVANT.

SLEEP, SLEEPING, SLUMBERING, is taken (1.) for the natural sleep or repose of the body; (2.) for the moral sleep of the soul; supineness, indolence, stupidity; (3.) for the sleep of death. (See Jer. li. 39; Dan. xii. 2; John xi. 11; Ephes. v. 14; 2 Pet. ii. 3; Prov. xxiii. 21.)

SLIME, (Gen. xi. 3.) a bituminous production, procured from pits in the earth, out of which it issues, often in considerable quantities. (See BRUMEN.) Slime pits were pits yielding bitumen.

SLING, an instrument of cords, used to throw stones by the arm, with violence; the invention of which is ascribed to the Phenicians, or to the inhabitants of the islands Baleares, now called Majorca and Minorca. The Hebrews made great use of the sling, Judg. xx. 16; 1 Sam. xvii. 49; 1 Chron. xii. 2; 2 Chron. xxvi. 14.

There is a remarkable simile employed by the royal sage, in Prov. xxvi. 8, "As he who bindeth a stone in a sling, so is he who giveth honor to a fool;" i. e. he counteracts his own intention. But the margin reads, perhaps, more correctly, "As he who putteth a precious stone among a heap of stones," that is, pebble; so is honor completely overwhelmed by base companions, if given to a fool.

SMELL. Jacob said to his sons, after the slaughter of the Shechemites, (Gen. xxxiv. 30.) "Ye have troubled me, to make me to stink among the inhabitants of the land"—Ye have given me an ill scent, or smell, among this people. The Israelites in a similar manner complained to Moses and Aaron, (Exod. v. 21.) "The Lord look upon you, and judge, because you have made our savor to be abhorred in the eyes of Pharaoh, and in the eyes of his servants." This manner of speaking occurs frequently in the Hebrew. In a contrary sense, Paul says, (2 Cor. ii. 15, 16.) "We are unto God a sweet savor of Christ, in them that are saved, and in them that perish; to the one we are the savor of death unto death, and to the other the savor of life unto life."

In the sacrifices of the old law, the smell of the burnt-offerings is represented in Scripture as agreeable to God; (Gen. viii. 21.) "And thou shalt burn the whole ram upon the altar; it is a burnt-offering unto the Lord; it is a sweet savor, an offering made by fire unto the Lord." The same thing, by analogy, is said of prayer: (Ps. cxli. 2.) "Let my prayer be set forth before thee as incense; and the lifting up of my hands, as the evening sacrifice." And John, in allusion to this service of the Old Testament, represents the twenty-four elders with "golden vials full of odors, which are the prayers of the saints," Rev. v. 8.

SMITE, to strike. The word is often used for to kill. Thus, David smote the Philistine; i. e. he killed Goliath. The Lord smote Nabal and Uzziah; he put them to death. To smite an army, and is to conquer it, to rout it entirely. To smite with the tongue, is to load with injuries and reproaches, with scandalous reflections. To smite the thigh, denotes indignation, trouble, astonishment, Jer. xxxi. 19.

SMYRNA, a city of Ionia, in Asia Minor, situated on the Archipelago, and having a fine harbor. Our Lord, by the mouth of John, addresses the angel or bishop of Smyrna, (Rev. ii. 8—10.) who is thought to have been Polycarp, the martyr, who was put to death, A. D. 166. Smyrna is still a place of great consideration, having a great foreign trade, and a population of about 140,000.

SNOW, being extremely white, forms a frequent object of comparison in Scripture, Exod. iv. 6; Numb. xii. 10; 2 Kings v. 27. Snow is enumerated among the stores in the treasury of God, his atmospheric meteors, &c. The expression in Prov. xxv. 15, "As the cold of snow in the time of harvest, so is a faithful messenger to them who send him; for he refresheth the soul of his masters," seems to refer to the cooling effect of snow on the wines drank in the East; or to what in Italy is termed alfresco, that is, snow put into water to cool it, previous to its being drank, which is esteemed extremely refreshing. This removes the apparent contradiction of this passage with chap. xxvi. 1. As snow, that is, a fall of snow, in summer, is unnatural, and ill-timed, so honor is not seemly for a fool; but it is quite out of character, out of season.

SO, king of Egypt, made an alliance with Hoshea, king of Israel, and promised him assistance, yet gave none, nor prevented Shalmaneser king of Assyria from taking Samaria, and subverting the kingdom, 2 Kings xvii. 4.

Usher and Marsham think So to be Sabacon, king of Ethiopia, who is taken for the first king of the dynasty of Ethiopians in Egypt, and who, according to Usher, began to reign A. M. 3277, having taken and burnt alive Bocchoris king of this country. He reigned eight years, and had for his successor Sevechus, whom Usher thinks to be the Sethon of Herodotus, lib. ii. cap. 141. [But see the article EGYPT, p. 373; and also under PHARAOH. R.]

SOAP, or FULLER'S SOAP, named in Hebrew borith, signifying the cleanser, is by some supposed to be a salt, extracted from the earth, called by the Arabs bora. But others prefer a vegetable, in accordance with the LXX, who render ποία, or πία, an herb. The ancients certainly employed vegetables, and the salt extracted from them, for the purpose of washing linen. Dioscorides and Pliny mention the struthion as so employed, and the Persians use this plant as soap. The kali, soda, salsola kali, or barilla, is called in the London Pharmacopœia, natron; and there seems to be sufficient reason to consider it as the borith-plant of Jeremiah, (ii. 22.) at least it is the best known to us of those plants which possess the property of cleansing, either by themselves or their salts. In its wild state it rises about a foot in height; the leaves are long, narrow and prickly, the flowers whitish or rose-color. It is found on the sea-shore, and is considered as a sea-weed. The best, burned into a hard mass of salt, comes from Alicant in Spain. Combined with fat, it forms soap, the cleansing virtues of which are well known in every family, Jer. ii. 22; Mal. iii. 2.

SOBRIETY is commonly taken for the opposite to intemperance; sometimes also for moderation, modesty, and that virtue which chooses the golden mean, Rom. xii. 3. Paul (1 Tim. ii. 9.) would have women dress themselves "in modest apparel, with shame-facedness and sobriety," as decency requires. The word sobriety is also taken for vigilance in 1 Tim. iii. 2, "A bishop must be vigilant, sober," prudent, moderate. We have, however, no English word that properly expresses the whole meaning of the term rendered sober. It imports steadiness of mind, prudence, the power of forming a just estimate of things: a sense of what is becoming; which differs, according to time, place and circumstances; together with a suitable behavior and conduct.

SOCOH, or SUOCOH, a city of Judah, (Josh. xv. 35; 1 Sam. xvii. 1.) which Rehoboam afterwards fortified, 2 Chron. xi. 7. Eusebius says, there were two cities of this name, the higher and the lower, nine miles from Eleutheropolis toward Jerusalem. It is also the name of a man, 1 Chron. iv. 18.

SODOM, the capital city of the Pentapolis; and for some time the dwelling-place of Lot, Gen. xiii. 12, 13. Its crimes, however, were so enormous, that God destroyed it by fire from heaven, with three neighboring cities, Gomorria, Zeboim and Admah; which were as wicked as itself, Gen. xix. A. M. 2107. The plain in which they stood was pleasant and fruitful, like an earthly paradise, but it was first burned, and afterwards overflowed by the waters of the Jordan, which formed the present Dead sea, or lake of Sodom. The prophets mention the destruction of Sodom and Gomorria, or allude to it, and intimate, that these places shall be desert, and dried up, and uninhabited; (Jer. xlix. 18; l. 38.) that they shall be covered with briars and brambles, a land of salt and sulphur, where can be neither planting nor sowing, Deut. xxix. 22; Wisd. ii. 9; Amos iv. 11. Throughout Scripture the ruin of Sodom and Gomorria is represented as one of the most signal effects of God's anger. See SEA, Dead.

SOLOMON, son of David and Bathsheba, was born A. M. 2971, ante A. D. 1033. The Lord loved him, and sent the prophet Nathan to give him the name of Jedidiah, that is, Beloved of the Lord, 2 Sam. xii. 24, 25. David gave him an education proportionate to the great designs for which God had ordained him; and on Adonijah's assumption of power (see ADONIJAH) he was anointed king, inaugurated amid the acclamations of the people, and placed on the throne. David's death being at hand, he earnestly recommended to Solomon a strict fidelity and piety towards God; the punishment of Joab and Shimei; but a favorable regard to Barzillai, who had succored him in his distress. He put into his hands plans for building the temple with many regulations civil and sacred; and in a general assembly of the people, and of the great men, he delivered to him his gold, silver and valuable materials, collected for building the temple, and exhorted all present to make each an offering to the Lord, according to his abilities.

From this time Solomon entered on full possession of the kingdom. His first act of importance was to put his brother Adonijah to death, on account of his having intrigued to obtain the throne. He also banished the high-priest Abiathar to his country-house, because he had been of Adonijah's party, and put Joab to death.

Being confirmed in his kingdom, Solomon contracted an alliance with Pharaoh king of Egypt, and married his daughter, whom he brought to Jerusalem. He appointed her apartments in the city of David, till he should build her a palace, which he did some years afterwards, when he had finished the temple. It is thought, that on occasion of this marriage, Solomon composed the Canticles, which are a kind of epithalamium, and also Psalm xlv. Scripture speaks of the daughter of Pharaoh, as contributing to pervert Solomon to idolatry, 1 Kings xi. 1, 2; Neh. xiii. 26. Having presented a thousand burnt-offerings to the Lord, at Gibeon, God appeared to him in a dream, and said, "Ask of me what you desire." Solomon besought to have a wise and understanding heart, and such qualities as were necessary for the government of the people committed to him. This request was agreeable to the Lord, and was fully granted. He enjoyed a profound peace throughout his dominions; Judah and Israel lived in security; and his neighbors either paid him tribute, or were his allies. He ruled over all the countries and kingdoms, from the Euphrates to the Nile, and his dominions extended even beyond the Euphrates. He had abundance of horses and chariots of war. He exceeded the orientals and the Egyptians in wisdom and prudence; he was the wisest of mankind, and his reputation spread through all nations. He composed, or collected, three thousand proverbs, and one thousand and five canticles. He was acquainted with the nature of plants and trees, from the cedar on Lebanon to the hyssop on the wall; also of beasts, of birds, of reptiles, of fishes. There was a concourse of strangers from all countries to hear his wisdom, and ambassadors from the most remote princes. He made gold and silver as common in Jerusalem as stones in the street, and cedars as plentiful as the sycamores in the valley.

Hiram, king of Tyre, sent ambassadors to congratulate his accession to the crown, and subsequently assisted him in building a temple to the Lord, which was completed in seven years. There were employed in this great work, 70,000 proselytes, descendants of the ancient Canaanites, in carrying burdens; 80,000 in cutting stones out of the quarries; and 3600 overseers of the works; besides 30,000 Israelites in the quarries of Libanus. It was dedicated A. M. 3001, and to render the ceremony the more august, Solomon appointed the eighth day of the seventh month of the holy year, and the first of the civil year. The ceremony continued for seven days, at the end of which the Feast of Tabernacles commenced, and continued seven days longer; so that the people continued at Jerusalem fourteen or fifteen days, from the eighth to the twenty-second of the seventh month.

When the ark was placed in the sanctuary, while the priests and Levites were celebrating the praises of the Lord, the temple was filled with a miraculous cloud; so that the priests could no longer continue there, nor perform the functions of their ministry. Solomon prostrated himself on his throne with his face to the ground; and then, rising up, and turning toward the sanctuary, he addressed his prayer to God, and besought him, that the house which he had built might be acceptable to him; that he would bless and sanctify it, and hear the prayers of those who should entreat him from this holy place. He besought him also to fulfil the promises he had made to David his servant, in favor of his family, and of the kings his successors, and then turning himself to the people, he blessed them. Fire coming down from heaven, consumed the victims and burnt-sacrifices on the altar, and the glory of the Lord filled the whole temple. On this occasion there were sacrificed 22,000 oxen and 120,000 sheep for peace-offerings; and the altar of burnt-offerings not being sufficient for all these victims, the court of the people was consecrated for the purpose. The Lord appeared a second time to Solomon in a dream; probably in the night that followed the first day of the dedication, assured him that he had heard his prayer, and chosen the temple to be his house of sacrifice. He also promised to bless him and his posterity, if they were constant in his worship; if not, to punish them, and destroy the sacred edifice.

Solomon afterwards built a sumptuous palace for himself, and another for his queen. He also built the walls of Jerusalem, and the place called Millo, in the city; repaired and fortified Hazor, Megiddo, Gezer, the two Beth-horons, upper and lower, and Baalath, and Palmyra, in the desert of Syria. He also fortified the cities where he had magazines of corn, wine and oil, and those where his chariots and horses were kept. He brought under his government the Hittites, the Hivites, the Amorites and the Perizzites, which remained in the land of Israel, and made them tributaries and laborers on the public works.

Solomon also extended the commerce of the country, and imported largely of foreign produce. He fitted out a fleet at Ezion-geber, and at Elath, on the Red sea, and in conjunction with Hiram, king of Tyre, who furnished him mariners, traded to Ophir for ivory, ebony, precious wood, peacocks, apes, and other curiosities. His annual revenues were 666 talents of gold, without reckoning the tributes from kings and nations, or those paid by Israelites. The bucklers of his guards, and the throne he sat on, were overlaid with gold; and all the vessels of his table, and the utensils of his palaces, were of the same material. From all parts he received presents, vessels of gold and silver, precious stuffs, spices, arms, horses and mules; the whole earth desiring to see his face, and to hear the wisdom which God had put into his heart.

The later actions of his life, however, inflicted a deep disgrace on his character. He took wives and concubines, to the number of 1000, from among the Moabites, Ammonites, Idumeans, Sidonians and Hittites, who perverted his heart, so that he worshipped Ashtoreth of the Sidonians, Moloch of the Ammonites, and Chemosh of the Moabites, to whom he built temples on the mount of Olives. These sins brought on him the judgments of the Lord, who said to him in a dream, "Since you have not kept my covenant, nor obeyed my commandments, I will rend and divide your kingdom, and will give it to one of your servants." Before his death, he saw the commencement of revolt, in the troubles raised by Jeroboam, and Hadad the Idumean. He died, after he had reigned forty years, (A. M. 3029, ante A. D. 975,) at about 58 years of age. His history was written by the prophets Nathan, Ahijah and Iddo; and he was buried in the city of David. Rehoboam his son reigned in his stead, but not over all Israel. See REHOBAM.

Of all the works composed by Solomon, we have nothing remaining but his Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Canticles. Some have ascribed to him the book of Wisdom, and Ecclesiasticus. (See the articles.) The Jews think he was the author of Psalm lxxii. "Give the king thy judgments, O God, and thy righteousness unto the king's son," &c. And Psalm exxvii. "Except the Lord build the house," &c.

SOLOMON'S SONG, see CANTICLES.

SON, a word used in several senses, both in the Old and New Testaments. It denotes (1.) the immediate offspring. (2.) Grandson: so Laban is called son of Nahor, (Gen. xxix. 5.) whereas he was his grandson, being the son of Bethuel: (Gen. xxiv. 29.) Mephibosheth is called son of Saul, though he was the son of Jonathan, son of Saul, 2 Sam. xix. 24. (3.) Remote descendants: so we have the sons of Israel, many ages after the primitive ancestor. (4.) Son-in-law:—There is a son born to Naomi, Ruth iv. 17. (5.) Son by adoption, as Ephraim and Manasseh, to Jacob, Gen. xlviii. (See ADOPTION.) (6.) Son by nation; sons of the East, 1 Kings iv. 20; Job i. 3. (7.) Son by education; that is, a disciple; Eli calls Samuel his son, 1 Sam. iii. 6. Solomon calls his disciple his son, in the Proverbs, often: and we read of the sons of the prophets, (1 Kings xx. 35, et al.) that is, those under a course of instruction for ministerial service. In nearly the same sense a convert is called son, 1 Tim. i. 2; Titus i. 4; Philem. 10; 1 Cor. iv. 15; 1 Pet. v. 13. (8.) Son by disposition and conduct, as sons of Belial, (Judg. xix. 22; 1 Sam. ii. 12.) unrestrainable persons; sons of the mighty, (Ps. xxix. 1.) heroes; sons of the band, (2 Chron. xxv. 13.) soldiers rank and file; sons of the sorceress, who study or practise sorcery, Isa. lvii. 3. (9.) Son in reference to age; son of one year, (Exod. xii. 5.) that is, one year old; son of sixty years, &c. The same in reference to a beast, Micah vi. 6. (10.) A production, or offspring, as it were, from any parent; sons of the burning coal, that is, sparks, which issue from burning wood, Job v. 7. Son of the bow, that is, an arrow, (Job iv. 19.) because an arrow issues from a bow; but an arrow may also issue from a quiver, therefore son of the quiver, Lam. iii. 13. Son of the floor, thrashed corn, Isa. xxi. 10. Sons of oil, (Zech. iii. 14.) the branches of the olive-tree. (11.) Son of beating, that is, deserving beating, Dent. xxv. 3. Son of death; that is, deserving death, 2 Sam. xii. 3. Son of perdition: that is, deserving perdition, John xvii. 12. (12.) Son of God, by excellence above all; Jesus the Son of God, Mark i. 1; Luke i. 15; John i.

34; Rom. i. 4; Heb. iv. 14; Rev. ii. 18. The only-begotten; and in this he differs from Adam, who was son of God, by immediate creation, Luke iii. 18. (13.) Sons of God, the angels, (Job i. 6; xxxviii. 7.) perhaps so called in respect to their possessing power delegated from God; his deputies, his vicegerents, and in that sense among others his offspring. (14.) Genuine Christians, truly pious persons; perhaps also so called in reference to their possession of principles communicated from God by the Holy Spirit, which, correcting every evil bias, and subduing every perverse propensity, gradually assimilates the party to the temper, disposition and conduct, called the image, likeness or resemblance of God. Believers are sons of God. (See John i. 12; Phil. ii. 15; Rom. viii. 14; 1 John iii. 1.) (15.) Sons of this world (Luke xvi. 8.) are those who by their overweening attention to the things of this world, demonstrate their principles to be derived from the world; that is, worldly-minded persons. Sons of disobedience (Eph. ii. 2; v. 6.) are persons whose conduct proves that they are sons of Belial, of unrestrainableness, sons of libertinism. Sons of hell, Matt. xxiii. 5. Sons of the devil, Acts xiii. 10.

In addition to these senses in which the word son is used in Scripture, there are others, which show the extreme looseness of its application. So, when we read of sons of the bride-chamber, (Matt. ix. 15; Mark ii. 19.) it merely indicates the youthful companions of the bridegroom, as in the instance of Samson. And when the Holy Mother was committed to the care of the apostle John, (John xix. 36.) the term son is evidently used with great latitude.

SONG OF SOLOMON, see CANTICLES.

SOOTHSAYER, see DIVINATION, and MAGIC.

SORCERER, see DIVINATION, and MAGIC.

I. SOREK, a place where Delilah dwelt, not far from Zorah and Eshtaul, Samson's usual abode, Judg. xvi. 4.

II. SOREK, VINE OF, a finer and nobler species of vine, yielding, according to the rabbins, the small sweet grapes which seem to have no seeds or kernels, and which are still called in Marocco Sorki. The word, however, may signify red grapes. (See Niebuhr Descr. Arab. p. 147. Germ. edit.) The English version gives the word by choice, noble, &c. Gen. xlix. 11; Isa. v. 2; Jer. ii. 21. R.

SORROW. This passion contracts the heart, sinks the spirits, and injures the health. Scripture cautions against it, (Prov. xxv. 20; Eccles. xiv. 1—3; xxx. 24, 25; 1 Thess. iv. 13, &c.) but Paul distinguishes two sorts of sorrow; one a godly the other a worldly sorrow. 2 Cor. vii. 10, "Godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation, not to be repented of; but the sorrow of the world worketh death." So, the wise man (Eccles. vii. 3.) says that the grave and serious air of a master who reproves, is more profitable than the laughter and caresses of those who flatter. Our Lord upbraided that counterfeit air of sorrow and mortification, which the Pharisees affected when they fasted; and cautioned his disciples against all such affectation, which proposes to gain the approbation of men, Matt. vi. 16.

SOSIPATER, a disciple of Berea, mentioned by Paul, (Rom. xvi. 21.) and who was his kinsman, as some think.

SOSTHENES, the chief of the synagogue of Corinth, who was beaten by the Gentiles, when the Jews carried Paul before Gallio, the pro-consul, Acts xviii. 17.

SOUL. This word is very equivocal, in the style of the Hebrews. It is taken, (1.) For the soul which animates mankind; for that which animates beasts; or for a living person; (2.) For the life, Gen. xxxii. 30. (3) For desire, love, inclination, Numb. xi. 6.

When God had formed the body of man out of the dust, (Gen. ii. 7.) he "breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul;" a living being. This breath of life has been considered by some, as the principle of animal life in man, which, they say, is nothing different from that of beasts. God gives to men and to brutes a breath of life, or a vivifying spirit; "All flesh in which is the breath of life died;" (Gen. vi. 17.) all living animals, sentenced to die by the waters of the deluge. This spirit of life God withdraws at his pleasure, and brings all flesh to corruption, says Job, xxxiv. 14, 15. The psalmist, (civ. 29.) speaking of animals, to which God gives existence, says, "Thou takest away their breath, they die and return to their dust." So Solomon: (Eccles. xii. 7.) "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it." And Paul, speaking to the philosophers of Athens, says, God "giveth to all life, and breath, and all things," Acts xvii. 25.

But, beside this spirit, which is the principle of animal life, common to men and brutes, which is dispersed after death, there is in man a spiritual, reasonable and immortal soul, the origin of our thoughts, desires and reasonings, which distinguishes us from the brute creation, and in which chiefly consists our resemblance to God, Gen. i. 26. This must be spiritual, because it thinks; it must be immortal, because it is spiritual. And though Scripture ascribes both to man and beast a soul, spirit, or life, it allows to man alone the privilege of understanding, the knowledge of God, wisdom, immortality, hope of future happiness, and of eternal life. It threatens men, only, with punishment in another life, and with the pains of hell.

The immortality of the soul is a fundamental doctrine of revealed religion. The ancient patriarchs lived and died persuaded of this truth; and it was in the hope of another life that they received the promises. When Balaam desired that his death might be like that of the just, (Numb. xxiii. 10.) he must have meant in the hope and expectation of a happy resurrection. Another decisive proof, that the Israelites believed in the immortality of the soul, is found in their persuasion, that the souls of the dead sometimes appeared after their decease; as Samuel to Saul, (1 Sam. xxviii. 13—15.) and Jeremiah to Judas Maccabeus, 2 Mac. xv. 14. When the apostles saw Christ walking on the sea, they took him for an apparition; (Matt. xiv. 26.) and after his resurrection he referred to this current belief, Luke xxiv. 39.

The Sadducees, who denied this immortality and resurrection, were regarded by their nation as a kind of heretics and innovators. Those of whom Solomon expresses the sentiments, (Eccles. iii. 19, 20.) were confuted by Solomon himself, who says, (Eccles. xii. 7.) "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it."

SPAIN comprehended in ancient usage the modern kingdoms of Spain and Portugal, i. e. the whole Spanish peninsula. In the time of Paul it was subject to the Romans, and was frequented by many Jews. In Rom. xv. 24, 28, Paul expresses his intention of visiting Spain; but there is no good evidence that he was ever permitted to fulfil his purpose. R.

SPARROW. The Hebrew word tzippor is used not only for a sparrow, but for all sorts of clean birds, or such whose use was not forbidden by the law, and especially for the smaller birds; and in most of the passages where sparrow is read, we may understand a bird of any kind.

SPIDER, a well-known insect, remarkable for the thread which it spins, and with which it forms a web of curious texture, but so frail that it is exposed to be broken and destroyed by the slightest accident. To the slenderness of this filmy workmanship Job compares the hope of the wicked, chap. viii. 14. This, says Mr. Good, was doubtless a proverbial allusion; and so exquisite, that it is impossible to conceive any figure that can more fully describe the utter vanity of the hopes and prosperity of the wicked.

"Deceiving bliss! in bitter shame it ends;
His prop a cobweb, which an insect rears."

So Isaiah says, "They weave the web of a spider; of their webs no garment shall be made; neither shall they cover themselves with their works," chap. lix. 5.

The greater part of modern interpreters, among whom are our own translators, suppose this insect to be intended by Solomon in these words, "The spider taketh hold with her hands, and is in kings' palaces," Prov. xxx. 28. But the wise man uses a different word from the common name of this creature, (scamilla, and not accabish), and subjoins a description, which, in one particular, is by no means applicable to it; for, although several ancient writers have given fingers to the spider, not one has honored her with hands. An ancient poet has accordingly taught her to say, Nulla mihi manus est, pedibus tamen omnia fiunt.

Had Solomon intended to describe the spider, he would not have merely said, "She taketh hold with her hands," but, she spins her thread, and weaves her toils; circumstances assuredly much more worthy of notice; nor would he have said that she takes up her abode in kings' palaces, when she more frequently constructs her dwelling in the cabins of the poor where she resides in greater security and freedom. The opinion of the celebrated Bochart, that the newt, a species of small lizard, is meant, seems, in every respect, entitled to the preference. (Hieroz. vol. ii p. 510.) This reptile answers to the description which the royal preacher gives of her form and habits, and is, according to the testimony of ancient and modern writers, found to take up its abode in the dwelling-houses, in the East.

SPIKENARD. Mr. Taylor has given a very full account of this plant, in his Fragments, (Nat. Hist. No. 33.) derived from the Dissertations of sir William Jones, and Drs. Blane and Roxburgh.

The spikenard (Heb. נרד, nerd, or nard), is a plant belonging to the order of gramina, and is of different species. In India, whence the best sort comes, it grows as common grass, in large tufts close to each other, in general from three to four feet in length. So strong is its aroma, which resides principally in the luskny roots, that when trodden upon, or otherwise bruised, the air is filled with its fragrance. Dr. Blane, who planted some of the roots in his garden, at Luneknow, states, that in the rainy season it shot up spikes about six feet high.

The description of the Nardicus Indica which is given by Pliny, not exactly corresponding with the specimen procured by Dr. Blane, this gentleman very reasonably supposes that other plants of an inferior description, and more easily procurable, used to be substituted for it, and that it is of one of these spurious nards that the Roman naturalist speaks. Horace mentions a Nardus Assyria, and Dioscorides speaks of a Nardus Syriaca, as a species different from the Indica, which certainly was brought from some of the remote parts of India: for both Dioscorides and Galen, by way of fixing more precisely the country whence it comes, call it also Nardus Gangites.

This plant was highly valued among the ancients, both as an article of luxury, and as a medicine. The Unguentum Nardinum, or ointment manufactured from the nard, was the favorite perfume used at the ancient baths and feasts; and it appears from a passage in Horace, that it was so valuable, that so much of it as could be contained in a small box of precious stone was considered a sort of equivalent for a large vessel of wine; and a handsome quota for a guest to contribute to an entertainment, according to the custom of antiquity.

This leads us to notice the narrative of the evangelist, of "a woman, having an alabaster box of ointment of spikenard, very precious; and she brake the box and poured it on his [Christ's] head," Mark xiv. 3. In verse 5, this is said to have been worth more than three hundred pence (denarii); and John (ch. xii. 3.) mentions "a pound of ointment of spikenard, very costly;"—the house was filled with the odor of the ointment;—it was worth three hundred pence (denarii.) As this evangelist has determined the quantity, a pound,—and the lowest value (for Mark says more) was nearly forty dollars, we may safely suppose that this was not a Syrian production, or made from any fragrant grass growing in the neighboring districts; but was of the true Indian spikenard, "very costly." In the answer of our Lord on this occasion, there seems also to be some allusion to the remoteness of the country whence this unguent was brought, "Whosoever this gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world, this also that she hath done, shall be spoken of for a memorial of her," Mark xiv. 9. As much as to say, "This unguent came from a distant country, to be sure, but the gospel shall spread to a much greater distance, yea, all over the world; so that in India itself, whence this composition came, shall the memorial of its application to my sacred person be mentioned with honor." The idea of a far country, connected with the ointment, seems to have suggested that of "all the world."

In Cant. iv. 13, 14, the spikenard is twice mentioned in a peculiar manner: "Camphire with spikenard, spikenard with saffron." Why should this plant be twice named? a question to which no satisfactory answer can be given, unless we suppose, with the writer just named, that the first nard means the Syrian and Arabian plant, which no doubt was familiar to Solomon, and the second, the Indian nard, true spikenard. If this be admitted, the passage is clear, and it is probable that the latter word merely wants some discriminating epithet, answering to spike, which transcribers, not understanding, have dropped; or that a different mode of pronunciation distinguished the names of these two plants when mentioned in discourse. In the printed copies the words are differently pointed, and what is still more deserving attention is, that the first word is nardin, plural; whereas the second seems to be put absolutely, nard, or the nard, singular.

From a similar use of this word in the singular form, in Cant. i. 12, "While the king sitteth at his table, my spikenard sendeth forth the smell thereof," Mr. Taylor inclines to think that this nard was in the form of an essence, in a small bag, or a number of sprigs of the fragrant grass, worn like a nosegay in the bosom of the bride. What seems to strengthen the idea is, that the different perfumes mentioned in connection with it are all flowers in their natural state.

SPIRIT (Heb. רוּחַ, ruach; Greek, Πνεύμα) is a word employed in various senses in Scripture. (1.) For the Holy Spirit, the third person of the Holy Trinity, who inspired the prophets, who animates good men, pours his unction into our hearts, imparts to us life and comfort; and in whose name we are baptized, as well as in that of the Father and the Son. When the adjective holy is applied to the term spirit, we may safely take it as here explained; but there are many places where it must be taken in this sense, although the term holy is omitted. (2.) Breath, respiration, animal life, common to men and animals: this God has given, and this he recalls when he takes away life, Gen. vii. 15; Numb. xvi. 22; Job xii. 10. (3.) The rational soul which animates us, and preserves its being, after the death of the body. That spiritual reasoning and choosing substance, which is capable of eternal happiness. (See SOUL.) (4.) An angel, a demon, a soul separate from the body. It is said, (Acts xxiii. 8.) that the Sadducees denied the existence of angels and spirits. Christ, appearing to his disciples, said to them, (Luke xxiv. 39.) "Handle me, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have." Heb. i. 14, good angels are called ministering spirits. It is said (1 Sam. xvi. 14; xviii. 10; xix. 9.) that "the evil spirit from God came upon Saul." And in the gospel the devils are often called "unclean spirits, evil spirits, spirits of darkness," &c. (5.) Spirit is sometimes taken for the disposition of the mind or intellect; because it was presumed, that the good or evil inclinations of these proceeded from good or bad spirits. So, a spirit of jealousy, a spirit of fornication, a spirit of prayer, a spirit of infirmity, a spirit of wisdom and understanding, a spirit of fear of the Lord, &c. Numb. v. 14; Hos. iv. 12; Zech. xii. 10; Luke xiii. 11; Eccles. xv. 5; Isa. xi. 2.

DISTINGUISHING, OR DISCERNING, OF SPIRITS, was a gift of God, which consisted in discerning whether a man were really inspired by the Spirit of God, or was a false prophet, an impostor, who only followed the impulse of his own spirit, or of Satan. Paul speaks (1 Cor. xii. 10.) of the discerning of spirits, as being among the miraculous gifts granted by God to the faithful, at the first settlement of Christianity. And John exhorts believers not to believe every spirit, but to try the spirits, whether they were of God; because many false prophets had gone out into the world, 1 Epist. iv. 1.

TO QUENCH THE SPIRIT (1 Thess. v. 19.) is a metaphorical expression easily understood. The Spirit may be quenched, (1.) by forcing, as it were, that divine agent to withdraw from us, by sin, irregularity of manners, vanity, avarice, negligence, or other crimes contrary to charity, truth, peace, and his other gifts and qualifications. (2.) The Spirit might have been quenched by such actions as caused God to take away his supernatural gifts and favors, such as prophecy, the gift of tongues, the gift of healing, &c. For though these gifts were of mere grace, and God might communicate them sometimes to doubtful characters, yet he has often granted them to the prayers of the faithful ; and has taken them away, to punish their misuse or contempt of them.

To GRIEVE THE SPIRIT, (Eph. iv. 30.) may also be taken to refer either to an internal grace, habitual or actual, or to the miraculous gifts, with which God favored the primitive Christians. We grieve the Spirit of God, by withstanding his holy inspirations, the motions of his grace ; or by living in a lukewarm and incautious manner ; by despising his gifts, or neglecting them ; by abusing his favors, either out of vanity, curiosity or indifference. In a contrary sense, (2 Tim. i. 6.) we stir up the Spirit of God which is in us, by the practice of virtue, by our compliance with his inspirations, by fervor in his service, by renewing our gratitude, &c.

The spirit, as opposed to the flesh, is put for the soul by which we are animated : (Gen. vi. 3.) "My Spirit shall no longer abide in man, because he is but flesh;" i. e. I will destroy mankind, I will take from them my breath which I gave them, the soul that I infused into them ; because they are all carnal, debased by vile inclinations, by brutish passions ; because, in a word, "all flesh have corrupted their way upon the earth," they have in a great measure forgotten that they are reasonable creatures, and have plunged themselves into the state and condition of beasts. Or it may mean, My Spirit shall not strive with man—to correct him, to repel his wickedness : no ; but I will chastise him severely : his violent inclinations shall feel no check from the gentle admonitions of my benevolent Spirit, but shall have their own way—his flesh shall not be thwarted, but shall prove his ruin—at least, after such a respite as I have appointed.

Spirit, in the moral sense, is opposed to the flesh : (Rom. vii. 25.) "With the mind, or spirit, I myself serve the law of God ; but with the flesh the law of sin." And chap. viii. 13, "If ye live after the flesh, ye shall die ; but if ye through the spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live." Also, Gal. v. 19, 22, "Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these ; adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness," &c. "But the fruit of the spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance."

The Spirit of Christ, which animates true Christians, the children of God, and distinguishes them from the children of darkness, who are animated by the spirit of the world, is the gift of grace, of adoption, the Holy Spirit poured into our hearts, which emboldens us to call God, "My Father, my Father," Rom. viii. 5. Those who are influenced by this Spirit "have crucified the flesh, with its affections and lusts. If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit," Gal. v. 25 : Rom. viii. 9. "Ye are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you. Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." The Spirit of Christ animated the prophets, and inclined them industriously to inquire at what time those events should happen, which they foretold concerning his passion and glory, 1 Pet. i. 11.

After referring to the article Soul, it may be proper to suggest, that whatever language describes spiritual existence is particularly obscure ; and so must continue to mortals. Nothing can be less obvious than in what consisted the gift of the Holy Spirit as imparted by the hands of the apostles. That this power was restricted to them, only, is remarkable, since it might be thought the 120 were no less qualified to bestow it. That it was given to many, perhaps to most new converts, insomuch that many hundreds, not to say thousands, must have participated in it, is equally remarkable : but this general reception of it renders many things applicable to the primitive churches, and Christians, and justly said of them, which it would be presumptuous to apply to any since their day. And although some of the powers enjoyed by the primitive Christians are enumerated in certain places of the Epistles, yet we are not much enlightened on the subject, though it was so clear and conspicuous anciently. Were any, or all, of these powers in any case imparted to females ?

There is a passage in 1 Pet. iii. 19, referring to the spirits in prison, the difficulties of which no hypothesis has yet completely solved. In the first place, it should be remarked, that the apostle distinguishes between spirits (πνεύματα) and souls (ψυχαι) : the souls were saved by the ark ; the spirits were shut up in prison. He seems to refer to the same thing as Job, (xxvi. 5.) "The giants (Rephaim) groan under the waters;" that is, says Scott, the mighty men of renown in the old world, who filled the earth with violence, and perished by the deluge. Admitting this reference, the apostle points at "the spirits in prison ever since the flood." The difficulty remains, that Christ is said to go, "he went and preached," to those who were afterwards destroyed, because of their unbelief and disobedience. But whether this of necessity means a personal action may be doubted ; for it is said of Christ, (Eph. ii. 17.) "He came and preached to you who were afar off"—which is not true of Christ, personally : he preached by his agents. Admit that he also preached by his agents in the days of Noah, by that patriarch, himself, with others, and the passage loses much of its embarrassment. Christ, by his Spirit imparted to Noah, endeavored to reclaim the antediluvians ; but they, persisting in their iniquities, lost their lives in the deluge ; their spirits, meanwhile, being confined in prison, await the great day of judgment. Noah, believing, and acting on his belief, was saved from the general destruction. Those criminals abused the long-suffering of God ; Noah took advantage of it to his salvation.

STACHYS, a disciple of Paul, by whom he is honorably mentioned, (Rom. xvi. 14.) but we know no particulars of his life that can be relied upon.

STACTE, a drug, which was one of the four ingredients composing the sacred perfume, Exod. xxx. 34, 35. It is understood to be the prime kind of myrrh ; and as the Heb. properly signifies a drop, some think it to be myrrh distilling, dropping, from the tree, of its own accord, without incision. So Pliny, speaking of the trees whence myrrh is produced, says, "Before any incision is made, they exude of their own accord what is called stacte, to which no kind of myrrh is preferable." (Nat. Hist. lib. xii. cap. 15.) The rabbins suppose it to be the opobalsam : others, storax.

STADIUM, a measure of length, a furlong, which consisted of one hundred and twenty-five geometrical paces. Eight furlongs make a mile. See the Table of Measures at the end of the volume. [The Roman stadium was nearly equal to the English furlong, and contained 201.45 yards. This is the stadium probably meant in the New Testament, since the Jews were then subject to the Romans, and had constant intercourse with them. R.]

Stadium is also taken for the place in which were performed public exercises of running. St. Paul alludes to these, 1 Cor. ix. 24 : "They which run in a race (in stadio) run all, but one receiveth the prize."

These places were called stadia, because they were distinguished into courses, or distances, by certain resting places; so that some of the racers run but one distance, some two or more, each according to his strength.

STAR. Under the name of stars, the Hebrews comprehended all constellations, planets and heavenly bodies; all luminaries, except the sun and moon. The psalmist, to exalt the power and omniscience of God, says, "He numbers the stars, and calls them by their names." He is described as a king taking a review of his army, and knowing the name of every one of his soldiers. To express a very extraordinary increase and multiplication, Scripture uses the similitude of the stars of heaven, or of the sands of the sea, Gen. xv. 5; xxii. 17; xxvi. 4; Exod. xxxii. 13, &c. In times of disgrace and public calamity, it is said, the stars withhold their light; that they are covered with darkness; that they fall from heaven, and disappear. These figurative and emphatic expressions, which refer to the governing powers of nations, are only weakened and enervated by being explained.

To caution the Hebrews against the idolatry that prevailed over almost all the East, of worshipping the sun, moon and stars, Moses informs them (Gen. i. 14—16.) that God gave the stars their being, and separated them from that mass of matter which he created; and Job (xxxviii. 7.) describes them as praising the Creator at the beginning of the world.

The beauty and splendor that men observed in the stars; the great advantages they derived from them; the wonderful order apparent in their courses; the influence ascribed to their returns, in the production and preservation of animals, fruits, plants and minerals, have induced almost all people to impute to them life, knowledge, power, and to pay them a sovereign worship and adoration. See IDOLATRY.

The sacred books seem to ascribe knowledge to the stars; hence we are told that they praised the Lord, (Job xxxviii. 7.) and elsewhere they are excited to this. These expressions, however, are popular, or poetical, and are not to be understood literally; for then we must admit, that the earth, the trees, the waters, are animated and intelligent, since we find in Scripture expressions that import as much. All the creatures glorify God, bless the Lord, and obey him, each in its way.

The star foretold by Balaam, (Numb. xxiv. 17.) was, according to the modern Jews, king David, who conquered the Moabites, and reduced them under his obedience. But the paraphrasts Oukelos and Jonathan explain it of the Messiah, as the natural sense of the passage. The Jews were so well convinced of this, at the time of Christ, and afterwards, that the famous impostor Bar-chaliba caused himself to be called Bar-cocheba, "son of the star," pretending to be the Messiah; which involved the Jews of Palestine in a revolt, that completed the ruin of their unfortunate nation.

STATER, a Greek coin of the value of one shekel, Matt. xvii. 37, in the Greek. It was worth about 50 cents.

STEPHANAS, a Christian of Corinth, whose family Paul baptized; probably about A. D. 52, 1 Cor. i. 16. He was forward to the service of the church, and came to Paul at Ephesus, 1 Cor. xvi. 15, 17.

STEPHEN, the first Christian martyr, was probably a Hellenistic Jew, and Epiphanius thinks he was among the 72 disciples; but this is not probable. He is always put first among the deacons in the church at Jerusalem; and it is believed he had studied at the feet of Gamaliel. He was full of the Holy Spirit, and of zeal, and performed many miracles, Acts vi. 5. Some of the synagogue of the freedmen, of the Cyrenians, Alexandrians, and others, disputing with him, and being unable to withstand his wisdom and spirit, suborned false witnesses, to testify, that they had heard him blaspheme against Moses and against God, and drew him before the Sanhedrim. Stephen appeared in the midst of this assembly, with a countenance like that of an angel; and upon the high-priest asking him what he had to answer, he denied that he had said any thing against Moses or the temple—but he showed that the Jews had always opposed God and his prophets; upbraided them with the hardness of their hearts, with their putting the prophets to death, and with slaying the Messiah himself. His boldness enraged the unbelieving Jews; but Stephen, lifting up his eyes to heaven, said, "I see the heavens open, and the Son of man standing at the right hand of God." Unable to endure any more, his enemies cried out, stopped their ears, and falling upon him, drew him out of the city, and stoned him; the witnesses laying down their clothes at the feet of a young man called Saul, then one of the most eager persecutors of the Christians, but afterwards one of the most zealous preachers of Christianity. Stephen called upon the Lord, and said, "Lord, impute not this sin to them;" after which he fell asleep in the Lord, and some pious persons took care to bury him, and accompanied his funeral with great mourning, Acts viii. 2.

STEWARD, one who manages the affairs, or superintends the affairs of another. Thus Eliezer was the steward of Abraham's house; (Gen. xv. 2.) Christian ministers are the stewards of God over his church or family, (Tit. i. 7; 1 Cor. iv. 1, 2.) and believers are stewards of his gifts and graces, to dispense the benefits of them to the world, 1 Pet. iv. 10.

On reading the parable of the unjust steward, who defrauds his principal by collusion with his debtors, (Luke xvi.) we find it concluded by what seems to be a strange expression: (ver. 12.) "If ye have not been faithful in that which is another man's, who shall give you that which is your own?" Certainly that which is a man's own he may naturally expect should be given him; for who has a right to withhold it? The propriety of the phrase, therefore, and the inferential connection of the sentiment with the parable, is not clear to a general reader; but the following custom of the Turks (as related by Aaron Hill, Travels, p. 77.) may contribute to its better understanding: "It is a common custom with the merchants of this country when they hire a broker, book-keeper, or other [confidential] servant, to agree, that he shall claim no wages; but, to make amends for that unprofitable disadvantage, they give them free and uncontrolled authority to cheat them every way they can, in managing their business; but with this proviso, that they must never exceed the privileged advantage of ten per cent. All under that, which they can fairly gain in settling of accounts with their respective masters, is properly THEIR OWN; and by their masters' will is confirmed to their possession." He proceeds to say, "The servant knowing he has nothing to depend on but these profits. . . . puts himself upon a wily method of overreaching others, in the goods he buys by order of his master. His master, on the other hand, well knows that unless he watches carefully his servant's management, he will probably go beyond the tolerated limits of ten per cent."

This kind of allowance, though appearing extremely singular to us, is both ancient and general in the East. It is found in the Gentoo Laws: (chap. ix.) "If a man has hired any person to conduct a trade for him, and no agreement is made in regard to wages, in that case, the person hired shall receive one tenth of the profit." "If the person be hired to attend cattle, he shall receive one tenth of the milk. If the person be hired for agriculture, one tenth of the crop. If he plough the ground, receiving victuals, one fifth of the crop: if he receive no victuals, one third." (Hallied's Code of Gentoo Laws, p. 140.)

We see, then, that Mr. Hill has been too severe in describing the taking of such an allowance as a "cheating" of the principal; since he admits, it has that principal's permission, and is "a privileged advantage." We see, too, that the Gentoo laws admit a detention of one third part, in certain cases, as payment for a servant's labor and attention.

The phrase which appears so offensive to us, now assumes its true import:—"If you have not been found faithful in the administration of your principal's property, how can you expect to receive your own share (as the word may signify) of that advantage which should reward your labors? If you have not been just toward him, why, or how, do you expect he should be just toward you?" May not this principle set the conduct of the unjust steward in a different light from what it has hitherto appeared in? (1.) We see that this steward had a right to expect from his master the value of a share of this oil and wheat, as his due:—But if his master had once got possession of this value, he might have seized it in compensation for former deficiencies: the steward prevents this, by negotiating with the debtors themselves, before their accounts are inspected by his master. (2.) The steward had a right to a portion of the value, but he takes abundantly more than his due; and then carries in the mutilated account to his master, as if it were the produce of the whole, not accounting for the quantity reserved by him for his future dependence in the hands of those who, having had their share of the fraud, might return the advantage by receiving this unjust agent into their habitations. (3.) The steward's master commends him as having adopted an expedient not easily to be detected, but, in fact, a cunning contrivance; being evidently founded in custom and equity; readily enough to be represented as merely doing himself that justice which, as he might say, his master denied him; and, as to the quantity he withholds, he might plead somewhat analogous to what is provided for in the Gentoo laws, which, we see, in some cases allow of one third as a compensation for extraordinary care and trouble.

May our Lord's inference be thus understood? "This steward could only expect that his friends would receive and maintain him, so long as what he could claim of this value, or stock, of oil or of wheat, lasted: when that was exhausted, they would desire his absence; but, contrary to this, I advise you, by your management of worldly riches, to make friends—friends who may receive you into, not temporary, but lasting residence; who may welcome your arrival, not into a mere transitory shelter, but into an ever-abiding felicity. I press this upon you, because riches are so slippery, so perverting, so delusive, that they may well be called DECEITFUL; and they but too often are allurements to unrighteousness—to unrighteous modes of acquiring them, and to unrighteous modes of disposing of them; but if they be used with a disposition of mind contrary to that of this unjust steward, if, instead of being wickedly withheld, they be justly and liberally circulated, and, as it were, brought to account, the benevolence of true piety will direct them to such salutary purposes, as may lay many worthy but necessitous persons under great obligations: and these, should you be involved in distress here below, will do their utmost to soothe and relieve you; or they will hereafter congratulate your happy reception into never-ending beatitude and glory."

[This passage (Luke xvi. 9.) is more properly taken impersonally; the phrase "that they may receive you" being equivalent to "that ye may be received into everlasting habitations," &c. Impersonal verbs of this form are frequent in Greek; e. g. Luke xii. 20, "This night SHALL THEY REQUIRE thy soul of thee," in the Greek, for "thy soul shall be required of thee," &c. R.]

STOICS, a sect of heathen philosophers, so named from the Greek στοά, a porch, or portico, because Zeno, its founder, held his school in a porch of the city of Athens. They placed the supreme happiness of man in living agreeably to nature and reason; affecting the same stiffness, patience, apathy, austerity and insensibility, as the Pharisees, whom, according to Josephus, they much resembled. They were considerable at Athens when Paul visited that city, Acts xvii. 18.

STONES. For the names of the precious stones which were in the high-priest's breastplate, (Exod. xxviii. 17, &c.) the reader may see their articles, and BREASTPLATE.

CORNER STONE, or head stone of the corner, is that put at the angle of a building, whether at the foundation or on the top of the wall. (See CORNER STONE.) Our Saviour, though rejected by the Jews, was the corner stone of the church, (Ps. cxviii. 22.) and the stone that binds and unites the synagogue and Gentiles in the union of one faith, Acts iv. 11; Isa. xxviii. 16; Eph. ii. 20; 1 Pet. ii. 6; Matt. xxi. 42; Mark xii. 10; Luke xx. 17. The Hebrews sometimes gave the name of stone, or rock, to kings or princes, and also to God himself.

Moses forbids the Hebrews to set up in their country any stone that is exalted, or remarkable, Lev. xxvi. 1. The text may be translated by "a stone for sight;" a land-mark that stands on an eminence, or in some great road, to be seen from a distance. Strabo (lib. xvii.) mentions such stones on the highways in Egypt; and he says also, there are several remarkable and eminent stones upon Libanus. The Syrians and Egyptians had such respect for them that they almost adored them. They anointed them with oil, as may be seen in Apuleius, kissed and saluted them. It is probable that this worship is what Moses intended to prohibit; for heaps of stones, raised in witness of memorable events, and to preserve the remembrance of matters of great importance, are the most ancient monuments among the Hebrews. In early ages, these were used instead of inscriptions, pyramids, medals or histories. Jacob and Laban raised such a monument on mount Gilead, in memory of their covenant, Gen. xxxi. 46. Joshua erected one at Gilgal, of stones taken out of the Jordan, to preserve the memorial of his miraculous passage; (Josh. iv. 5—7.) and the Israelites beyond Jordan raised one on the banks of that river, as a testimony that they constituted but one nation with their brethren on the other side, Josh. xxii. 10.

In illustration of this practice, Mr. Taylor quotes from Chardin the following passage:—"Upon the left hand of the road are to be seen LARGE CIRCLES of hewn stone; which the Persians affirm to be a great sign that the Caous, making war in Media, held a council in that place; it being the custom of those people, that every officer that came to the council, brought with him a stone to serve him instead of a chair: these Caous were a sort of giants. What is most to be admired, after observation of these stones, is this, that they are so big that eight men can hardly move one; and yet there is no place from whence they can be imagined to have been fetched, but from the next mountains, which are six leagues off." (p. 371.)

This extract deserves notice on two accounts: (1.) The Persian notion of stones being used instead of chairs, at a council, must have had some origin; and must also have been customary at some time in that country:—the sitting upon stones, then, could not have been always totally unknown in Mesopotamia, where Laban resided, and Jacob with him; and what was customary at a council, might be practised at a covenant agreement, as in the case of Laban and Jacob. (2.) The resemblance of these CIRCLES of large stones to the Druidical monuments of Great Britain (Stonehenge, Abury, &c.) is striking; and the finding structures so similar in regions so distant, demonstrates the extensive spread and influence (if not the identity) of that religion, the exercise of which had occasioned their erection. (Fragments 166, 734—736.)

In the Fragments just referred to, Mr. Taylor has collected much information relative to heaps and circles of stones, wholly or partly remaining, in different parts of Great Britain, and elsewhere, for the purpose of throwing light on a practice so often alluded or referred to in the Old Testament, and especially in connection with Gilgal, a religious station, in the early period of the Israelitish history. The practice of raising and consecrating stones in commemoration of memorable events connected with religion, which has so extensively prevailed in various parts of the world, and among people altogether dissimilar in their general character and habits, he considers as affording a striking proof that the religion of mankind was originally the same, in its objects, its principles and its rites: and that, to wherever the original tribes of men migrated, with their natural fathers at their head, or wherever they settled, they retained those religious customs, notions and references, which they had received as part of their patrimony, in the land of their primary residence.

Rough and unformed stones were considered to be more pure and fit for sacred uses than those that were hewn. Moses directed (Exod. xx. 25.) an altar to be raised to the Lord, of rough stones; not of hewn ones, which he declared to be polluted. (See also Deut. xxvii. 5; Josh. viii. 31, 32; Ezra v. 8; 1 Mac. iv. 46, 47.)

"A heart of stone" may be understood several ways. Job, (xli. 24.) speaking of the behemoth, says, his heart is as hard as stone, as impenetrable as an anvil; q. d. he is of a very extraordinary strength, boldness and courage. The heart of Nabal became as a stone, when he comprehended the danger he had incurred by his imprudence, (1 Sam. xxv. 37.) i. e. his heart became immovable like a stone; it was contracted or convulsed, and this convulsion occasioned his death. Ezekiel says, (xi. 19; xxxvi. 26.) the Lord will take away from his people the heart of stone, and give them a heart of flesh; i. e. he will convert them, and inspire them with milder and more gracious feelings. Nearly in the same sense, John the Baptist said, (Matt. iii. 9.) God was able to raise up to Abraham children from the stones of the desert.

Daniel, speaking of the kingdom of the Messiah, compares it to a small stone loosened from the mountain, by no mortal power, that struck upon the feet of the colossus which Nebuchadnezzar saw in his dream, and afterwards filled the whole earth, Dan. ii. 34.

STONING was a punishment much in use among the Hebrews, and the rabbins reckon all crimes as being subject to it, which the law condemns to death, without expressing the particular mode. They say, that when a man was condemned to death, he was led out of the city to the place of execution, and there exhorted to acknowledge and confess his fault. He was then stoned in one of two ways, either stones were thrown upon him till he died, or he was thrown headlong down a steep place, and a large stone rolled upon his body. To the latter mode it is supposed there is a reference in Matt. xxi. 44.

STORK, ciconia, Heb. הכורק, from הכר, kind, good; probably so called because of the tenderness which it is said to manifest towards its parents; never, as is reported, forsaking them, but feeding and defending them in their decrepitude. The stork is a bird of passage; (Jer. viii. 7.) "The stork in the heavens knoweth her appointed times; and the turtle, and the crane, and the swallow, observe the time of their coming." Jerome and the LXX sometimes render the Hebrew word by herodius, the heron; sometimes by pelican or kite; but there can be very little doubt that it designates properly the stork. Moses places it among unclean birds, Lev. xi. 19; Deut. xiv. 18. The psalmist says (civ. 17.) "As for the stork, the fir-trees are her house." In the climate of Europe, she commonly builds her nest on some high tower, or on the top of a house; but in Palestine, where the coverings of the houses are flat, she builds in high trees. Profane authors speak much of the piety of the stork, and its gratitude to its parents. Ambrose says, that for this reason the Romans called it avis pia; (Hexæmer. lib. v. c. 16.) and Publius calls it pietatis cultrix. (Apud. Petron. Vide Bochart de Animal Sacr. tom. ii. lib. ii. c. 29.)

Ciconia enim grata, peregrina, hospita,
Pietatis cultrix, gracili-pes, crotalistris.

The stork has the beak and legs long and red; it feeds on serpents, frogs and insects. Its plumage would be wholly white, but that the extremities of its wings, and some small part of its head and thighs, are black. It sits for the space of thirty days, and lays but four eggs. They migrate to southern countries in August, and return in the spring. They are still the objects of much veneration among the common people in some parts of Europe. *R.

I. SUCCOTH, tents, tabernacles, the first encampment of the Israelites, after they left Egypt, Exod. xii. 37. See EXODUS, p. 401.

II. SUCCOTH, a city east of the Jordan, between the brook Jabok and that river, and where Jacob set up his tents on his return from Mesopotamia, Gen. xxxiii. 17. Joshua assigned the city subsequently built here to the tribe of Gad, Josh. xiii. 27. Gideon tore the flesh of the principal men of Succoth with thorns and briers, because they returned him a haughty answer when pursuing the Midianites, Judg. vii. 5.

SUCCOTH BENOTH. Calmet speaks of Succoth Benoth as an idol set up in Samaria, by the men brought from Assyria, (2 Kings xvii. 30.) but Mr. Taylor and other writers have shown it more probably to denote tabernacles or booths consecrated to one of the forms of Venus. In such places young maidens were devoted to the licentious worship of Venus.

SUN, the great luminary which God created, at the beginning, to govern the day. Calmet thinks it was the sun which the Phœnicians worshipped under the name of Baal, the Moabites under that of Chemosh, the Ammonites under that of Moloch, the Israelites under that of Baal, and king of the host of heaven. Moses cautioned the Israelites against this species of idolatry, (Deut. iv. 19.) "Take ye, therefore, good heed unto yourselves—lest thou lift up thine eyes unto heaven, and when thou seest the sun, the moon and the stars, even all the host of heaven, thou shouldst be driven to worship and serve them." In Deut. xvii. 3, he condemns to death those perverted to worship strange gods, the sun, the moon, &c.; and Josiah took from the temple of the Lord the horses, and burned the chariots, which the kings his predecessors had consecrated to the sun, 2 Kings xxiii. 11. Job says, (xxxii. 26—28.) he looked on it as a great crime, and as renouncing the God that is above, to kiss his hand in token of adoration, when he beheld the sun in its beauty and splendor. Ezekiel (viii. 16.) saw in the Spirit, in the temple of the Lord, five and twenty men of Judah, who turned their backs on the sanctuary, and had their faces towards the east, worshipping the rising sun.

The sun furnishes the greater part of the noble similitudes used by the sacred authors, who, to represent great public calamity, speak of the sun as being obscured, &c. (See Isa. xiii. 10; xxiv. 23; Jer. xv. 9; Ezek. xxxii. 7; Joel ii. 31; Amos viii. 9.) To express a long continuance of any thing glorious and illustrious, it is said, it shall continue as long as the sun. So the reign of the Messiah, (Ps. lxxii. 17; lxxxix. 36.) under whose happy dominion the light of the moon shall equal that of the sun, and that of the sun be seven times more than ordinary, Isa. xxx. 26. Christ is called the Sun of righteousness, Mal. iv. 2.

The compass of the whole earth is described by the expression, from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same; or rather from east to west, Ps. i. 1; cvii. 3; cxiii. 3, &c.

SUPERSTITION, and SUPERSTITIOUS, are words which occur only in the New Testament. Festus, governor of Judea, informed Agrippa, that Paul had disputed with the other Jews concerning matters of their own superstition, (Acts xxv. 19.) in which he spoke like a true pagan, equally ignorant of the Christian religion, and of the Jewish. Paul, writing to the Colossians, (chap. ii. 23.) recommends to them, not to regard false teachers, who would persuade them to a compliance with human wisdom, in an affected humility and superstition; and speaking to the Athenians, he says, "I perceive that in all things ye are too superstitious," &c. Acts xvii. 22.

The Greeks call superstition ἄσπιθαυρία, demon-terror. A superstitious man looks on God as a severe and rigid master, and obeys with fear and trembling. Varro says, the pious man honors and loves God; the superstitious man dreads him, even to terror; and Maximus Tyrius observes, that a man truly pious looks on God as a friend full of goodness, whereas the superstitious serves him with base and mean flattery. Such are Calmet's remarks on this subject. Mr. Taylor observes, that the Greek word ἄσπιθαυρία is probably of less offensive import than has been stated. Festus, a governor newly arrived in his province, would hardly have paid so ill a compliment to Agrippa, a king of the Jewish religion, as to call his religion superstitious; and when Paul at Athens tells the Areopagites that they are too superstitious he uses a word no doubt susceptible of a good as well as of a bad sense; as it would have been highly indecorous, nor less unnecessary, to calumniate the religious disposition of his judges, whom he was addressing. If we take the word in the sense of worship, or reverence, Festus may say, "Paul and the Jews differ in respect of certain objects of spiritual reverence,"—and Paul may say, "I perceive ye are greatly attached to objects of spiritual reverence," not only without offence, but as a very graceful introduction to a discourse, which proposed to describe the only proper object of such reverence.

SUPHA. Suph is certainly the Red sea; but the notion of Suph being an appellation belonging to the Red sea only, has misled our translators into gross errors of geography. We read in Numb. xxi. 14, of the "book of the wars of the Lord, what he did in the Red sea—Supha—and in the brooks of Arnon." But the brooks of Arnon were not near the Red sea, nor was any transaction there comparable to the passage of the Red sea by the Israelites. It is more probable that this Supha is the same as Suph, (Deut. i. 1.) where Moses repeated his laws; which was eleven days' journey from Horeb, and between Paran, Tophel, &c. on this side Jordan; certainly, to say the least, in the neighborhood of that river, and by the banks of it, very distant from the Red sea.

SUSANNA, a holy woman who attended on our Saviour, and with others ministered to his wants, Luke viii. 2, 3.

SWALLOW. There is considerable diversity of opinion among critics on the Hebrew designation of this well known bird. Our translators have taken both שׁוֹרֵר and שׁוֹרֵר to signify the swallow, in different passages of Scripture; but in each they seem to have been wrong. The former of the words is better understood by Bochart, and other able critics, to be applied to a species of dove; and there is little doubt that the latter word imports the crane, which is so called from its remarkable cry. The real designation of the swallow appears to be שׁוֹרֵר, sis, either from its sprightliness or swift motion, or, as Bochart thinks, from its note. It is worthy of remark, that the goddess Isis is said to have been changed into this bird; which circumstance, from the resemblance of the name, furnishes an additional confirmation of the interpretation here adopted. The only mention of the swallow in Scripture is in Isa. xxxviii. 14, and Jer. viii. 7. In the former passage, Hezekiah, referring to the severity of his recent affliction, says, "Like a swallow, or a crane, so did I chatter." The note of the swallow being quick and mournful, the allusion of the king has been supposed to be to his prayers, which were so interrupted by groans, as to be like the quick twitterings of the swallow. This seems to have occasioned the pious monarch to regard with suspicion the sincerity and fervor of his supplications, thus delivered, but in broken accents; and in bitterness of spirit he casts himself upon the unbounded mercy of his God, exclaiming, "O Lord, I am oppressed, undertake for me." The passage in Jeremiah refers to the well known migration of this bird, a circumstance from which the faithful prophet takes occasion to reprove the ingratitude and infidelity of the favored tribes: "The turtle, and the crane, and the swallow observe the time of their coming; but my people know not the judgment of the Lord."

SWAN. This bird is only mentioned in Lev. xi. 18, and Deut. xiv. 16, and it is extremely doubtful whether it be really denoted by the Hebrew שׂוּמָן. The LXX render Porphyrion, or purple hen, which is a water bird, not unlike in form to those which precede it in the text. Geddes observes, that "the root signifies to breathe out, to respire; and adds, if etymology were our guide, I would say it points to a well known quality in the swan, that of being able to respire a long time with its bill and neck under water, and even plunged in the mud." Some think the conjecture of Michaelis not improbable, "that it is the goose, which every one knows is remarkable for its manner of breathing out, or hissing, when provoked." "What makes me conjecture this," says Michaelis, "is that the same Chaldee interpreters, who in Leviticus render Obija, do not employ this word in Deuteronomy, but substitute 'the white Kak,' which, according to Buxtorf, denotes the goose." Perhaps Egypt has birds of the wild goose kind, one of which is here alluded to. Norden (vol. ii. p. 36.) mentions a "goose of the Nile, whose plumage was extremely beautiful. It was of an exquisite aromatic taste, smelled of ginger, and had a great deal of flavor." Can a bird of this kind be the Hebrew Tinshemeth?

SWEARING, see OATH.

SWINE, a well known animal, forbidden as food to the Hebrews, (Lev. xi. 7; Deut. xiv. 8.) who held its flesh in such detestation, that they would not so much as pronounce its name.

Among the gross abominations and idolatrous practices of which the Israelites were guilty in the time of Isaiah, however, the eating of swine's flesh is mentioned, ch. lxx. 4: "A people that provoketh me to anger continually to my face; that sacrificeth in gardens, and burneth incense upon altars of brick; which remain among the graves, and lodge in the monuments; which eat swine's flesh; and broth of abominable things is in their vessels," &c. Their punishment is denounced in the next chapter: "They that sanctify themselves and purify themselves in the gardens behind one tree in the midst, eating swine's flesh, and the abomination, and the mouse, shall be consumed together, saith the Lord," ch. lxxvi. 17.

It was an established custom, among the Greeks and Romans, to offer a hog in sacrifice to Ceres at the beginning of harvest, and another to Bacchus, before the beginning of vintage; because that animal is equally hostile to the growing corn and the loaded vineyard. To this practice there is probably an allusion in Isa. lxxvi. 3: "He that killeth an ox is as if he slew a man; he that sacrificeth a lamb, as if he cut off a dog's neck; he that offereth an oblation, as if he offered swine's blood; he that burneth incense, as if he blessed an idol; yea, they have chosen their own ways, and their soul delighteth in their abomination."

