

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

P R E F A C E.

NEARLY twelve years have elapsed since this Bible-Dictionary was projected, and an understanding came to between the Editor and the Publishers respecting its execution. Circumstances, however, occurred to prevent the actual commencement of the undertaking so early as was intended; and unforeseen delays have occasionally arisen during the progress of publication, prolonging the period of completion considerably beyond the time originally contemplated. When the design was formed Kitto's Cyclopædia was the only English work of the kind, in which the later results of biblical scholarship were applied to the elucidation of Scripture; and though others have appeared since—in particular the learned and comprehensive work edited by Dr. Smith—yet from the plan on which this Dictionary was projected, and the distinctive aims it was intended to realize, there still seems to be a place left which it may without presumption or needless rivalry endeavour to fill.

The circle through which religious inquiry—so far at least as regards an intelligent study of the sacred records—has spread itself in this country, is a progressively expanding one. There is a constantly growing class of persons in different grades of society, who, without any professional study of the languages and literature of the Bible, are yet possessed of sufficient culture, and intelligent interest in sacred things, to dispose and enable them to profit by works in which biblical subjects are handled in the light of modern learning and research, if not overloaded with scholastic forms of expression, or entering into very minute and lengthened investigations. To a certain extent, and as regards all the greater topics and interests of the Bible, the wants of such persons do not materially differ from those of a vast proportion of the ministers of the gospel, who with limited resources, and with comparatively little time for independent research and continuous study, require to have at command a store-house of knowledge on biblical subjects in a compendious form. And in an age like the present, in which knowledge generally is so much increased, in which also speculation in divine things is so rife, and weapons are so busily plied within as well as without the pale of the visible Church to undermine the foundations and pervert the teaching of the Word of God, it is of the greatest moment that helps of the kind now indicated should be amply provided—such helps especially as combine with the fruits of enlightened and careful inquiry sound principles of Scriptural interpretation, and are not too voluminous or expensive to be accessible to an extensive circle of readers.

It was with such views and aims that this Bible-Dictionary was undertaken, and has been carried out; and with reference to these it ought to be judged. It were vain, however, to expect that it could preserve throughout a method equally appropriate to one and all of its readers. Embracing such a manifold variety of topics, and topics that stand related to such distant climes and remote ages, it could scarcely fail that, in the hands even of a single writer, some articles would run out to points that may seem to a class needlessly minute, others bearing too much the impress of a learned antiquarianism, or an argumentative theology; and with the employment of a number of writers the probability that such may occasionally happen naturally becomes greater. It should not, therefore, excite any surprise, if articles on certain subjects should be found which will scarcely be interesting, or in some parts altogether intelligible, except to those who have made biblical learning their proper study. The work would not accomplish its purpose, without grappling with the questions and the difficulties which inevitably require articles of such a description—while still it will be found that they form no great proportion of the whole, and that the work in its general tenor and substance is adapted to the use of persons who have enjoyed a good ordinary education.

Above all other books the Bible stands pre-eminent for its profoundly ethical character and aim; keeping constantly in view, amid all its variety of matter and form, the high purposes of a revelation from heaven. This it has been the endeavour also of the writers of this work to bear in mind, convinced that no defence or elucidation of Scripture will adequately serve its purpose, apart from an insight into the spiritual design as well as the supernatural character of revelation. The work, therefore, is based on the inspiration of the sacred volume, as the unerring record of God's mind and will to men; and while it does not needlessly obtrude, yet neither does it evade, the topics which more peculiarly distinguish it as such a revelation; it takes them in their proper order, as forming an integral and essential part of the volume which it has for its object to explain and vindicate. In the lives, also, of the more prominent actors in sacred history respect has commonly been had to the spiritual meaning of their course, and the relations they respectively held to the higher purposes of the divine administration. The method, no doubt, carries with it certain difficulties and perils; for in the present divided state of Christendom it is impossible to traverse thus the wide domain of Scripture without occasionally striking on the cherished convictions of some most intelligent and conscientious believers. It should be enough, in such a case, if no needless offence is given (as none such, it is hoped, will be found here); for it were an unworthy compromise, and unlike the spirit of the Bible, for the sake of a few minor differences to practise a general reserve on the great themes of salvation, and treat the several parts of revelation merely as the component items or accidental accompaniments of an external and lifeless framework.

In the carrying out of such a plan it will be understood there is at once a general and an individual responsibility—the one that of the Editor, the other that of the several contributors. The Editor is responsible for whatever may be said to bear on the professed scope and distinctive principles of the undertaking: the blame is his if anything should appear at variance with the divine character and teaching of Scripture, inconsistent with the great principles of truth and duty, or palpably defective and erroneous in the discussion even of comparatively common topics. But within these limits each writer is responsible for his own contributions; and as it is of the utmost importance that every article should bear the stamp of its author's vein of thought and untrammelled convictions, so there may be occasional expressions of opinion, and occasional interpretations of texts, to which the Editor does not hold himself committed; as there may be also in his own portions of the work certain things in which some of his fellow-labourers will be inclined to differ from him. But such differences, he is convinced, are comparatively few, and form no serious abatement on the prevailing concord of sentiment.

The subjects formally treated are such as strictly belong to a dictionary of the Bible; but for the sake partly of convenience, and partly on account of references frequently made to them in discussions on the Bible, the books and some of the more prominent characters of the Apocrypha are briefly noticed. The remarkable sect of the ESSENES, also, belongs to the same class. The names of persons and of subjects generally are, with few exceptions, given as they appear in our English Bible; and when they happen to differ from the form found in the original text, such differences are carefully noted at the beginning, or in the course of the article. As a rule, whenever anything depends on the precise phraseology of the original, the original itself is adduced. There are, however, certain subjects in respect to which the usual designations in our English Bible are either not sufficiently definite, or have now been commonly supplanted by others; such as DECALOGUE, DELUGE, HADES, PALESTINE, PENTATEUCH, SANHEDRIM, which are fitter expressions for the subjects requiring to be handled under them than any to be found in our English Scriptures, and they have accordingly been adopted.

All the names of persons and places contained in the Bible, it is expected, will be found in this Dictionary; but with a view to economy of space, and a consequent saving of expense, a considerable number of names of persons, of whom nothing particular is known, which appear only in groups or genealogies, and some also of the more obscure places, have been given only in an Appendix, with a reference to the passage or passages where the names occur. The line betwixt these and certain others which have found a place in the body of the work is at times certainly a somewhat indefinite one; a few, it is possible, might without disadvantage, some may even think with propriety, have changed places; but the number of such cannot be very many. A second Appendix or Index has been prepared of the texts which have received incidental illustration in the course of the work. In this list such texts only are included as have had some light thrown on their meaning, and of these only such as are less immediately connected with the subjects under which they occur, not texts merely referred to, or those which every considerate reader might see to be necessarily involved in the treatment of those subjects. Both lists have been prepared by the Rev. Sinclair Manson.

The Editor desires at the close of his labours to acknowledge his great obligations to the gentlemen who have lent him their valuable and hearty co-operation. To some he is more peculiarly indebted, having respectively taken an entire series of subjects, relating to specific departments; in particular, the Rev. E. A. Litton, who, along with some kindred topics, has discoursed of the life and epistles of St. Paul; the Rev. Dr. Hamilton, and Mr. P. H. Gosse, who have respectively charged themselves with the botanical and the zoological departments; and Professors Weir, Douglas, and Eadie, who have each furnished a considerable variety of articles on topics relating to the Old Testament. Similar mention should also be made of the chief writers of the more elaborate topographical articles—Dr. Bonar, the Rev. E. Wilton, the Rev. J. Rowlands—who have enriched the work with the results of much personal observation, painstaking research, and discriminating study, in connection with a large number of places (some of less, some of greater note). Mainly by a growing fulness and particularity in this class of subjects has the work come to exceed the dimensions originally intended; but this enlargement will, it is hoped, be found amply compensated by the increased interest and value imparted by such contributions. Mr. Wilton was suddenly cut off in the midst of his labours; but not without having done good service both here and in his separate treatise (The Negeb, or South Country of Scripture) in vindicating the minute accuracy and truthfulness of Scripture. Two other fellow-labourers, it may be added, have been called to their rest before this work has reached its completion—the Rev. John Macdonald and Professor Lindsay.

All the articles—except those for which the Editor is himself responsible—are marked at the close by the initials of the several writers. He would willingly have had more with these, so that less (especially in the earlier part) might have devolved upon himself. He owes, however, to his friend and colleague Professor Douglas, beside many contributions on Old Testament subjects, the greater part of the minor articles, not initialed, in letter B. Two articles, it will be observed, are from the pens of continental contributors—those on the books of Isaiah and Psalms—and this chiefly on account of the extent to which these peculiar and very precious portions of Old Testament Scripture have been subjected by the rash speculations and disturbing criticism of German theologians. It seemed most for the benefit of the work (besides serving as a pleasing link of connection between home and foreign labourers in the same great field) that those portions should be handled by persons who, from their intimate acquaintance with the theological literature of their country, and their own personal eminence in connection with it, might be considered in a special manner qualified to do justice to the subjects. Such, beyond doubt, are Professors Delitzsch and Oehler.

Very particular attention has been given to the illustrations, which include representations of the plants and animals mentioned in Scripture, its more notable scenes and places, eastern garbs and manners, and the remains of ancient skill and handicraft, whether as connected with domestic, social, or religious life, in Palestine and the surrounding countries. Maps also and plans, of a convenient form and carefully executed, have been interspersed to illustrate the topography of some special localities. In addition to such pictorial helps, a series of views representing some of the places which the Bible narrative has invested with peculiar interest, accompanies the work.

No one who has had any experience in the practical management of such a work can need to be told of the extreme difficulty of preventing occasional omissions and slips of a minor kind from creeping in. Besides a few errata given elsewhere, including the ascription to Professor Porter of a particular view respecting Bozra, a few subjects (DILL, SPOIL, TYPE, WATER, WILD VINE) were by some oversight omitted in their proper places. They will be found in a brief Supplement, along with an article on ESHTAOL, left in writing by Mr. Wilton, which from its relation to ZORAH (also prepared by him, and inserted in its proper place) it has been thought advisable to preserve.

AARON [properly Aharon, but derivation and meaning unknown], the brother of Moses, and the first high-priest among the Israelites. He was the eldest son of Amram and Jochebed, both of the tribe of Levi, and of the most honourable family of that tribe; for, on the occasion of a contest among the tribes as to rights and privileges, when each tribe had to be represented by its proper head, the tribe of Levi was represented by Aaron, Nu. xvii. 3. He was three years older than Moses, Ex. vii. 7, and appears to have been born either before the cruel edict of Pharaoh was issued respecting the destruction of the male children of the Israelites, or before families were brought into much distress by its operation. We know nothing of Aaron's earlier history, excepting that he married Eliaheba, one of the daughters of Amminadab, of the tribe of Judah, by whom he had four sons, Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar, Ex. vi. 23; but from the time that the divine purpose to deliver Israel from the yoke of Egypt began to take effect, Aaron stood next to Moses in the transactions that led to its accomplishment. He had even, it would seem, set out to consult with Moses upon the subject before the deliverer appeared upon the field of conflict; for Moses was informed by the Lord at the burning bush that his brother Aaron was already on the way to meet him, Ex. iv. 14. He was then eighty-three years old, and it says much at least for his alacrity of spirit, and for the general vigour of his frame, that, at so advanced an age, he should have been ready to make common cause with his brother in such a vast and perilous undertaking.

In the work of deliverance itself, as in the important transactions that followed, the part assigned to Aaron, though inferior to that of Moses, was one of high consideration and great influence. As Moses stood in the room of God, issuing from time to time the orders of Heaven, so Aaron stood in the room of Moses, and acted as his prophet or spokesman to make known to Pharaoh what Moses put into his mouth, Ex. iv. 14-16; vi. 1, 2. For this office, it is intimated, he was specially qualified on account of his natural fluency of speech, a talent in which his more gifted brother was peculiarly deficient. When the terrible conflict with the king of Egypt was over, and a fresh struggle had to be encountered on the edge of the desert with the forces of Amalek, Aaron again stood beside Moses in the same brotherly and subordinate relation—he and Hur bearing up together the hands of the man of God, with his rod pointing to heaven, in token of their dependence on the aid of the Most High, and their acknowledgment of Moses as the special ambassador of Heaven, Ex. xvii. 2. Aaron, however, was not always so steadfast in thus adhering to his place and calling; and, like many who are fitted by nature for acting only a secondary part, he was too easily moved by the circumstances of the moment. This appeared especially on the occasion of the general apostasy, which took place during the absence of Moses on the mount, and when the people prevailed on Aaron to make for them a molten image. The elder Jewish writers have laboured hard to vindicate Aaron from the charge of idolatry on this unhappy occasion. He yielded, some of them have alleged, to the people's wishes in the matter, only that he might prevent their perpetrating the greater crime of laying violent hands on himself, in case he had resisted their importunate demands; others, that he might protract the business till Moses should return and arrest its execution; and others still, again, that he might render the apostasy less complete, by proclaiming a festival to Jehovah, under the symbol of the calf, not to the calf itself (Bochart, Hieros. l. ii. c. 34). But we find no such palliations of his conduct in Scripture. With its wonted and stern impartiality it represents him as having contributed to bring a great sin upon the people, and made them naked to their shame before their enemies, Ex. xxxii. 21-26. Moses even speaks of having made his sin the subject of special intercession, as being one of peculiar aggravation, De. ix. 20. It was not, however, that Aaron prompted, or in any proper respect headed the apostasy; but only that he showed himself too facile in giving way to the evil, instead of using the authority and influence he possessed to withstand it. Such, too, appears to have been the part he acted on the next occasion of backsliding, when, along with Miriam, he yielded to a spirit of envy against Moses, and reproached him, both for having married an Ethiopian woman and for assuming too much to himself, Nu. xii. Miriam was plainly the ringleader in this more private outbreak, since she is both mentioned first, and on her, as the more guilty party, the special judgment of Heaven comes down.

The only other occasion on which Aaron is charged with open transgression was at that fearful tumult which arose in the desert of Zin, on account of the want of water, and which overcame even the stronger faith and more patient endurance of Moses, Nu. xx. 1-13. (See MOSES.) It betrayed a failure, if not in the principle of faith, at least in its calm and persistent exercise. And, happening as it did at a comparatively late period in the wilderness sojourn, and too palpably indicating an imperfect sanctification in the two leaders, they were, partly on their own account, and partly as a solemn lesson to others, alike adjudged to die, without being permitted to enter the promised land. Still, notwithstanding such occasional failures, Aaron was undoubtedly, for the period, a man of distinguished excellence and worth, and is fitly designated "the saint of the Lord," Ps. cv. 16. In his appointment to the sacred and honourable office of high-priest, we may as little doubt that respect was had to his habitual piety, as there was to the peculiar gifts and qualifications of Moses in his destination to the work of mediator and deliverer. As high-priest, the privilege belonged to Aaron of drawing near to God, and ministering in his immediate presence—a privilege which emphatically required the possession of holiness in him who enjoyed it. This was symbolically represented in the manifold rites of sacrifice, washing, and anointing, through which he received consecration to the office, Le. viii. 13. (See PRIEST.) The hallowed dignity of the high-priestly office of Aaron, great and honourable in itself, appears yet more so, when viewed in the typical relationship which it bore to the priesthood of Christ. There were certain obvious differences between them, and in these differences marks of inferiority on the part of Aaron and his successors in office, which it became necessary to render prominent in New Testament scripture, on account of the mistaken and extravagant views entertained regarding the religion of the old covenant by the pharisaical Jews of later times. For this reason, the priesthood of Melchizedec had to be exalted over the priesthood of Aaron, as foreshadowing more distinctly some of the higher and more peculiar elements of the Messiah's priestly function, He. vii. But there still was both a closer and a more varied relation between the priesthood of Aaron and that of Christ. For it was a priesthood exercised in immediate connection with the tabernacle, which the Lord had himself planned, and chosen for his holy habitation—a priesthood which, in every feature of its character and calling, in the personal qualifications required for it, the vestments worn by it, the honours and privileges it enjoyed, and the whole train of occasional as well as of regular ministrations appointed for its discharge, had a divinely ordained respect to the better things to come in Christ. All were, indeed, but shadows of these better things; yet they were shadows bearing throughout the form and likeness of what was hereafter to be revealed. And it cannot but be regarded as a high honour assigned to Aaron, that he should have been constituted the head of an order which had such lofty bearings, and was to find such a glorious consummation.

But taken even in respect to its more immediate relations and interests, there was a not unnatural tendency to pay regard to the honour connected with the office, rather than to the holiness essential to its proper discharge. And so a formidable conspiracy, headed by Korah (himself of the tribe of Levi), Dathan, and Abiram, sprung into existence, on the ground that the members of the congregation generally were holy, and had an equal right to draw near in sacred offices to God with Aaron and Moses, Nu. xvi. The result was the destruction of those who thus conspired, by the immediate judgment of God; and occasion was also taken from the transaction, by the trial of the rods, to render manifest the divine choice of Aaron to the peculiar honours of the priesthood, and of the tribe of Levi to the discharge of sacred functions. The almond-rod of each tribe, with the distinctive name inscribed on it, being laid up before the Lord, the rod of Aaron alone was found to bring forth buds, and bloom blossoms, and yield almonds, Nu. xvii.—a miraculous sign that the great Giver of life and fruitfulness was to be with Aaron and his sons in their sacred ministrations, but not with those who should presume of their own accord to intermeddle with the functions of the priesthood. It proclaimed that, in this respect, as in others, the divine order must be kept, if the divine blessing was to be experienced; and not a greater good could be found by traversing it, but only the loss of that which might otherwise be secured. The action of Aaron in the midst of the pestilence, which broke out immediately after the destruction of the conspirators, had even already pointed in the same direction. The people, it is said, murmured against Moses and against Aaron, and gathered together in a hostile attitude on the day after the destruction of Korah and his company—as if these two men of God had been personally chargeable with the evil that had taken place, and had even caused the death of those who perished. This was manifestly a great aggravation of the guilt which had been incurred, and was a virtual abetting, on the part of the congregation, of the sin of the rebels, while the brand of Heaven's condemnation was still fresh upon it. One cannot, therefore, wonder that a destroying plague from the Lord broke out among the people; and the plague being stayed, when, at the command of Moses, Aaron, as the high-priest, rushed forth with his censer, filled with live coals from the altar, and stood between the living and the dead, the visible attestation of Heaven was given to the acceptance and worth of his priestly intercession, Nu. xvi. 46, 47.