There is an injunction in Matt. vii. 6, which demands notice here: "Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet, and turn again and rend you." This passage, as it stands, is somewhat obscure, since it refers both the malignant acts specified to the last-mentioned animal. Dr. A. Clarke, however, has restored it to its true meaning, by transposing the lines; and bishop Jebb, availing himself of the hint, has shown it to be one of those introverted parallelisms which so frequently present themselves in the sacred writings, and which he has generally so beautifully illustrated. Placed in this form, it will stand as follows:—

Give not that which is holy to the dogs;
Neither cast your pearls before the swine;
Lest they trample them under their feet,
And turn about and rend you.

Here the first line is related to the fourth, and the second to the third. The sense of the passage becomes perfectly clear, on thus adjusting the parallelism:—

Give not that which is holy to the dogs;
Lest they turn about and rend you:
Neither cast your pearls before the swine;
Lest they trample them under their feet.

The more dangerous act of imprudence, with its fatal result, is placed first and last, so as to make, and to leave, the deepest practical impression. To cast pearls before swine, is to place the pure and elevated morality of the gospel before sensual and besotted wretches, who have

. . . Nor ear, nor soul, to comprehend
The sublime notion, and high mystery;

but will assuredly trample them in the mire. To give that which is holy (the sacrifice, as some translate it) to the dogs, is to produce the deep truths of Christianity before the malignant and profane, who will not fail to add injury to neglect; who will not only hate the doctrine, but persecute the teacher. In either case, an indiscreet and over-profluent zeal may do serious mischief to the cause of goodness; but in the latter case, the injury will fall with heightened severity, both on religion, and on religious injudicious friends. The warning, therefore, against the dogs, is emphatically placed at the commencement and the close. (Jebb's Sacred Literature, p. 338, &c.) This certainly places the allusion in a striking and beautiful light, but we doubt whether the bishop has caught the true sense of the passage. In this part of his discourse our Lord is warning his hearers not to be unmerciful and severe in censuring others, in marking and aggravating their faults; not to correct their vices or mistakes, while they are chargeable themselves with much more heinous crimes. They were not to suffer sin in their brother, but were bound to reprove his faults, and endeavor his reformation; their counsels and reproofs, however, were to be managed with wisdom and prudence, and were not to be unseasonably lavished on hardened and profligate sinners, who, instead of receiving them in a becoming manner, would be exasperated by them, and turn with fury upon their indiscreet advisers. "Give not wisdom," says the Hebrew adage, "to him who knows not its value, for it is more precious than pearls, and he who seeks it not is worse than a swine that defiles and rolls himself in the mud; so he who knows not the value of wisdom, profanes its glory."

The hog delights more in the fetid mire than in the clear and running stream. The mud is the chosen place of his repose, and to wallow in it seems to constitute one of his greatest pleasures. To wash him is vain; for he is no sooner at liberty, than he hastens to the puddle, and besmears himself anew. Such is the temper of corrupt and wicked men, who had escaped the pollutions of the world, through the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, but are again entangled and overcome. It happened unto them according to the true proverb, "The dog is turned to his vomit again; and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire," 2

Pet. ii. 22. Allured by the promises of the Gospel, or alarmed by the terrors of the law, they abandoned some of their evil courses, and performed many laudable actions; but their nature and inclinations remaining unrenewed by divine grace, they quickly shook off the feeble restraints of external reformation, and returned with greater eagerness than ever to their former courses. (Paxton's Illustrations, vol. i. p. 500, &c.)

The beautiful and affecting parable of the prodigal son, designed to represent the degraded and destitute condition of the Gentile nations, before they were called to a participation in the blessings of the covenant, by the incarnation and ministry of the Saviour, shows that the swine-herd was considered to be an employment of the most despicable character. It was the last resource of that depraved and unhappy being who had squandered away his patrimony in riotous living; and may, perhaps, help to account for the otherwise unnatural conduct of his brother, while it sets the strong and unconquerable paternal feelings of his affectionate father in a more convincing and interesting light.

SWORD, in the style of the Hebrews, is often used for war. The Lord shall send the sword into the land; that is, war. The "mouth of the sword" is the edge of the sword. "A man that draws the sword" is a soldier by profession. The sword of the mouth (Job v. 15.) is pernicious discourse, accusations, slander, calumny. "Their tongue is a two-edged sword;" (Ps. lvii. 4.) i. e. the tongue of the wicked is extremely dangerous. "If he turn not, he will whet his sword;" i. e. he will prepare to send war. To lift the sword upon stones, (Exod. xx. 25.) is to cut them with a chisel, or other sharp iron instrument. "By thy sword shalt thou live;" (Gen. xxvii. 40.) i. e. thou shalt support thyself by war and rapine. "They that take the sword shall perish with the sword;" (Matt. xxvi. 52.) they that employ the sword by their own authority, and would do themselves justice, deserve to be put to death by the sword of authority. Or this is a kind of proverb: those who take the sword to smite another, generally suffer by it themselves. "The word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword," (Heb. iv. 12.) it penetrates even to the bottom of the soul, into the heart and mind. Paul exhorts the Ephesians (vi. 17.) to arm themselves with the word of God, as with a spiritual sword; to defend themselves against spiritual enemies.

SYCAMORE. This curious tree, which seems to partake of the nature of two distinct species, the mulberry and the fig, the former in its leaf, and the latter in its fruit, is called in Hebrew שִׁקְמוֹרָה and שִׁקְמוֹרָה, (occurring only in the plural form,) the derivation of which is uncertain; but in the Greek its name, Συκμορος, is plainly descriptive of its character, being compounded of σῦκος, a fig tree, and μύρος, a mulberry tree. The sycamore is thus described by Norden: "I shall remark, that they have in Egypt divers sorts of figs; but if there is any difference between them, a particular kind differs still more. I mean that which the sycamore bears, that they name in Arabic giomez. It was upon a tree of this sort that Zaccheus got up, to see our Saviour pass through Jericho. This sycamore is of the height of a beech, and bears its fruit in a manner quite different from other trees. It has them on the trunk itself, which shoots out little sprigs, in form of a grape-stalk, at the end of which grows the fruit, close to one another, most like bunches of grapes. The tree is always green, and bears fruit several times in the year, without observing any certain seasons, for I have seen some sycamores which had fruit two months after others. The fruit has the figure and smell of real figs; but is inferior to them in the taste, having a disgusting sweetness. Its color is a yellow, inclining to an ochre, shadowed by a flesh color; in the inside it resembles the common fig, excepting that it has a blackish coloring, with yellow spots. This sort of tree is pretty common in Egypt. The people, for the greater part, live on its fruit." (Travels, vol. i. p. 79.)

From 1 Kings x. 27, 1 Chron. xxvii. 28, and 2 Chron. i. 15, it is evident that this tree was pretty common in Palestine, as well as in Egypt; and from its being joined with the vines in Ps. lxxviii. 47, as well as from the circumstance of David's appointing a particular officer to superintend their plantations, it seems to have been as much valued in ancient as in modern times. From Isa. ix. 10, we find that the timber of the sycamore was used in the construction of buildings; and, notwithstanding its porous and spongy appearance, it was, as we learn from Dr. Shaw, of extreme durability. Describing the catacombs and mummies of Egypt, this intelligent writer states that he found the mummy chests, and the little square boxes, containing various figures, which are placed at the feet of each mummy, to be both made of sycamore wood, and thus preserved entire and uncorrupted for at least three thousand years.

In Amos vii. 14, there is a reference, no doubt, to the manner in which these trees are cultivated, by scraping or making incisions in the fruit. So the LXX seem to have understood it, and so it would seem, from the united testimonies of natural historians, that the original term imports. Pliny, Dioscorides, Theophrastus, Hasselquist, and other writers, state, that the fruit of the sycamore must be cut or scratched, either with the nail or iron, before it will ripen; and it was in this employment, most probably, that the prophet was engaged before he was called to sustain the prophetic character. If the words were rendered "a sycamore tree dresser," instead of a "gatherer of sycamore fruit," it would include, as Mr. Harmer suggested, both the scarification and the gathering of the fruit.

In the passage cited from Norden, that traveller adverted to the circumstance of Zaccheus climbing up into the sycamore for the purpose of witnessing our Lord pass through Jericho, Luke xix. 4; and Mr. Blomfield remarks, that this mode of viewing an object seems to have been not unfrequent, inasmuch that it appears to have given rise to a proverbial expression, which he cites from Libanius.

The sycamore strikes its large diverging roots deep into the soil; and on this account, says Paxton, our Lord alludes to it as the most difficult to be rooted up, and transferred to another situation: "If ye had faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye might say unto this sycamore tree, Be thou plucked up by the root, and be thou planted in the sea, and it should obey you," Luke xvii. 5. The stronger and more diverging the root of a tree, the more difficult it must be to pluck it up, and insert it again so as to make it strike root and grow; but far more difficult still to plant it in the sea, where the soil is so far below the surface, and where the restless billows are continually tossing it from one side to the other; yet, says our Lord, a task no less difficult than this to be accomplished, can the man of genuine faith perform with a word, for with God nothing is impossible, nothing difficult, or laborious. In the parallel passage (Matt. xvii. 20.)

the hyperbole is varied, a mountain being substituted for the sycamore tree. The passage is thus paraphrased by Rosenmüller: "So long as you trust in God and me, and are not sufficient in self-reliance, you may accomplish the most arduous labors undertaken for the furthering my religion."

SYCHAR, see SICHEM.

SYENE, a city on the southern frontiers of Egypt towards Ethiopia, between Thebes and the cataracts of the Nile, (Ezek. xxix. 10; xxx. 6.) and now called Assouan. Pliny says it stands in a peninsula on the eastern shore of the Nile; that it is a mile in circumference, and has a Roman garrison.

SYNAGOGUE, a word which primarily signifies an assembly; but, like the word church, came at length to be applied to places in which any assemblies, especially those for the worship of God, met, or were convened. From the silence of the Old Testament with reference to these places of worship, most commentators and writers on biblical antiquities are of opinion that they were not in use till after the Babylonish captivity. Prior to that time, the Jews seem to have held their social meetings for religious worship either in the open air, or in the houses of the prophets. (See 2 Kings iv. 23.) Synagogues could only be erected in those places where ten men of age, learning, piety, and easy circumstances could be found to attend to the service which was enjoined in them. Large towns had several synagogues, and soon after the captivity, their utility became so obvious, that they were scattered over the land, and became the parish churches of the Jewish nation. Their number appears to have been very considerable, and when the erection of a synagogue was considered as a mark of piety, (Luke vii. 5.) or passport to heaven, we need not be surprised to hear that they were multiplied beyond all necessity, so that in Jerusalem alone there were not fewer than 460 or 480. They were generally built on the most elevated ground, and consisted of two parts. The one on the most westerly part of the building contained the ark, or chest, in which the book of the law and the sections of the prophets were deposited, and was called the temple by way of eminence. The other, in which the congregation assembled, was termed the body of the church. The people sat with their faces towards the temple, and the elders in the contrary direction, and opposite to the people; the space between them being occupied by the pulpit, or reading desk. The seats of the elders were considered as more holy than the others, and are spoken of as "the chief seats in the synagogues," Matt. xxiii. 6.

The stated office-bearers in every synagogue were ten, though in rank they were but six. Their names and duties are given by Lightfoot, to whom the reader is referred. But we must notice the Archisynagogos, or ruler of the synagogue; who regulated all its concerns, and granted permission to preach. Of these there were three in each synagogue. Dr. Lightfoot believes them to have possessed a civil power, and to have constituted the lowest civil tribunal, commonly known as "the council of three;" whose office it was to decide the differences that arose between any members of the synagogue, and to judge of money matters, thefts, losses, &c. To these officers there is probably an allusion in 1 Cor. vi. 5. The second office-bearer was "the angel of the church," or minister of the congregation, who prayed and preached. In allusion to these the pastors of the Asiatic churches are called angels, Rev. ii. iii.

The service of the synagogue was as follows:—The people being seated, the minister, or angel of the church, ascended the pulpit and offered up the public prayers; the people rising from their seats, and standing in a posture of deep devotion, Matt. vi. 5; Mark xi. 25; Luke xviii. 11, 13. The prayers were nineteen in number, and were closed by reading the execration. The next thing was the repetition of their phylacteries; after which came the reading of the law and the prophets. The former was divided into 54 sections, with which were united corresponding portions from the prophets; (see Acts xv. 21; xiii. 27.) and these were read through once in the course of the year. After the return from the captivity an interpreter was employed in reading the law and the prophets, (see Neh. viii. 2—10.) who interpreted them into the Syro-Chaldaic dialect, which was then spoken by the people. The last part of the service was the expounding of the Scriptures, and preaching from them to the people. This was done either by one of the officers, or by some distinguished person who happened to be present. The reader will recollect one memorable occasion, on which our Saviour availed himself of the opportunity thus afforded to address his countrymen, (Luke iv. 20.) and there are several other instances recorded of himself and his disciples teaching in the synagogues. (See Matt. xiii. 54; Mark vi. 2; John xviii. 20; Acts xiii. 5, 15, 44; xiv. 1; xvii. 2—4, 10—12, 17; xviii. 4, 25; xix. 8.) The whole service was concluded with a short prayer, or benediction.

The Jewish synagogues were not only used for the purposes of divine worship, but also for courts of judicature, in such matters as fell under the cognizance of the council of three, of which we have already spoken. On such occasions the sentence given against the offender was sometimes carried into effect in the place where the council was assembled. Hence we read of persons being beaten in the synagogue, and scourged in the synagogue, Matt. x. 17; Mark xiii. 9.

SYNTYCHE, (Phil. iv. 2.) a woman illustrious for virtue and good works in the church at Philippi.

SYRACUSE, the capital of Sicily, on the eastern coast, (Acts xxviii. 12.) where Paul spent three days, on his voyage to Rome.

SYRIA, called Aram, from the patriarch who peopled its chief provinces, comprehended the country lying between the Euphrates east, the Mediterranean west, Cilicia north, and Phœnicia, Judea and Arabia Deserta south. Syria of the two rivers is Mesopotamia of Syria, which see.

Syria of Damascus extended eastward along mount Libanus; but its limits varied according to the power of the princes that reigned at Damascus. Syria of Zobah, or Sobal, was probably Cole-Syria, or hollow Syria. Syria of Maacah, or Beth-maacah, or Machati, was also towards Libanus, (2 Sam. x. 6, 8; 2 Kings xv. 29.) extending beyond Jordan, and was given to Manasseh, Deut. iii. 14; Josh. xiii. 13. (See ABEL II.) Syria of Rehob, or Rehob, was that part of Syria of which Rehob was the capital, near the northern frontier of the Land of Promise, (Numb. xiii. 21.) on the pass that leads to Emath, or Hamath. It was given to Asher, and lay contiguous to Apher, in Libanus, Josh. xix. 28, 30; xxi. 31. Laish, situate at the fountains of Jordan, was in this country, Judg. i. 31. Syria of Tob, or of Ish-tob, or of the land of Tob, or of the Tubieni, as they are called in the Maccabees, was in the neighborhood of Libanus, the northern extremity of Palestine, Judg. xi. 3, 5;

1 Mac. v. 13; 2 Mac. xii. 17. Syria of Emath, or Hamath, near the province of which Hamath, on the Orontes, was the capital.

Syria, however, without any other appellation, denotes the kingdom of Syria, of which Antioch became the capital, after the reign of the Seleucidæ. This country was originally governed by its own kings, each in his own city and territories. David subdued them about ante A. D. 1044, (2 Sam. viii. 12; x. 6, 8.) but after the reign of Solomon they shook off the yoke, and were not reduced again, till the time of Jeroboam II. A. M. 3179. Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel, having declared war against Ahab, king of Judah, he found himself under the necessity of soliciting aid from Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, who put Rezin to death, took Damascus, and transported the Syrians beyond the Euphrates. Syria afterwards came under the Chaldeans, then under the Persians, and was ultimately reduced by Alexander the Great. After his death (A. M. 3681) the empire was divided between his principal officers, Seleucus Nicanor, head of the family of kings called Seleucidæ, taking the diadem, and name of king of Syria. He reigned forty-two years, and was succeeded by Antiochus Soter; Antiochus Theos; Seleucus Callinicus; Seleucus Kerannus; Antiochus Magnus; Seleucus Philopator; Antiochus Epiphanes; Antiochus Eupator; Demetrius Soter; Demetrius Nicator; Antiochus Theos; Tryphon; Antiochus Soter, or Sidetes; 3878, Seleucus V. son of Demetrius Nicanor; Antiochus Gryphus, or Philometer, and Antiochus Cyzicenus, his brother, (3892,) divided the kingdom; Seleucus VI. son of Gryphus; and Antiochus Eusebes.

In the year 3912, Syria was divided between Philip and Demetrius Eucærus. The Syrians finding their country almost ruined by the civil wars which ensued, they called in Tigranes, king of Armenia, A. M. 3921. The two sons of Antiochus Eusebes, however, still held possession of a part of Syria, till Pompey reduced it into a Roman province, A. M. 3939, after it had subsisted 257 years. (See further under the respective articles relative to the persons mentioned in this historical sketch.)

SYRIAC VERSION, see VERSIONS.

SYRO-PHœNICIA is Phœnicia properly so called, but which, having by conquest been united to the kingdom of Syria, added its old name, Phœnicia, to that of Syria. The Canaanitish woman is called a Syro-phœnician, (Mark vii. 26.) because she was of Phœnicia, then considered as part of Syria. Matthew, who is by some supposed to have written in Hebrew or Syriac, calls her a Canaanitish woman, (Matt. xv. 22.) because that country was really peopled by Canaanites, Sidon being the eldest son of Canaan, Gen. x. 15. See PHœNICIA.

TAANACH is always mentioned in connection with MEGIDDO, except in Josh. xxi. 25. The inference is, that they lay near each other. (See MEGIDDO, and see a full description of the topography of the region, in the Bibl. Repository, vol. i. p. 598, 603.) *R.

TABERAH, or TABEERA, burning, an encampment of Israel in the desert, (Numb. xi. 3; Deut. ix. 22) and so called, because here a fire from the tabernacle of the Lord burned a great part of the camp.

TABERNACLE. We have an account of three public tabernacles among the Jews, previous to the building of Solomon's temple. The first, which Moses erected for himself, is called "the tabernacle of the congregation." In this he gave audience, heard causes, and inquired of God. Perhaps the public offices of religious worship were also performed in it for some time, and hence its designation. The second tabernacle was that which Moses built for God, by his express command, partly to be the place of his residence as king of Israel, (Exod. xl. 34, 35.) and partly to be the medium of that solemn worship which the people were to render to him, ver. 17, 26—29. The third public tabernacle was that which David erected in his own city, for the reception of the ark, when he received it from the house of Obed-edom, 2 Sam. vi. 17; 1 Chron. xvi. 1. But it is the second of these, called the tabernacle, by way of distinction, that we have more particularly to notice.

Moses having been instructed by God to rear the tabernacle, according to the pattern which had been shown to him in the mount, called the people together and informed them of his proceedings, for the purpose of affording them an opportunity of contributing towards so noble and honorable a work, Exod. xxv. 2; xxxv. 5. And so liberally did the people bring their offerings, that he was obliged to restrain them in so doing, ver. 21—xxxvi. 6. The structure which we are now about to describe, was built with extraordinary magnificence, and at a prodigious expense, that it might be in some measure suitable to the dignity of the Great King, for whose palace it was designed, and to the value of those spiritual and eternal blessings, of which it was also designed as a type or emblem.

The value of the gold and silver, only, used for the work, and of which we have an account in Exod. xxxviii. 24, 25, amounted, according to bishop Cumberland's reduction of the Jewish talent and shekel to English coin, to upwards of 182,568*l.* or more than 810,600 dollars. If we add to this the vast quantity of brass or copper, that was also used; the shittim wood, of which the boards of the tabernacle, as well as the pillars which surrounded the court and sacred utensils, were made; as also the rich embroidered curtains and canopies that covered the tabernacle, divided the parts of it, and surrounded the court;—and if we further add, the jewels that were set in the high-priest's ephod and breastplate, which are to be considered as part of the furniture of the tabernacle, the value of the whole materials, exclusive of workmanship, must amount to an immense sum. This sum was raised, partly by voluntary contributions and presents, and partly by a poll tax of half a shekel a head for every male Israelite above twenty years old, (chap. xxx. 11—16.) which amounted to a hundred talents and 1775 shekels, that is, 35,359l. 7s. 6d. sterling, or nearly 157,000 dollars, chap. xxxviii. 25.

The learned Spencer imagined that Moses borrowed his design of this tabernacle from Egypt. But this notion, as Jennings has shown, is directly at variance with matter of fact; the structure of Moses differing from those used in the heathen worship most essentially, both in situation and form, and also with its typical design and use, as pointed out by the apostle in the ninth chapter of the Hebrews.

The tabernacle was of an oblong rectangular form, thirty cubits long, ten broad, and ten in height; (Exod. xxvi. 18—29; xxxvi. 23—34.) which, according to bishop Cumberland, was fifty-five feet long, eighteen broad, and eighteen high. The two sides, and the western end, were formed of boards of shittim wood, overlaid with thin plates of gold, and fixed in solid sockets, or vases of silver. Above, they were secured by bars of the same wood, overlaid with gold, passing through rings of gold, which were fixed to the boards. On the east end, which was the entrance, there were no boards, but only five pillars of shittim wood, whose chapiters and fillets were overlaid with gold, and their hooks of gold, standing on five sockets of brass. The tabernacle, thus erected, was covered with four different kinds of curtains. The first and inner curtain was composed of fine linen, magnificently embroidered with figures of cherubim, in shades of blue, purple and scarlet; this formed the beautiful ceiling. The next covering was made of goats' hair; the third of rams' skins, dyed red; and the fourth and outward covering was made of badgers' skins, as our translators have it, but which is not quite certain, as it is generally thought that the original intends only skins of some description, dyed of a particular color. We have already said, that the east end of the tabernacle had no boards, but only five pillars of shittim wood; it was, therefore, enclosed with a richly embroidered curtain, suspended from these pillars, Exod. xxvii. 16.

Such was the external appearance of the sacred tent, which was divided into two apartments, by means of four pillars of shittim wood, overlaid with gold, like the pillars before described, two cubits and a half distant from each other; only they stood on sockets of silver, instead of sockets of brass; (Exod. xxvi. 32; xxxvi. 36.) and on these pillars was hung a veil, formed of the same materials as the one placed at the east end, Exod. xxvi. 31—33; xxxvi. 35. We are not informed in what proportions the interior of the tabernacle was thus divided; but it is generally conceived that it was divided in the same proportion as the temple afterwards built according to its model; that is, two thirds of the whole length being allotted to the first room, or the holy place, and one third to the second, or most holy place. Thus the former would be twenty cubits long, ten wide, and ten high, and the latter ten cubits every way. It is observable, that neither the holy nor most holy places had any window. Hence the need of the candlestick in the one, for the service that was performed therein; the darkness of the other would create reverence, and might, perhaps, have suggested the similar contrivance of the Adyta in the heathen temples.

The tabernacle thus described stood in an open space, of an oblong form, one hundred cubits in length, and fifty in breadth, situated due east and west, Exod. xxvii. 18. This court was surrounded with pillars of brass, filleted with silver, and placed at the distance of five cubits from each other. Their sockets were of brass and were fastened to the earth with pins of the same metal, Exod. xxxviii. 10, 17, 20. Their height is not stated, but it was probably five cubits, that being the length of the curtains that were suspended on them, Exod. xxxviii. 18. These curtains, which formed an enclosure round the court, were of fine twined white linen yarn, (Exod. xxvii. 9; xxxviii. 9, 16.) except that at the entrance on the east end, which was of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine white twined linen, with cords to draw it either up, or aside, when the priests entered the court, Exod. xxxviii. 18; xxxix. 40. Within this area stood the altar of burnt-offerings, and the laver and its foot. The former was placed in a line between the door of the court and the door of the tabernacle, but nearer the former; (Exod. xl. 6, 29.) the latter stood between the altar of burnt-offering and the door of the tabernacle, Exod. xxxviii. 8.

But although the tabernacle was surrounded by the court, there is no reason to think that it stood in the centre of it; for there was no occasion for so large an area at the west end as at the east, where the altar and other utensils of the sacred service were placed. It is more probable that the area at this end was fifty cubits square; and indeed a less space than that could hardly suffice for the work that was to be done there, and for the persons who were immediately to attend the service. We now proceed to notice the furniture which the tabernacle contained.

In the holy place were three objects worthy of notice, viz. the altar of incense, the table for the shewbread, and the candlestick for the lights, each of which have been described in their respective places. The altar of incense was placed in the middle of the sanctuary, before the veil, (Exod. xxx. 6—10; xl. 26, 27.) and on it the incense was burnt morning and evening, Exod. xxx. 7, 8, 34—38. On the north side of the altar of incense, that is, on the right hand of the priest as he entered, stood the table for the shewbread, (Exod. xxvi. 35; xl. 22, 23.) and on the south side of the holy place, the golden candlestick, Exod. xxv. 31—39. In the most holy place were the ark, the mercy-seat, and the cherubim, for a description of which their articles may be consulted.

The remarkable and costly structure thus described was erected in the wilderness of Sinai, on the first day of the first month of the second year, after the Israelites left Egypt; (Exod. xl. 17.) and when erected was anointed, together with its furniture, with holy oil, (ver. 9—11.) and sanctified by blood, Exod. xxiv. 6—8; Heb. ix. 21. The altar of burnt-offering, especially, was sanctified by sacrifices during seven days, (Exod. xxix. 37.) while rich donations were given by the princes of the tribes, for the service of the sanctuary, Numb. vii.

We should not omit to observe, that the tabernacle was so constructed as to be taken to pieces and put together again, as occasion required. This was indispensable; it being designed to accompany the Israelites during their travels in the wilderness. As often as they removed, the tabernacle was taken to pieces, and borne in regular order by the Levites, Numb. iv. Wherever they encamped it was pitched in the midst of their tents, which were set up in a quadrangular form, under their respective standards, at a distance from the tabernacle of 2000 cubits; while Moses and Aaron, with the priests and Levites occupied a place between them.

“Tabernacle” is sometimes put for heaven, for the dwelling-place of the blessed, Ps. xv. 1; lxi. 4. “I will abide in thy tabernacle for ever.” Ps. lxxxiv. 1. “How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts!”

Paul says to the Hebrews, (chap. viii. 2.) that "Jesus Christ was a minister of the sanctuary and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man;" and that, "being come a high-priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building," &c. ch. ix. 11. (See also Rev. xiii. 6; xxi. 3.) The tabernacle of David that God was to raise (Amos ix. 11; Acts xv. 16.) is the church of Christ, the offspring of David, and heir of the promises made to that patriarch.

TABERNACLES, FEAST OF; called Σκηνοπηγία, that is, the feast in which they set up tents or tabernacles, John vii. 2. In Hebrew it is called the feast of tents, (Lev. xxiii. 42—44.) because it was kept under green tents, or arbors, in memory of the dwelling in tents by the Israelites during their passage through the wilderness. It was one of their three great solemnities, in which all the males were obliged to appear before the Lord. It was celebrated after harvest, on the fifteenth of Tizri, the first month of the civil year, and was designed to return thanks to God for the fruits of the earth, then gathered in, Exod. xxiii. 16. The feast continued eight days, during which no labor was permitted, and certain sacrifices were offered. On the first day they cut down branches of the handsomest trees, with their fruit, which they carried in ceremony to the synagogue, where they performed what they called Lulab. Holding in their right hand a branch of a palm-tree, three branches of myrtle, and two of willow, tied together, and having in their left hand a citron with its fruit, they brought them together, waving them towards the four quarters of the world, and singing certain songs. These branches were also called Hosanna, because on that occasion they cried Hosanna! not unlike what was done at our Saviour's entry into Jerusalem, Matt. xxi. 8, 9. On the eighth day they performed this ceremony more frequently, and with greater solemnity than on the other days of the feast; whence they called this day Hosanna Rabbah, or the great Hosanna. On this occasion Psalm cxviii. "O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good—Let Israel now say," &c. seems to have been sung. The psalmist makes a plain allusion to it in ver. 25, &c. "Save now, I beseech thee, O Lord: O Lord, I beseech thee, send now prosperity. Blessed be he that cometh in the name of the Lord," &c. The Hebrew says, "Hosanna Jehovah," &c. and these words the Jews sing at this day, when they make a procession about their desk, at the Feast of Tabernacles. They are the same as were sung at our Saviour's triumphal entry into Jerusalem.

On the first day of the feast, besides the ordinary sacrifices, they offered as a burnt offering thirteen calves, two rams and fourteen lambs, with offerings of flour and libations of wine; and also a goat for a sin-offering, Numb. xxix. 12. On the second day they offered twelve calves, two rams and fourteen lambs, for a burnt-offering, with their offerings of flour, oil and wine; as also a goat for a sin-offering; and this beside the ordinary morning and evening sacrifices, which were never interrupted; nor those offered by the Israelites from private devotion, or for expiation of sin. On the third, fourth, fifth, sixth and seventh days of the feast were offered the same sacrifices as on the second day, with this difference, that every day they diminished from the former by one calf; so that on the third day they offered eleven, on the fourth ten, on the fifth nine, on the sixth eight, and on the seventh but seven. But the eighth day, which was kept with the greatest solemnity, they offered but one calf, one ram and seven lambs for a burnt-offering, and one goat for a sin-offering; with the other accustomed offerings and libations. On this day, too, the Jews presented at the temple the first-fruits of their later crop, that is, of such things as were the latest in coming to maturity. They also drew water out of the fountain of Siloam, which was brought into the temple, and, being first mingled with wine, was poured out by the priests at the foot of the altar of burnt-offerings; the people in the mean time singing those words of the prophet Isaiah, (chap. xii. 3.) "Therefore with joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation." It is said this ceremony was instituted by Haggai and Zechariah, at the return from the captivity; and it is thought that our Lord alluded to it, (John vii. 37, 38.) when he cried in the temple, on the last day of the Feast of Tabernacles, "If any thirst, let him come unto me and drink. He that believeth on me, as the Scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water;"—meaning, according to John's observation, the Holy Ghost, which should be given to those who believed on him. Some commentators think, that at this feast were rehearsed Psalms viii. lxxxi. and lxxxviii. entitled "for the presses;" but Leo of Modena says, they rehearsed those Psalms whose titles are Hallelujah, or, "praise God,"—cxii. cxiii. cxvi. cxvii. cxviii.

TABLE OF SHEW-BREAD, see BREAD, p. 209, seq.

TABITHA, a Christian widow, who lived at Joppa, and who, having fallen sick and died, was restored to life through the intercession of the apostle Peter, Acts iv. 36. The name Tabitha, Heb. טביתא, Syr. ܬܒܝܬܐ, signifies gazelle; as does also the corresponding Greek name, Doreas. See ANTELOPE, p. 70.

TABOR, an isolated mountain which rises on the north-eastern side of the plain of Esdraelon, in Galilee. Its shape is that of a truncated cone, and Burckhardt states its composition to be entirely calcareous. Travellers vary in their estimate of its height, which is probably about 2500 to 3000 feet. Tabor is extremely fertile, and is covered by trees and odoriferous plants. On its summit is a plain about a mile in circumference, where are the remains of a citadel of some considerable extent, but for what purpose it was erected is not known. Mr. Buckingham, who ascended this mountain, describes the view from its summit as being the finest in the country: "We had on the north-west a view of the Mediterranean sea, whose blue surface filled up an open space left by a downward bend in the outline of the western hills; to the west-north-west a smaller portion of its waters were seen; and on the west again, the slender line of its distant horizon was just perceptible over the range of land near the sea coast. From the west to the south, the plain of Esdraelon extended over a vast space, being bounded on the south by the range of hills generally considered to be Hermon, whose dews are poetically celebrated, (Ps. cxxxiii. 3.) and having in the same direction, nearer the foot of Tabor, the springs of Ain-el-Sherar, which send a perceptible stream through its centre, and form the brook Kishon of antiquity, Ps. lxxxiii. 9. From the south-east to the east is the plain of Galilee, being almost a continuation of Esdraelon, and like it, appearing to be highly cultivated, being now ploughed for seed throughout. Beneath the range of this supposed Hermon is seated Endor, famed for the witch who raised the ghost of Samuel; (1 Sam. xxviii.) and Nain, equally celebrate, as the place at which Jesus raised the only son of a widow from death to life, and restored him to his afflicted parent, Luke vii. 11—15. The range which bounds the eastern view is thought to be the mountains of Gilboa, where Saul, setting an example of self-destruction to his armor-bearer and his three sons, fell on his own sword, rather than fall into the hands of the uncircumcised Philistines, by whom he was defeated, 1 Sam. xxxi. The sea of Tiberias, or the lake of Gennesaret, famed as the seat of many miracles, is seen on the north-east, filling the hollow of a deep valley, and contrasting its light blue waters with the dark brown shades of the barren hills by which it is hemmed around. Here, too, the steep is pointed out, down which the herd of swine, who were possessed by the legion of devils, ran headlong into the sea, Luke viii. 33. In the same direction, below, and on the plain of Galilee, and about an hour's distance from the foot of mount Tabor, there is a cluster of buildings, used as a bazaar for cattle; somewhat further on is a rising ground, from which, it is said, that Christ delivered the long and excellent discourse, called the 'Sermon on the mount,' and the whole view in this quarter is bounded by the high range of Gebel-el-Telj, or the mountain of Snow. The city of Saphet, supposed to be the ancient Bethuliah, a city said to be seen far and near, and thought to be alluded to in the apophthegm which says, 'a city set on a hill cannot be hid,' (Matt. v. 14.) is also pointed out in this direction. To the north were the stony hills over which we had journeyed hither; and these completed this truly grand and interesting panoramic view." (Travels, p. 107—109.)

Deborah and Barak assembled their army on Tabor, from which they marched to give battle to Sisera; (Judg. iv. 6.) and subsequently, Hosea (chap. v. 1.) reproaches the princes of Israel, and the priests of the golden calves, with having been a snare on Mizpah, and a net spread upon Tabor; referring, no doubt, to the idols, or superstitious altars, which they here set up. When Josephus was governor of Galilee, he strongly fortified the top of Tabor; but Vespasian by stratagem drew down the Jews into the open country, and there cut them to pieces.

TABRET, or TABOURET, a small species of drum, e. g. TIMBREL, which see.

TADMOR, subsequently called Palmyra by the Greeks, was a city founded by Solomon in the desert of Syria, on the borders of Arabia Deserta, near the Euphrates. Its situation was remote from human habitations, in the midst of a dreary wilderness; and it is probable that Solomon built it to facilitate his commerce with the East, as it afforded a supply of water, a thing of the utmost importance in an Arabian desert. It is one day's journey from the Euphrates, two from Upper Syria, and six from Babylon. The original name was preserved till the time of Alexander, who extended his conquests to this city, which then exchanged Tadmor for the title of Palmyra. It submitted to the Romans about the year 130, and continued in alliance with them during a period of 150 years. When the Saracens triumphed in the East, they acquired possession of this city, and restored its ancient name of Tadmor. Of the time of its ruin there is no authentic record; but it is thought, with some probability, that its destruction occurred during the period in which it was occupied by the Saracens. Of its present appearance Messrs. Wood and Dawkins, who visited it in 1751, thus speak: "It is scarcely possible to imagine any thing more striking than this view. So great a number of Corinthian pillars, mixed with so little wall or solid building, afforded a most romantic variety of prospect." Captain Mangles, who travelled more recently, observes, "On opening upon the ruins of Palmyra, as seen from the valley of the Tombs, we were much struck with the picturesque effect of the whole, presenting the most imposing sight of the kind we had ever seen." But on a minuter inspection, the ruins of this once mighty city do not appear so interesting as at a distance. Volney observes, "In the space covered by these ruins, we sometimes find a palace of which nothing remains but the court and walls; sometimes a temple, whose peristile is half thrown down; and now a portico, a gallery, a triumphal arch. If from this striking scene we cast our eyes upon the ground, another almost as varied presents itself. On which side soever we look, the earth is strewn with vast stones half buried, with broken entablatures, mutilated friezes, disfigured reliefs, effaced sculptures, violated tombs, and altars defiled by the dust." It is situated under a ridge of barren hills to the west, and its other sides are open to the desert. The city was originally about ten miles in circumference; but, such have been the destructions effected by time, that the boundaries are with difficulty traced and determined. In the Modern Traveller there is a very excellent description of the present aspect of this ruined city, by Mr. Josiah Conder. (Vol. iii. p. 1. Amer. edit.)

TAHAPANES, (Jer. ii. 16.) or TAHAPHNES, (Jer. xliii. 7, 9.) or ΤΗΡΑΦΝΗΕΣ, (Ezek. xxx. 18.) the name of an Egyptian city, for which the Seventy put Taphne, (Τάφνη, Τάφναι.) and this is probably the same name which the Greeks write Daphne. This city lay in the vicinity of Pelusium, (see SIN II.) towards the south-west, on the western bank of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile; and is therefore called by Herodotus the Pelusiac Daphne. To this city many of the Jews retired, after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, taking with them the prophet Jeremiah, Jer. xliii. 7—9; xlv. 1. That Tahapanes was a large and important city, is apparent from the threats uttered against it by Ezekiel, c. xxx. 18. *R.

TALENT. Several authors have supposed that among the Hebrews there were two sorts of talents, a larger and a smaller; the talent of the sanctuary, and the common talent; the former being double the weight or value of the other. But we cannot find this distinction in Scripture.

The weight of the Jewish talent, according to Dr. Arbuthnot was 113 pounds, 10 ounces, 1 pennyweight and 10 2-7ths grains troy weight. Its value in (English) money was 342l. 3s. 9d. or about $1520. The talent of gold was of the same weight; its value, 54,752l. or $243,100.

The following thought of Mr. Bruce is perhaps worth inquiring into; that is, that the talents appropriated to different commodities might be of different weights; and adds, that if a talent could be discovered, which, at the mine, was of less weight than the talent of Judea, we might, perhaps, be justified in estimating the riches in gold of David, or of Solomon, by the weight of that talent. "David took possession of two ports, Eloth and Ezion-gaber; (1 Kings ix. 26; 2 Chron. viii. 17.) from which he carried on trade to Ophir and Tarshish, to a very great extent, to the day of his death. We are struck with astonishment, when we reflect on the sum that prince received in so short a time from these mines of Ophir. For what is said to be given by David (I Chron. xxii. 14, 15, 19; xxix. 3—7, three thousand Hebrew talents of gold, reduced to our money, is 21,600,000*l.* sterling) and his princes, for the building of the temple of Jerusalem, exceeds in value 800,000,000*l.* of our money, if the talent there spoken of be a Hebrew talent, (the value of a Hebrew talent appears from Exod. xxxviii. 25, 26. For 603,550 persons being taxed at half a shekel each, they must have paid in the whole 301,774; now that sum is said to amount to 100 talents, 775 shekels only; deduct the two latter sums, and there will remain 300,000, which, divided by 100, will leave 3000 shekels for each of these talents,) and not a weight of the same denomination, the value of which was less, and peculiarly reserved for, and used in the traffic of, these precious metals, gold and silver. It was probably an African or Indian weight, proper to the same mine whence was gotten the gold, appropriated to fine commodities only, as is the case with our ounce troy different from the avoirdupois."

TALISMAN, see AMULET.

TALMUD is the name of a Jewish work containing the body of the doctrines, religion and morality of the Jews; and having among them an authority equal to, if not greater than that of the Hebrew Scriptures. The name comes from the Hebrew lāmad, to teach, and signifies therefore teaching, or rather traditional doctrine. There are strictly two works under this name, viz. the Talmud of Jerusalem, and the Talmud of Babylon. See under LANGUAGE, p. 609.

The TALMUD OF JERUSALEM was compiled by Rabbi Jochanan, who presided in the school of Palestine fourscore years, and who is said to have finished it 230 years after the ruin of the temple, or about A. D. 300, for the use of the Jews in Judea. This Talmud is shorter and more obscure than that of Babylon, but is doubtless more ancient. It is composed of two parts, the Mishna and the Gemara. The Mishna (which is also common to the Babylonian Talmud) is the work of Rabbi Judah Hakkodesh, or "the Holy," who compiled it about A. D. 190 or 220, at Tiberias. The name Mishna signifies the second law; and the work is a collection of the traditions of the Jewish doctors, which Hakkodesh gathered into one body, for fear they should be lost and forgotten because of the dispersion of the Jews and the interruption of their schools. About a century later, Rabbi Jochanan, as is said above, composed the Gemara, i. e. completion, perfection, in order to perfect and finish the Mishna of Rabbi Judah. It consists of illustrations of the Mishna, and things supplementary to it, and is in the nature of a commentary upon it. The two constitute the Talmud of Jerusalem.

The TALMUD OF BABYLON is composed of the same Mishna of Judah the Holy, and of a Gemara, composed, as is said by some, by Rabbi Asa, who lived at Babylon about A. D. 400; or, as is affirmed by others, by Rabbi Jose, in the beginning of the sixth century. It is called the Talmud of Babylon, because it was compiled in that city, and was chiefly prevalent among the Jews beyond the Euphrates. The Jews prefer this to the Talmud of Jerusalem, because it is clearer and more extensive. It abounds with a multitude of fables and ridiculous stories, of the truth of which, however, they must entertain no doubt, unless they would pass for heretics.

The Jews even prefer the authority of the Talmud to that of Scripture. They compare the Bible to water, the Mishna to wine, and the Gemara to hypocras. It is a part of their belief, that the traditions and explications contained in the Talmud are derived from God himself; that Moses revealed them to Aaron and his sons, and to the elders of Israel; that these communicated them to the prophets, and the prophets to the members of the great synagogue, who transmitted them down till they came to the doctors or rabbis, and these reduced them to the form of the Mishna and Gemara.

The Mishna is written in Hebrew, in a very close and obscure style. See LANGUAGE, p. 609. A noble edition of it was given by Surenubius, in six parts, folio, Amst. 1698, &c. The Talmud of Jerusalem was printed by Bomberg, at Venice, in one volume folio: that of Babylon at Amsterdam, in twelve volumes folio. Other editions are also extant. *R.

I. TAMAR, daughter-in-law of the patriarch Judah, wife of Er and Onan, and mother of Pharez and Zarah. The book of the Testament of the twelve Patriarchs says, that Tamar was of Mesopotamia, and daughter of Aram, that is, by descent a Syrian; that Bathshuah, the wife of Judah, could not endure her, because she was of a nation different from her own, and inspired the same hatred of her into her son Er, who, refusing to treat Tamar as his wife, was slain by an angel of the Lord, on the third day after his marriage. Scripture says that he was very wicked before the Lord, for which the Lord slew him, (Gen. xxxviii. 7.) which may mean, either that he was suddenly slain, or smitten by a disease which ultimately produced his death. Judah then said to Onan, his second son, "Go in unto thy brother's wife, and marry her, and raise up seed unto thy brother." Onan took her, as commanded by his father; but knowing that the children born from this intercourse would not belong to him, but to his brother, he withheld from Tamar the means of becoming a mother; wherefore the Lord slew him also. Judah then said to Tamar, "Continue a widow in thy father's house, till my son Shelah shall be of age to marry;" being afraid that Shelah also might die, as his brothers did. Tamar therefore lived with her father a considerable time, but did not receive Shelah as her husband. Some years afterwards, therefore, when Judah went to a sheep-shearing feast of his friend Hirah, the Adullamite, Tamar disguised herself as a foreign harlot, and sat in a place where he would pass. Judah had intercourse with her, and gave her as pledges, his ring, his bracelets and his staff. After some months the pregnancy of Tamar became apparent, and Judah would have had her burned alive; but when she produced the ring, the bracelets and the staff, and attributed her condition to the owner of those pledges, Judah acknowledged that she was more just than he had been. She bore twins, of which one was called Pharez, the other Zarah.

Much has been said and written upon the transaction between Tamar and Judah, and certainly, there are ample grounds to doubt whether Tamar were so culpable as she at first sight appears to have been. It seems that her marriage with one branch of the family, gave her a right to expect a continuance of conjugality with some of its other branches. The custom of the surviving brother marrying his deceased brother's widow, with the indignity attendant upon his refusal, are well known; (see MARRIAGE;) and its general prevalence shows it was of great antiquity. The probability is, that Tamar, who was a Canaanitess, might satisfy her mind with some form of marriage, at that time customary in her country, as seems implied in the declaration of Judah—"She has been more righteous than I." The phrase is not—she is less to blame—but—"she is more righteous." Among the eight forms of marriage specified in the Gentoo code, is one by a mutual interchange, between the parties, of necklaces or strings of flowers, which bears a very striking resemblance to the case of Judah and Tamar, the latter receiving from the former his signet and bracelets. Might not Tamar thus marry herself to Judah, though unwittingly in him? From the expression, (ver. 26.) "He knew her again no more," it seems as if he might lawfully have done so, had he pleased. It is important to remark, that although Tamar had been contracted to Er and Onan, it is very doubtful whether those marriages had been consummated.

In the Asiatic Researches (vol. iii. p. 35.) there is a passage, which affords a similarity to the narrative under consideration, that is extremely remarkable: "I discovered these circumstances of the marriage ceremony of the Garrows, from being present at the marriage of Lungree, youngest daughter of the chief Oodassy, SEVEN YEARS OF AGE, and Buglun, twenty-three years old, the son of a common Garrow; and I may here observe, that this marriage, disproportionate as to age and rank, is a very happy one for Buglun, as he will succeed to the Booneaship and estate: for among the Garrows, the YOUNGEST DAUGHTER IS ALWAYS HEIRESS, and if there were any other children born before her, they would get nothing on the death of the Booneah: what is more strange, if Buglun were to die, Lungree would MARRY ONE OF HIS BROTHERS; and if all his brothers were dead, SHE WOULD THEN MARRY THE FATHER; and if the father afterwards should prove too old, she would put him aside, and take any one else whom she might choose."

Upon this extract Mr. Taylor has the following remarks. It is clear, that Lungree would have acted exactly like Tamar; who, because Shelah was not given to her, considered him "as dead," and therefore she "married the father;" in doing which, Judah not only acquits her of any transgression, but confesses she had more closely adhered to the law than himself ("is more righteous than I"). It appears also, that the children of Judah by Tamar did actually inherit as his sons, lawfully, as well as naturally; hence they are reckoned to him in 1 Chron. ii. 4. "And Tamar his daughter-in-law bare him Pharez and Zerah." In Numb. xxvi. 20, we read, "The sons of Judah were—of Shelah—of Pharez—of Zerah," without any particular mark of abasement on Pharez; and in Ruth iv. 18, the pedigree of David is expressly derived from this same son of Judah by Tamar. If the pedigree of David be so derived, that of the Messiah must follow it; and it needs little consideration to determine which has most propriety, to allow the legality of Tamar's marriage, with the legal acknowledgment of her children, or to bastardize not merely Pharez but his posterity, Boaz, David, Solomon; a long line of Hebrew heroes, and all the kings of Judah.

II. TAMAR, the daughter of Maachah, wife of David, and by courtesy reckoned among the king's children, 1 Chron. iii. 9. Her great beauty was the occasion of great trouble in the family of David. See AMNON.

III. TAMAR. Absalom had a daughter whose name was Tamar, 2 Sam. xiv. 27.

IV. TAMAR, a city of Judea, (Ezek. xlviii. 19; xlviii. 28.) somewhere about the southern extremity of the Dead sea.

TAMMUS, the tenth month of the Hebrew civil year, and the fourth of the sacred year. (See the Jewish Calendar at the end of the volume.)

TAMMUZ, a pagan idol, mentioned in Ezek. viii. 14, where the women are represented as weeping for it. It is generally thought that Tammuz was the same deity as ADONIS, to which article the reader is referred, as also to the article IDOLATRY.

TANACH, or TAANACH, a city of the half-tribe of Manasseh, east of the Jordan, (Josh. xii. 21; xx. 25; Judg. i. 27.) yielded to the Levites. Eusebius, Jerome and Procopius of Gaza say, that in their time it was a considerable place, three miles from Legio.

TANNIM, or THANNIM, see DRAGON.

I. TAPPUAH, a city of Manasseh, but belonging to Ephraim, (Josh. xvii. 8.) probably the En-tappuah of the former verse.

II. TAPPUAH, a city of Judah, (Josh. xv. 34.) perhaps the Beth-tappuah of verse 53, which is also attributed to Judah, and which Eusebius places beyond Raphia, 14 miles toward Egypt.

TARAH, an encampment of Israel in the desert, to which they came from Tahath, and went hence to Mitheah, Numb. xxxiii. 27.

TARES. It is not easy to decide, whether by the term εἰλίαινα, in Matt. xiii. 25, seq. the Saviour intends indifferently all plants which grow among grain, or some particular species. All we are certain of from the circumstances of the parable is, that it is a plant which rises to the height of the corn. Mintert says, "It is a plant in appearance not unlike corn or wheat, having at first the same kind of stalk, and the same viridity, but bringing forth no fruit, at least none good." John Melchior also says, that Ζιζάνιον does not signify every weed, in general, which grows among corn, but a particular species of weed known in Canaan, which is not unlike wheat, but, being put into the ground, degenerated and assumed another nature and form. The Talmudists name it zonim. "Among the hurtful weeds," says Johnson, "Lolium album" is the first. It bringeth forth leaves like those of wheat or barley, yet rougher, with a long ear, made up of many little ones, every particular whereof containeth two or three grains lesser than those of wheat; scarcely any chaffy husk to cover them with; by reason whereof they are easily shaken about, and scattered abroad. They grow in fields among wheat and barley. They spring and flourish with the corn; and in August the seed is ripe. Darnell is called, in the Arabian tongue, zizania."

Forsk. says, the darnell is well known to the people of Aleppo. It grows among corn. If the seeds remain mixed with the meal, they render a man drunk by eating the bread. The reapers do not separate the plant; but, after the thrashing, they reject the seeds by means of a fan or sieve. Nothing, says Mr. Taylor, can more clearly elucidate the plant intended by our Lord, than this extract. It grows among corn—so in the parable. The reapers do not separate the plants—so in the parable; both grow together till harvest. After the thrashing they separate them—in the parable they are gathered from among the wheat, and separated by the hand, then gathered into bundles. Their seeds, if any remain by accident, are finally separated by winnowing; which is, of course, a process preparatory to being gathered—the corn into the garner, or storehouse; the injurious plant into heaps, for consumption by fire, as weeds are consumed.

TARGUMS, or Chaldee versions of the Hebrew Scriptures, see VERSIONS.

I. TARSHISH, the second son of Javan, Gen. x. 4. He is supposed to have been the founder of Tarsus in Cilicia.

II. TARSHISH, the proper name of a city and country (Tartessus) in Spain, the most celebrated emporium in the west to which the Hebrews and Phœnicians traded. That it was situated in the west is evident from Gen. x. 4, where it is joined with Elishah, Kittim and Dodanim. See also Ps. lxxii. 10. According to Ezek. xxxviii. 13, it was an important place of trade; according to Jer. x. 9, it exported silver; and according to Ezek. xxvii. 12, 25, silver, iron, tin and lead to the Tyrian markets. They embarked for this place from Joppa, Jon. i. 3, 4. In Isa. xxiii. 1, 6, 10, it is evidently represented as an important Phœnician colony. It is named among other distant states, in Isa. lxvi. 19. That these notices agree with Tartessus has been shown by Bochart, Michaëlis and Bredow. The Greek name Tartessus is derived from a harder Aramean pronunciation of the word תרשש; but another orthography with  $\sigma$ , was also known to the Greeks; for in Polybius and Stephanus Byzantinus occurs Tαρσησιον, as synonymous with Tαρσίσιος.

In the interval between the composition of the Books of Kings and Chronicles, this name seems to have been transferred to denote any distant country; hence the Tarshish ships that went to Ophir (1 Kings xxii. 49.) are said expressly by the writer of Chronicles to have gone to Tarshish, 2 Chron. ix; xxi. 20; xxxvi. 37. There is no necessity, then, for the adoption of a second Tarshish (perhaps in India or Ethiopia). (Gesenius, Heb. Lex. sub. vocem.)

Tarshish ships is employed in Isa. xxiii. 1, 4; lx. 9, &c. to denote large merchant ships bound on long voyages, (perhaps distinguished by their construction from the common Phœnician ships,) even though they were sent to other countries instead of Tarshish.—The English phrase an Indiaman is very similar. The phrase is also used of the ships that went to Ophir, 1 Kings xxii. 49; x. 22.

TARSUS, the name of a celebrated city, the metropolis of Cilicia, situated on the banks of the river Cydnus, which flowed through and divided it into two parts. Hence in the Greek writers the city is sometimes called Tαρσοί, as Xen. Anab. i. 2. 23. Tarsus was distinguished for the culture of Greek literature and philosophy, so that at one time, in its schools and in the number of its learned men, it was the rival of Athens and Alexandria. (Strabo xiv. p. 463. ed. Casaub.) In reward for its exertions and sacrifices during the civil wars of Rome, Tarsus was made a free city by Augustus. (Appian. Bell. Civ. v. p. 1077. Λαοδικίας δὲ καὶ Ταρσοῦς ἐλευθέρους ἀπέει. Dio. Chrysost. in Tarsic. post.) It was the privilege of such cities, that they were governed by their own laws and magistrates, and were not subjected to the jurisdiction of a Roman governor, nor to the power of a Roman garrison; although they acknowledged the supremacy of the Roman people, and were bound to aid them against their enemies. That the freedom of Tarsus, however, was not equivalent to being a Roman citizen, appears from this, that the tribune, although he knew Paul to be a citizen of Tarsus, (Acts xxi. 39.) yet ordered him to be scourged, (Acts xxii. 24.) but desisted from his purpose when he learned that Paul was a Roman citizen (Acts xxii. 27.) It is therefore probable, that the ancestors of Paul had obtained the privilege of Roman citizenship in some other way, Acts ix. 30; xi. 25; xxii. 3. (See Kuinoel on Acts xvi. 37.) *R.

TARTAN, an officer of king Sennacherib, sent with Rabshakeh on a message to Hezekiah, 2 Kings xviii. 17.

TATNAI, an officer of the king of Persia, and governor of Samaria, and of the provinces on this side Jordan, opposed the rebuilding of the temple and the walls of Jerusalem, Ezra v. 6.

TAXING, see CYRENIUS.

TEARS, VALE OF, see BACA.

TEBETH, the Babylonish name of the tenth ecclesiastical month of the Hebrews, Esth. ii. 16. See JEWISH CALENDAR, infra.

TEHAPHNEHES, see TAHAPANES.

TEIL-TREE, see TEREBINTH.

TEKEL, he was weighed, one of the words that appeared written on the wall at the sacrilegious feast of Belshazzar, indicating that this wretched prince had been weighed in the balance, and was found wanting, Dan. v. 25. See BELSHAZZAR, and DANIEL.

TEKOA, a city of Judah, (2 Chron. xi. 6.) which Eusebius and Jerome place twelve miles from Jerusalem, south. The wilderness of Tekoa, mentioned 2 Chron. xx. 20, is not far from the Red sea.

TEL-ABIB, the name of a place to which some of Israel were carried captive, (Ezek. iii. 15.) and probably the same place as is now called Thelabba, in Mesopotamia, on the river Chebar. In D'Anville's Chart of the Euphrates and Tigris, it is placed between 36° and 37° north latitude, and 53° and 54° east longitude.

TELASSER, or THALASSAR, a province of Assyria, (Isa. xxxvii. 12; 2 Kings xix. 12.) the exact situation of which is unknown. It is thought to be towards Armenia and Mesopotamia, and about the sources of the Euphrates and Tigris, because of the children of Eden, who inhabited that country.

TELEM, a city of Judah, originally seized as a prey, (Josh. xv. 24.) as Kimchi, Le Clerc, Hiller, and others suppose; elsewhere called also TELAIM; "prey violently taken away," as the Arabic root imports, 1 Sam. xv. 4.

TEL-HARSA, perhaps the same as Telasser. Those who returned with Zerubbabel out of this country, could not prove their genealogies, or show that they were of the race of Israel, Ezra ii. 59; Neh. vii. 61.

TEMA, or THEMMA, son of Ishmael, (Gen. xxv. 15.) is thought to have peopled the city of Thema, in Arabia Deserta. Job speaks of the caravans of Tema and Sheba, (chap. vi. 19.) and Ptolemy places a city called Themma, or Thamma, in Arabia Deserta, towards the mountains of the Chaldeans.

TEMAN, or THEMAN, son of Eliphaz, and grandson of Esau, Gen. xxxvi. 15. In the ver. 34, we find a king of Idumea, called Itusham, of the country of the Temani. Jeremiah, (xlix. 7—20.) Ezekiel (xxv. 13.) and Amos (i. 12.) speak of Teman. Eusebius places Theman in Arabia Petræa, five miles from Petra, and says there was a Roman garrison there. This was doubtless the country of the TEMANITES. It is also sometimes used for the whole south.

TEMPLE, the house of God, the sanctuary, the tabernacle of the Lord, the palace of the Most High, are terms often used synonymously in Scripture, though, strictly speaking, they import very distinct things. The sanctuary was but one part of the tabernacle or temple; neither does the word temple describe the tabernacle, nor tabernacle the temple. The Hebrews, before Solomon, could not properly be said to have had a temple, yet they did not scruple by the word temple to describe the tabernacle; as, on the contrary, they sometimes by the tabernacle of the Lord, expressed the temple built by Solomon. After the Lord had instructed David that Jerusalem was the place he had chosen, in which to fix his dwelling, that pious prince began to realize his design of preparing a temple for the Lord, that might be something worthy of his divine majesty. He opened his mind on this subject to the prophet Nathan, but the Lord did not think fit that he should execute his purpose, however laudable. The honor was reserved for Solomon, his son and successor, who was to be a peaceable prince, and not like David, who had shed much blood in war. David, however, applied himself to collect great quantities of gold, silver, brass, iron, and other materials for this undertaking.

The place chosen for erecting this magnificent structure was mount Moriah, the summit of which, originally, was unequal and its sides irregular; but it was an object of ambition with the Jews to level and extend it. This they effected, and during the second temple, it formed a square of 500 cubits, or 304 yards on each side, allowing, as is commonly done, 21,888 inches to the cubit. Almost the whole of this space was arched under ground, to prevent the possibility of pollution from secret graves; and it was surrounded by a wall of excellent stone, 25 cubits, or 47 feet 7 inches high; without which lay a considerable extent of flat and gently-sloping ground, which was occupied by the buildings of the tower of Antonia, gardens and public walks.

The plan and the whole model of this structure was laid by the same divine architect as that of the tabernacle, viz. God himself; and it was built much in the same form as the tabernacle, but was of much larger dimensions. The utensils for the sacred service were also the same as those used in the tabernacle, only several of them were larger, in proportion to the more spacious edifice to which they belonged. The foundations of this magnificent edifice were laid by Solomon, in the year of the world 2992, and it was finished A. M. 3000, having occupied seven years and six months in the building. It was dedicated A. M. 3001, with peculiar solemnity, to the worship of Jehovah, who condescended to make it the place for the special manifestation of his glory, 2 Chron. v. vi. vii. The front or entrance to the temple was on the eastern side, and consequently facing the mount of Olives, which commanded a noble prospect of the building: the holy of holies, therefore, stood towards the west. The temple itself, strictly so called, which comprised the portico, the sanctuary, and the holy of holies, formed only a small part of the sacred edifice, these being surrounded by spacious courts, chambers, and other apartments, which were much more extensive than the temple itself.

From the descriptions which are handed down to us of the temple of Solomon, it is utterly impossible to obtain so accurate an idea of its relative parts and their respective proportions, as to furnish such an account as may be deemed satisfactory to the reader. Hence we find no two writers agreeing in their descriptions. The following account may be sufficient to give us a general idea of the building:—

“The temple itself was 70 cubits long; the porch being 10 cubits, (1 Kings vi. 3.) the holy place, 40 cubits, (ver. 17.) and the most holy place, 20 cubits, 2 Chron. iii. 8. The width of the porch, holy, and most holy places, were 20 cubits; (2 Chron. iii. 3.) and the height over the holy and most holy places, was 30 cubits; (1 Kings vi. 2.) but the height of the porch was much greater, being no less than 120 cubits, (2 Chron. iii. 4.) or four times the height of the rest of the building. To the north and south sides, and the west end of the holy and most holy places, or all around the edifice, from the back of the porch on the one side, to the back of the porch on the other side, certain buildings were attached. These were called side chambers, and consisted of three stories, each 5 cubits high, (1 Kings vi. 10.) and joined to the wall of the temple without. But what may seem singular is, that the lowest of these stories was 5 cubits broad on the floor, the second 6 cubits, and the third 7 cubits, and yet the outer wall of them all was upright, ver. 6. The reason of this was, that the wall of the temple, against which they leaned, had always a scarcement of a cubit at the height of every 5 cubits, to prevent the joists of these side chambers from being fixed in it. Thus the three stories of side chambers, when taken together, were 15 cubits high, and consequently reached exactly to half the height of the side walls, and end of the temple; so that there was abundance of space, above these, for the windows which gave light to the temple, ver. 4. Josephus differs very materially from this in his description, for which we know not how to account, but by supposing that he has confounded the Scripture account of Solomon's temple with that of the temple after the captivity and of Herod.

In noticing the several courts of the temple, we naturally begin with the outer one, which was called the court of the Gentiles, and into which persons of all nations were permitted to enter. The most natural approach to this was by the east gate, which was the principal gate of the temple. It was by far the largest of all the courts pertaining to the sacred building, and comprised a space of 188,991 superficial cubits, or fourteen English acres, one rood, twenty-nine poles, and thirteen yards, of which above two thirds lay to the south of the temple. It was separated from the court of the women by a wall of 3 cubits high, of lattice work, so that persons walking here might see through it, as well as over it. This wall, however, was not on a level with the court of which we are speaking, but was cut out of the rock 6 cubits above it, the ascent to which was by 12 steps. On pillars placed at equal distances in this wall were inscriptions in Greek and Latin, to warn strangers, and such as were unclean, not to proceed further, on pain of death. It was from this court that our Saviour drove the persons who had established a cattle-market, for the purpose of supplying those with sacrifices who came from a distance, Matt. xxi. 12, 13. We must not overlook the beautiful pavement of variegated marble, and the piazzas, or covered walks, with which this court was surrounded. Those on the east, west, and north sides were of the same dimensions; but that on the south was much larger. The porch called Solomon's (John x. 23; Acts iii. 11.) was on the east side or front of the temple, and was so called because it was built by this prince, upon a high wall of 400 cubits from the valley of Kedron.

The court of the women, called in Scripture the new court, (2 Chron. xx. 5.) and the outer court, (Ezek. xlvi. 21.) was so designated by the Jews, not because none but women were permitted to enter it, but because it was their appointed place of worship, beyond which they might not go, unless when they brought a sacrifice, in which case they went forward to the court of Israel. The gate which led into this court, from that of the Gentiles, was the beautiful gate of the temple, mentioned Acts iii. 2, so called, because the folding doors, lintel and side-posts, were all overlaid with Corinthian brass. The court itself was 135 cubits square, having four gates, one on each side; and on three of its sides were piazzas, with galleries above them, whence could be seen what was passing in the great court. At the four corners of this court, were four rooms, appropriated to different purposes, Ezek. xlvi. 21—24. In the first, the lepers purified themselves after they were healed; in the second, the wood for the sacrifices was laid up; the Nazarites prepared their oblations, and shaved their heads, in the third; and in the fourth, the wine and oil for the sacrifices were kept. There were also two rooms more, where the Levites' musical instruments were laid up; and also thirteen treasure chests, two of which were for the half shekel, which was paid yearly by every Israelite; and the rest for the money for the purchase of sacrifices and other oblations. It was in this court of the women, called the treasury, that our Saviour delivered his striking discourse to the Jews, related in John viii. 1—20. It was into this court also, that the Pharisee and publican went to pray, (Luke xviii. 10—13.) and into which the lame man followed Peter and John, after he was cured; the court of the women being the ordinary place of worship for those who brought no sacrifice, Acts iii. 8. From thence, after prayers, he went back with them, through the beautiful gate of the temple, where he had been lying, and through the sacred fence, into the court of the Gentiles, where, under the eastern piazza, or Solomon's porch, Peter delivered that sermon which converted five thousand. It was in the same court of the women that the Jews laid hold of Paul, when they judged him a violator of the temple, by taking Gentiles within the sacred fence, Acts xxi. 26, &c. In this court the high-priest, at the fast of Expiation, read a portion of the law. Here also the king, on the sabbatical year, did the same at the Feast of Tabernacles.

The court of Israel was separated from the court of the women by a wall 32½ cubits high, on that side, but on the other only 25. The reason of which difference was, that as the rock on which the temple stood always became higher on advancing westward, the several courts naturally became elevated in proportion. The ascent into the court was by a flight of 15 steps, of a semicircular form, on which it is by some thought that the Levites stood and sung the "Psalms of degrees" (cxxx—cxxxiv.) at the Feast of Tabernacles. This gate is spoken of under several appellations in the Old Testament; but in the time of our Saviour it was known as the gate Nicanor. It was here the leper stood, to have his atonement made, and his cleansing completed. It was here they tried the suspected wife, by making her drink of the bitter water; and it was here likewise that women appeared after childbirth, for purification. The whole length of the court from east to west was 187 cubits, and the breadth from north to south, 135 cubits. This was divided into two parts, one of which was the court of the Israelites, and the other, the court of the priests. The former was a kind of piazza surrounding the latter, under which the Israelites stood while their sacrifices were burning in the court of the priests. It had 13 gates, with chambers above them, each of which had its particular name and use. The space which was comprised in the court of the priests was 165 cubits long, and 119 cubits wide, and was raised 2½ cubits above the surrounding court, from which it was separated by the pillars which supported the piazza, and the railing which was placed between them, 2 Kings xi. 8, 10. Within this court stood the brazen altar, on which the sacrifices were consumed, the molten sea, in which the priests washed, and the ten brazen lavers, for washing the sacrifices; also the various utensils and instruments for sacrificing, which are enumerated in 2 Chron. iv.

It is necessary to observe here, that although the court of the priests was not accessible to all Israelites, as that of Israel was to all the priests, yet they might enter it on three several occasions; viz. to lay their hands on the animals which they offered, or to kill them, or to waive some part of them. And then their entrance was not by the east gate, and through the place where the priests stood, but ordinarily by the north or south side of the court, according as the sacrifices were to be slain on the north or south sides of the altar. In general, it was a rule that they never returned from this court by the same door that they entered, Exod. xlvi. 9. From the court of the priests the ascent to the temple was by a flight of twelve steps, each half a cubit in height, which led into the sacred porch. Of the dimensions of this, as also of the sanctuary and holy of holies, we have already spoken. We shall therefore only observe here, that it was within the door of the porch, and in the sight of those who stood in the courts immediately before it, that the two pillars, Jachin and Boaz, were placed, 2 Chron. iii. 17; Ezek. xl. 49.

The temple thus described, retained its pristine splendor but 33 years, when it was plundered by Shishak, king of Egypt, 1 Kings xiv. 25, 26; 2 Chron. xii. 9. After this period it underwent sundry profanations and pillages, and was at length utterly destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, A. M. 3416, B. C. 588, after having stood, according to Usher, 424 years, three months and eight days.

After lying in ruins for 52 years, the foundations of the second temple were laid by Zerubbabel, and the Jews who had availed themselves of the privilege granted by Cyrus, and returned to Jerusalem, Ezra i. 1—4; ii. 1; iii. 8—10. They had not proceeded far, however, before they were obliged to desist, on account of an order from Artaxerxes, king of Persia, which had been procured through the misrepresentations of the Samaritans and others, chap. iv. 1. During fifteen years the work stood still, (ver. 24.) but in the second year of Darius they recommenced their labors; and on the third day of the month Adar, in the sixth year of Darius, it was finished and dedicated, (Ezra vi. 15, 16.) 21 years after it was begun, B. C. 515. The dimensions of this temple in breadth and height were double those of Solomon's. The weeping of the people at the laying of the foundation, therefore, (Ezra iii. 12, 13.) and the diminutive manner in which they spoke of it, when compared with the first one, (Hag. ii. 3.) were not occasioned by its inferiority in size, but in glory. It wanted the five principal things which invested it with this; viz. the ark and mercy-seat; the divine presence, or visible glory of the Shechinah; the holy fire on the altar; the urim and thummim; and the spirit of prophecy.

In the year A. M. 3837, this temple was plundered and profaned by Antiochus Epiphanes, who ordered the discontinuance of the daily sacrifice, offered swine's flesh upon the altar, and completely suspended the worship of Jehovah, 1 Mac. i. 62. Thus it continued for three years, when it was repaired and purified by Judas Maccabeus, who restored the divine worship, and dedicated it anew.

Herod, having slain all the Sanhedrim, except two, in the first year of his reign, B. C. 37, resolved to atone for it, by rebuilding and beautifying the temple. This he was the more inclined to do, both from the peace which he enjoyed, and the decayed state of the edifice. For, besides the common ravages of time, it had suffered considerably by the hands of enemies, since that part of Jerusalem was the strongest, and consequently the last resort of the inhabitants in times of extremity. After employing two years in preparing the materials for the work, in which 1000 wagons and 10,000 artificers were employed, besides 1000 priests to direct the works, the temple of Zerubbabel was pulled down, B. C. 17, and 46 years before the first Passover of his ministry. Although this temple was fit for divine service in nine years and a half, yet a great number of laborers and artificers were still employed in carrying on the out-buildings, all the time of our Saviour's abode on earth, and even till the coming of Gessius Florus to be governor of Judea.

The temple of Herod was considerably larger than that of Zerubbabel, as that of Zerubbabel was larger than Solomon's. For, whereas the second temple was 70 cubits long, 60 broad, and 60 high, this was 100 cubits long, 70 broad, and 100 high. The porch was raised to the height of 100 cubits, and was extended 15 cubits beyond each side of the rest of the building. All the Jewish writers praise this temple exceedingly for its beauty, and the costliness of its workmanship; for it was built of white marble, exquisitely wrought, and with stones of large dimensions, some of them 25 cubits long, 8 cubits high, and 12 cubits thick. To these there is no doubt a reference in Mark xii. 1; Luke xxi. 5: "And as he went out of the temple, one of his disciples saith unto him, Master, see what manner (Luke, goodly) of stones, and what buildings are here!"

The several courts have been already described, with some little variation, in our observations on the temple of Solomon. We may add, however, that the vast sums which Herod laid out in adorning this structure, gave it the most magnificent and imposing appearance. "Its appearance," says Josephus, "had every thing that could strike the mind, and astonish the sight. For it was on every side covered with solid plates of gold, so that when the sun rose upon it, it reflected such a strong and dazzling effulgence that the eye of the beholder was obliged to turn away from it, being no more able to sustain its radiance than the splendor of the sun." To strangers who approached the capital, it appeared, at a distance, like a huge mountain covered with snow. For where it was not decorated with plates of gold, it was extremely white and glistening. The historian, indeed, says, that the temple of Herod was the most astonishing structure he had ever seen or heard of, as well on account of its architecture as its magnitude, and likewise the richness and magnificence of its various parts, and the fame and reputation of its sacred apartments. And Tacitus calls it, immense opulentie templum—a temple of immense opulence. Its external glory, indeed, consisted not only in the opulence and magnificence of the building, but also in the rich gifts with which it was adorned, and which excited the admiration of those who beheld them, Luke xxi. 5.

This splendid building, however, which was once the admiration and envy of the world, has for ever passed away. According to our blessed Lord's predition, that "there should not be left one stone upon another that should not be thrown down," (Mark xiii. 2.) it was completely demolished by the Roman soldiers, under Titus, A. D. 70, on the same month, and on the same day of the month, on which Solomon's temple was destroyed by the Babylonians.

Concerning the high veneration which the Jews cherished for their temple, Dr. Harwood has collected some interesting particulars from Philo, Josephus, and the writings of Luke. Their reverence for the sacred edifice was such, that rather than witness its defilement, they would cheerfully submit to death. They could not bear the least disrespectful or dishonorable thing to be said of it. The least injurious slight of it, real or apprehended, instantly awakened all the cholera of a Jew, and was an affront never to be forgiven. Our Saviour, in the course of his public instructions, happening to say, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up again," (John ii. 19.)—it was construed into a contemptuous disrespect, designedly thrown out against the temple—his words instantly descended into the heart of a Jew, and kept rankling there for several years; for upon his trial, this declaration, which it was impossible for a Jew ever to forget or to forgive, was alleged against him, as big with the most atrocious guilt and impiety, Matt. xxvi. 61. Nor was the rancor and virulence which this expression had occasioned at all softened by all the affecting circumstances of that execrating and wretched death they saw him die—even as he hung upon the cross, with infinite triumph, scorn, and exultation, they upbraided him with it, contemptuously shaking their heads, and saying, "O Thou, who couldest demolish our TEMPLE, and rear it up again in all its splendor, in the space of three days, do now save thyself, and descend from the cross!" Matt. xxvii. 40. Their superstitious veneration for the temple further appears from the account of Stephen. When his adversaries were baffled and confounded by that superior wisdom, and those distinguished gifts he possessed, they were so exasperated at the victory he had gained over them, that they went and suborned persons to swear, that they had heard him speak blasphemy against Moses and against God. These inflaming the populace, the magistrates, and the Jewish clergy, he was seized, dragged away, and brought before the Sanhedrim. Here the false witnesses, whom they had procured, stood up and said, "This person, before you, is continually uttering the most reproachful expressions against this SACRED PLACE," (Acts vi. 13.) meaning the temple. This was blasphemy not to be pardoned. A judicature composed of high-priests and scribes would never forgive such impiety. We witness the same thing in the case of Paul, when they imagined that he had taken Trophimus, an Ephesian, with him into the temple, and for which insult they had determined to imbrue their hands in his blood, Acts xxi. 28, &c.

We have only to add, that from several passages of Scripture it appears that the Jews had a body of soldiers who guarded the temple, to prevent any disturbance during the ministration of such an immense number of the priests and Levites. To this body of men, whose office it was to guard the temple, Pilate probably referred, when he said to the chief priests and Pharisees who waited on him to desire he would make the sepulchre secure, "You have a watch: go your way and make it as secure as you can," Matt. xxvii. 65. Over these guards one person had the supreme command, who in several places is called captain of the temple, or officer of the temple guards, Acts iv. 1; v. 25, 26; xviii. 12. Josephus mentions such an officer, Antiq. b. xx. 2. Wars, c. 17. 2.

A few remarks on the daily service of the temple will close this article.

The first thing we notice is the morning service. After having enjoyed their repose, the priests bathed themselves in the rooms provided for that purpose, and waited the arrival of the president of the lots. This officer having arrived, they divided themselves into two companies, each of which was provided with lamps or torches, and made a circuit of the temple, going in different directions, and meeting at the pastryman's chamber, on the south side of the gate Nicanor. Having summoned him to prepare the cakes for the high-priest's meat-offering, they retired with the president to the south-east corner of the court, and cast lots for the duties connected with the altar. The priest being chosen to remove the ashes from the altar, he again washed his feet at the laver, and then with the silver shovel proceeded to his work. As soon as he had removed one shovel-full of the ashes, the other priests retired to wash their hands and feet, and then joined him in cleansing the altar and renewing the fires. The next duty was to cast lots for the thirteen particular duties connected with offering the sacrifice, which being settled, the president ordered one of them to fetch the lamb for the morning sacrifice. While the priests on this duty were engaged in fetching and examining the victim, those who carried the keys were opening the seven gates of the court of Israel, and the two doors that separated between the porch and the holy place. When the last of the seven gates was opened, the silver trumpets gave a flourish, to call the Levites to their desks for the music, and the stationary men to their places, as the representatives of the people. The opening of the folding doors of the temple was the established signal for killing the sacrifice, which was cut in pieces and carried to the top of the altar, where it was salted, and left while the priests once more retired to the room Gazith to join in prayer. While the sacrifice was being slain in the court of the priests, the two priests appointed to trim the lamps and cleanse the altar of incense were attending to their duties in the holy place. After the conclusion of their prayer, and a rehearsal of the ten commandments and their phylacteries, the priests again cast lots, to choose two to offer incense on the golden altar, and another to lay the pieces of the sacrifice on the fire of the brazen altar. The lot being determined, the two who were to offer the incense proceeded to discharge their duty, the time for which was, between the sprinkling of the blood and the laying the pieces upon the altar, in the morning; and in the evening between the laying the pieces upon the altar and the drink-offering. As they proceeded to the temple they rang the megemphita, or great bell, to warn the absent priests to come to worship; the absent Levites to come to sing; and the stationary men to bring to the gate Nicanor those whose purification was not perfected. The priest who carried the censer of coals, which had been taken from one of the three fires on the great altar, after kindling the fire on the incense altar, worshipped and came out into the porch, leaving the priest who had the incense alone in the holy place. As soon as the signal was given by the president, the incense was kindled, the holy place was filled with perfume, and the congregation without joined in the prayers, Luke i. 9. These being ended, the priest, whose lot it was to lay the pieces of the sacrifice upon the altar, threw them into the fire, and then, taking the tongs, disposed them in somewhat of their natural order. The four priests who had been in the holy place now appeared upon the steps that led to the porch, and, extending their arms, so as to raise their hands higher than their heads, one of them pronounced the solemn blessing, Numb. vi. 24—26. After this benediction, the daily meat-offering was offered; then the meat-offering of the high-priest; and last of all the drink-offering; at the conclusion of which the Levites began the song of praise; and, at every pause in the music, the trumpets sounded and the people worshipped. This was the termination of the morning service. It should be stated that the morning service of the priests began with the dawn of day, except in the great festivals, when it began much earlier; the sacrifice was offered immediately after sunrise.

During the middle of the day the priests held themselves in readiness to offer the sacrifices which might be presented by any of the Israelites, either of a voluntary or an expiatory nature. Their duties would therefore vary according to the number and nature of the offerings they might have to present.

The evening service varied in a very trifling measure from that of the morning; and the same priests ministered, except when there was one in the house of their Father who had never burned incense, in which case that office was assigned to him; or if there were more than one, they cast lots who should be employed.

The holiness of the place, and the injunction of Lev. xix. 3, "Ye shall reverence my sanctuary," laid the people under an obligation to maintain a solemn and holy behavior when they came to worship in the temple. We have already seen, that such as were ceremonially unclean were forbidden to enter the sacred court on pain of death; but in the course of time there were several prohibitions enforced by the Sanhedrim which the law had not named. The following have been collected by Lightfoot out of the rabbinical writings:—(1.) "No man might enter the mountain of the house with his staff."—(2.) "None might enter in thither with his shoes on his feet," though he might with his sandals.—(3.) "Nor might any man enter the mountain of the house with his scrip on."—(4.) "Nor might he come in with the dust on his feet," but he must wash or wipe them, "and look to his feet when he entered into the house of God," to remind him, perhaps, that he should then shake off all worldly thoughts and affections.—(5.) "Nor with money in his purse." He might bring it in his hand however; and in this way it was brought in for various purposes. If this had not been the case, it would seem strange that the cripple should have been placed at the gate of the temple, to ask alms of those who entered therein. (See Acts iii. 2.)—(6.) "None might spit in the temple: if he were necessitated to spit, it must be done in some corner of his garment."—(7.) "He might not use any irreverent gesture, especially before the gate of Nicanor," that being exactly in front of the temple.—(8.) "He might not make the mountain of the house a thoroughfare," for the purpose of reaching the place by a nearer way: for it was devoted to the purposes of religion.—(9.) "He that went into the court must go leisurely and gravely into his place; and there he must demean himself as in the presence of the Lord God, in all reverence and fear."—(10.) "He must worship standing, with his feet close to each other, his eyes directed to the ground, his hands upon his breast, with the right one above the left." (See Luke xviii. 13.)—(11.) "No one, however weary, might sit down in the court." The only exception was in favor of the kings of the house of David.—(12.) "None might pray with his head uncovered. And the wise men and their scholars never prayed without a veil." This custom is alluded to in 1 Cor. xi. 4, where the apostle directs the men to reverse the practice adopted in the Jewish temple.—(13.) Their bodily gesture, in bowing before the Lord, was either "bending of the knees," "bowing the head," or "falling prostrate on the ground."—(14.) Having performed the service, and being about to retire, "they might not turn their backs upon the altar." They therefore went backward till they were out of the court. (Temple Service, chap. x.)

The word temple denotes, sometimes, the church of Christ: (Rev. iii. 12.) "Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God." And Paul says, (2 Thess. ii. 4.) that Antichrist "as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God." Sometimes it imports heaven: (Ps. xi. 4.) "The Lord is in his holy temple: the Lord's throne is in heaven." The martyrs in heaven are said to be "before the throne of God, and to serve him day and night in his temple," Rev. vii. 15. The soul of a righteous man is the temple of God, because it is inhabited by the Holy Spirit, 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17; vi. 19; 2 Cor. vi. 16.

TEMPT, TEMPTATION, to try, to prove. God tempted Abraham, by commanding him to offer up his son Isaac; (Gen. xxii. 1.) intending to prove his obedience and faith, to confirm and strengthen him by this trial, and to furnish in his person an example and pattern of perfect obedience; to all succeeding ages. God does not tempt or try men, in order to ascertain their tempers and dispositions, as if he were ignorant of them; but to exercise their virtue, to purify it, to render it conspicuous to others, to give them an opportunity of receiving favors from his hands. When we read in Scripture that God proved his people, whether they would walk in his law, or no; (Exod. xvi. 4.) and that he permitted false prophets to arise among them, who prophesied vain things to try them, whether they would seek the Lord with their whole hearts, we should interpret these expressions by that of James, (i. 13.) "Let no man say when he is tempted, 'I am tempted of God,' for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man. But every man is tempted when he is drawn away by his own lust, and enticed."

The devil tempts us to evil, of every kind, and lays snares for us, even in our best actions. He tempted our Saviour in the wilderness, and endeavored to infuse into him sentiments of pride, ambition and distrust, Matt. iv. 1; Mark i. 13; Luke iv. 2. He tempted Ananias and Sapphira to lie to the Holy Ghost, Acts v. 3. In the prayer that Christ himself has taught us, we pray God "not to lead us into temptation;" (Matt. vi. 13,) and a little before his death, our Saviour exhorted his disciples to "watch and pray, that they might not enter into temptation," Matt. xxvi. 41. Paul says, "God will not suffer us to be tempted above what we are able to bear," 1 Cor. x. 13.

Men are said to tempt the Lord, when they unseasonably require proofs of the divine presence, power or goodness. Without doubt, we are allowed to seek the Lord for his assistance, and to pray him to give us what we need; but it is not allowed us to tempt him, nor to expose ourselves to dangers from which we cannot escape, unless by miraculous interposition of his omnipotence. God is not obliged to work miracles in our favor; he requires of us only the performance of such actions as are within the ordinary measures of our strength. The Israelites in the desert repeatedly tempted the Lord, as if they had reason to doubt of his presence among them, or of his goodness, or of his power, after all his appearances in their favor, Exod. xvi. 2, 7, 17; Numb. xx. 12; Ps. lxxviii. 18, 41, &c.

Men tempt or try one another, when they would know whether things are really what they seem to be; whether men are such as they are thought or desired to be. The queen of Sheba came to prove the wisdom of Solomon, by proposing riddles for him to explain, 1 Kings xi. 1; 2 Chron ix. 1. Daniel desired of him who had the care of feeding him and his companions, to prove them for some days, whether abstinence from food of certain kinds would make them leaner, Dan. i. 12, 14. The scribes and Pharisees often tempted our Saviour, and endeavored to decoy him into their snares, Matt. xvi. 1; xix. 3; xxii. 18.

TENT. Among the artificial conveniences for the habitations of men, tents were of very early invention. Jabal, before the flood, is called the father of all such as dwell in tents. Noah, after the flood, slept in his tent, and prophesying of the future destiny of his family, he said, "Japheth shall dwell in the tents of Shem." The patriarchal ages are described as of shepherds dwelling in tents. Abraham dwelt in tents with Isaac and Jacob; Lot had flocks, and herds, and tents; Jacob was a plain man, dwelling in tents, and his descendants succeeded a people designated Shepherd Kings, in the land of Goshen, under the Pharaohs of Egypt. On the exodus of the Israelites from Egypt, throughout their peregrinations, until they obtained the promised land, they adopted the same kind of habitation. Tents were very generally used in ancient times among the nations: their way of life being in general pastoral, locomotion became necessary for pasturage, and dwellings adapted for such a life became indispensable. The Egyptians already mentioned, the Midianites, the Philistines, the Syrians, the descendants of Ham, the Hagarites and Cushanites are mentioned in Scripture as living in tents. But the people most remarkable for this unsettled and wandering mode of life are the Arabs, who, from the time of Ishmael to the present day, have continued the custom of dwelling in tents. Amidst the revolutions which have transferred kingdoms from one possessor to another, these wandering tribes still dwell, unsubdued and wild as was their progenitor. This kind of dwelling is not, however, confined to the Arabs, but is used throughout the continent of Asia. The word tent is formed from the Latin, "to stretch;" tents being usually made of canvass stretched out, and sustained by poles with cords and pegs. The same may be understood of a tabernacle, a pavilion, or a portable lodge, under which to shelter in the open air, from the injuries of the weather.

Mr. Taylor remarks, that erections answering the purpose of tents, however slight they may be, must have (1.) a supporting pole or poles, placed towards the centre; (2.) hangings and curtains of some kind; (3.) cords attached to (4.) pins, which are driven into the ground, in order to take sure hold of it.

Of the various kinds of tents, some were made of slight materials, and others were erected for greater permanency; others, again, were mere shades or hovels, and not made of canvass. Tents were also appropriated to different sexes; Sarah had her tent; Laban went into Jacob's tent; Leah's tent, Rachel's tent, and the maid servant's tent, are also particularized. Sisera fled to Jael's tent. The custom of setting apart tents for the use of the women, is still in use, perhaps, however, a little varied; and the common Arabs have a separate apartment in their tents for their wives, made by letting down a curtain or carpet from one of the pillars. The part of the tent thus appropriated is called harem; and no stranger is permitted to enter it, unless introduced. Hence, perhaps, Sisera's hope of greater security in the harem of Heber, Jael's husband. There were also tents for cattle. From the slighter kind of tents, the town, or whatever else it might be, of Succoth was named; (Gen. xxiii. 17.) and an allusion to the frailty of this description of shelter is made by Job, in chap. xxvii. 18, which very aptly describes the prosperity of the wicked:—

“He buildeth his house like the moth,
Or like a shed which the watchman contriveth,
His support shall rot away.”

The watchman is here supposed to be the keeper of a vineyard, and the shed of the simplest kind, and merely intended to defend him, while on guard, from the intense heat of the sun. The Vulgate translates the term umbrella, a little insignificant shade, probably similar to those reared by the watch-negro on plantations in the West Indies, and which generally consists of four upright stakes joined together at right angles, to others which support a covering of plantain or banana leaves.

Besides Succoth, two other terms are used in the sacred Scriptures to denote tents; namely, sheken, which may perhaps be taken for an inferior kind of tent or tabernacle; similar to the huts of the natives of New Holland, which are formed of a few branches crossing each other, covered with brush-wood and clay, six feet in depth, and four or five in breadth: the other, called abel, may denote a tent whose accommodation may be varied so as to suit a few persons, a family; or great men, as generals and kings, enriched and ornamented. Of this kind of tent, a description is given by sir John Chardin, in his Travels, who relates that the deceased king of Persia caused a tent to be made that cost £150,000. It was called the house of gold, because there was nothing but gold that glistened in every part of it. Its cornice was embellished with verses, which concluded in this manner: “If thou still demandest at what time the throne of this second Solomon was built, I will tell thee—Behold the throne of the second Solomon!” here the last words being taken for numerals, make 1057, the date of the year.

The Turks spare for nothing in rendering their tents convenient and magnificent; those of the grandees are said to be exceedingly splendid, and entirely covered with silk, besides being lined with a stuff of the same material. Van Egmont and Heyman mention one which cost 25,000 piastres, and was not finished in less than three years: it was lined with a single piece made of camels' hair, and beautifully decorated with festoons, and sentences in the Turkish language. Nadir Shah had a very superb tent, covered on the outside with scarlet broadcloth, and lined within with violet colored satin, ornamented with a great variety of animals, flowers, &c. formed entirely of pearls and precious stones.

The tents of princes are frequently illuminated as a mark of honor and dignity. Norden tells us, that the tent of the bey of Girge was distinguished from those of others by forty lamps suspended before it, in the form of chequer work; and the general appearance of the camp of Darius, as related in Quintus Curtius, is very characteristic of a modern Persian camp. Whoever has seen at night, at a distance, a Persian camp, or indeed a camp of any Asiatics, where immense fires are lighted in all parts of it, will be struck with the correctness of the similitude to a general conflagration.

Tents are also of various colors; black, as the tents of Kedar; red, as of scarlet cloth; yellow, as of gold shining brilliantly; white, as of canvass. They are also of various shapes; some circular, others of an oblong figure, not unlike the bottom of a ship turned upside down. In Syria, the tents are generally made of cloth of goats' hair, woven by women. Those of the Arabs are of black goats' hair. Some other nations adopt the same kind, but it is not common. Thevenot says, the Curds of Mesopotamia do. The modern royal tents of the Arabs have generally no other covering than black hair-cloth. The Turcomans, who are a nation living in the Holy Land, dwell in tents of white linen cloth: they are very neat in their camps, and lie in good beds. The Egyptian and Moorish inhabitants of Askalon are said to use white tents; and D'Arvieux mentions that the tent of an Arab emir he visited, was distinguished from the rest by its being of white cloth.

The Roman emperors had an ancient custom of spreading a scarlet cloak over their tents, to distinguish those of officers of rank. Among the Mamelukes, the tents are often of cloth, and highly ornamented. Lieutenant Brown, of the Royal Navy, brought an entire tent from the late Egyptian expedition. It was of strong sail-cloth, of a leaden hue, but ornamented with painting. Mr. Jackson, in his over-land journey from India, on his entering the Tigris, in the place where the river Hil joins with it, near a small town called Coote, fell in with a Turkish encampment, which appeared to him beautiful, some of the tents being red, some green, and some white. (Harmer's Observations, 1816.) Olearius, attending the ambassadors of Holstein Gottorp, who were invited by a late Persian monarch to accompany him on a party of pleasure for hunting, hawking, &c. found in a village many tents prepared for the reception of the company, which, by the variety of their colors, and the peculiar manner in which they were pitched, made a most pleasing appearance.

Tents are still used for religious solemnities, as will appear from the following extracts:—When De Perry arrived at Siüt, a large town near the Nile, about 70 leagues above Cairo, it was “the first day of Biram; and, going to the town, we found many tents pitched, and an innumerable concourse of people without the town, to the southward of it. These people were partly of Siüt, and partly from the circumjacent villages, who came thither to celebrate the happy day.” The Rev. Cornelius Rahum, a missionary, visiting Dorbat Horde, by whom the Calmuc superstitions are held in veneration, describes it thus:—"We went out to the 'Churull,' this is the name of that part of the encampment where the temple Kibitjes, (or sacred tents), and those belonging to the lama and galls, or priests, are pitched. The word is derived from a verb which signifies 'to gather,' and in this place all ordinary assemblies for worship are held. In the church were six temple Kibitjes."

A custom prevails in the East, of persons in all stations of life living in certain seasons of the year in tents, whilst in other seasons they dwell in houses. Dr. Pococke mentions a pleasant place near Aleppo, where he met an aga, who had a great entertainment, accompanied with music, under tents. The custom of taking air in the neighborhood of Cairo in tents, is noticed by Maillet as a matter of course.

It was customary to pitch tents near water-springs or fountains. The army of Ishbosheth sat down by the pool of Gibeon, 2 Sam. xx. 12, 13. Chardin informs us that Tahmasp, the Persian monarch, used to retire, in the summer, three or four leagues into the country, where he lived in tents, at the foot of mount Olouvent, in a place abounding in cool springs and pleasant shrubs. The following stanza from the Bedavi, a Persian poet, translated by Fox, will further illustrate this. Speaking of the shepherd, he says,

"Or haply when the summer sun-beam pours
Intensely o'er th' unshaded wide extent,
He leads instinctive where the grove embowers,
And rears beside the brook his shel'ring tent."

The words succoth and masac are variously rendered in our translation, curtain, tabernacle, covert, pavilion, college, booth, tent, a hanging, and a covering.

TEPHILIM, i. q. FRONTLETS, which see.

TERAH, son of Nahor, and father of Nahor, Haran and Abraham, (Gen. xi. 24.) was born A. M. 1878. He begat Abraham at the age of 72 years, and left Ur, of the Chaldeans, to settle at Haran, in Mesopotamia, A. M. 2082, Gen. xi. 31, 32. He died there the same year, aged 275 years. Scripture intimates plainly, that Terah had fallen into idolatry, (Josh. xxiv. 2—14.) and some think that Abraham himself at first, worshipped idols; but that afterwards, God being gracious to him, convinced him of the vanity of this worship, and that he undecieved his father Terah. See ABRAHAM.

TERAPHIM, idols, or superstitious figures, to which extraordinary effects were ascribed. The eastern people are still much addicted to this superstition of talismans. The Persians call them telefin, a name nearly approaching to teraphim. Those of Rachel must have been images, made of some precious metal. See Gen. xxxi. 19; 1 Sam. xv. 23; Judg. xvii. 5; Ezek. xxi. 21; Zech. x. 2, where the word teraphim is used for an idol, or superstitious figure. See EAR-RINGS, and AMULETS.

The prophet Hosea, (iii. 4, 5.) threatening Israel, says, "The children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and without teraphim:" that is, during their captivity they shall be deprived of the public exercise of their religion, and even weaned from their private superstition. The passage is highly descriptive of the depth of their suffering. (See Fragment, 738.)

TEREBINTH. The Heb. תרבות is sometimes rendered by the ancient versions oak, and sometimes terebinth. The latter is the Pistacia Terebinthus of Linnæus, or the common turpentine tree, whose resin or juice is the Chiau or Cyprus turpentine, used in medicine, and finer than that produced by the fir tribe. The tree grows to a large size and great age, and is common in Palestine. According to Pliny, it is an evergreen; although this does not coincide with the experience of modern botanists. The Hebrew word would seem rather to be used, in a broader sense, of any large tree in general; like the Greek δῦρε. In Is. vi. 13, it is improperly translated teitree, which is the same as the lime or linden. *R.

TERTIUS, Paul's amanuensis in writing his epistle to the Romans, Rom. xvi. 22. Lightfoot conjectures that he was the same as Silas, this Hebrew name signifying the same as the Latin Tertius.

TERTULLUS, an advocate who pleaded against Paul before Felix, governor of Judea, A. D. 58, Acts xxiv. 1—9.

TESTAMENT is commonly taken in Scripture for the covenant, the law, the promises. See COVENANT.

TESTIMONY, a proof, testimony or witness. (See Exod. xx. 16; xxiii. 1; Gen. xxxi. 47, 48, 52; Josh. xxii. 27; John i. 8; v. 31, &c.)

The law is called a testimony, Ps. cxix. passim, because when the Lord gave it to the Israelites, he gave testimony of his presence by prodigies performed before them, and he required an oath of them, that they should continue faithful to him. The ark is called the ark of testimony, because it contained the tables of the law; so the tabernacle of testimony, because in that tent the tables of the law were kept.

TETRARCHI, a sovereign of a fourth part of a state, province or kingdom, Matt. xiv. 1; Luke iii. 1, 19; ix. 7; Acts xiii. 1. It was a title frequent among the descendants of Herod the Great, to whom the Roman emperors distributed his dominions at their pleasure. But the word tetararch ought not to be understood rigorously, as it was occasionally given to a prince who possessed, perhaps, a half, or a third part, of a state.

I. THADDEUS, a surname of Jude the apostle, Mark iii. 18.

II. THADDEUS, one of the seventy disciples, who is related to have been sent to king Abgarus at Edessa. (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. 13.)

THANKSGIVING, the act of acknowledging the mercies of God. (See PRAISE.) There are various modes, under the Old Testament, of offering thanksgiving; sometimes it was public, sometimes in the family. It was frequently accompanied by sacrifices (2 Chron. xxix. 31.) and peace-offerings, or offerings of pure devotion, arising from the sentiments of gratitude in the offerer's own mind, Lev. vii. 12, 15; Ps. cvii. 23; cxvi. 7. It is usually connected with praise, joy, gladness, and the voice of melody, (Isa. li. 3.) or (as Neh. xi. 17.) with singing and with honor; (Rev. vii. 12.) but occasionally, if not generally, with supplication (Phil. iv. 6.) and prayer, 1 Tim. ii. 3; Neh. xi. 17. For thanksgiving, we have examples in the best men in all ages, and also in Christ our Lord. Whoever possesses any good without giving thanks for it, deprives him who bestows that good of his glory, sets a bad example before others, and prepares a recollection severely painful for himself, when he comes in his turn to experience ingratitude. Let only that man withhold thanksgiving, who has no enjoyments for which to give thanks.

THARSHISH, see TARSUS II.

THEBET, see TEBETH.

THEBEZ, a city of Ephraim, at the siege of which Abimelech, son of Gideon, was killed, Judg. ix. 50, &c. Eusebius says, there was a village called Thebes, 13 miles from Shechem, towards Scythopolis.

THEFT, among the Hebrews, was not punished with death: (Prov. vi. 30, 31.) "Men do not despise [overlook?] a thief, if he steal to satisfy his soul when he is hungry. But if he be found, he shall restore seven-fold; he shall give all the substance of his house." The Mosaic law condemned a common thief to make double restitution, Exod. xxii. 4. If he stole an ox, he was to restore five-fold; if a sheep, only four-fold, Exod. xxii. 1. But if the animal stolen were found alive in his house, he only rendered the double of it. If he did not make restitution, they seized and sold his property, his house, and even himself, if he had not wherewith to make satisfaction, Exod. xxii. 23. In the passage of Proverbs, the wise man seems to say, that the thief should restore seven-fold the value stolen; but seven-fold is here put for many-fold. Zaccheus declared he would restore four-fold whatever he had fraudulently acquired in his office of publican, (Luke xix. 8.) because the civil law condemned receivers of the public money to a four-fold restitution of their unjust gains.

If a thief were taken, and carried before a magistrate, he was interrogated judicially, and adjured in the name of the Lord to confess the fact. If he persisted in denying it, and was afterwards convicted of perjury, he was condemned to death; not for the theft, but for the perjury. An accomplice, or receiver of stolen goods, was subject to the same penalty, if he did not discover the truth to the judges, when he was examined, and adjured in the name of the Lord, Lev. v. 1; Prov. xxix. 24. To steal a freeman, or a Hebrew, and to reduce him to servitude, was punished with death, Exod. xxi. 16. If a stranger were stolen, the thief was only condemned to restitution.

The night-robber might be killed with impunity in the fact; but not a thief taken stealing in the day-time, Exod. xxii. 2. It was presumed, that he who attempted to break open a house, and steal by night, had a design on the life of the person molested; and under this presumption he might be prevented and killed. But it was not so with him who stole by day; there was then opportunity of defence against such an attack; and the thief might be prosecuted before the judges, and compelled to make restitution.

THEOPHILUS, an honorable person, to whom the evangelist Luke addressed his Gospel, and the Acts of the Apostles, Luke i. 3; Acts i. 3. He was probably a Christian of quality, and most likely governor or intendant of some province; such having generally the title of most excellent. It is right to observe, however, that it does not of necessity imply a Roman appellation of honor; nor does the name Theophilus occur in Roman history, as a governor. It is found among the Jewish high-priests, in a son of Annas, who was high-priest in the year when our Saviour was crucified. Theophilus was nominated to that office instead of his brother Jonathan, who had been deposed by Vitellius, (Joseph. Ant. xviii. xix. xx.) and Michaëlis countenances the notion that this was Luke's Theophilus. [We can only say of Luke's friend, in general, that most probably he was a man of some note, who lived out of Palestine, and had abjured paganism in order to embrace Christianity. R.]

THESSALONICA, a city and seaport of the second part of Macedonia. [It is situated at the head of the Sinus Thermaicus. When Æmilius Paulus, after his conquest of Macedonia, divided the country into four districts, this city was made the capital of the second division, and was the station of a Roman governor and questor. (Liv. xlv. 29.) It was anciently called Therma, but afterwards received the name of Thessalonica, either from Cassander, in honor of his wife Thessalonica, the daughter of Philip; or from Philip himself, in memory of a victory obtained over the armies of Thessaly. (Diod. Sic. xix. 35 et 52. coll. Strab. vii. p. 509.) It was inhabited by Greeks, Romans and Jews, from among whom the apostle Paul gathered a numerous church. R.] There was a large number of Jews resident in this city, where they had a synagogue, in which Paul (A. D. 52) preached to them on three successive sabbaths. Some of the Jews, and many of the Gentiles, embraced the gospel, but the rest of the Jews determined to maltreat the apostle, and surrounded the house in which they believed he was lodging. The brethren, however, secretly led Paul and Silas out of the city, towards Berea, and they escaped from their enemies, Acts xvii. Thessalonica, now called Saloniki, is at present a wretched town, but having a population of about 60,000 persons.

When Paul left Macedonia for Athens and Corinth, he left behind him Timothy and Silas, that they might confirm those in the faith who had been converted under his ministry. Being subsequently informed by them of the state of the church in Thessalonica, he addressed to them the first of the two Epistles, so directed, in our present canon, A. D. 52, or 53.

In this letter, the apostle instructs them concerning the last judgment, and of the manner and measure with which Christians should be afflicted for the death of their relations. He expresses much affection and tenderness for them, with an earnest desire of coming to see them. He reproves them with much mildness and prudence, intermingling expressions of praise, and marks of tenderness, with his reprehensions. The Second Epistle was written from Corinth, a short time after the First; and in it the apostle cautions the Thessalonians against misapprehensions occasioned by a false interpretation of a passage in his former Epistle, as if he had said, that the day of the Lord was at hand. He exhorts them to continue steadfast in the doctrine and traditions he had taught them, and to suffer with constancy under persecution. He reproves, more vehemently than before, those who lived in idleness and vain curiosity; and directs his converts to separate from them, that at least they might be ashamed of their trifling, and reform it. He signs the letter with his own hand, and desires them to mark it well, that they might not be imposed on by supposititious letters, written in his name, by which, perhaps, they had formerly been deceived. (See chap. ii. 2.)

THEUDAS, the name of a seditious person, who excited popular tumults, probably during the interregnum which followed the death of Herod the Great, while Archelaus was absent at Rome; at which time Judea was agitated with frequent seditions, Acts v. 36. The person spoken of by Gamaliel cannot be the Theudas mentioned by Josephus, (Ant. xx. 5. 1.) since the latter appeared during the reign of Claudius, after the death of Herod Agrippa I. and was destroyed by Cuspius Fadus, then procurator of Syria and Judea, about 14 or 15 years after the time when the advice of Gamaliel was given. (See Kuinoel.) *R.

THIMNATHAH, (Josh. xix. 43.) the same as THINATH, which see.

THIRST is a painful, natural sensation, occasioned by the absence of moistening liquors from the stomach. As this sensation is accompanied by vehement desire, the term is sometimes used in Scripture in a moral sense, for a mental desire; as Jer. ii. 25: "Withhold thy throat from thirst; but thou saidst, I loved strangers, and after them will I go." In other words, "I desire the commission of sin—I thirst for criminal indulgence." And Matt. v. 6, "Blessed are they who hunger and thirst after righteousness." Ps. xliii. 2, "My soul thirsteth for God." The same figure is employed in the discourse of our Lord with the woman of Samaria: "Whosoever drinketh of the water which I shall give him shall never thirst;" an allusion which the woman mistook as if intended of natural water, drawn from some spring possessing peculiar properties.

THOMAS, the apostle, (Matt. x. 3.) called in Greek Didymus, (John xx. 24.) was probably a Galilean, as well as the other apostles; but the place of his birth, and the circumstances of his calling, are unknown. He was appointed an apostle A. D. 31, (Luke vi. 13—15.) and continued to follow our Saviour during the three years of his preaching. We know no particulars of his life, till A. D. 33, a little before the passion of Christ; when Jesus intending to go to Judea to raise Lazarus, Thomas said to the rest, "Let us also go, that we may die with him," (John xi. 16.) meaning that by going to Judea they should be exposed to certain death from the hatred and malice of the Jews against his Master. At the last supper (John xiv. 5, 6.) Thomas asked Christ whether he was going, and what way. Our Saviour answered, "I am the way, and the truth, and the life." After the resurrection, when Christ appeared to his apostles, in the absence of Thomas, he so far expressed his disbelief in what they assured him of, as to say, "Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into his side, I will not believe," John xx. 19—29. Eight days after, Jesus appeared to the apostles, Thomas being with them, who, having both seen and touched him, no longer doubted, but cried out, "My Lord, and my God!" Jesus said to him, "Thomas, because thou hast seen, thou hast believed: blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed." A few days after, while Thomas and some other disciples were fishing, on the sea of Galilee, Jesus appeared to them, caused them to take a very great draught of fishes, and dined with them.

Tradition says, that in the distribution of the apostles to the several parts of the world, to preach the gospel, the country of the Parthians was allotted to Thomas, who preached to the Medes, the Persians, the Caramanians, the Hircanians, the Bactrians, and the Magians, people which then composed the empire of the Parthians. The author of the Imperfect Work on Matthew says, that being arrived at the country in which the Magi were still living, who came to worship Christ at Bethlehem, he baptized them, and employed them in preaching the gospel. Several of the Fathers inform us, that he preached in the Indies; and others say, that he preached in Ethiopia, near the Caspian sea.

There are Christians in the East Indies, which bear the name of St. Thomas, because they report that this apostle preached the gospel there. They dwell in a peninsula of the Indus, on this side the gulf. There are also many in the kingdom of Cranganor, and in neighboring places; as also at Negapatam, Meliapur, Engamar, beyond Cochin, where their archbishop resides, who acknowledges the jurisdiction of the patriarch of Babylon. It is said that the first Christians of the Indies, converted by Thomas, relapsed into their former infidelity, and so far forgot the instructions they had received from the apostle, that they did not remember there had ever been any Christians in their country. They believe that a certain holy man, called Mar-Thome, a Syrian, brought them the light of the gospel, and converted a great number of the people, with the assistance of some priests from Syria and Egypt, whom he invited thither. Calmet inclines to believe, that they derived the name of Christians of St. Thomas only from Mar-Thome; but Mr. Taylor remarks, that the uniform tradition and testimony of their writers, as collected by Asseman, forms a body of evidence on this subject which it is very difficult to resist. Thomas travelled very far east; and it can hardly be supposed that the Syrians would introduce into their public worship, commemorations of him, with thanksgivings to God for his zeal and example, unless their ecclesiastics, who composed such ancient ritual, thought themselves warranted by facts. There remains, however, the question, what countries the Syrian writers intended by the terms they use. When they speak of China, it does not necessarily follow that they mean the country we now call China; and certainly not in its whole extent. It appears to be prudent to restrict the evangelical labors of Thomas to the peninsula of India; yet without denying that he might in some excursion, by sea or land, touch on some part of the Chinese empire. Here he might first plant the gospel; but he returned to his residence in India. The confusion occasioned by the revival, under a second Thomas, should not be allowed to invalidate the evidence that fixes so firmly on the first.

THORNS. There are several species of thorns or briars, and not less than eight different words are employed by the sacred writers to denote one or other of them. The first time they are mentioned is in Gen. iii. 18, (רִיבֵי וְרִיבֵי) "thorns and thistles." The word רִיבֵי is put for thorns in other places, (Exod. xxii. 6; Judg. viii. 6; xxviii. 24.) but it is not certain whether it means a specific kind of thorn, or is a generic name for all kinds of thorny plants. In the passage first cited, it seems to be used generally, for all those noxious plants, shrubs, &c. by which the labors of the husbandman are impeded, and which are only fit for burning. The radical import of the word is to fret, to wound, or to tear.

In Judges viii. 16, we read of Gideon taking "thorns," (רִיבֵי) and "briars" (גִּבְרֵי). The former word we have noticed; the latter now claims our attention. There can be no doubt that it means a sharp, jagged kind of plant; the difficulty is to fix on one, where so many offer themselves. The LXX preserve the original word. We should hardly think, says Mr. Taylor, that Gideon went far to seek these plants; the "thorns" are expressly said to be from the "wilderness," or common, hard by; probably the barkánim were from the same place. In our country this would lead us to the black-berry bushes on our commons; but it might not be so around Succoth. There is a plant mentioned by Hasselquist, whose name and properties somewhat resemble those which are required in the barkânim of this passage: "Nabca paliurus Athenæi, the nabka of the Arabs. There is every appearance of this being the tree which furnished the crown of thorns put on the head of our Lord. It is common in the East; a plant more proper for this purpose could not be selected; for it is armed with thorns; its branches are supple and pliant, and its leaf of a deep green, like that of the ivy. Perhaps the enemies of Christ chose this plant, in order to add insult to punishment, by employing a plant approaching in appearance that which was used to crown emperors and generals." I am not sure, continues Mr. Taylor, whether something of the same ideas did not influence Gideon: at least, it is remarkable, that though in ver. 7, he threatens to thrash the flesh of the men of Succoth with thorns, that is, to beat them severely, yet, in ver. 16, it is said, he taught, made to know, perhaps made to be known by wearing them, as at once insult and punishment. The change of words deserves notice; and so does the observation, that "he slew the men of Pennel," which is not said of the men of Succoth. If the nabka (nabaka) of the Arabs might be the na-barkan of this passage, the idea of its employment is remarkably coincident in the two instances. [The barkânim of Gideon are understood by Gesenius to be the sharp stones (sometimes, perhaps, thorns) underneath the thrashing machines of the Hebrews; and these Gideon used as instruments of punishment and torture. See THRASHING. R.]

Another word used to denote a plant of this description, is תְּזִימ, tzenim, Numb. xxxiii. 55; Josh. xxiii. 13, and Job v. 5. From its application, it seems to describe a bad kind of thorn: "But if ye will not drive out the inhabitants of the land from before you, then it shall come to pass, that those which ye let remain of them shall be pricks in your eyes, and thorns in your sides, and shall vex you in the land wherein ye dwell," Numb. xxxiii. 55. So in the second passage referred to. The passage in Job is thus rendered by Good—

Their harvest the wild starveling devoureth;
He seizeth it to the very thorns;

which supports the interpretation of the word above proposed, as far as the idea is concerned, although Dr. Good seems inclined to think, with Symmachus and Jerome, that the allusion is here rather to "hostile arms" than to vegetable prickles. Perhaps Eliphaz may refer to a hedge of thorns, which surrounds for security a thrashing-floor, granary, or some such place; and Dr. Harris proposes, as the particular kind, the rhannus paliurus, a deciduous plant or tree, a native of Palestine, Spain and Italy. It will grow nearly to the height of fourteen feet, and is armed with sharp thorns, two of which are at the insertion of each branch, one of them straight and upright, the other bent backward.

In Prov. xv. 19, there is a beautiful apophthegm, which involves a reference to some kind of thorny shrub:—

The way of the slothful is as a hedge of thorns.
But the way of the righteous is plain.

The word here used is חֶדֶק, chedek, but the particular kind of thorn which is intended, it seems hardly possible to determine. Celsius and Ray make it the solanum pomiferum fructu spinoso; but Dr. Harris thinks it is the colutea spinosa of Forskal, which is called in the Arabic keddad, and of which there is an engraving in Russell. In Mic. vii. 4, the same word is translated "brier," and perhaps here the same word may be retained without injury to the passage. Perhaps, too, this chedek may be a plant of some verdure, like our brier, and of which we call a scented kind "sweet-brier;" so a judge—the comparison in Micah—may be a well-looking (q. verdant) character, but if he take bribes he becomes a brier, holding every thing that comes within his reach, hooking all he can catch; not a sweet-brier, but a rank weed:

Sauciat atque rapit spinus paliurus acutis:
Hoc etiam judex semper avarus agit.

With regard to the passage in the Proverbs, there is a beautiful opposition, which is lost in our rendering:—"The narrow way of the slothful is like perplexed pathways among sharp thorns; whereas, the broad road of the righteous is a high bank;" (as rendered elsewhere, a causeway;) that is, straight forward; free from obstructions; the direct, conspicuous, open path. (1.) The common course of life of these two characters answers to this comparison. (2.) Their manner of going about business, or of transacting it, answers to this: an idle man always prefers the most intricate, the most oblique, and eventually the most thorny measures, to accomplish his purpose; the honest man prefers the most liberal and straightforward.

We have no means of determining the kind of plant meant by שִׁרִים, sirim, rendered "thorns," in Exod. vii. 6; Nah. i. 10, and Hos. ii. 6. In Exod. and Nah. they are spoken of as a kind of fuel which quickly burns up, and in Hos. as obstructions or hedges. The like uncertainty attends our inquiry as to the תְּזִימ, "thorns," of 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11; Prov. xxvi. 9; Cant. ii. 2; Hos. ix. 6. Its etymology would lead us to look for a kind of thorn with incurved spines, like fish-hooks. In 2 Kings xiv. 9; 2 Chron. xxv. 18; Job xxxi. 18, the word תָּהַר is rendered "thistle;" in Job xli. 2, "hook;" in 1 Sam. xiii. 6, "thicket;" and in Isa. xxxiv. 14, "bramble."

The תְּזִימִים, natzi'im of Isa. vii. 19, is taken for "thorns" by the Chaldee interpreters, and also by our translators; but bishop Lowth renders it "thickets," referring it, probably, to the root תָּ, a tree. Mr. Taylor, however, thinks that it refers rather to places than to plants—meadows, or flowery meads. Bate thinks that the תְּזִימִים, nehellim, with which it is associated, and which we render "bushes," should rather be understood of "pasture grounds, where flocks are tended;" and as this makes three out of the four subjects mentioned places, the fourth also, by parity, should be a place, not a plant. This would lead to the following distribution of the passage:—

In that day,
The Lord shall hiss for the fly
Which is in the uttermost parts of the rivers of Egypt,
Which shall come and settle on all flowery meads,
And on all fruitful pastures.
And for the bee,
Which is in the land of Assyria,
Which shall come and settle on all abandoned valleys,
And in the crevices (or clefts) of the rock.

The שִׁלּוֹן, sillon, of Gen. iii. 18; Josh. xxiii. 13; Ezek. ii. 6, and chap. xxviii. 24, is thought by some to be a kind of thorn, oversreading a large surface of ground, as the dew-brier. Mr. Taylor, from its association in the two last passages, inclines to think that some kind of animal is intended, rather than a vegetable substance. His reasons, however, seem to possess little weight, and the passage in Gen. iii. 18, appears decisive for a thorny plant of some description, though the particular kind cannot be ascertained. From the vexatious characters ascribed to it, Harris thinks it to be the hantuffa as described by Bruce.

The כרפף, sirpad, of Isa. lv. 13, means, apparently, some kind of wide-spreading thorn. Hiller calls it the ruscus.

In addition to the words already enumerated, we find חרול, cherul, used in Job xxx. 7; Prov. xxiv. 31, and Zeph. ii. 9. It is only in the second passage, however, that it is rendered thorn, and the particular kind it is impossible to determine. Indeed, it is no wonder, that among so many kinds of thorns as are to be found in the East, we should be embarrassed in identifying them. [The difficulty in all the preceding remarks is, that the writers have felt no embarrassment, but have decided with self-complacency, where real scholars are at a loss. R.]

The word employed in the New Testament for "thorns" is ἄκανθα. Wetstein has quoted a passage from Galen, very similar to Matt. vii. 16: "The husbandman would never be able to make the thorn produce grapes." On Matt. xxvii. 29, Harris cites, with apparent approbation, Dr. Pearce's note on the passage, which is as follows: "The word ἄκανθων may as well be the plural genitive case of the word ἄκανθος, as of ἄκανθῶν; if of the latter, it is rightly translated 'of thorns,' but the former would signify what we call 'bear's foot;' and the French 'brancie ursine.' This is not of the thorny kind of plants, but is soft and smooth. Virgil calls it 'mollis acanthus,' so does Pliny secundus; and Pliny the elder says that it is 'lævis, smooth, and that it is one of those plants that are cultivated in gardens. I have somewhere read, but cannot at present tell where, that this soft and smooth herb was very common in and about Jerusalem. I find nothing in the New Testament concerning the crown which Pilate's soldiers put on the head of Jesus to incline one to think that it was of thorns, and intended, as is usually supposed, to put him to pain. The reed put into his hand, and the scarlet robe on his back, were meant only as marks of mockery and contempt. One may also reasonably judge by the soldiers being said to plait this crown, that it was not composed of such twigs and leaves as were of a thorny nature. I do not find that it is mentioned by any of the primitive Christian writers as an instance of the cruelty used towards our Saviour before he was led to crucifixion, till the time of Tertullian, who lived after Jesus' death at the distance of above one hundred and sixty years. He, indeed, seems to have understood azarar in the sense of thorns, and says, "Quale oro te, Jesus Christus sertum pro utroque sexu subit? Ex spinis, opinor, et tribulis." The total silence of Polycarp, Barnabas, Cl. Romanus, and all the other Christian writers whose works are now extant, and who wrote before Tertullian, in particular, will give some weight to incline one to think that this crown was not plaited with thorns.

This conjecture of Pearce, which has been embraced by Michaëlis, is solidly refuted by Campbell. Not a single version favors it; and, as Bloomfield remarks, the word proposed occurs no where in the New Testament or the Septuagint. The Italian and Syriac render thorns; and the ancient Greek and Latin fathers so took it. There is, therefore, the highest probability opposed to mere conjecture. Bodæus and Theophylact think that our Lord's crown was of acacia; others conjecture differently. It was, doubtless, of some kind of prickly shrub, though what that was cannot now be ascertained. Certainly it was not of mere thorns, nor pressed upon his head with an intent to torture him; every thing in this occurrence seems to have been done with a view to mockery and derision, not pain; and, as Whitby remarks, not to deride Christ's pretensions to the Messiahship, but to his title to be king of the Jews. Doddridge thinks, that had ridicule alone been intended, a crown of straws might have done as well. But crowns were usually made of such shrubs as admitted of being woven, and such are usually more or less prickly. That they meant cruelty, he argues from their striking him; but with what?—a reed, not a cane; or, as Doddridge thinks, a walking-staff, as Wetstein has satisfactorily shown.

THOUGHT, THINKING, are words not always used in Scripture for the simple operation of the mind; but as including a formed design of doing something. (See Jer. xi. 19; Gen. xi. 6, &c.)

When our translation was made, the word thought included the sense of anxiety, solicitude, apprehension; so that when we are directed to "take no thought for the morrow," the meaning was, no anxiety, no carling carefulness; the same when we are told to take no thought for our life, or living, (Matt. vi. 8.) or for raiment, Luke xii. 26. Which of you, by taking thought, by anxiety, by solicitude, can add one cubit to his stature, or to his age? verse 25. It cannot be supposed that our Lord forbids a proper care, foresight, or provision for future time: he only meant to restrain immoderate desire, anguish of mind, corroding cares, avarice.

THRASHING, the separating of corn from the shell or husk in which it is enclosed. In England this operation was, till lately, usually performed by the staff or flail; but it was not so among the Hebrews.

In Isaiah xli. 15, we read, "Behold, I will make thee a new sharp thrashing instrument, having teeth; thou shalt thrash the mountains, and beat them small, and shalt make the hills as chaff; thou shalt fan them, and the wind shall carry them away, and the whirlwind shall scatter them." Here every idea, every allusion, every sentence, was familiar to an eastern agriculturist; but what can an Englishman understand by "a new sharp thrashing instrument having teeth?" He who naturally thinks of the flail, as his thrashing instrument, may well be permitted to wonder in what part of this instrument its teeth can be placed, and how it was to be used, when increased by this addition. As to our modern thrashing machines, they are out of the question. In the same prophet we have another passage, (chap. xxv. 10,) which has not been understood: "Moab shall be trodden down under him, even as straw is trodden down on the dunghill."—The margin reads, "Moab shall be thrashed, as straw is thrashed in Madmenah." Now, to tread straw by labor purposely and specifically for the dunghill, is an occupation of persons unknown to our rural economy; but our translators were aware, that to allude to the thrashing of straw in Madmenah, was to delude the rustic reader by a seeming translation of no information to him; and they, therefore, preferred that which, though it had no foundation in fact, yet seems less uncouth to English ears. Translators, in general, have referred the passage to thrashing, as appears by consulting them; Coverdale has "thrashed upon the ground;" the Doway translation, "broken with the wain;" and bishop Lowth, "thrashed under the wheels of the car;" each something right, and something wrong; but bishop Lowth is the nearest to accuracy.

Very little of the real import, the haste, or the value, of the proposed present of Ornan to David (1 Chron. xvi. 23.) can be understood in this country: "I give the thrashing instruments for wood;" i. e. to burn the sacrifice of the oxen, &c. How many flails (our thrashing instruments) must Ornan have possessed, to accomplish this purpose? Could nothing better be found, nothing be fetched from the adjacent city, but must all the flails of this Jebusite be consumed for this service? Surely Ornan did not hold such a quantity of land, as required so great a number of flails for the purpose of thrashing the produce of it, that they might serve to consume the sacrifice of two oxen! But why not conclude, that this offer was made for instant use, Ornan hereby hoping to terminate the pestilence, as it were, on the instant, without a moment's delay? Thus considered, it acquires additional propriety, and we shall see that it had no trifling value.

When the prophet Isaiah speaks of the customary practice of rural economy in Judea, as exemplifying the talents imparted by Heaven to the sons of men, he says, "His God doth instruct him to discretion, and doth teach him; for the fitches are not thrashed with a thrashing instrument; neither is a cart wheel turned about upon the cumiu; but the fitches are beaten out with a staff, and the cumin with a rod. Bread corn is bruised, because he will not be ever thrashing it, nor break it with the wheel of his cart, nor bruise it with his horsemen. This also cometh from the Lord of hosts, who is wonderful in counsel, and excellent in working," ch. xxviii. 27. To turn cart wheels upon bread corn seems strange enough; but the following information will remove the difficulty:

"The second remark is concerning the manner they thrash, or rather tread, rice in Egypt, by means of a sledge drawn by two oxen; and in which the man who drives them is on his knees, whilst another man has the care of drawing back the straw, and of separating it from the grain, that remains underneath. In order to tread the rice, they lay it on the ground in a ring, so as to leave a little void circle in the middle." (Norden's Travels in Egypt and Nubia, page 80.) "In thrashing their corn, the Arabians lay the sheaves down in a certain order, and then lead over them two oxen, dragging a large stone. This mode of separating the cars from the straw, is not unlike that of Egypt." (Niebuhr's Travels, page 299.) "They use oxen, as the ancients did, to beat out their corn, by trampling upon the sheaves, and dragging after them a clumsy machine. This machine is not, as in Arabia, a stone cylinder; nor a plank with sharp stones, as in Syria; but a sort of sledge consisting of three rollers, fitted with irons, which turn upon axles. A farmer chooses out a level spot in his fields, and has his corn carried thither in sheaves, upon asses, or dromedaries. Two oxen are then yoked in a sledge; a driver gets upon it, and drives them backwards and forwards [or in a circle] upon the sheaves; and fresh oxen succeed in the yoke, from time to time. By this operation, the chaff is very much cut down; the whole is then winnowed, and the pure grain thus separated. This mode of thrashing out the corn is tedious and inconvenient; it destroys the chaff, and injures the quality of the grain." (Ib. vol. i. p. 89.)

"This machine [Niebuhr adds] is called Nauridj. It has three rollers, which turn on their axles; and each of them is furnished with some irons, round and flat. At the beginning of June, Mr. Forskal and I several times saw, in the environs of Djsise, [Gize,] how corn was thrashed in Egypt. Every peasant chose for himself, in the open field, a smooth plot of ground, from 80 to 100 paces in circumference. Hither was brought, on camels or asses, the corn in sheaves, of which was formed a ring of six or eight feet wide, and two high. Two oxen were made to draw over it again and again the sledge (traineau) above mentioned, and this was done with the greatest convenience to the driver; for he was seated in a chair fixed on the sledge. Two such parcels or layers of corn are thrashed out in a day, and they move each of them as many as eight times, with a wooden fork of five prongs, which they call Meddre. Afterwards they throw the straw into the middle of the ring, where it forms a heap, which grows bigger and bigger. When the first layer is thrashed, they replace the straw in the ring, and thrash it as before. Thus the straw becomes every time smaller, till at last it resembles chopped straw. After this, with the fork just described, they cast the whole some yards from thence, and against the wind; which driving back the straw, the corn and the ears not thrashed out fall apart from it, and make another heap. A man collects the clods of dirt and other impurities, to which any corn adheres, and throws them into a sieve. They afterwards place in a ring the heaps, in which a good many entire ears are still found, and drive over them, for four or five hours together, a dozen couple of oxen joined two and two, till, by absolute trampling, they have separated the grains, which they throw into the air with a shovel (Luhh) to cleanse them."

The ancient Arabs, Syrians, Egyptians and Romans thrashed their corn in the same manner, by the feet of cattle, as may be seen in Bochart, vol. ii. p. 302, 310. "The Moors and Arabs," says Dr. Shaw, "continue to tread out their corn after the primitive custom of the East. Instead of beeves, they frequently make use of mules and horses, by tying in the like manner, by the neck, three or four of them together, and whipping them afterwards round about the neddars, (as they call the thrashing-floors; the Lybicæ Aræ of Horace,) where the sheaves lie open and expanded, in the same manner as they are placed and prepared, with us, for thrashing. This, indeed, is a much quicker way than ours, but less cleanly: for, as it is performed in the open air (Hos. xiii. 3.) upon any round level plat of ground, daubed over with cow's dung, to prevent, as much as possible, the earth, sand, or gravel, from rising; a great quantity of them all, notwithstanding this precaution, must unavoidably be taken up with the grain; at the same time the straw, which is their only fodder, is hereby shattered to pieces; a circumstance very pertinently alluded to in 2 Kings xiii. 7. where the king of Syria is said to have made the Israelites like the dust, by thrashing." (Travels, p. 221, folio.)

THRONE, that magnificent seat on which princes usually sit to receive the homage of their subjects, or to give audience to ambassadors; where they appear in pomp and ceremony; whence they dispense justice, &c. The throne, the sceptre, the crown, are ordinary symbols of royalty and royal authority. Scripture often represents the Lord as sitting on a throne. The psalmist says, that God had confirmed his throne in heaven from all eternity, Ps. ciii. 19; xciii. 2; xliv. 6. This throne was supported by justice and equity, xvii. 2. The throne of the Lord which was shown to Ezekiel, (chap. i.) was at the same time the most terrible, and yet the most magnificent, object that can be imagined. It was an animated chariot, borne by four cherubim of an extraordinary figure. The wheels were of inexplicable beauty and magnitude, also animated and conducted by a spirit. The throne of the Lord, which was over the wheels and the cherubim, was like glittering crystal, with a seat of sapphire. He who sat on the throne was surrounded with splendor like that of fire, or of metal in fusion; and round him glowed the colors of the rainbow. (See also Isa. vi. 2—4.)

The cherubim on the ark of the covenant were also considered as a kind of throne of the Deity: whence it is said in many places that God sits between the cherubim; (1 Sam. iv. 4; 2 Sam. vi. 2; 2 Kings xix. 15; Ps. xviii. 10; lxxx. 1; xcix. 1; Isa. xxxvii. 16.) whether we consider the cherubim of the ark, or the cherubim which Isaiah and Ezekiel describe as being under, and about, the throne of the Almighty; and probably to the same cherubim Paul refers by the term thrones, Col. i. 16.

The throne of Solomon is described in Scripture as the finest and richest in the world, 1 Kings x. 20. It was of ivory, inlaid with gold. The ascent was by seven steps; the back was round, and two arms supported the seat; twelve golden lions, one at each end of every step, made a principal part of its ornaments.

The Jews sometimes swore by the throne of God, or by heaven; but our Saviour forbids such oaths; (Matt. v. 34; xxiii. 22.) for "Whoever swears by heaven, swears by the throne of God, and by him who sitteth upon it." There is a passage (Exod. xvii. 16.) that might be understood in the sense of an oath, sworn by the throne of God: "The Lord has lifted up his hand from his throne (he has sworn by his throne) that he would make war against Amalek." (See OATH.) Thus in Judith, (i. 2.) Nebuchadnezzar swears by his throne, that he would make war against all who had rejected his ambassadors.