The only other circumstance of moment noticed in the life of Aaron is one that occurred probably at a much earlier period than the transactions last mentioned—the loss, namely, he sustained in the death of his two sons, Nadab and Abihu, who were struck dead while ministering with strange fire in the priest's office, Le. x. 1-6. Aaron seems to have conducted himself with a subdued and chastened spirit on the occasion; bowed down beneath the stroke, yet breathing no complaint against its severity. His own death, which occurred in the last year of the sojourn in the wilderness, when he was 123 years old, is said in the earlier notices to have taken place on the top of Mount Hor, and in the later at Mosera, Nu. xx. 27-29; xxxiii. 38; comp. with De. x. 6. This Mosera, however, is only to be regarded as the name of the encampment at Mount Hor, where the closing scene occurred. At the command of God, Moses went up to the mount, accompanied by Aaron and his son Eleazar, in the sight of all the congregation; and there, withdrawn from mortal gaze, under the eye of Heaven, and as in the precincts of the upper sanctuary itself, the venerable high-priest was "gathered to his people," after having yielded to Eleazar the consecrated robes which he had so long worn as the minister of the earthly tabernacle. What a solemn and impressive scene! impressive in the very silence and secrecy that attended it! Nor was it without mysterious meaning to the people in whose behalf he had ministered before the Lord; for by such a veil being thrown around the decease of Aaron, coupled with the skyey elevation where it was appointed to take place, on a "heaven-kissing hill," they had the high-priest of their profession associated in their minds only with living ministrations, of the mountain ranges of Anti-Libanus, bursts out through a tremendous gorge in the hills, about two miles to the north-west of Damascus, and rushes down into the plain. The Pharpar, which is identified with the modern Awaj, enters the plain at its western extremity, and pursuing its course eastward, and to the south of the city, sends what remains of it into the Bahret-Hijaneh—the southernmost of the three lakes that lie to the east of Damascus. That part of the plain, therefore, in which Damascus lies, and the city itself, are indebted for the ample supply of water they enjoy entirely to the Barada, whose endlessly subdivided streams not only find their way into every field and garden around the city, but into every street and every court of a house within the city itself. Beyond the city its reunited waters flow eastwards, and finally fall partly into the Bahret-es-Shurkiyeh, and partly into the Bahret-el-Kibliyeh, other two lakes to the east of the city."—(Buchanan's Clerical Furlough.)

ABA'RIM, the name of a mountain chain, on the east of Jordan, over against Jericho, and of which Nebo, Peor, and Pisgah were so many summits. It is a plural word, and signifies the passages or passes. In De. xxxii. 49, Mount Nebo is spoken of as belonging to it: "Get thee up into this mountain Abarim, unto Mount Nebo;" and again, Mount Nebo is associated with Pisgah in a way that indicates the one to have been only a higher elevation of the same range: "Moses went up from the plains of Moab unto the mountain of Nebo, to the top of Pisgah, that is over against Jericho," De. xxxiv. 1. Mention is also made in two passages, Nu. xxi. 11; xxxiii. 44, of Ije-abarim, which means "heaps of Abarim," probably a particular section of the same chain. The chain itself reaches from the Dead Sea eastward towards the wilderness, and belonged to what were anciently the territories of Moab and Ammon.

and were taught to consider his function, when reaching its earthly close, not so properly expiring, as rising aloft and commingling in blessed fellowship with the glories of a higher region.

AARONITES, mentioned in 1 Ch. xii. 27, xxvii. 17, were simply the descendants of Aaron, the members of the priesthood.

AB, a late name, introduced after the return from Babylon, for the fifth month of the Jewish year. It never occurs under this appellation in Scripture. (See MONTH.)

ABADDON, the Hebrew name for the angel of the bottomless pit in Re. ix. 11 (אֲבַדּוֹן), and corresponding to the Greek Apollyon (ἀπολλύων), destroyer. It is plainly but another name for the prince of darkness, expressing what he is in respect to the pernicious and deadly character of the agencies he employs.

ABANA, a river of Damascus, 2 Ki. v. 12, where it is mentioned along with Pharpar, another river, by Naaman, the Syrian general. The name nowhere else occurs in Old Testament scripture, nor is it found in any other ancient writings. It is now, and has always been, one of the chief felicities connected with the natural situation of Damascus, that the town itself, and the neighbouring district, have a constant and copious supply of water from the rivers that flow through it. The Abana, being first named in the passage from Kings, is commonly identified with the chief river Barada, "which, taking its rise far away in the heart

ABBA, the Chaldaic form of the Hebrew word for father. In New Testament scripture it occurs in addresses to God; once by Christ, Mar. xiv. 36, and twice by the apostle Paul, Ro. viii. 16; Ga. iv. 6, coupled with the Greek synonym (πάτερ), as if nothing but the familiar and endeared expression could adequately express the feelings of the heart. In the two passages referred to from St. Paul's writings, the use of the expression is regarded as a mark of the filial confidence and liberty belonging to believers in gospel times—not, probably, without some respect to the ancient custom of forbidding slaves to employ the term in addressing their owners. And it is remarkable that while, in Old Testament times, the Lord revealed himself as a father to Israel, even called Israel his first-born, and sometimes challenged them to address him by the corresponding title, as in Je. iii. 4, "Wilt thou not from this time cry unto me, My Father, thou art the guide of my youth?" yet, in reality, the saints of the Old Testament never appear to have done so. Not even in the Psalms, with all the fulness and fervency of their devotional breathings, does the suppliant ever rise to the true filial cry of Abba, Father. The spirit of bondage still, to some extent, rested upon the soul, and repressed the freedom of its intercourse with heaven. The new and more filial spirit takes its commencement with Jesus, who, even at his first appearance in the temple, used the emphatic words, My Father, Lu. ii. 49; and in all the recorded utterances of his soul towards the sanctuary above, excepting the cry of agony on the cross, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" constantly addressed God by the appellation of FATHER, Jn. xi. 41; xii. 27, 28; xvii. 1, 5, &c.; Lu. xxii. 42; xxiii. 34, 46, &c. By the "Our Father," also, at the commencement of the Lord's Prayer, he puts this endearing appellation into the mouth of all his disciples, as by the freedom of access to the holiest, which he provided for them by his blood, he rendered the use of it suitable to their condition. Most fitly, therefore, is the Abba, Father, given by the apostle Paul, as the distinctive symbol or index of a true Christian relation.

ABDON [serviceable]. 1. A city of the tribe of Asher, made one of the cities of the Levites, and given to the families of Gershom, Jos. xxi. 30; 1 Ch. vi. 74.—2. The name of one of the judges who, before the institution of the kingdom, ruled over Israel. He was the son of Hillel, an Ephraimite, and judged Israel for eight years, Ju. xii. 13-15.—3. Two other persons are mentioned under this name, of whom nothing particular is known, 1 Ch. viii. 30; x. 36; 2 Ch. xxxiv. 20.

ABED'NEGO [the servant of Nego], the name imposed by the officer of the king of Babylon on Azariah, one of Daniel's godly companions, Da. i. 7. He is only mentioned in connection with Shadrach and Meshach, who united with him in resisting the decree of Nebuchadnezzar to worship his golden image, and chose rather to brave the appalling terrors of the fiery furnace, from which they were miraculously delivered, Da. iv. 28. (See NEBUCHADNEZZAR.)

A'BEL [emptiness, vanity], the second son of Adam and Eve. Why such a name should have been conferred upon him we are not told. Possibly something in his personal appearance might have suggested the derogatory appellation; or, what is fully more probable, this name, by which he is known to history, was occasioned by his unhappy fate, and expressed the feelings of vexation and disappointment which that affecting tragedy awakened in the bosoms of his parents. The rather may this explanation be entertained, as the name in Abel's case is not, as it was in Cain's, connected with the birth. It is not said, Eve brought forth a son, and called him Abel; but, after recording the birth of Cain, and the reason of his being so designated, the sacred narrative simply relates of Eve, "And she again bare his brother Abel," Ge. iv. 2. It was quite natural that the vanity which was so impressively stamped upon his earthly history should have been converted into his personal designation. The notice of his birth is immediately followed by that of his occupation in after life: he "was a keeper of sheep," while Cain was "a tiller of the ground"—two different lines of pursuit, as was natural in the circumstances; but, so far from presenting any necessary antagonism, fitted rather to co-operate and work to each other's hands. Yet out of this diversity of worldly pursuit arose, it would seem, that deadly strife which ended in the murder of Abel—it furnished the incidental occasion, though certainly not the real cause of the quarrel. "And in process of time," it is said, "Cain brought of the fruit of the ground an offering unto the Lord. And Abel, he also brought of the firstlings of his flock, and of the fat thereof." So far, it might seem, all was quite natural; each took a portion of the increase which the Lord had been pleased to grant him, in that particular line of husbandry to which he had chosen to apply himself, and presented it as a sacred oblation to the Lord. Yet the result was widely different in the two cases; for, it is added, "the Lord had respect unto Abel and to his offering, but unto Cain and to his offering he had not respect." There must, therefore, have been some fundamental difference, such as made it a righteous thing for God to accept the one worshipper and his offering, and reject the other. Wherein did that consist? Was it in the diverse kind of offering? or in the spirit and behaviour respectively characterizing the offerers?

The original narrative is so brief, that it does not afford a quite ready or obvious solution of these questions. It plainly enough, however, charges sin upon Cain, and even an obstinate adherence to sin, as the ground of his rejection. When by some visible token—possibly by the descent of fire from heaven, or by a lightning flash from between the cherubim at the east of the garden consuming the sacrifice—the Lord gave indication of his acceptance of Abel's offering, to the exclusion of Cain's, "Cain was very wroth, and his countenance fell. And the Lord said unto Cain, Why art thou wroth? and why is thy countenance fallen? If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted? And if thou doest not well, sin lieth at the door. And unto thee shall be his desire, and thou shalt rule over him." So the passage stands in the authorized English version. Some have proposed instead of "sin," to substitute "sin-offering;" on the ground that the Hebrew word for sin is sometimes put for sin-offering, and that the head and front of Cain's offence was his stout-hearted refusal to offer an animal sacrifice for the atonement of sin. It is fatal to this view, however, that what were distinctively called sin-offerings were only introduced at the giving of the law by Moses, till which time the burnt-offering was the proper expiatory sacrifice, and it is never designated by the word for sin. There can be little doubt that the rendering by sin is to be adhered to as correct, only sin is personified as a seducer; and if, in the last clause, the masculine pronoun his is retained, it should be understood as referring to sin, the only proper antecedent, and not to Abel. The more exact translation would be, "If thou doest good, shall there not be acceptance? And if thou doest not good, sin coucheth at the door; and unto thee shall be its desire, and thou shalt rule over it." Her words at the close refer to what was said of Eve, in her relation to Adam, and Adam's proper relation to her, Ge. iii. 16. And the meaning of the whole is, that the real root of the evil, which caused Cain's annoyance and anger, lay with himself, in his refusing to acknowledge and serve God as his brother did; that, if he should still continue in this refusal, the sin which he cherished would do the part of a tempter to him, as Eve had done to Adam—its desire would be towards him, to lead him astray; but it became him rather to do the manly part, and rule over it.

It thus appears from the narrative itself, that a sinful principle had the ascendancy in Cain's bosom, and was the real cause of the disrespect that was shown to him and to his offering. On the other hand, it was a righteous principle in Abel which secured for him a place in the divine favour and blessing. Such, also, is the testimony of the apostle John, when he says of Cain, "he was of the wicked one and slew his brother. And wherefore slew he him? Because his own works were evil, and his brother's righteous," 1 Jn. iii. 12. This, however, is still general, and indicates nothing as to where we are to seek the righteous principle in the one brother, and the unrighteous principle in the other. But in the Epistle to the Hebrews more specific information is furnished, when it is said, "By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent [literally, a greater] sacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witness that he was righteous, God testifying of his gifts," He. xi. 4. Here the matter is traced up to its root—to faith in the one brother, which rendered him a righteous person, and made his offering what God could own and bless; and to the want of faith in the other, which left him in guilt and condemnation. But this faith must have been something more than a general belief in God, and an acknowledgment of him as the supreme object of worship, for that belonged to Cain as well as to Abel. It must have been faith in God as to the specific kind of worship and service which he had made known to them as acceptable in his sight. And so the conclusion forces itself upon us, that the difference in respect to the offerings presented was no accidental thing, but the native result of the different states of the two brothers; that Abel's animal sacrifice was on this account more excellent, because it was the expression of his faith in God as to sin and salvation, while Cain stood upon the ground of nature's sufficiency, and thought it enough to surrender to God a portion of his own labours. (See SACRIFICE.)

All that we know besides of Abel is, that he fell a victim to the ungodly spite and fiendish malice of his brother: "And Cain talked with Abel his brother; and it came to pass when they were in the field, that Cain rose up against Abel his brother, and slew him." A controversy was raised, it would seem, on the principles which respectively animated them, and the different courses they pursued; and, unable to prevail on grounds of reason, Cain resorted to the arm of violence, and wickedly laid the man of faith and righteousness in the dust—a melancholy sign, at the commencement of the world's history, of the deep-rooted enmity lurking in the natural man to the things of God, and of the treatment which the children of faith might expect to receive from it! It was a fact pregnant with awful meaning for the future, that the first righteous man in Adam's family should also have become the first martyr to righteousness; yet it was not without hope, since Heaven distinctly identified itself with his testimony, and espoused the cause of injured rectitude and worth. In such a case, the ascendancy of evil could not be more than temporary.

A'BEL, a term occurring in various compound words, which are employed to designate certain towns and places of more or less note. When so used, however, it is generally supposed to be in the sense of grassy plain or meadow, of which traces are found in the Arabic and Syriac languages. None of the places having this word as a part of their designation rose to much importance; and little more is necessary than to notice their distinctive names and their several localities.

A'BEL-BETH-MA'ACAH, a town in the north of Palestine, which is mentioned among the places smitten by Ben-hadad, 1 Ki. xv. 20, and apparently was the same with that called ABEL-MAIM, in the parallel passage of Chronicles, 2 Ch. xvi. 4. It was again taken by Tiglath-pileser, who sent captives from it into Assyria, 2 Ki. xv. 29. It was also the place of refuge to which Sheba the son of Bichri repaired, who headed a revolt in the latter part of the reign of David, from which it may be inferred to have been a place of considerable strength. But by the counsel of a sage woman the inhabitants were induced to cut off his head, and his cause went down, 2 Sa. xx. 14-22.

A'BEL-KERA'MIM [plain of the vineyards], a village of the Ammonites, and according to Eusebius about six Roman miles from Philadelphia or Rabbath-Ammon. It no doubt got its distinctive name from its excellent vineyards; and for centuries after the Christian era it is reported to have been still remarkable for its vintage, Ju. xi. 33.

A'BEL-MEHOLAH [plain of dancing], a village in the territory of Issachar, supposed to have stood near the Jordan, celebrated chiefly as having been the birth-place of the prophet Elisha, 1 Ki. xix. 16, but also occasionally referred to in connection with other events, Ju. vii. 22; 1 Ki. iv. 12.

A'BEL-MIZ'RAIM [plain of the Egyptians, or, if read with different vowel-points and pronounced with the sharper sound of a, as appears to have been done by the Septuagint translators, the mourning of the Egyptians], the name not of a town, but of a thrashing-floor, or open flat place, used for the purpose of thrashing and winnowing corn, at which the funeral party from Egypt rested and mourned, when conveying the mortal remains of Jacob to the burying-ground in Machpelah, Ge. l. 11. It is said to have been beyond, that is on the east of Jordan; and Jerome may have been wrong in placing it on the other side near Jericho.

A'BEL-SHIT'TIM [plain of acacias], the name of a place on the east of Jordan, in the plains of Moab, sometimes called simply Shittim, known in the time of Josephus by the name of Abila, and chiefly remarkable as the scene of one of Israel's greatest backslidings and most severe chastisements, Nu. xxv. 1; xxxiii. 40; Mi. vi. 5.

ABI'A, or ABIAH. See ABIJAH.

ABI-AL/BON. See ABIEL.

ABIATHAR [father of plenty], a high-priest in the time of David, the fourth in descent from Eli, 1 Sa. xiv. 3; xxii. 9-20; and of that line of Aaron's family which was descended from Ithamar. He was the son of Ahimelech (or Ahiah, as he is called in 1 Sa. xiv. 3), and escaped, apparently alone, from the fearful slaughter of the priests at Nob, which was done to appease the cruel jealousy of Saul, by the hand of Doeg the Edomite, 1 Sa. xxii. He carried with him the ephod, an essential part of the high-priest's attire; and not only continued to discharge the more peculiar offices of the priesthood to the party of David during their persecutions from the hand of Saul, but was formally recognized as high-priest after David came to the throne. In the meantime, however, Zadok, of the line of Eleazar, had succeeded to the highest functions of the priesthood, after the death of Ahimelech, and David did not cause him to be displaced; indeed, the priority in some respect continued to be held by him, as he is always mentioned first when the two are named together. But both Abiathar and Zadok appear to have been regarded as high-priests during the greater part of David's reign, 2 Sa. xx. 26; also viii. 17, where "Ahimelech, the son of Abiathar," seems to be an error of the text for "Abiathar, the son of Ahimelech." Toward the close, however, of David's life, Abiathar deviated into a wrong course by taking part with Adonijah in his ambitious project to get possession of the throne, hoping possibly to secure for himself thereby an exclusive, instead of a divided pontificate. The reverse, however, took place; for he was degraded from his office by Solomon, and sent into retirement; nor do any of his descendants ever afterwards appear in the highest function of the priesthood. The dishonour, therefore, which then befell him and his family, is justly marked as among the humiliating providences which gave fulfilment to the doom suspended over the house of Eli, 1 KI. ii. 27. In Mar. ii. 26, Abiathar is represented, in a discourse of our Lord, as having been high-priest at the time David obtained the showbread to eat; while the history in Samuel expressly states that his father Ahimelech was the presiding priest with whom David spoke, and from whom he received the hallowed bread. Various explanations have been given of this seeming discrepancy, but with so little success, that recent commentators of note have pronounced it to be still without any satisfactory adjustment. The solution, we are disposed to think, has been looked for somewhat in the wrong direction. The statement of our Lord simply affirms, that the transaction took place while Abiathar was ἀρχιερεὺς, which strictly means high-priest. But terms, it is well known, are not always used in their stricter sense, and their current use at one time very often differs from what it becomes or has been at another. In Old Testament times the term high-priest was seldom employed; he who really held the office was often called, merely by way of eminence, the priest—as, for example, in the 21st chapter of 1st Samuel, which relates the story about the showbread, and in the passages referred to above respecting Zadok and Abiathar. An entirely different usage comes into view in the writings of the New Testament. There, the term high-priest is of frequent occurrence, but it is often used in a more extended application than the emphatic priest of the Old Testament, and so as to include any one of priestly rank, who took a prominent place in the general management of ecclesiastical affairs. Hence the word occurs even more frequently in the plural than in the singular; as in the Gospel of Matthew, where it appears altogether twenty-five times, but of these no fewer than eighteen are in the plural, though from the adoption of chief priests as the rendering, the fact is disguised to the English reader. This later usage quite naturally arose out of the altered circumstances which sprung up in Judea subsequent to the return from the Babylonian exile, in consequence of which the more sacred and distinctive offices of the high-priest fell comparatively into abeyance, and he formed only one of a class, chiefly composed of priests, through whom were administered, not only all strictly ecclesiastical, but also a great portion of the judicial, functions of the commonwealth. The distinction was thus practically narrowed between the high-priest proper, and the elite generally of the priesthood; on which account the name ἀρχιερεὺς was applied to them as a common designation. And in this we are furnished with a perfectly natural and adequate explanation of the difficulty before us. Our Lord there, in the application of the term high-priest to Abiathar, simply takes it in its current and later acceptance, as denoting one who, though not precisely in the highest, still was at the time referred to in one of the higher functions of the priesthood; he was in the position of a chief-priest at the time, and took part with his father Ahimelech in the daily ministrations about the tabernacle. In this sense, the name might have been coupled indifferently, either with Ahimelech or Abiathar; but our Lord chose to couple it rather with Abiathar, when speaking of an action in the life of David, because of the close, life-long connection which he had with David in sacred things, while the relation of Ahimelech to David was quite incidental and momentary. Thus all becomes plain, and there is no need for resorting to the strained and arbitrary suppositions which have too commonly been had recourse to by commentators. (See PRIEST.)

ABIB [green ear], the name given to the first month in the Jewish calendar. (See MONTH.)

ABTEL [father of strength]. 1. The name of Saul's grandfather, 1 Sa. ix. 1. 2. The name of one of the thirty most distinguished men of David's army, 1 Ch. xi. 32. The latter is designated Abi-albon in 2 Sa. xxiii. 31, a word of precisely the same import.

ABIEZER [father of help], a descendant of Manasseh, and son of Gilead, Jos. xvii. 2, the founder of the family to which Gideon belonged, Ju. vi. 11, 34. It was chiefly by the prowess of members of that family that Gideon gained the victory he won over the host of Midian, and hence the courteous and poetical form of the rebuke which he administered to the Ephraimites, who afterwards contended with him, on account of not having been summoned at first to the conflict: "What have I done now in comparison of you? Is not the gleanings of the grapes of Ephraim better than the vintage of Abiezer?" Ju. viii. 2; that is, your exploits in following up the victory, and capturing the two princes, Zeba and Zalmunna, bring you more honour than accrues from the victory itself to the kindred of Abiezer.

ABIGAIL [father of gladness or joy—or perhaps, after the analogy of some other words, compounded partly of abi, my father-gladness]. 1. ABIGAIL. A memorial name, commemorative of the joy which the birth had occasioned to the father. It is employed only as the name of Nabal's wife, who, by her prudent and active interposition, prevented the mischief which the churlish behaviour of her husband toward David was like to have occasioned, 1 Sa. xxv. 14-42. David himself felt deeply indebted to her for the part she acted on the occasion, and the advice she tendered; for by her timely interference he was saved from the sin of avenging himself with his own hand. He took a wrong way, however, to show his gratitude, when, after the death of Nabal, he sent for her, and took her to be one of his own wives.

2. ABIGAIL is found in the English Bible as the name of a considerable variety of persons; but in the original the word is not precisely the same, and should have been either ABIHAIL [father of light], in which form it occurs as the name of the wife of Rehoboam, a daughter, or more probably a grand-daughter of Eliab, David's elder brother, 2 Ch. xi. 18; or ABICHAIL [father of strength], Nu. iii. 35; 1 Ch. ii. 29; v. 14; Es. ii. 16.

3. ABIGAL, which, like Abihail, is doubtless a variation of Abigail, occurs as the name of Amasa's mother, 2 Sa. xvii. 25, but is written Abigail in the English Bible. In the passage referred to, she is called the daughter of Nahaah, while at 1 Ch. ii. 16 she appears as David's sister. Either, therefore, Nahaah must have been another name for Jesse, which is not very likely; or Abigal must have been but a half-sister of David.

ABIHU [father of him, or my father-he, viz. God]. It occurs only once in Scripture, as the name of Aaron's second son, who along with his brother Nadab committed trespass in the sin of offering incense before the Lord which had been kindled by strange fire. What is meant by strange fire in this connection is, in other words, common fire—fire taken from some other place than the brazen altar before the door of the tabernacle, which was kept perpetually burning for the offering of slain victims. The priests were expressly commanded to take live coals from this altar when they went in to burn incense at the golden altar in the sanctuary, Le. xvi. 12; first, no doubt, because the fire ever burning there had originally come from the Lord's presence, Le. ix. 24, and was therefore to be regarded as emphatically sanctified fire, fire of Heaven's own kindling; and also, because it was important to keep up in men's minds the connection between prayer (of which the offering of incense was a symbol) and expiatory sacrifice. Only when founded in atonement by blood, and sent up as on the flame of accepted sacrifice, can it ascend before God as a sweet-smelling savour. To offer incense, therefore, with strange fire, was, in a most important particular, to traverse the divine appointment, and desecrate the hallowed things of God. As a solemn warning against like corruptions in the future, the transgressors were consumed on the spot by a bolt of fire; and, as their presumption or mistake had probably arisen from too free indulgence in intoxicating liquor, an ordinance was immediately issued prohibiting all officiating priests from the use of wine or strong drink, Le. x. 1-11.

ABIJAH, often abbreviated into ABIAH or ABIA [my father-Jah], expressive in him, who first imposed or assumed the name, of filial regard to Jehovah. In the more lengthened or abbreviated form it occurs with considerable frequency in Scripture; sometimes as the name of women, 1 Ch. ii. 24; 2 Ch. xxix. 1, but more commonly as that of men.

1. ABIJAH, the son and successor of Rehoboam, king of Judah, 1 Kl. xv. 1; 2 Ch. xiii. 1. In the former of these passages, ABIJAM is the name used instead of Abijah, of which there is no certain explanation, although it probably originated in a mere textual error of early date. There is an apparent discrepancy also in regard to his mother, between the accounts in Kings and Chronicles. In the former, 1 Kl. xv. 2, it is said, "his mother's name was Maachah, the daughter of Abishalom;" while in the other, 2 Ch. xiii. 2, we read, "his mother's name was Micaiah, the daughter of Uriel of Gibeah." Maachah and Micaiah were obviously but different forms of the same word, and Abishalom was merely a variation of Absalom. Of Rehoboam's eighteen wives, two are expressly said to have belonged to the family of David, 2 Ch. xi. 18; and if we suppose that this Micaiah or Maachah was a third, and that she was the daughter immediately of Uriel, remotely of Absalom, his granddaughter, as the term daughter often signifies, we have all that is required to make the two accounts perfectly consistent. In regard to Abijah himself, it would appear, from a comparison of the narratives in the books of Kings and of Chronicles, that he was at first actuated by a light and thoughtless spirit, and is hence said to have "walked in the sins of his father," 1 Kl. xv. 3, but that he afterwards became more interested in the cause of God, and in its behalf carried on a vigorous warfare with Jeroboam, over whom he gained some marked successes. We have no reason, however, to conclude from this that his heart was ever affected as it should have been toward God, or that his zeal was of the pure and elevated stamp of David's. The account in Chronicles, 2 Ch. xiii., presents him in a more favourable light than the briefer notice contained in the book of Kings; but the account itself, coupled with the reformations presently after ascribed to Assa, 2 Ch. xiv. 2-5, plainly implies that his zeal expended itself more on warlike operations abroad, than on the internal administration of truth and righteousness. His reign lasted only for three years.

2. ABIJAH, the second son of Samuel, who judged in Beersheba, 1 Sa. viii. 2

3. ABIJAH, the eldest son of Jeroboam, who died in early youth, and with the commendation of having some good thing in him toward the God of Israel, 1 Kl. xiv. 13.

4. ABIJAH, a priest of the line of Eleazar, who gave for his own and future generations the distinctive name to one of the priestly courses, the one to which Zechariah and John the Baptist belonged, 1 Ch. xxiv. 10; Lu. i. 5.

ABILENE, a small province or territory, to the north of Palestine, deriving its name from the chief town belonging to it, ABILA. The district itself is nowhere very exactly defined; but the position of Abila is known to have been on the road from Heliopolis (Baalbec) to Damascus, being about eighteen Roman miles north-west from the latter, and from the notices in Josephus and St. Luke, it is connected with Palestine as a border country. The territory of Abilene, therefore, appears to have been a portion of Coele-Syria, stretching along the east of Anti-Libanus, beyond Damascus, and reaching southwards to the extremities of Galilee and Trachonitis. The only point of interest or importance attaching to it, in a historical or biblical respect, arises from the mention made of it in Lu. iii. 1. It is there stated, in connection with other notices of a like kind, that, at the commencement of John the Baptist's ministry, Lysanias was tetrarch of Abilene. This has been questioned by some neological and infidel writers. By comparing together various passages in Josephus, they have maintained that, at the time referred to by St. Luke, there was no tetrarch or separate governor of the territory of Abilene; that, both then and for a considerable period before, it had been merged in the jurisdiction of one or other of the Herodian family; and that the only Lysanias connected with it was the son of one Ptolemæus, who was killed, after a brief reign, upwards of thirty years before the Christian era. Such, in substance, are the allegations made by De Wette, Strauss, and many others; but when the matter is closely examined, there is found no solid foundation for them. The statements scattered through different parts of Josephus are of a kind that it is not quite easy to reconcile and render perfectly harmonious with each other, but, when fairly put, they rather confirm than contradict the notice in St. Luke; for, while Josephus mentions the murder of the Lysanias above referred to, by Anthony, at the instigation of Cleopatra, he does not call him tetrarch of Abilene, nor does he expressly connect that district with him. Lysanias and his father are simply styled rulers of Chalcis (Ant. xiv. 7, § 4; xv. 4, § 1; Wars, i. 13, § 1); and, afterwards, he even pointedly distinguishes between Chalcis and what he called the tetrarchy of Lysanias (Ant. xx. 7, § 1). It is quite arbitrary, therefore, to infer, from the notices of Josephus, that the Lysanias in question was ever tetrarch of Abilene; or that what Josephus elsewhere terms alternately "the house (or possession) of Lysanias," and "the house of Zenodorus" (Ant. xvii. 11, § 4; xv. 10, § 1), is to be identified with Abilene. They are rather to be connected with the Chalcidene district. It is in reference to a much later period—to what happened in the reigns of Caligula and Claudius, or the period immediately subsequent to the events of gospel history—that Josephus speaks of "the tetrarchy of Abilene." He names this as a part of the grant bestowed, first by Caligula, and then by Claudius, on Herod Agrippa (Ant. xviii. 6, § 10; xix. 5, § 1); and it is against all probability to suppose that the district should have been so called from a Lysanias who had been slain seventy or eighty years before, and who, even if he had been exclusive ruler of Abilene (of which there is no evidence), could not have held possession of it above four years. There must have been a later Lysanias—whether a descendant of the other or not—from whom the district in question derived the name of the tetrarchy of Abilene. So that, when we find St. Luke speaking of a Lysanias, tetrarch of Abilene, at the beginning of our Lord's ministry, and Josephus, at periods varying from twelve to twenty years later, speaking of the disposal of the "tetrarchy of Lysanias," which he identifies with Abilene (Ant. xix. 5, § 1), we may assuredly conclude, with Meyer (Comm. Lu. iii. 1), that the testimony of Josephus really confirms that of the evangelist.

ABIM'AEI [my father from God], the name of a descendant of Joktan, Ge. x. 28, and supposed by some to have been the stem-father of the Mali, or Malitæ, an Arabian tribe.—(See Bochart's Phaleg. ii. 24.)

ABIM'ELECH [father of the King, or simply father-king], a name probably originating in the desire of distinguishing the possessor of it as a hereditary monarch, whose title to the throne was not obtained by election, or won by conquest, but held as a matter of birthright.

1. 2. ABIMELECH, the name of a king of Gerar, in the land of the Philistines, first in the time of Abraham, and again in the time of Isaac, Ge. xx. xxi. xxvi. The long interval between the two notices, coupled with the circumstances narrated of each respectively, leave little room to doubt that the persons mentioned belonged to different generations, and were probably father and son. It is not unlikely that the name may have been used as a designation, less properly of the individual, than of the reigning chief in Gerar, somewhat like Pharaoh in Egypt. The transactions which the successive Abimelechs had with Abraham and Isaac will fall to be noticed in connection with the lives of those two patriarchs, as the transactions derive their chief importance from the light they throw on the patriarchal relations and character.

3. ABIMELECH. The most noted person who bears this name in Scripture was the son of Gideon, by a concubine in Shechem. After the death of his father, he aspired to the place of power and authority which had latterly been held by Gideon, and, to secure his object, slew, with the help of the Shechemites, all the legitimate children of his father, with the exception of Jotham, who effected his escape, after delivering the memorable and striking parable recorded in Ju. ix. 8-20. The threat of retribution uttered at the close of this parable against the people of Shechem, and those who took part in the atrocious proceedings of Abimelech, was signally executed; for, on the occasion of a revolt from his supremacy, the Shechemites suffered most severely at his hands, and shortly afterwards he shared himself the just reward of his deeds, when, pressing the siege of Thebez, he was felled by a stone thrown at him by a woman, Ju. ix. 50. (See GAAL.)

ABIN'ADAB [father of free-willingness, or liberality]. 1. A Levite of Kirjath-jearim, in whose house the ark remained for a time, 1 Sa. vii. 2. One of Jesse's sons, 1 Sa. xvi. 8. 3. A son also of Saul, who perished in Gilboa, 1 Sa. xxxi. 2. 4. One of the officers in Solomon's establishment, 1 KI. iv. 11.

ABIRAM [father of loftiness]. 1. One of the chiefs of the tribe of Reuben, who joined in the rebellion of Korah, and perished in his destruction, Num. xvi. (See AARON and KORAH.) 2. The name of the first-born of Hiel the Bethelite, 1 KI. xvi. 34. (See HIEL.)

ABTSHAG [father of error], a Shunammite virgin of the tribe of Issachar, chosen by the attendants of David to cherish him in his extreme age, and minister to him, 1 KI. i. 1-4. Though not strictly married to David or admitted to sexual connection with him, she was yet regarded as belonging to the royal household; and when afterwards sought by Adonijah to be his wife, the request was not only refused by Solomon, but the very presenting of it, being regarded as a sign of lurking ambition, was visited with the death of Adonijah, 1 KI. ii. 13-25. (See ADONIJAH.)

ABISHAI [father of gifts], one of the sons of Zeruah, David's sister, and a younger brother of Joab. Along with his brothers, Abishai attached himself early to the cause of David, shared with him in his protracted perils and struggles, and became ultimately one of the leading men around his throne. From the notices given of him, he appears to have been more distinguished for his courage and military prowess than for the graces of a divine life. On one occasion, when he accompanied David to the camp of Saul, and found the latter asleep on the ground, he sought permission to embrace the opportunity of at once putting an end to the persecutor's life, 1 Sa. xxvi. 5-9. On another occasion, he would fain have rushed upon Shimei, when coming forth to curse David in the day of his calamity, and inflict on him summary vengeance, but was again met by the stern resistance of David, 2 Sa. xvi. 2. We find him also associated with Joab in the crafty and cruel policy to which Abner fell a victim, after he had been reconciled to David, 2 Sa. iii. 30. These are the darker spots in the history of Abishai, which certainly present him to our view as palpably defective in the milder virtues of humanity. But the circumstances in which he was placed from early life, it must be remembered, were extremely unfavourable for the cultivation of such virtues; and the faith, and devotedness, and chivalrous ardour which he displayed in the cause of David, must not be forgotten. None cast in their lot with David more heartily than Abishai, or risked more on his account. On one occasion, to rescue David's life, he placed his own in imminent peril, and slew the Philistine giant Ishbi-benob, by whom his uncle was like to have been overcome, 2 Sa. xxi. 15-17. He was also one of the three who broke through the Philistine host, to obtain for David a draught of water from the well of Bethlehem, 2 Sa. xxiii. 14-17. He is specially named in connection with the victories that were gained over the Edomites and the Ammonites, 1 Ch. xviii. 12; 2 Sa. x. 10, as a large share of the honour belonged to him. In regard also to personal bravery and individual exploits, he is ranked in the second class of David's heroes, and is celebrated as having withstood 300 men, and slain them with his spear, 2 Sa. xviii. 18. No account has been preserved of his latter days, or of his death.

ABISHALOM [father of peace], a variation of the name Achaalom, 1 Kl. xv. 2, 10, comp. with 2 Ch. xi. 20.

ABLUTION. See WASHINGS, SPRINKLINGS.