In Scripture, the Son of God is represented as sitting on a throne at the right hand of his Father, Ps. cx. 1; Heb. i. 8; Rev. iii. 21. And he himself assures his apostles, that they should sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel, Luke xxii. 30. In the Revelation, we find the twenty-four elders seen in vision, sitting on thrones before the Lord, Rev. iv. 4. And (Dan. vii. 9.) when God is about to enter into judgment with men, thrones are prepared for judges. The Ancient of Days is seated; his throne is as a flame of fire; his wheels are as consuming fire; streams of fire radiate from his face; millions of millions of angels attend upon him, and thousands of thousands are round about him.

Thrones, in the sense of an order of the celestial hierarchy, (Col. i. 16.) may signify, as above hinted, the cherubim, which were considered as the throne of God. Paul does not mention thrones among the celestial spirits that compose the angelic hierarchy, (Eph. iii. 10; vi. 12.) and hence some suppose that by thrones, principalities, powers and dominions, the apostle means no more than temporal powers, subordinate one to another. Thus, thrones denote kingly power; principalities, governors or princes; and powers, judges, magistrates of cities, &c.

THUMMIM, see URIM.

THUNDER is a re-percussion of the air violently agitated, among dense clouds, by the lightning or electric flash; and as this is the loudest natural noise with which mankind are acquainted, it was, like many other surprising things, expressed by an addition of the name of God. So we have, in Scripture, the terms "fair to God," extremely beautiful; "great cities of God," extremely great cities; "trees of God," extremely tall trees; and hence thunder is called "the voice of God," that is, the prodigious sound, noise, or report; "voices of God," (Heb. Exod. ix. 28.) are mighty thunderings; (Ps. xxix. 3, 4, 5.) the voice of the Lord breaketh the cedars, divideth the flames of fire, &c.: the psalmist tells us, verse 3, he means thunder.

THYATIRA, a city of Lydia, in Asia Minor, anciently called Pelopia and Euhippia, now Ak-hisar. It was situated on the confines of Lydia and Mysia, near the river Lyens, between Sardis and Pergamus, Acts xvi. 14; Rev. i. 11; ii. 18, 24. The art of dyeing purple was particularly cultivated at Thyatira, as appears from an inscription found there, for which see Kunoel on Acts i. (See Wells, Sac. Geogr. No. 537. Miss. Her. for 1821, p. 251.) *R.

THYINE-WOOD, (Rev. xviii. 12.) the wood of the thya v. thuja articulata of Linnæus, an aromatic evergreen tree, resembling the cedar, and found in Libya. The wood was used in burning incense. R.

I. TIBERIAS, a city of Galilee, on the western shore of the lake of Gennesareth, the original name of which is thought to have been Cinnereth, or Hammath, or Emath, or Rakkath, or Reccehath. Reland, however, shows that this is very doubtful, and only founded on the sea of Cinnereth being afterwards called the sea of Tiberias; which by no means proves that Cinnereth and Tiberias were the same town. Besides, as he observes, the portion of Naphtali did not begin towards the south, but at Capernaum, (Matt. iv. 13.) which is more to the north than Tiberias; and yet Cinnereth, Hammath, Rakkath, belong to the portion of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 35.

Josephus states (Ant. lib. xviii. cap. 3; De Bel. lib. ii. cap. 8.) that Tiberias was built in honor of Tiberias by Herod Antipas, and that it was 30 furlongs from Hippas, 60 from Gadara, 120 from Scythopolis, and 30 from Tarichea. (De Vitâ suâ, p. 1025, 1010.) Herod endowed it with great advantages; which, with its convenient situation, soon made it the metropolis of Galilee. When he was obliged to leave Rome, he retired hither with his uncle Herod; and the emperor Claudius afterwards bestowing it upon him, it had the name of Claudia Tiberias. Josephus took possession of it at the time of the wars with the Jews, and gave the bastinado to the officer who came to propose terms of peace to it from the Romans. Vespasian intended to put all the inhabitants to the edge of the sword; but Agrippa prevailed on him to be satisfied with beating down part of its walls. Tiberias was famous for its baths of hot waters, from which diseased people received great benefit.

In this city, some of the most learned of the Jews, after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, assembled, and laid the foundation of an academy, which became famous by the Mishna that was composed in it; by the celebrated labors of the Masorites, the authors of the vowel points; and by the reputation of the doctors who there kept their schools. Here the patriarch of the nation also resided.

Dr. E. D. Clarke says, (Trav. vol. ii. p. 467.) "The town of Tiberias is situated close to the edge of the lake. It is fortified by walls, but has no artillery; and, like all Turkish citadels, makes a great figure from without, exhibiting, at the same time, the utmost wretchedness within. Its castle stands upon a rising ground in the north part of it. No antiquities now remain, except a very ancient church, of an oblong square form, to which we descended by steps. There is reason to believe this the first place of Christian worship erected in Tiberias, and that it was constructed as long ago as the fourth century. The roof is of stone, and it is vaulted. It is called the house of Peter. About a mile south of the town are the celebrated hot baths of Emmaus."

II. TIBERIAS, SEA OF. This lake, which is almost equal in the grandeur of its appearance to the lake of Geneva, is called indifferently the lake of Gennesareth, the lake of Tiberias, the sea of Galilee, and the sea of Cinneroth, from the adjacent country, or the principal towns upon its shores. Josephus and Pliny agree in stating it to be about 16 miles in length, and about 6 in breadth. Mr. Buckingham thus describes it: "The waters of this lake lie in a deep basin, surrounded on all sides with lofty hills, excepting only the narrow entrance and outlet of the Jordan at each extreme; for which reason, long continued tempests from any one quarter are here unknown; and this lake, like the Dead sea, with which it communicates, is, for the same reason, never violently agitated for any great length of time. The same local features, however, render it occasionally subject to whirlwinds, squalls and sudden gusts from the hollow of the mountains, which, as in any other similar basin, are of short duration; and the most furious gust is succeeded by a perfect calm. A strong current marks the passage of the Jordan through the middle of the lake, in its way to the Dead sea, where it empties itself. The appearance of this sea from the town of Capernaum, which is situated near the upper end of the bank on the western side, is extremely grand; its greatest length runs nearly north and south. The barren aspect of the mountains on each side, and the total absence of wood, give, however, a cast of dulness to the picture; and this is increased to melancholy by the dead calm of its waters, and the silence which reigns throughout its whole extent, where not a boat or vessel of any kind is to be found."

Dr. E. D. Clarke, describing its appearance, says, "The wind rendered its surface rough, and called to mind the situation of our Saviour's disciples, when, in one of the small vessels which traverse these waters, they were tossed in a storm, and saw Jesus, in the fourth watch of the night, walking to them upon the waves, Matt. xiv. 24, 25, 26. Often as this subject has been painted, combining a number of circumstances adapted for the representation of sublimity, no artist has been aware of the uncommon grandeur of the scenery, memorable on account of the transaction. The lake of Gennesareth is surrounded by objects well calculated to heighten the solemn impression made by such a picture; and, independent of the local feelings likely to be excited in its contemplation, affords one of the most striking prospects in the Holy Land. It is by comparison alone that any due conception of the appearance it presents can be conveyed to the minds of those who have not seen it; and, speaking of it comparatively, it may be described as longer and finer than any of our Cumberland and Westmoreland lakes, although, perhaps, it yields in majesty to the stupendous features of Loch Lomond in Scotland. It does not possess the vastness of the lake of Geneva, although it much resembles it in particular points of view. The lake of Locarno in Italy comes nearest to it in point of picturesque beauty, although it is destitute of any thing similar to the islands by which that majestic piece of water is adorned. It is inferior in magnitude, and, perhaps, in the height of its surrounding mountains, to the lake Asphaltites; but its broad and extended surface, covering the bottom of a profound valley, environed by lofty and precipitous eminences, added to the impression of a certain reverential awe under which every Christian pilgrim approaches it, give it a character of dignity unparalleled by any similar scenery." (Travels, p. 462.)

TIBERIUS CÆSAR, second emperor of Rome,

i. e. Tiberius Claudius Drusus Nero. He was the son of Livia, and step-son of Augustus; and, being adopted by that emperor, he succeeded to his throne A. D. 14. He died A. D. 37, after a cruel reign of 22½ years. It was in the 14th year of his reign that John the Baptist first appeared; and the crucifixion of Jesus took place in the 3d or 4th year after, Luke iii. 1. R.

TIBHATHI, a city of Syria-Zoba, taken and plundered by David, 1 Chron. xviii. 8.

TIBNI, a son of Ginnath, and competitor with Omri for the kingdom of Israel, 1 Kings xvi. 21.

TIDAL, king of nations, or of Gentiles, (goim.) Gen. xiv. 1. Some think he was king of Galilee of the Gentiles beyond Jordan; (Matt. iv. 15.) and Joshua speaks of a king of the nations of Gilgal, or of Galilee, according to the Septuagint, Josh. xii. 23.

TIGLATH-PILESER, king of Assyria, reigned at Nineveh. Ahaz, king of Judah, finding himself pressed by Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel, and unable to oppose them, sent ambassadors to Tiglath-pileser, to desire his assistance against those kings, 2 Kings xvi. 7, &c. At the same time he sent him all the gold and silver found in the treasures of the temple and of the palace. Tiglath-pileser marched against Rezin, killed him, plundered Damascus, and transported the inhabitants to places on the river Cyrus. Ahaz went to meet him at Damascus, (2 Chron. xxviii. 20, 21.) but Tiglath-pileser, not being satisfied with the presents of Ahaz, entered Judea, and ravaged the whole country. He did the same in Samaria, carried away the tribes of Reuben and Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh, and transplanted them to Halah, Habor and Hara, on the river Gozan, 1 Chron. v. 26. He took also the cities Ijon, Abel-beth-maachah, Janoah, Kedesh, Hazor, Galilee, and the countries of Gilead and Naphtali, and carried away the inhabitants into Assyria, 2 Kings xv. 29. He reigned nineteen years at Nineveh. His successor was his son Shalmaneser. See more in ASSYRIA.

TIMBREL, an instrument of music, often mentioned in Scripture. The Hebrews called it תוף, toph, under which name they comprehended all kinds of drums, tabors and timbrels. We do not find that the Hebrews used it in their wars, but only at their public rejoicings; and it was commonly employed by the women. It consisted and still consists of a small rim, over which a skin is drawn. The rim is also hung with small bells. The timbrel is used as an accompaniment to lively music, being shaken and beaten with the knuckles in time. After the passage of the Red sea, Miriam, sister of Moses, took a timbrel, and began to play and dance with the women, Exod. xv. 20. The daughter of Jephthah came to meet her father with timbrels and other musical instruments, Judg. xi. 34.

TIMNAH, or TIMNATH, an ancient Canaanitish city, to which Judah was going when he met with Tamar, Gen. xxxviii. 12. It was at first assigned to Judah, on whose northern borders it lay, (Josh. xv. 10, 57.) but afterwards to the tribe of Dan, (Josh. xix. 43.) where it is written THIMNATHAI. It remained mostly, however, in the possession of the Canaanites. Judg. xiv. 1; 2 Chron. xxviii. 18. (Compare Joseph. Antiq. v. 8. 5.) *R.

TIMNATH-SERAH, a city of Ephraim, which Joshua chose for his dwelling and burying-place, Josh. xix. 50; xxiv. 30.

TIMOTHY, a disciple of Paul. He was of Derbe or Lystra, both cities of Lycaonia, Acts xvi. 1; xiv. 6. His father was a Gentile, but his mother a Jewess, 2

Tim. i. 5; iii. 15. When Paul came to Derbe and Lystra, about A. D. 51, or 52, the brethren spoke highly of the merit and good disposition of Timothy; and the apostle determined to take him along with him, for which purpose he circumcised him at Lystra, Acts xvi. 3. Timothy applied himself to labor in the gospel, and did Paul very important services, through the whole course of his preaching. It is not known when he was made bishop; but it is believed that he received very early the imposition of the apostle's hands, and this in consequence of a particular revelation, or intimation from the Holy Spirit, 1 Tim. iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 6. Paul calls him, not only his dearly beloved son, but also his brother, the companion of his labors, and a man of God; observing that none was more united with him in heart and mind than Timothy.

He accompanied Paul to Macedonia, to Philippi, to Thessalonica, and to Berea, where he left him and Silas to confirm the converts, Acts xvii. 14, &c. When at Athens, he directed Timothy to come to him, (A. D. 52,) and thence sent him back to Thessalonica, from whence he afterwards returned with Silas, to Paul at Corinth, (Acts xviii. 5.) where he continued with the apostle, and is named with Silas at the beginning of the two epistles to the Thessalonians.

About A. D. 56, Paul sent Timothy with Erastus into Macedonia, (Acts xix. 22.) and directed him to call at Corinth, to refresh the minds of the Corinthians in the truth. Some time after, writing to this church, (1 Cor. iv. 17.) he recommends to them the care of Timothy, and directs them to send him back in peace.

Timothy returned to Paul in Asia, who there stayed for him, whence they went together into Macedonia, and the apostle joins Timothy's name with his own, in the Second Epistle to the Corinthians, which he wrote from this province, about the middle of A. D. 57. He also sends his commendations to the Romans, in the letter which he wrote to them from Corinth, the same year, or about A. D. 58, Rom. xvi. 21.

Though it does not appear, by the Acts, that Timothy was with Paul the two years in which he was prisoner at Cesarea, nor during his voyage to Rome; yet he had accompanied him in his journey to Jerusalem, (Acts xx. 4.) and it is certain he was in Rome when the apostle wrote to the Philippians, to the Colossians, and to Philemon, because he is named in the titles of these epistles, which were written A. D. 60, 61, 62. The year following, when Paul wrote to the Hebrews, (Heb. xiii. 23. A. D. 64,) he tells them, that Timothy was come out of prison; but he mentions no circumstances, either of his imprisonment or delivery.

When the apostle returned from Rome, A. D. 64, he left Timothy at Ephesus, (1 Tim. i. 3.) as the overseer of that church. The first of the two letters addressed to him was written from Macedonia, about A. D. 64 or 65, 1 Tim. v. 23. (But see under PAUL.) The apostle recommends him to be more moderate in his austerities, and to drink a little wine, because of the weakness of his stomach, and his frequent infirmities. After Paul came to Rome, (A. D. 65,) he wrote to him his second letter, which is full of kindness and tenderness for this his dear disciple, and which is justly considered as the last will of the apostle. He desires him to come to Rome to him before winter, and to bring with him several things that had been left at Troas, 2 Tim. iv. 9—13. If Timothy went to Rome, as is probable, he must have been a witness there of the martyrdom of Paul, A. D. 66. Calmet and some other commentators incline to think that Timothy must be the angel of the church of Ephesus, to whom John writes, (Rev. ii.) though they are of opinion that the reproaches contained in the address do not so much concern Timothy personally, as some members of his church whose zeal had become cool. We have nothing that can be depended upon, concerning the latter part of his life.

TIN is the word commonly employed in the Scriptures to designate the metal tin, as in Num. xxxi. 22. But in Isa. i. 25, the Hebrew word is put for dross, or that which is separated by smelting; and here our translators have also improperly retained the word tin. R.

TIPHSAN, the ancient Thapsacus, an important city on the western bank of the Euphrates, which constituted the north-eastern extremity of Solomon's dominions. There was here a celebrated ford or ferry over the Euphrates, 1 Kings iv. 24. Perhaps the same city is meant, 2 Kings xv. 16; though others understand here a city of the same name near Samaria. (Xen. Anab. i. 4. Arrian. Exped. Alex. iii. 7.) R.

TIRHAKAH, king of Ethiopia, or Cush, bordering on Palestine and Egypt. (See CUSH, p. , and EGYPT, p. 373.) This prince, at the head of a powerful army, attempted to relieve Hezekiah, when attacked by Sennacherib, (2 Kings xix. 9.) but the Assyrian army was routed before he came up. See SENNACHERIB.

TIRZAH, pleasant, a city of Ephraim, and the royal seat of the kings of Israel, from the time of Jeroboam to the reign of Omri, who built the city of Samaria, which then became the capital of this kingdom. Joshua killed the king of Tirzah, Josh. xii. 24. Menahem, the son of Gadi, of Tirzah, slew Shallum, the usurper of the kingdom of Israel, who reigned at Samaria, and assumed the government himself. But the city of Tirzah shutting its gates against him, he made it suffer the most terrible effects of his indignation, 2 Kings xv. 14, 16.

TISHBE, a city of Gilead, east of the Jordan, and the country of the prophet Elijah, who from hence was called the Tishbite, 1 Kings xvii. 1.

TISRI, the first Hebrew month of the civil year, and the seventh of the ecclesiastical year. (See the JEWISH CALENDAR, at the end of the volume.)

TITHES, see TYTHES.

TITUS, a Gentile (Gal. ii. 3.) converted by the apostle Paul, who calls him his son, Tit. i. 4. Paul took him with him to Jerusalem, (Gal. ii. 1.) about the time of the question whether the converted Gentiles should become subject to the ceremonies of the law. Some would then have obliged him to circumcise Titus; but neither he nor Titus would consent. Titus was afterwards sent by the apostle to Corinth, (2 Cor. xii. 18.) on occasion of some disputes in that church. He was well received by the Corinthians, and much satisfied by their ready compliance, but would receive nothing from them; thereby imitating the disinterestedness of his master. From Corinth he went to Paul in Macedonia, and gave him an account of the state of the Corinthian church, 2 Cor. vii. 6, 15. A short while afterwards, the apostle desired him to return to Corinth, to regulate things against his own arrival there. Titus readily undertook this journey, and departed immediately, (2 Cor. viii. 5, 16, 17.) carrying with him Paul's second letter to the Corinthians. Titus was made bishop of Crete about A. D. 63, when Paul was obliged to leave that island, to take care of other churches, Tit. i. 5. The following year he wrote to him to desire that as soon as he should have sent Tychicus, or Artemas, to supply his place in Crete, Titus would come to him to Nicopolis in Macedonia, (or to Nicopolis in Epirus, on the gulf of Ambracia,) where the apostle intended to pass his winter, Tit. iii. 12.

Titus was deputed to preach the gospel in Dalmatia; and he was there A. D. 65, when the apostle wrote his Second Epistle to Timothy, 2 Tim. iv. 10. He afterwards returned to Crete, whence, it is said, he propagated the gospel in the neighboring islands, and died, aged 94.

The subject of the Epistle to Titus, is to represent the qualities that should characterize church-officers. As a principal function of Titus in the isle of Crete was to ordain bishops and deacons, it was highly incumbent on him to make a discreet choice. The apostle also suggests the advice and instructions he should give to all sorts of persons; to the aged, both men and women; to young people of either sex; to slaves and servants. He exhorts him to exercise a strict authority over the Cretans, and to reprove them with severity, on account of their lying, idleness and gluttony. And as there were many converted Jews in Crete, he exhorts him to oppose their vain traditions and fables; also to decline the observation of the legal ceremonies, as no longer necessary; to show that the distinction of meats is abolished, and that every thing is pure and clean to those who are pure. He puts him in mind of exhorting the faithful to be obedient to temporal powers, to avoid disputes, quarrels and slander; to engage in honest callings; and to shun the company of heretics, after the first and second admonition. It is supposed by many, from the similarity of their contents, that the Epistle to Titus, and the first to Timothy, were written at no great interval of time. See under PAUL.

TOB, a country beyond Jordan, in the most northern part of the portion of Manasseh. The first mention of it appears to be in Judg. xi. 3, where we read that Jephthah fled into the land of Tob; and was fetched from thence, verse 5. This is thought by many to be the same as Ish-Tob, 2 Sam. x. 6, 8. We also read of this country apparently in 1 Mac. v. 13, where the Jews send letters to Judas Maccabæus, complaining of the heathen in the land of Gilead, who had slain "all our brethren that were in the places of Tob, or Tubin," (where the word places deserves notice, as being rather an addition by way of explanation, than strictly in the original,) and we read also of Jews called Tubieni, 2 Mac. xii. 17. Ptolemy mentions this city under the name of Thaubia; it should probably have been written Thuba. Rabbi Joshua ben Levi says, the Tob into which Jephthah withdrew was afterwards called Susitha; in Greek, Hippene, (cavalry-town.) In the city Hippo, were mingled both Jews and Gentiles.

TOBIAH, an Ammonite, and an enemy to the Jews, who strenuously opposed the rebuilding of the temple, after the return from Babylon, Neh. ii. 10; iv. 3; vi. 1, 12, 14. He is called in some places the servant or slave of Nehemiah; probably because he was originally of servile condition. However, he became of great consideration among the Samaritans, over whom he was governor, with Sanballat. Tobiah married the daughter of Shechaniah, a principal Jew of Jerusalem, and had a powerful party in the city itself, Neh. vi. 18. Nehemiah being obliged to return to Babylon, after he had repaired the walls of Jerusalem, Tobiah took this opportunity to come and dwelt at Jerusalem; and even obtained of Eliashib, who had the care of the house of the Lord, an apartment in the temple. But Nehemiah returning from Babylon, some years after, drove Tobiah away, and threw his goods out of the holy place, Neh. xiii. 4—8. Scripture makes no further mention of Tobiah: he probably retired to Sanballat at Samaria.

I. TOBIJAH, a Levite and doctor of the law, sent by king Jehoshaphat through the cities of Judah, to instruct the people, 2 Chron. xvii. 8.

II. TOBIJAH. The Lord commanded the prophet Zechariah (vi. 10, 14.) to ask of Tobijah, Heldai, Jedaiah and Josiah, son of Zephaniah, lately returned from Babylon, a certain quantity of gold and silver, which they intended for an offering to the temple, to make crowns thereof, to place on the head of Joshua, son of Josedech, high-priest of the Jews. The rabbins are of opinion, that these four persons were the same as Daniel, Ananias, Azariah and Mishaël.

TOGARMAH, the third son of Gomer, (Gen. x. 3.) is thought by Josephus and Jerome to have been the father of the Phrygians; but the majority of learned men are for Cappadocia or Armenia. Ezekiel says, (xxvii. 14.) "They of the house of Togarmah traded in thy fairs (at Tyre) with horses and horsemen and mules;" which agrees very well with Cappadocia.

TOI, king of Hamath, in Syria, who, when he heard that David conquered king Hadadezer, sent his son Joram to congratulate him, and to offer him vessels of gold, silver and brass, 2 Sam. viii. 9—11.

I. TOLA, the tenth judge of Israel, succeeded Abimelech, and judged Israel 23 years; from A. M. 2772 to 2795. Scripture says, Tola was the son of Puah, uncle to Abimelech by the father's side, and consequently brother to Gideon; yet Tola was of the tribe of Issachar, and Gideon of Manasseh. (See ΑΔΟΡΤΙΟΝ.) He was buried at Shamir, a city in the mountain of Ephraim, where he dwelt, and was succeeded by Jair of Gilead.

II. TOLA, the eldest son of Issachar, and chief of a family, Gen. xli. 13; Numb. xxvi. 23.

TOLAD, a city of Judah, (1 Chron. iv. 29.) yielded to Simeon. Probably the Elitolad of Josh. xv. 30; xix. 4.

TOMB, see SEPULCHRE.

TONGUE is taken in different senses: (1.) For the organ of speech.—(2.) For the language spoken in any country.—(3.) For discourse: thus we say, a bad tongue, a slanderous tongue, &c.

To gnaw one's tongue is a sign of fury, despair and torment. The worshippers of the beast "gnawed their tongues for pain; and blasphemed the God of heaven, because of their pains and their sores, and repented not of their deeds," Rev. xvi. 10.

Tongue of the sea—tongue of land—are terms used in Scripture for an extremity or point of a sea. Or a peninsula, a cape, a promontory of land, having the sea on both sides.

The wise man says, (Eccles. xxvi. 6.) that a jealous woman is a scourge of the tongue. In families where polygamy was frequent, jealousy among women was the foundation of a great number of evil discourses and backbitings. The same author says, (Eccles. xxviii. 17, 18.) "The stroke of the whip maketh marks in the flesh, but the stroke of the tongue breaketh the bone. Many have fallen by the edge of the sword, but not so many as have fallen by the tongue." And Job says, (v. 21.) God shall defend you from the lash of the tongue; you shall not be exposed to its strokes.

The gift of tongues with which God endowed the apostles and disciples assembled at Jerusalem, on the day of Pentecost, (Acts ii.) was communicated to the faithful, as appears by the Epistles of Paul, which regulate the manner in which this great privilege was to be used in their assemblies; (1 Cor. xii. 10; xiv. 2.) and it continued in the church so long as God thought necessary, for the conversion of heathen, and the confirmation of believers. Irenæus testifies, (lib. v. cap. 6.) that it subsisted in the church in his time.

When Paul says, that though he should speak with the tongue of men and of angels, it would be nothing without charity, he uses a supposed hyperbole; as when we say, angelical beauty, angelical voice, &c. e. g. "I would have every one set a due value on the gift of tongues; but though a man possessed the most exquisite eloquence, this inestimable gift would be of little use to him, as to salvation, if he be without charity."

TOPAZ. The Heb. טַזְבַּח, Pitdah, (Exod. xxviii. 17; xxxix. 10; Job xxviii. 19; Ezek. xxviii. 13.) is translated in most of the ancient versions, topaz, which, in modern times, is supposed to be the same as the chrysolite.

TOPHET, a place near Jerusalem, in the valley of the children of Hinnom. It is said that a constant fire was kept here, for burning the offal, and other filth brought from the city. Isaiah (xxx. 33.) seems to allude to the custom of burning dead carcasses in Tophet: when speaking of the defeat of the army of Sennacherib, he says, "For Tophet is ordained of old; yea, for the king [or Moloch] it is prepared; he hath made it deep and large. The pile thereof is fire and much wood: the breath of the Lord, like a stream of brimstone, doth kindle it." Hence some think the name of Tophet was given to the valley of Hinnom, because of the sacrifices offered there to the god Moloch, by beat of drum, to drown the cries of the consuming children. In Hebrew a drum is called toph. See GEHENNA.

Jeremiah (vii. 31.) upbraids the Israelites with having built temples to Moloch: "The high places of Tophet, which is in the valley of the sons of Hinnom, to burn their sons and their daughters in the fire." We learn from the same prophet that Tophet was a polluted and unclean place, where they used to throw the carcasses to which they refused burial, chap. vii. 32; xix. 11—13. King Josiah defiled the place of Tophet, where the temple of Moloch stood, that nobody might go thither any more, to sacrifice their children to that cruel deity, 2 Kings xxiii. 10.

TORTOISE, (Lev. xi. 29.) a class of animals strongly allied to the reptile kinds. The Hebrew word, however, does not signify a tortoise, but a lizard, called in Arabic tzab.

TRACHONITIS, rocky, or rugged, a province between Palestine and Syria, having Arabia Deserta east, Batanea west, Iturea south, and the country of Damascus north. Josephus (Antiq. lib. i. cap. 7.) says, it is situate between Palestine and Cælo-Syria, and was peopled by Hush, or Cush, a son of Aram. Of this province Herod Philip was tetrarch, Luke iii. 1.

TRADITION, a sentiment or custom not written, but delivered down by succession. The Jews had numerous traditions, which they did not commit to writing, before their wars against the Romans, under Adrian and Severus. Then rabbi Judah, the Holy, composed the Mishna, that is, the second law; which is the most ancient collection of Jewish traditions. To this were added the Gemara of Jerusalem, and that of Babylon, which, together with the Mishna, form the Talmud of Jerusalem, and that of Babylon. (See TALMUD.) Our Saviour often censured the false traditions of the Pharisees; and reproached them with preferring these to the law itself, Mark vii. 7, &c. Matt. xv. 2, 3, seq. He gives several instances of their superstitious adherence to vain observances, while they neglected essential things.

The Christians also had traditions, which they received from Christ, or his apostles. Paul (2 Thess. ii. 15.) says, "Therefore, brethren, stand fast, and hold the traditions which ye have been taught, whether by word or by our epistle." The ancient fathers acknowledged the truth and authority of the apostolical traditions, but they have not pretended that we must blindly receive as apostolical traditions all that may be put upon us as such.

TRANSFIGURATION. After our Saviour had inquired of his disciples what men thought of him, and what they themselves thought, Peter answered, that he was the son of the living God. Jesus then began to speak of his passion, as at hand, (Matt. xvi. 28.) adding, "Verily I say unto you, there be some standing here, which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom." Six days after this promise, [Matt. xvii. 1, says six days, but Luke ix. 28, mentions eight days; probably because he counted inclusively, reckoning the day of the promise, and the day of the execution of that promise; whereas the other evangelist regarded only the six intermediate days. One evangelist also says, about eight days, the other, after six days,] Jesus took Peter, James and John his brother, and brought them up into a high mountain apart, and was transfigured before them; and his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light: and behold there appeared unto them Moses and Elias talking with him"—on the subject of his expected suffering and death at Jerusalem. The chief design of the Son of God in this transfiguration was, according to the fathers, to fulfil his promise made a few days before, that he would let some of his disciples see a glimpse of his glory before his death, and to fortify them against the scandal of the cross, by giving them this convincing proof that he was the Messiah. It is observed, with great reason, that the condition in which Christ appeared among men, humble, weak, poor and despised, was a true and continual transfiguration; whereas, the transfiguration itself, in which he showed himself in the real splendor of his glory, was his true and natural condition.

It is probable, too, that being well aware of the sufferings which awaited him at Jerusalem, Jesus himself was refreshed by this manifestation, and by the encouragement resulting from a view of the glory that should follow his crucifixion. Hence his decease is not expressed by the usual term for death, but by the term implying a deliverance from suffering, with an admission into a state of happiness; as the Israelites were released, by their exodus, from the bondage of Egypt, and conducted into Canaan, the land of rest from their labors and wanderings. It is the opinion of many interpreters, that this transfiguration occurred upon mount Tabor; but this opinion is attended with difficulties.

The fathers observe in this manifestation, that the law, represented by Moses, and the prophets, represented by Elias, gave testimony to our Saviour.

TREASURE, any thing collected together, in stores. So a treasure of corn, of wine, of oil; treasures of gold, silver, brass; treasures of coined money. Snow, winds, hail, rain, waters, are in the treasures of God, Ps. cxxxv. 7; Jer. li. 16. We say also, a treasure of good works, treasures of iniquity, to lay up treasures in heaven, to bring forth good or evil out of the treasures of the heart. Joseph told his brethren, when they found their money returned in their sacks, that God had given them treasures, Gen. xliii. 23. The kings of Judah had keepers of their treasures, both in city and country, (1 Chron. xxvii. 25; 2 Chron. xxxii. 27, &c.) and the places where these magazines were laid up were called treasure-cities. Pharaoh compelled the Hebrews to build him treasure-cities, or magazines, Exod. i. 11. The word treasure is often used to express any thing in great abundance: (Col. ii. 3.) "In Jesus Christ are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge." The wise man says, that wisdom contains in its treasures understanding, the knowledge of religion, &c. Paul (Rom. ii. 5.) speaks of heaping up a treasure of wrath against the day of wrath; and the prophet Amos says (iii. 10.) they treasure up iniquity, they lay up iniquity as it were in a store-house, which will bring them a thousand calamities. The treasures of impiety or iniquity, (Prov. x. 2.) express ill-gotten riches. The treasures of iniquity, says the wise man, will eventually bring no profit; and, in the same sense, Christ calls the riches of iniquity, mammon of unrighteousness, an estate wickedly acquired, Luke xvi. 9.

Gospel faith is the treasure of the just: but Paul says, (2 Cor. iv. 7.) "We have this treasure in earthen vessels." Isaiah says of a good man, (xxxiii. 6.) "The fear of the Lord is his treasure."

TRENCH, a kind of ditch cut into the earth, for the purpose of receiving and draining the water from adjacent parts. Something of this kind was the trench cut by the prophet Elijah, to contain the water which he ordered to be poured on his sacrifice, (1 Kings xviii. 32.) and which, when filled to the brim with water, was entirely exhausted, evaporated, by the fire of the Lord, which consumed the sacrifice.

TRENCHES is also a military term, and denotes one description of the approaches to a fortified town. They were anciently used to surround a town, to enclose the besieged, and to secure the besiegers against attacks from them. Trenches could not be cut in a rock; and it is probable, that when our Lord says of Jerusalem, (Luke xix. 43.) "Thy enemies shall cast a trench about thee," meaning, "they shall raise a wall of enclosure," he foretold what the Jews would barely credit, from the nature of the case; perhaps what they considered as impossible: yet the providence of God has so ordered it, that we have evidence to this fact, in Josephus, who says, that Titus exhorting his soldiers, they surrounded Jerusalem with a wall in the space of three days, although the general opinion had pronounced it impossible. This circumvallation, prevented any escape from the city, and deterred from all attempts at relief by succors going into it.

Such being the nature of trenches, it seems that our translators have used this word incorrectly in 1 Sam. xxvi. 5: "Saul was sleeping within the trench." A trench demanded too much labor, and was too tedious an operation, to be cut round every place where a camp lodged for a night. The margin, therefore, hints at a circle, or ring, of carriages; and so Buxtorf interprets the word. It seems, however, more likely that it means a circular encampment, in the midst of which stood the tent of Saul; or a circular guard, which surrounded the royal tent, as Mr. Harmer supposes. Mr. Taylor thinks, however, from the description given of the tent of Nadir Shah, that it may mean a circular screen, with passages, which, surrounding the royal tent, kept off all persons but those to whom the guards gave regular admission. This screen might be of canvass, or of any other substance, like the tent itself.

TRESPASS is an offence committed, a hurt, or wrong done to a neighbor; and partakes of the nature of an error, or slip, rather than of deliberate or gross sin. Under the law, the delinquent who had trespassed was of course bound to make satisfaction; but an offering or oblation was allowed him, to reconcile himself to the Divine Governor, Lev. v. 6, 15. It deserves notice, that whoever does not forgive the trespasses of a fellow man against himself, is not to expect that his Father in heaven will forgive his trespasses; if he will not forgive smaller, inadvertent, non-intentional offences, but harbors a bitter, revengeful disposition, how should he propitiate God when God withholds forgiveness for his lesser crimes; and moreover, charges him with accumulated guilt by great transgressions? May this thought promote a forgiving spirit, a spirit of reconciliation and mutual charity between neighbors and friends!

TRIBE. Jacob having twelve sons, who were heads of so many families, which together formed a great nation, each of these families was called a tribe. But this patriarch on his death-bed adopted Ephraim and Manasseh, the two sons of Joseph, and would have them also to constitute two tribes in Israel, Gen. xlviii. 5. Instead of twelve tribes, there were now thirteen, that of Joseph being two. However, in the distribution of lands by Joshua, under the order of God, they reckoned but twelve tribes, and made but twelve lots. For the tribe of Levi, being appointed to the sacred service, had no share in the distribution of the land; but received certain cities to dwell in, with the first fruits, tithes and oblations of the people.

The twelve tribes, while in the desert, encamped round the tabernacle of the covenant each in due order. To the east were Judah, Zebulun and Issachar: to the west Ephraim, Manasseh and Benjamin: to the south Reuben, Simeon and Gad: and to the north Dan, Asher and Naphtali. The Levites were distributed round about the tabernacle, nearer to the holy place than the other tribes; so that Moses and Aaron, with their families, were to the east, Gershom to the west, Kohath to the south, and Merari to the north.

In the marches of Israel, the twelve tribes were divided into four great bodies. The first body, in front of the army, included Judah, Issachar and Zebulun: the second was composed of Reuben, Simeon and Gad. Between the second and third body of troops came the Levites and priests, with the ark of the Lord, and the furniture of the tabernacle. The third body was composed of Ephraim, Manasseh and Benjamin; and the fourth, which brought up the rear, was Dan, Asher and Naphtali.

In the division made by Joshua of the land of Canaan, Reuben, Gad and half of Manasseh, had their lot beyond Jordan, east; all the other tribes, and the remaining half of Manasseh, had their distribution on this side the river, west. See CANAAN.

The twelve tribes continued united as one state, one people and one monarchy, till after the death of Solomon, when ten of the tribes revolted from the house of David, and formed the kingdom of Israel. See HEBREWS.

TRIBULATION expresses in our version much the same as trouble, or trial; importing afflictive distributions, to which a person is subjected, either by way of punishment, or by way of experiment. For tribulation, by way of punishment, see Judg. x. 14; Matt. xxiv. 21, 29; Rom. ii. 9; 2 Thess. i. 6. For tribulation by way of trial, see John xvi. 33; Rom. v. 3; 2 Thess. i. 4.

TRIBUNAL, the place where judicial proceedings are administered. Moses appointed (Deut. xvi. 18; xvii. 8, 9; Ezek. xlv. 24.) that in every city there should be judges and magistrates, who should hear and determine differences; and that if any thing very difficult occurred, it should be referred to the place which the Lord should choose, and be laid before the high-priest, or priests, of the race of Aaron, and before the judge, whom the Lord should raise up there for the time being. See JUDGE, and SANHEDRIN.

TRIBUTE. The Hebrews acknowledged the sovereign dominion of God by a tribute, or capitation of half a shekel a head, which was paid yearly, Exod. xxx. 13. Our Saviour (Matt. xvii. 25.) thus reasons with Peter: "Of whom do the kings of the earth take custom or tribute? of their own children, or of strangers?" Meaning, that he, as Son of God, ought to be exempt from this capitation. We do not find that either the kings or the judges of the Hebrews, when they were of that nation, demanded tribute. Solomon, at the beginning of his reign, (1 Kings ix. 21—33; 2 Chron. viii. 9.) compelled the Canaanites, left in the country, to pay tribute, and to perform the drudgery of the public works he had undertaken. Toward the end of his reign, he also imposed a tribute on his own people, and made them work on the public buildings, (1 Kings v. 13, 14; ix. 15; xi. 27.) which alienated their minds, and sowed the seeds of that discontent which afterwards ripened into open revolt, by the rebellion of Jeroboam.

The Israelites were frequently subdued by foreign princes, who laid taxes and tribute on them, to which necessity compelled them to submit. See in Matt. xxii. 17, the answer of Christ to the Pharisees, who came with insidious designs of tempting him, and asked him, whether or no it was lawful to pay tribute to Caesar. Also John viii. 33, where the Jews boast of having never been slaves to any, of being a free nation, acknowledging God only for sovereign. And note that at that time many Jews had imbibed the principles of Judas Gaulonites, and infused into the people their notions of independence, and a vain show of liberty. On the contrary, the apostles Peter and Paul, in their epistles, always endeavored to recommend and inculcate on Christians submission and obedience to princes, with a conscientious discharge of their duty, in paying tribute, Rom. xiii. 1—8; 1 Pet. ii. 13.

TROAS, a city of Phrygia, or of Mysia, on the Hellespont, between Troy north, and Assos south. Sometimes the name of Troas (or the Troad) signifies the whole country of the Trojans, the province where the ancient city of Troy had stood. But in the New Testament the word Troas signifies a city of this name, sometimes called Antigonis, and Alexandria. Sometimes both names are united, Alexandria-Troas.

Paul was at Troas, A. D. 52, (Acts xvi. 8, &c.) and had a vision in the night of a man of Macedonia, who requested gospel assistance. He embarked, therefore, at Troas, and passed over into Macedonia. The apostle was several other times at Troas. (See Acts xx. 5, 6; 2 Cor. ii. 12.) He left here, in the custody of Carpus, some clothes and books, which he desired Timothy to bring with him to Rome, 2 Tim. iv. 13.

TROGYLLIUM, the name of a town and promontory of Ionia, in Asia Minor, between Ephesus and the mouth of the river Meander, opposite to Samos. The promontory is a spur of mount Mycale, Acts xx. 15. R.

TROPHIMUS, a disciple of Paul, a Gentile by religion, and an Ephesian by birth, came to Corinth with the apostle, and accompanied him in his whole journey to Jerusalem, A. D. 58, Acts xx. 4. When the apostle was in the temple there, the Jews laid hold of him, crying out, "He hath brought Greeks into the temple, and hath polluted this holy place," because having seen him in the city, accompanied by Trophimus, they imagined that he had introduced him into the temple. It is probable that Trophimus followed Paul to Rome, and attended him while in bonds; and it is also related, that after the apostle had obtained his liberty, he went into Spain, and passing through Gaul, left Trophimus at Arles, as bishop. This, however, as Calmet remarks, is very difficult to reconcile with what Paul writes to Timothy, (2 Tim. iv. 20.) that he left him sick at Miletus. Trophimus must then necessarily have returned to Asia, about a year after Paul had thus left him at Arles.

TRUMPET. The Lord commanded Moses to make two trumpets of beaten silver, for the purpose of calling the people together when they were to decamp, Numb. x. They chiefly used these trumpets, however, to proclaim the beginning of the civil year, the beginning of the sabbatical year, (Lev. xxiii. 24; Numb. xxix. 1.) and the beginning of the jubilee, Lev. xxv. 9, 10. Josephus says, that they were near a cubit long, and that their tube or pipe was of the thickness of a common flute. Their mouths were no wider than just admitted to blow into them, and their ends were like those of a modern trumpet. There were originally but two in the camp, though afterwards they made a great number. In the time of Joshua there were seven, (Josh. iii. 4.) and at the dedication of the temple of Solomon there were 120 priests that sounded trumpets, 2 Chron. v. 12.

In addition to the sacred trumpets of the temple, whose use was restricted to the priests, even in war and in battle, there were others used by the Hebrew generals, Judg. iii. 27. Ehud sounded the trumpet to assemble Israel against the Moabites, whose king, Eglon, he had lately slain. Gideon took a trumpet in his hand, and gave each of his people one, when he assaulted the Midianites, Judg. vii. 2, 16. Joab sounded the trumpet as a signal of retreat to his soldiers, in the battle against Abner, (2 Sam. ii. 28.) in that against Absalom, (2 Sam. xviii. 16.) and in the pursuit of Sheba, son of Bichri, 2 Sam. xx. 22.

TRUMPETS, THE FEAST OF, was kept on the first day of the seventh month of the sacred year, which was the first of the civil year, called Tizri. The beginning of the year was proclaimed by sound of trumpet, (Lev. xxiii. 2; Numb. xxix.) and the day was kept solemn; all servile business being forbidden. A solemn holocaust was offered in the name of the whole nation, of a calf, two rams, and seven lambs of the same year, with offerings of flour and wine, as usual with these sacrifices. Scripture does not mention the occasion of appointing this feast. The rabbins say, it was in remembrance of the deliverance of Isaac by the substitution of a ram.

TRUTH is that accurate correspondence of what is related of a subject, or of what is expected from it, which fully justifies the relation; or, it is the precise conformity of a description, an assertion, a proposition, &c. to its subject. In Scripture language, eminently, God is truth; that is, in him is no fallacy, deception, perverseness, &c. Jesus Christ is the truth, the true way to God, the true representative, image, character of the Father; the Holy Spirit is the Spirit of truth, who communicates truth, who maintains the truth in believers, guides them in the truth; and who hates and punishes falsehood, or lies, even to the death of the transgressor, Ps. xxxi. 5; John xiv. 6, 17; Acts v. 3, &c. Good men maintain truth, speak the truth, practise truth; that is, they are careful that their words, actions and sentiments correspond with what is correct, accurate and upright.

Truth, as a substance, is opposed to typical representations, as shadows; the law was given by Moses, but the grace and the truth—the reality of the promised blessings—came by Jesus Christ.

Every man should speak truth to his neighbor; that is, honestly, sincerely, with integrity. Truth, on the part of God, is often united with kindness, mercy, goodness, &c. because fidelity to promises being one great branch of truth, and goodness, mercy, &c. being implied in the divine promises, when God realized any special good, he did but show himself faithful, true, fulfilling the desires, or acting for the advantage, of those who confided in him and in his word, Ps. xl. 10; Rom. iii. 21. Truth is judicial, in reference to a verdict given, (Prov. xx. 28.) judicious, (Rom. i. 25.) constant, (Rom. iii. 7.) upright, 1 Cor. v. 8. The love of the truth is among the noblest characters of the Christian; and as genuine piety, wherever it prevails, will banish falsehood, so we find a real love of truth, the comparison of a man's conduct with the regulations of truth, and a conformity to those regulations are always among the most desirable, the most favorable, and the most decisive proofs of genuine religion; which being itself a system of truth, delights in nothing more than in truth, whether of heart, discourse, or conduct. Of this the apostle John is an instance, who expresses to the lady Eclecta his delight at seeing her children walk in the truth.

TRYPHENA, and TRYPHOSA, Christian women, whom Paul mentions in Rom. xvi. 12, and of whom much mention is made in the history of St. Thecla.

TRYPHON, a king of Syria, who had been a captain in the troops of Alexander Balas. He deposed Nicanor, and placed Antiochus on the throne of Syria, whose death he afterwards procured, and then seized the throne himself. See ANTIOCHUS.

TUBAL, fifth son of Japhet, who is commonly united with Meshech, whence it is thought that they peopled countries bordering on each other. Bochart is very copious to prove, that by Meshech and Tubal are intended the Muscovites and the Tiberians.

TUBAL-CAIN, son of Lamech the bigamist, and of Zillah, Gen. iv. 22. Scripture calls him the father, that is, inventor or master of the art of forging and managing iron, and of making all kinds of iron work. It has been thought that he gave occasion to the Vulcan of the heathen.

TURTLE-DOVE, or TURTLE, a clean bird often mentioned in Scripture, and which the Jews might offer in sacrifice. It was appointed in favor of the poor, who could not afford more substantial sacrifices, (Lev. xii. 6—8; xiv. 23; Luke ii. 24.) Before the law, (Gen. xv. 9.) Abraham offered birds which were a turtle and a pigeon; and when he divided the other victims he left the birds entire. See DOVE.

Jeremiah (viii. 7.) speaks of the turtle as a bird of passage: "The stork in the heaven knoweth her appointed times, and the turtle, and the crane, and the swallow, observe the time of their coming."

TYCHICUS, a disciple employed by the apostle Paul to carry his letters to several churches. He was of the province of Asia, and accompanied Paul in his journey from Corinth to Jerusalem, Acts xx. 4. He carried the Epistle to the Colossians, that to the Ephesians, and the first to Timothy. The apostle calls him his dear brother, a faithful minister of the Lord, and his companion in the service of God, (Eph. vi. 21, 22; Col. iv. 7, 8.) and had intentions of sending him into Crete, to preside there in the absence of Titus, Tit. iii. 12. It is thought also, that he was sent to Ephesus, while Timothy was at Rome, when he carried a letter to the Ephesians from this apostle. The Greeks make him one of the seventy, and bishop of Colophon, in the province of Asia.

TYPE is a Greek word which generally signifies a resemblance, however it may be produced. Thus, (Acts vii. 44.) Moses was to make the tabernacle according to the type, model, exemplar, he had seen. The same word is used in reference to the copy of the letter sent from Claudius Lysias to Felix, (Acts xxiii. 25.) and also concerning the form of doctrine into which believers were inducted, and, as it were, pressed as clay is pressed into the mould, the impression, form, or resemblance of which it exactly takes. (Comp. 1 Cor. x. 6; Phil. iii. 17, et al.)

A type is however more usually considered as an example, pattern, or general similitude to a person, event, or thing which is to come; and in this it differs from a representation, memorial, or commemoration of an event which is past. For instance, the ceremony of the passover among the Jews, with its bitter herbs, its lamb slain, &c. was a commemoration, or memorial repetition of what their fathers had originally transacted at their exodus from Egypt. The same may be said of their dwelling in booths, and the opinion may be justified, which considers sacrifices themselves as commemorative. Being originally instituted after the first transgression, they perpetually revived in Adam, and in his posterity, the recollection of his first guilt, and of the victim which died instead of himself, on that occasion.

In the nature of commemorative ordinances, Jews and Christians are agreed: but the latter say further that many, or most, if not all, the sacred institutions among the Jews were prefigurative hints, or notices of what was to happen under a more perfect dispensation. Hence a sacrifice, the blood of which was shed before the ark, or other symbolical presence of God, prefigured a more noble, more dignified blood, which should be shed before God at some future time; that as such blood was shed to reconcile man and God, to mediate between those otherwise distant parties, so the nobler blood should mediate, with unlimited success, in restoring amity between God and man. They say also, that the dwelling in tabernacles, or booths, prefigured the appearance of a great personage, whose residence in human nature was to him but a mere temporary humble dwelling; as much below his true dignity as a slight booth or hut is below the dignity of a palace. In like manner the passover lamb was a victim which exempted from evil, while it also prefigured a nobler deliverer (and deliverance) from divine wrath and anger, than could possibly be accomplished in the exemption of Israel from the stroke of the destroying angel which smote the first-born of the Egyptians; a nobler deliverance from the moral tyranny of sin than that of the Israelites was from the oppressive dominion of Pharaoh, which deliverance is accomplished by the blood of "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sins of the world."

Types differ from signs, in that signs were occasional, and usually pointed to a time, but little distant, in the first place; though ultimately to a much more distant event, of whose accomplishment the accomplishment of the sign was a token, an earnest, and in some sense a proof; as it manifested a divine interposition on the subject to which the sign related. So when Ezekiel, at a great distance from Jerusalem, brought out his troops, and digged through his house, he signified the fate of Jerusalem: so, when Isaiah was ordered to beget a son by a young woman, then a virgin, this being accomplished, was a sign of a much greater birth to be expected in the person of Emmanuel, to whom the prophet expressly directs the ultimate reference.

If this be correct, what should prevent types also from looking forward? If it pleased God to encourage the hope and faith of his people by occasional signs, why not also by lasting and permanent types? Why might not the same ideas be conveyed every day, every year, on public occasions, as incidentally, only, in a less conspicuous manner? Nevertheless, that may be true of public services under a general idea, which it would be imprudent and unadvisable to apply to every minute circumstance attending them. E. gr. The holy of holies in the Jewish temple might be emblematic of heaven, the residence of God; but it certainly is not prudent to consider whatever may, at any rate, and by any construction, bear a reference to the holy of holies, as therefore assimilated to a correspondent antitype in heaven. The wit and ingenuity of many of those references, which occur in some systems of divinity, may be admirable, but admiration differs from approbation. Though we read that the bellies of the pillars in Solomon's temple were decorated with lily work, it is by no means certain that "the typical meaning was, to denote that ministers being the pillars of the gospel church, and lilies being emblems of the care of Providence, therefore gospel ministers should leave to Providence the care of their bellies." Whatever may be thought of the doctrine, it is far enough from certain, that this was the intention of the sacred writer, or of the Holy Spirit, in recording this passage; to which intention too much cautious deference cannot be paid.

Whether certain histories which happened in ancient times were designed as types of future events, it is not easy to determine: but it is likely (1.) that such histories are recorded (being selected from among many occurrences) as might be useful lessons to succeeding ages: (2.) that there being a general conformity in the dispensations of providence and grace, to different persons, and in different ages, instances of former dispensations may usefully be held up to the view of later times, and may encourage, check, direct, or control, those placed in circumstances similar to what is recorded, though their times and their places may be widely separated. We have New Testament authority for this.

Types may be considered as possessing different degrees of that clearness which determines their reference to their antitype. Some may be evident, and palpable; others more obscure: some may be referable in a general or leading sense, or under some particular view; but, if only that general (or that particular) view were originally designed, it is not for us to particularize every division, every ramification seen under every aspect, and tinged with every hue which the multiplication glass of a fertile imagination may offer, or may induce us to admire.

The Jewish literati delighted in the studies and the application of learning derived from the types: they even thought certain letters, and their positions, to be of the nature of types; and hence arose their Cabala. But the fallacy of this mode of instruction as to any reliance to be placed on it, appears from considering that scarcely any two commentators agree in their explanations and inferences, when such principles are the basis of their remarks.

Types should be referred from a lesser to a greater, as from the death of a beast to the death of a man; from a lower to a higher, as from earth to heaven; from time present to futurity, as from this world to the eternal state; from lesser degrees of perfection to more absolute, as from man to God. If the sacrifice of a lamb availed officially to restore peace, or to conciliate favor, that of a person in whom dwelt the fulness of Divinity, must be infinitely more available to mediate reconciliation: if pardon and exemption from punishment in this world be desirable, justification and deliverance from eternal misery is infinitely more desirable: if the tender feelings of a father in this unequal state, and amidst all the imperfections of the social principle, be powerful, how much more those of the great Father of all, the Father of our spirits! Whatever is divine is infinite; whatever is infinite eludes our comprehension, however urged by the most vehement imagination; under this reflection, types may be useful by offering similitudes adapted to our powers; but when that which is perfect is come, that which is imperfect and partial, that which is feeble and unsatisfactory, shall be done away. (On the general subject of types, see the Bibl. Repos. vol. i. p. 135.)

TYRANNUS. We read, Acts xix. 9, that Paul, at Ephesus, withdrew from the synagogue, but taught every day in the school of one Tyrannus, who is generally thought to have been a converted Gentile.

TYRE, a famous city of Phœnicia, allotted to the tribe of Asher, with other maritime cities of the same coast; (Josh. xix. 29.) but it does not appear that the Asherites ever drove out the Canaanites. Yet very learned men maintain, that in Joshua's time Tyre was not built; and that Strong Tyre—well-fortified Tyre—Tyre the Great, is not the city of Tyre. Isaiah, it is said, (xxiii. 12.) calls Sidon the daughter of Tyre, that is, a colony from it. Homer never speaks of Tyre, but only of Sidon. Josephus says, Tyre was built not above 240 years before the temple of Solomon; which would be 200 years after Joshua. That there was such a city as Tyre, however, in the days of Homer, is quite certain, seeing, that in the reign of Solomon, there was a king of Tyre; and we apprehend that the Scripture text will be held a sufficient proof of its having had an existence before the land of Canaan was conquered by the Israelites. Nor is Josephus's chronology so accurate as to render his authority on such a point very important. There was Insular Tyre, and Tyrus on the continent, or Pale Tyrus; and it is supposed by some learned writers, that the island was not inhabited till after the reign of Nebuchadnezzar. But this supposition is not merely at variance with the doubtful authority of Josephus, but is scarcely reconcilable with the language of the prophets Isaiah and Ezekiel, who both seem to speak of Tyre as an isle. (See Isa. xxiii. 2, 6; Ezek. xxvi. 17; xxvii. 3; xxviii. 2.) Nor is it probable that the advantageous position of the island would be altogether neglected by a maritime people. The coast would, indeed, first be occupied, and the fortified city mentioned in the book of Joshua was in all probability on the continent; but as the commercial importance and wealth of the port increased, the island would naturally be inhabited, and it must have been considered as the place of the greatest security. Volney supposes that the Tyrians retired to their isle when compelled to abandon the ancient city of Nebuchadnezzar, and that till that time the death of water had prevented it from being much built upon. Certain it is, that when, at length, Nebuchadnezzar took the city, he found it so impoverished as to afford him no compensation for his labor. (See Ezek. xxix. 18, 19.) The chief edifices were, at all events, on the main land, and to these the denunciations of total ruin strictly apply. Pale Tyrus never rose from its overthrow by the Chaldean conqueror, and the Macedonian completed its destruction; at the same time, the wealth and commerce of Insular Tyre were for the time destroyed, though it afterwards recovered from the effects of this invasion.

Ancient Tyre, then, probably consisted of the fortified city, which commanded a considerable territory on the coast, and of the port which was "strong in the sea." On that side, it had little to fear from invaders, as the Tyrians were lords of the sea, and accordingly it does not appear that the Chaldean conqueror ventured upon a maritime assault. Josephus, indeed, states, that Salmaneser, king of Assyria, made war against the Tyrians, with a fleet of sixty ships, manned by 800 rowers. The Tyrians had but twelve ships, yet they obtained the victory, dispersing the Assyrian fleet, and taking 500 prisoners. Salmaneser then returned to Nineveh, leaving his land forces before Tyre, where they remained for five years, but were unable to take the city. (See Joseph. Antiq.) This expedition is supposed to have taken place in the reign of Hezekiah, king of Judah, about A. M. 3287, or 717 B. C. It must have been about this period, or a few years earlier, that Isaiah delivered his oracle against Tyre, in which he specifically declared, that it should be destroyed, not by the power which then threatened, but by the Chaldeans, a people "formerly of no account," Isa. xxiii. 13. The more detailed predictions of the prophet Ezekiel were delivered a hundred and twenty years after, B. C. 588. Almost immediately before the Chaldean invasion, the army of Nebuchadnezzar is said to have lain before Tyre thirteen years, and it was not taken till the fifteenth year after the captivity, B. C. 573, more than 1700 years, according to Josephus, after its foundation. Its destruction then must have been entire; all the inhabitants were put to the sword, or led into captivity, the walls were razed to the ground, and it was made a "terror" and a desolation. It is remarkable, that one reason assigned by Ezekiel for the destruction of this proud city, is its exultation at the destruction of Jerusalem: "I shall be replenished now she is laid waste," Ezek. xvi. 2. This clearly indicates that its overthrow was posterior to that event; and if we take the seventy years during which it was predicted by Isaiah (xxiii. 15.) that Tyre should be forgotten, to denote a definite term, (which seems the most natural sense) we may conclude that it was not rebuilt till the same number of years after the return of the Jews from Babylon. Old Tyre, the continental city, remained, however, in ruins up to the period of the Macedonian invasion. Insular Tyre had then risen to be a city of very considerable wealth and political importance, and by sea her fleets were triumphant. It was the rubbish (Ezek. xxv. 12, 19,) of old Tyre, thirty furlongs off, that supplied materials for the gigantic mole constructed by Alexander, of 200 feet in breadth, extending all the way from the continent to the island, a distance of three quarters of a mile. The sea that formerly separated them, was shallow near the shore, but towards the island, it is said to have been three fathoms in depth. The causeway has probably been enlarged by the sand thrown up by the sea, which now covers the surface of the isthmus. Tyre was taken by the Macedonian conqueror, after a siege of eight months, B. C. 332, two hundred and forty-one years after its destruction by Nebuchadnezzar, and consequently about one hundred and seventy after it had been rebuilt.

Though now subjugated, it was not, however, totally destroyed, since only thirty years afterwards it was an object of contention to Alexander's successors. The fleet of Antigonus invested and blockaded it for thirteen months, at the expiration of which it was compelled to surrender, and received a garrison of his troops for its defence. About three years after it was invested by Ptolemy, in person, and owing to a mutiny in the garrison, fell into his hands. Its history is now identified with that of Syria. In the apostolic age it seems to have regained some measure of its ancient character as a trading town; and Paul, in touching here, on one occasion, in his way back from Macedonia, found a number of Christian believers, with whom he spent a week; so that the gospel must have been early preached to the Tyrians. (Acts xxi. 3, 4.) Josephus, in speaking of the city of Zabalou as of admirable beauty, says that its houses were built like those in Tyre, and Sidon, and Berytus. Strabo also speaks of the loftiness and beauty of the buildings. In ecclesiastical history, it is distinguished as the first archbishopric under the patriarchate of Jerusalem. It shared the fate of the country in the Saracen invasion, in the beginning of the seventh century. It was reconquered by the crusaders in the twelfth, and formed a royal domain of the kingdom of Jerusalem, as well as an archiepiscopal see. William of Tyre, the well-known historian, an Englishman, was the first archbishop. In 1289, it was retaken by the Saracens, the Christians being permitted to remove with their effects. When the sultan Selim divided Syria into pashalies, Tyre, which had probably gone into decay, with the depression of commerce, was merged in the territory of Sidon. In 1766, it was taken possession of by the Moutualies, who repaired the port, and enclosed it, on the land side, with a wall twenty feet high. The wall was standing, but the repairs had gone to ruin, at the time of Volney's visit (1784). He noticed, however, the choir of the ancient church, also mentioned by Maundrell, together with some columns of red granite, of a species unknown in Syria, which Djeddar Pasha wanted to remove to Acre, but could find no engineers fit to accomplish it. It was at that time a miserable village: its exports consisted of a few sacks of corn and cotton, and the only merchant of which it could boast was a solitary Greek, in the service of the French factory at Sidon, who could hardly gain a livelihood. It is only within the last five-and-twenty years that it has once more begun to lift its head from the dust. (Modern Traveller, Syria, vol. i. p. 37, seq. Amer. ed.)

TYTHES. We have nothing more ancient concerning tythes, than what is read Gen. xiv. 20, that Abraham gave tythes to Melchizedec, king of Salem, of all the booty he had taken from the enemy. Jacob imitated this piety of his grandfather, when he vowed to the Lord the tythe of all the substance he might acquire in Mesopotamia, Gen. xxviii. 22. Under the law, Moses ordained, "All the tythe of the land, whether of the seed of the land, or of the fruit of the tree, is the Lord's; it is holy unto the Lord. And if a man will at all redeem ought of his tythes, he shall add thereto the fifth part thereof. And concerning the tythe of the herd, or of the flock, even of whatsoever passeth under the rod, the tenth shall be holy unto the Lord;" Lev. xxvii. 30—32.

The Pharisees in the time of Christ, to distinguish themselves by a more scrupulous observance of the law, not content with tything the grain and fruits growing in the fields, also paid tythes of pulse and herbs growing in their gardens, which was more than the law required. Our Saviour did not censure this exactness; but he blamed their hypocrisy and pride in it, Mat. xxiii. 23; Luke xi. 42.

Tythes were taken from what remained after the offerings and first-fruits were paid. They brought the tythes to the Levites in the city of Jerusalem, as appears by Josephus, Antiq. lib. iv. cap. 8. The Levites set apart the tenth part of their tythes for the priests, (for the priests did not receive them immediately from the people,) and the Levites were not to enjoy the tythes they had received, before they had given to the priests such a part as the law assigned to them. Of the nine parts that remained to the proprietors, after the tythe was paid to the Levites, they took another tenth part, which was either sent to Jerusalem in kind, or, if that were too far, they sent the value in money, adding thereto, as the rabbins inform us, a fifth from the whole. This tenth part was applied towards celebrating the festivals in the temple; and was nearly resembled by the Agapæ, or love feasts, of the first Christians. Thus Deut. xiv. 22, 23, is understood by the rabbins: "Thou shalt truly tythe all the increase of thy seed, that the field bringeth forth year by year. And thou shalt eat before the Lord thy God, in the place which he shall choose to place his name there, the tythe of thy corn, of thy wine and of thy oil, and the firstlings of thy herds and of thy flocks; that thou mayest learn to fear the Lord thy God always." Josephus also speaks of these feasts, which were made in the temple, and in the holy city, Antiq. lib. iv. cap. 8.

Tobit says (i. 6.) that every three years he paid punctually his tythe to strangers and proselytes. This was probably because there were neither priests nor Levites in the city where he dwelt. Moses speaks of this last kind of tythe, Deut. xiv. 28; xxvi. 12. "At the end of three years thou shalt bring forth all the tythe of thine increase the same year, and shall lay it up within thy gates. And the Levite, (because he hath no part nor inheritance with thee,) and the stranger, and the fatherless, and the widow, which are within thy gates, shall come, and shall eat and be satisfied: that the Lord thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hand which thou dost." Calmet thinks this third tythe not to be different from the second kind already noticed, except that in the third year it was not brought into the temple, but was used on the spot, by every one in the city of his habitation. Therefore, properly speaking, there were only two sorts of tythes; (1.) that which was given to the Levites and priests; (2.) that which was applied to feasts of charity, either in the temple at Jerusalem, or in other cities.

Samuel tells the children of Israel, that their king would "take the tenth part of their seed, and of their vineyards, and give to his officers and his servants. He will take the tenth of your sheep, and ye shall be his servants," 1 Sam. viii. 15, 16. Yet it does not clearly appear from the history of the Jews, that they regularly paid tythe to their princes. But the manner in which Samuel expresses himself seems to insinuate, that it was looked upon as a common right among the kings of the East.

Tythes are not enforced by the New Testament. Our Saviour has commanded nothing as to the support of ministers; only, when he sent his apostles to preach in the cities of Israel, he forbade them to carry either purse, or provisions, and commanded them to enter the houses of those who were willing to receive them, and to eat what should be set before them; for, as he adds, the laborer is worthy of his hire, that is, of his maintenance, Matt. x. 10; Luke x. 7, 8. Paul also determines, that he who receives instruction, should administer some of his good things to him who gives it, Gal. vi. 6. It is agreeable to nature and reason, that they who wait at the altar should live by the altar; and whoever undertook a warfare at his own expense? 1 Cor. ix. 13. In the infancy of the church, the ministers lived on the alms and oblations of believers. Afterwards, lands and fixed revenues were settled on churches and their ministers, and people began to give them a certain portion of their substance, which was called tythe, in imitation of that paid to the priests of the old covenant, though every one gave only as his devotion inclined him. At last, the bishops, in concurrence with secular princes, made laws obliging Christians to give to ecclesiastics the tythe of their revenues, and of the fruits of the earth. As these regulations were not all made at the same time, nor in a uniform manner, we cannot precisely fix the period of the establishment of tythes. But they were paid as far back as the sixth century; though not every where, nor under the same obligations. F. Paul, in his Treatise of Benefices, observes, that till the eighth or the ninth century, tythes were not paid in the East, nor in Africa.