ABNER [father of light], son of Ner, and cousin of Saul, the chief general of Saul's armies, 1 Sa. xiv. 50. After Saul's death he still adhered to the interests of the family, and used his influence to get Ishbosheth established on the throne of the kingdom. He continued to pursue this course for seven years, during which time various encounters took place between the forces of David and Ishbosheth, and in particular two near Gibeon; first a drawn battle between twelve champions on each side, who mutually slew one another, and then a conflict between the two armies, in which Abner was defeated, 2 Sa. ii. 23. In the pursuit, however, Asahel, the brother of Joab, fell by the hand of Abner, after having been warned in vain to turn back; and in revenge for this act of bloodshed, which can scarcely be regarded otherwise than as an act of self-defence, Abner, sometime afterwards, was himself slain by Joab. We must condemn the mode that was taken to inflict capital punishment upon Abner; for, as he had been received to terms of peace with David—had even been authorized to concert measures for bringing over to David the tribes that still adhered to the house of Saul, 2 Sa. iii. 21—it was against all righteous and honourable principles to call him back, as Joab and Abishai did, under colour of friendship, and seize the opportunity to plunge a dagger into his heart, 2 Sa. iii. 27. At the same time, one cannot but see in the calamity itself a divine retribution—not, indeed, for the death of Asahel, but for the opposition to God's purpose which Abner had so long maintained, and the great sacrifice of life of which he had instrumentally been the occasion. It was an act of gross sin of which he was guilty, with one of Saul's concubines, which at last led to his desertion of Ishbosheth, 2 Sa. iii. 7, 8; and in meeting the charge which on that account was brought against him, he indicated his perfect cognizance of the fact, that the cause of David was in reality the cause of God. "So do God to Abner, and more also, except as the Lord hath sworn to David, even so I do to him; to translate the kingdom from the house of Saul, and to set up the throne of David over Israel, and over Judah." So that, from his own confession, Abner had, for a series of years, been engaged in withstanding the claims of one whose destination to the kingdom he knew all the while to have received the sanction, and even to have been confirmed by the oath of God. In such a case, he doubtless well deserved to die; though, as to the manner of execution, the deed, it must be said, was not righteously, but foully done. And it was to show his abhorrence of this, and his freedom from all participation in the treachery under which it had been accomplished, that David so bitterly grieved for the death of Abner, and so pathetically bewailed it. "And David said to Joab, and to all the people that were with him, Rend your clothes, and gird you with sackcloth, and mourn before Abner. And king David himself followed the bier, and they buried Abner in Hebron: and the king lifted up his voice, and wept at the grave of Abner; and the king lamented over Abner, and said, Died Abner as a fool dieth? Thy hands were not bound, nor thy feet put into fetters: as a man falleth before wicked men, so fellest thou," 2 Sa. iii. 31-34. The meaning of this dirge plainly is, that a most unfair advantage had been taken of Abner; that, if the sons of Zeruiah thought they had a just ground of quarrel with him for the death of their brother, they should have let this be understood, and insisted that Abner be delivered up to the hands of justice as an offender; but that, instead of this, they adopted the treacherous policy of unscrupulous and wicked men, against which even the innocent can provide themselves with no adequate defence. Why David did not proceed against the perpetrators of the deed, but contented himself with lamenting the fate of Abner, and uttering his condemnation of the mode in which it had been brought about, will be considered under the life of David.

ABOMINATION. In certain applications of this word in Scripture there is nothing peculiar; it is used to denote whatever is particularly offensive to the religious feeling, the moral sense, or even the natural relish and inclination of the soul. Thus Israel is said, on account simply of the antipathy created by reverses in war, to have been had in abomination by the Philistines, 1 Sa. xiii. 4; and the Psalmist, in like manner, was for his distressed and apparently forlorn condition reckoned an abomination by his friends, Ps. lxxxviii. 8. The operations of unrighteous principle, the practices of manifest corruption and sin—such as the swellings of pride, lips of falsehood, the sacrifices of the wicked, the foul rites of idolatry—are stigmatized as abominations, Pr. vi. 16; xii. 22; xv. 8; Jo. vi. 16, &c. It was a quite natural extension of the same manner of speech to apply it to outward objects, which were on some account forbidden, and to be shunned as evil; for example to the articles of food, which the Israelites were prohibited from using, Le. xi. 10, 11, &c.; to the sacrificial food connected with the worship of idols, Zec. ix. 7; and in particular to the idols themselves of the heathen, to Milcom the abomination of the Moabites, and so on, 1 Kl. xi. 6, 7; 2 Kl. xiii. 13; Jo. iv. 1; vii. 30, &c.

None of these applications of the term can be accounted peculiar, further than that they very strongly indicate the feeling of repulsion that was, or should be, entertained towards the objects in question. But in connection with the history of the children of Israel in Egypt, we meet with applications of a somewhat singular kind. Thus at Ex. viii. 26, Moses excuses himself from assembling his countrymen to a great sacrificial solemnity in Egypt, because they should sacrifice "the abomination of the Egyptians before their eyes," and the Egyptians would stone them. This has been explained by some with reference to the cow, which it was held improper to sacrifice, being sacred to Isis, so that "all Egyptians alike paid a far greater reverence to cows than to any other cattle" (Herod. ii. 41.) Of the bovine kind male calves and bullocks only could be offered in sacrifice. The chief objection to this explanation is, that the Hebrews were under no necessity of coming here into conflict with Egyptian superstition, and did not, in fact, offer cows or heifers except in a very few peculiar cases. The offence referred to must therefore have attached to the rites of worship, possibly to the mode of determining what was properly fit for sacrifice (in which the Egyptians were very particular), rather than to the kind of animals from which the victims were selected. The service would somehow be so conducted as to appear an abomination to the people of the land. The remarkable sacredness, however, associated with the cow in Egypt serves to explain another statement made in the history; namely, that "the Egyptians might not eat bread with the Hebrews, for that is an abomination to the Egyptians," Ge. xliii. 32. For Herodotus states, in connection with the prevailing veneration for the cow, "that therefore no Egyptian man or woman will kiss a Grecian on the mouth, or use the knife, spit, or cauldron of a Greek [of course, also, of a Hebrew], or taste of the flesh of a pure ox that has been divided by a Grecian knife." The peculiar place occupied by the cow in their religion rendered foreigners unclean to them, and obliged them to eat apart, as the Hebrews had to do afterwards, through the distinctions of food introduced by the laws of Moses. A still further peculiarity noticed is, that "every shepherd is an abomination to the Egyptians," Ge. xli. 34. The fact alone is stated, and no account is given, either in profane or sacred history, of the origin of the feeling. Some would connect it with the dominion of the Hycsos, or shepherd race in Egypt, which had produced a general feeling of antipathy in the native mind to the occupation itself; others, perhaps more justly, with the dislike and aversion naturally entertained, in a cultivated country like Egypt, to the wandering and predatory habits of the nomade or shepherd tribes. But the fact itself is beyond dispute, and is amply attested by the evidence of the monuments, on which shepherds are always represented in a low and degrading attitude (Wilkinson, Ancient Egypt. ii. 16). On the ground of their prevailing occupation, therefore, the Hebrews when they entered Egypt were naturally objects of suspicion and dislike to the people of the country, though their relation to Joseph secured for them the greatest measure of respect and kindness that was possible in the circumstances.

ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION. This striking and somewhat enigmatical expression occurs properly but once in the English Bible; namely, in the address delivered by our Lord to his disciples respecting the destruction of Jerusalem and the last days, Mat. xxiv. 15; Mar. xiii. 14. But as there introduced it is given as a quotation from the prophet Daniel—"When ye shall see the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, whose readeth, let him understand"—although when we turn to Daniel the precise expression is not found in the English Bible. This arises from the translation of the Septuagint being adopted by our Lord (βδέλυγμα τῆς ἐρημώσεως), the exact equivalent to which in English is "abomination of desolation," while the original in Hebrew slightly differs. The passage actually referred to is Da. ix. 27, where our translators render "for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate." This, however, is not the most accurate rendering; it should rather be "over top of abominations (will be) the desolator," or destroyer. And so again in two other passages, which are generally understood to point to the Maccabean times: "And they shall place (or set up) the abomination, the desolator," ch. xi. 31, and "till the abomination that desolates," ch. xii. 11. The chief difference among commentators, as to the meaning of the expression, has respect to the point, whether the abomination, which somehow should carry along with it the curse of desolation, ought to be understood of the idolatrous and corrupt practices which should inevitably draw down desolating inflictions of vengeance, or of the heathen powers and weapons of war that should be the immediate instruments of executing them. There appear to be conclusive reasons for understanding the expression of the former.

1. By far the most common use of the term abomination or abominations, when referring to spiritual things, and especially to things involving severe judgments and sweeping desolation, is in respect to idolatrous, and other foul corruptions. It was the pollution of the first temple, or the worship connected with it by such things, which in a whole series of passages is described as the abominations that provoked God to lay it in ruins, 2 Ki. xxi. 2-13; Je. vii. 10-14; Eze. v. 11; vii. 8, 9, 20-23. And our Lord very distinctly intimated, by referring on another occasion to some of these passages, that as the same wickedness substantially was lifting itself up anew, the same retributions of evil might certainly be expected to chastise them, Mat. xxi. 13. 2. When reference is made to the prophecy in Daniel it is coupled with a word, "Whoso readeth let him understand," which seems evidently to point to a profound spiritual meaning in the prophecy, such as thoughtful and serious minds alone could apprehend. But this could only be the case if abominations in the moral sense were meant; for the defiling and desolating effect of heathen armies planting themselves in the holy place was what a child might perceive. Such dreadful and unseemly intruders were but the outward signs of the real abominations, which cried for vengeance in the ear of heaven. The compassing of Jerusalem with armies, therefore, mentioned in Lu. xxi. 20, ready to bring the desolation, is not to be regarded as the same with the abomination of desolation; it indicated a further stage of matters. 3. The abominations which were the cause of the desolations are ever spoken of as springing up from within, among the covenant people themselves, not as invasions from without. They are so represented in Daniel also, ch. xi. 30, 32; xii. 9, 10; and that the Jews themselves, the better sort of them at least, so understood the matter, is plain from 1 Mac. i. 54-57, where, with reference to the two passages of Daniel just noticed, the heathen-inclined party in Israel are represented, in the time of Antiochus, as the real persons who "set up the abomination of desolation and built idol altars;" comp. also 2 Mac. iv. 15-17. (See on the whole subject, Hengstenberg on the Genuineness of Daniel, ch. iii. § 3; and Christology, at Da. ix. 27, with the authorities there referred to.)

ABRAHAM [father of a multitude, previously ABRAM, father of elevation, or high father], a son of Terah, the tenth in lineal descent from Shem, and a native of Ur of the Chaldea. So much is certain respecting Abraham's origin and his natural place in the world's history, but the sacred record provides us with no materials for going farther. Of the three sons of Terah, who are mentioned in the order of Abram, Nahor, and Haran, it does not positively affirm that Abram was the first-born; and he may have been named first merely because he occupied the highest place in the divine purpose, and was to be the chief subject of the sacred narrative, precisely as Shem is named first among the sons of Noah, though Japhet appears to have been the eldest. Accordingly, while some hold Abraham to have been really the eldest son of Terah, and place his birth in the seventieth year of Terah's life, there are others, and probably a still larger number, who make him the youngest, and even suppose him not to have been born till Terah was 130 years old. The chief ground for this latter conclusion is, that as Terah lived till he was 205 years of age, and Abraham was 75 when he left Haran for the land of Canaan, this 75, added to 130, would just make the 205 which was the sum of Terah's life, and would thus render Abraham's removal to Canaan subsequent to his father's death in Haran. On the other supposition, that Abraham was born in the seventieth year of Terah, the father must have been left in Haran by the son, and even have continued to linger there for sixty years after the son's departure. There is nothing in the Old Testament narrative expressly at variance with this, though the natural impression produced by the brief account in Ge. xi. 31, 32, is, that Terah's death had actually occurred before the removal of Abraham to the land of Canaan. And the impression is confirmed by Stephen, who, in his speech before the Jewish council, distinctly states, that only after Terah's death did Abraham leave Haran, and take his departure for Canaan, Ac. vii. 4. So that, on this view of the matter, Stephen must either have followed an erroneous rabbinical interpretation, or by the death of Terah must be understood, not his literal, but his spiritual death—his relapse into idolatry. Some adopt the one, and some the other explanation; but neither view can be regarded as quite satisfactory. Coupling, therefore, the affirmation of Stephen with what seems the natural import of the original narrative, we are inclined to rest in the common belief, that Terah died before Abraham's actual departure from Mesopotamia, and that consequently Abraham was most probably born at a comparatively late period in his father's life. This conclusion is strengthened by the collateral circumstances, that Lot, the son of Haran, who accompanied Abraham into Canaan, appears, at no great distance from their entrance into it, as a person in advanced life, with a family well grown, and that Nahor, the other brother of Abraham, married Milcah, the daughter of Haran. These notices seem to imply that Haran had been considerably older than the other brothers, and that Abraham may not have been very much older than Lot.

The only express call to Abraham to leave his kindred and his country, recorded in Genesis, is the one that follows the notice of Terah's death, Ge. xii. 1-4; the call which Abraham immediately obeyed by removing into Canaan. But as it is stated at the close of the preceding chapter, xi. 31, that "Terah took Abram his son, and Lot the son of Haran, his son's son, and Sarai his daughter-in-law, his son Abram's wife, and they went forth with them from Ur of the Chaldees, to go into the land of Canaan," the earlier Jewish authorities (Philo de Abrahamo, § 15), with whom also Stephen concurs, Ac. vii. 2, inferred that there was a prior call, whether addressed to Abraham individually, or to him in common with his father, as alone adequate to account for the movement of Terah, and those about him, toward the land of Canaan. That leading, as they did, a nomadic or shepherd life, they should have left the region of Ur, with the view of settling somewhere else in the province of Chaldea, would have been nothing extraordinary; but that they should have done so with the explicit design of migrating into Canaan, a country so far distant, and with which they had no natural connection—this can scarcely be accounted for, except on the supposition of a special call, and a call originating on religious grounds. So, also, it seems to be plainly implied in Ge. xv. 7, where God says to Abraham, "I am the Lord that brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees;" which is repeated in Ne. ix. 7. If the more immediate reason of the movement was, as we may naturally suppose, to escape from the idolatrous tendencies which had already begun to manifest themselves in their native region, then it is possible enough, that in the district of Haran, which was still within the boundaries of Mesopotamia, though in the direction of Canaan, the family may have found, earlier than they at first expected, a place of sojourn, where they could live in comfort, and without molestation maintain the worship of God in purity. In that case it might have been perfectly natural for them to halt for a time at Haran, and might also have been found difficult, from the increasing infirmities of Terah, to proceed farther till his decease. But as such a partial separation from the original seat of the family was insufficient to accomplish the divine purpose, so a fresh, a more imperative, if not also a more specific and individual call came to Abraham after the death of Terah; for it is only to that period that we can with any propriety refer the call recorded at the beginning of Ge. xii.; and we must translate, not "now the Lord had said," as in our authorized version, but simply "Now the Lord said to Abram, Get thee out of thy country," &c.

This call to Abraham undoubtedly forms an important era in the history of the divine communications; it introduced a class of relations which were never, in a sense, to wax old. The future revelations of God's will to men always bear, to some extent, the Abrahamical type. This arose from the very nature of the relation into which, by the divine call, the son of Terah was brought. He was constituted, individually, the head of a seed of blessing, the first link of a chain that was to embrace the whole multitude of God's elect; so that to the last the relative position and place of Abraham is never altogether lost sight of. Even believers in Christ are represented as Abraham's seed, and those that fall asleep in the Lord are spoken of as going to Abraham's bosom. Till the time of Abraham, the revelations of God's character and purposes had been of a general nature; they spoke one language to all mankind, and neither disclosed truths nor conveyed privileges to one portion of the human family which were withheld from another. But this method had proved insufficient to keep alive the true knowledge of God, and restrain the prevailing tendency to corruption; it left the cords of obligation too loose upon the individual conscience to stem the encroachments of evil, and secure the transmission from age to age of the principles of godliness. This is too amply confirmed by the history of the antediluvian world. There was light enough then to guide those who really sought the way of peace, and there were symbols and institutions of worship through which to give practical expression to their faith and hope; but means were still wanting to form the true worshippers, by a special organization, into a distinct society, or to keep them aloof from contaminating influences; and the result was a continual decay of living piety, ending in such a general dissolution of manners, that nothing but the overwhelming visitation of the deluge seemed adequate to meet the evil. Even with the advantage on the side of righteousness gained by this terrific judgment, the same tendencies soon began to develop themselves anew after the deluge; within a few generations the miracle at Babel was necessary to confound the projects of men, combining in one vast scheme to thwart the purposes of Heaven; and even the posterity of Shem, which had some kind of general distinction conferred on it in divine things by the prophecy of Noah, was ready to be engulfed in the swelling stream of pollution; for the service of idols had already commenced among the better portions of that line in the generation to which Abraham belonged, Jos. xxiv. 2. It was necessary, therefore, to adopt another course, and, for the sake of the general good of the world, to select a particular channel of blessing. This is the principle of the divine government, of which Abraham became the first living representative—individual election to special privileges, hopes, and obligations; primarily, indeed, for the behoof of those more immediately concerned, but remotely also for the benefit of others, nay, with the express object and design that the particular, in this respect, might become the universal. Hence, the call to Abraham has these distinct and closely connected parts:—1. The elevation of himself as an individual, by the free choice of Heaven, to the enjoyment of a near and friendly relationship to God; the Lord reveals himself as in a special sense Abraham's God, and, in a correspondingly special sense, recognizes Abraham as his servant. 2. In visible token of this election, and as a sign of the necessary separation it involved from worldly alliances and the course of nature's depravity, Abraham was enjoined to leave his home and his kindred, and go forth, under the direction of God, into a region where he should dwell comparatively alone. 3. Then, as a compensation for what he had thus to sacrifice of natural good, or rather as a proof of the rich and plenteous beneficence connected with an interest in God, the patriarch obtains the promise of a land for a possession, and of a numerous and blessed offspring to inherit it. 4. And, finally, so far from having such distinguished honours and elevated prospects conferred on him for any selfish end, the blessing, which he and his family were to be the first to enjoy, was for the world at large; he and his chosen line were to be, not a fountain sealed up, but an ever-flowing channel of highest beneficence; they were to be peculiarly identified with the cause of God, only that this cause might be more successfully maintained, and might ultimately diffuse its privileges and blessings among all the families of the earth. These points are all involved in the call addressed to Abraham, even in its earliest recorded form, Ge. xii. 1-4; and subsequent communications merely served to bring out more distinctly its specific parts, or to exhibit the principles on which it was to proceed to its realization.

Such was the word that came to Abraham, when still only a Mesopotamian herdsman; and, romantic as the prospect might seem which it held out for his encouragement, he responded at once to the call, by an implicit faith and a child-like obedience. Departing from Haran, he took with him his nephew Lot, and all that belonged to them. When, however, he reached the land of Canaan, he met with what must have presented itself as a staggering difficulty; for he found it not an uninhabited region, waiting, as it were, to receive him. "The Canaanite was already in the land," Ge. xii. 6. But a fresh revelation assured him that this should prove no insurmountable obstacle, and that he should both have that land and a seed to inherit it; on which, we are told, he built an altar to the Lord, who had appeared to him, and called upon his name. But presently another difficulty arose. He was not well in the land of Canaan till a dearth set in—not a partial scarcity merely, but "a grievous famine;" so that, having already journeyed well to the south, it seemed the readiest mode of escaping the danger which threatened him to go down into Egypt. In this there was, undoubtedly, a partial failure of his faith, as he had no divine direction to resort to Egypt; while the Lord had expressly commanded him to sojourn in the land of Canaan, with an implied promise of protection and support. And this false step soon led to another; for, going to Egypt, as he consciously did, without any divine warrant, he began to doubt respecting his personal safety, and fell upon the equivocating device of bidding Sarah call him her brother—a half truth, indeed, but one that, in the circumstances, involved a whole lie. He probably thought that, if her fair complexion and comely appearance should attract peculiar regard among the swarthy natives of Egypt, Sarah would certainly resist any offers or solicitations that might be made to detach her from him, while, being understood to be only his sister, there was no temptation, on her account, to do violence to him. Nothing, at least, was likely to be done in haste, and they could parry any proposals that might be made, till it was again in their power to leave the land. But the right seems even then to have acquired a footing in Egypt, which has continued in the despotic countries of the East to the present times—the right of the reigning monarch to possess himself of any unmarried female in his dominions whose beauty has won his regard. And so, without ceremony, as in the exercise of an undisputed prerogative, the king of Egypt sent and took Sarah into his house, for the purpose, doubtless, of undergoing the purifications and training that were required to prepare her for an alliance with royalty. The Lord, however, graciously interposed for her rescue, inflicting plagues on the house of Pharaoh, which prompted inquiry, and led to the discovery of Sarah's real position. Thus God acted for his own name sake, and took occasion, even from the sins and imperfections of his people, to impress more deeply on those who sought to do them wrong, their peculiar interest in the favour and protection of Heaven, Ps. cv. 15. And thus, also, it appeared that Abraham's faith, viewed as a principle of righteousness, partook of infirmity, and, so far from providing a meritorious ground of acceptance, itself stood in need of improvement.

Abraham returned from Egypt richer in possessions than he entered it, having received liberal gifts from Pharaoh—an earnest of what his posterity were one day to reap on a much grander scale from Egyptian oppressors. He pitched his tent anew near Hebron, on the plain of Mamre, but soon found that the pasture-grounds there were too circumscribed for the herds and flocks he now possessed, along with those of his kinsman Lot; therefore, on the occasion of a strife among the herdsmen, Abraham proposed a separation, and left Lot to choose the direction he might wish to take. The very proposal to exercise such a choice clearly implies that the land was still but partially occupied, and that large tracts existed as common or unappropriated pasture-ground. The circumstance itself, however, together with the actual choice of Lot, was a token of God's special goodness to Abraham, and his settled purpose to fulfil the promise respecting the inheritance; for, as Lot was led to fix upon a place of sojourn which lay actually beyond the bounds of the promised land, this land itself now remained for the sojourn of Abraham, in pledge of its future occupancy. And hence, immediately after the departure of Lot, and pointing to the significance of the whole transaction, the Lord appeared again to Abraham, and said, "Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art, northward and southward, and eastward and westward; for all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever," Ge. xiii. 14, 15.

At no great distance, apparently, from this period, another circumstance occurred, which brought out before the people of the land how high a place Abraham held in the consideration of God, and how much, even already, he was associated with the divine power and blessing. This was the invasion of the cities of the plain by Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, and others—(see CHEDORLAOMER)—issuing in the capture of Lot, and the taking of much spoil. It was more immediately for the sake of rescuing his kinsman that Abraham was led to take part in this warlike fray; but, moved on this account by a divine impulse, as well as a brotherly affection, he sallied forth with his 318 trained servants, overtook the marauding host near Dan, in the north of Palestine, and, after smiting them by night, pursued them to the neighbourhood of Damascus, recovering Lot, and all the spoil they had taken from Sodom and the other places they had plundered. The whole of this spoil Abraham surrendered to the king of Sodom, in token of his freedom from all sinister motives in his military adventure, and of his solemn determination to avoid even the appearance of being indebted to the king of such a people. But one singular and instructive homage he paid in connection with it: he gave tithes of all to another king, to Melchizedek, the king of Salem, and priest of the Most High God. This Melchizedek had gone forth to meet Abraham on his return from victory, and presented him with refreshment in bread and wine; thereby acknowledging Abraham as, under God, the deliverer of the country, and, on account of what he had done, bestowing on him the priestly benediction. That Abraham should have received this at the hands of Melchizedek, and should also have given him the tenth of the spoil, showed that he recognized in this man, not merely the rightful prerogatives of an earthly prince, but the character of a true representative of the God of heaven: so that, in paying tithes to him, Abraham did homage to God, and confessed himself but an instrument in the success which had been won. (See MELCHIZEDEK.)

Meanwhile, no advance seemed to be making in regard to that part of the divine promise—which naturally lay nearest to the heart of Abraham—the possession of a seed to inherit and transmit his peculiar blessing. The next scene in the patriarch's life presents him to our view as raised to fellowship with God in vision, and giving vent to the heavy thoughts that pressed upon his bosom, on account of his still existing childless condition. After God had assured him that he was his shield and his exceeding great reward, the anxious question burst from the patriarch, "Lord God, what wilt thou give me, seeing I go childless, and the steward of my house is this Eliezer of Damascus?" Ge. xv. 2. This drew from the Lord the solemn assurance, that Abraham should have an heir in the proper sense, his own veritable offspring; and not only so, but that from the seed to be given him there should spring a multitude like the stars of heaven. Abraham believed the word, contrary though it was to all present appearances, and even requiring at the outset to surmount what seemed natural impossibilities; he believed that God would do what he said, and "it was counted to him for righteousness"—that is, his faith in God's willingness and power to fulfil the promised good, was taken in lieu of such righteousness as might, if he had possessed it, have entitled him to look for that good as a matter of debt. Losing sight of nature and self, he was ready to look for all to the infinite sufficiency and goodness of God. And so, there being an explicit engagement on the part of God, and a responsive faith on the part of Abraham, a covenant transaction was entered into, by means of sacrifice, for the purpose of ratifying, in a formal and solemn manner, what had taken place, and still farther assuring the mind of Abraham as to the inheritance destined for the promised seed. The materials were divinely chosen, and the transactions connected with them ordered, so as to be at once symbolical of the future and confirmatory of the present. The larger sacrifices were to consist of animals three years old—the three pointing to the three complete generations in Egypt, of which mention was going to be made; they were also divided into two equal parts, more distinctly to represent the two parties engaged in the sanctioning of the agreement; and then, amid a horror of great darkness which fell upon Abraham—prefigurative, as he was informed, of the troubles and conflicts which were, especially for three generations, to befall his posterity, and through which the covenant-promise was to pass on to its accomplishment—there appeared "a smoking furnace, and a burning lamp passing between the pieces." This was the symbol of the Lord's glory, substantially the pillar of cloud and fire, formally owning the sacrifice, and doubtless consuming it as a whole burnt-offering. And on the sacrificial action being closed, the Lord expressly assured Abraham, and "made a covenant with him," that the land in which he then sojourned should become the inheritance of his seed, specifying, as an additional ground of assurance, the boundaries of the land, and naming the existing tribes by whom it was for the time occupied.

Notwithstanding, however, this formal and ratified agreement, another long period of inaction succeeded, which greatly tried the faith of Abraham, and entirely exhausted that of Sarah. The conviction at last established itself in her mind, that she must now abandon all hope of having any personal connection with the promised seed; and as the word of promise, even in its most explicit form, had only spoken of Abraham's offspring, the thought occurred to her, that the maternal headship must have been destined for some other than herself, and that the nearest connection she could possibly have with the seed of blessing should be through her handmaid. A son thus obtained would be, in the strictest sense, Abraham's child, and might be Sarah's also by adoption. With this view she counselled Abraham to go in to Hagar, the Egyptian bondmaid; and he too readily fell in with the advice. The evil consequences were not long in discovering themselves: the maid became elated with the prospects of her condition, and treated her mistress with contempt. Domestic brawls ensued, which led to the expulsion of Hagar from the house—the providence of God thus setting its seal of disapproval on the connection that had been formed, and the mode employed to work out the promise. But, by divine interference, the insubordination on the part of Hagar was quelled, so that she returned and bore a son, Ishmael. Thirteen years more elapsed, during which everything, as far as we know, moved on with perfect equanimity, and the child grew upon the affections of Abraham, who, in spite of what had happened at the outset, had come to look upon him as the commencement of the promised seed. But when Abraham himself was on the verge of his hundredth year, and Sarah was but ten years younger, the Lord again appeared to him; and, as if all were yet to be done that was necessary to make good the word of promise, spake again of making his covenant with Abraham, and multiplying him. There was no repetition of the sacrifices; so far, what had taken place before was held to be still in force. But the ratification of the covenant was carried to a higher stage, by the appointment of a sacramental pledge and symbol of it, in the ordinance of circumcision. This was accompanied by a fresh assurance to Abraham that he should have a seed destined to grow into vast multitudes; and then came also the new and more specific information, that Sarah should give birth to a son, who should be the first of the illustrious progeny. In commemoration of the happy era, and in proof of the absolute certainty of what was spoken, the name of the patriarch was changed from ABRAHAM [high father] to ABRAHAM [father of a multitude], and that of his spouse from SARAI [my princess] into SARAH [simply princess], as henceforth to be related, not to one, but to many, destined to become the queen-mother of a royal and countless offspring. The tidings appeared at first almost to exceed belief. Abraham received what was spoken with a kind of joyful wonder, though presently the thought of what was implied in respect to Ishmael cast a shade of gloom over the prospect; and when the matter was, shortly after, through the visit of the angels, Ge. xviii., brought distinctly before the mind of Sarah, she could scarcely believe for joy. But faith did spring up, through which also she received strength to conceive seed; and in the course of the following year Isaac was born to Abraham, when an hundred years old, and of a mother who was ninety.

This long delay in the fulfilment of the promise was no arbitrary postponement of the expected good, or needless prolongation of trial to the faith and patience of the parents. It was essentially connected with the covenant of promise, to show what kind of seed it was intended to secure, or how the seed should be entitled to look for its peculiar heritage of blessing. The first child of promise was to be, in this respect, a sign to all coming generations—the primal type of the whole seed. And for this two things were necessary; the first of which was, that he should be emphatically the gift of God—not born in the ordinary course of nature, of the will of the flesh (as Ishmael was), but above nature, by the special agency of God; for what the covenant sought was, not simply seed, but a godly seed, such as might be recognized to be properly God's offspring. And though, in the great mass of those who should afterwards constitute the seed, this divine and distinctive impress could only be of a spiritual kind, yet, at the commencement, it was fit that the natural should go along with the spiritual, and correctly image it. Born as Isaac was, none could doubt his connection with the special interposition of Heaven; and all future parents, who might wish to have their offspring becoming true children of the covenant, were taught to seek for as real a work of God to make them so, though of a less outward kind. Most needful, therefore, was it for the great ends of the covenant, that Isaac, its first and typical offspring, should be born of parents so aged, that their bodies were in a manner dead, and were only rendered capable of producing seed by the supernatural power of God. Then, for the same ends, another thing was necessary—that the outgoing of this supernatural power should be connected with a corresponding spiritually supernatural state on the part of the parents. The godly seed that was to issue from the covenant by the special agency of God, must not be expected otherwise than as the fruit of a godly parentage; and hence the postponement of the generation of Isaac till Abraham had not only attained to the higher degrees of excellence, but had also received the rite of circumcision, the symbol of a purified condition. It was then only that the powers of nature were miraculously vivified in the aged pair for the production of the promised seed; and so the child born of them was the proper type of what the covenant aimed at, and what the symbolical ordinance connected with it indicated, namely, a spiritual seed, in which the divine and human, grace and nature, should meet together in producing true subjects and channels of blessing. In the Lord Jesus Christ these elements were to meet in their highest degree and most perfect form—not in co-operative merely, but in organic union; and the result consequently was, one in whom perfection was realized, at once the heir and the dispenser of all blessings. But the same things had, in a measure, to be found in the real children of the covenant, of every age; and those in whom they were not might indeed be of Israel, but they could not be the Israel.

The supernatural vivification of the powers of animal life which took place in Abraham and Sarah after the full ratification of the covenant, while it accounts for the conception of seed by Sarah when past age, also explains how she should in her ninetieth year have attracted the notice of Abimelech, king of Gerar, and been sought for as an object of desire, Ge. xx. The circumstance has often been objected to as unnatural by infidels and superficial critics, because they overlook the most essential fact of the case. In reality, both Abraham and Sarah had come, through the supernatural work of God upon their frames, to renew their youth. They had returned, in a manner, to the prime of life; and the story of Abimelech's attempt to get possession of Sarah is perfectly in place. The only cause for wonder is, that the previous failure of the device resorted to by Abraham when in Egypt, should not have had the effect of preventing him from repeating it now. We can only account for his doing so by the extreme wickedness which he saw in Gerar, and which, as he alleged in his defence, forced on him the conviction, that "surely the fear of God was not there," Ge. xx. 11. Like one suddenly cast among lions, he caught at what seemed for the moment the only available subterfuge; and had it not been for the gracious interposition of God, all his hopes had been wrecked—a fresh proof, even in the father of the faithful, that the stability of the covenant rests not on what they are to God, but what God is to them! Abimelech was rebuked by God in a dream, and enjoined to release Sarah on pain of the most severe judgments. He obeyed; but in turn rebuked Abraham for the deception he had practised, though the defence offered by the patriarch was received without any note of disapprobation. He even bestowed upon the patriarch costly presents, on the ground that he was himself in part to blame for what had happened, and that he owed the arrest of judgment to the intercession of Abraham as a man of God; so that they parted on terms of friendship, but with an admonition to Sarah to cultivate in future a more veiled appearance, that her beauty might prove less a snare to her.

With the exception of the temporary failure now noticed, Abraham appears, from the period of the full ratification of the covenant to have occupied a high moral position, and the procedure of God was conducted with an especial aim to the securing of personal holiness as the great end of the covenant. The distinctive badge of the covenant—the sacrament of circumcision—was a perpetual monitor to this effect, calling every one who received it to put off the old man of corruption, that he might walk in righteousness before God. The delay practised in regard to that part of the covenant which respected the promised seed, and the much longer delay that was to take place in regard to that other part which concerned the possession of the inheritance, “because the iniquity of the Amorites was not yet full,” both pointed in the same direction, since they showed how prominent a place was to be given to moral considerations in establishing the provisions of the covenant, and how far its course of development was to rise above merely natural grounds and interests. Abraham himself enters into these views. He ascends to the elevation of the divine plan. Angels visit him, as one with whom they might now have familiar converse. The Lord himself talks with him as a friend, and discloses to him the secret of Heaven respecting the cities of the plain, expressly because Abraham was now known to be one who would “command his children and his household after him, to keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgment,” Ge. xviii. 19. The patriarch, in turn, pleads with the Lord, in the full consciousness of his privileged condition; yet only in so far as he felt a regard to the interests of righteousness could justly carry him—silently acquiescing at last in the destruction of Sodom and its kindred cities, as in accordance with the demands of righteousness. But Abraham reached the highest stage of spiritual progress and self-sacrificing devotedness to the will of Heaven, when, in obedience to the divine call, he went forth to offer up his son Isaac on the altar of God. The form in which this call came to Abraham made full and touching recognition of the greatness of the sacrifice it demanded: “Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah, and offer him there for a burnt-offering.” It was a trial, indeed, in the strongest sense, such as no parent on earth could ever afterwards be called literally to make, since no one ever should have a son on whose prolonged existence so much depended, and be called personally to put an end to it. The call might fitly be named a temptation, as it not only enjoined the patriarch to go and extinguish a life incomparably dear to him, but in the very act of doing so to destroy, as it might seem, the very object of faith and hope, and enact the most revolting rite of heathenism. Yet, though not in outward reality—God never intended that—“in heart and purpose the act must be done. It was no freak of arbitrary power to command the sacrifice, nor for the purpose merely of raising the patriarch to a kind of romantic moral elevation. It was for the purpose of exhibiting outwardly and palpably the great truth, that God's method of working in the covenant of grace must have its counterpart in man's. The one must be the reflex of the other. God in blessing Abraham triumphs over nature, and Abraham triumphs after the same manner, in proportion as he is blessed. He receives a special gift, a child of hope, from the hand of God, and he freely surrenders it again to him who gave it. He consecrates his best, his all, in a manner, to the divine service. And the child of promise himself—the type, in his outward condition and history, of all who should become proper subjects and channels of blessing—he also must concur in the act; on God's altar he must sanctify himself, as a sign to all who would possess the higher life in God, that it implies and carries along with it a devout surrender of the natural life to the service and glory of God.”—(Typology of Scripture, i. p. 331).

By this extraordinary demand, therefore, the Lord sought to complete the instruction which the early circumstances of Isaac's life, as the first offspring of the covenant, were intended to impart, and to purge the affection of the patriarch toward his heaven-sent child from the earthliness and corruption of nature. Great as the trial was, his faith in the truth and faithfulness of God had grown so much, that he was found equal to the task. He believed that as the dead womb of Sarah had been supernaturally vivified to bring this child into being, so the dead child himself could be restored to life again when the word and the will of God required it; and in this confidence he proceeded to carry out the injunction laid upon him—up to the last terrible act—when the Lord again interposed, and declared his acceptance of the surrender that had been made in principle and feeling, as equivalent for the purposes aimed at, to the actual sacrifice. At the same time, a rain was provided for the burnt-offering in the room of Isaac—a more fitting type in this respect than Isaac could have been of the one great sacrifice for sin; and the venerable father of the faithful was sent away from the affecting scene with the seal of Heaven's highest commendation, and with the divine oath superadded to all the other bonds of the covenant, that its provisions should be fully carried out. Abraham had now risen to the highest exercise of faith and obedience of which he was capable, and in his conduct had given the nearest possible reflex of the divine—imaging so long beforehand that actual surrender to death of the Son, the only Son, whom the Father from eternity loved, in order that the covenant might be fulfilled, and the way laid open for its members to everlasting life and blessing. There is no need, however, when seeking to make out the proper significance of this part of Abraham's history, whether in its more immediate or its prospective bearing, to lay stress on the precise locality where the transaction was appointed to take place, or the subordinate circumstances connected with its performance. Whether the mount that was indicated to him “in the land of Moriah” was exactly the same with that, which was afterwards designated “Mount Moriah,” and on which the temple was built, must, from the lack of definite information, remain somewhat doubtful; and even if we could be assured of it, the fact would be significant rather as connected with the typical things of the temple than with the antitypical in Christ; for it was not on Mount Moriah, the most sacred spot within the city, but in a place called Calvary, a place of pollution, without it, that Jesus suffered. The particular spot and other incidental circumstances should be regarded only in the light of accessories, since either they, or others not materially different, must have accompanied the main transaction; this alone is important.