U

UNICORN

ULAI, a river which runs by the city Shushan in Persia, on the bank of which Daniel had a famous vision, Dan. viii. 2, 16. [It was the Choaspes of the Greeks, and is now called Kerrah. It empties its waters into the united stream of the Euphrates and Tigris, Dan. viii. 2. (See R. K. Porter's Travels, vol. ii. p. 412.) R.

UNICORN. (Heb.  $\text{עֵיט}$ , reem.) It is hardly necessary to remark, that the unicorn, as represented by poets and painters, has never been found in nature, and never, perhaps, had an existence but in the imagination of the one, and on the canvass of the other. [See, however, the additions at the end of this article. Indeed the whole of the article which follows might, perhaps, be more properly omitted; as it proceeds on the erroneous supposition that the animal denoted by the Hebrew word reem is the rhinoceros; and because one of the main arguments for this supposition is based upon a word not found in the Hebrew, but inserted by the English translators, as will be shown below. Still, as the general information here exhibited is not uninteresting, the whole may be permitted to remain; referring the reader, however, for a probably more correct view to the additions below. R.

Before we inquire what creature is denoted by the Hebrew reem, it will be well to ascertain its precise character from a careful examination of the several passages in which it is mentioned. The first allusion to it is in the reply of Balaam to Balak, when impetuned by the terrified king to curse the invading armies of Israel: "God brought them out of Egypt; he hath as it were the strength of an unicorn," Numb. xxiii. 22; xxiv. 8. From this it is evident, that the reem was conceived to possess very considerable power. With this idea corresponds the passage in Isaiah, where the prophet associates with him other powerful animals, to symbolize the leaders and princes of the hostile nations that were destined to desolate his country: "And the unicorns shall come down with them, and the bullocks with the bulls; and their land shall be soaked with blood, and their dust be made fat with fatness," chap. xxxiv. 7. From the book of Job we learn, that he was not only an animal of considerable strength, but also of a very intractable disposition: "Will the unicorn be willing to serve thee, or abide by thy crib? Canst thou bind the unicorn with his band in the furrow, or will he harrow the valleys after thee? Wilt thou trust him because his strength is great, or wilt thou leave thy labor to him? Wilt thou believe him, that he will bring home thy seed, and gather it into thy barn?" chap. xxxix. 9—12. Another particular we collect from Ps. xcii. 10, namely, that this animal possesses a single horn, and that in an erect posture, unlike other horned animals: "My horn shalt thou exalt like the horn of an unicorn;" while it is evident from the following passage, that it was sometimes found with more horns than one. "His [Joseph's] horns are like the horns of an unicorn," Deut. xxxiii. 17. There are only two more passages, in which the reem is mentioned in Scripture: these are Ps. xxii. 21. and xxix. 6. From the former we are unable to gather any additional information, and the latter will add but little to our stock: "He maketh them also to skip like a calf; Lebanon and Sirion like a young unicorn."

We are now better prepared to examine into the validity of the claims that have been advanced in favor of those animals which are supposed to be the reem of the Hebrew Scriptures. Let us first hear Mr. Bruce.

It is very remarkable, says this distinguished traveller, that two such animals as the elephant and rhinoceros should have wholly escaped the description of the sacred writers. Moses and the children of Israel were long in the neighborhood of the countries which produced them both, while in Egypt and in Arabia. The classing of the animals into clean and unclean seems to have led the legislator into a kind of necessity of describing, in one of the classes, an animal which made the food of the principal pagan nations in the neighborhood. Considering the long and intimate connection Solomon had with the south coast of the Red sea, it is next to impossible that he was not acquainted with them, as both David his father, and he himself, made plentiful use of ivory, as they frequently mention in their writings, which, along with gold, came from the same parts. Solomon, besides, wrote expressly on zoology, and we can scarce suppose was ignorant of two of the principal articles of that part of the creation, inhabitants of the great continent of Asia east from him, and that of Africa on the south, with both which territories he was in constant correspondence.

There are two animals named frequently in Scripture, without naturalists being agreed what they are. The one is the behemoth, the other the reem; both mentioned as types of strength, courage and independence on man; and, as such, exempted from the ordinary lot of beasts, to be subdued by him, or reduced under his dominion. Though this is not to be taken in a literal sense,—for there is no animal without the fear or beyond the reach of the power of man,—we are to understand it of animals possessed of strength and size so superlative, as that in these qualities other beasts bear no proportion to them.

The behemoth Mr. Bruce takes to be the elephant, in which we differ from him: the reem he argues to be the rhinoceros, from the following considerations:

The derivation of the word, both in Hebrew and Ethiopic, seems to be from creetness, or standing straight. This is certainly no particular quality in the animal itself, who is not more, nor even so much, erect as many other quadrupeds, for its knees are rather crooked; but it is from the circumstance and manner in which his horn is placed. The horns of all other animals are inclined to some degree of parallelism with the nose, or os frontis. The horn of the rhinoceros alone is erect or perpendicular to this bone, on which it stands at right angles; thereby possessing a greater purchase or power, as a lever, than any horn could possibly have in any other position. This situation of the horn is very happily alluded to in the sacred writings: "My horn shalt thou exalt like the horn of a reem," Ps. xcii. 10. And the horn here alluded to is not wholly figurative, but was really an ornament worn by great men in the days of victory, preferment, or rejoicing, when they were anointed with new, sweet, or fresh oil; a circumstance which David joins with that of erecting the horn.

The reasons which have induced some writers to consider the unicorn as being of the deer or antelope kind, it is difficult to conceive of, since this is of a genus, whose very character is fear and weakness, very opposite, as Mr. Bruce continues, to the qualities by which the reem is described in Scripture. Besides, it is plain the reem is not of the class of clean quadrupeds; and a late traveller very whimsically takes him for the leviathan, which certainly was a fish. Balaam, a priest of Midian, and so in the neighborhood of the haunts of the rhinoceros, and intimately connected with Ethiopia, (for they themselves were shepherds of that country,) in a transport, from contemplating the strength of Israel whom he was brought to curse, says, they had as it were "the strength of the reem," Numb. xxiii. 22. Job makes frequent allusion to his great strength, ferocity and indolence, chap. xxxix. 9, 10. He asks, "Will the reem be willing to serve thee, or to abide at thy crib?" That is, Will he willingly come into thy stable, and eat at thy manger? and again, "Canst thou bind the reem with a band in the furrow, and will he harrow the valleys after thee?" In other words, Canst thou make him to go in the plough or harrows?

Isaiah, (chap. xxxiv. 7.) who, of all the prophets, seems to have known Egypt and Ethiopia the best, when prophesying about the destruction of Idumea, says, that "the reem shall come down with the fat cattle:" a proof that he knew his habitation was in the neighborhood. In the same manner as when foretelling the desolation of Egypt, he mentions as one manner of effecting it, the bringing down the fly from Ethiopia, to meet the cattle in the desert, and among the bushes, and destroy them there, where that insect did not ordinarily come but on command, (comp. Isa. vii. 18, 19, and Exod. viii. 22.) and where the cattle feed every year, to save themselves from that insect.

The rhinoceros in Geez is called arvé harish, and in the Amharic, auraris, both of which names signify the large wild beast with the horn. This would seem as if applied to the species that had but one horn. On the other hand, in the country of the Shangalla, and in Nubia adjoining, he is called girmangirn, or horn upon horn, and this would seem to denote that he had two. The Ethiopic text renders the word reem, arvé harish, and this the Septuagint translates μορόζερος, or unicorn.

If the Abyssinian rhinoceros had invariably two horns, it seems improbable that the Septuagint would have called him monoceros, especially as they must have seen an animal of this kind exposed at Alexandria in their time, when first mentioned in history, at an exhibition given to Ptolemy Philadelphus, at his accession to the crown, before the death of his father.

The principal reason for translating the word reem, unicorn, and not rhinoceros, is from a prejudice that he must have but one horn. But this is by no means so well founded, as to be admitted as the only argument for establishing the existence of an animal, which never has appeared after the search of so many ages. Scripture, as we have seen, speaks of the horns of the unicorn; so that, even from this circumstance, the reem may be the rhinoceros, as the Asiatic and part of the African rhinoceros may be the unicorn.

In addition to these particulars, Mr. Bruce informs us, that the rhinoceros does not eat hay or grass, but lives entirely upon trees; he does not spare the most thorny ones, but rather seems to be fond of them; and it is not a small branch that can escape his hunger, for he has the strongest jaws of any creature known to him, and best adapted to grinding or bruising any thing that makes resistance. But, besides the trees capable of most resistance, there are in the vast forests which he inhabits trees of a softer consistence, and of a very succulent quality, which seem to be destined for his principal food. For the purpose of gaining the highest branches of these, his upper lip is capable of being lengthened out, so as to increase his power of laying hold with this, in the same manner as the elephant does with his trunk. With this lip, and the assistance of his tongue, he pulls down the upper branches, which have most leaves, and these he devours first: having stripped the tree of its branches, he does not therefore abandon it, but placing his snout as low in the trunk as he finds his horn will enter, he rips up the body of the tree, and reduces it to thin pieces, like so many laths; and when he has thus prepared it, he embraces as much of it as he can in his monstrous jaws, and twists it with as much case as an ox would do a root of celery. (Bruce's Travels, vol. v. p. 89—95.)

Such is the description which this intelligent writer gives of the animal which he supposes to be the reem of the sacred writers; but it is necessary that we should notice the objections urged against this opinion.

Mr. Scott, who considers the reem to be a species of the wild bull, an animal bred in the Arabian and Syrian deserts, objects, that the rhinoceros cannot be the animal intended, because the reem is represented as having high and terrible horns; whereas, this creature possesses but one, and that a very short one, placed just over the nose. That the former part of this objection is founded in misapprehension, we have already seen; since the reem is, in one passage of Scripture at least represented as having only one horn; and that horn, as is evident from the allusion, placed in a position exactly answering to the description of this weapon of the rhinoceros, which is furnished by Mr. Bruce. Nor is the remaining part of the objection of greater weight, since the horn of the rhinoceros is by no means of so contemptible a size as it represents. In the forty-second and fifty-sixth volumes of the Philosophical Transactions, Dr. Parsons has given drawings of the horns of the rhinoceros, from Dr. Mead's, and also from sir Hans Sloane's, collections. From those delineations we ascertain, that the straight horn on a double-horned animal was twenty-five inches in length; the curved one being something shorter; and the two diameters of the bases thirteen inches. Nor were these the largest of the kind, for the doctor mentions a horn in the collection of sir H. Sloane, which was thirty-seven inches long, and another thirty-two inches; and Buffon mentions one whose length was three feet eight inches,—an altitude sufficient, surely, to justify the allusions of the sacred writers.

But in addition to this, we must remark, that the wild bull, which in all its varieties is possessed of two horns, can never be identified with an animal represented as varying in these particulars; possessing sometimes one and sometimes two. The LXX, as we have shown, uniformly translate the Heb. עֶבְרִי בְּרִיבָהוֹס, i. e. oxe-horned; and the contradiction is equally great, whether they designed to describe a bull having two horns, or whether they designed the double-horned rhinoceros. But when we consider that a wild bull, having only one horn, would be contrary to the nature of the beeve kind, and, indeed, would be a monster; whereas a unicorn, or single-horned rhinoceros, would suit some passages of Scripture, and be perfectly well known to their readers; while another species of rhinoceros, having two horns, would suit other passages of Scripture, where a similar animal is meant, and this also was known to their readers;—we cannot but approve of the choice they made in preferring the rhinoceros to the urus, as the animal intended by the Hebrew reem. We consider this choice and this opinion of the Egyptian translators, who certainly knew full as well as modern writers can know, the animal most likely to be described by the sacred poet, as no despicable authority on this side of the question.

We now leave the reader to determine for himself respecting the identity of this disputed animal. To us it appears, that the arguments in favor of the rhinoceros preponderate, and that we shall not be very far from the truth, if we conclude this to be the reem of the sacred volume.

From what has been already said, some idea may be formed of the external appearance, as well as the dispositions of the rhinoceros. A few additional remarks, however, may not be unacceptable.

Next to the elephant, the rhinoceros is said to be the most powerful of animals. It is usually found twelve feet long, from the tip of the nose to the insertion of the tail; from six to seven feet high; and the circumference of its body is nearly equal to its length. It is, therefore, equal to the elephant in bulk; and the reason of its appearing so much smaller to the eye than that animal is, that its legs are so much shorter. Words, says Goldsmith, can convey but a very confused idea of this animal's shape; and yet there are few so remarkably formed. But for its horn, which we have already described, its head would have the appearance of that part of a hog. The skin of the rhinoceros is naked, rough, knotty, and lying upon the body in folds, in a very peculiar manner: the skin, which is of a dirty brown color, is so thick as to turn the edge of a cimeter, and to resist a musket-ball.

Such is the general outline of an animal that appears chiefly formidable from the horn growing from its snout; and formed rather for war, than with a propensity to engage. The elephant, the boar, and the buffalo, are obliged to strike transversely with their weapons; but the rhinoceros, from the situation of his horn, employs all his force with every blow; so that the tiger will more willingly attack any other animal of the forest than one whose strength is so justly employed. Indeed, there is no force which this terrible animal has to apprehend; defended on every side by a thick, horny hide, which the claws of the lion or the tiger are unable to pierce, and armed before with a weapon that even the elephant does not choose to oppose. Travellers have assured us, that the elephant is often found dead in the forests, pierced with the horn of a rhinoceros.

[The preceding arguments are the strongest, and indeed the only ones, which can be urged in favor of the rhinoceros, as being the reem of the Hebrew writers. They are however rebutted by the fact, that the reem was obviously an animal well known to the Hebrews, being every where mentioned with other animals common to the country; while the rhinoceros was never an inhabitant of the country, is nowhere else spoken of by the sacred writers, nor, according to Bochart, either by Aristotle in his treatise of animals, nor by Arabian writers. Nor do the qualities and habits of the rhinoceros at all coincide with those ascribed to the reem. The prominent features of the latter are its horns, in respect to which it is classed with animals that push, which is never the case with the rhinoceros. Besides, the chief argument adduced above for the rhinoceros, viz. that the reem is sometimes described with one horn and sometimes with more, is false. The truth is, the word reem has in itself no reference to horns at all, and wherever the animal is spoken of with any allusion to this member, the expression is in the plural, horns; e. g. Deut. xxxiii. 17, "His [Joseph's] horns are like the horns of an unicorn;" Ps. xxii. 21, "Thou hast heard [and delivered] me from the horns of the unicorn." In Ps. xcii. 10, which is referred to above as proving that the reem is sometimes represented as having but one horn, the Hebrew reads simply, "My horn shalt thou exalt like an unicorn;" where the word horn, as it stands in the English version, is nowhere expressed; although there is undoubtedly an ellipsis, which, to compare with other parallel passages, ought to be filled out with horns, in the plural, rather than with the singular. (See Stuart's Heb. Gram. § 550. 4th edit.) Thus the whole argument in question rests not on the Hebrew original, but on an interpolation of the English translators.—Indeed the supposition of the rhinoceros has been long since refuted by Bochart, to whose learned work the reader is referred. (Hieroz. Tom. i. 930. edit. 1712.)

But on the other hand, Bochart, and after him Rosenmüller and others, regard the reem of the Hebrews as a species of antelope, the rim of the Arabs, and the oryx or leucoryx of the Greeks. The argument of most weight in Bochart's mind, seems to be the fact, that rim in Arabic, which is equivalent to reem in Hebrew, is thus used of a species of white gazelle or antelope, (Niebuhr, Descr. of Arab. p. xxxviii. Germ. ed.) which would seem to be very probably the leucoryx. But then, the other characteristics of these animals by no means correspond to those of the reem, which is every where described as a fierce, intractable animal, acting on the offensive and attacking even men of its own accord. Now, however wild and untameable many species of antelopes may be, they are universally described as a shy and retiring animal, always flying from pursuit, and avoiding even the approach of man. In opposition to this, Bochart and Rosenmüller produce a passage of Martial, where he gives to the oryx the epithet fierce, (sævus oryx, Epigr. xiii. 95.) and another from Oppian, where he says, "There is a beast, with pointed horns, familiar to the woods, the savage oryx, most terrible to other beasts." (Cyneg. ii. 445.) Now all these epithets and descriptions, even allowing nothing for poetical amplification, are perfectly applicable to the stag of our forests and of Asia; they imply no more than that the oryx, when hard pushed, will turn upon its pursuers, and defend himself with fury. Yet no one would hence draw the conclusion, that it was characteristic of the stag to act on the offensive; nor can such a conclusion be drawn with better reason in regard to the oryx.—The oryx of Pliny and other ancient writers is understood to be the antelope oryx of zoologists; the gazella Indica of Ray, the capra gazella of the Syst. Nat., the Egyptian antelope of Pennant, and the pasari of Buffon. It is about the size of a fallow deer, having straight, slender, annulated horns which taper to a point; the horns are about three feet long, the points sharp, and about fourteen inches asunder; the body and sides are of a reddish ash color; the face is white, with a black spot at the base of the horns, and another on the middle of the face. It is a native of Asia and Africa.—The leucoryx, which some suppose to be the oryx of Oppian, is in general similar to the animal above described, except that the body is of a milk white color. It inhabits the neighborhood of Bassora, on the Persian gulf.—Most obviously neither of these animals answer the description of the Hebrew reem. The fact that the Arabs apply the word rim to this class of animals, has probably its origin in the same cause, which also leads them to apply to the races of deer and antelopes, in general, the epithet wild oxen. (See Schultens, Comm. in Job xxxix. 9.)

Other writers have supposed the reem of the Hebrews to be the urus, bison, or wild ox, described by Cæsar, which is understood to be the same animal as the American buffalo. The characteristics of this animal accord well with those attributed to the reem; but there is no evidence that the bison existed in Palestine, or was known to the Hebrews. A more obvious supposition, therefore, is that of Schultens, De Wette, Gesenius, and others, that under the reem we are to understand the buffalo of the eastern continent, the bos bubalus of Linnæus, which differs from the bison or American buffalo chiefly in the shape of the horns and the absence of the dewlap. This animal is indigenous, originally, in the hotter parts of Asia and Africa, but also in Persia, Abyssinia and Egypt; and is now also naturalized in Italy and southern Europe. As, therefore, it existed in the countries all around Palestine, there is every reason to suppose that it was also found in that country, or at least in the regions east of the Jordan and south of the Dead sea, as Bashan and Idumea.

The oriental buffalo appears to be so closely allied to our common ox, that without an attentive examination it might be easily mistaken for a variety of that animal. In point of size it is rather superior to the ox; and upon an accurate inspection, it is observed to differ in the shape and magnitude of the head, the latter being larger than in the ox. But it is chiefly by the structure of the horns that the buffalo is distinguished, these being of a shape and curvature altogether different from those of the ox. They are of gigantic size in proportion to the bulk of the animal, and of a compressed form, with a sharp exterior edge; for a considerable length from their base these horns are straight, and then bend slightly upwards; the prevailing color of them is dusky, or nearly black. The buffalo has no dewlap; his tail is small and destitute of vertebrae near the extremity; his ears are long and pointed. This animal has the appearance of uncommon strength. The bulk of his body, and prodigious muscular limbs, denote his force at the first view. His aspect is ferocious and malignant; at the same time that his physiognomy is strongly marked with features of stupidity. His head is of a ponderous size; his eyes diminutive; and what serves to render his visage still more savage, are the tufts of frizzled hair which hang down from his cheeks and the lower part of his muzzle.

This animal, although originally a native of the hotter parts of India and Africa, is now completely naturalized to the climate of the south of Europe. Mr. Pennant supposes the wild bulls of Aristotle to have been buffaloes, and Gmelin and other distinguished naturalists are of the same opinion. Gmelin also supposes the Bos Indicus of Pliny to have been the same animal. Buffon, however, endeavors to show, that the buffalo of modern times was unknown to the Greeks and Romans, and that it was first transported from its native countries, the warmer regions of Africa and the Indies, to be naturalized in Italy, not earlier than the seventh century.

The buffalo grows in some countries to an extremely large size. The buffaloes of Abyssinia grow to twice the size of our largest oxen, and are called elephant bulls. Mr. Pennant mentions a pair of horns in the British Museum, which are six feet and a half long, and the hollow of which will hold five quarts. Father Lobo affirms that some of the horns of the buffaloes in Abyssinia will hold ten quarts; and Dillon saw some in India that were ten feet long. They are sometimes wrinkled, but generally smooth. The distance between the points of the two horns is usually about five feet.

Wild buffaloes occur in many parts of Africa and India, where they live in great troops in the forests, and are regarded as excessively fierce and dangerous animals. In all these particulars they coincide with the buffaloes of America. The hunting of them is a favorite but very dangerous pursuit; the hunters never venture in any numbers to oppose these ferocious animals face to face; but conceal themselves in the thickets, or in the branches of the trees; whence they attack the buffaloes as they pass along.

In Egypt, as also in southern Europe, the buffalo has been partially domesticated. In Egypt especially, it is much cultivated, where, according to Sonnini, it yields plenty of excellent milk, from which butter and various kinds of cheese are made.

"The buffalo," says Sonnini, "is an acquisition of the modern Egyptians, with which their ancestors were unacquainted. It was brought over from Persia [?] into their country, where the species is at present universally spread, and is very much propagated. It is even more numerous than the common ox, and is there equally domestic, though but recently domesticated; as is easily distinguishable by the constantly uniform color of the hair, and still more by a remnant of ferocity and intractability of disposition, and a wild and lowering aspect, the characters of all half-tamed animals. The buffaloes of Egypt, however, are not near so wild nor so much to be feared as those of other countries. They there partake of the gentleness of other domestic animals, and only retain a few sudden and occasional caprices.—They are so fond of water, that I have seen them continue in it a whole day. It often happens that the water which is fetched from the Nile, near its banks, has contracted their musky smell."

These animals multiply more readily than the common ox; they breed in the fourth year, producing young for two years together, and remaining sterile the third; and they commonly cease breeding after their twelfth year. Their term of life is much the same as that of the common ox. They are more robust than the common ox, better capable of bearing fatigue, and, generally speaking, less liable to distempers. They are therefore employed to advantage in different kinds of labor. Buffaloes are made to draw heavy loads, and are commonly guided by means of a ring passed through the nose. In its habits the buffalo is much less cleanly than the ox, and delights to wallow in the mud. His voice is deeper, more uncouth and hideous than that of the bull. The milk is said by some authors to be not so good as that of the cow, but more plentiful; Buffon, on the contrary, asserts that it is far superior to cows' milk. The skin and horns are of more value than all the rest of the animal; the latter are of a fine grain, strong, and bear a good polish, and are therefore in much esteem with cutlers and other artisans.

Italy is the country where buffaloes are, at present, most common perhaps in a domesticated state. They are used more particularly in the Pontine marshes and those in the district of Sienna, where the fatal nature of the climate acts unfavorably on common cattle, but affects the buffaloes less. The Spaniards also have paid attention to them; and indeed the cultivation of this useful animal seems to be pretty general in all the countries bordering on the Mediterranean sea, both in Europe and Africa. Niebuhr remarks, that he saw buffaloes not only in Egypt, but also at Bombay, Surat, on the Euphrates, Tigris, Orontes, at Scanderoon, &c. and indeed in almost all marshy regions and near large rivers. He does not remember any in Arabia, there being perhaps in that country too little water for this animal. (Deser. of Arabia, p. 165, Germ. edit.)

We have been thus particular in describing the buffalo of Asia, in order to show that it possesses, in its wild state, all the characteristics attributed to the Hebrew reem. All the evidence goes to show that it has been domesticated only at a comparatively recent period; and that the Hebrews therefore were probably acquainted with it only as a wild, savage, ferocious animal, resembling the ox; and it was not improbably often intended by them under the epithet bulls of Bashan. The appropriateness of the foregoing description to the Hebrew reem will be apparent, on a closer inspection of the passages where this animal is mentioned.

In Deut. xxxiii. 17, and Ps. xcii. 10, the comparison is with his horns; which requires no further illustration after what is said above. In Numb. xxiii. 22; xxiv. 8, it is said, "he hath as it were the strength of a reem;" this is certainly most appropriate, if we adopt here the word strength, as the proper translation. But the Hebrew word here rendered strength, means strictly, rapidity of motion, speed, combined, if you please, with force. In this sense also, it is not less descriptive of the buffalo, which runs with great speed and violence when excited; as is often the case in regard to whole herds, which then rush blindly forwards with tremendous power. (See the Account of major Long's expedition to the Rocky mountains.) In three other passages, the reem is closely coupled with the common ox, or with the employment of the latter. In Ps. xxix. 6, it is said, "He maketh them also to skip like a calf; Lebanon and Sirion like a young reem;" where the young of the reem stands in parallelism with the calf, so that we should naturally expect a great similarity between them. Isa. xxxiv. 7, "And the reemim shall come down with them, and the bullocks with the bulls, &c." Here, in verse 6, it is said that the Lord has a great sacrifice in Bozrah; and the idea in verse 7 is, according to the LXX and Gesenius, that the reemim shall come down, i. e. shall make part of, this sacrifice, as also the bullocks, old and young, of the land of Edom, so that their "land shall be soaked with blood," &c. The other passage is Job xxix. 9—12, "Will the reem be willing to serve thee, or abide by thy crib? Canst thou bind the reem with his band in the furrow, or will he barrow the valleys after thee? Wilt thou trust him because his strength is great, or wilt thou leave thy labor to him? Wilt thou believe him, that he will bring home thy seed, and gather it into thy barn?" Here Job is asked, whether he would dare to intrust to the reem such and such labors as were usually performed by oxen. Nothing can be more appropriate to the wild buffalo than this language; and we have seen above that the Hebrews probably knew it only in a wild state. The only other passage where the reem is mentioned is Ps. xxii. 21, and this requires a more extended notice. The psalmist in deep distress says in verse 12, "Many bulls (צרים) have compassed me, strong bulls of Bashan have beset me round. They gaped upon me with their mouths, as a ravening and roaring lion. For dogs have compassed me," &c. Here it will be observed that three animals are mentioned as besetting the writer, bulls of Bashan, lions, dogs. The psalmist proceeds to speak of his deliverance; verse 20, "Deliver my soul [me] from the sword, my darling [me] from the power of the dog. Save me from the lion's mouth; for thou hast heard [and saved] me from the horns of the reemim." Here also it will be seen are three animals, corresponding to the three before mentioned as besetting him, but ranged in an inverted order, viz. the dog, the lion, and the reem, in place of the bulls of Bashan; that is, from the whole structure of the poem, and the fact that these animals and no others are alluded to, the inference is almost irresistible, that the reemim of verse 21 are the parim of verse 12, the bulls of Bashan, as has been already suggested above. At least we may infer that the reem was an animal not so unlike those bulls, but that it might with propriety be interchanged with them in poetic parallelism; a circumstance most appropriately true of the wild buffalo, and of him only.

From all these considerations, and from the fact that the buffalo must have been far better known in western Asia than either the rhinoceros or the oryx, (even if the description of the reem suited these animals in other respects,) we feel justified in assuming the taurus bubalus, or wild buffalo, to be the reem of the Hebrew Scriptures and the unicorn of the English version.

The principal difficulty in the way of this assumption, is the fact that the LXX have usually translated the Hebrew reem by ροδοκερας, unicorn, one-horn. It must, however, be borne in mind, that these translators lived many centuries after the Hebrew Scriptures were written, and not long indeed before the birth of Christ; they lived, too, in Egypt, where it is not impossible that the buffalo had in their age begun to be domesticated. In such circumstances, and being unacquainted with the animal in his fierce and savage state, they may have thought that the allusions to the reem were not fully answered by the half-domesticated animal before them, and they may, therefore, have felt themselves at liberty to insert the name of some animal which seemed to them more appropriate. That they did often take such liberties, is well known. An instance occurs in the very passage of Isaiah above quoted, ch. xxxiv. 7, where the Hebrew is זבירים עם אבירים, "and the bullocks with the bulls," i. e. the bulls with the strong ones, or, according to Gesenius, "the bulls both young and old:" this the LXX translate, zai oi zoi oi zai oi tauroi, "and the rams (or wethers) and the bulls,"—certainly a quid pro quo not less striking than that of putting unicorn for buffalo.

That the LXX, in using the word monoceros, (unicorn, one-horn), did not understand by it the rhinoceros, would seem obvious; both because the latter always had its appropriate and peculiar name in Greek, (ῥινόκερος, rhinoceros, nose-horn), taken from the position of its horn upon the snout; and also from the circumstance so much insisted on above in the extracts from Mr. Bruce, that the rhinoceros of that part of Africa adjacent to Egypt actually has two horns. They appear rather to have had in mind the half-fabulous unicorn, described by Pliny, but lost sight of by all subsequent naturalists; although imperfect hints and accounts of a similar animal have been given by travellers in Africa and India in different centuries, and entirely independent of each other. The interesting nature of the subject, renders it proper to exhibit here all the evidence which exists in respect to such an animal; especially as it is no where brought together in the English language, or at least in no such form as to render it generally accessible.

The figure of the unicorn, in various attitudes, is depicted, according to Niebuhr, on almost all the stair-cases found among the ruins of Persepolis. One of these figures is given in vol. ii. plate xxiii. of Niebuhr's Travels; and also in vol. i. p. 594. 595, of the Travels of Sir R. K. Porter. The latter traveller supposes it to be the representation of a bull with a single horn. Pliny, in speaking of the wild beasts of India, says with regard to the animal in question: Asperrimam autem feram monocerolcm, reliquo corpore equo similem, capite cervo, pedibus clephanti, cauda apro, mugitu gravi, uno cornu nigro media fronte cubitorum duum eminente. Hanc feram vivam negant capi. (Hist. Nat. viii. 21.) "The unicorn is an exceeding fierce animal, resembling a horse as to the rest of its body, but having the head like a stag, the feet like an elephant, and the tail like a wild boar: its roaring is loud; and it has a black horn of about two cubits projecting from the middle of its forehead." These seem to be the chief ancient notices of the existence of the animal in question.

In 1530, Ludovico de Bartema, a Roman patrician, travelled to Egypt, Arabia and India; and having assumed the character of a Mussulman, he was able to visit Mecca with the Hadj, or great caravan of pilgrims. In his account of the curiosities of this city, in Ramusio's Collection of Travels, (Racotta di Viaggi, Venet. 1563, p. 163.) he says: "On the other side of the Caaba is a walled court, in which we saw two unicorns, which were pointed out to us as a rarity; and they are indeed truly remarkable. The larger of the two is built like a three-year-old colt, and has a horn upon the forehead about three ells long. The other unicorn was smaller, like a yearling foal, and has a horn perhaps four spans long.—This animal has the color of a yellowish-brown horse, a head like a stag, a neck not very long, with a thin mane; the legs are small and slender, like those of a hind or roe; the hoofs of the forefeet are divided, and resemble the hoofs of a goat. These two animals were sent to the sultan of Mecca, as a rarity of great value, and very seldom found, by a king of Ethiopia, who wished to secure, by this present, the good will of the sultan of Mecca."

Don Juan Gabriel, a Portuguese colonel, who lived several years in Abyssinia, assures us, that in the region of Agamos in the Abyssinian province of Damota, he had seen an animal of the form and size of a middle-sized horse, of a dark chestnut-brown color, and with a whitish horn about five spans long upon the forehead; the mane and tail were black, and the legs short and slender. Several other Portuguese, who were placed in confinement upon a high mountain in the district Namma, by the Abyssinian king Adamas Saghedo, related that they had seen, at the foot of the mountain, several unicorns feeding. (Ludolf's Hist. Æthiop. lib. i. c. 10. n. 80, seq.) These accounts are confirmed by father Lobo, who lived for a long time as a missionary in Abyssinia. He adds, that the unicorn is extremely shy, and escapes from closer observation by a speedy flight into the forests; for which reason there is no exact description of him. (Voyage histor. d'Abyssinie, Amst. 1728, vol. i. p. 83, 291.) All these accounts are certainly not applicable to the rhinoceros; although it is singular that Mr. Bruce speaks only of the latter animal as not uncommon in Abyssinia, and makes apparently no allusion to the above accounts.

In more recent times we find further traces of the animal in question in Southern Africa. Dr. Sparmann, the Swedish naturalist, who visited the cape of Good Hope and the adjacent regions, in the years 1772-1776, gives, in his travels, the following account: Jacob Kock, an observing peasant on Hippopotamus river, who had travelled over the greater part of Southern Africa, found on the face of a perpendicular rock a drawing made by the Hottentots, representing a quadruped with one horn. The Hottentots told him, that the animal there represented was very like the horse on which he rode, but had a straight horn upon the forehead. They added, that these one-horned animals were rare, that they ran with great rapidity, and were also very fierce. They also described the manner of hunting them. "It is not probable," Dr. Sparrmann remarks, "that the savages wholly invented this story, and that too so very circumstantially: still less can we suppose, that they should have received and retained, merely from history or tradition, the remembrance of such an animal. These regions are very seldom visited; and the creature might, therefore, long remain unknown. That an animal so rare should not be better known to the modern world, proves nothing against its existence. The greater part of Africa is still among the terre incognite. Even the giraffe has been again discovered only within comparatively a few years. So also the gnu, which, till recently, was held to be a fable of the ancients."

A somewhat more definite account of a similar animal is contained in the Transactions of the Zealand Academy of Sciences at Flushing. (Pt. xv. Middelb. 1792. Pref. p. lvi.) The account was transmitted to the society in 1791, from the cape of Good Hope, by Mr. Henry Cloete. It states that a bastard Hottentot, Gerrit Slinger by name, related, that while engaged several years before with a party, in pursuit of the savage Bushmen, they had got sight of nine strange animals, which they followed on horseback, and shot one of them. This animal resembled a horse, and was of a light-gray color, with white stripes under the lower jaw. It had a single horn, directly in front, as long as one's arm, and at the base about as thick. Towards the middle the horn was somewhat flattened, but had a sharp point; it was not attached to the bone of the forehead, but fixed only in the skin. The head was like that of the horse, and the size also about the same. The hoofs were round, like those of a horse, but divided below, like those of oxen. This remarkable animal was shot between the so-called Table mountain and Hippopotamus river, about sixteen days' journey on horseback from Cambedo, which would be about a month's journey in ox-wagons from Capetown. Mr. Cloete mentions, that several different natives and Hottentots testify to the existence of a similar animal with one horn, of which they profess to have seen drawings by hundreds, made by the Bushmen on rocks and stones. He supposes that it would not be difficult to obtain one of these animals, if desired. His letter is dated at the Cape, April 8, 1791. (See thus far Rosenmüller's Altes u. neues Morgenland, ii. p. 269, seq. Leipz. 1818.)

Such appear to have been the latest accounts of the animal in question, when it was again suddenly brought into notice as existing in the elevated regions of central India. The Quarterly Review for Oct. 1820, (vol. xxiv. p. 120.) in a notice of Frazer's tour through the Himalaya mountains, goes on to remark as follows: "We have no doubt that a little time will bring to light many objects of natural history peculiar to the elevated regions of central Asia, and hitherto unknown in the animal, vegetable and mineral kingdoms, particularly in the two former. This is an opinion which we have long entertained; but we are led to the expression of it on the present occasion, by having been favored with the perusal of a most interesting communication from major Latter, commanding in the rajah of Sikkim's territories, in the hilly country east of Nepal, addressed to adjutant-general Nicol, and transmitted by him to the marquis of Hastings. This important paper explicitly states that the unicorn, so long considered as a fabulous animal, actually exists at this moment in the interior of Thibet, where it is well known to the inhabitants. 'This'—we copy from the major's letter—is a very curious fact, and it may be necessary to mention how the circumstance became known to me. In a Thibetian manuscript, containing the names of different animals, which I procured the other day from the hills, the unicorn is classed under the head of those whose hoofs are divided: it is called the one-horned tso'po: Upon inquiring what kind of animal it was, to our astonishment, the person who brought the manuscript described exactly the unicorn of the ancients; saying, that it was a native of the interior of Thibet, about the size of a tattoo, [a horse from twelve to thirteen hands high,] fierce and extremely wild; seldom, if ever, caught alive, but frequently shot; and that the flesh was used for food.—'The person,' major Latter adds, 'who gave me this information, has repeatedly seen these animals, and eaten the flesh of them. They go together in herds, like our wild buffaloes, and are very frequently to be met with on the borders of the great desert, about a month's journey from Lassa, in that part of the country inhabited by the wandering Tartars.'

"This communication is accompanied by a drawing made by the messenger from recollection. It bears some resemblance to a horse, but has cloven hoofs, a long curved horn growing out of the forehead, and a boar-shaped tail, like that of the fera monoceros described by Pliny. From its herding together, as the unicorn of the Scriptures is said to do, as well as from the rest of the description, it is evident that it cannot be the rhinoceros, which is a solitary animal; besides major Latter states that, in the Thibetian manuscript, the rhinoceros is described under the name of servo, and classed with the elephant; 'neither,' says he, 'is it the wild horse, (well known in Thibet,) for that has also a different name, and is classed in the manuscript with the animals which have the hoofs undivided.'—'I have written,' he subjoins, 'to the Sachia Lama, requesting him to procure me a perfect skin of the animal, with the head, horn and hoofs; but it will be a long time before I can get it down, for they are not to be met with nearer than a month's journey from Lassa.'

As a sequel to this account, we find the following paragraph in the Calcutta Government Gazette, August, 1821: "Major Latter has obtained the horn of a young unicorn from the Sachia Lama, which is now before us. It is twenty inches in length; at the root it is four inches and a half in circumference, and tapers to a point; it is black, rather flat at the sides, and has fifteen rings, but they are only prominent on one side; it is nearly straight. Major Latter expects to obtain the head of the animal, with the hoofs and the skin, very shortly, which will afford positive proof of the form and character of the tso'po, or Thibet unicorn."

Such are the latest accounts which have reached us of this animal; and although their credibility cannot well be contested, and the coincidence of the description with that of Pliny is so striking, yet it is singular that in the lapse of more than ten years, (1832,) nothing further should have been heard on a subject so interesting.—But whatever may be the fact as to the existence of this animal, the adoption of it by the LXX, as being the Hebrew reem, cannot well be correct; both for the reasons already adduced above, and also from the circumstance, that the reem was evidently an animal frequent and well known in the countries where the scenes of the Bible are laid;

while the unicorn, at all events, is and was an animal of exceeding rarity. *R.

UR, the country of Terah, and the birth-place of Abraham, (Gen. xi. 28.) but its precise situation is unknown. [It is called Ur of the Chaldees; and by the Seventy, country, or region of the Chaldees. Traces of it most probably remain in the Persian fortress Ur, between Nesibis and the Tigris, mentioned by Ammianus, xxv. 8. Alexander Polyhistor calls it a city of the Chaldeans. (Ap. Euseb. Præp. Evang. ix. 17.) The word Ur in Sanscrit signifies city, town, place, &c. R.

URIAH, a Hittite, and husband of Bathsheba, was killed at the siege of Rabbah, in consequence of the orders of David, 2 Sam. xi. 3. See BATHSHEBA.

I. URIJAH, chief priest of the Jews under Abaz, king of Judah, introduced, under Abaz's direction, a new altar into the temple of the Lord, 2 Kings xvi. 10—12. (See ABIAZ.) Urijah succeeded Zadok II. and was succeeded by Shallum.

II. URIJAH, a prophet of the Lord, son of Shemaiah of Kirjath-jearim, (Jer. xxvi. 20, 21.) prophesied at the same time as Jeremiah, and declared the same things against Jerusalem and Judah. Jehoiakim resolved to secure him, and put him to death; but Urijah escaped into Egypt. Jehoiakim sent messengers, who brought him out of Egypt; and he was put to death by the sword, and ordered to be buried dishonorably in the graves of the meanest of the people. A. M. 3395, ante A. D. 609.

URIM AND THUMMIM, light and perfection, or doctrine and judgment, is supposed to have been an ornament in the high-priest's habit, which was consulted as an oracle upon particular and difficult public questions. Some think it was the precious stones in his breastplate, which made known the divine will by casting an extraordinary lustre. Others assert that they were the words manifestation and truth, written upon two precious stones, or upon a plate of gold. Various, in fact, are the conjectures upon this subject, and Moses has no where spoken of the Urim and Thummim in such terms as to remove the difficulty. When the Urim and Thummim was to be consulted, the high-priest put on his robes, and, going into the holy place, stood before the curtain that separated the holy place from the most holy place, and then, turning his face directly toward the ark and the mercy-seat, upon which the divine presence rested, he proposed what he wanted to be resolved about; and directly behind him, at some distance without the holy place, stood the person at whose command or entreaty God was consulted, and there, with all humility and devotion, expected the answer. According to Josephus, this oracle ceased about 112 years before Christ.

USURY, a premium received for the loan of a sum of money, over and above the principal. It is said in Exod. xxii. 25, 26, "If thou lend money to any of my people that is poor by thee, thou shalt not be to him as an usurer, neither shalt thou lay upon him usury. If thou at all take thy neighbor's raiment to pledge, thou shalt deliver it unto him by that the sun goeth down." And in Lev. xxv. 35—37: "If thy brother be waxen poor, and fallen into decay with thee, then thou shalt relieve him; yea, though he be a stranger, or a sojourner, that he may live with thee. Take thou no usury of him, or increase, but fear thy God, that thy brother may live with thee. Thou shalt not give him thy money upon usury, nor lend him thy victuals for increase." The Hebrew may be translated: "When your brother shall fall into poverty and misery, you shall support him; and as to the stranger or foreigner that shall be settled among you, you shall take no usury of him; you shall not lend him your money for usury," &c. So that this passage would contain two precepts: first, that a brother was to be maintained when in poverty; secondly, that even a stranger was to be relieved without paying usury. In Deut. xxiii. 19, 20, however, we have the following: "Thou shalt not lend upon usury to thy brother, usury of money, usury of victuals, usury of any thing that is lent upon usury. Unto a stranger thou mayest lend upon usury, but unto thy brother thou shalt not lend upon usury: that the Lord thy God may bless thee in all that thou settest thine hand to, in the land whither thou goest to possess it." In this place the Lord seems to tolerate usury towards strangers; that is, the Canaanites, and other people devoted to subjection, but not toward such strangers against whom the Hebrews had no quarrel, and against whom the Lord had not denounced his judgments. To exact usury is here, according to Ambrose, an act of hostility; it was a kind of waging war with the Canaanites, and of ruining them by means of usury. The true inference seems to be, that God did indeed tolerate, but not approve, the usury which the Hebrews received from the Canaanites. He allowed thus much to the hardness of their hearts, because it could not be entirely prevented.

Our Saviour has revoked all such tolerations, which obtained under the old law, Luke vi. 30—33.

I. UZ, the eldest son of Aram, and grandson of Shem, is thought to have peopled Trachonitis, a province beyond Jordan, having Arabia Deserta east, and Batanea west. The ancients say, that Uz founded the city of Damascus; and the Arabians affirm, that Uz had Ad for a son, who was father of a people called Adites, in Arabia Felix.

II. UZ, LAND OF. Eusebius and Jerome assure us, that, according to the tradition of the people of Palestine, and around it, the city of Astaroth-Carnaim was the place of Job's habitation; but Astaroth-Carnaim was beyond Jordan, between Mahanaim and Esdrai, on the Jabbok. Others suppose he lived in the city of Bozra, the capital of Idumea; but Calmet, who thinks that Job may be the Jobab mentioned in Gen. xxxvi. 33, 34, and 1 Chron. i. 43, 44, believes that the city of Dinbahah, in Moab, was the country which Scripture assigns for Job's dwelling-place.

Dr. Good, in one of the dissertations prefixed to his translation of the Book of Job, has bestowed much labor on this question. The following extract cannot fail to be acceptable to the reader:—"The immediate district of Arabia to which the ensuing poem directs our attention, is the land of Uz, which by some geographers has been placed in Sandy, and by others in Stony, Arabia. Bochart took a lead in the former opinion, and has been powerfully supported by Spanheim, and the writers of that very excellent work, the Universal History. The general argument is as follows: Ptolemy has described a region which he calls Æsita, as situated in this very province, bounded by the Cauchabeni, who inhabited the southern banks of the Euphrates, on the north, and by the mountains of Chaldea on the east; and as the Septuagint, and the Greek writers generally, translate Uz by Αυσίταις, Ausitis, there is a probability, it is contended, that the Ausitis, or Ausitai, of the poem of Job, was the same as the Æsita of Ptolemy; a probability which is considerably strengthened by our finding, in Ptolemy's delineation of this same province, three districts, denominated Sabe, Thema, and Bustitis, very closely corresponding in sound with the Sabæa, Teman, and Buz of the same poem. In addition to which, we are expressly told, in the very opening of the poem, that the country was often infested by hordes of Chaldean banditti, whose mountains form the boundary line between the Ptolemaic Æsitiæ and Chaldea. In consequence of which it is ingeniously conjectured that the land of Uz and of Buz, the Æsitiæ and Busitis of Ptolemy, were respectively peopled and named from Uz and Buz, two of the sons of Nahor, and consequently nephews of Abraham, the residence of whose father, Terah, was at Haran, or Charra, on the opposite bank of the Euphrates, and necessarily, therefore, in the neighborhood of Æsitiæ.

"Yet, this hypothesis can by no means be reconciled with the geography of the Old Testament, which is uniform in placing the land of Uz, or the Ausitis of the Septuagint, in Stony Arabia, on the south-western coast of the lake Asphaltites, or the Dead sea, in a line between Egypt and Philistia, surrounded by Kedar, Teman and Midian, all of them districts of Stony Arabia; and, as though to set every remaining doubt completely at rest, situated in Idumea, or the land of Edom or Esau, (of whose position there can be no question,) and comprising so large a part of it, that Idumea and Ausitis, or the land of Uz, and the land of Edom, were convertible terms, and equally employed to import the same region. Thus Jeremiah: (Lam. iv. 21.) 'Rejoice, and be glad, O daughter of Edom, that dwellest in the land of Uz.' Whence Eusebius: 'Idumea is the region of Esau, surnamed Edom; it is that part which lies about Petraea, (Stony Arabia,) now called Gabalene, and with some writers is the Ausitis, or country of Job;' an opinion advanced with great modesty, considering that he himself appears to have concurred in it.

"In effect, nothing is clearer than that all the persons introduced into the ensuing poem were Idumeans, dwelling in Idumea; or, in other words, Edomite Arabs. These characters are, Job himself, of the land of Uz, Eliphaz of Teman, a district of as much repute as Uz; and, upon the joint testimony of Jeremiah, (xlix. 7, 20.) Ezekiel, (xxv. 13.) Amos (i. 11, 12.) and Obadiah, (v. 8, 9.) a part, and principal part, of Idumea; Bildad of Shuah, always mentioned in conjunction with Sheba and Dedan, the first of which was probably named after one of the brothers of Joktan or Kahtan, and the two last from two of his sons, all of them being uniformly placed in the vicinity of Idumea; Zophar of Naama, a city importing pleasantness, which is also stated by Joshua (xv. 21, 41.) to have been situated in Idumea, and to have lain in a southern direction, towards its coast, or the shores of the Red sea; and Elihu of Buz, which, as the name of a place, occurs only once in Sacred Writ, but is there mentioned in conjunction with Teman and Dedan, (Jer. xxv. 23.) and hence necessarily, like themselves, a border city upon Ausitis, Uz, or Idumea.

"Nothing, therefore, appears clearer, than that the Uz, or Ausitis, mentioned in the ensuing poem, must have been situate in Stony, and not in Sandy, Arabia; and that the Æsitis of Ptolemy could not have been the same place. In reality, to make it so, Bochart and those who advocate his opinion are obliged to suppose, first, a typographical error of Æsitis for Ausitis in the text of Ptolemy; and next, that the position of Æsitis itself is not correctly laid down in Ptolemy's delineation, which they admit ought to be placed in a higher northern latitude, by nearly two degrees. Uz, Buz, Teman, Dedan and Seba are names not unfrequent in the earlier part of the Hebrew Scriptures; and hence it is by no means difficult to suppose that, in different provinces of the same country, similar names may have been given to different districts or cities. And it is highly probable that the Seba of Ptolemy was so denominated, not from the son of Abraham of this name by Keturah, but from one of the descendants of Cush, who had a son of the name of Seba, and two grandsons named Shebah and Dedan, (Gen. x. 7.) and who in various places are incidentally stated to have travelled towards the eastern parts of Happy Arabia, and consequently in the very track in which the Seba of Ptolemy is situated; a probability very strongly corroborated from the name of Raamah, the father of Sheba and Dedan, being also mentioned by Ezekiel, (xxvii. 22.) as that of a celebrated commercial city lying in the same track, by the Septuagint written Ριγυα, Rhegma; and from the same name, with the Septuagint mode of spelling it, occurring in Ptolemy, at no great distance from his Seba.

"It only remains to be observed, that allowing this chorography to be correct, there is no difficulty in conceiving that hordes of predatory Chaldeans, and even of the Sabæans of Ptolemy, should occasionally have infested the country of Idumea, and carried off the camels of Job, unlimited as they were in their roving, and addicted to general plunder, perhaps, as bishop Lowth conjectures, over the whole extent of country from the Euphrates to Egypt.

"In few words, the country which forms the scene of the poem before us, was almost as richly endowed with names as ancient Greece, and, in many respects, from causes not dissimilar. It was first called Horitis, or the land of the Horim, or Horites, in consequence, as is generally supposed, of its having been first possessed and peopled by a leader of the name of Hor, and his tribe or family. Among the descendants of Hor, one of the most distinguished characters was Seir; and from his era it was better known by the name of the land of Seir. This chieftain had a numerous family of sons and grandsons: among the most signalized of the latter was Uz, or Utz; and from him, and not from Uz the son of Nahor, it seems to have been called Ausitis, or the land of Uz. The family of Hor, Seir, or Uz, were at length, however, dispossessed of the entire region, by Esau, or Edom; who, already powerful on his entering Arabia, rendered himself still more so by a marriage with one of the daughters of Ismael; and the conquered territory was now denominated Idumea, or the land of Edom, under which name it has been generally recognized by the Greek writers."

UZAL, the sixth son of Joktan, (Gen. x. 27; 1 Chron. i. 21.) is commonly placed in Arabia Felix.

UZZAH, son of Abinadab, (2 Sam. vi.) a Levite, who, with his brother, Ahio, conducted the new cart, on which the ark of the covenant was brought from Kirjath-jearim to Jerusalem. When they arrived at Nachon's thrashing-floor, Uzzah stretched out his hand to support the ark of God, which seemed to him to be in danger of falling, because of the stumbling of the oxen. In consequence of this, the anger of the Lord smote him, and he died on the place.

Critics are much divided about the occasion of the death of Uzzah; and as the history, being related very succinctly, is liable to be misunderstood, it may be proper to notice,

(1.) That the law (Exod. xxv. 14.) ordered the ark to be carried on the shoulders of Levites, whereas, in this instance, it was drawn by oxen, on a cart, as if this carriage by beasts were good enough for it: it was hereby assimilated to the processions of the heathen, who drew their gods about in carriages.

(2.) The ark ought to have been enveloped, wholly concealed, by the priests, before the Levites approached it: whereas, no priest attended this procession. Was it carried openly, exposed to view as it was by the Philistines? 1 Sam. vi. 13—19. Uzzah, being a Levite, ought to have known these rules, and being the principal in conducting the procession, and, as may be supposed, the elder brother, he was principally guilty; Abio being subordinate to him.

(3.) It is likely, that the oxen drew it safely while in a straight road, but when they came to the thrashing-floor, one or both of them became restiff and stumbled, which, provoking Uzzah, put him off his guard.

[This solution seems to be most in accordance with the words of David afterwards, when about to bring the ark from the house of Obed-edom to Zion, 1 Chron. xv. After saying (verse 2) that "none ought to carry the ark of God but the Levites," he summons all the priests and Levites to assist in the removal of it, and then says, (verse 13,) "Because ye did it not at the first, the Lord our God made a breach upon us, for that we sought him not after the due order." This is said in evident allusion to the breach made upon Uzzah, i. e. the breaking forth of God's anger against Uzzah, 2 Sam. vi. 8, and 1 Chron. xiii. 11. R.

VEI

VANITY is put (1.) for vain glory, or pride, which inflates men with a great opinion of themselves; boasting, or self-conceit, Ps. cxix. 37; 2 Pet. ii. 18; (2.) for lying, Ps. iv. 2; (3.) for mere emptiness, Eccles. i; Ps. cxliv. 4; (4.) for idols, Deut. xxxii. 21; 2 Kings xvii. 15; Jer. ii. 5; (5.) for wantonly, unnecessarily, &c. Exod. xx. 7. (6.) Vain is opposed to true, real, substantial. Ps. v. 10, "Their heart is vain, or full of vanity and lying." Ps. xii. 2, They have deceived their neighbors by vain discourses, by words of deceit and lies. To lift up the soul to vanity. (Ps. xxiv. 4.) is, to swear vainly and falsely.

VASHTI, a wife of Ahasuerus, divorced by him, in favor of Esther. See ESTHER, and AHASUERUS.

VEIL, a kind of scarf or mantle, with which females in the East cover the face and head.

In the history of Abimelech and Sarah, (Gen. xx. 16.) the veil is by some supposed to be described by the circumlocution of "a covering to the eyes." [But the phrase "covering to the eyes" refers evidently to the money given by Abimelech, viz. the thousand pieces of silver, which were to be a covering to the eyes of others, i. e. an atoning present, a testimony of her innocence in the eyes of all. See ABIMELECH I. R.

It is related of Moses, (Exod. xxxiv. 33.) that after coming down from the mount, "the skin of his face shone;" so that, in order to quiet the minds of the people, "he put a veil over his face." This veil is called מסכה, masveh, and seems to denote not a close texture, but a loosely woven, or open net-work material. This idea shows the propriety of the application of a like word in Isa. xxv. 7, "The Lord shall take away, in this mountain, the superficial wrapper, covering close up, which is upon all nations, whereby they are totally precluded from correct knowledge of God; as well as the veil of a looser texture, (masveh,) the spreading spread over all people; which permits some small glimpse (by natural conscience, Rom. ii. 14, 17) of the divine excellences to pass through it; affording, not a clear view, but a confused perception, to those who wish to examine beyond it. This seems to be the very idea of the apostle, 2 Cor. iii.

VEIL

12, 13:—"We use great openness, and plainness of speech, in discovering the gospel to you; not as Moses did, who put a net-work veil over his face, so that Israel could not look steadfastly—to the end—fully—thoroughly, entirely, into that which was to be abolished; they could see a part, but not the whole; they saw it as it were through the meshes of the network, but not clearly, distinctly; they discerned ill-definedly, not, as you may do, punctually, for we do not use the slightest prevention of sight;—and this veil, which admits but such imperfect views of things, continues still upon their heart, but shall be removed; so that they shall see all things clearly, when that heart shall turn to the Lord." [The distinction here made exists only in the fancy of the writer. R.

There is a kind of veil or garment mentioned in Ruth iii. 15, named מִטְפָּחַת, mitpahhath, which, by the expression of Boaz, it should seem, Ruth wore upon her person. It appears also not to have been very large, as Ruth held it open, to receive six measures of barley. Besides, as she carried this quantity, it could not have been extremely heavy, and yet it is most likely Boaz nearly or altogether filled it. A word, very closely allied to this, if not the very same, with a Chaldee variation, is used, Ezek. xiii. 18, to denote a veil, (Eng. trans. "kerchief" from the French couvre-chef), which is expressly said to be worn on the head; consequently, it is not the neck couvre-chef of our females; as otherwise might have been thought.—"Wo to the women who adapt cushions to all reclining arms, and who compose veils (מִטְפָּחַת) to be worn upon the head of females of all statures, in order to render them more alluring, for purposes of voluptuousness, to hunt souls—persons: . . . I will tear away the pillows from your lolling arms; your kerchiefs also will I tear, that they may no longer adorn you; and will let go the (male) souls—persons, whom you have hunted, and caught in your toils." q. d. "Some of my people you worry and seduce by voluptuous attractions and solicitations; others you chase and pursue, till they are terrified, to answer your criminal purposes: but from both these methods of attack will I deliver them; and I will punish you."

From this use of this kind of veil, it appears that it was esteemed a very ornamental part of the head-dress; and herein it agrees with the directions of Naomi to Ruth, to dress herself to advantage. It was, perhaps, not, therefore, a veil to be taken off and put on, but was constantly worn on the head, and has, possibly, its representatives in the modern caps or turbans of our young women.

We read, Gen. xxiv. 65, that Rebekah, seeing Isaac advancing towards her, covered herself with a veil, or rather with the veil, (הַצֵּיִף, hats-tsâiph), either, (1.) that which it was customary for brides to wear, or, (2.) that which had been provided for her at home: if these ideas may coalesce into one, then this was provided at home, for Rebekah to wear as a bridal veil. That it was used for that purpose in her intention, is certain; but was it adopted on account of haste? or was it that veil which due formality required? This question is rendered perplexing, by the same word being used in the history of Tamar, who "put away the garments of her widowhood, and covered up herself in a tsâiph;" whence, it seems, this was not a widow-like dress, or dress of grief, but of joy; yet it could hardly be the regular bridal veil, (notwithstanding Mr. Harmer thinks it was,) for what could any observer, or bystander, think might induce a BRIDE to sit as Tamar sat, "like a harlot, by the way side?"—Besides, could Judah think her a bride, and yet make such proposals as he did to her? It is, therefore, likely, that this veil was worn by Chaldean women, or stranger women—foreigners to the country of Canaan; hence it seems to be certain, that Rebekah brought with her that kind of veil which in her own country would have been esteemed honorable, on any occasion; and Tamar, (a Canaanitess,) by wearing such a veil, appeared to Judah to be a foreigner—a stranger-woman—who had strayed from her associates, or whose living depended on the disposal of her person.

[Another Hebrew word rendered veil in the English version, is רָדִיד, râdid, which, however, seems properly to denote a fine upper garment or mantle, which females were accustomed to throw over their other garments when they went out, Cant. v. 7; Isa. iii. 23. The Greek word ἐξουσία, power, which is also thus translated in 1 Cor. xi. 10, seems there more properly to be put for emblem of power or of honor and dignity, i. e. a veil. Thus, Paul says, should be worn by females in the churches, on account of the angels. Who are these? Some say, the angels of the churches, i. e. the bishops. Others, better, the messengers, i. e. spies of the heathen, evil-minded persons, who frequent the assemblies in order to spy out irregularities. Others, still, take angels in the usual sense, and consider Paul as representing the angels of heaven as beholding with deep interest the devotions of Christian assemblies. R.

These remarks will have prepared the way for noticing some of the eastern ideas attached to the veil.

In the first place, it is proper to notice the affront committed against a female in the East, by lifting up her veil. We might quote from Schultens, who shows, from Arabian writers, that the image of tearing or taking away the veil expresses the unhappy state of eastern virgins, when affronted, violated and insulted. So Cabilah, the mother of Khalife Motaz, complained of Saleh, the Turkish chief, "He has torn my veil;" to express with decency, "He has dishonored me;" but we rather appeal to the story of Susanna, in the Apocrypha, as best adapted to the following illustration. The writer notices as an act of ill treatment, "Now Susanna was a very delicate woman, and beautiful to behold; and these wicked men commanded to UNCOVER HER FACE, (for she was covered), that they might be filled with her beauty. Therefore, her friends, and all that saw her, wept;" i. e. the elders unveiled her from impure motives.

Many have been the inquiries to which the precept of our Lord in Matt. v. 28, has given occasion: "Who-soever looketh on a woman, to lust after her, hath committed adultery with her already in his heart." Great stress has usually been laid on the motive, and very justly; but Lardner and others insist, that zurâzu must be taken for a married woman, as is common enough; nevertheless, the true import of the passage, Mr. Taylor thinks, can only be understood, by considering the closely covered state of the eastern women, under their veils, in which, being totally concealed, they offer no occasion of being LOOKED UPON; but would take it as the greatest insolence—as nothing short of the greatest insolence could dictate the offence—should their veils be drawn aside. Understand, therefore, the passage thus: "You have heard that it was said in ancient times, Thou shalt not commit adultery: but I say to you, that my purer principles forbid the most remote advance toward that crime, any commencement of what may lead to it; whoever removes the veil, to look on any woman, (whether married or unmarried, whether of rigid or of easy virtue,) if he violate modesty by such a liberty for excitative purposes, he has sullied his spiritual purity, and is guilty." Is not this the true import of the term to LOOK ON, on which the question turns? [But does not this minuteness of meaning detract much from the force of our Lord's precept? Cannot a man, according to our Lord's idea, just as much commit adultery or fornication in his heart by casting his eyes upon a woman to lust after her, or even in thinking of her, as by actually tearing away her veil to look upon her? Away, then, with such trifling! R.

In the Fragments from which these remarks are selected, and some others which follow, (Nos. 159—165), are collected from various travellers the most ample accounts of the forms of eastern veils, and of the manner in which they are worn. From these accounts it is manifest that it is a most important part of female dress, and is frequently alluded to, where not distinctly or apparently spoken of in Scripture.

VERSIONS OF THE SCRIPTURES. Our attention must be confined, in this article, to those which are more usually denominated the ANCIENT VERSIONS. These are the following: The Greek versions, of which the SEPTUAGINT or Alexandrine version is the chief; the Latin versions, viz. the VULGATE and Itala; the Chaldee versions, or TARGUMS; the Samaritan version; the Peshito and other Syriac versions; and the Arabic versions.

After the Hebrew had ceased to be spoken, and had become a dead language, in the second century before Christ, and still more after the spread of Christianity, translations of the Hebrew Scriptures into the prevailing languages of the age, became a thing of necessity, both to Jews and Christians, in Palestine and in other countries. Accordingly, almost every language then current received at least one version, which became of ecclesiastical authority, and was used instead of the original Hebrew text. In this way, there arose, almost contemporaneously, the Alexandrine version for the Grecian and Egyptian Jews, and the earliest Chaldee versions for those who dwelt in Palestine and Babylonia. After the introduction of Christianity, the Christians adopted at first the Septuagint; but in the second century there appeared three or four other Greek versions from the hands of Jewish and Christian translators, the object of which was to supersede the Septuagint. In this, however, they did not succeed; and these works are now lost. About the same time, the Syrian Christians made the Syriac version; and the Latin Christians procured a Latin version of the Septuagint, which at the close of the fourth century gave place to the version of Jerome, the present Vulgate. After the wide extension of the Arabic language in the seventh century, both Jews and Christians began to translate the Scriptures into Arabic also; the Jews out of the original Hebrew, and the Christians from the Septuagint. Indeed, this latter is the case with all translations of the Old Testament, made by the Christians, into the oriental languages.

The versions of the Scriptures are usually divided into the immediate, or those made directly from the original text, and the mediate, or those made from other versions. The latter are also sometimes called daughters of the former. It is only those of the first species which have any hermeneutical value; and those of the latter kind can only serve for aid in the verbal criticism of the versions from which they have flowed, and are indeed of no special importance, even here, except in the case of the Septuagint, the text of which has been so much corrupted.

The ancient translators possessed neither grammatical nor lexicographical helps, and followed, therefore, every where, exegetical tradition. As their object, too, was always practical, rather than a learned or scientific one, they are often apt to fail in the requisite degree of exactness; and sometimes also they interweave their own views and impressions in their versions. This last circumstance renders these versions less available as it respects exegesis; but makes them so much the more important as historical documents, in regard to the views of the age and of the sect to which they belong.