But few incidents are recorded in the remaining period of Abraham's life. He removed from Beersheba, which seems to have been his settled place of residence about the time of the offering up of Isaac, to Hebron, where Sarah died, an hundred and twenty-seven years old. At her death, and doubtless with reference to the future occupancy of the land by his seed, he secured as his own property a burying-ground in the field of Machpelah, in which, besides Sarah's, his own remains and those of his immediate descendants were laid. Some time after this, with the view of securing a suitable alliance, he sent by the hand of a trusty servant to the land of his kindred, and obtained for his son Isaac, Rebekah to wife. Finally, he took to himself a second wife, Keturah, of whose country and connections nothing is recorded; but by her he had several sons, to whom, as to Ishmael, he gave smaller portions, while he reserved the main part for Isaac. "He died in a good old age, an old man and full of years," an hundred three score and fifteen. He was buried by his sons Isaac and Ishmael in the cave of Machpelah; without an epitaph, but with a memorial that shall be ever blessed—a witness, while living, of the ennobling result that flows from a cordial surrender to the call of God; and when dead, still speaking of the goodness which God has in store for them who fear Him, and who commit themselves in implicit faith to the direction of his word, Ge. xxv. 9, 10.

ABSALOM [father of peace], a happy name, but a sad misnomer for the restless and aspiring youth with whom alone it stands connected in Scripture, and who, after embroiling first a family, then a kingdom in turmoil, fell a victim to his own rashness and folly. Absalom was the third son of David, and his only son by Maachah, the daughter of Talmi, king of Geshur, 2 Sa. iii. 3. He was possessed of singular grace and beauty, so that he was esteemed when grown to manhood the handsomest man of his time. From the manner in which he is reported to have cultivated his hair, allowing it to grow till it is even said to have weighed 200 shekels, 2 Sa. xiv. 26, it is evident that he was extremely vain of his personal appearance, and bestowed the greatest attention on his exterior. Had his vanity, however, confined itself in this direction, it would have ended in simple foppery; but in process of time it took a loftier aim. The first occasion that stirred his spirit into a flame was, indeed, one of an atrocious description, such as might well have thrown from its proper balance a wiser and more considerate spirit than his. This was the violence done to his full sister Tamar by Amnon, the eldest son of David—a violence accompanied by such consummate deceit beforehand, and such heartless repudiation afterwards, that it certainly merited the severest chastisement. David, we are told, when he heard of what had happened, "was very wroth," 2 Sa. xiii. 21; but he appears to have taken no decided action regarding it—unnerved, doubtless, by the humiliating recollection of his own recent misconduct in the matter of Uriah, which had also been marked by extraordinary deceit and violence. The inaction of David served as an excuse for the vengeful determination of Absalom, who could not tolerate the thought of such an injury having being done to his sister without signal retribution. But the better to effect his object, he feigned in the meantime an easy indifference, intending to compass his object in a like crafty and unscrupulous manner to that which had been practised by Amnon. For two years he restrained the impetuosity of his spirit, and at length, when all suspicions of evil had been lulled to sleep, he brought his long-meditated purpose to a head, in connection with a sheep-shearing entertainment, which he was going to hold in Baal-hazor, a place at no great distance from Jerusalem, somewhere between Bethel and Jericho. He invited the king himself to this entertainment, not probably expecting or even wishing the invitation to be accepted, but the more effectually to throw all parties off their guard, and prevent the idea from once entering their minds that any project of evil was contemplated. Accordingly, while David declined going, Amnon and the other members of the royal family went; and, in conformity with preconcocted arrangements, when Amnon had become intoxicated with wine, he was slain by the servants of Absalom. The other brothers were seized with consternation on seeing what was done, and, apprehending a general slaughter, ran each for his mule, and made as fast as possible for Jerusalem; but it was soon discovered that their apprehensions were groundless, and that the whole scheme had been concerted for the murder of Amnon. It is altogether a dismal story, and reveals a state of things in David's family which, had it not been disclosed to us by the faithful pen of inspiration, we could not have supposed to exist, or scarcely even have believed to be possible. In attempting to account for it a large portion of blame must undoubtedly be attached to the evil practice of polygamy, which in David's family, as in every other where it exists, necessarily loosened the bonds of brotherhood, and gave scope to feelings of jealousy and lust, for which otherwise place could not have been found. The children of the different wives living to a considerable extent apart, naturally came to look upon each other as so many related, yet distinct and separate circles; and the differences that existed among the several mothers, whether in original rank, or in conjugal regard, could not fail to foster feelings in the children adverse to domestic harmony and affection. In particular, as Absalom's mother was the daughter of a king, and herself also, in all probability, like her children, distinguished for comeliness of form, the children would readily think themselves entitled to some degree of precedence; and this could not but tend to inflame the unnatural desire of Amnon on the one hand, and on the other deepen Absalom's determination to have his revenge. The offence, too, that had been committed, was aggravated by a certain measure of insolence and presumption in the manner of it. But along with this original root of evil in the household of David, there was the pernicious tendency of his own fatal backsliding in regard to Bathsheba—a tendency that was sure to work with most disastrous effect in his own household, as the ill example of the parent naturally gave wings to corruption in the bosoms of his children, and rendered him well nigh incapable of administering a vigilant and wholesome discipline. The outburst of wickedness, therefore, first in Amnon, and then in Absalom, was but the fruit of the great moral defection which had tarnished the career of David, and of which the prophet gave him no doubtful intimation, when he said, that the Lord would "raise up evil against him out of his own house" and that "the sword should never depart from it," 2 Sa. xii. 10, 11.

In the murder of Amnon, Absalom had satiated his revenge; but he had, at the same time, sealed his exclusion from the presence and court of his father. After such an atrocious procedure he durst not appear there; and accordingly he fled to Geshur, and put himself under the protection of his maternal grandfather. He abode there for three years. Whether during this time he kept up any correspondence with parties in Israel we are not told; but there can be no doubt, from what subsequently took place, that there were not a few at Jerusalem and elsewhere who wished him back; and the heart also of David, after it had recovered from the shock of Amnon's death, again longed after Absalom. Joab, with his shrewd discernment, was not slow to perceive how the current was running; and anxious to have the credit of bringing about what he judged almost certain ere long to take place, he employed a wise woman of Tekoah to introduce the matter in a parabolical discourse to the king, and got him virtually committed to the principle of Absalom's recall, before the king was aware of his case being brought under review. When he did perceive the drift of the representation, he at once suspected that the hand of Joab was in the device, and was well pleased, we may readily conceive, when he found his suspicion confirmed. He would be satisfied, since so sagacious a counsellor had taken the initiative, that the kingdom was ripe for the return of Absalom, and that he could gratify his personal feelings toward his son, without doing violence to the general sense of the community. Joab was therefore instructed to have Absalom brought back, 2 Sa. xiv. 21, though the liberty to return was coupled with the restriction that Absalom should so far confine himself to his own house as to refrain from coming into the king's presence. The exiled youth gladly availed himself of the opportunity presented to him; but after his return he felt galled by the restraint imposed upon him. In truth, it was a piece of unskilful management to couple his return with such a condition, for it gave to his case an aspect of harsh treatment; and the lovers of gay society and courtly manners would bewail it as a sort of public calamity, that the man above all others fitted to shine in places of fashionable resort should be kept under a cloud of dishonour. The policy adopted was one of those half-measures, which by what they withhold more than undo the effect of what has been conceded. And when Absalom saw how matters had been working in his favour, he set his heart upon getting the restraint withdrawn. For this purpose he sought for an interview with Joab, in the hope that as Joab had so far effected his restoration, he might not be unwilling to accomplish what remained. But in this he was disappointed. Joab had probably by this time discerned the dangerous elements that were gathering about Absalom, and had some apprehension of the improper use that would be made of any further indulgence, if it were granted. He therefore declined seeing Absalom; but the latter, with that mixture of boldness and cunning, which appears to have formed so remarkable a feature in his character, put his servants on the project of setting fire to Joab's barley field, which adjoined to Absalom's, and thus in a manner forced Joab to a conference; and then, when having taunted Joab with the folly of having brought him from a foreign exile only to shut him up to an exile at home, he succeeded in getting Joab's interest engaged in his behalf, and was shortly afterwards admitted to the presence of his father.

Had there been any spark of right principle or honourable feeling in the bosom of Absalom, the forbearance and clemency which had now been extended toward him would have bound him with cords of unalterable attachment to the person and throne of his father. But the reverse was the case; personal vanity and ambition were his ruling principles; and he now addressed himself to the work of securing their full gratification. To understand aright this part of his career, we must endeavour to realize the exact position of matters at the time, and know the materials he had to work upon. The eye of Absalom was steadfastly set upon the throne; and as matters then stood, there were many things to favour his attempt to reach it, could he only bring into play a sufficient amount of skilful management, while, if affairs were left to themselves, he had every reason to dread disappointment. Even after Amnon's death he was not absolutely the eldest surviving son; for Chileab was his senior by birth, and, for anything we know to the contrary, was still alive. More than that, a peculiar interest hung around another and younger son of David, Solomon, concerning whom words had been spoken and names imposed, which seemed too plainly to point in the direction of the kingdom, and of which Absalom could scarcely be altogether ignorant, 1 Ch. xiii. 9; 2 Sa. xii. 24, 25. Then there was the consideration of his own past wickedness, which he could not but regard as an obstacle in his way to the throne by legitimate means, especially as the relation of his father to Saul had clearly enough shown, that moral considerations must here have important weight, and David, with all his partial leanings, was not the man to set them wholly aside. Such things obviously left but little hope to Absalom by a fair and orderly course of procedure. But, on the other side, he had many advantages. He was, if not absolutely the eldest son, at least the eldest of any consideration, and the only son by a king's daughter. Royal blood on both sides flowed in his veins, and his appearance and manners were altogether kingly. His claims were thus within the very precincts of legitimacy; and, if he could but interest a powerful and influential party in his behalf, a bold and well-concerted stroke of policy might carry him to the summit of his wishes. But for this, he must inevitably throw himself chiefly on the worse elements of society in his father's kingdom. The better portion were too enlightened in their views of the constitution of the kingdom, and also too sensible of the benefits that had been reaped from David's administration, to encourage any policy hostile to David's interests, or at variance with the leading principles of his government. But there was a large class of another kind—an ungodly portion, whom Saul's policy had tended greatly to foster, and who, though they had yielded to the rising fortunes and military prowess of David, yet must often have sighed, amid his strivings after righteousness, for what they would call the good old times of Saul. Nay, it is not to be doubted that a very considerable number, both at Jerusalem and throughout the land, who had been wont by means of corruption and favouritism to secure their own ends, till the more stringent and impartial rule of David had put a check on their courses, would, in the latter days of his kingdom, feel as if they had many a grudge to satisfy, and something to hope for by a change. Such, in the actual state of things, were the elements of evil fermenting around Absalom, by skilfully working on which he might hope to make his way to the throne. He resolved to throw himself into the vortex, and to become—as we find from the Psalms of David written in connection with Absalom's rebellion, he actually did become—the head of the ungodly party in the kingdom—the party that sought to revive the times of Saul, and strengthen themselves by worldly resources and plans of wickedness. In those psalms, such as Ps. iii. iv. xlii. lxiii. &c., David continually speaks of those who had risen up against him, as the patrons of unrighteousness, the forgers of lies, the enemies of God as well as of himself, yea his enemy on the very ground of his adherence to the cause of righteousness and truth; so that he apparently regarded Absalom (though in this doubtless he was too much swayed by overweening personal affection) more as the seduced than the seducer—the tool of other men's malice and ambition, rather than the agent of his own. Absalom was precisely the man to conciliate the regard, and head the movements of this party. He was as capable as they were of working by fraud or violence. Then, his love of display, his fine chariots and horses, his numerous foot-runners and handsome equipages, gratified their carnal tastes, and promised, were he on the throne, to throw an air of splendour around the kingdom, even beyond what it had presented in the days of Saul. Added to this, there was his wonderful condescension and grace, his insinuating address, his apparent interest in every one's affairs, his readiness to sympathize with them in their matters of complaint, and anxiety to right their cause, had he but the power to do so! 2 Sa. xv. 1-5. These arts were successful; the discontented and ungodly party in the kingdom had found the man they desired; and it seemed right to hazard all in his interest, rather than continue longer under the saintly administration of David, and run the chance of having a like-minded successor to follow him on the throne.

The mode of carrying the plan into effect was characteristic of its nature; it began with a great lie. Absalom pretended he had made a vow to the Lord in Geshur, which required to be paid in Hebron. What it was we are not told; but in all probability he meant a Nazarite vow of separation for a certain time to the Lord, which was to be begun and terminated in Hebron, as a place more suitable than Jerusalem for such a service. It looked suspicious, that Absalom should have been so long in making any mention of such a vow, if he really had undertaken it; but the king described no danger in the proposal, and gave him leave to depart. Presently, however, the secret disclosed itself; so many from Jerusalem and other quarters followed Absalom to Hebron, and among these persons of such high consideration, including Ahithophel, one of David's most trusty counsellors, that the plot was seen at once to be widely spread as well as deeply laid. David perceived in a moment, when he heard how matters stood, that the old Sauline party, which had been so long smothered, had again revived in the conspiracy of Absalom; and, being confident that all the ungodly elements around him would draw in that direction, he saw that his safety was in flight. At the commencement of this flight, the open-mouthed slander and cursing of Shimei confirmed him in the fears he entertained, and showed how closely connected this outburst of rebellion in Absalom was with the smouldering spirit of attachment to the house of Saul. But while he thus had good reason to lose confidence in man, the psalms he indited on the occasion strikingly exhibit the trust he still reposed in God. He rested in the belief, that He who had set the crown upon his head, in the face of the most furious opposition, would vindicate his right to hold it, in spite of all that were now against him. And so it proved. The success of Absalom, indeed, was alarmingly rapid—it seemed as if all was yielding to his touch; Jerusalem opened its gates at his approach; and if he had followed the counsel of Ahithophel to pursue the king at once, and overtake him, when weary and downcast with his misfortunes, the triumph, humanly speaking, might have been complete. But God had provided to defeat the counsel of Ahithophel. The cunning and deceit which had carried Absalom so far on the wings of victory, met him in his council-chamber; his own measure was meted back to him in the skilful part played by Hushai, who urged delay; so that time was obtained for David and his adherents to rally their spirits and concentrate their forces; and when the final struggle came on, the tried and well-officered bands of David completely routed the comparatively raw and undisciplined recruits of Absalom. Absalom himself died by the hands of Joab, after having been caught in a thicket of the wood by his long hair; thus falling a victim at once to his foppish vanity, and his unprincipled, heartless ambition.

The most affecting part in the whole story is the yearning fondness with which the heart of the royal parent continued to go forth toward his unnatural and worthless son. To the very last his bowels moved in this direction. The charge given with emphatic earnestness before the battle, and heard by all the captains, was, "Deal gently for my sake with the young man Absalom." After the battle, as the messengers of victory came posting on one after another to the seat of the king, the first question put to each of them was, "Is the young man Absalom safe?" And when the sad tale fell on the monarch's ear, never did a more piteous lamentation burst from the lips of bereaved parent than was then poured forth, "O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom! would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!" A wonderful fascination must have hung around the man who, after such a career, could still be the object of such a clinging affection. But Joab had taken greatly better the gauge of Absalom's real position and proper deserts; and, rightly conceiving that there would be an end to all order and rectitude in the kingdom, if such an offender should be allowed to escape, he inflicted the fatal stroke, even in the face of the king's pressing injunction. Nor did David, on after reflection, condemn the deed; for while in his last charge he recounted things in Joab's past course by which he had made himself amenable to justice, not a word of rebuke is dropped over the part he took in the termination of Absalom's mournful career.

AB'SALOM'S TOMB, the modern designation of a kind of sepulchral monument in the valley of Jehoshaphat, which stands close by the lower bridge over the Kedron. It consists of a square block, hewn from the rocky ledge, to which it originally belonged, ornamented on each side with engaged columns of the Ionic order, and surmounted with a circular building, which runs up into a low spire. The whole elevation is about forty feet, and in the interior there is a small excavated chamber. How this composite structure should have come to be associated with the name of Absalom is quite unknown. But there can be no doubt it belongs to a much later period, and it certainly has no

cality, excepting that to our apprehension (whether it may be so in reality or not) it must be thought of as at the farthest possible remove from the heaven of light and glory—therefore, most naturally in the heart of the earth. It would seem to be some relief to apostate spirits to be allowed to leave this lowest hell—though they cannot thereby escape from the worse hell of their own bosom—and to prosecute schemes of mischief in the different spheres of terrestrial life and agency. Within certain limits this permission is granted them, not on their own account, but in subservience to the purposes of God's moral government among men. And when these shall have been accomplished, the bars of their eternal prison-house shall be finally closed upon them, and their doom in it rendered only more intensely miserable by reason of the wickedness they had practised on earth, 2 Pe. ii. 4; Jude 6; Re. xx. 10.

In a more general sense the term abyss or deep is used of the state of the dead, in the passage paraphrased by St. Paul from Deuteronomy, and applied to our Lord's profoundest humiliation—"Who shall descend into the deep (the abyss)? that is, to bring up Christ again from the dead," Ro. x. 7. In dying, Christ's bodily part descended into the lower parts of the earth; and his soul also is conceived of as going downwards—cut off for a time from the land of the living; although in reality it entered into a state of most blessed repose, and enjoyed the sweets of paradise. So that nothing definitely local is to be inferred from such language as to the abode of departed spirits. (See HADES.)

ACCAD, one of five cities that were built by Nimrod in the land of Shinar or Babylonia, Ge. x. 10. It is supposed that a remarkable pile of ancient buildings, connection with that pillar which Absalom is said to have erected for himself in the king's dale, 2 Sa. xviii. 18. Dr. Robinson regards it as belonging to that "style of mingled Greek and Egyptian art which prevailed in the oriental provinces of the Roman empire." He thinks it probably of the same age as the architectural remains of Petra; and certainly not reaching farther back than the age of the Herods.

ABYSS, the English form of the Greek ἀβυσσος, which means literally without bottom, hence profound, deep. In the authorized version it is rendered deep in Lu. viii. 31; Ro. x. 7, and bottomless pit, or pit, in all the other passages where it occurs, and which are found only in Revelation—ch. ix. 1, 2, 11; xl. 7, 17, &c. The word had been employed by the Greek translators of the Old Testament, chiefly as an equivalent for the Heb. תְּהוֹמִים (tehom), as at Ge. i. 2; vii. 11; Job xxviii.

14, &c. So used, it plainly denoted a huge, and apparently fathomless assemblage of waters, whether covering the surface, or concealed within the bowels of the earth. And from this the transition was natural and easy to the innermost parts of the earth itself, or the regions generally of the lowest depths—the depths of utter darkness and irrecoverable perdition.

It is in this sense the terms deep and bottomless pit, corresponding to the original term abyss, are always used in New Testament scripture; and it had certainly been better if the one term of the original (abyss) had always appeared in our English Bibles. The demons in the poor Gadarene maniac besought the Lord, when he was going to dispossess them, that he would not cast them forth into the abyss, Lu. viii. 31, that is, would not remand them to the dark and dreary abode, which is their proper habitation, and which is always represented as in the lowest conceivable depths. Nothing is thereby determined as to the precise lo-known by the name of Aker-koof, and situated in Sittacene, about nine miles west from the Tigris, may be the remains of the ancient city. But nothing certain can be ascertained on the subject, especially as so little is known of the original place itself.

ACCHO [Heb. אַכּוֹ, probably sun-heated], a seaport within the territory of the tribe of Asher, and about 30 miles to the south of Tyre. It was never won from the hands of its original occupants, Ju. i. 31. Its earlier name with Greek and Roman writers was Aké, but ultimately it was commonly known under that of Ptolemais, which it derived from Ptolemy, the first Egyptian king of that name, who greatly improved and strengthened it (Strabo, xvi. 877; Diod. Sic. xix. 93; Plin. Nat. Hist. v. 19; 1 Mac. x. 56, &c.); but among Europeans it is better known by the name of St. Jean d'Acre. It is associated with no important event in Old Testament history, and in the New is only mentioned once, when, in connection with the journeyings of Paul, it is said—"We came to Ptolemais, and saluted the brethren, and abode with them one day," Ac. xxi. 7. It acquired its European name from having been assigned by the crusaders to the knights of St. John, by whom it was held for the best part of a century, but was again re-conquered by the Mahometan power in 1291. With the native population, however, it has always gone by the name of Akka, and is therefore, as remarked by Mr. Stanley, "a remarkable instance of the tenacity with which a Semitic name has outlived the foreign appellation imposed upon it. Ptolemais—the title which it bore for the many centuries of Greek and Roman sway—dropped off the moment that sway was broken; and in the modern name of Acre, the ancient Accho, derived from the heated sandy tract on which the town was built, reasserted its rights" (Sinai and Palestine, p. 264). The harbour of Accho is shallow, and can only accommodate vessels of comparatively small burden; but, such as it is, it renders the place of considerable importance, as there is no haven nearly so good in the immediate neighbourhood. It was hence designated by Napoleon the key of Palestine, and in his ambitious designs upon Egypt and the East he made a vigorous attack with the view of getting possession of it. But it made so gallant a resistance under the able command of Sir Sidney Smith, that the French were obliged to desist. It has since been the subject of several sieges, and has suffered much from the vicissitudes of war. So late as 1840, it was bombarded by Admiral Stopford, in connection with the operations which were then carried on for restoring Syria to the Porte. The trade, however, for Syria is now chiefly connected with Beyrout, and Acre has become relatively of much less importance. The existing population is reckoned about 12,000, of which one-third are Turks. The period of its peculiar glory was that of the thirteenth century, when, for a time, it formed the great stronghold of the crusaders (Gibbon's History, ch. lix.)

ACELDAMA, properly HAKAL-DEMA [אַכַּל-דֵּמָא, field of blood], the name given to the plot of ground which was purchased with the reward of Judas' treachery, Ac. i. 19. Its position is no further described, than that it is said to have belonged to the "Potter's Field." This undoubtedly identifies it with the valley of Hinnom; for what was called emphatically the Potter's Field was, from ancient times, associated with that valley, Je. xix. The portion of the valley of Hinnom which forms the southern declivity from Mount Zion, was very anciently used as a burying-place, and is studded with tombs, chiefly hewn out of the rock, but in which nothing of any historical interest has yet been found. The tombs themselves are rude and untasteful; one of these, about half way up the hill, and directly opposite the pool of Siloam, stands, according to tradition, in the midst of the Aceldama of Scripture. Jerome connects it with the same spot, in his Onomasticon; and nearly all the earlier, as well as the later travellers, notice it in their descriptions of Jerusalem. Maundeville, Sandys, and Maundrell each speak of it as used for purposes of burial in their day. We select only one of the latest accounts:—"It is a long, vaulted building, of massive masonry, in front of a precipice of rock, in which is apparently a natural cave. The interior is excavated to the depth of some twenty feet, thus forming an immense charnel-house. At each end is an opening, through which we have a dim view of the interior; the bottom is empty and dry, with a few half-decayed bones scattered over it. The charnel-house is first mentioned by Maundeville. The bodies of the dead were thrown loosely into it; and the soil was believed to possess the remarkable power of consuming them in the short space of forty-eight hours (Sandys). The place does not appear to have been used for burial for more than a century, though some travellers affirm they have seen bodies in it within the last twenty years."—(Murray's Hand-book for Syria and Palestine, by Porter.)

ACHAIA, in the classical period of ancient Greece, was a comparatively small province in the north-west of the Peloponnesus, extending along the Corinthian Gulf for about 65 English miles, with a breadth varying from 12 to 20. But as used in New Testament scripture, the name includes a great deal more; it comprehends the whole of the Peloponnesus, and the greater part of Greece proper, with the adjacent islands; so that the "regions of Achaia" in St. Paul, 2Co. xi. 10, are very much the same with the regions of classical Greece. This change was introduced after the conquest of that country by the Romans—not immediately, however, but after various temporary arrangements had run their course. Shortly before the gospel era, the whole of Greece was divided by Augustus into three provinces, the most southerly of which was called Achaia, comprehending, as already stated, nearly all that was wont to be understood under the general name of Greece; while to the north lay, first Macedonia, and then Epirus. The boundaries between the three provinces are nowhere exactly defined. Achaia, in the large sense now mentioned, was at first constituted a senatorial province, and was accordingly governed by proconsuls. But Tiberius changed it into an imperial province, when, as a matter of course, the government came to be administered by proprators (Tacit. Ann. i. 76). Not long afterwards, however, it was again restored to the senate, and was presided over by a proconsul down even to the time of Justinian (Suet. Claud. c. 25). The events related in the Acts of the Apostles occurred, some of them before, and some of them after this latter change; and nothing but the most minute faithfulness and accuracy could have prevented the sacred historian from falling into error in the use of the terms. It was for a time supposed, even by some able commentators, that an error had been committed at ch. xviii. 12, where Gallio is represented as the proconsul of Achaia, and alterations of the text were suggested to put the matter right. But more careful inquiry fully justified the accuracy of the historian, which is the more remarkable, as it was only five or six years previous to the transactions recorded in Acts xviii. that the province of Achaia had been restored to the senate.

ACHATICUS, the name of a believer in the region of Achaia, and a delegate to the apostle Paul from the church of Corinth, 1 Co. xvi. 17. Nothing further is known of him.

A'CHAN, also written ACHAR, 1 Ch. ii. 7, which means troubling or disturbing; and the probability is, that this slight change in the name was introduced for the purpose of rendering it significant of the character and history of the unfortunate individual it refers to. Achan was the son of Carmi, of the tribe of Judah, and at the taking of Jericho was guilty of a trespass, in what is called "the accursed thing," Jos. vii. 1; that is, he secreted for his own personal advantage a portion of the spoil of the place (viz. a Babylonish garment, 200 shekels of silver, and a wedge of gold), which had been all put under the divine ban, and solemnly devoted to the Lord. This ban had been put upon the people and possessions of Canaan generally, but in a more special and emphatic manner it was laid on Jericho, as the first-fruits of the land, to show, as Hengstenberg justly states (Christol. Mal. iv. 6), "that the former possessors of the land were not exterminated by human caprice, but by the vengeance of God; that their land and their goods were not bestowed upon the Israelites as spoil, but as a fief which He had reclaimed, and which He could now bestow upon another vassal, to see whether he would faithfully render the service he was called to yield." The sin of Achan, therefore, was of a very heinous description; it was a virtual infraction of the terms on which Canaan was granted to the children of Israel, and turned to a selfish account what should have been associated with the most sacred obligations. It carried also the spirit of idolatry in its bosom, and implied that, as the deed was done in secrecy, the God of Israel could neither see nor regard. Such a spirit, manifesting itself at such a time, required to be met with the most severe rebuke, as pregnant (should it prevail) with mischief to the whole community of Israel, and subversive of the design for which they were to be settled in Canaan. Accordingly, a repulse was appointed, under Providence, to be sustained at Ai, to bring out in a palpable form the fact that there was something essentially wrong with the people; and when this had produced its due impression, and a general terror was spread among them, they were directed to the sin of Achan as the cause of the whole evil. The actual discovery of the offender was obtained by casting the lot, who then made full confession of his guilt, and was presently afterwards, with all his family, and even his cattle, stoned to death and burned to ashes by the assembled congregation of Israel.

The melancholy history of Achan gives rise to two questions:—1. Why should the sin of Achan have been imputed to the congregation at large, so that, on its account, the whole should have suffered a defeat? It were wrong, certainly, to hold this a case of imputation in the strict and proper sense—in such a sense as Adam's sin is imputed to his posterity, or the righteousness of Christ to his people. The connection in this case could not, from the nature of things, be nearly so close. But the divine procedure clearly showed that there was a connection, and one that could not exist without a certain participation in the guilt, and a consequent liability to the punishment. It was an essential part of God's policy toward Israel, to treat them as one compact body—a regularly organized whole—to whose common welfare or adversity each individual contributed, and in which also he, more or less, shared: individuals could not expect to attain to blessing apart from the whole, nor the whole apart from the faith and integrity of individuals. To impress this upon them from the first, as a matter of vital moment, terrible things in righteousness were done, and among these the disaster arising out of the sin of Achan. The people were made to feel, that the infection of a single member of the body was fraught with peril to the whole, and doubtless also more thoughtful minds were smitten with the conviction that, though but one man had committed the particular sin condemned, the tendency to fall in the same direction was far from being confined to him. 2. The other question connected with the case of Achan has respect to the severity of the judgment—not only the culprit himself, but his entire family, and every living creature in his possession, being doomed to suffer with him the same terrible penalty. The ground of this undoubtedly was the same with that which involved the people generally in Achan's guilt—the close communal interest which it was necessary to maintain between one portion of the covenant people and another. Standing under one covenant-bond, each was, to a certain extent, responsible for another's behaviour; and the moral interconnection necessarily assumed its strictest form in the family circle. It was not, indeed, an unvarying and inseparable connection; parents, according to the express enactments of Moses, De. xxi. 16, were not to be put to death for their children, nor children for their parents. But the bond was still a very close one, and from the natural tendency of the heart to imbibe evil, it could but rarely happen in Israel, that when the parent turned aside to iniquity, the members of his household should be found free from the contamination. The rather so, as then, greatly more than now, the family was dependent upon the oral teaching and living example of its head for the character it assumed. If, therefore, it might be too much to affirm, in regard to the case before us, that every member of Achan's family participated in his transgression, and hence shared in his condemnation, we may, at least, say that the spirit of Achan was but too probably characteristic of them all; and that, for a warning to all future generations of the inevitable ruin sure to overtake families, if sin should get possession of those who stood at the head of them, the entire household and property of Achan were surrendered to destruction. Thus, in both the respects adverted to, the divine procedure is capable of a perfect justification; and the severity of righteousness displayed in it was fitted to exert a most salutary and wholesome influence upon the families of Israel.

A'CHISH, the import of which is uncertain, occurs as the name of a king of Gath, at whose court David twice sought and found protection, 1 Sa. xxi. 10-15; xxvii. 2; and probably also of another king of Gath, to whom, at a considerably later period, the servants of Shimei fled, 1 Ki. ii. 39. The reception given by the former to David will be noticed in the account of David's life.

ACH'METHA, the ancient and scriptural name of Ecbatana, the metropolis of Media. It occurs, however, only once, Est. vi. 2, where we are told, the decree of Cyrus respecting the restoration of the Jews was found "at Achmetha, in the palace that is in the province of the Medes." In the Apocrypha and Josephus, Ecbatana is the name used. That it was a strongly fortified place is evident from many notices in ancient history; such as, that, after the disastrous battle of Arbela, Darius fled thither, as to a place of comparative safety (Arrian, Anab. iii. 19); that Alexander transported to it the plunder he had taken at Babylon and Susa, &c. The building of the walls of the city, which probably formed the most important part of the fortifications, is ascribed, at the commencement of the apocryphal book Judith, to Arphaxad. But who this king Arphaxad might be is quite uncertain; and Herodotus makes Dejoes the chief founder of the city, as a place of note and security, and represents it as having been surrounded by seven concentric walls, each inner one rising with its battlements above the one immediately before it (b. i. 78). But this is only to be taken as a matter of report—by some it is even held to be entirely fabulous; and certainly it does not square well with the account of Polybius, who states that the city had no walls around it, but possessed a citadel of enormous strength. It is unnecessary here to enter into any further details on the subject, as nothing depends on it for the illustration of Scripture. The common tradition identifies the modern Hamadan with the ancient Ecbatana, which stands on the slopes of the Elwand, the an-scene of disquietude and sorrow; Ho. ii. 15, "I will give her the valley of Achor for a door of hope"—in other words, I will bring to an end the tribulations arising out of sin, and substitute in their room the joyful anticipations of uninterrupted life and blessing.

ACH'SAH [an ankle], a daughter of Caleb. In conformity with customs not unusual in ancient times, she was promised in marriage by her father to the man who should take the city of Kirjath-sephir, or Debir. This feat was accomplished by Othniel, the nephew of Caleb, who accordingly received Achsah for his wife, Jos. xv. 16, 17; Ju. i. 12, 13.

ACH'SAPH [enchantment], a town in the tribe of Asher, Jos. xi. 1; xix. 26; supposed by some to be the same as Accho, and by others as Achzib. The latter supposition is certainly improbable, as Achzib is also mentioned in Jos. xix. 29.

ACH'ZIB [deceptive, lying], the name of two towns, of which very little is known. 1. A place situated in the tribe of Judah, the precise locality of which is nowhere defined, Jos. xv. 44. 2. Another, and apparently more considerable place, within the boundaries of the tribe of Asher, about 10 miles to the north of Acre. The Israelites were at first unable to drive out the Philistines from it, Ju. i. 31, and nothing is afterwards mentioned of it in particular. It still survives under the name of DSIB.

ACRE OF LAND, as used in Scripture, is a less exact term than an English reader might suppose. It is properly a yoke, namely, such a quantity as a yoke of oxen might plough in a day—perhaps from a half to three-quarters of an imperial acre, 1 Sa. xiv. 14; 1a. v. 10, &c.

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, the name commonly used to designate the fifth book in the New Testament scriptures. It obtained this title at a very early period, though sometimes the epithet holy was prefixed to apostles, and sometimes also it was reckoned among the gospels, and called the Gospel of the Holy Ghost, or the Gospel of the Resurrection. common designation, however, has always been that which is still in use; and the early and all but unanimous tradition of the church assigns its human composition to the pen of the evangelist Luke. This tradition is supported by various grounds of an internal kind. 1. According to the preface it purports to have been written by the same person who composed the third gospel, and for the more immediate benefit of the same individual (Theophilus); and by the concurrent voice of all antiquity that Gospel is attributed to St. Luke. 2. There is a striking similarity in the style of this book and of the third Gospel, such as might naturally be looked for in the writings of the same author: the dialect, like that of the Gospel, is in general less Hebraistic than that used by the other evangelists, and it contains a considerable number of words and phrases which are rarely, often never, found in any other books of New Testament scripture, except the Gospel of Luke. A'CHOR [troubling], a valley near Jericho, so named from having been the scene of Achan's punishment, Jos. vii. 24-26. It never occurs again in the history, but is employed as an image by the prophets Isaiah and Hosea, when depicting the better days in prospect for the people of God, which should, as it were, reverse the evil that had taken place in the past, and turn it into experiences of blessing, 1a. lxv. 10, "The valley of Achor shall be a place for the herds to lie down in"—a place of peaceful rest, instead of, as in the days of old, a common designation, however, has always been that which is still in use; and the early and all but unanimous tradition of the church assigns its human composition to the pen of the evangelist Luke. This tradition is supported by various grounds of an internal kind. 1. There is a striking similarity in the style of this book and of the third Gospel, such as might naturally be looked for in the writings of the same author: the dialect, like that of the Gospel, is in general less Hebraistic than that used by the other evangelists, and it contains a considerable number of words and phrases which are rarely, often never, found in any other books of New Testament scripture, except the Gospel of Luke. As many as fifty of these have been pointed out—(see, for example, Davidson's Introd. § 1.) 3. In the latter part of the narrative, from ch. xvi. 10, onwards, the writer usually includes himself in the party of Paul, and speaks as one who had been an eye-witness of many of the transactions which took place; so, in particular, he writes at ch. xx. 5; xxi. 1; xxvii.; xxviii. Now, we know of no other person who was on such a footing of intimacy and companionship with St. Paul, of whom this can be properly understood, but the evangelist Luke. We cannot, with some in later times, understand it of Timothy; for at ch. xx. 4, 5, Timothy is mentioned among others who accompanied Paul into Asia, and who, it is said, "going before tarried for us at Troas," implying that the historian was a different person from any of those specified. Nor can we, with others, suppose Silas to have been the person so identifying himself with the apostle; for Silas is once and again spoken of in the third person, and in ch. xv. 22, when first mentioned, he is spoken of in a way the writer could never have done of himself, as a "chief man among the brethren." Then, though Luke is not mentioned by name in the history, yet we know from the allusions in the later epistles of Paul, that he was a bosom-friend and close companion of the apostle; in Phile. 24 he is named as one of his "fellow-labourers," in Col. iv. 14 as "the beloved physician," and in 2 Ti. iv. 11 as the one faithful friend who abode with him to the last, when so many forsook him. So that not only had Luke gone with the apostle into Italy, but he continued to hold with him there a peculiarly close and endearing relationship; and the whole of the incidental notices concerning him, and the relation he held to the apostle, conspire with the tradition in pointing to him as the companion who wrote, who alone, so far as we know, could have written, such an account of the life and labours of Paul as is found in this book.