Septuagint, or Alexandrine Version. The Septuagint, or the version of the LXX, or the Alexandrine version, is undoubtedly the oldest of all the Greek, or, indeed, of all the versions whatever of the Old Testament. There was, it is true, a legend among the Fathers, that there had existed an earlier Greek version, in which Plato had read the Bible; but this is assuredly without foundation, and was suggested by the Fathers, in order to afford ground for the assumption, that Plato and the Greek philosophers had borrowed from Moses. (Clem. Alexandr. Stromata, i. p. 526, ed. Potter.) The origin of this version, like that of the canon, in some degree, is veiled in Jewish legends; according to which Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, from 284 to 246, B. C. having formed the wish, through the advice of his librarian, Demetrius Phalerius, to possess a Greek translation of the Mosaic writings for the Alexandrine library, sent an embassy to Jerusalem for this object, and obtained a Hebrew manuscript, and 72 learned Jews to translate it. These all labored together in the translation, which, after mutual consultation, they dictated to Demetrius. This legend is given in an epistle said to have been written by Aristæus to his brother in Alexandria, but which is spurious. Josephus also relates the story, lib. xii. 2. 2—14. The pretended epistle of Aristæus is found in Van Dale's Diss. sup. Aristæum, Amst. 1705; in H. Hody's de Biblior. Text. originalibus, Ox. 1705; in Josephi Opp. ed. Havercamp. Amst. 1726. The legend, as transmitted to us by the Fathers, is far more romantic. According to Justin Martyr, the 72 interpreters were distributed into as many separate cells, in which they were confined until they had completed each his separate translation, or 72 in all; and these, when afterwards compared, were found to agree verbatim throughout.

If, now, we leave out of view these later fabulous additions, still, even the earlier narrative of the Jews is full of improbability. An Egyptian monarch would hardly have thought it necessary to send an embassy to Jerusalem to obtain a manuscript; and the circumstance as related savors strongly of Jewish national self-complacency and pride. The most probable supposition is, that after the Jews had in great numbers settled down permanently in Egypt, and had, by degrees, forgotten in a great measure the Hebrew language, a Greek version of their Scriptures, and especially of the Law, or Pentateuch, became necessary for the use of their public worship in their synagogues and temple. (See ALEXANDRIA, p. 43.) This would be, in all probability, prepared under the authority of the Sanhedrin, which consisted of 72 members. Or this number, moreover, is a sort of round number, and might be used merely to denote a version made by many interpreters. Such a version would not improbably be received by Demetrius into the library; for we know that he set on foot a collection of all known codes of law, with reference to a new code contemplated by Ptolemy Lagus. The translation of the other books, besides the Pentateuch, seems to have taken place gradually, between this time and the birth of Christ. Of the book of Esther, it is said, in a note at the end, that it was translated under Ptolemy Philometor. The book of Daniel seems to have been translated last of all; on which account it is, perhaps, that this book is not contained at all in our manuscripts of the Septuagint. The translation of Daniel, in our editions, is that of Theodotion. The genuine Alexandrine version of Daniel was first discovered in the preceding century, and published at Rome, 1772, reprinted Gottingen, 1773.

The character of this version is different, according to the different books. It is easy to distinguish five or six different translators. The Pentateuch is best translated, and exhibits a clear and flowing Greek style; though it seems to have been made from a different and interpolated original text. The next in rank is the translator of Job and Proverbs; he indeed often misses the true sense, but still gives every where a good idea, and his style is like that of an original writer. The Psalms and the prophets are translated worst of all; often, indeed, without any sense. The version of Ecclesiastes is distinguished by an anxious literal adherence to the original.—Indeed, the real value of the Septuagint, as a version, stands in no sort of relation to its reputation. All the translators engaged in it appear to have been wanting in a proper knowledge of the two languages, and in a due attention to grammar, etymology and orthography. Hence they often confound proper names, and appellations, kindred verbs, similar words and letters, etc. and this in cases where we are not at liberty to conjecture various readings. The whole version is rather free than literal; the figures and metaphors are resolved, and there are frequent allusions inserted to later times and later Jewish dogmas; e. g. Isa. xiii. 21; ix. 12; xix. 18, 25; xxxiv. 14. Not unfrequently, too, particular references and allusions to Egypt, and Egyptian antiquities, are inserted; e. g. Isa. xix. The Greek of the Septuagint is that of the Jews in Egypt, a branch of the later Greek of the common people, and called usually ἡ κοινή, the common, or also the Macedonic-Alexandrine dialect. This common dialect, or vulgar language, spread itself, after the time of Alexander, over all the nations which spoke Greek, and was distinguished from the Attic, &c. by the circumstance, that it adopted much from the ancient Doric. It was first used as the language of books, in the version of the LXX, and is, hence, often called the Alexandrine dialect. From the mixture of Hebraisms which it received in the mouths of the Jews, who spoke Greek, i. e. the Hellenistic Jews, it is also named the Hellenistic dialect. The New Testament is written in the same dialect, but in a purer form. It is also the language of the Apocrypha and of some of the Fathers. The chief philological helps for the study of the Septuagint, are the concordance of Tromm, and the lexicons of the Old Testament by Biel and Schleusner.

The authority of this new version soon became so great, as to supersede the use of the original Hebrew among all those Jews who spoke Greek. In the Egyptian synagogues, indeed, the original Hebrew was still read along with the Greek version, but the common people no longer understood it. Even scholars, like Philo, no longer understood the national mother tongue, and held entirely to the Greek translation. In Palestine also, this became by degrees current, and was used along with the Chaldee versions, especially by the more learned, who were acquainted with Greek. This appears even in Josephus, and from the New Testament. In both, the version of the LXX seems to lie at the foundation; though the citations do not always accord with it, and the writers sometimes (e. g. Matthew) seem to have had the original before them. (On the citations from the O. T. see Surenhusius, βιβλος καταλλαγής, Amst. 713; also the Tracts of Owen and Randolph, as published at Andover, 1827.) From the Jews the reputation and authority of the Septuagint passed over to the Christians, who employed it with the same degree of credence as the original. It became of course the point of appeal in the controversies between Jews and Christians, and hence began to lose its consequence in the eyes of the former. As in those controversies the Jews often found themselves worsted, they declared that this lay solely in the Greek translation, and carried their appeal to the Hebrew original, and also to other versions, which they said were more literal. The Talmudists, among whom the ancient hatred against the Greek again awoke, proclaimed a curse upon the Greek law, or Pentateuch, and appointed a fast upon the day on which they supposed the translation to have been suggested.

The Text of the Septuagint has suffered greatly. Through the multitude of copies, which the very general usage rendered necessary, and by means of ignorant critics, the text of this version, in the third century, had fallen into the most lamentable state. In order to remedy this evil, Origen set himself to obtain a corrected text by means of a comparison of the original Hebrew and the other Greek versions. The plan which he adopted was, to place the original text and the different versions in parallel columns; by which means, also, he was able to give to the Christians, in their polemics with the Jews, the benefit of all the versions of the Old Testament in one view. This work was the celebrated HEXAPLA of Origen, ἑξαπλα sc. βιβλία, i. e. the Bible in six columns. It contained, besides the Hebrew text and the LXX, also the three later Greek versions of Aquila, Symmachus and Theodotion, described below, together with the Hebrew text, written in Greek letters. In order to emend the LXX, he compared the Greek with the original, in which he used the assistance of learned Jews. Where there was an omission in the Greek, he supplied it from one of the other versions, usually that of Theodotion; marking the additions with an asterisk at the beginning, and with the name of the translator at the end. Where the LXX had any thing too much, he let it stand, indeed, but marked it with an obelisk or dagger at the beginning, to denote its spuriousness. The whole work consisted of fifty rolls or volumes, and was afterwards seen and used by Jerome in the autograph; but was, not long after, lost, and exists now only in fragments.

These fragments have been collected, and published by Montfaucon, Paris, 1714, 2 vols. fol. reprinted in an abridgment by Bahrdr, Leipz. 1769—70. But the very plan adopted by Origen became, alas! in the sequel, the occasion of still more numerous, and greater corruptions of the Greek text of the Septuagint. The transcribers left out all the critical marks and signs which Origen had employed, but not the words which he had inserted in the text; so that the evil was worse than before.

The text which has come down to us from this source is called the Text of the Hexapla, or of Origen, in distinction from the earlier text, which is called the κοινή, the common, or the Greek Vulgate. In the manuscripts which exist at the present day, as also in the printed editions, these two different texts lie at the foundation, according as they follow the two principal manuscripts, viz. the Roman, or the Codex Vaticanus, the basis of which is the κοινή, or earlier common text; and the Alexandrine, from the Codex Alexandrinus, in the British museum at London, which exhibits more of the readings and interpolations of the Hexapla of Origen. Hence the editions of the Septuagint fall also into two classes, viz. those which follow the Codex Vaticanus, as the editions of L. Bos, 1709, and Reineccius, 1730, 1757; and those which follow the Codex Alexandr. as the editions of Grabe, Ox. 1707, and of Bretinger, 1730. A critical edition of the Septuagint, with a full collection of various readings from all the manuscripts, and also out of the versions which have flowed from it, was undertaken in England, by Dr. Holmes, towards the close of the last century. The book of Genesis was published in folio, in 1798; Exodus, 1801; Leviticus, 1802; Numbers, 1803; Deuteronomy, 1804; and the book of Daniel in 1805, just before the death of the editor. The work has since been continued by Dr. Parsons; Joshua was published in 1810; Judges and Ruth in 1812; and the six remaining historical books, in the five years following; thus completing the second volume. The work is still continued. (See, on the history of the Septuagint, Hody de Biblior. Textibus orig. Ox. 1705; and Fabricii Bibliotheca Græca, edit. Harles, vol. ii. iii.)

The principal mediate versions, which have been made from the Septuagint, are the Itala, or ancient Latin version, one of the Syriac versions, the Ethiopic, Egyptian, Armenian, Georgian or Grusinian, Slavonian, and several Arabic versions.

Other Greek Versions. In the latter half of the second century after Christ, there appeared, nearly contemporaneously, three new Greek versions of the whole Old Testament. The author of the first was AQUILA, a Jew by birth, whose translation, therefore, was adopted for use in many synagogues. The authors of the two others, SYMMACUS and THEODO-TION, were Jewish Christians. All these are more exact and literal than the LXX; they retain the figures and metaphors of the original; and none of them exhibit the arbitrary caprices of the Alexandrine translators. Aquila, especially, is in the highest degree anxious; he is often so literal as to destroy the sense; and expresses with the utmost care even the etymologies of the Hebrew. Symmachus, on the contrary, aims at a better Greek style. Theodotion is more eclectic, and he seems to have been wanting in a knowledge of Hebrew. Fragments of all these versions are found in the Hexapla of Origen, as published by Montfaucon. From Theodotion alone we have the whole book of Daniel extant, which stands in our editions of the Septuagint.

Of less importance are some anonymous Greek versions, which Origen denotes as the 5th, 6th and 7th. Of rather more value is a Græco-Samaritan translation, which was made from the Samaritan version.

In the latter part of the preceding century, a new Greek version of several books of the Old Testament was discovered by Villoison, in a manuscript in the library of St. Mark's cathedral, Venice; hence called the Versio Veneta, or Græcus Venetus. It comprises the Pentateuch, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations and Daniel. The Pentateuch was published by Ammon, Erlangen, 1790—91; the other books by Villoison himself, Strasburg, 1784. It follows slavishly the original, and the verbal interpretation of the Jews; even the Parasha or Jewish divisions of the text are given, and the pages of the manuscript run backwards, like the Hebrew; the Greek diction is in the highest degree affected. The translator is ever straining after a poetic and Attic style; along with which occur, nevertheless, the grossest mistakes in language and newly formed words. Jehovah he translates ἰσοτάρις. The translator was, most probably, a Byzantine Jew, of the middle ages.

Ancient Latin Version, or Itala. After Christianity had extended itself in the West, a Latin version of the Bible also became necessary. In the time of Augustin, there were several of these; although only one of them was adopted by the church, i. e. by ecclesiastical authority. This was called vulgata, (common, popular,) because it was made from the Greek common version, ἡ κοινή. In modern times this ancient Latin version is often called Itala, in consequence of a passage in Augustin: (de Doctr. Christ. ii. 15.) but the reading is there false, and it should be read usitata. This translation was made literally from the Septuagint, and gives, most conscientiously, even all the verbal mistakes of the Greek. There are still extant of it the Psalms, Job, and some of the apocryphal books, complete, besides fragments; these were all collected and published by Sabatier, Rheims, 1739—49, 3 vols. fol. As the manuscripts of this version had become by degrees very much corrupted, a revision of the Psalter and book of Job was undertaken, in A. D. 383, by Jerome, in pursuance of a commission from the Roman bishop Damasus; this is still extant, and called Psalterium Romanum, because it was introduced into the Roman diocese.

The modern Vulgate, or Jerome's Version. While Jerome was still employed in the revision of the ancient Vulgata, or Itala, he ventured to commence, also, a new version of his own, out of the original Hebrew; being induced to the undertaking partly by the counsel of his friends, and partly by his own feeling of the necessity of such a work. He began with the Books of Kings, and completed the work A. D. 405, with Jeremiah. While engaged in this work, he enjoyed the oral instruction of learned Jewish rabbins in Palestine, (see LANGUAGE, p. 609,) and availed himself of all the former Greek versions and of the Hexapla of Origen. His new version surpasses all the preceding in usefulness. The knowledge of Hebrew which Jerome possessed was, for the age, very respectable; and he also made himself master of the Chaldee. His manner of explanation connects itself very closely with that of the Jews; and his choice of Latin expressions is, for the most part, very happy. Still, this production did not meet with the anticipated success and general reception; and especially Augustin and Rufinus wrote against it with violence, as if a new Bible were about to be introduced. Nevertheless, the new version maintained itself along with the ancient one; and at length, in the seventh century, supplanted it almost entirely.

But the frequent and constant use of the new version now occasioned again, in turn, a very considerable corruption of the text; so that already in the time of Charlemagne, no copies entirely alike were any longer to be found. In order to remedy this evil, Charlemagne commissioned Alcuin to make a revision of the manuscripts of the new Latin version. Similar revisions of this version, (the Vulgate), were made occasionally during the whole of the middle ages, under the name of Correctoria. These are a kind of Latin Masorah, and consist of various readings, and all kinds of critical remarks. Only one correctorium has ever been printed, viz. at Cologne, 1508, 4to.

The Vulgate was the first book ever printed. The first edition is without date or place; the first with a date was printed at Mayence, 1462. At the council of Trent, in 1545, the Vulgate was declared to be the standard version of the Catholic church, and to be of equal authority with the original Scripture. Since this time, the study of the original text has been regarded by the Catholics as a verging towards heresy. (See LANGUAGE, p. 609.) The Vulgate at present consists of different elements; the Psalms and most of the apocryphal books being from the ancient version, or Itala, and the rest from the later Vulgate. The popes have taken great pains to obtain as correct a text of the Vulgate as possible; thus, in 1590, under Sixtus V., appeared the editio Sixtina, which was declared to be the standard for all future editions. But many errors being afterwards discovered in it, the popes purchased up all the copies, so far as possible, and a new standard, the editio Clementina, was published in 1592, which still retains its authority.

The Targums, or Chaldee Versions. All these are the works of Jews living in Palestine and Babylon, from a century before Christ, to the eighth or ninth century after. They bear the name Targum, i. e. translation, from the Chaldee תרגום, to translate. The name paraphrase, by which they are sometimes called, is unsuitable, since they are not all paraphrastic. That Chaldee translations were already in use in the time of Christ is apparent from Matt. xxvii. 46, among other passages, where the words are quoted according to the Chaldee version. The more ancient of the Targums are well translated, and may be reckoned among the best works of the kind. The later ones are more prolix and paraphrastic, and full of ridiculous interpolations. There are, in all, eleven Targums, of which the four following are the most important.

1. The Targum of Onkelos, containing the Pentateuch. The author was, most probably, a pupil of Hillel, the grandfather of Gamaliel, Paul's instructor. The style is pure, and the translation very exact and literal. (See Winer, de Onkelosso Pentat. Interp. Lips. 1820.)

2. The Targum of JONATHAN BEN UZZIEL, comprising the historical books and prophets. He lived a short time before the birth of Christ, but his work is far inferior to the preceding. It exhibits a multitude of arbitrary explanations, interpolations, and later views; especially such as tend to the honor of the Pharisees. (Comp. Gesenius Comm. zu Isa. Einl. § 11.)

3. The version of the Pentateuch, professedly by the same Jonathan, but which is spurious. It is hence called the Targum of PSEUDO-JONATHAN.

4. The Targum of JERUSALEM, on the Pentateuch. All these Targums are to be found in the rabbinic Bibles and the Polyglotts.

There are smaller separate Targums on the books of Daniel, Ezra and Nehemiah. A separate Targum on the Chronicles was first discovered at a later period in the library of Erfürth, and published by Beck, 1680—83, 4to.; and by Wilkins, Amst. 1715, 4to.

Samaritan Version. There exists a copy of the Pentateuch among the Samaritans, in the Hebrew language, but written with Samaritan letters. (See SAMARITANS, p. 810.) But besides this, there exists also a version of the Pentateuch in the Samaritan language. About the time of Christ's appearance, they had forgotten the ancient Hebrew, as much as the Jews of that age; and spoke instead of it a peculiar dialect, mixed up from Hebrew and Chaldee, but with many peculiar words. In this dialect the version is made, following their copy or recension of the Pentateuch. Nothing is certainly known respecting the age of this version, except that it had existed a considerable time before Origen's day; for this father cites a Greek version, which had already been made from the Samaritan. The Samaritan version itself is difficult to be understood, since, besides this, and some few poems, we have nothing in this dialect. The version stands in the Polyglotts; and Winer has written an essay upon it—De versione Samaritana, Lips. 1817. See Bibl. Repos. Vol. II. p. 720.

Syriac Versions. There are two of these, both of which are of Christian origin, having been made by Christians of the Syrian church, who dwelt in Mesopotamia and Armenia. The earliest and most celebrated of these is the Peshito, i. e. plana, simplex, or the clear, the literal. It is the regular version of the Syrian church, and of all its sects and parties, the orthodox and also the heterodox. The Syrian church regards this version as so exceedingly old, as to have been made, by command of king Solomon, for the church in Syria. What is certain is, that in the third century it already was the authoritative version of the church. The author was, possibly, a Jewish Christian, and has availed himself of the Chaldee version. The Peshito follows, in general, the Hebrew literally; but exhibits also traces of the occasional use both of the Septuagint and Chaldee. It stands in the Polyglotts; and a beautiful edition has also been published in England, under the superintendence of professor Lee.

The other Syriac version was made from the Septuagint, and from the text of the Hexapla, about A. D. 616, for the use of the Monophysites. It is of importance only for the criticism of the Septuagint. There is a complete manuscript of this version existing in the Ambrosian library at Milan. No portion of it has been printed, except Jeremiah and Ezekiel, 1787, and Daniel, 1788.

Arabic Versions. After the era of Mohammed, the Arabic became the mother tongue of most of the Jews, and of very numerous bodies of Christians, especially of those in Egypt. It is, therefore, no wonder that Arabic versions of the Scriptures were very soon felt to be necessary. Of these there are quite a number, flowing sometimes from the Hebrew, but chiefly from the Septuagint, and also from the Peshito and Vulgate. The most important and best known are the following:—

1. The Arabic version of R. SAADIAS GAON, director of the Jewish academy at Babylon, in the tenth century. It probably comprised, originally, all the Old Testament; but there have been printed only the Pentateuch and Isaiah, though some other books, e. g. Job, are extant in manuscript. This version is paraphractical, and resolves all the tropes and anthropomorphisms; in other respects it follows very closely our unpointed Hebrew text. The Pentateuch stands in the Polyglotts; and Isaiah was published by Paulus, in 1791.

2. The Mauritanian version of the Pentateuch, made in the thirteenth century, by an Arabian Jew, and published by Erpenius in 1629; hence called Arabs Erpeniana.

3. The Arabic version of the prophets, found in the Polyglotts, which was made from the LXX, apparently by a Christian of Alexandria, after the time of Mohammed. For the POLYGLOTTS, see BIBLE, p. 177. *R.

VETCHES, see FITCHES.

VIALS, see CENSER, p. 287.

VINE. Of this valuable and well-known plant there are several species, and there are many references to it in the sacred writings. It grew plentifully in Palestine, and was particularly fine in some of the districts. The Scriptures celebrate the vines of Sorek, Sibmah, Jazer and Abel; and profane authors mention the excellent wines of Gaza, Sarcpta, Libanus, Sharon, Ascalon and Tyre. The grapes of Egypt being particularly small, we may easily conceive of the surprise which was occasioned to the Israelites by witnessing the bunch of grapes brought by the spies to the camp, from the valley of Eshcol, Numb. xiii. 24. The account of Moses, however, is confirmed by the testimony of several travellers. Doubdan assures us, that in the valley of Eshcol were bunches of grapes of ten and twelve pounds. Forster tells us, that he was informed by a Religious, who had lived many years in Palestine, that there were bunches of grapes in the valley of Hebron, so large that two men could scarcely carry one. (Comp. Numb. xiii. 24.) And Rosenmüller says, "Though the Mahomedan religion does not favor the cultivation of the vine, there is no want of vineyards in Palestine. Besides the large quantities of grapes and raisins which are daily sent to the markets of Jerusalem and other neighboring places, Hebron alone, in the first half of the eighteenth century, annually sent three hundred camel loads, that is, nearly three hundred thousand weight of grape juice, or honey of raisins, to Egypt."

Bochart informs us that a triple produce from the same vine is gathered every year. In March, after the vine has produced the first clusters, they cut away from the fruit that wood which is barren. In April a new shoot, bearing fruit, springs from the branch that was left in March, which is also lopped; this shoots forth again in May, loaded with the latter grapes. Those clusters which blossomed in March come to maturity and are fit to be gathered in August; those which blossomed in April are gathered in September; and those which blossomed in May must be gathered in October.

In the East, grapes enter very largely into the provisions at an entertainment. Thus, Norden was treated by the aga of Essuauen with coffee, and some bunches of grapes of an excellent taste. To show the abundance of vines which should fall to the lot of Judah in the partition of the promised land, Jacob, in his prophetic benediction, says of this tribe, he shall be found—

Binding his colt to the vine,
And to the choice vine, the foal of his ass.
Washing his garments in wine,
His clothes in the blood of the grape.

Gen. xlix. 11.

It has been shown by Paxton, that in some parts of Persia, it was formerly the custom to turn their cattle into the vineyards after the vintage, to browse on the vines, some of which are so large, that a man can hardly compass their trunks in his arms. These facts clearly show, that according to the prediction of Jacob, the ass might be securely bound to the vine, and without damaging the tree by browsing on its leaves and branches. The same custom appears, by the narratives of several travellers, to have generally prevailed in Lesser Asia. Chandler observed, that in the vineyards around Smyrna, the leaves of the vines were decayed or stripped by the camels, or herds of goats, which are permitted to browse upon them, after the vintage. When he left Smyrna, on the 30th of September, the vineyards were already bare; but when he arrived at Phygella, on the 5th or 6th of October, he found its territory still green with vines; which is a proof that the vineyards at Smyrna must have been stripped by the cattle, which delight to feed upon the foliage.

This custom furnishes a satisfactory reason for a regulation in the laws of Moses, the meaning of which has been very imperfectly understood, which prohibits a man from introducing his beast into the vineyard of his neighbor. It was destructive to the vineyard before the fruit was gathered; and after the vintage it was still a serious injury, because it deprived the owner of the fodder, which was most grateful to his flocks and herds, and perhaps absolutely requisite for their subsistence during the winter. These things considered, we discern, in this enactment, the justice, wisdom and kindness of the great Legislator: and the same traits of excellence might, no doubt, be discovered in the most obscure and minute regulation, could we detect the reason on which it is founded.

But if the vine leaves were generally eaten by cattle after the winter was over, how, says Mr. Harmer, "could the prophet (Isa. xxxiv. 4.) represent the dropping of the stars from heaven, in a general wreck of nature, by the falling of the leaf from the vine? If they were devoured by the cattle they could not fall." The answer is easy: the prophet refers to the character of the vine-leaf, not to any local custom; nor is it reasonable to suppose that the leaves of every vineyard were so regularly and completely consumed, that the people had never seen them showering from the branches by the force of the wind; or the nipping colds in the close of the year. (Paxton, vol. i. p. 180.)

The law enjoined that he who planted a vine should not eat of the produce of it before the fifth year, Lev. xix. 24, 25. Nor did they gather their grapes on the seventh year: the fruit was then left for the poor, the orphan and the stranger. A traveller was permitted to gather and eat grapes in a vineyard, as he passed along, but was not permitted to carry any away, Deut. xxiii. 24.

In John xv. our Lord declares himself to be the "true vine." Doddridge, after Wetstein, has supposed that the idea might be suggested by the sight of a vine, either from a window or in some court by the side of the house; but this is controverted by Harmer, who remarks, that there were no gardens in Jerusalem, and that it is not likely there were vines about the sides of the houses. Harmer's assertion, however, is set aside by Dr. Russell, who states, that it is very common to cover the stairs leading to the upper apartments of the harem with vines. This fully explains the beautiful metaphor in Ps. cxviii.—"Thy wife shall be as a fruitful vine by the sides of thine house,"—with which Mr. Harmer is so much embarrassed: but whether such a vine gave rise to our Saviour's discourse, is a matter of great doubt. The intention of the similitude is that which it is most important for us to attend to and understand; which is, that no fruit can be expected from professing Christians, either in their personal or official character, but by perseverance in the appointed way, and in communion, by faith and love, with him who is the source of all that is good in man.

Rosenmüller has a long article on the parable, which Dr. Wait has translated in his "Repertorium Theologicum," and of which the following is the substance. After having remarked that the whole of the discourses in John xiii.—xviii. were not delivered in one place, and in an unbroken connection, he proceeds to show that the comparison of our Lord was not to a real or natural vine, since John always uses the adjective ἀληθινός, true, in opposition to something false, counterfeit, and not genuine; c. g. iv. 23; i. 47; viii. 31. "But what is the opposition in this passage, where Christ is denominated ἡ ἀμπελος ἡ ἀληθινή? It would be, according to the preceding expositions, a natural or real vine:—yet it will be urged, that this would have far greater claims to the ἀμπελος ἀληθινή than Christ, who only compared himself to such, and merely represents himself as an image of it. Since then he calls himself 'THE TRUE VINE,' he must necessarily have had a certain object in contrast, which represented a vine without being a natural or real vine, between which also and himself a most significant analogy existed." What this probably was, he proceeds to show.

In the temple at Jerusalem, above and round the gate, seventy cubits high, which led from the porch to the holy place, a richly carved vine was extended as a border and decoration. The branches, tendrils and leaves were of the finest gold; the stalks of the bunches were of the length of the human form, and the bunches hanging upon them were of costly jewels. Herod first placed it there; rich and patriotic Jews from time to time added to its embellishment, one contributing a new grape, another a leaf, and a third even a bunch of the same precious materials. If to compute its value at more than 12,000,000 of dollars be an exaggeration, it is nevertheless indisputable, that this vine must have had an uncommon importance and a sacred meaning in the eyes of the Jews. With what majestic splendor must it likewise have appeared in the evening, when it was illuminated by tapers!

If, then, Jesus, in the evening, after having celebrated the passover, again betook himself to the temple with his disciples, what is more natural, than, as they wandered in it to and fro, that above every thing this vine blazing with gold and jewels should have attracted their attention? that, rivetted by the gorgeous magnificence of the sight, they were absorbed in wonder and contemplation respecting the real import of this work of art? Let us now conceive that Jesus at this moment, referring to this vine, said to his disciples, "I am the true vine"—how correct and striking must his words then have appeared!—how clearly and determinately must then the import of them have been seen!

The Jews accounted the vine the most noble of plants, and a type of all that was excellent, powerful, fruitful and fortunate. The prophets, therefore, compared the Jewish nation and the Jewish church to a great vine, adorned with beautiful fruit, planted, tended and guarded by God, Jer. ii. 21; Ezek. xix. 10, seq.; Ps. lxxx. 9, 15, seq. God was the dresser of the vineyard; Israel was the vineyard and vine; (Isa. v. 1, seq.; xxvii. 2, seq.; Hos. x. 1.) every true Israelite, especially the heads and chiefs of the people, were the branches; (Isa. xvi. 8; Ezek. xix. 10.) the might and power of the nation were the full swelling bunches. The basis of the metaphor was ever the idea, that "Israel is the first, the most holy nation on the earth, that God himself is the founder and protector of it."

The curiously-wrought and splendid vine, above described, which Herod introduced into the temple, was a symbol of this peculiar, proximate and joyful relation in which God stood to Israel. The patriotic Jews, as they looked at it, thought with joy and pride of the high dignity and preëminence of their people. To go out and to enter under the vine, was a phrase, by which they denoted a peaceful, fortunate and contented life. Hence this ornament, extended over the entrance to the holy place, was as striking and full of meaning, as it was edifying to the orthodox Jews; hence, each contributed his own to increase its magnificence, and thus authenticate himself, as a worthy member of this holy and glorious nation.

Jesus having thus depicted himself as the individual who was prefigured by this vine, the ideas which he would express by this parable, could not have been misunderstood.

This parable, therefore, more immediately concerns the apostles. Jesus does not merely represent himself under the metaphor of a vine in the more confined sense of a teacher, but in the more exalted and comprehensive one of the Messiah sent from heaven to found a new kingdom of God. He considers his apostles as the branches in him, not merely as disciples and friends, but as deputies and assistants chosen and called by him to found and extend his kingdom. The connection which he would maintain between himself and them, consists not merely in love and friendship, but in the true execution of his commands, grounded on a faith in his exalted nature and dignity. The fruits which he expects from them are not merely faith and virtue, which are the concerns of all Christians, but important services in the extension of Christianity. And he incites them to perform them by a promise of divine grace and assistance.

The expression of "sitting every man under his own vine," (1 Kings iv. 25; Mic. iv. 4.) probably alludes to the delightful eastern arbors, which were partly composed of vines. Norden speaks of vine-arbors as being common in the Egyptian gardens: and the Prenestine pavement, in Shaw's Travels, gives us the figure of an ancient one. The expression is intended to refer to a time of public tranquillity and of profound peace.

In the passage of Isaiah to which we just now referred, there is mention made of a wild grape, which requires notice: "And he looked that it should bring forth grapes, and it brought forth wild grapes," Isa. v. 2. Jeremiah uses the same image, and applies it to the same purpose, in an elegant paraphrase of this part of Isaiah's parable, in his flowing and plaintive manner—But I planted thee a sorek, a scion perfectly genuine; how then art thou changed, and become to me the degenerate shoots of the strange vine! chap. ii. 21. By these wild grapes, or poisonous berries, שֶׂעִרִים, we must understand not merely useless, unprofitable grapes, such as wild grapes, but grapes offensive to the smell, noxious, poisonous. By the force and intent of the allegory, to good grapes ought to be opposed fruit of a dangerous and pernicious quality; as, in the explication of it, to judgment is opposed tyranny, and to righteousness oppression. Gephen, the vine, is a common name or genus, including several species under it; and Moses, to distinguish the true vine, or that from which wine is made, from the rest, calls it gephen hayayin, the wine-vine, Num. vi. 4. Some of the other sorts were of a poisonous quality, as appears from the story related among the miraculous acts of Elisha: "And one went out into the field to gather pot herbs, and he found a field-vine, and he gathered from it wild fruit, his lap full; and he went and shred them into the pot of pottage, for they knew them not. And they poured it out for the men to eat; and it came to pass as they were eating of the pottage, that they cried out and said, There is death in the pot, O man of God! and they could not eat of it. And he said, Bring meal; and he threw it into the pot. And he said, Pour out for the people, that they may eat. And there was nothing hurtful in the pot," 2 Kings iv. 39—41.

From some such poisonous sorts of the grape kind, Moses has taken those strong and highly poetical images, with which he has set forth the future corruption and extreme degeneracy of the Israelites, in an allegory which has a near relation, both in its subject and imagery, to this of Isaiah, Deut. xxxii. 32, 33.—

"Their vine is from the vine of Sodom,
And from the fields of Gomorrah:
Their grapes are grapes of gall;
Their clusters are bitter:
Their wine is the poison of dragons,
And the cruel venom of aspics."

"I am inclined to believe," says Hasselquist, "that the prophet here (Isa. v. 2, 4.) means the hoary nightshade, solanum incanum; because it is common in Egypt, Palestine and the East; and the Arabian name agrees well with it. The Arabs call it aneb el dib, that is, wolf-grapes. (The שֶׂעִרִים, says Rab Chai, is a well-known species of the vine, and the worst of all sorts.) The prophet could not have found a plant more opposite to the vine than this; for it grows much in the vineyards, and is very pernicious to them, wherefore they root it out: it likewise resembles a vine by its shrubby stalk." (Travels, p. 289.) But see GRAPES, WILD, p. 471,

The following scriptural account of the cultivation of the vine, the vintage and the wines of Palestine, which will doubtless be acceptable to the reader, is taken from the "Investigator."

The Jews planted their vineyards most commonly on the south side of a hill or mountain, the stones being gathered out, and the space hedged round with thorns, or walled, Isa. v. 1—6; Ps. lxxx. and Matt. xxi. 33. A good vineyard consisted of a thousand vines, and produced a rent of a thousand silverlings, or shekels of silver, Isa. vii. 23. It required two hundred more to pay the dressers, Cant. viii. 11, 12. In these, the keepers and vine-dressers labored, digging, planting, pruning and propping the vines, gathering the grapes and making wine. This was at once a laborious task, and often reckoned a base one, 2 Kings xxv. 12; Cant. i. 6; Isa. lxi. 5. The vines with the tender grapes gave a good smell early in the spring, (Cant. ii. 13.) as we learn also from Isa. xviii. 5, afore the harvest, that is, the barley-harvest, when the bud is perfect, and the sour grape is ripening in the flower.

The VINTAGE followed the wheat harvest and the thrashing, (Lev. xxvi. 5; Amos ix. 13.) about June or July, when the clusters of the grapes were gathered with a sickle, and put into baskets, (Jer. vi. 9.) carried and thrown into the wine-vat, or wine-press, where they were probably first trodden by men, and then pressed, Rev. xiv. 18—20. It is mentioned as a mark of the great work and power of the Messial, that he had trodden the figurative wine-press alone; and of the people there was none with him, Isa. lxiii. 3; Rev. xix. 15. The vintage was a season of great mirth. Of the juice of the squeezed grapes were formed wine and vinegar.

The WINES of Canaan, being very heady, were generally mixed with water for common use, as among the Italians; and they sometimes scented them with frankincense, myrrh, calamus and other spices; (Prov. ix. 2, 5; Cant. viii. 2.) they also scented them with pomegranates, or made wine of their juice as we do of the juice of currants, gooseberries, &c. fermented with sugar. Wine is best when old, and on the lees, the dregs having sunk to the bottom, Isa. xxv. 6. Sweet wine is that which is made from grapes fully ripe, Isa. xlix. 26. The Israelites had two kinds of vinegar: the one was a weak wine, which was used for their common drink in the harvest field, (Ruth ii. 14.) as the Spaniards and Italians still do; and it was probably of this that Solomon was to furnish twenty thousand baths to Hiram for his servants, the hewers that cut timber in Lebanon, 2 Chron. ii. 10. The other had a sharp acid taste, like ours; and hence Solomon hints, that a sluggard hurts and vexes such as employ him in business, as vinegar is disagreeable to the teeth, and smoke to the eyes; (Prov. x. 26.) and as vinegar poured upon nitre spoils its virtue, so he that singeth songs to a heavy heart, does but add to his grief, chap. xxv. 20. The poor were allowed to glean grapes, as well as corn, and other articles; (Lev. xix. 10; Deut. xxiv. 21; Isa. iii. 14; chap. xvii. 6; xxiv. 13; Micah vii. 1.) and we learn that the gleanings of the grapes of Ephraim was better than the vintage of Abiezer, Judg. viii. 2.

The vessels in which the wine was kept were probably, for the most part, bottles, which were usually made of leather, or goat-skins, firmly sewed and pitched together. (See BOTTLES.) The Arabs pull the skin off goats in the same manner that we do from rabbits, and sew up the places where the legs and tail were cut off, leaving one for the neck of the bottle, to pour from; and in such bags they put up and carry, not only their liquors, but dry things which are not apt to be broken; by which means they are well preserved from wet, dust or insects. These would in time crack and wear out. Hence, when the Gibeonites came to Joshua, pretending that they came from a far country, amongst other things they brought wine bottles, old and rent, and bound up where they had leaked, Josh. ix. 4, 13. Thus, too, it was not expedient to put new wine into old bottles, because the fermentation of it would break or crack the bottles, Matt. ix. 17. And thus David complains, that he had become like a bottle in the smoke; that is, a bottle dried and cracked, and worn out, and unfit for service, Ps. cxix. 83. These bottles were probably of various sizes, and sometimes very large; for when Abigail went to meet David and his 400 men, and took a present to pacify and supply him, 200 loaves and five sheep, ready dressed, &c. she took only two bottles of wine, (1 Sam. xxv. 18.) a very disproportionate quantity, unless the bottles were large. But the Israelites had bottles likewise made by the potters. (See Isa. xxx. 14, marg.; Jer. xix. 1, 10; ch. xlvi. 12.) We hear also of vessels called barrels. That of the widow, in which her meal was held, (1 Kings xvii. 12, 14.) was not, probably, very large; but those four in which the water was brought up from the sea, at the bottom of mount Carmel, to pour upon Elijah's sacrifice and altar, must have been large, 1 Kings xviii. 33. We read also of the water-jugs, or jars of stone, of considerable size, in which our Lord caused the water to be converted into wine, John ii. 6. See BOTTLES.

Grapes were also dried into raisins. A part of Abigail's present to David was 100 clusters of raisins; (1 Sam. xxv. 18.) and when Ziba met David, his present contained the same quantity, 2 Sam. xvi. 1; 1 Sam. xxx. 12; 1 Chron. xii. 40.

VINEGAR, see VINE, ad fin.

VIPER, a sort of serpent. See SERPENT.

VIRGIN, παρθενη, Almah, Παρθενος, properly signifies a young unmarried woman, and, by implication, one who has preserved the purity of her body.

The authors of the books of the Maccabees, and Ecclesiasticus, speaking of the young unmarried women, give them the epithets, kept in, secluded, hidden, to distinguish them from married women, who occasionally appear in public; and Jerome preserves a distinction between bethula, a virgin, and almah, in that the latter is one who never has been seen by men. This is its proper signification, in the Punic or Phœnician language, which, as is well known, is the same as the Hebrew. It occurs in the famous passage of Isaiah, vii. 14: "Behold a virgin [almah] shall conceive, and bear a son." The Hebrew [according to some] has no term that more properly signifies a virgin, than almah; but it must be admitted, without lessening, however, the certainty or application of Isaiah's prophecy, that sometimes, by mistake, for instance, a young woman, whether truly a virgin or not, is called almah. Jerome remarks, that the prophet declined using the word bethula, which signifies a young woman, or young person, but employed the term almah, which denotes a virgin never seen by man. This is the proper import of the word, which is derived from a root that signifies to conceal. It is well known that young women, in the East, do not appear in public, but are shut up in their houses, and in their mothers' apartments, like nuns. The Chaldee paraphrast and the Septuagint, translate almah by παρθενος; Akiba, the famous rabbin, a great enemy to Christ and Christians, who lived in the second century, understands it thus; the apostles and evangelists, and the Jews of our Saviour's time, explained it thus, and expected a Messiah born of a virgin; and, further, Mahomet and his followers acknowledge the virginity of the mother of our Lord.

[The above remarks are by Calmet. The English editor has subjoined a long discussion, in which he advances a theory (respecting Isa. vii. 14.) apparently his own, or at least unlike what any other person would be apt to strike upon. It is, however, so complicated, and rests on assumptions so obviously unfounded, that it would both be a waste of time to insert it here, and would only tend to mislead the reader.

Before entering on the consideration of the passage in question, a few words may be premised on the proper meaning of the Hebrew word almah, rendered every where virgin. The earlier interpreters all derive it from the Hebrew verb אלם, alam, to conceal, (so Jerome, as cited above,) with reference to the oriental custom of keeping young females shut up. But a more direct and far better etymology is found in the same word (alam) as employed by the Arabs, among whom it signifies to grow up; whence also they have derivative nouns, signifying adolescens and adolescentula, youth and young maiden (alámah); so also the Syriac álinéthá, from the same verb in Syriac. Hence derived, the idea of the Hebrew almah is young maiden, damsel, virgin, i. e. a young unmarried woman; without direct reference to chastity of person, although this is naturally implied. That this, however, is not necessarily to be understood, is obvious from Prov. xxx. 19, "The way of a man with a maid," where the Hebrew word is almah, which is properly rendered by the English word maid, in its general signification, and not its special one of virgo intacta.

The passage in Isa. vii. 14—16, stands thus: Ahaz having refused to ask a sign by which he may be assured of deliverance from the kings of Syria and Israel, the prophet exclaims: "Therefore the Lord himself shall give you a sign; behold a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel. Butter and honey shall he eat, that [until] he may know to refuse the evil and choose the good. For before the child shall know to refuse the evil and choose the good, the land that thou abhorrest shall be forsaken of both her kings." This prophecy Matthew quotes (i. 22.) as referring to the Messiah; and introduces his citation by the words, "Now all this was done, that it might be fulfilled," etc.

In regard to this passage of Isaiah, we may say, that it must obviously either be understood as wholly prophetic of the Messiah, or else as having no reference to him, but as relating merely to a sign to be given to Ahaz, viz. the birth of a son from the prophetess within a certain time, within the period of whose childhood the promised deliverance should take place. Between these two there would seem to be no middle way, which does not lead to inextricable confusion and absurdity—whether we suppose a change of subject, the prophet speaking sometimes of Immanuel and sometimes of Shear-jashub, which is mere hypothesis; or whether we suppose that the sign was to Ahaz alone, but consisted in the birth of a child from a virgin who had not known man—a supposition for which there is no hint in history, nor any ground of necessity or probability.

The Messianic exposition has been that of the church at large, in all ages, down to the middle of the eighteenth century; except that some have connected with it a double sense, making it refer both to the Messiah and to an event in the time of Ahaz, for which there seems no rational ground extant. Those who, since the middle of the last century, deny that the passage is prophetic of the Messiah, consider the word almah as signifying a young woman in general, whether married or unmarried; or at least they suppose that it might be employed of a young married woman, without a violation of usage. They suppose the wife of the prophet to be intended; and that the sign is, her conception and delivery of a son in accordance with this distinct and definite prediction;—the fulfilment of this prediction will be a sign to the king, that the promise of deliverance connected with it will also be fulfilled. They suppose that the history in the beginning of c. viii. is the narrative of this very fulfilment, where the prophet takes witness, and goes in unto the prophetess, and she conceives and bears a son; of whom it is said, "Before the child shall have knowledge to cry My father and my mother, the riches of Damascus and the spoil of Samaria shall be taken away before the king of Assyria,"—the same event which is predicted in c. vii. 16, as about to follow the birth of Immanuel. That in c. viii. 3, the father is directed to call the child Maher-shalal-hashbaz, instead of Immanuel, as in c. vii. 14, creates no greater difficulty, it is said, than Matt. i. 21; where, although this passage respecting the birth of Immanuel is quoted, yet the angel directs Joseph to call the name of Mary's son Jesus, and not Immanuel. It is asked, moreover, Of what value could a sign be to Ahaz, which was first to take place after 700 years? or what connection could this have with his deliverance from the invasion of the kings of Israel and Syria? Those who adopt this mode of exposition understand, of course, the citation of Matthew to be made merely by way of illustration, or as an allusion to a fact or circumstance of former history; just as in Matt. ii. 15, it is said of Jesus, "Out of Egypt have I called my son," quoted from Hos. xi. 1, where it refers simply and solely to the nation of Israel. It must indeed be admitted, that were the quotation in Matthew not extant, there would probably be nothing to suggest that this passage in Isaiah could have any reference to the Messiah.

But, on the other hand, it is very difficult to avoid the conclusion, that the evangelist intended here to cite this passage as a direct prophecy. In c. ii. 15, he merely says, "that it might be fulfilled;" or, as it may be rendered, so that there was a fulfilment, sc. in a higher sense, i. e. as God formerly called Israel his son out of Egypt, so now his own well-beloved Son, the Messiah. But here, in c. i. 22, the writer says expressly, "Now all this was done, that it might be fulfilled," &c. intimating that all the circumstances previous to the birth of Christ had a direct reference to this passage in Isaiah, and that this passage was directly prophetic of these circumstances. The language is as strong as possible: had the evangelist intended to express this idea with the utmost strength and plainness, he could not probably have selected any other language, or at least none stronger. With this view, too, coincide the other prophecies of the Messiah in Isa. ix. 6, and Micah v. 2, 3.

In respect to the objection, that if this is an announcement of the Messiah, it could be no sign to Ahaz, it may be replied, that the prophet directs his discourse not so much to Ahaz, as to the pious part of the people; Ahaz being, indeed, the representative of the whole nation. He had cast off the fear of God; the land was invaded; he had just contemned the promise of the Lord through his prophet. The people, or at least the pious part of them, feared the total destruction of the state. In these circumstances, the prophet reminds the people of their firm belief in the future appearance of a Messiah, and shows them that this belief is in contradiction with their present fear of the total downfall of the state. His language to them is: "Because the king has contemned the miraculous sign which I was commissioned to offer him, therefore God, through me, recalls to your minds that great event of the future, which is well known to you, although you now forget it, the miraculous birth of the Messiah. This may serve to you as a sign of present deliverance; for so surely as that event will take place, so surely can the state not now come to destruction."

The words of verse 16 have occasioned much difficulty: "Before the child shall know to refuse the evil and choose the good, the land that thou abhorrest shall be forsaken of both her kings." If the passage be taken as non-Messianic, these words are easy and natural; and they constitute, indeed, one of the greatest difficulties in the way of the other mode of exposition. The idea unquestionably is, that in the interval between the birth of the child mentioned, and the time when it will begin to distinguish between good and evil, i. e. an interval of 3 or 4 years, the kingdoms of Israel and Syria will be overthrown. But how could the prophet say this, if that child was the Messiah, who was to be born 700 years later? The best, and indeed the only solution, seems to be that of Vtringa, Lowth, Koppe, Hengstenberg and others, which is as follows: The prophet, beholding the future in vision, sees all things as if present; thus in c. ix. 6, he says, "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given;" so here we may with entire propriety translate, "Lo! the virgin conceives and brings forth a son," &c.—the prophet beholding, in vision, the future spread out before him as if present. So in announcing to Ahaz, or more properly to the pious part of the people, the approaching deliverance from invading enemies, with this same vision of the future spread out before his mental eye, he goes on to say, that in an interval not longer than that in which this child, whom he now thus beholds, shall learn to distinguish good and evil, this deliverance of the land shall take place; i. e. the prophet assumes the time between the birth of this child and the development of his faculties, as the measure of the time before the deliverance of the country from its enemies. He means to say, that in the interval of 3 or 4 years, the fall of both the hostile kingdoms will take place. This he expresses by saying, that this interval will be the same as the interval from the birth of the child whom he now beholds in vision, to the age when this child will be able to choose the good and refuse the evil." (See Hengstenberg's Christologie, Th. ii. p. 68, seq.) *R.

VISION, a supernatural presentation of certain scenery or circumstances to the mind of a person, while awake. (See DREAM, ad fin.) When Aaron and Miriam murmured against Moses, (Numb. xii. 6—8.) the Lord said, "Hear now my words: if there be a prophet among you, I, the Lord, will make myself known unto him in a vision, and will speak to him in a dream. My servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all mine house; with him will I speak mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches; and the similitude of the Lord shall he behold." The false prophet Balaam, whose heart was perverted by covetousness, says of himself, that he had seen the visions of the Almighty, Numb. xxiv. 15, 16. In the time of the high-priest Eli, it is said, (1 Sam. iii. 1.) "The word of the Lord was precious in those days; there was no open vision;" literally, "the vision did not break forth." Such communications were not vouchsafed to any prophet then existing.

TO VISIT; VISITATION. These words are sometimes taken for a visit of mercy from God, but oftener for a visit of rigor and vengeance; day of visitation, year of visitation, or time of visitation, generally signifies the time of affliction and vengeance; or of close inspection.

VITELLIUS, the censor, father of the emperor A. Vitellius, was made governor of Syria, at the expiration of his consulate, A. D. 35, and the same year, or the year following, he came to Jerusalem at the feast of the passover, and was very magnificently entertained. He released the city from a tax on fruits; committed to the care of the Jews the high-priest's habit, with the pontifical ornaments, which Herod and the Romans had kept, till then, in the tower Antonia. He deposed Joseph Caiaphas from the high-priesthood, and put in his place Jonathan, son of Ananus; but deprived him of his dignity two years afterwards, and conferred it on Theophilus, his brother. (Josephus, Ant. viii. 6.)

VOLUME, see BOOK.

VOW, a promise made to God of doing some good thing hereafter. The use of vows is observable throughout Scripture. Jacob, going into Mesopotamia, vowed the tenth of his estate, and promised to offer it, at Bethel, to the honor of God, Gen. xxviii. 22. Moses enacts several laws for the regulation and execution of vows. A man might devote himself or his children to the Lord. Jephthah devoted his daughter, (Judg. xi. 30, 31.) and Samuel was vowed and consecrated to the service of the Lord, 1 Sam. i. 21, &c. If a man or woman vowed themselves to the Lord, they were obliged to adhere strictly to his service, according to the conditions of the vow; but in some cases they might be redeemed. A man from twenty years of age till sixty, gave fifty shekels of silver, and a woman thirty. From the age of five years to twenty, a man gave twenty shekels, and a woman ten: from a month old to five years, they gave for a boy five shekels, and for a girl three. A man of sixty years old or upwards, gave fifteen shekels, and a woman of the same age ten. If the person were poor, and could not procure this sum, the priest imposed a ransom on him, according to his abilities, Lev. xxvii. 3.

If any one vowed an animal that was clean, he had not the liberty of redeeming it, or of exchanging it, but must sacrifice it to the Lord. If it were an unclean animal, such as was not lawful in sacrifice, the priest made a valuation of it, and the proprietor, if he desired to redeem it, added a fifth part to the value, by way of fine. They did the same, in proportion, when the thing vowed was a house or a field. They could not devote the first-born, because, in their own nature, they belonged to the Lord. Whatever was devoted by anathema could not be redeemed, of whatever nature or quality it was; if an animal, it was put to death; and other things were devoted forever to the Lord, Lev. xxvii. 28, 29. The consecration of Nazarites was a particular kind of vow, and had special rules. See NAZARITES.

The vows and promises of children were void, of course, except ratified by the express or tacit consent of their parents, Numb. xxx. 1—3, &c. Also the vow of a married woman was of no validity, except confirmed by the express or tacit consent of her husband. But widows, or liberated wives, were bound by their vows, of whatever nature. Deut. xxiii. 21, 22, "When thou shalt vow a vow unto the Lord thy God, thou shalt not be slack to pay it; for the Lord thy God will surely require it of thee, and it would be sin in thee. But if thou shalt forbear to vow, it shall be no sin in thee." (See Eccl. v. 3, 4, &c.) Paul had a vow of Nazariteship, when he left Cenchrea, (Acts xviii. 18.) and when he arrived at Jerusalem, James, the apostle, and the brethren, advised him to join four Judaizing Christians, who had a vow of Nazariteship, and to contribute to the charges of their purification in the temple, chap. xxi. 18, &c.

The vows of the Jews always implied a kind of imprecation against themselves, if they failed in the performance. Such vows were generally expressed in a distinct and plain manner, but the penalty was declared conditionally or hypothetically. For example, Ps. xc. 11, "I have sworn in my wrath, if they shall enter into my rest." I have sworn they shall not enter, and I have said, Let me be a liar—or something else, not expressed—if they do enter. David vows to the Lord to build him a temple, saying, "Surely I will not come [or if I come] into the tabernacle of my house—until I find out a place for the Lord, a habitation for the mighty God of Jacob." Where we observe, that he does not mention the penalty to which he becomes liable, should he fail of performing his vow: as if he had said, "Let God treat me with the utmost rigor, if I allow myself the least respite, till I have accomplished my design."

Sometimes they expressed the penalty, or imprecation, but directed it against their enemies, or against brute beasts. For example, "So and more also do God unto the enemies of David, if I leave a male, of all that pertain to him, by the morning light." He does not say, "May God treat me as a forsworn person, if I leave any one alive of the family of Nabal;" but, May God do so to the enemies of David, if I leave so much as a dog alive. Generally, the Scripture expresses the imprecation by, "God do so to me—and more also," &c. without specifying any particular penalty, or imprecation; whether it be that the person vowing did not express any, or that out of discretion he forbore to mention any; or that the penalty was so publicly known, being customary, that it was understood without being expressed. WALK, WALKING. This word, in Hebrew, signifies, not merely to proceed or advance, step by step, steadily, but to proceed with increased velocity: it signifies to swell out louder a musical note or voice, a crescendo, as musicians term it; and so, generally, to augment a moderate pace till it acquires rapidity. Under this idea, examine Isa. xl. 31: "The youths shall faint and grow weary, the young men shall utterly fail of their power; but they who wait on the Lord shall renew strength; shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary, they shall walk, shall increase their swiftness, augment their velocity, and not faint." The passage requires the admission of some idea to this effect, since walking after running is an anti-climax, and therefore could not be the poetical prophet's meaning.

To walk signifies the conduct of life, the general course of a party, his deportment, demeanor, &c. To worship and serve God truly, is to walk before him. Enoch walked with God, maintained and increased in piety towards him; so did Noah. God promises to walk with his people, and his people desire his influence, that they may walk in his statutes.

The pestilence is said to walk in darkness, spreading its ravages by night as well as by day. God is said to walk on the wings of the wind, and the heart of man to walk after detestable things. To walk in darkness, (1 John i. 6, 7.) is to be misled by error; to walk in the light, is to be well informed; to walk by faith, is to expect the things promised or threatened, and to maintain a conduct accordingly; to walk after the flesh, is to gratify fleshly appetites; to walk after the spirit, is to pursue spiritual objects, to cultivate spiritual affections, to be spiritually minded, which is life and peace.

WALL, an enclosure or separation. (See FENCE.) The Lord tells the prophet Jeremiah, (i. 18; xv. 20.) that he will make him as a wall of brass, to withstand the house of Israel. Paul says, (Eph. ii. 14.) that Christ, by his death, broke down the partition-wall that separated us from God, or rather the wall that separated Jew and Gentile; so that these two people, when converted, may make but one.

WAR. The Hebrews were formerly one of the most warlike nations in the world. The books that relate their wars are by neither flattering authors, nor ignorant, but inspired by the spirit of truth and wisdom. Their warriors were not fabulous heroes, but, commonly, wise and valiant generals, raised up by God, to fight the battles of the Lord; such were Joshua, Gideon, Jephthah, Samson, David, the Maccabees, &c. Their wars were not undertaken on slight occasions, nor performed with a handful of people. Under Joshua the affair was no less than the conquest of a country, allotted, by God, to Israel, from several powerful nations, who were devoted to an anathema; to vindicate an offended Deity, and human nature, debased by wicked and corrupt people of different nations, which had filled up the measure of their iniquities. Under the Judges, the purpose was to assert their liberty, by shaking off the yoke of powerful kings, who kept them in subjection. Under Saul and David, to these motives were added that of subduing such provinces as God had promised to his people.

In the latter times of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, we find their kings bearing the shock of the greatest powers of Asia, the kings of Assyria and Chaldea, Shalmaneser, Sennacherib, Esar-Haddon and Nebuchadnezzar, who made the whole East to tremble. Under the Maccabees, the business was, with a handful of men, to oppose the whole power of the kings of Syria, to uphold the religion of their fathers, and to free themselves from the despotism which designed to subvert both their religion and liberty. In the last times of their nation, with what courage, intrepidity and constancy did they sustain the war against the Romans, then masters of the world!

Under Moses and Joshua, the Israelites were all soldiers, and men bearing arms. They came out of Egypt in number 600,000 fighting men. When Joshua entered Canaan, he fought sometimes with detachments, and sometimes with his whole army. To signalize his omnipotence, and to humble the pride of man, God often gave victory to very small armies. For example, under Gideon, when he ordered that general to dismiss the greater part of his attendants, and only to keep with him three hundred men, with which he defeated an innumerable multitude of Midianites and Amalekites. SEE ARMIES.

We may distinguish two kinds of wars among the Hebrews. Some were of obligation, being expressly commanded by the Lord; others were free and voluntary. The first were such as those against the Amalekites, and the intrusive and wicked Canaanites, nations devoted to an anathema. The others were to avenge injuries, insults, or offences against the nation. Such was that against the city of Gibeah, and against the tribe of Benjamin; and such was that of David against the Ammonites, whose king had insulted his ambassadors. Or they were to maintain and defend their allies, as that of Joshua against the kings of the Canaanites, to protect Gibeon. In fact, the laws of Moses suppose that Israel might make war, and oppose enemies.

The first law of war is, that it should be declared to the enemy, and that reparation should be demanded for the wrong supposed to have been suffered, before the enemy is attacked, Deut. xx. 10, 11, &c. In the sacred writings, we have several examples of defiance, challenge, or declaration of war; and complaints of those who were attacked, without having had war formally declared. When the Ammonites by surprise attacked the Israelites beyond Jordan, Jephthah sent to inquire of them, "What hast thou to do with me, that thou art come against me, to fight in my land?" &c. Judg. xi. 12. When the Philistines entered the territory of Judah, to avenge themselves for the fire that Samson had put to their corn, the men of Judah came out to inquire of them, "Why are ye come up against us?" Judg. xv. 10, &c. They answered, they had no quarrel against any but Samson, who had destroyed their fields. The men of Judah promised to deliver up the guilty person, and the Philistines retired. Amaziah, king of Judah, puffed up with some advantages he had obtained over the Edomites, sent a challenge to Joash, king of Israel, saying, "Come, let us look one another in the face," 2 Kings xiv. 8—10. But the king of Israel, without disquieting himself about it, sent him a parable in answer: Amaziah would not hearken to his advice, and Judah was beaten. Benhadad, king of Syria, came with his army before Samaria, and sent to declare war against Ahab, king of Israel, saying, "Thy silver and thy gold is mine; thy wives, also, and thy children, even the goodliest are mine," 1 Kings xx. 1, 3. Ahab at first submitted, but Benhadad becoming more arrogant, Ahab determined to resist him, and the Syrian failed of his purpose.

When a war was resolved upon, all the people capable of bearing arms were assembled, or only part of them, according to the exigence of the case, and the necessity and importance of the enterprise; for it does not appear, that before the reign of David there were any regular troops in Israel. A general rendezvous was appointed, and a review made of the people by tribes, and by families. When Saul, at the beginning of his reign, was informed of the cruel proposal made by the Ammonites to Jabesh-Gilead, he cut in pieces the oxen belonging unto his plough-team, and sent dis severed members through the country, saying, "Whosoever cometh not forth after Saul and Samuel, to the relief of Jabesh-Gilead, so shall it be done unto his oxen," 1 Sam. xi. 1. (See COVENANT.) After this he marched to meet the enemy. When the children of Israel had heard of the crime committed by the inhabitants of Gibeah, against the wife of the Levite of Bethlehem, (Judg. xx. 8.) they resolved not to return to their houses till they had adequately punished it. They consulted the Lord, who appointed the tribe of Judah to lead the enterprise. They chose ten men out of every hundred, to bring provisions to the army, after which they proceeded to action.

In ancient times, those who went to war commonly carried their own provisions with them; hence the wars were generally of short continuance. When David, Jesse's younger son, staid behind to look after his father's flocks, while his elder brothers accompanied Saul in the army, he was sent by Jesse with provisions to his brothers, 1 Sam. xvii. 13. Each one also provided his own arms; for the kings did not begin to form magazines of warlike implements till the time of David.

The Officers of War were, (1.) The generalissimo of the armies, or the military prince, such as Abner under Saul, Joab under David, and Benaiah under Solomon. (2.) The princes of the tribes, or princes of the fathers, or of the families of Israel, who were at the head of their tribes. (3.) Princes of a thousand, or tribunes, captains of a hundred, heads of fifty men; also decurions, or chiefs of ten men. (4.) Shopherim, scribes or writers, a kind of commissaries, who kept the muster-roll of the troops; and, (5.) Shoterim, or inspectors, who had authority to command the troops under their inspection.

Machines of War, proper for besieging cities and fortresses, are of comparatively late invention. They are not mentioned in Homer; and Diodorus Siculus observes, (lib. ii. p. 80.) that Sardanapalus, king of Assyria, sustained a siege of seven years in Nineveh; because at that time machines fit for demolishing and taking cities were not invented. But about the same time we read, that Uzziah, king of Judah, had stored up in his magazines "shields, and spears, and helmets, habergeons, and bows, and slings to cast stones." And that "he made in Jerusalem engines invented by cunning men, to be on the towers, and upon the bulwarks, to shoot arrows and great stones, and his name spread far abroad, for he was marvelously helped, till he was strong," 2 Chron. xxvi. 14, 15. Here we have, perhaps, the first instance of machines of war, or, at least, of a collected armory of them. About seventy years after, in the sieges of Tyre and Jerusalem, Nebuchadnezzar used battering-rams and slings. The Hebrew רַם, car, (Ezek. iv. 1, 2; xxi. 22.) in Greek Καρίς, which Scripture uses to express this machine, signifies a real ram; by metaphor a machine, with which they battered down gates and walls of cities. Ezekiel, (xxvi. 8, 9.) speaking of this siege, alludes to the ancient manner of besieging places: "He shall slay with the sword thy daughters in the field, and he shall make a fort against thee, and cast a mount against thee, and lift up the buckler against thee. And he shall set ensigns of war against thy walls, and with his axes he shall break down thy towers."

When the ancients besieged a place, they usually surrounded it with mounds, towers and trenches, that the besieged might neither make sallies, nor receive succors from without. To lift up the buckler may intimate what the Romans called facere testudinem, to make a tortoise; when they caused their soldiers to close each other to join their bucklers, in the form of a tortoise, in order to sap the walls, to beat down gates, or to burn them. The engines of war here mentioned, or machines of cords, were the Balliste, or Catapulte, used for casting stones or darts; or great hooks fastened to cords, and thrown on the tops of walls, to tear them down. Of these iron hooks or fangs, may be understood 2 Sam. xvii. 13: "If he be got into a city, then shall all Israel bring ropes to that city, and we will draw it into the river, until there be not one small stone found there."

But besides open and violent modes of attack, the besiegers, whenever it was possible, practised the less evident, but not less fatal, method, of sapping and undermining the walls of a city: the besieged, on their part, also, adopted the same mode for purposes of resistance, with design of ruining the works of their adversaries; or of issuing from the city, either for sudden attack on their enemies, or for escape from the consequences of the siege, when they considered resistance as desperate. We have a history of such an attempt at escaping in Zedekiah, (Jer. xxxix. 4.) "who fled and went forth out of the city by night, by the way of the king's gardens, by the gate between the two walls;" but he was overtaken. In 2 Kings xxv. 4, it is said, "all the men of war fled by night, by the way of the gate between two walls, which is by the king's gardens (now the Chaldees were against the city round about).—Should not this rather be understood, "by the rough, rugged way, or track, between two walls;" that is, one wall below the other, around a part of the king's gardens; rather "between the defences," that is, of the city, in that part of the works of defence which went round the king's gardens; for, as the Chaldeans surrounded the city, they would certainly watch every gate; and Zedekiah would hardly have chosen to issue by a regular and customary passage, since he wished for secrecy, and to screen himself from observation; in which, apparently, he in some degree succeeded.

Thus understood, the history will agree with the figurative representation of it by Ezekiel: (chap. xii. 7.) "I brought forth my stuff, baggage, by day, as baggage for going into captivity; and in the evening, at twilight, I digged through the wall with mine own hand: I brought it—my baggage—forth, in the twilight: I bare it upon my shoulder," see verse 12. In like manner, Zedekiah passed over the precipices, or steps, and digged through a part of the defences of his city; and endeavored to escape at this breach made by his own hands, or his own order in his own fortification. Probably, too, Zedekiah carried about his person whatever of valuables he could convey from his palace; so that the resemblance to Ezekiel, in loading himself with baggage, was nearly, or altogether, perfect. It might be more complete than we are aware of, if Zedekiah digged through the wall of any part of his palace, as Ezekiel did of his house; in which we see no improbability; and he might also have a subterraneous passage of some length, before he issued from the wall into any open place.

WASHING, purification. See BAPTISM.

WASHING OF FEET. See under FOOT, and SANDALS.

WASHING OF HANDS was very frequent among the Hebrews. See BAPTISM.

Children were washed immediately after their birth. See BIRTH.

WATCH, a period of time. See HOUR.

WATERS denote, metaphorically, (1.) posterity, Numb. xxiv. 7; Prov. v. 15, 16; Isa. xlvi. 1.—(2.) indefinitely, a large concourse of people, Rev. xvii. 15.

Strange waters, stolen waters, (Prov. ix. 17.) denote unlawful pleasure with strange women. The Israelites are reproached with having forsaken the fountain of living water, to quench their thirst at broken cisterns; (Jer. ii. 13.) i. e. with having quitted the worship of God for that of false and abominable deities.

Waters sometimes denote afflictions and misfortunes, Lam. iii. 54; Ps. lxxix. 1; cxxiv. 4, 5; cxvii. 16.

Living waters, spring waters, running waters, streams; in opposition to waters that stagnate in a cistern, or in a lake, which are dead waters.

As in Scripture, bread is put for all sorts of food, or solid nourishment, so water is used for all sorts of drink. The Moabites and Ammonites are reproached for not meeting the Israelites with bread and water, that is, with proper refreshments, Deut. xxiii. 4. Nabal says, insulting David's messengers, "Shall I then take my bread and my water, and my flesh that I have killed for my shearers, and give it unto men, whom I know not whence they be?" 1 Sam. xiv. 11.

In Deut. xi. 10, it is said, the land of Canaan is not like Egypt, "where thou sowest thy seed, and waterest it with thy foot." Palestine is a country which has rains, plentiful dews, springs, rivulets and brooks, which supply the earth with the moisture necessary to its fruitfulness; whereas Egypt has no river but the Nile; and as it seldom rains, the lands which are not within reach of the inundation, continue parched and barren. To supply this want, ditches are dug, and water is distributed throughout the several villages and cantons, by the help of machines; one of which Philo describes as a wheel which a man turns with the motion of his feet, by ascending successively the several steps that are within it. But as, while he is thus continually turning, he cannot keep himself up, he holds a stay in his hands, which is not movable, and this supports him; so that in this work, the hands do the office of the feet, and the feet that of the hands.

WEDDING, see MARRIAGE.

WEEK. Among the Hebrews there were three kinds of weeks: (1.) Weeks of days, reckoned from one sabbath to another. [The Jews were accustomed, instead of the term week, to make use of the expression eight days; just as the Germans do at the present day; and just as we also say fortnight (i. e. fourteen nights) instead of two weeks. This remark serves to illustrate John xx. 26, where the disciples are said to have met again after "eight days," i. e. evidently after a week, on the eighth day after our Lord's resurrection. R.] (2.) Weeks of years, reckoned from one sabbatical year to another, and consisting of seven years. (3.) Weeks of seven times seven years, or of forty-nine years, reckoned from one jubilee to another.

WEEPING, see FUNERAL.

WEIGHTS. The Hebrews weighed all the gold and silver they used in trade. The shekel, the half-shekel, the talent, are not only denominations of moneys, of certain values, in gold and silver, but also of certain weights. The Weight of the Sanctuary, or Weight of the Temple, (Exod. xxx. 13, 24; Lev. v. 5; Numb. iii. 50; vii. 19; xviii. 16, &c.) was probably the standard weight, preserved in some apartment of the temple, and not a different weight from the common shekel; (1 Chron. xxiii. 29.) for though Moses appoints, that all things valued by their price in silver should be rated by the weight of the sanctuary, (Lev. xxvii. 25.) he makes no difference between this shekel of twenty oboli, or twenty gerahs, and the common shekel. Ezekiel, (xlv. 12.) speaking of the ordinary weights and measures used in traffic among the Jews, says, that the shekel weighed twenty oboli, or gerahs:—it was therefore equal to the weight of the sanctuary. Neither Josephus, nor Philo, nor Jerome, nor any ancient author, speaks of a distinction between the weights of the temple and those in common use.

Besides, the custom of preserving the standards of weights and measures in temples is not peculiar to the Hebrews. The Egyptians, as Clemens Alexandrinus informs us, had an officer in the college of priests, whose business it was to examine all sorts of measures, and to take care of the originals; the Romans had the same custom. Fannius, de Amphora; and the emperor Justinian decreed, that standards of weights and measures should be kept in Christian churches.

The following are the Jewish weights reduced to Troy:—

	lb.	oz.	dwt.	gr.
The Gerah, the 20th part of a shekel, . . . . .	0	0	0	12.
The Bekah, half a shekel, . . . . .	0	0	5	0.
The Shekel, . . . . .	0	0	10	0.
The Maneh, 60 shekels, . . . . .	2	6	0	0.
The Talent, 50 maneh, or 3000 shekels, 125	0	0	0	0.

A weight of glory, of which Paul speaks, (2 Cor. iv. 17.) is opposed to the lightness of the evils of this life. The troubles we endure are really of no more weight than a feather, or of no weight at all, if compared to the weight or intenseness of that glory, which shall be hereafter a compensation for them. In addition to this, it is probable the apostle had in view the double meaning of the Hebrew word cabod, which signifies not only weight, but glory: glory, that is, splendor, is in this world the lightest thing in nature; but in the other world it may be real, at once substantial and radiant.

WELLS, or SPRINGS, are frequently mentioned in Scripture. The Hebrews call a well beer; whence this word is often compounded with proper names, as Beer-sheba, Beeroth-bene-jaukan, Beeroth, Beerah, &c.

How little do the people of this country understand feelingly those passages of Scripture which speak of want of water, of paying for that necessary fluid, and of the strife for such a valuable article as a well! So we read, "Abraham reproved Abimelech, because of a well of water, which Abimelech's servants had violently taken away," Gen. xxi. 25. So, chap. xxvi. 20, "The herdsmen of Gerar did strive with Isaac's herdsmen; and he called the well Ezek, contention."—To what extremities contention about a supply of water may proceed, we learn from the following extracts:—"Our course lay along shore, betwixt the main land and a chain of little islands, with which, as likewise with rocks and shoals, the sea abounds in this part; and for that reason, it is the practice with all these vessels to anchor every evening: we generally brought up close to the shore, and the land-breeze springing up about midnight, wafted to us the perfumes of Arabia, with which it was strongly impregnated, and very fragrant; the latter part of it carried us off in the morning, and continued till eight, when it generally fell calm for two or three hours, and after that the northerly wind set in, after obliging us to anchor under the lee of the land by noon. It happened that one morning, when we had been driven by stress of weather into a small bay, called Birk bay, the country around it being inhabited by the Budoes, [Bedoweens,] the Noquedah sent his people on shore to get water, for which it is always customary to pay. The Budoes were, as the people thought, rather too exorbitant in their demands, and not choosing to comply with them, returned to make their report to their master. On hearing it, rage immediately seized him, and, determined to have the water on his own terms, or perish in the attempt, he buckled on his armor, and attended by his myrmidons, carrying their match-lock guns and lances, being twenty in number, they rowed to the land. My Arabian servant, who went on shore with the first party, and saw that the Budoes were disposed for fighting, told me that I should certainly see a battle. I accordingly looked on very anxiously, hoping that the fortune of the day would be on the side of my friends; but Heaven ordained it otherwise; for, after a parley of about a quarter of an hour, with which the Budoes amuse them till near a hundred were assembled, they proceeded to the attack, and routed the sailors, who made a precipitate retreat, the Noquedah and two others having fallen in the action, and several being wounded; they contrived, however, to bring off their lead," &c. (Major Rooke's Travels from India to England, page 52.)

This extract especially illustrates the passage in Numb. xx. 17, 19:—"We will not drink of the water of the wells:—If I and my cattle drink of thy water, then will I pay for it."—This is always expected; and though Edom might, in friendship, have let his brother Israel drink gratis, had he recollected their consanguinity, yet Israel did not insist on such accommodation. How strange would it sound among us, if a person in travelling should propose to pay for drinking water from the wells by the road-side! Nevertheless, still stronger is the expression, Lam. v. 4: "We have drank our own water for money;" we bought it of our foreign rulers, although we were the natural proprietors of the wells which furnished it.

WHEAT is the principal and most valuable kind of grain for the service of man, and is produced in almost any part of the world. It is comprehended under the general name of grain or corn. See CORN.

WICKED, vicious, sinful. "The wicked one," taken absolutely, is generally put for the devil: "Deliver us from the wicked or evil one" (Matt. vi. 13.); "Then cometh the wicked one, and catcheth away that which was sown in his heart," Matt. xiii. 19. The evil day (Ephes. vi. 13.) is the day of temptation, or trial; the day in which one is most in danger of doing evil. The evil eye signifies jealousy, envy, or sordid niggardliness, being opposed to liberality and charity. Or it may denote a grudging or malign aspect. In the East, they believe the eye to have great powers of striking the party looked on; and perhaps the phrase alludes to this: a mischievous, malignant, injurious direction of the eye; eye-shot, as our poets speak, "darting malignant fires."

WIDOW. Widowhood, as well as barrenness, was a kind of shame and reproach in Israel. Isaiah (iv. 4.) says, "Thou shalt forget the shame of thy youth, [passed in celibacy and barrenness,] and shalt not remember the reproach of thy widowhood any more." It was presumed, that a woman of merit and reputation might have found a husband, either in the family of her deceased husband, if he died childless, (see MARRIAGE,) or in some other family, if he had left children. It is true, indeed, that a widow was commended, who, from affection to her first husband, declined a second marriage, and continued in mourning and widowhood, as was the case of Judith.

It was thought the greatest misfortune that could happen to a man, to die, and not be bewailed by his widow, that is, without receiving the solemn honors of sepulture, of which the tears and praises of the widow made a chief part. The wicked and his children shall die, says Job, "and their widows shall not mourn for them," (chap. xxvii. 15.) and the psalmist, speaking of the lamentable death of Hophni and Phinias, observes, as a great disaster, that they were not bewailed by their widows, Ps. lxxviii. 64.

God frequently recommends to his people to be very careful in relieving the widow and orphan, Exod. xxi. 22; Deut. x. 18; xiv. 29, et passim. Paul would have us honor widows that are widows indeed, and desolate; (1 Tim. v. 3, &c.) that is, the bishop should have a great regard for them, and supply them in their necessity; for this is often signified by the veil to honor. God forbids his high-priest to marry a woman who is either a widow, or divorced, Lev. xxi. 14.

Formerly there were widows in the Christian church, who, because of their poverty, were placed on the list of persons to be provided for at the expense of the church. There were others, who had certain employments in the church; as, to visit sick women, to assist women at baptism, and to do several things which decency would not permit to the other sex. Paul did not allow any woman to be chosen into this number, unless she were threescore years old, at least, 1 Tim. v. 9. Such must have been married but once; must have produced sufficient testimony of their good works; must have given good education to their children; must have exercised hospitality, washed the feet of the saints, and bestowed succor on the miserable and afflicted. He forbids that young widows should be admitted among these, or, at least, among such as were on the church list for maintenance.

WILDERNESS, see DESERT.

WILL. Besides the common acception of this word, to signify that faculty of willing, with which we are endued; that is, of choosing, desiring and loving, it is taken, (1.) For the absolute and immutable will of God, which nothing can withstand,

Rom. ix. 19; Gen. i. 19, 20; Isa. xlvi. 10. (2) For a will not absolute and immutable; as when Christ desired that the cup of his passion might pass from him, if such had been the will of God, Matt. xxvi. 39. It is not the will of God, that the wicked should perish: (Ezek. xviii. 23.) "Have I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die, saith the Lord God, and not that he should turn from his ways and live?" But if he determine to perish, and refuse to be converted, God is not obliged to interpose, and to hinder him from perishing against his will. (3.) To do the will of God is put for keeping his law, submitting to his authority, Matt. vii. 21; xii. 50. Paul says, (Heb. x. 26.) "If we sin willingly, there remains no other sacrifice for sin." In the old law, sacrifices for the expiation of offences committed against the ceremonies of the law, were repeated as often as those offences were acknowledged. But, under the new law, those who fall voluntarily and wilfully into great crimes, are not to expect that Christ will come to die for them again: he died but once, and is not to die any more; neither is there to be any succeeding mediator. Those who fall into great crimes, it is true, may always hope for pardon, or may return and repent; but this remedy and this return are not easy. By those voluntary crimes mentioned by Paul, many understand final impenitence, hardness of heart, despair, or the sin against the Holy Spirit.

WILLOW, a very common tree, which grows in marshy places, with a leaf much like that of the olive. God commanded the Hebrews to take branches of the handsomest trees, particularly of the willows of the brook, and to bear them in their hands before the Lord, as a token of rejoicing, at the Feast of Tabernacles, Lev. xxiii. 40.

WIMPLE, a veil or hood. But the Hebrew מִטְּפָלִית signifies, properly, a broad and large mantle or shawl. So in Ruth iii. 15, Boaz gives Ruth six measures of barley, which she carries away in her mit-pahhath or mantle, not veil as in the English translation. So in Isa. iii. 22. R.

WINDS. [From the Calendar of Palestine, by Buhle, inserted under the article CANAAN, (p. 240.) it appears, that the winds which most commonly prevail in Palestine are from the western quarter, more usually, perhaps from the south-west. This is also supported by the reports of intelligent travellers. The Rev. E. Smith, American missionary in the East, now (July 1832) on a visit to his native country, recently confirmed this statement to the writer; remarking, also, that a north wind not unfrequently arises, which, as in ancient days, is still the sure harbinger of fair weather; illustrating the truth of the observation in Prov. xxv. 23, "The north wind driveth away rain." (For the tempestuous wind called EUROCLYDON, see that article.)

But the principal object which we have here in view is the Kâdim or EAST WIND of the Scriptures, which is represented as blasting and drying up the fruits, (Gen. xli. 6; Ezek. xvii. 10; xix. 12, &c.) and also as blowing with great violence, Ps. xlviii. 7; Ezek. xxvii. 26; Jonah iv. 8, &c. It is also the "horrible tempest," properly glow-wind, הַצֶּלְזֵל, of Ps. xi. 6. This is a sultry and oppressive wind blowing from the south-east, and prevailing only in the hot and dry months of summer. Coming thus from the vast Arabian desert, it seems to increase the heat and drought of the season, and produces universal languor and relaxation. Mr. Smith, who experienced its effects during the summer, at Beyrout, describes it as possessing the same qualities and characteristics, as the Sirocco which he had felt at Malta, and which also prevails in Sicily and Italy; except that the Sirocco, in passing over the sea, acquires great dampness. The Sirocco is described by Brydone, as resembling a blast of burning steam from the mouth of an oven; in a few minutes those exposed to it find every fibre relaxed in an extraordinary manner. This wind is more or less violent, and of longer or shorter duration at different times; seldom lasting more than 36 or 40 hours; and, notwithstanding its scorching heat, it has never been known to produce epidemical disorders, or to do any injury to the health of the people. These characteristics, except the dampness, apply entirely to the east wind of Palestine, which is dry and withering.

Many interpreters, however, have chosen to refer the kâdim, or east wind of the Scriptures, to the oft described wind of the desert, called by the Arabs Simoom, (Semoom, Samoom, or Smoum;) by the Turks Samiel, and in Egypt Camsin; which has long retained the character of a pestilential wind, suddenly overtaking travellers and caravans in the deserts, and almost instantly destroying them by its poisonous and suffocating breath. The result, however of the researches of more modern and judicious travellers, seems to show, that the former accounts of the destructive power of this wind have been, at least, much exaggerated; and that the authors of these accounts either had their credulity imposed upon by the Arabs, or else have described certain facts in such a way, as to impart to them a coloring and cause them to make an impression, which the naked facts themselves would not warrant.

Among writers of this class, we may probably reckon with justice Mr. Bruce and sir R. K. Porter. The latter has every where given the first accounts which he received from by-standers, as matters of fact; without ever seeming himself to have any question of their correctness, and usually without even indicating that they are not matters of his own personal knowledge or experience. In 1830 and 1831, Messrs. Smith and Dwight, American missionaries, travelled in Armenia over much of the same ground as this writer; and they do not hesitate to affirm that his accounts are, in general, to be received with great distrust, and that not a few of his statements are in direct variance with the reality. In regard to Mr. Bruce, it is well known, that his book was generally considered, on the first appearance of it, as a mere romance; later travellers, however, have confirmed the accuracy of his general accounts, i. e. they have established the fact, that his work has a broad basis of truth at the bottom; while it is well understood, that in filling up the details he drew largely from his imagination;—not perhaps with the design of stating any thing which he did not suppose to be true; but partly in consequence of that tendency to exaggeration and high coloring, which is the characteristic of so many minds; and partly, no doubt, from the circumstance, that his narrative was first written out, sixteen years after the events therein described, when the whole had become to him, in a measure, like a dream. Mr. Salt, in his Travels in Abyssinia, has produced some strong instances, on the part of Bruce, of aberration from strict veracity and manly frankness.

After these prefatory remarks, we proceed to give the accounts of the Simoom as furnished by various travellers, placing that of sir R. K. Porter first, as being, although one of the latest, yet, probably, one of the most exaggerated.

At Bagdad, October 9, 1818, sir R. K. Porter informs us, (Travels, vol. ii. p. 229.) the master of the khan "told me, that they consider October the first month of their autumn, and feel it delightfully cool in comparison with July, August and September; for that during forty days of the two first-named summer months, the hot wind blows from the desert, and its effects are often destructive. Its title is very appropriate, being called the Samiel, or Baude Semoom, the pestilential wind. It does not come in continued long currents, but in gusts at different intervals, each blast lasting several minutes, and passing along with the rapidity of lightning. No one dare stir from their houses while this invisible flame is sweeping over the face of the country. Previous to its approach, the atmosphere becomes thick and suffocating, and appearing particularly dense near the horizon, gives sufficient warning of the threatened mischief. Though hostile to human life, it is so far from being prejudicial to the vegetable creation, that a continuance of the Samiel tends to ripen the fruits. I inquired what became of the cattle during such a plague, and was told they were seldom touched by it. It seems strange that their lungs should be so perfectly insensible to what seems instant destruction to the breath of man; but so it is, and they are regularly driven down to water at the customary times of day, even when the blasts are at the severest. The people who attend them are obliged to plaster their own faces and other parts of the body usually exposed to the air, with a sort of muddy clay, which in general protects them from its most malignant effects. The periods of the winds' blowing are generally from noon till sunset; they cease almost entirely during the night; and the direction of the gust is always from the north-east. When it has passed over, a sulphuric, and indeed loathsome, smell, like putridity, remains for a long time. The poison which occasions this smell must be deadly; for if any unfortunate traveller, too far from shelter, meet the blast, he falls immediately; and, in a few minutes his flesh becomes almost black, while both it and his bones at once arrive at so extreme a state of corruption, that the smallest movement of the body would separate the one from the other."

It is but justice to sir R. K. Porter to say, that his account of the Simoom tallies entirely with that given by Chardin in his Travels in Persia. Both travellers doubtless drew from similar sources—the stories of the common people. Chardin says, (Travels, vol. iii. p. 286. edit. of Langlés,) that "this wind blows with a great noise, appears red and inflamed, and kills those persons whom it overtakes by a kind of suffocation. The most remarkable effect of it is, not so much that it causes death, as that the bodies of those who are destroyed by it are dissolved or corrupted, without losing either their form or color; so that one would suppose, they were merely asleep; but if he takes hold of a member, it separates from the body and remains in his hand." Chardin then relates several instances of this kind which he had heard of.

The following extract is from D'Obsonville's "Essays, &c. on the East:" "Some enlightened travellers have seriously written, that every individual who falls a victim to this infection, is immediately reduced to ashes, though apparently only asleep; and that when taken hold of to be awakened by passengers, the limbs part from the body and remain in the hand. Such travellers would evidently not have taken these tales on hearsay, if they had paid a proper attention to other facts, which they either did, or ought to have heard. Experience proves, that animals, by pressing their nostrils to the earth, and men, by covering their heads in their mantles, have nothing to fear from these meteors. This demonstrates the impossibility, that a poison, which can only penetrate the most delicate parts of the brain or lungs, should calcine the skin, flesh, nerves and bones. I acknowledge these accounts are had from the Arabs themselves; but their picturesque and extravagant expressions are a kind of imaginary coin, to know the true value of which requires some practice." "I have twice had an opportunity of considering the effect of these siphons, with some attention. I shall relate simply what I have seen in the case of a merchant and two travellers, who were struck during their sleep, and died on the spot. I ran to see if it was possible to afford them any succor, but they were already dead, the victims of an interior suffocating fire. There were apparent signs of the dissolution of their fluids; a kind of serous matter issued from the nostrils, mouth and ears; and in something more than an hour, the whole body was in the same state. However, as, according to their custom, they [the Arabs] were diligent to pay them the last duties of humanity, I cannot affirm that the putrefaction was more or less rapid than usual in that country. As to the meteor itself, it may be examined with impunity at the distance of three or four fathoms; and the country people are only afraid of being surprised by it when they are asleep; neither are such accidents very common, for these siphons are only seen during two or three months of the year; and as their approach is felt, the camp-guards and the people awake, are always very careful to rouse those that sleep, who also have a general habit of covering their faces with their mantles."

All these accounts bear, upon the face of them, the stamp of exaggeration. But this is not all. Of the accounts of Chardin, Mr. Morier, well known as a judicious observer, remarks, in speaking of this very passage, (p. 63.) "On inquiry, we learned that the present inhabitants of these countries [around the Persian gulf] know nothing of the fatal effects of this wind upon those who are exposed to it, and of which this traveller [Chardin] adduces examples. The Sam-wind occasions great devastation in this region, as I was informed, and is especially destructive to the vegetation. About six years before, this wind blew during all the summer months, and scorched all the grain, then nearly ripe, in such a manner, that no animal would touch a leaf or a kernel of it." This account is far more probable in itself, apart from the well-known character of the writer; and it is also sustained by the following extract from the Journal of Mr. Jackson, who made the over-land journey from India to England in 1797. This writer gives the following account of this wind, which is probably very near the truth. When on the Tigris, about five days' journey from Bagdad, (in the same region as sir R. K. Porter,) he remarks: "I had here an opportunity of observing the progress of the hot winds, called by the natives Samiel, which sometimes proves very destructive, particularly at this season. They are most dangerous between twelve and three o'clock, when the atmosphere is at its greatest degree of heat. Their force entirely depends on the surface over which they pass. If it be over a desert, where there is no vegetation, they extend their dimensions with amazing velocity, and then their progress is sometimes to windward; if over grass, or any other vegetation, they soon diminish and lose much of their force; if over water, they lose all their electrical force, and ascend; [see the extract from Ruppell below;] yet I have sometimes felt their effects across the river where it was at least a mile broad. An instance happened here. Mr. Stephens, a fellow traveller, was bathing in the river, having on a pair of Turkish drawers. On his return from the water, there came a hot wind across the river, which made his drawers and himself perfectly dry in an instant. Had such a circumstance been related to him by another person, he declared he could not have believed it. I was present and felt the force of the hot wind, but should otherwise have been as incredulous as Mr. Stephens." (p. 81.)

We subjoin here the account of Niebuhr, as being one of the most full and trustworthy, and as relating also to the same Asiatic regions. It will be perceived, however, that this is the result, not of his own observations, but of his inquiries among the Arabs; and that although according in the chief points with the descriptions of Porter and Chardin, the language is, nevertheless, much more moderate. The suggestions also occasionally thrown in, accord well with the character of this most sober and judicious of all travellers. He is speaking of the region around the Persian gulf, Bagdad, &c. (Descr. of Arab. p. 7. Germ. edit.) "The hot season is called by the Arabs, so far as I can learn, Smum, [Simoom,] just as we call the same period, dog-days, and as the Egyptians also call their hot season, Camsin. In these months there are occasional instances at Bassora, though seldom, of persons in the street, both in the city and on the way to Zobier, falling down and dying from the heat; indeed mules also are said to have died of the heat out of the city.

"Of the poisonous wind Sam, Smum, Samiel, or Sameli, according to the pronunciation of the Arabs, of whom I inquired about it, one hears most in the desert between Bassora, Bagdad, Aleppo and Mecca. It is said also not to be unknown in some districts of Persia and India, and also in Spain. This wind is also to be feared only in the hottest summer months. It is said always to come from the great desert; indeed they say that the Simoom, (I am not sure whether the poisonous one is meant,) at Mecca, comes from the east, at Bagdad, from the west, at Bassorah, from the north-west, and at Surat, from the north. At Cairo, the hottest wind comes over the Libyan desert, and consequently from the south-west. As the Arabs of the desert are accustomed to a pure atmosphere, it is said that some among them are so keen-scented as to distinguish the fatal Simoom by its sulphurous smell. Another token of this wind is said to be, that the whole atmosphere, in the quarter whence it blows, becomes of a reddish hue. Since, however, a wind moving regularly forwards has less power near the surface of the earth, being somewhat hindered and broken perhaps by hills, and rocks, and bushes, and also by the evaporation from the ground, it is therefore usual for persons to throw themselves upon the earth when they perceive the approach of the Simoom. Nature also is said to have taught the beasts to hold their heads to the earth in like circumstances. One of my servants was overtaken by this wind, in a caravan on the way from Bassorah to Aleppo. Some of the Arabs cried out in time for them all to throw themselves on the ground, and none of those who did this received any injury. But some of the caravan, and among them a French surgeon, who wished to examine this phenomenon more closely, were too secure, and in consequence died. Sometimes years are said to elapse, during which there appears no trace of the poisonous Simoom on the way between Bassorah and Aleppo.

"According to the Arabs, both men and beasts are suffocated by this wind, in the same manner as by the ordinary hot wind, of which I have spoken above. When the heat of the season is extraordinarily great, there comes sometimes a slight blast which is still hotter; and when men or beasts have already become so weak as almost to perish from the heat, it would seem that this additional degree of heat, though small, takes away their breath entirely. In the case of those who are suffocated by this wind, or, as they say, whose heart has burst, it is said that the blood starts from the nose and ears sometimes in two hours after death. Their bodies are said to remain a long time warm, to swell, to turn blue and green, and, if the attempt is made to raise them by the leg or arm, this separates itself at once. Some profess to have observed, that those who are not previously so weakened, usually suffer less; and hence, in a large caravan, sometimes not more than four or five have died on the spot, while others have lived several hours, and some have even been restored by refreshing cordials. The Arabs, it is said, take with them leeks and raisins upon their journeys, and by means of these have often relieved persons who were well nigh suffocated.

"After this description of the Simoom, it will readily be supposed, that I had no great inclination to make the experiment proposed in the 24th question of professor Michaelis. And even if I had kept every thing in readiness for this purpose, my trouble would all have been in vain, for I have myself never met with this wind."

The preceding extracts relate chiefly to the interior of Arabia and Asia; those which follow refer more to Africa, and the southern coast of Arabia. The first which we shall give, go to show that the Simoom has in general the same bad name in these regions as in other places.

Maillet, in speaking of the great Hadj, or annual caravan of pilgrims from Egypt to Mecca, remarks: (Let. xiv. p. 232.) "If the north wind happens to fail, and that from the south comes in its place, which, however, is rather uncommon, then the whole caravan is so sickly and exhausted, that three or four hundred persons are wont to lose their lives; and even greater numbers, as fifteen hundred; of whom the greatest part are stifled on the spot, by the fire and dust of which this fatal wind seems to be composed."

The same writer, in giving an account of the dangers attending the caravans that pass between Egypt and Nubia, further remarks: (Lett. dern. p. 218.) "The danger is infinitely greater when the south wind happens to blow in these deserts. The least mischief that it produces is the making dry their leather bottles, or goat skins filled with water, which they are obliged to carry with them in these journeys, and by this means depriving both man and beast of the only relief they have against its violent heats. This wind, which the Arabs call poisonous, stifles on the spot those that are unfortunate enough to breathe in it; so that to guard against its pernicious effects, they are obliged to throw themselves speedily on the ground, with their face close to these burning sands, with which they are surrounded, and to cover their heads with some cloth or carpet, lest, in respiration, they should suck in that deadly quality which every where attends it. People ought even to think themselves very happy when this wind, which is always, besides, very violent, does not raise up large quantities of sand with a whirling motion, which, darkening the air, renders their guides incapable of discerning their way. Sometimes whole caravans have been buried by this means under the sand, with which this wind is frequently charged."

The next traveller whom we quote is Mr. Bruce, who speaks more in detail, and professes to give the results of his own personal experience. On the general character of his work, and the degree of confidence to be placed in the accuracy of his narratives, we have made some remarks above. (p. 927.) His account is as follows:—

"On the 16th, at half-past ten, we left El Mout. At eleven o'clock, while we contemplated with great pleasure the rugged top of Chiggré, to which we were fast approaching, and where we were to solace ourselves with plenty of good water, Idris cried out, 'Fall upon your faces, for here is the Simoom!' I saw from the S. E. a haze come, in color like the purple part of the rainbow, but not so compressed or thick. It did not occupy twenty yards in breadth, and was about twelve feet high from the ground. It was a kind of blush upon the air, and it moved very rapidly, for I scarce could turn to fall upon the ground, with my head to the northward, when I felt the heat of its current plainly upon my face. We all lay flat on the ground, as if dead, till Idris told us it was blown over. The meteor, or purple haze, which I saw, was indeed passed, but the light air that still blew was of heat to threaten suffocation. For my part, I found distinctly in my breast that I had imbibed a part of it, nor was I free of an asthmatic sensation, till I had been some months in Italy, at the baths of Poretta, near two years afterwards. A universal despondency had taken possession of our people. They ceased to speak to one another, and when they did, it was in whispers, by which I easily guessed that they were increasing each others' fears, by vain suggestions, calculated to sink each other's spirits still further. . . . This phenomenon of the Simoom, unexpected by us, though foreseen by Idris, caused us all to relapse into our former despondency. It still continued to blow, so as to exhaust us entirely, though the blast was so weak as scarcely would have raised a leaf from the ground. At twenty minutes before five, the Simoom ceased, and a comfortable and cooling breeze came by starts from the north." (Vol. iv. p. 558, 559.)

"We had no sooner got into the plains than we felt great symptoms of the Simoom, and about a quarter before twelve, our prisoner first, and then Idris, cried out, The Simoom! the Simoom! My curiosity would not suffer me to fall down without looking behind me; about due south, a little to the east, I saw the colored haze as before. It seemed now to be rather less compressed, and to have with it a shade of blue. The edges of it were not defined as those of the former; but like a very thin smoke, with about a yard in the middle tinged with those colors. We all fell upon our faces, and the Simoom passed with a gentle ruffling wind. It continued to blow in this manner till near three o'clock; so that we were all taken ill at night, and scarcely strength was left us to load the camels." (Vol. iv. p. 581.)

"The Simoom with the wind at S. E. immediately followed the wind at N. and the usual despondency that always accompanied it. The blue meteor, with which it began passing over us about twelve, and the ruffling wind that followed it, continued till near two. Silence, and a desperate kind of indifference about life, were the immediate effects upon us; and I began, seeing the condition of my camels, to fear we were all doomed to a sandy grave, and to contemplate it with some degree of resignation.

"I here began to provide for the worst. I saw the fate of our camels fast approaching, and that our men grew weak in proportion: our bread, too, began to fail us, although we had plenty of camel's flesh in its stead; our water, though to all appearance we were to find it more frequently than in the beginning of our journey, was nevertheless brackish, and scarce served the purpose to quench our thirst; and above all, the dreadful Simoom had perfectly exhausted our strength, and brought upon us a degree of cowardice and languor, that we struggled with in vain." (Vol. v. p. 583, 584.)

Such is the strongest evidence which is or can be brought forward, to establish the poisonous qualities of the Simoom, or wind of the desert. We must now reverse the picture, and produce the evidence to show that all these stories probably rest either upon the credulity of the writers, or on a spirit of exaggeration. Our first witness is Burckhardt, who lived and travelled, from 1810 to 1817 inclusive, in Syria, Arabia, and the countries between these, in Egypt, Nubia, Soudan, &c.—in all the countries indeed in which, according to the foregoing accounts, the Simoom is said to be prevalent. He was, moreover, thoroughly acquainted with the language, and travelled every where as a native, which of course gave him far greater facilities of obtaining information than fall to the lot of other Europeans. His good judgment and extreme accuracy are every where apparent, and are also vouched for by all subsequent travellers. In describing his journey across the great Nubian desert, in 1814, the same which Mr. Bruce crossed, he gives the results of all his observations upon the Simoom, in the following manner:—

"March 22, 1814.—At the end of five hours we halted in a Wady. The wind was still southerly. I again inquired, as I had often done before, whether my companions had often experienced the Semoom, which we translate by the poisonous blast of the desert, but which is nothing more than a violent south-east wind. They answered in the affirmative, but none had ever known an instance of its having proved fatal. Its worst effect is, that it dries up the water in the skins, and so far endangers the traveller's safety. In these southern countries, however, [Nubia,] water-skins are made of very thick cow-leather, which are almost impenetrable to the Semoom. In Arabia and Egypt, on the contrary, the skins of sheep or goats are used for this purpose; and I [afterwards] witnessed the effect of a Semoom upon them, in going from Tor to Suez, in 1815, when in one morning a third of the contents of a full water-skin was evaporated. I have repeatedly been exposed to the hot wind, in the Syrian and Arabian deserts, in Upper Egypt and Nubia. The hottest and most violent I ever experienced was at Suakin, [on the Nubian coast of the Red sea,] yet, even there, I felt no particular inconvenience from it, although exposed to all its fury in the open plain. For my own part, I am PERFECTLY CONVINCED, that all the stories which travellers, or the inhabitants of the towns of Egypt and Syria, relate of the Semoom of the desert, are greatly exaggerated; and I never could hear of a SINGLE WELL AUTHENTICATED INSTANCE of its having proved mortal, either to man or beast. The fact is, that the Bedouins, when questioned on the subject, often frighten the towns-people with tales of men, and even of whole caravans, having perished by the effects of the wind; when, upon close inquiry, made of some person whom they find not ignorant of the desert, they will state the plain truth. I never observed that the Semoom blows close to the ground, as commonly supposed, but always observed the whole atmosphere appear as if in a state of combustion; the dust and sand are carried high into the air, which assumes a reddish, or bluish, or yellowish tint, according to the nature and color of the ground, from which the dust arises. The yellow, however, always, more or less, predominates. In looking through a glass of a light yellow color, one may form a pretty correct idea of the appearance of the air, as I observed it during a stormy Semoom at Esne, in Upper Egypt, in May, 1813. The Semoom is not always accompanied by whirlwinds; in its less violent degree, it will blow for hours with little force, although with oppressive heat; when the whirlwind raises the dust, it then increases several degrees in heat. In the Semoom at Esne, the thermometer mounted to 121° in the shade; but the air seldom remains longer than a quarter of an hour in this state, or longer than the whirlwind lasts.

"The most disagreeable effect of the Semoom on man is, that it stops perspiration, dries up the palate, and produces great restlessness. I never saw any person lie down flat upon his face, to escape its pernicious blast, as Bruce describes himself to have done in crossing this very desert; but during the whirlwinds, the Arabs often hide their faces with their cloaks, and kneel down near their camels, to prevent the sand or dust from hurting their eyes. Camels are always much distressed, not by the heat, but by the dust blowing into their large, prominent eyes. They turn round and endeavor to screen themselves by holding down their heads; but this I never saw them do, except in case of a whirlwind, however intense the heat of the atmosphere might be. In June, 1813, going from Esne to Siout, a violent Semoom overtook me upon the plain, between Farshiout and Berdys. I was quite alone, mounted upon a light-footed Hedjin. When the whirlwind arose, neither house nor tree was in sight, and while I was endeavoring to cover my face with my handkerchief, the beast was made unruly by the quantity of dust thrown into its eyes, and the terrible noise of the wind, and set off at a furious gallop. I lost the reins and received a heavy fall; and not being able to see ten yards before me, I remained wrapped up in my cloak on the spot where I fell, until the wind abated, when, pursuing my dromedary, I found it at a great distance, quietly standing near a low shrub, the branches of which afforded some shelter to its eyes.

"Bruce has mentioned the moving pillars of sand in this desert; but although none such occurred during my passage, I do not presume to question his veracity on this head. The Arabs told me that there are often whirlwinds of sand, and I have repeatedly passed through districts of moving sands, which the slightest wind can raise. I remember to have seen columns of sands moving about like water-spouts, in the desert, on the banks of the Euphrates, and have seen, at Jaka, terrible effects from a sudden wind; I therefore very easily credit their occasional appearance in the Nubian desert, although I doubt of their endangering the safety of travellers." (Travels in Nubia, &c. Lond. 1819, p. 204—6.)

A later and not less respectable traveller is M. Rüppell, of Franckfort, who is still living, (1832,) and with whom the writer of these lines had the pleasure of a personal interview. He first visited Egypt, and

Arabia Péninsula, in the years 1817 and 1818; but returned to Europe in this latter year, in order to make the necessary preparations in order to examine those and the adjacent regions in a more scientific manner. He pursued the necessary studies, both in natural philosophy and natural history, at the university of Pavia, under the general advice and direction of the celebrated astronomer, baron Von Zach; and procured also an apparatus of astronomical and other instruments. Thus prepared, he arrived in Egypt in the beginning of 1822, and continued to reside and travel in that country, in Nubia, Kordofan, and south-western Arabia, until the middle of 1827. His remarks upon the wind of the desert are contained in the following extract, and are those of a scientific observer:—

“During the march from Suez to Cairo, I had opportunity to make a meteorological observation, which surprised me, and which may perhaps lead to interesting results. It was on the 21st of May, 1822, at the distance of seven hours [about 22 miles] from Cairo, that we were overtaken by the violent south wind, of which former travellers have given the most strange and incredible accounts. Not long after sunrise, after we had had during the night a light wind from the north-east, there sprung up a fresh breeze from the south-south-east, which by degrees increased to a violent gale. Clouds of dust filled the whole atmosphere to such a degree, that one could recognize nothing fifty paces off; not even a camel was to be distinguished at this distance. Along the surface of the earth there was a constant crackling, which I supposed to arise from the rolling sand, which the wind lashed so impetuously. All those parts of our bodies which were turned towards the wind, were uncommonly heated; and we experienced an unusual feeling of pain, somewhat like the pricking of needles, accompanied by a peculiar sound. I supposed, at first, that this feeling of pain in the exposed parts of the body, was caused by the small stones which were borne along by the tempest and hurled against us; and in order to judge of the size of these stones, I attempted to catch some of them with my cap; but how great was my surprise, when I found I could not succeed in obtaining a single one of these supposed stones. I now remarked, for the first time, that this painful feeling in the skin was not caused by the stroke of any such stones or sand, but was rather the effect of some invisible physical power, which I could compare only with the passing off of a stream of electric fluid. After this first conjecture, I began to observe more closely the phenomena around me. I noticed, that our hair became more or less erect; and that the pricking pain in the skin was especially perceptible in the joints and at the extremities, just as if I had been exposed to an electric shock upon an isolated stool. In order to convince myself entirely, that this feeling of pain did not arise from the stroke of stones or sand, I stretched a sheet of paper, and held it against the wind. The smallest stone or grain of sand, and even the dust itself, would have been distinctly perceptible to the ear or eye; but nothing of this took place. The surface of the paper remained unchanged and noiseless. I now stretched out my arm, and the pricking pain was immediately increased at the extremities of my fingers. These observations led me very strongly to conjecture, that the violent wind known in Egypt by the name of Camstn, is either accompanied by a large quantity of the electric fluid, or else that this is occasioned by the motion of the dry sand in the desert. Hence the thick clouds of dust which accompany this wind, consisting of isolated atoms of sand, which for days darken the sun in a cloudless sky. In this way one could perhaps explain how this wind might, through its electrical properties, sometimes prove fatal to caravans, as has been related by some travellers. I must, however, here remark, that in the countries through which I have travelled, I HAVE NEVER HEARD THE LEAST HINT OF ANY SUCH ACCIDENT. At any rate, the supposition that such a calamity might be occasioned by the caravan's being buried under the sand, is most ridiculous.

“The Camstn, or gale from the south-east, usually blows in Egypt two or three days at a time, with less violence, however, during the night. It occurs only in the interval between the middle of April and the middle of June; hence its Arabic name, which signifies fifty, or the fifty days' wind. It is much to be wished, that scientific travellers, provided with the proper instruments, may subject the electrical quality of this wind to an accurate examination; but for this purpose it would be necessary to select some other station than Cairo, or any other inhabited place, where, in consequence of the vicinity of trees, or houses, or towers, the electricity of the air would be already weakened or lost. The observer of the Camstn must betake himself to the midst of the desert, far from all running or standing water, where the wind shows itself in its full strength; and there may he with certainty expect, that his investigations will lead to interesting and important results.” (Reisen, Franckf. 1829, p. 269—272.)

In a note appended to this passage, M. Rüppell further remarks: “I had myself opportunity, a year afterwards, to make some investigations in Dongola, respecting the electricity which accompanies violent gales in Africa. It was during a gale which occurred in that province, on the 7th of April, 1823. The instrument employed was the common Voltaic straw-electrometer. On the first experiment, at 8 o'clock A. M. while it was blowing violently from N. N. W. [from the great African desert,] and the thermometer stood at 16° of Reaumur, [68° Fahr.] the electricity of the air was at its maximum; the straw instantly touched the sides of the bottle. The electricity was negative. At 10 o'clock, during a whirlwind, with the like temperature, the electrometer showed ten degrees, and that positive. About 12 o'clock, the wind had somewhat abated; the thermometer stood at 18°, [72½°] and the electrometer showed only four degrees, negative. Afterwards, as the wind abated more, the electricity of the air disappeared entirely.”

To these statements of Burckhardt and Rüppell, it is almost unnecessary to add, that they are confirmed by the oral testimony of the American missionaries, who have visited those regions. The Rev. Mr. Smith, in particular, stated expressly to the editor, that so far as his opportunities of experience and inquiry, in Egypt and Palestine, had extended, the views given by Burckhardt were entirely correct. We must, therefore, it would seem, abandon the long prevalent idea of the poisonous nature of the hot wind of the desert; while it may no doubt be true, that individuals, previously exhausted by the heat of the season, have sunk under the augmented heat of this wind, in the manner described above by Niebuhr; and as is, also, not very seldom the case in the more sultry days even of our own clime. In the caravans, too, which cross these arid wastes, there are always more or less who are feeble and languid, and who thus may be easily overcome, and perish by a greater degree of heat, and especially by a sudden augmentation of it through a sultry wind. The great Hadj route, across the desert El Tyh, is strewed with the bones of animals, and eluded with the graves of pilgrims, that have died on the route, from fatigue, exhaustion, disease, &c. but not in general from any fatal influence of the wind, or atmosphere. (See the extracts from Burckhardt, under EXODUS, p. 416.) *R.

WINE. (See VINE, ad fin.) Hardly any sacrifices were made to the Lord, without being accompanied by libations of wine, Exod. xxix. 40; Numb. xv. 5, 7. Its use, however, was forbidden to the priests during the time they were in the tabernacle, employed in the service of the altar, (Lev. x. 9.) as it was also to the Nazarites, Numb. vi. 3.

Wine, or the cup in which it is contained, often represents the anger of God: "Thou hast made us drink the wine of astonishment," Ps. lx. 3. "In the hand of the Lord there is a cup, and the wine is red; it is full of mixture, and he poureth out of the same. But the dregs thereof all the wicked shall wring them out and drink them," Ps. lxxv. 8. The Lord says to Jeremiah, (chap. xxv. 15.) "Take the wine-cup of this fury at my hand, and cause all the nations to whom I send thee to drink it."

Wine was administered medically to such as were sinking in trouble and sorrow: (Prov. xxxi. 4—6.) "Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine to those that be of heavy hearts." The rabbins tell us, that it was customary to give wine and strong liquors to criminals condemned to die, at their execution, to stupify them, to abate their fear, and lull the sense of their pain. There were certain charitable women at Jerusalem, they say, who used to mix certain drugs with wine, to make it stronger, and more effectual in diminishing the sense of pain. It is thought a mixture of this kind was offered to our Saviour to drink, before he was fastened to the cross: (Mark xv. 23.) "And they gave him to drink, wine mingled with myrrh; but he received it not."

WINE OF HELBON (Ezek. xxvii. 18.) was a kind of excellent wine, sold at the fairs of Tyre. It was made at Damascus.

WINE OF ASTONISHMENT (Ps. lx. 3.) may represent the cup of God's anger, with which he inebriates the wicked; or rather, according to the Hebrew, the cup of the wine of affliction, impregnated with its lees; it might also be translated, wine of trembling, that produces death, that poisons, that stupifies, Ps. lxxv. 8. The LXX translate it, wine that stings inwardly, that causes affliction, or compunction; Aquila, wine of stupefaction; Symmachus, wine of agitation, or disturbance.

WINE OF THE PALM-TREE (Deut. xiv. 26.) is made of the sap of the palm-tree, and is common in the East.

WINE OF LIBATION (Deut. xxxii. 38; Esth. xiv. 17.) was the most excellent wine, poured on the victims in the temple of the Lord. Or pure wine, because in libations they used no mixture.

WINE OF UPRIGHTNESS (Cant. i. 4; vii. 9; Prov. xxiii. 30.) is good wine, true and excellent wine.

WING, *Ala. By this word, the Hebrews understood not only the wings of birds, but also the lappet, skirt, or flap of a garment, the extremity of a country, the wings of an army; figuratively and metaphorically, protection or defence. God says, that he has borne his people on the wings of eagles, (Exod. xxi. 4; see also Deut. xxxii. 11.) that is, he had brought them out of Egypt, as an eagle carries its young ones under its wings. The prophet begs of God to protect them under his wings, (Ps. xvii. 8.) and says that the children of men put their trust in the protection of his wings, Ps. xxxvi. 7. Isaiah, speaking of the army of the kings of Israel and Syria, who were coming against Judah, says, "The stretching out of his wings shall fill the breadth of thy land, O Immanuel," chap. viii. 8.

WINTER, in Palestine, see under CANAAN, p. 240, seq.

WISDOM is a word used with great latitude in the Scriptures, and its precise import can only be ascertained by a close attention to the context. See FOLLY.

1. The term wisdom is used to express the understanding or knowledge of things, both human and divine. It is often so used in the Psalms. It was this wisdom which Solomon entreated and received of God.

2. It is put for ingenuity, skill, dexterity; as in the case of the artificers Bezaleel and Aholiab, Exod. xxxviii. 3; xxxi. 3.

3. Wisdom is used for subtlety, craft, stratagem, whether good or evil. Pharaoh dealt wisely with the Israelites, Exod. i. 10. Jonadab was very wise, i. e. subtle and crafty, 2 Sam. xiii. 3. In Proverbs, (xiv. 8.) it is said, "The wisdom of the prudent is to understand his way."

4. For doctrine, learning, experience, sagacity, Job xii. 2, 12; xxxviii. 37; Ps. cv. 22.

5. It is put sometimes for the skill or arts of magicians, wizards, fortune-tellers, &c.

6. Wisdom is also the Eternal Wisdom, the Word, the Son of God, Prov. iii. 9; viii. 22, 23. (Compare also the Book of Wisdom, vii. 22, 26; viii. xvii. 12, 26, &c. Also Eccles. xxiv. 5, &c.)

7. Wisdom of the flesh, of this world, human wisdom, are opposed, by Paul, to true wisdom, the wisdom of Christ, the wisdom of the Spirit, 1 Cor. i. 19, &c. James also (iii. 14, &c.) speaks of a wisdom which is earthly, sensual, devilish, and opposed to the wisdom that is from above, which is pure, peaceable, gentle, &c.

WISDOM, BOOK OF, [or, as it is also called, the Wisdom of Solomon. Just as the books of Tobit and Sirach give us a representation of the Jewish religious views and culture in Palestine, in the centuries next preceding the Christian era, so also the book of Wisdom does the same for the far nobler and purer religious culture of the Alexandrian Jews, in the same period. We see from this book, and from Philo, that a peculiar religious philosophy had formed itself in Alexandria among the Jews, arising out of a mixture of the national views, Platonic philosophy, and the oriental, or more especially Persian, ideas of dualism and emanation. The great object of the book is, to enforce the value of wisdom, i. e. of religion; and this is done by showing that it leads not only to greater honor and esteem in this life, but to the rewards of a future state of existence.

Solomon is every where introduced as the speaker, in the first part; and it would seem to have been the plan of the writer, that he should be the speaker throughout. This, however, is not the case; for in the latter part, the writer often speaks of Solomon in the third person. From chap. xv. onward, God is every where addressed.

The book was originally written in the Alexandrine Greek; the style, for that of a later Jew, is uncommonly good. It has in it something eloquent and retorical, which verges sometimes towards the artificial and pompous. This is more particularly the case with the latter part. There is, however, along with this, such a variety of allusion, as to betray a very extensive knowledge, and especially an acquaintance with heathen learning.

As to the author and the time in which he wrote, nothing can be said definitely, except that he must have been a Jew of Alexandria, in the centuries next preceding Christ. In consequence of the similarity of some points in the book with the doctrines of the Essenes, it has been supposed that the author was of this sect; but there are also, in other places and respects, certain resemblances between the Essenes and Alexandrians. Others, as Grotius, have assumed certain interpolations from some Christian hand, viz. in respect to the doctrine of immortality; but, regarded more closely, the immortality of this book is not that of Christianity, inasmuch as it speaks only of the immortality of the pious. In a philological respect, moreover, interpolations are not admissible. The assertion of Jerome, perhaps, deserves the most attention, viz. that Philo was the author. But yet, after all the points of close resemblance with Philo's writings, there is still a difference; nor can it well be explained, if Philo were the author, why the book should not stand among his acknowledged works.

The Latin version of this book, which is found in the Vulgate, is not by Jerome, but is of an earlier date. See VERSIONS. *R.

WITCH OF ENDOR, see in SAMUEL.

WITNESS, one who bears testimony to any thing: thus it is said, you are a witness—a faithful witness—a false witness—God is witness, &c. Christ is the faithful witness; (Rev. i. 5.) the martyr of truth and justice. God promises to give to his two witnesses (which some think to be Enoch and Elijah) the spirit of prophecy, (Rev. xi. 3.) after which (he says) they shall be put to death.

The law appoints, that two or three witnesses should be credited in matters of judicature; but not one witness only, Deut. xvii. 6, 7. The law condemned a false witness to the same punishment as that he would have subjected his neighbor to, Deut. xix. 16—19.

The prophets are the witnesses of our belief; they witness the truth of our religion, Heb. xii. 1. The apostles are still further witnesses of the coming, the mission, and the doctrine of Christ. If Christ is not risen, says Paul, then are we false witnesses, 1 Cor. xv. 15. We are witnesses, says Peter, Acts x. 39, 41.) of all that Jesus did in Judea; and when the apostles thought fit to put another in the place of Judas, (Acts i. 22.) they selected one who had been a witness of the resurrection along with themselves.

WIZARD, see MAGIC, and INCHANTMENTS.

WO is used in our translation where a softer expression would be at least equally proper: "Wo to such an one!" is in our language, a threat, or imprecation, which comprises a wish for some calamity, natural or judicial, to befall a person; but this is not always the meaning of the word in Scripture. We have the expression "Wo is me," that is, Alas, for my sufferings! and "Wo to the women with child, and those who give suck," &c. that is, Alas, for their redoubled sufferings, in times of distress! It is also more agreeable to the gentle character of the compassionate Jesus, to consider him as lamenting the sufferings of any, whether person, or city, than as imprecating, or even as denouncing, them; since his character of judge formed no part of his mission. If, then, we should read, "Alas, for thee, Chorazin! Alas, for thee, Bethsaida!" we should do no injustice to the general sentiments of the place, or to the character of the person speaking. This, however, is not the sense in which wo is always to be taken; as when we read, "Wo to those who build houses by unrighteousness, and cities by blood:" wo to those who are "rebellious against God," &c. in numerous passages, especially of the Old Testament. The import of this word, then, is in some degree qualified by the application of it; where it is directed against transgression, crime, or any enormity, it may be taken as a threatening, a malediction; but in the words of our Lord, and where the subject is suffering under misfortunes, though not extremely wicked, a kind of lamentatory application of it should seem to be most proper.

WOLF, a wild creature, very well known. The Scripture notices these remarkable things respecting the wolf: (1.) It lives upon rapine. (2.) Is violent, cruel and bloody. (3.) Voracious and greedy. (4.) Seeks its prey by night. (5.) Is very sharp-sighted. (6.) Is the great enemy of sheep. That Benjamin shall raven as a wolf, Gen. xlix. 27. False teachers are wolves in sheep's clothing. Persecutors of the church, and false pastors, are also ravenous wolves. The prophets speak of evening wolves. Jer. v. 6, "A wolf of the evening shall spoil them." And Hab. i. 8, "Their horses are more fierce than the evening wolves." And Zeph. iii. 3, "Her judges are evening wolves." The Chaldee interpreters explain—Benjamin shall raven as a wolf—of the altar of burnt-offerings at Jerusalem, which stood in the tribe of Benjamin. Others refer it to that violent seizure, by the sons of Benjamin, of the young women that came to the tabernacle at Shiloh, Judg. xxi. 21. Others refer it to Mordecai, or to Saul, who were of the tribe of Benjamin. Others explain it of Paul, who was also of this tribe; and this interpretation has commonly prevailed among Christian interpreters.

The wolf is a fierce creature, dwelling in forests, ravenous, greedy, crafty, and of exquisite quickness of smell.

Isaiah, (xi. 6; lxv. 25.) describing the tranquil reign of the Messiah, says, "The wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf, and the young lion, and the fating together, and a little child shall lead them." Our Saviour, (Matt. x. 16.) says, that he sends his apostles as sheep among wolves, (Luke x. 3.) and it is known, that both Jews and pagans, like ravenous and voracious wolves, persecuted and slew almost all of them. At last, however, these same wolves themselves became converts, and docile as lambs. Paul, one of the most eager persecutors of the church, was afterwards one of its most zealous defenders.

WOMAN was created as a companion and assistant to man; (see ADAM;) equal to him in authority and jurisdiction over the animals; but after the fall, God subjected her to the government of man: (Gen. iii. 16.) "Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee." In addition to the duties prescribed by the law, common to men and women, certain regulations were peculiar to this sex; as those respecting legal uncleanness during their ordinary infirmities, those attending child-bearing, &c. The law did not allow any action of the woman against the man; but it permitted the husband to divorce his wife, and to cause her to be stoned, if she violated her conjugal vow, &c.

If a married woman made a vow, of whatever nature, she was not bound by it, if her husband forbade it the same day. But if he staid till the next day, before he contradicted it, or knowing the thing, if he held his peace, he was then supposed to consent to it; and the woman was bound by her vow, Numb. xxx. 7, &c. (See 1 Cor. vii. 2, &c. for the duties of women towards their husbands.) The apostle would have them submissive, as to Christ, Eph. v. 2. He forbids them to speak or teach in the church; or to appear there with their heads uncovered, or without veils, 1 Cor. xi. 5; xiv. 34. He does not allow women to teach, or to domineer over their husbands, but would have them continue in submission and silence. (See VEIL.) He adds, that the woman shall be saved in bearing and educating her children, if she bring them up in faith, charity, sanctity, and a sober life. See Titus ii. 4, 5, and 1 Pet. iii. 1—3, where modesty is recommended to them, with great care in avoiding superfluous ornaments and unnecessary finery.

WOMB. The fruit of the womb is children, (Gen. xxx. 2.) whom the psalmist (cxxxvii. 3.) describes as the blessing of marriage. Ps. xxii. 10, "Lord, thou art my God from my mother's womb."

WONDER is some occurrence, or thing, which so strongly engages our attention, by its surprising greatness, rarity, or other properties, that our minds are struck by it into astonishment. Wonder is also nearly synonymous with sign: "If a prophet give thee a sign, or a wonder," says Moses, (Deut. xiii. 1.) and "if the sign or wonder come to pass," &c. Isaiah says, he and "his children are for signs and wonders," (chap. viii. 18.) that is, they were for signs, indications of, allusions to, prefigurations of, things future, that should certainly take place; and they were to excite notice, attention and consideration in beholders; to cause wonder in them. Wonder also signifies the act of wondering, as resulting from the observation of something extraordinary, or beyond what we are accustomed to behold.

WORD is in Hebrew often put for thing or matter; as Exod. ii. 14: "Surely this thing [Heb. word] is known." "To-morrow the Lord shall do this thing [Heb. word] in the land," Exod. ix. 5. "I will do a thing [Heb. word] in Israel, at which both the ears of every one that heareth it shall tingle," 1 Sam. iii. 11. "And the rest of the acts [Heb. words] of Solomon," 1 Kings xi. 41.

Sometimes Scripture ascribes to the word of God supernatural effects; or represents it as animated and active. So, "He sent his word, and healed them." The Book of Wisdom ascribes to the word of God, the death of the first-born of Egypt; (Wisd. xviii. 15; xvi. 26; ix. 1; xvi. 12.) the miraculous effects of the manna; the creation of the world; the healing of those who looked up to the brazen serpent. The centurion in the Gospel says to our Saviour, (Matt. viii. 8.) "Speak the word only, and my servant shall be healed." And Christ says to the devil that tempted him, (Matt. iv. 4.) "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." Hence we see that word is taken either, (1.) for that eternal word heard by the prophets, when under inspiration from God. Or, (2.) for that which they heard externally, when God spoke to them; as when he spoke to Moses, face to face, or as one friend speaks to another, Exod. xxxiii. 11. Or, (3.) for that word which the ministers of God, the priests, the apostles, the servants of God, declare in his name to the people. (4.) For what is written in the sacred books of the Old and New Testaments. (5.) For the only Son of the Father, the uncreated Wisdom: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him, and without him was not any thing made that was made," John i.

The Chaldee paraphrasts, the most ancient Jewish writers extant, generally use the name Memra, or Word, where Moses puts Jehovah; and it is thought that under this term they allude to the Son of God. Now, their testimony is so much the more considerable, as, having lived before or at the time of Christ, they are irrefragable witnesses of the sentiments of their nation on this article; since their Targum, or explication, has always been, and still is, in universal esteem among them. In the greater part of the passages where the sacred name occurs, these paraphrasts substitute Memra Jehovah, (מִמְרָא יְהוָה) the Word of God; and as they ascribe to Memra all the attributes of deity, it is concluded that they believed the divinity of the Word. In effect, according to them, Memra created the world; appeared to Abraham in the plain of Mamre, and to Jacob at Bethel. It was to Memra Jacob appealed to witness the covenant between him and Laban: "Let the Word see between thee and me." The same Word appeared to Moses at Sinai; gave the law to Israel; spoke face to face with that lawgiver; marched at the head of that people; enabled them to conquer nations; and was a consuming fire to all who violated the law of the Lord. All these characters, where the paraphrasts use the word Memra, clearly denote Almighty God. This Word, therefore, was God; and the Hebrews were of this opinion at the time when the Targum was composed.

The author of the Book of Wisdom expresses himself much in the same manner. He says that God created all things by his Word, (ch. ix. 1.) that it is not what the earth produces that feeds man; but the Word of the Almighty that supports him, ch. xvi. 26. It was this Word that fed the Israelites in the desert; healed them after the biting of the serpents; (ch. xvi. 12.) and who, by his power, destroyed the first-born of the Egyptians, (ch. xviii. 15; Exod. xii. 29, 30.) and by which Aaron stopped the fury of the fire that was kindled in the camp, which threatened the destruction of all Israel, Wisd. xviii. 22. (See Numb. xvi. 46.)

But the most full and distinct testimony is borne to the personality and real deity of the Word, by the evangelist John in his Gospel, in his First Epistle and in the Book of Revelation.

The following remarks on the different applications of the terms Rhema and Logos, in the New Testament, are from Mr. Taylor.

We do not find that Rhema is ever personified, or that personal actions are attributed to the term, but generally speaking, when relating to events, the force of our English word facts, unquestionable facts, is intended; in other cases, authority, influence, or power.

The word Logos imports simple speech; that by which the party hearing it may be instructed; also written information, that by which the reader may be edified. Acts i. 1, "The former treatise (λόγος) I have made." Also commandments, John viii. 55; Rom. xiii. 9; 1 Thess. iv. 15, et al. Prophecy, promises, disputes, threatenings, evil speakings, and, in short, whatever is the subject of words, whether good or bad. Hence, teaching in all its branches; hence teacher, instructor, wisdom; hence heavenly wisdom, the heavenly teacher, the heavenly instructor, &c.

And this word Logos is personified, and personal actions are attributed to it.

It is not easy to suggest English terms by which to fix this distinction in every instance; but it is very desirable to represent the original as accurately as possible, and to avoid interchanging terms which, certainly, were not adopted by the sacred writers, to express such difference, without valid and efficient reasons.

In addition to these remarks on the application of the word Logos, Mr. Taylor has elsewhere some observations on the probable origin of its personal reference. The following extracts are from Bruce's Travels :—

“An officer, named Kal Hatzé, who stands always upon steps at the side of the lattice window, where there is a hole covered in the inside with a curtain of green taffeta;—behind this curtain the king sits.” (Vol. iv. p. 76.) “Hitherto, while there were strangers in the room, he [the king] had spoken to us by an officer called Kal Hatzé, the voice or word of the king.” (Vol. iii. p. 231.) “—But there is no such ceremony in use; and exhibitions of this kind, made by the king in public, at no period seem to have suited the genius of this people. Formerly, his face was never seen, nor any part of him, excepting sometimes his foot. He sits in a kind of balcony, with lattice windows and curtains before him. Even yet he covers his face on audiences, or public occasions, and when in judgment. On cases of treason, he sits within his balcony, and speaks through a hole in the side of it, to an officer called Kal Hatzé, ‘the voice or word of the king,’ by whom he sends his questions, or any thing else that occurs, to the judges, who are seated at the council table.” (Vol. iii. p. 265.)

Of the use of this officer, Mr. Bruce gives several striking instances: in particular, one on the trial of a rebel, when the king, by his Kal Hatzé, asked a question, by which his guilt was effectually demonstrated. It appears, then, that the king of Abyssinia makes inquiry, gives his opinion, and declares his will by a deputy, a go-between, a middle-man, called “his word.” Assuming for a moment that this was a Jewish custom, we see to what the ancient Jewish paraphrasts referred by their term, “Word of Jehovah,” instead of Jehovah himself; and the idea was familiar to their recollection, and to that of their readers; a no less necessary consideration than that of their own recollection.

If it be inquired, What traces of this officer, as an attendant on official dignity, occur in Scripture? we may reply that to trace allusions to the office of this deputy in Scripture would be too extensive for this place; but by way of selection, consult the history of the calling of Samuel, 1 Sam. iii. 21. “Jehovah revealed himself to Samuel, in Shiloh, by the word of the Lord (Jehovah);” why not say at once, simply, “by himself;” without this interposing “word?” What shall we say to Job xxxiii. 23? and does not Elisha (2 Kings v. 10), assume somewhat of the same state? And is it not probable, that Naaman felt himself treated like an inferior, a subject, by the prophet's sending a messenger (a Kal Hatzé) to him, instead of coming out to him? See also 1 Kings xiii. 9, &c. a prophet directed by the word of the Lord. There is something very remarkable in the terms employed by the old prophet: (v. 18.) An angel spake to me by the word of the Lord: what a circuitous combination of phraseology! Why not at once, “The Lord spake to me.” Why not at most, “The word of the Lord spake to me?”

The author of the Wisdom of Solomon has given an activity to his “Word of God,” which exceeds what appears to be the duty of Abyssinian Kal Hatzé. Thine Almighty Word leaped down from heaven, from the royal throne, [or, according to the representation of Bruce, down the steps at the side of the window next the throne,] and brought thine unfeigned commandment, as a sharp sword, and filled all with death, &c. chap. xviii. 15, 16.

It may now be considered as hardly bearing a question, whether the ancient Jewish writers (Philo included) derived this idea, or mode of speech, from the heathen, or from the customs and manners of the kings of the East, and those of their own country in particular. Shall we not, hereafter, acquit the evangelists from adopting the mythological conceptions of Plato? Rather, did not Plato adopt eastern language? and is not the custom still retained in the East? See all accounts of an ambassador's visit to the grand seignior; who never himself answers, but directs his vizier to speak for him. So in Europe, the king of France directs his keeper of the seals to speak in his name; and so the lord chancellor in England prorogues the parliament, expressing his majesty's pleasure, and using his majesty's name, though in his majesty's presence.

WORLD, in addition to its natural meaning, as embracing the whole of created nature, and more particularly the respective parts of our own planet, is used in Scripture to denote its inhabitants, as in John viii. 12; xvii. 25; xv. 18, &c. In several passages of the New Testament, the Greek word γῆς, now translated world, would be more correctly rendered land.

WORMWOOD, a plant which grows wild about dunghills, and on dry waste grounds. It flowers in summer; the leaves have a strong, offensive smell, and a very bitter, nauseous taste; the flowers are equally bitter, but less nauseous. Its bitter qualities are mentioned in several comparisons in Scripture.

WORSHIP of God is an act of religion, which consists in paying a due respect, veneration and homage to the Deity, from a sense of his greatness, of benefits already received, and under a certain expectation of reward. This internal respect is to be shown and testified by external acts; as prayers, sacrifices, (formerly,) thanksgivings, &c.

Worship may be taken as (1.) internal, or (2.) external: (1.) private, or (2.) public: (1.) personal, or (2.) social: (1.) active, or (2.) passive; for there is a worship of God in sentiment, in submission to his will, in intentional obedience, &c. which is not external or active, but which becomes a habit of the mind, and indeed forms it to a devout disposition for active worship.

That it is the duty of man to worship his Maker, no one can deny; it is not, indeed, easily to be conceived how any one who has tolerably just notions of the attributes and providence of God, can possibly neglect the duty of private worship; and if we admit that public worship does not seem to be expressly enjoined in that system which is called the religion of nature, yet it is most expressly commanded by the religion of Christ, and will be regularly performed and promoted by every one who reflects on its great utility, or who enjoys its extensive benefits.

YEAR

YEAR. The Hebrews had always years of twelve months. But at the beginning, and in the time of Moses, they were solar years of twelve months, each month having thirty days, excepting the twelfth, which had thirty-five days. We see, by the enumeration of the days of the deluge, (Gen. vii.) that the Hebrew year consisted of 365 days. It is supposed that they had an intercalary month at the end of 120 years; at which time the beginning of their year would be out of its place full thirty days. It must be admitted, however, that no mention is made in Scripture of the thirteenth month, or of any intercalation; and hence some think that Moses retained the order of the Egyptian year, which was solar, and consisted of twelve months of thirty days each. After the time of Alexander the Great, and of the Grecians, in Asia, the Jews reckoned by lunar months, chiefly in what related to religion and to the festivals; (see Eclus. xliii. 6, 7.) and since the completing of the Talmud, they use years wholly lunar; having alternately a full month of thirty days, and a defective month of twenty-nine days. To accommodate this lunar year to the course of the sun, at the end of three years they intercalate a whole month after Adar, which intercalated month they call Ve-adar, that is, second Adar.

Their civil year has always begun in autumn, at the month Tizri; but their sacred year, by which the festivals, assemblies and other religious acts were regulated, began in the spring, at the month Nisan. See MONTHS, and JEWISH CALENDAR, infra.

Nothing is more equivocal among the ancients than the term year; and hence it has always been, and still is, a source of dispute among the learned. Some think, that from the beginning of the world to the 160th year of Enoch, mankind reckoned only by weeks; and that the angel Uriel revealed to Enoch the use of months, years, the revolutions of the stars, and the return of the seasons. Some nations formerly made their year to consist of one month, others of four, others of six, others of ten, others of twelve. Some have made one year of winter, another of summer. The beginning of the year was fixed sometimes at autumn; sometimes at spring; sometimes at mid-winter. Some used lunar months, others solar. Even the days have been differently divided; some beginning them at evening, others at morning, others at noon, others at midnight. With some, the hours were equal, both in winter and summer; with others, they were unequal. They counted twelve hours to the day, and twelve to the night. In summer the hours of the day were longer than those of the night; on the contrary, in winter the hours of the night were longest. See Hour.

In some parts of the East, particularly in Japan, says baron Thunberg, the year ending on a certain day, any portion of the foregoing year is taken for a whole year; so that, supposing a child to be born in the last week of our December, it would be reckoned one year old on the first day of January. This sounds like a strange solecism to us: a child not a week old, not a month old, is yet one year old! because born in the old year. If this mode of computation obtained among the Hebrews, the principle of it easily accounts for those anachronisms of single years, or parts of years taken for whole ones, which occur in sacred writ; it removes the difficulties which concern the half years of several princes of Judah and Israel, in which the latter half of the deceased king's last year has hitherto been supposed to be added to the former half of his successor's first year.

YEAR

We cannot but observe how this mode of enumeration clears the phrase "three days," &c. where it occurs, reckoning as the entire first day, whatever small portion of that day was included, even if only a quarter of it; and the same as to the third day; so that a few hours pass for a whole day in this case, as a few months or a few weeks pass for a whole year in the other case.

This may contribute to explain a passage or two which are not commonly seen in this light. 1 Sam. xiii. 1, "A son of one year was Saul in his kingdom; and two years he reigned over Israel," that is, say he was inaugurated in June; he was consequently one year old as king on the first day of January following, though he had only reigned six months; the son of a year: but after [and on] this first of January, he was in the second year of his reign, although, according to our computation, the first year of his reign wanted six months of being completed: in this, his second year, he chose three thousand military, &c. guards. This passage has been noticed as a difficulty; may we now perceive the reason of this remarkable phraseology?

The same principle may account for the phrase (ἀπὸ διετίας) used to denote the age of the infants slaughtered at Bethlehem, (Matt. ii. 16.) "from two years old and under." If these words, as they stand, do not form an absolute contradiction, they come pretty near one. This difficulty has been strongly felt by the learned, and has been made the most of by the antagonists of Christianity—"What," say they, "some infants two weeks old, others two months, others two years, equally slain! Surely those born so long before could not possibly be included in the order, which purposed to destroy a child certainly born within a few months." This is regulated at once, by admitting the existence of this manner of calculating time, or rather of expressing a mode of calculating time; by the idea that they were all of nearly equal age, being all recently born; some not long before the close of the old year, others not long since the beginning of the new year. Now, those born before the close of the old year, though only a few months or weeks, would be in their second year, as the expression implies; and those born since the beginning of the year would be well described by the phrase "and under;" that is, under one year old;—some two years old, though not born a complete twelve-month, (perhaps, in fact, barely six months,) others under one year old, yet born three, or four, or five months; and therefore a few days younger than those previously described: "according to the time which he had diligently inquired of the wise men:"—in their second year and under.

The influence of this remark, on the proper placing of the birth of our Lord, before the death of Herod, is considerable: it lessens, too, the number of infants slain by his order; it draws a strong distinction between those appointed to death, and those allowed to escape; while it shortens the interval between the appearance of the star to the Magi, and their visit to Jerusalem, if we are not mistaken, full one half of what some have allowed for it.

YESTERDAY is used to denote all time past, however distant; as to-day denotes time present, but of a larger extent than the very day on which one speaks: Exod. xxi. 29. "If the ox was wont to push with his horn in time past; Heb. yesterday. And it came to pass, when all that knew him before time; Heb. yesterday; whereas thou earnest but yesterday," 2 Sam. xv. 20, or lately, et al. freq. "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day and for ever," Heb. xiii. 8. His doctrine, like his person, admits of no change; his truths are invariable. With him there is neither yesterday nor to-morrow, but one continued to-day. Job says, (viii. 9.) "We are but of yesterday, and know nothing; because our days upon earth are a shadow."

YOKE. It appears that yokes were of two kinds, as two words are used to denote them in the Hebrew: one refers to such yokes as were put upon the necks of cattle, and in which they labored, Numb. xix. 2. Deut. xxi. 3. The subjects of Solomon complain that he had made his yoke heavy to them, (1 Kings xii. 10.) and they use the same word; but Jeremiah (xxvii. 2.) made him bonds and yokes of another construction, and fitted to the human neck; which he expresses by another word; most probably they were such as slaves used to wear when at labor; however, they were the sign of bondage. We read of yokes of iron, Deut. xxviii. 48; Jer. xxviii. 13. The ceremonies of the Mosaic ritual are called a yoke, (Acts xv. 10; Gal. v. 1.) as also tyrannical authority; but Christ says, his yoke is easy, and his burden is light, Matt. xi. 29.

ZAAANANNIM, a city of Naphtali, (Josh. xix. 33; Micah i. 11.) contracted into Zenan, Josh. xv. 37.

ZABADEANS, Arabians who dwelt east of the mountains of Gilead, and who were overcome by Jonathan Maccabeus, 1 Mac. xii. 31. Calmet thinks that, instead of Zabadeans, which is a name entirely unknown, we should read Nabatheans, as Josephus does.

I. ZABDIEL, father of Jashobeam, commanded the 24,000 men who served in the first month, as the life-guard of David, 1 Chron. xxvii. 2.

II. ZABDIEL, a king of Arabia, who killed Alexander Balas, king of Syria, and sent his head to Ptolemy Philometor, king of Egypt, 1 Mac. xi. 17.

ZACCHEUS, chief of the publicans; that is, former-general of the revenue, Luke xix. When Christ passed through Jericho, Zaccheus greatly desired to see him, but could not, because of the multitude, and because he was low of stature. He therefore ran before, and climbed up into a sycamore tree. Jesus, observing him, called him down, and proposed to become his guest. The result was, that the heart of Zaccheus was opened, and he declared he would make four-fold restitution to all whom he had injured.

I. ZACHARIAH, king of Israel, succeeded his father, Jeroboam II. A. M. 3220, and reigned six months. He did evil in the sight of the Lord, (2 Kings xiv. 29.) and Shallum, son of Jabesh, conspired against him, killed him in public, and reigned in his stead. Thus was fulfilled what the Lord had foretold to Jehu, that his children should sit on the throne of Israel to the fourth generation, 2 Kings xv. 8—11.

II. ZACHARIAH, or ZECHARIAH, a Levite, who was sent by Jehoshaphat throughout Judah, to instruct the people, 2 Chron. xvii. 7.

ZACHARIAH

III. ZACHARIAH, or ZECHARIAH, son of Jehoiada, high-priest of the Jews, and probably the Azariah of 1 Chron. vi. 10, 11, was slain by order of Joash, A. M. 3164, 2 Chron. xxiv. 20—22.

Jerome (on Matt. xxiii.) followed by a great number of commentators, believed that this Zachariah, son of Jehoiada, was he of whom our Saviour speaks in Matt. xxiii. 34, 35. But to this opinion three things are objected: (1.) That Zachariah, son of Barachiah, according to the intention of Christ, seems to have been the last of the prophets, or just, slain by the Jews, as Abel was the first of the just who suffered a violent death. (2.) That Zachariah, son of Jehoiada, was stoned in the court of the house of God; whereas Zachariah, son of Barachiah, was killed between the temple and the altar. (3.) That though it be true that the Hebrews had often two names, it is hardly to be thought that Christ would here omit the name of Jehoiada, which was so well known, and substitute that of Barachiah, which was not so familiar. Calmet, therefore, thinks that our Saviour points at Zachariah, son of Baruch.

IV. ZACHARIAH, or ZECHARIAH, the eleventh of the lesser prophets, was son of Barachiah, and grandson of Iddo. He returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, and began to prophesy in the second year of Darius son of Hystaspes, A. M. 3484, ante A. D. 520, in the eighth month of the holy year, and two months after Haggai. These two prophets, with united zeal, encouraged the people to resume the work of the temple, which had been discontinued for some years, Ezra v. 1.

This prophet has been confounded with Zachariah, son of Barachiah, contemporary with Isaiah, (viii. 2.) and with Zachariah, the father of John the Baptist, which opinion is plainly incongruous. He has been thought to be the Zachariah, son of Barachiah, whom our Saviour mentions as killed between the temple and the altar, though no such thing is any where said of him.

Zachariah begins his prophecy with an exhortation to the people, to return to the Lord, and not to imitate the stubbornness of their fathers. He foretells very distinctly the coming of Christ, a Saviour, poor, and sitting on an ass, and a colt, the foal of an ass. In the eleventh chapter he speaks of the war of the Romans against the Jews, of the breach of the covenant between God and his people; of thirty pieces of silver given for a recompense to the shepherd; of three shepherds put to death in one month, &c.

Zachariah is the longest and the most obscure of the twelve minor prophets. His style is broken and unconnected; but his prophecies concerning the Messiah are more particular and express than those of some other prophets. Several modern critics have been of opinion, that chap. ix.—xi. of this prophet were written by Jeremiah; because in Matt. xxvii. 9, 10, under the name of Jeremiah, we find quoted Zach. xi. 12; and as the chapters make but one continued discourse, they concluded, that all three belonged to Jeremiah. But it is much more natural to suppose, that the name of Jeremiah, by some mistake, has slipped into the text of Matthew.

V. ZACHARIAH, or ZACHARIAS, a priest of the family of Abia, father of John the Baptist, and husband to Elisabeth, (Luke i. 5, 12, &c.) with whom he was righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless. They had no child, because Elisabeth was barren, and they were both well stricken in years; but about fifteen months before the birth of Christ, as Zachariah was waiting his week, and performing the functions of priest in the temple, "there appeared unto him an angel of the Lord, standing on the right side of the altar of incense. And when Zachariah saw him, he was troubled, and fear fell upon him. But the angel said unto him, Fear not, Zachariah; for thy prayer is heard; and thy wife Elisabeth shall bear thee a son, and thou shalt call his name John. And Zachariah said unto the angel, Whereby shall I know this? For I am an old man, and my wife well stricken in years. And the angel answering said unto him, I am Gabriel, that stand in the presence of God; and am sent to speak unto thee, and to show thee these glad tidings. And, behold, thou shalt be dumb, and not able to speak, until the day that these things shall be performed, because thou believedst not my words, which yet shall be fulfilled in their season." See ANNUNCIATION.

The people were waiting till Zachariah came forth out of the holy place; and they were surprised at his long delay. But when he came out, he was not able to speak; and by his making signs to them, they found that he had seen a vision, and had become dumb. When the days of his ministry were completed, that is, at the end of about a week, he returned to his own house; and his wife Elisabeth conceived a son, of whom she was happily delivered in its due time. Her neighbors and relations assembled to congratulate her on this occasion; and on the eighth day they circumcised the child, calling his name Zachariah, after the name of his father; but Elisabeth interposed, and directed his name to be called "John." They then desired a token from his father, who, making signs for a tablet, wrote on it, "His name is John." At this instant his tongue was loosed; he praised God; and, being filled with the Holy Ghost, he prophesied, by a canticle, which Luke has preserved, chap. ii.

ZADOK, or SADOQ, son of Ahitub, high-priest of the Jews, of the race of Eleazar. From the decease of Eli, the high-priesthood had been in the family of Ithamar; but it was restored to the family of Eleazar, in the time of Saul, in the person of Zadok, who was put in the place of Ahimelech, slain by Saul, A. M. 2944, 1 Sam. xxii. 17, 18. While Zadok performed the functions of the priesthood with Saul, Ahimelech performed them with David; so that, till the reign of Solomon, there were two high-priests in Israel, Zadok, of the race of Eleazar, and Ahimelech, of the race of Ithamar, 2 Sam. viii. 17. See ELI, and ABIATHAR.

When David was forced to leave Jerusalem by the rebellion of his son Absalom, Zadok and Abiathar would have accompanied him with the ark of the Lord, (2 Sam. xv. 24.) but the king would not permit them. To Zadok he said, O seer, return into the city with Ahimaash your son, and let Abiathar and his son Jonathan return also. I will conceal myself in the country, till you send me news of what passes. Zadok and Abiathar returned, therefore, to Jerusalem; but their two sons, Ahimaash and Jonathan, hid themselves near the fountain of Rogel; and when Hushai, the friend of David, had defeated the counsel of Ahitophel, they communicated this event to David. Subsequently, Zadok counteracted the party of Adonijah, who aspired at the kingdom, to the exclusion of Solomon, (1 Kings i. 5—10, &c.) and David sent Zadok with Nathan, and the chief officers of his court, to give the royal unction to Solomon, and to proclaim him king instead of his father. After the death of David, Solomon excluded Abiathar from the high-priesthood, because of his adherence to the party of Adonijah; and Zadok was high-priest alone, 1 Kings ii. 35. It is not known when he died; but his successor was his son Ahimaash, who enjoyed the high-priesthood under Rehoboam.

ZALMONAH, an encampment of Israel in the desert, (Numb. xxxiii. 41.) where, as some think, Moses set up the brazen serpent.

ZAMZUMMIM, ancient giants who dwelt beyond Jordan, in the country afterwards inhabited by the Ammonites, Deut. ii. 20. See ANAKIM.

ZARAH, son of Judah and Tamar, Gen. xxxviii 28, 29. He had five sons, Ethan, Zimri, Heman, Caleel and Dara.

ZARED, or ZERED, a brook beyond Jordan, on the frontier of Moab, which falls into the Dead sea. See ZERED.

ZAREPHATH, a city of the Sidonians, between Tyre and Sidon, in Phœnicia, on the coast of the Mediterranean sea, and afterwards called Sarepta. It is between Tyre and Sidon, and was the residence of the prophet Elijah, with a poor woman, during a famine in the land of Israel, 1 Kings xvii. 9, 10.

ZARETH-SHAHAR, a city of Reuben, beyond Jordan, Josh. xiii. 19.

ZARETAN, a town in the land of Manasseh, on this side Jordan, called Zartana, in 1 Kings iv. 12. It is said to be near Beth Shen, which was in the northern limits of Manasseh. From Adam to Zaretan, the waters dried up, (Josh. iii. 16.) from Zaretan upwards, they stood on a heap. The brazen vessels for the temple were cast in the clay ground between Zaretan and Succoth, 1 Kings vii. 46.

ZEAL is taken, (1.) For the eagerness with which any thing is pursued: "I have been very jealous (or zealous) for the Lord God of hosts," 1 Kings xix. 10, 14. I burn with zeal for his honor. "Phineas was zealous for his God, and made an atonement for the children of Israel," Numb. xxv. 13. Judith says that Simeon and his brethren were filled with the zeal of the Lord, to revenge the injury done to their sister, Judith ix. 4.—(2.) Zeal is put for anger: (2 Kings xix. 31.) "the zeal of the Lord of hosts shall do this;" that is, his anger. Ps. lxxix. 5, "How long, Lord? wilt thou be angry for ever? shall thy jealousy (or zeal) burn like fire?" The whole land shall be devoured by the fire of his jealousy, or zeal, Zeph. i. 18; iii. 8.

ZEAL, JUDGMENT OF, see JUDGMENT, ad fin.

The IDOL OF ZEAL (Ezek. viii. 3, 5.) was Adonis; called the idol of jealousy, because he was beloved by Venus; and therefore Mars, stimulated by jealousy, sent a wild boar against him, which killed him. In pursuing the discourse of Ezekiel, we see that the same idol, which at the fifth verse is called the idol of jealousy, is called Thammuz at the fourteenth verse. See ADONIS.

ZEBEDEE, father of the apostles James, and John the evangelist, was a fisherman by profession. His wife was called Salome, and his two sons left him to follow our Saviour, Matt. iv. 21.

ZEBUL, governor of the city of Shechem for Abimelech, son of Gideon, Judg. ix. 28.

I. ZEBULON, the sixth son of Jacob and Leah, (Gen. xxx. 20.) was born in Mesopotamia, about A. M. 2256. His sons were Sereb, Elon and Jahleel, Gen. xli. 14. Moses gives us no particulars of his life; but Jacob in his last blessing (Gen. xlix. 13.) said, "Zebulun shall dwell at the haven of the sea, and he shall be for a haven of ships, and his border shall be unto Zidon." His portion extended to the coast of the Mediterranean, one end of it bordering on this sea, and the other on the sea of Tiberias, Josh. xix. 10. (See CANAAN.) Moses joins Zebulun and Issachar together: (Deut. xxxiii. 18.) "Rejoice, Zebulun, in thy going out; and, Issachar, in thy tents. They shall call the people unto the mountain; there they shall offer sacrifices of righteousness: for they shall suck of the abundance of the seas, and of treasures hid in the sand." Meaning, that these two tribes, being at the greatest distance north, should come together to the temple at Jerusalem, to the holy mountain, and should bring with them such of the other tribes as dwelt in their way; and that, occupying part of the coast of the Mediterranean, they should apply themselves to trade and navigation, and to the melting of metals and glass, denoted by those words, Treasures hid in the sand. The river Belus, whose sand was very fit for making glass, was in this tribe. See GLASS.

When the tribe of Zebulun left Egypt, its chief was Eliab, son of Elon, and it comprehended 57,400 men able to bear arms, Numb. i. 9, 30. In another review, 39 years afterwards, it amounted to 60,500 men, of age to bear arms, Numb. xxvi. 26, 27. The tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali distinguished themselves in the war of Barak and Deborah, against Sisera, the general of the armies of Jabin, Judg. iv. 5, 6, 10; v. 4, 18. It is thought they were the first carried into captivity beyond the Euphrates, by Pul and Tiglath-Pileser, kings of Assyria, 1 Chron. v. 26. But they had the advantage of hearing and seeing Christ in their country oftener and longer than any other of the tribes, Isa. ix. 1; Matt. iv. 13, 15.

II. ZEBULUN, a city of Asher, (Josh. xix. 27.) but probably afterwards yielded to Zebulun, whence it took its name. It was not far from Ptolemais, since Josephus makes the length of lower Galilee to be from Tiberias to Ptolemais. It received the name of Zebulun of men, probably from its great populousness. Elon, judge of Israel, was buried in this city, Judg. xii. 12.

ZECHARIAH, see ZACHARIAH.

ZEDAD, a city of Syria, in the most northern part of the Land of Promise, Numb. xxxiv. 8; Ezek. xlvii. 15.

I. ZEDEKIAH, or MATTANIAH, the last king of Judah, before the captivity of Babylon, was son of Josiah, and uncle to Jeconiah, his predecessor, 2 Kings xxiv. 17, 19. When Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem, he carried Jeconiah to Babylon, with his wives, children, officers, and the best artificers in Judea, and put in his place his uncle Mattaniah, whose name he changed to Zedekiah, and made him promise, with an oath, that he would maintain fidelity to him, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 13; Ezek. xvii. 12, 14, 18. He was 21 years old when he began to reign at Jerusalem, and he reigned there eleven years. He did evil in the sight of the Lord, committing the same crimes as Jehoiakim, 2 Kings xxiv. 18—20; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 11—13. The princes of the people, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, imitated his impiety, and abandoned themselves to all the abominations of the Gentiles.

In the first year of his reign, Zedekiah sent to Babylon, Elasah, son of Shaphan, and Gemariah, son of Hilkiah, probably to carry his tribute to Nebuchadnezzar; and by these messengers Jeremiah sent a letter to the captives of Babylon, Jer. xxix. 1, 2—23. Four years afterwards, either Zedekiah went thither himself, or sent thither, (Jer. xxxii. 12; ii. 59; Baruch i. 1.) his chief design being to entreat Nebuchadnezzar to return the sacred vessels of the temple, Baruch i. 8. In the ninth year of his reign, he revolted against Nebuchadnezzar, (2 Kings xxv.) in consequence of which the Assyrian marched his army into Judea, and took all the fortified places, except Lachish, Azekah and Jerusalem. During the siege of the holy city, Zedekiah often consulted Jeremiah, who advised him to surrender, and denounced the greatest woes against him if he should persist in his rebellion, Jer. xxxvii. 3—10; xxi. But the unfortunate prince had neither patience to hear, nor resolution to follow, good counsel. In the eleventh year of his reign, on the ninth day of the fourth month, (July,) Jerusalem was taken, 2 Kings xxv. Jer. xxxix. lii. The king and his people endeavored to escape by favor of the night; but the Chaldean troops pursuing them, they were overtaken in the plain of Jericho.

Zedekiah was taken and carried to Nebuchadnezzar, then at Riblah, in Syria, who reproached him with his perfidy, caused all his children to be slain before his face, and his own eyes to be put out; and then, loading him with chains of brass, he ordered him to be sent to Babylon, 2 Kings xxv. Jer. xxxii. lii. Thus were accomplished two prophecies, which seemed contradictory; one of Jeremiah, who said that Zedekiah should see, and yet not see, Nebuchadnezzar with his eyes; (chap. xxxii. 4, 5; xxxiv. 3.) the other of Ezekiel, (xii. 13.) which intimated that he should not see Babylon, though he should die there. The year of his death is not known. Jeremiah had assured him (chap. xxxiv. 4, 5.) that he should die in peace; that his body should be burned, as those of the kings of Judah usually were; and that they should mourn for him, saying, Alas, my lord! He reigned eleven years at Jerusalem; and after him the kingdom of Judah was entirely suppressed.

II. ZEDEKIAH, son of Chenaanah, a false prophet of Samaria, (1 Kings xxii. 11.) who put iron horns on his head, and sent to Ahab, king of Israel, saying, "Thus saith the Lord, You shall beat Syria, and toss it up into the air with these horns." The prophet Micaiah, son of Imlah, being sent for, and denouncing the direct contrary, Zedekiah came near him, and giving him a blow on the face, said to him, "Which way went the Spirit of the Lord from me, to do thus to you?" Micaiah answered, "You will see that, when you shall be obliged to hide yourself in an inward chamber." It is not said what became of Zedekiah; but all the prophecies of Micaiah proved true.

III. ZEDEKIAH, son of Maaseiah, a false prophet, who always opposed Jeremiah. Against him, and Ahab, son of Kolaiah, the prophet pronounced a terrible curse: (chap. xxix. 21, 22.) "Of them shall be taken up a curse by all the captivity of Judah which are in Babylon, saying, The Lord make thee like Zedekiah, and like Ahab, whom the king of Babylon roasted in the fire," &c.

ZEEB, a prince of Midian, was found at a wine-press, and slain by the Ephraimites, who sent his head to Gideon beyond Jordan, whither they pursued their enemies, Judg. vii. 25.

ZELAH, a city of Benjamin, (Josh. xviii. 28.) where Saul was buried in the tomb of his father Kish, 2 Sam. xxi. 14.

ZELOTES, a surname given to Simon the Canaanite, one of the apostles. It signifies, properly, one passionately ardent in any cause, a zealot, as in Titus ii. 14, in the Greek. Thus, among the ancient Hebrews, those who, from zeal for the institutions of their religion, reproved or punished such as committed offences against them, were said to be ἠλωταί, zealots. (Comp. Numb. xxv. 6—13; 1 Macc. ii. 40.) In the age of Christ and the apostles, this name was applied particularly to an extensive association of private individuals, who undertook to maintain the purity of the national worship, by inflicting punishment without the form of trial on all who should violate any of the institutions, &c. which they held sacred. They were impelled, as they said, by a more than human zeal; and were certainly guilty of the greatest excesses and crimes. (See Jos. B. J. iv. 6. 3. vii. 8. 1. Jahn, § 321.)

The name Zelotes was, therefore, probably given to Simon from the circumstance of his having been one of the Zelotæ. The name Canaanite, or more properly Canaanite, is also most probably here of the same signification, being derived from the Heb. כנעני, Chald. כנעני, which is entirely equivalent in meaning to Zelotes. *R.

ZENAS, a doctor of the law, and disciple of Paul, Tit. iii. 13.

I. ZEPHANIAH, son of Maaseiah; called (2 Kings xxv. 18.) the second priest, while the high-priest Seraiah performed the functions of the high-priesthood, and was the first priest. It is thought Zephaniah was his deputy, to discharge the duty when the high-priest was sick, or when any other accident hindered him from performing his office. After the taking of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, Seraiah and Zephaniah were taken and sent to Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah, who caused them to be put to death. Zephaniah was sent more than once by Zedekiah to consult Jeremiah. (See chap. xxi. 1; xxxvii. 3.)

II. ZEPHANIAH, son of Cushi, and grandson of Gedaliah, was of the tribe of Simeon, according to Epiphanius, and of mount Sarabata, a place not mentioned in Scripture. The Jews are of opinion, that the ancestors of Zephaniah, recited at the beginning of his prophecy, were prophets. Some have supposed, without foundation, that he was of an illustrious family. We have no exact knowledge, either of his actions, or the time of his death. He lived under Josiah, who began to reign A. M. 3363. The description that Zephaniah gives of the disorders of Judah, leads Calmet to judge, that he prophesied before the eighteenth year of Josiah; that is, before this prince had reformed the abuses and corruptions of his dominions, 2 Kings xxii. Besides, he foretells the destruction of Nineveh, (chap. ii. 13.) which could not fall out before the sixteenth year of Josiah, by allowing, with Berosus, 21 years to the reign of Nabopolassar over the Chaldeans. Therefore we must necessarily place the beginning of Zephaniah's prophecy early in the reign of Josiah. His first chapter is a general threatening against all the people whom the Lord had appointed to slaughter; against Judah; against those who leap over the threshold, i. e. the Philistines, 1 Sam. v. 5. In the second chapter he inveighs against Moab, Ammon, Cush, the Phœnicians, and the Assyrians, and foretells the fall of Nineveh, which happened A. M. 3378. The third chapter contains invectives and threatenings against Jerusalem, but afterwards gives comfortable assurance of a return from the captivity, and of a flourishing condition.

ZEPHATH, a city of Simeon, (Judg. i. 17.) probably the same as Zephathah, near Mareshah, in the south of Judah, 2 Chron. xiv. 10. It was called Hormah, or Anathema, after the victory obtained by Israel over the king of Arad, Numb. xxi. 3; Judg. i. 17.

ZEPHATHAH, THE VALLEY OF, near Mareshah, is mentioned 2 Chron. xiv. 10. It was, perhaps, near Zephath, or Hormah; or, perhaps, it should be read Shephalah, instead of Zephathah.

ZERAH, king of Ethiopia, or Cush, in Arabia Petraea, on the Red sea, and bordering on Egypt, (2 Chron. xiv. 9.) came to attack Asa, king of Judah, with an army of a million of foot, (see ARMIES,) and three hundred chariots of war. Asa went out to meet him, and set his army in battle array in the valley of Zephathah, near Mareshah. He called on the Lord, who cast terror and consternation into the hearts of the Ethiopians, so that they ran away. Asa and his army pursued them to Gerar, and obtained a great booty. See, however, in PHARAOH, p. 742.

ZERED, or ZARED, a brook or torrent which takes its rise in the mountains of Moab, and, running from east to west, falls into the Dead sea. It seems to be the stream which Burekhardt calls Wady Beni Hammad, south of the Arnon, and about five hours north of Kerek, the ancient Charak Moab, Numb. xxi. 12; Deut. ii. 13, 14.

ZEREDA, a city of Ephraim, the native place of Jeroboam, son of Nebat, 1 Kings xi. 26. Perhaps Zerethatha, or Zarthan.

ZERERATH, a city in Manassah, not far from Bethshan, Judg. vii. 22. Also called Zereda, 1 Kings xi. 26, and Zerethatha, 2 Chron. iv. 17; perhaps also Zaretan, the narrow dwellings, Josh. iii. 16, 1 Kings vii. 46, and Zaretanah, 1 Kings iv. 12.

ZERI, son of Jeduthun, the fourth among the twenty-four families of the Levites, which attended in the temple, 1 Chron. xxv. 3, 11.

ZERUBBABEL, or ZOROBABEL, son of Salathiel, of the royal race of David. Matthew (i. 12.) and the Chronicles (1 Chron. iii. 17, 19.) make Jecoonah, king of Judah, to be father of Salathiel, but they do not agree as to the father of Zerubbabel. The Chronicles say Pedaiah was father of Zerubbabel; but Matthew, Luke, Esdras, and Haggai constantly make Salathiel his father. We must, therefore, take the name of son in the sense of grandson, and say that Salathiel having educated Zerubbabel, he was always afterwards considered as his father. Some think that Zerubbabel had also the name of Sheshbazzar, and that he is so called, Ezra i. 8. Josephus and the first book of Esdras describe him as one of the three famous body-guards of Darius, son of Hystaspes; but this must be a mistake, for he returned to Jerusalem long before the reign of Darius, son of Hystaspes.

Cyrus committed to his care the sacred vessels of the temple, with which he returned to Jerusalem, Ezra i. 11. He is always named first, as being chief of the Jews that returned to their own country, Ezra ii. 2; iii. 8; v. 2. He laid the foundations of the temple, (Ezra iii. 8, 9; Zech. iv. 9, &c.) and restored the worship of the Lord, and the usual sacrifices. When the Samaritans offered to assist in rebuilding the temple, Zerubbabel and the principal men of Judah refused them this honor, since Cyrus had granted his commission to the Jews only, Ezra iv. 2, 3. When the Lord showed the prophet Zachariah two olive-trees, near the golden candlestick with seven branches, the angel sent to explain this vision informed the prophet, that these two olive-trees, which supplied oil to the great candlestick, were Zerubbabel, the prince, and Joshua, the high-priest, son of Josedech. Scripture says nothing of the death of Zerubbabel, but it informs us, (1 Chron. iii. 19.) that he left seven sons and one daughter. These were Meshullam, Hananiah, and Shelomith, their sister; Hashuba, Ohel, Berechiah, Hasadiah and Jushabhesed. Matthew (i. 13.) makes the name of one of his sons to be Abiud, and Luke (iii. 27.) makes it Rhesa. Consequently, one of the sons of Zerubbabel, above enumerated, must have had more than one name. See ADOPTION.

ZIBA, a servant to Saul, 2 Sam. ix. When David was expelled from Jerusalem, by his son Absalom, Ziba went to meet him, with two asses loaded with provisions, 2 Sam. xvi. The king gave him all that belonged to Mephibosheth.

ZICHRI, of Ephraim, a very stout and valiant man. He killed Maasiah, son of king Ahaz, Azrikam, the governor of the palace, and Elkanah, who was second after the king, 2 Chron. xxviii. 7.

ZIDON, see SIDON.

ZIF, the second month of the holy year of the Hebrews; afterwards called Jiar; it answers nearly to April, 1 Kings vi. 1. See the JEWISH CALENDAR.

ZIKLAG, a city that Achish, king of Gath, gave to David, when he took shelter among the Philistines, (1 Sam. xxvii. 6.) and which, after that time, always belonged to the kings of Judah. The Amalekites took it, and plundered it, in the absence of David. Joshua had allotted it to the tribe of Simeon, Josh. xix. 5. Eusebius says it lay in the south of Canaan.

ZILLAH, a wife of Lamech, the bigamist. She was mother of Tubal-cain and Naamah, Gen. iv. 21, 22.

I. ZIMRI, son of Zerah, and grandson of Judah and Tamar, 1 Chron. ii. 6.

II. ZIMRI, son of Salu, prince of the tribe of Simeon, who went publicly into the tent of Cozbi, a Midianite woman, and was followed by Phinehas, son of Eleazar the high-priest, who slew him with Cozbi, Numb. xxv. 14.

III. ZIMRI, a general of half the cavalry of Elah, king of Israel, when he rebelled against his master, (1 Kings xvi. 9, 10.) killed him, and usurped his kingdom. He cut off the whole family, not sparing any of his relations or friends; whereby was fulfilled the word of the Lord, denounced to Baasha, the father of Elah, by the prophet Jehu. Zimri reigned but seven days; for the army of Israel, then besieging Gibbethon, a city of the Philistines, made their general, Omri, king, and came and besieged Zimri in the city of Tirzah. Zimri, seeing the city on the point of being taken, burnt himself in the palace with all its riches.

ZIN, a desert south of the Land of Promise. See in EXODUS, p. 419.

ZION, or SION, a mountain of Jerusalem. See SION.

I. ZIPH, the second Hebrew month, 1 Kings vi. 1.

II. ZIPH, son of Jehalaleel, of Judah, and of the family of Caleb; (1 Chron. iv. 16.) he probably gave his name to the city of Ziph, in Judah.

III. ZIPH, a city of Judah, (Josh. xv. 24.) near Hebron, eastward, and in the wilderness of which David kept himself concealed for some time, 1 Sam. xxiii. 14, 15.

IV. ZIPH, another city near Maon and Carmel of Judah, Josh. xv. 55.

ZIPPORAH, or SEPHERA, daughter of Jethro, wife of Moses, and mother of Eliezer and Gershom. When Moses fled from Egypt, (Exod. ii. 16, &c.) he withdrew into Midian, where, having stood up in defence of the daughters of Jethro, priest, or prince, of Midian, against shepherds who would have hindered them from watering their flocks, Jethro took him into his house, and gave him his daughter Zipporah in marriage, by whom he had two sons, Eliezer and Gershom. See MOSES.

ZOAN, a royal city of Egypt, and extremely ancient. Called in Greek Tanis, (Judith i. 10.) and built, no doubt, by emigrants, Numb. xiii. 22; Ps. lxxviii. 12, 43; Isa. xix. 11, 13; xxx. 4; Ezek. xxx. 14.

ZOAR, a city of the Pentapolis, on the southern extremity of the Dead sea, was destined, with the other five cities, to be consumed by fire from heaven; but at the intercession of Lot, it was preserved, Gen. xiv. 2. It was originally called Bela; but after Lot entreated the angel's permission to take refuge in it, and insisted on the smallness of this city, it had the name Zoar, which signifies small or little.

ZOBAB, a kingdom or country of Syria, whose king carried on war with Saul and David, 1 Sam. xiv. 47; 2 Sam. viii. 3; x. 6. It seems to have lain near Damascus, and to have included the city Hamath, (2 Chron. viii. 8.) but also to have extended towards the Euphrates, 2 Sam. viii. 3. *R.

ZOHELETH, a stone near the fountain of Rogel, or En-rogel, just under the walls of Jerusalem, 1 Kings i. 9. The rabbins tell us, that it served as an exercise to the young men, who tried their strength by throwing it, or rather rolling it, or lifting it. Others think it was useful to the fullers, or whitsters, to beat their clothes upon, after they had washed them.

ZOPHAR, the Naamathite, a friend of Job, chap. ii. 11. The LXX call him Sophar, king of the Mineans; the interpreter of Origen makes him king of the Nomades.

I. ZORAH, a city of Judah, (Josh. xv. 33.) built, or rebuilt and fortified, by Rehoboam, 2 Chron. xi. 10.

II. ZORAH, a city of Dan, and the birth-place of Samson, (Judg. xvi. 31.) on the frontier of Dan, and of Judah, not far from Eshtaol. Eusebius places it ten miles from Eleutheropolis, towards Nicopolis, not far from Kaphar-Sorek. Calmet thinks the Zorites, (1 Chron. ii. 54.) and the Zorathites, (1 Chron. iv. 2.) were inhabitants of Zorah.

ZUPH, a Levite, great-grandfather of Elkanah, the father of Samuel, and head of the family of the Zuphim, who dwelt at Ramah; whence it had its name of Ramathaim Zophim, (1 Sam. i. 1; 1 Chron. vi. 35.) and the land of Zuph, 1 Sam. ix. 5.

ZUR, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 58; Neh. iii. 16; 1 Chron. ii. 45; 2 Chron. xi. 7. Called Bethsura, and described as a strong town in 2 Mac. xi. 5.

I. ZUR, a prince of Midian, father of Cozbi, who, with Zimri, was killed by Phinehas, Numb. xxv. 15; xxxi. 8.

II. ZUR, son of Jehiel and Maachah, of Benjamin, inhabitants of Gibeon, 1 Chron. xi. 36; viii. 30.

ZURIEL, son of Abihail, chief of the families of the Mahlites and the Mushites, Numb. iii. 33, 35.

ZURISHADDAI, father of Shelumiel, who was chief of the tribe of Simeon at the exodus, Numbers i. 6.

ZUZIM, certain giants who dwelt beyond Jordan, and were conquered by Chedorlaomer and his allies, Gen. xiv. 5. The Chaldee and the LXX have taken Zuzim in the sense of an appellative, for stout and valiant men. Calmet conjectures the Zuzim to be the Zamzummin of Deut. ii. 20. See ANAKIM.

CALENDAR OF THE JEWS.

THE year of the Hebrews is composed of twelve lunar months, of which the first has thirty days, and the second twenty-nine; and so the rest successively, and alternately. The year begins in autumn, as to the civil year; and in the spring, as to the sacred year. The Jews had calendars, anciently, wherein were noted all the feasts—all the fasts—and all the days on which they celebrated the memory of any great event that had happened to the nation, Zech. viii. 19; Esth. viii. 6, in Græco. These ancient calendars are sometimes quoted in Talmud, (Misna Tract. Taanith, n. 8.) but the rabbins acknowledge that they are not now in being. (Vide Maimonides et Bartenora, in eum locum.) Those that we have now, whether printed or in manuscript, are not very ancient. (Vide Genebrar. Bibliot. Rabinic. p. 319; Buxtorf. Levit. Talmud. p. 1046; Bartoloecci. Bibl. Rabinic. tom. ii. p. 550; Lamy's Introduction to the Scripture; and Plantav. Isagog. Rabbin. ad finem.) That which passes for the oldest, is Megillath Thaanith, "the volume of affliction;" which contains the days of feasting and fasting heretofore in use among the Jews; which are not now observed; nor are they in the common calendars. We shall insert the chief historical events, taken as well from this volume, Thaanith, as from other calendars.

TISRI.

The first month of the civil year; the seventh month of the sacred year. It has thirty days, and answers to the moon of September.

Day 1. New moon. Beginning of the civil year. The feast of trumpets, Lev. xxiii. 24; Numb. xxix. 1, 2.

3. Fast for the death of Gedaliah, 2 Kings xxv. 25; Jer. xli. 2.

The same day, the abolition of written contracts. The wicked kings having forbidden the Israelites to pronounce the name of God, when they were restored to liberty, the Asmoneans, or Maccabees, ordained, that the name of God should be written in contracts after this manner: "In such a year of the high-priest N, who is minister of the most high God," &c. The judges to whom these writings were presented, decreed they should be satisfied; saying, for example, "On such a day, such a debtor shall pay such a sum, according to his promise, after which the schedule shall be torn." But it was found that the name of God was taken away out of the writing; and thus the whole became useless and ineffectual. For which reason they abolished all these written contracts, and appointed a festival day in memory of it. (Megil. Taanith, c. 7.)

5. The death of twenty Israelites. Rabbi Akiba, son of Joseph, dies in prison.

7. A fast, on account of the worshipping the golden calf, and of the sentence God pronounced against Israel, in consequence of that crime, Exod. xxxii. 6—8, 34.

10. A fast of expiation, Lev. xxiii. 19, &c.

15. The feast of tabernacles, with its octave, Lev. xxiii. 34.

21. Hosanna-Rabba. The seventh day of the feast of tabernacles, or the feast of branches.

22. The octave of the feast of tabernacles.

23. The rejoicing for the law, a solemnity in memory of the covenant that the Lord made with the Hebrews, in giving them the law by the mediation of Moses.

On this same day, the dedication of Solomon's temple, 1 Kings viii. 65, 66.

30. The first new-moon of the month Marchesvan.

MARCHESVAN.

The second month of the civil year; the eighth month of the sacred year. It has but twenty-nine days, and answers to the moon of October.

Day 1. The second new-moon, or first day of the month.

6, 7. A fast, because Nebuchadnezzar put out the eyes of Zedekiah, after he had slain his children before his face, 2 Kings xxv. 7; Jer. lii. 10.

19. A fast on Monday and Tuesday, [Thursday?] and the Monday following, to expiate faults committed on occasion of the feast of tabernacles. (Vide Calendar, à Bartoloeccio editum.)

23. A feast, or memorial of the stones of the altar, profaned by the Greeks; which were laid aside, in expectation of a prophet, who could declare to what use they might be applied, 1 Mac. iv. 46. (Megillath, c. 8.)

26. A fast in memory of some places possessed by the Cushites; which the Israelites recovered at their return from the captivity.

A dispute of Rabbin Jochanan, son of Zachai, against the Sadducees, who pretended that the loaves of the first-fruits (Lev. xxiii. 17, 18.) were not to be offered on the altar, but to be eaten hot. (Megil. c. 9.)

KISLEU.

The third month of the civil year; the ninth month of the sacred year. It has thirty days, and answers to our moon of November.

Day 1. New-moon, or the first day of the month.

3. A feast in memory of the idols which the As-moneans threw out of the courts, where the Gentiles had placed them. (Megil. Taanith.)

6. A fast in memory of the book of Jeremiah, torn and burnt by Jehoiakim, Jer. xxxvi. 23.

7. A fast in memory of the death of Herod the Great, son of Antipater; who was always an enemy to the sages. (Megillath, c. 11.)

21. The feast of mount Gerizim. The Jews relate that when their high-priest Simon, with his priests, went out to meet Alexander the Great, the Cutheans or Samaritans went also, and desired this prince to give them the temple of Jerusalem, and to sell them a part of mount Moriah, which request Alexander granted. But the high-priest of the Jews afterwards presenting himself, and Alexander asking him what he desired, Simon entreated him not to suffer the Samaritans to destroy the temple. The king replied to him, that he delivered that people into his hands, and he might do what he pleased with them. Then the high-priest and inhabitants of Jerusalem took the Samaritans, bored a hole through their heels, and tying them to their horses' tails, dragged them along to mount Gerizim, which they ploughed and sowed with tares, just as the Samaritans had intended to do to the temple of Jerusalem. In memory of this event, they instituted this festival. [Comp. Sivan 25.]

24. Prayers for rain. (Calendar Bartolucci.)

25. The dedication, or renewing of the temple, profaned by order of Antiochus Epiphanes, and purified by Judas-Maccabæus, 1 Mac. iv. 52; 2 Mac. ii. 16; John x. 22. This feast is kept with its octave. Josephus says, that in his time it was called the feast of lights; perhaps, he says, because this good fortune, of restoring the temple to its ancient use, appeared to the Jews as a new day. (Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 11.) But the Jewish authors give another reason for the name of lights. They report, that when they were employed in cleansing the temple, after it had been profaned by the Greeks, they found there only one small phial of oil, sealed up by the high-priest, which would hardly suffice to keep in the lamps so much as one night; but God permitted that it should last several days, till they had time to make more; in memory of which, the Jews lighted up several lamps in their synagogues, and at the doors of their houses. (Vide Selden, de Syned. lib. iii. cap. 13.) Others affirm (as the Scholastical History, Thomas Aquinas, cardinal Hughgo, on 1 Mac. iv. 52.) that the appellation of the feast of lights was a memorial of that fire from heaven which inflamed the wood on the altar of burnt-offerings, as related 2 Mac. i. 22.

Some think this feast of the dedication was instituted in memory of Judith. (Vide Sigon, lib. iii. cap. 18. de Republ. Hebr.) But it is doubted whether this ought to be understood of Judith, daughter of Merari, who killed Holofernes; or of another Judith, daughter of Mattathias, and sister of Judas Maccabæus, who slew Nicanor, as they tell us. (Vide Ganz, Zemach David; Millenar. 4. an. 622. et apud Selden, de Synedriis, lib. iii. cap. 13. n. 11.) This last Judith is known only in the writings of the rabbins, and is not mentioned either in the Maccabees, or in Josephus. But there is great likelihood that the Jews have altered the Greek history of Judith, to place it in the time of Judas Maccabæus.

A prayer for rain. Time of sowing begins in Judea.

30. First new-moon of the month Tebeth.

TEBETH.

The fourth month of the civil year; the tenth month of the ecclesiastical year. It has twenty-nine days, and answers to the moon of December.

Day 1. New-moon.

8. A fast, because of the translation of the law out of Hebrew into Greek. This day, and the three following days, were overcast by thick darkness.

The fast of the tenth month. (Calend. Bartolucci.)

9. A fast for which the rabbins assign no reason.

10. A fast in memory of the siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, 2 Kings xxv. 1.

28. A feast in memory of the exclusion of the Sadducees out of the Sanhedrim, where they had all the power in the time of king Alexander Jannæus. Rabbi Simeon, son of Shatach, found means of excluding them one after another, and of substituting Pharisees. (Megillat. Taanith.) [Comp. Jiar 23.]

SHEBET.

The fifth month of the civil year; the eleventh month of the sacred year. It has thirty days, and answers to the moon of January.

Day 1. New-moon, or the first day of the month.

2. A rejoicing for the death of king Alexander Jannæus, a great enemy to the Pharisees. (Megil.)

4 or 5. A fast in memory of the death of the elders, who succeeded Joshua, Judg. ii. 10.

15. The beginning of the year of trees, that is, from hence they begin to count the four years, during which trees were judged unclean, from the time of their being planted, Lev. xix. 23—25. Some place the beginning of these four years on the first day of the month.

22. A feast in memory of the death of one called Niskalemus, who had ordered the placing images or figures in the temple, which was forbidden by the law: but he died, and his orders were not executed. The Jews place this under the high-priest Simon the Just. It is not known who this Niskalemus was. (Megil. c. 11.)

23. A fast for the war of the ten tribes against that of Benjamin, Judg. xx.

They also call to remembrance the idol of Micah, Judg. xviii.

29. A memorial of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes; an enemy of the Jews, 1 Mac. vi. 1. (Megillath.)

30. First new-moon of the month Adar.

ADAR.

The sixth month of the civil year; the twelfth month of the sacred year. It has but twenty-nine days, and answers to the moon of February.

Day 1. New-moon.

7. A fast, because of the death of Moses, Deut. xxxiv. 5.

8, 9. The trumpet sounded, by way of thanksgiving for the rain that fell in this month, and to pray for it in future. (Megillath Taanith.)

9. A fast in memory of the schism between the schools of Shammai and Hillel [called Taanith Tzadehim].

12. A feast in memory of the death of two proselytes, Hollianus and Pipus his brother, whom one Tyrius or Turianus would have compelled to break the law, in the city of Laodicea; but they chose rather to die, than to act contrary to the law. (Selden, de Synedr. lib. iii. cap. 13. ex Megill. Taanith.)

13. Esther's fast; probably in memory of that, Esth. iv. 16. (Geneb. Bartolocci.)

A feast in memory of the death of Nicanor, an enemy of the Jews, 1 Mac. vii. 44; 2 Mac. xv. 30, &c. Some of the Hebrews insist, that Nicanor was killed by Judith, sister of Judas Maccabæus.

14. The first purim, or lesser feast of lots, Esth. ix. 21. The Jews in the provinces ceased from the slaughter of their enemies on Nisan 11, and on that day made great rejoicing. But the Jews of Shushan continued the slaughter till the 15th. Therefore Mordecai settled the feast of lots on the 14th and 15th of this month.

15. The great feast of purim, or lots; the second purim. These three days, the 13th, 14th and 15th, are commonly called the days of Mordecai; though the feast for the death of Nicanor has no relation either to Esther or to Mordecai.

The collectors of the half-shekel, paid by every Israelite, (Exod. xxx. 13.) received it on Adar 13, in the cities, and on the 25th in the temple. (Talmud. Tract. Shekalim.)

17. The deliverance of the sages of Israel, who, flying from the persecution of Alexander Jannæus, king of the Jews, retired into the city of Koslik in Arabia; but finding themselves in danger of being sacrificed by the Gentiles, the inhabitants of the place, they escaped by night. (Megill. Taanith.)

20. A feast in memory of the rain obtained from God, by one called Onias Hammagel, during a great drought in the time of Alexander Jannæus. (Megill. Taanith.)

23. The dedication of the temple of Zerubbabel, Ezra vi. 16. The day is not known. Some put it on the 16th, the calendar of Sigonius puts it on the 23d.

28. A feast in commemoration of the repeal of the decree by which the kings of Greece had forbidden the Jews to circumcise their children, to observe the sabbath, and to decline foreign worship. (Megill. Taanith. et Gemar. ut Tit. Thamith. c. 2.)

When the year consists of thirteen lunar months, they place here, by way of intercalation, the second month of Adar, or Ve-adar.

NISAN, or ABIB. Exod. xiii. 4.

The seventh month of the civil year; the first month of the sacred year. It has thirty days, and answers to the moon of March.

Day 1. New-moon. A fast, because of the death of the children of Aaron, Lev. x. 1, 2.

10. A fast for the death of Miriam, the sister of Moses, Numb. xx. 1. Also in memory of the scarcity of water that happened, after her death, to the children of Israel in the desert of Kadesh, Numb. xx. 2.

On this day every one provided himself a lamb or kid, preparatory to the following passover.

14. On the evening of the 14th they killed the paschal lamb; they began to use unleavened bread, and ceased from all servile labor.

15. The solemnity of the passover, with its octave. The first day of unleavened bread, a day of rest. They ate none but unleavened bread during eight days.

119

After sunset they gathered a sheaf of barley, which they brought into the temple. (Ccd. Menachot. vi. 3.)

Supplication for the reign of the spring. (Geneb.)

16. On the second day of the feast, they offered the barley which they had provided the evening before, as the first-fruits of the harvest. After that time, it was allowed to put the sickle to the corn.

The beginning of harvest.

From this day they began to count fifty days to pentecost.

21. The octave of the feast of the passover. The end of unleavened bread. This day is held more solemn than the other days of the octave; yet they did not refrain from manual labor on it.

26. A fast for the death of Josua, Josh. xxiv. 29.

30. The first new-moon of the month Jiar.

The book called Megillath Taanith does not notice any particular festival for the month Nisan.

JJAR, or IYAR.

The eighth month of the civil year; the second month of the ecclesiastical year. It has but twenty-nine days, and answers to the moon of April.

Day 1. New-moon.

6. A fast of three days for excesses committed during the feast of the passover, that is, on the Monday, Thursday, and the Monday following. (Calendar. Bartolocci.)

7. The dedication of the temple, when the Asmoneans consecrated it anew, after the persecutions of the Greeks. (Megill. Taanith, c. 2.)

10. A fast for the death of the high-priest Eli, and for the capture of the ark by the Philistines.

14. The second passover, in favor of those who could not celebrate the first, on Nisan 15.

23. A feast for the taking of the city of Gaza, by Simon Maccabæus. (Calendar. Scalig. 1 Mac. xiii. 43, 44.)

Or for the taking and purification of the citadel of Jerusalem, by the Maccabees; according to the calendar of Sigonius, 1 Mac. xiii. 49, 53; xvi. 7, 36.

A feast for the expulsion of the Caraites out of Jerusalem, by the Asmoneans or Maccabees. (Meg. Taanith.) [Comp. Tebeth 28.]

27. A feast for the expulsion of the Galileans, or those who attempted to set up crowns over the gates of their temples, and of their houses; and even on the heads of their oxen and asses; and to sing hymns in honor of false gods. The Maccabees drove them out of Judea and Jerusalem, and appointed this feast to perpetuate the memory of their expulsion. (Megill. Taanith.)

28. A fast for the death of the prophet Samuel, 1 Sam. xxv. 1.

SIVAN.

The ninth month of the civil year; the third month of the ecclesiastical year. It has thirty days, and answers to the moon of May.

Day 1. New-moon.

6. Pentecost, the fiftieth day after the passover. Called also the Feast of Weeks, because it happened seven weeks after the passover. We do not find that it had any octave.

15, 1<sup>a</sup>. A feast to celebrate the victory of the Maccabees over the people of Bethsan, 1 Mac. v. 52; xii. 40, 41. (Megill. Taanith.)

17. A feast for the taking of Cæsarea by the Asmoneans; who drove the pagans from thence, and settled the Jews there. (Megill. Taanith.)

22. A fast in memory of the prohibition by Jero-boam, son of Nebat, to his subjects, forbidding them to carry their first-fruits to Jerusalem, 1 Kings xii. 27.

25. A fast in commemoration of the death of the rabbins, Simeon, son of Gamaliel, Ishmael, son of Elisha, and Chanina, the high-priest's deputy.

A feast in memory of the solemn judgment pronounced in favor of the Jews by Alexander the Great, against the Ishmaelites, who, by virtue of their birthright, maintain a possession of the land of Canaan, against the Canaanites, who claimed the same, as being the original possessors, and against the Egyptians, who demanded restitution of the vessels and other things, borrowed by the Hebrews, when they left Egypt. (Vide Megillath Taanith.) But the Gemara of Babylon (Tit. Sanhedrim, c. 11.) puts the day of this sentence on Nisan 14. [Comp. Cisleu 21.]

27. A fast, because rabbi Chanina, the son of Thardion, was burnt with the book of the law.

30. The first new-moon of the month Thammuz.

THAMMUZ, or TAMUZ.

The tenth month of the civil year; the fourth month of the holy year. It has but twenty-nine days, and answers to the moon of June.

Day 1. New-moon.

14. A feast for the abolition of a pernicious book of the Sadducees and Bethusians, by which they endeavored to subvert the oral law, and all the traditions. (Megill. Taanith.)

17. A fast in memory of the tables of the law, broken by Moses, Exod. xxxii. 19.

On this day the city of Jerusalem was taken. The perpetual evening and morning sacrifice was suspended during the siege of Jerusalem by Titus. Epistemon tore the book of the law, and set up an idol in the temple. It is not said whether this happened under Nebuchadnezzar, Antiochus Epiphanes, or the Romans.

AB.

The eleventh month of the civil year; the fifth month of the sacred year. It has thirty days, and answers to the moon of July.

1. New-moon. A fast for the death of Aaron the high-priest.

5. A commemoration of the children of Jethuel, of the race of Judah, who, after the return from the captivity, furnished wood to the temple. (Megill. Taanith.)

9. A fast of the fifth month, in memory of God's declaration to Moses on this day, that none of the murmuring Israelites should enter the land of promise, Numb. xiv. 29, 31.

On the same day the temple was taken and burnt; Solomon's temple first by the Chaldeans; Herod's temple afterwards by the Romans.

18. A fast, because in the time of Ahaz the evening lamp went out.

21. Xylophoria; a feast on which they stored up the necessary wood in the temple. (Selden. Vide Josephus, de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 17.) Scaliger places this festival on the 22d of the next month.

24. A feast in memory of the abolition of a law by the Asmoneans, or Maccabees, which had been introduced by the Sadducees, enacting, that both sons and daughters should alike inherit the estates of their parents. (Megill. Taanith.)

30. The first new-moon of the month Elul.

ELUL.

The twelfth month of the civil year; and the seventh month of the ecclesiastical year. It has but twenty-nine days, and answers to the moon of August.

Day 1. New-moon.

7. Dedication of the walls of Jerusalem by Nehemiah, Ezra xii. 27. We read in Neh. vi. 15, that these walls were finished Elul 25. But as there still remained many things to be done, to complete this work, the dedication might have been deferred to the 7th of Elul of the year following. (Megill. Seld.)

17. A fast for the death of the spies, who brought an ill report of the land of promise, Numb. xiv. 36.

A feast in remembrance of the expulsion of the Romans, [rather the Greeks,] who would have prevented the Hebrews from marrying, and who dishonored the daughters of Israel. When they intended to use violence towards Judith, the only daughter of Mattathias, he, with the assistance of his sons, overcame them, and delivered his country from their yoke. In commemoration of which deliverance, this festival was appointed.

21. Xylophoria; a feast in which they brought to the temple the necessary provision of wood for keeping in the fire of the altar of burnt-sacrifices. The calendar of Scaliger places this feast on the 22d. (Vide the 21st of the foregoing month.)

22. A feast in memory of the punishment inflicted on the wicked Israelites, whose insolence could not be otherwise restrained than by putting them to death; for then Judea was in the possession of the Gentiles. They allowed these wicked Israelites three days to reform; but as they showed no signs of repentance, they were condemned to death. (Megill. Taanith.)

[From the beginning to the end of this month, the cornet is sounded to warn of the approaching new year.]

A GENERAL
CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE
 OF THE
HOLY BIBLE.

The Author places the true date of the birth of Christ four years before the common Era, or A. D.

A. M. 1 corresponds to the 710th year of the Julian Period.

We have added the Chronology adopted by Dr. Hales; and also a reference to the sources of information, both sacred and profane. [It must, however, be borne in mind, that the particularity of the dates here assigned rests chiefly on mere conjecture. R.]

Moses again ascends the mountain; God orders him to bid the people prepare themselves to receive his law. On the third day after that notice, the glory of God appears on the mountain, accompanied by sound of trumpet and thunder. Moses stations the people at the foot of mount Sinai; he alone goes up the mountain. God directs him to forbid the people to ascend, lest they should suffer death. Moses goes down and declares these orders to the people. He then ascends again, and receives the decalogue. . . . . He returns, and proposes to the people what he had received from the Lord. The people consent, and covenant on the terms proposed. . . . . Moses goes again up the mountain; God gives him several judiciary precepts of civil polity. At his return, he erects twelve altars at the foot of the mountain, causes victims to be sacrificed to ratify the covenant, and sprinkles with the blood of the sacrifices the book that contained the conditions of the covenant. He also sprinkles the people, who promise obedience and fidelity to the Lord. . . . . Moses, Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, and seventy elders of Israel, go up the mountain, and see the glory of the Lord. They come down the same day; but Moses, and his servant Joshua, stay there six days longer. The seventh day the Lord calls Moses, and during forty days shows him all that concerned his tabernacle, the ceremonies of sacrifice, and other things. . . . . After these forty days, God gives Moses the decalogue, written on two tables of stone, and bids him hasten down, because Israel had made a golden calf, and was worshipping it. . . . . Moses comes down, and finding the people dancing about their golden calf, he throws the tables of stone on the ground, and breaks them. Coming into the camp, he destroys the calf; slays by the sword of the Levites, three thousand Israelites, who had worshipped this idol. . . . . The day following, Moses again goes up the mountain, and, by his entreaties, obtains from God the pardon of his people. God orders him to prepare new tables for the law; and promises not to forsake Israel. . . . . Moses comes down and prepares new tables; goes up again the day following; God shows him his glory. He continues again forty days and forty nights on the mountain, and God writes a second time his law on the tables of stone. . . . . After forty days, Moses comes down, not knowing that his face shines with glory. He puts a veil over his face, discourses to the people, and proposes to erect a tabernacle to the Lord; to accomplish this, he taxes each Israelite at half a shekel. This occasions a numbering of the people, who amount to 603,550 men. He appoints Bezaleel and Aholiab to oversee the work of the tabernacle. . . . . Construction of the tabernacle, on the first day of the first month of the second year, after the exodus. . . A second numbering of the people, the first day of the second month. . . . . Consecration of the tabernacle, the altars and the priests, the fifth day of the second month. . . . .	Exod. xix. 7, 8. — — 9—15. — — 16—xx. 17. — xx. 18—21. — — 21—xxiv. 8. — xxiv. 9—xxxi. 18. — xxxii. 1—14. — — 15—30 — — 31—xxxiv. 3. — xxxiv. 4—28. — — 29—xxxv. 35. — xxxvi. 1—xl. 33. Numb. i. 1—46. Lev. viii. 1—ix. 24.

				The chronology of this reign is perplexed. 2 Kings xv. 8, 12, places the death of Zachariah in the 38th year of Uzziah, allowing him a reign of but six months. Yet, reckoning what time remains to the end of the kingdom of Israel, we must either admit an interregnum of nine or eleven years, between Jeroboam II. and Zachariah, as Usher does; or

An interregnum of 22 years, after the death of Jeroboam II. Zachariah.

The Romans become masters of the court of the people, in the temple ; they set fire to the galleries. A Roman soldier sets the temple on fire, notwithstanding Titus commands the contrary. . . . . The Romans, being now masters of the city and temple, offer sacrifices to their gods. The last enclosure of the city taken. . . . . John of Gischala, and Simon, son of Gioras, conceal themselves in the common sewers.	lib. v. c. 1. c. 2. c. 7.
4074	70	71	74	Titus demolishes the temple to its foundations. He also demolishes the city, reserving the towers of Hippicos, Phazael and Mariamne. . . . . Titus returns to Rome, to his father Vespasian ; they triumph over Judea. Bassus sent into Judea as lieutenant.	lib. vi. c. 4. c. 8.
4075		72	75	After the death of Bassus, Fulvius Sylva succeeds ; takes some fortresses that still held out in Judea. The temple Onion, in Egypt, shut up by the Romans. An assassin of Judea seduces the Jews of Cyrene, and causes their destruction. . . . . Vespasian causes a strict search to be made for all who are of the race of David.	c. 11