As to the sources from which St. Luke drew his information, and respecting which German critics have been wont to discourse at great length, though to little purpose, there is no need to go into any particular inquiry. For the latter half of the book, the man, who was the bosom-friend of the apostle to whom it all relates, and himself also the almost constant eye-witness of the transactions described, had no occasion to go in quest of original sources; he had these beside him, at first hand. And as regards the historical details given, and the discourses recorded in the earlier part, there can be no reasonable doubt that he took substantially the same course with this portion of his narrative, that he did in narrating the events of our Saviour's life—namely, sought and obtained "a perfect understanding of them from those who were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word," Lu. i. 2, 3. While in all things guided by the supernatural direction of God, he could not, on that account, be the less, but would rather be the more careful, to make use of the most authentic means within his reach for knowing precisely all that he undertook to relate of the first planting of the Church of Christ.

Of this we shall be the more satisfied, when we reflect upon the high design with which he wrote this sequel to his gospel history. A somewhat partial and superficial view has very commonly been taken of the book. The very name given to it—"Acts of the Apostles"—is itself a proof of the undue regard that has been had to the merely external aspect of its contents, and has also served to perpetuate the tendency so to view it, as if what we had chiefly to look for here were a historical account of the life and labours of our Lord's apostles after he had left them! Were that all, every one must be struck with the extremely defective nature of the work, and must also feel that in its object it occupies a much lower position than the Gospel of which it purports to be the continuation. But by the sacred historian himself, the two are most closely connected together: "The former treatise have I made, O Theophilus, of all that Jesus began both to do and teach:"—it was but the beginning of his mediatorial agency that the historical account in the Gospel had embraced, though it reached from his birth to his resurrection; and now—such is the fair inference from the words taken in connection with what follows (and the position of the verb, ἤρξατο, before Jesus, in the original, makes the inference still more obviously natural than in the translation—now, in this second account we proceed to exhibit the continued operation of that agency, and the results it accomplished among men. Jesus still is the great subject of the evangelist's delineations—the real spring of the movements he describes; only Jesus withdrawn within the veil, and from the sanctuary above operating by the grace of his Spirit upon the souls of men, and actually setting up the kingdom, which it was the purpose of his mission to establish in the world. Hence, as justly stated by Baumgarten, who, in his work on the Acts, has the merit of awakening attention to this higher aim of the book, Jesus, as the already exalted king of Zion, appears, on all suitable occasions, as the ruler and judge of supreme resort; the apostles are but his representatives and instruments of working. It is He who appoints the twelfth witness, that takes the place of the fallen apostle, ch. i. 24; He who, having received the promise from the Father, sends down the Holy Spirit with power, ch. ii. 33; He, who comes near to turn the people from their iniquities and add them to the membership of his church, ch. ii. 47; iii. 26; He who works miracles from time to time by the hand of the apostles; who sends Peter to open the door of faith to the Gentiles; who instructs Philip to go and meet the Ethiopian; who arrests Saul in his career of persecution and makes him a chosen vessel to the Gentiles; in short, who continually appears presiding over the affairs of his church, directing his servants in their course, protecting them from the hands of their enemies, and in the midst of much that was adverse, still giving effect to their ministrations, and causing the truth of the gospel to grow and bear fruit. We have therefore in this book, not merely a narrative of facts, which fell out at the beginning of the Christian church, in connection more especially with the apostolic agency of Peter and Paul, but we have, first of all and in all, the ever-present controlling administrative agency of the Lord Jesus Christ himself, shedding forth the powers of his risen life, and giving shape and form to his spiritual and everlasting kingdom. If this leading idea is kept in view, it will present the book of Acts to the mind as in scope and aim perfectly akin to the Gospels, and will also supply a connecting thread to bind together into a consistent whole the apparently isolated and somewhat occasional notices it contains. Nor, if contemplated in the light now suggested, will it appear accidental, that the history should terminate with Paul's work at Rome, as it commences with the work of the twelve in Jerusalem; for the commission of Christ to his ambassadors was, that they should preach the gospel among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem; and in Rome, the centre and capital of the heathen world, the different nations might be said to have their representation. The truth of the gospel, when once fairly planted there, might well be regarded as in the act of taking possession of the world. It is probable, however, that other and more personal reasons conspired to induce the evangelist to conclude his narrative when it reached the period of Paul's imprisonment at Rome. That period formed a sort of terminating point, as well as a long pause in the apostle's labours; and we can easily suppose that with the materials collected of the past, and amid the uncertainties of the future, the evangelist might deem it proper to bring his account to a close.

When we turn from the great design and object of the book, to think of the precise period and order of its particular parts, many difficulties present themselves. It is for the most part but an approximation that can be attained; and commentators differ considerably in respect to the dates they assign to specific facts. Since the careful investigations of Wiesler, however (Chronologie des Apostolischen Zeitalters), there has been more of general agreement as to the leading points. Taking the vulgar era of our Lord's birth as three or four years later than it should have been, we may say the history of the Acts reaches from A.D. 30 to A.D. 63. The persecution connected with the martyrdom of Stephen may be assigned to the year 36 or 37; the council at Jerusalem to decide respecting circumcision probably took place about the year 50, before which Paul's first missionary tour had been accomplished, and shortly after which his second tour commenced. It was during the year 60 that Felix was superseded by Festus, at which time Paul was, and had for two years already been in bonds. In the following year he arrived at Rome, and continued, with the degree of liberty granted him, to preach the gospel there for two years more; so that about the year 63 the sacred historian concluded his narrative, and most probably about the same period gave it forth to the world.

The events comprised within the thirty-three years over which the history stretches, may not unnaturally be ranged under three great divisions. Paley, in his Evidences, ch. ix., has adopted this division (coupling it, however, with quite improbable dates), and since his time it has been very commonly recognized. The first period embraces the strictly Jewish age of the New Testament church—the period during which the preaching of the gospel was confined to the circumcision, and the converts to the faith consisted only of believing Jews. This stage reaches to the death of Stephen, ch. vii., and probably occupied the first six or seven years of the Church's history. The second stage—already prepared for by the nature of Stephen's preaching—began with the persecution which ensued on his death, and which dispersed many of the disciples through Samaria and Galilee, and, in the case of some, as far as Antioch, Cyprus, and Phenice. Wherever they went, we are told, "they preached the word," and with a success which far exceeded their expectations; but it was still only to the Jews, ch. xi. 19, at least to none but the circumcised; for the Samaritans also shared in the benefit, though they held only a sort of intermediate position between the Jewish and Gentile portions of the world. But in this case they were reckoned as more properly belonging to the Jewish, since they practised circumcision, and so came within reach of the gospel call, as then understood. At the close of this period there were churches not only in Jerusalem, but also in Samaria and Galilee, Cæsarea, Antioch, and still more distant regions, ch. ix. 31; xi. 20, 21. Another and third era commences with the conversion of Paul, and the admission of the family of Cornelius into the bosom of the Church, which were probably not far asunder, though we may suppose the conversion of Paul to have been somewhat earlier. The great advance now made was the opening of the door of faith to the Gentiles, simply as Gentiles; that is, without having submitted to circumcision and passed through the Jewish yoke. The apostles knew from the first our Lord's intention to extend the blessings of the gospel to the Gentile portion of mankind; the original commission given to them before he left the world was to make disciples of all nations, nay, to preach the gospel to every creature. But the idea seems still to have hung upon their minds, that to receive the Christian faith the Gentiles must first submit to the yoke of Judaism. Now, however, by the descent of the Spirit on the family of Cornelius, while still uncircumcised, and by the calling of one who was to be sent as an apostle especially to the uncircumcised Gentiles, the bonds were in a manner burst, and the Church entered on her course of expansive development and world-wide diffusion. With the exception of the circumstances growing out of this important event at Jerusalem, and a few other occurrences about the same period, the remaining portions of the Acts are taken up in tracing the progress of this last phase of things, as connected with the life and labours of him who was more especially charged with its accomplishment.

Beside the benefit yielded by the book of Acts from the account preserved in it of these successive stages in the early history and planting of the Christian church, it contains materials, more particularly in its later portion, of immense value for establishing the authenticity and genuineness of the New Testament writings. It has been by means of a minute and careful comparison of the accounts in these with the allusions in St. Paul's epistles, that a most convincing, and, we may say, an irrefragable argument has been formed in proof of the historical verity of both. It is to Paley that the honour is due of exhibiting this proof, and establishing the argument grounded on it in a manner which leaves little to be supplied; and his Horæ Paulinæ will ever remain a monument of his fine discrimination, practical sagacity, and solid judgment. If the original writings of the New Testament had been more studied on the Continent in the spirit and principles of this work, many a vain and groundless theory would have been checked in the bud.

The more special helps for the study and interpretation of the book of Acts are, beside the general commentaries on the New Testament, the work of Baumgarten already referred to, now translated, and forming part of Clark's Foreign Library—a work in some parts fanciful, in others prolix and involved, but abounding with profound thoughts, and pervaded by an elevated spirit; Biscoe on the History of the Acts confirmed from other authors; Neander's History of the Planting of the Christian Church by the Apostles (forming part of Clark's Biblical Cabinet); The Life and Letters of the Apostle Paul, by Conybeare and Howson; Wiesler's Chronologie; Hackett's Exegetical Commentary; Alexander's Commentary, &c.

ADAH [ornament, comeliness] occurs as the name of one of the wives of Lamech, Ge. iv. 19; and also one of the wives of Esau, Ge. xxxvi. 4. The latter seems to have been originally called Judith, Ge. xxxvi. 34; but, in accordance with a practice quite common in the East, with a change of state there was assumed a change of name.

ADAM [to be red, or, as some put it, earth-red, ruddy], the name given to our first parent, and from him the common designation in Hebrew of mankind at large. It seems at first thought somewhat strange, that the head of the human family should have received his distinctive name from the affinity which he had, in the lower part of his nature, to the dust of the earth—that he should have been called Adam, as being taken in his bodily part from adamah, the ground; the more especially as the name was not assumed by man himself, but imposed by God, and imposed in immediate connection with man's destination to bear the image of God:—"And God said, Let us make man (Adam) in our image, after our likeness," &c. This apparent incongruity has led some, in particular Richers (Die Schöpfung, Paradieses und Sündfluthes Geschichte, p. 163), to adopt another etymology of the term—to make Adam a derivative of damah (דָּמָה), to be like, to resemble. Delitzsch, however, in his Psychology of the Bible (System der Bibl. Psychologie, p. 49), has objected to this view, both on grammatical and other grounds; and though we do not see the force of his grammatical objection to the derivation in question, yet we think he puts the matter itself rightly, and thereby justifies the received opinion. Man got his name Adam from the earth, adamah, not because of its being his characteristic dignity that God made him after his image, but because of this, that God made after his image one who had been taken from the earth. The likeness to God man had in common with the angels, but that, as the possessor of this likeness, he should be Adam—this is what brought him into union with two worlds—the world of spirit and the world of matter—rendered him the centre and the bond of all that had been made, the fitting topstone of the whole work of creation, and the motive principle of the world's history. It is precisely his having the image of God in an earthen vessel, that, while made somewhat lower than the angels, he occupies a higher position than they in respect to the affairs of this world, Ps. viii. 5; He. ii. 5.

To pass, however, from the name to the reality, the account given of Adam in Scripture must always be interesting and important, from the relation in which, as the first man, he stands to all the families and generations of mankind. In this respect the subjects of chief moment connected with his history divide themselves into three parts:—1. The simple fact of his creation at a definite stage in the natural history of the world. 2. The state in which he was created, with the constitution of things under which, in that state, he was placed. 3. The loss of his original condition by transgression, and the immediate and remote consequences thence arising.

1. In regard to the first of these points, the representation given in the first chapters of Genesis is, that Adam was absolutely the first man, and was created by the direct agency of God; that this act of creation, including the immediately subsequent creation of Eve, was the last in a series of creative acts, which extended through a period of six days (whether natural days or not will be the subject of future inquiry under the article CREATION); and that, as everything up to this consummating act had been made with a view to the future support and well-being of man, so, when Adam and his spouse were brought into being, they were placed over all as the proper heads of the world, and had its best things subordinated to their use. This scriptural account is, of course, entirely opposed to the atheistic hypothesis, which denies any definite beginning to the human race, but conceives the successive generations of men to have run on in a kind of infinite series, to which no beginning can be assigned. Such a hypothesis, originally propounded by heathen philosophers, has also been asserted by the more extreme section of infidel writers in Christian times. But it will scarcely find any advocates in the present day. The voice of tradition, which, in all the more ancient nations, uniformly points to a comparatively recent period for the origin of the human family, has now received conclusive attestations from learned research and scientific inquiry. Not only have the remains of human art and civilization, the more they have been explored, yielded more convincing evidence of a period not very remote when the human family itself was in infancy, but the languages of the world also, when carefully investigated and compared, as they have of late been, point to a common and not exceedingly remote origin. "It is no longer probable only," says Sir William Jones, "but absolutely certain, that the whole race of mankind proceeded from Iran (in Western Asia) as from a centre, whence they migrated at first in three great colonies, and that those three branches grew from a common stock which had been miraculously preserved in a general convulsion and inundation of this globe." And Bunsen, writing still later, states it as "the result of the most accurate linguistic inquiries, that a regular, not stray coincidence merely, has been proved to exist between three great families of language spreading from the north of Europe to the tropic lands of Asia and Africa—a coincidence not in radical words only, but even in the formative words and inflections which pervade their whole structure, and are interwoven, as it were, with every sentence pronounced in each of their branches. All the nations," he adds, "which, from the dawn of history to our days, have been the leaders of civilization in Asia, Europe, and Africa, must consequently have had one beginning." The same conclusion substantially is reached by Dr. Donaldson, who, after stating what has already been accomplished in this department of learning, expresses his conviction, on the ground alone of the affinities of language, that "investigation will fully confirm what the great apostle proclaimed in the Areopagus, that God hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth" (New Cratylus, p. 19). The conclusion is still further confirmed by the results that have been gained in the region of natural science. The most skilful and accomplished naturalists—such as Cuvier, Blumenbach, Pritchard—have established beyond any reasonable doubt the unity of the human family as a species (see particularly Pritchard's History of Man); and those who have prosecuted geological researches, while they have found remains in the different strata of rocks of numberless species of inferior animals, can point to no human petrifications—none, at least, but what appear in some comparatively recent and local formations—a proof that man is of too late an origin for his remains to have mingled with those of the extinct animal tribes of preceding ages.

So far, therefore, the account given in Genesis of the origin of the human race by the creation, last of all, of a human pair, stands accredited and established by the most careful investigations of human reason. Tradition, learning, science, in their maturest form, here pour in their contributions to support the testimony of revelation. And for another form of the atheistic, or at least antisciptural hypothesis, that the human family, instead of being all descended from one pair, may have sprung from several pairs created in different quarters of the globe, or possibly not so created, but developed by spontaneous generation out of some inferior species of the animal creation—as regards this aspect of the matter, the same reasons which meet the other form of objection are equally applicable here; for a variety of original pairs either developed or created is entirely at variance with the established result of a single species, at once essentially different from all others, and, at the same time, knit together by the bonds of internal affinities of thought and speech, and issuing from a common, not very remote centre. Science generally can tell of no separate creations for animals of one and the same species; and while all geologic history is full of the beginnings and the ends of species, “it exhibits no genealogies of development” (Miller's Testimony of the Rocks, p. 201). So that the natural history of man in the Bible, as embodied in the account of Adam's creation and its results, is the only one that is borne out by the deductions of science and learning. And that, when created, he must have been formed in full maturity, as Adam is related to have been, was a necessity arising from the very conditions of existence. To have been able even in the most favourable circumstances to meet the demands of nature, and provide for the support of himself and his offspring, he must have had from the first what others can acquire only by degrees—the strength, the sagacity, the prudence, which belong to the manhood of life. Had he been created otherwise, or had he even been placed, when created, in a situation ill adapted to the comfortable maintenance of life, where should have been for him the divine wisdom and beneficence? And how could existence have been preserved without a succession of miracles? The earth at large required to undergo a process of preparation, in order to become a fit habitation for a being of such capacities and wants. And not only so, but the particular region where the first parent of the human family was to be located, must also have required (if goodness presided over his destiny) to be the most select and fertile spot within its bounds. Accordingly, when God had formed man, he placed him in the garden of Eden, which he had specially prepared for him, with fruitful herbs and trees, and whatever was good for food and pleasant to the eye.

2. We turn now to our second point of inquiry—the state in which Adam was created, and the constitution of things under which in that state he was placed. The introduction of Adam and Eve last in the order of creation, implies, as already stated, the relative superiority of the species to which they belonged; they appear as the culmination of a creative series. This impression is confirmed and deepened by both the accounts given in the two first chapters of Genesis of Adam's creation. That in the second chapter, which relates more especially to his bodily organization and his animal life, still indicates his place to be above the rest of the animal creation. “And the Lord God,” it is said, “formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul.” The material, indeed, out of which the formation was made, is earthly—“dust of the ground,” though of that ground the finer particles; and the result produced, so far as here indicated, is not specifically different from what belonged in general to the animal creation; for in the case of the inferior orders also, it is given, ch. i. 24, as the result of the creative act, that each after its kind became “a living soul,” or “living creature,” as our English Bible there renders the Hebrew phrase. We may not, therefore, say that God's having breathed into man's nostrils the breath of life, and thereby made him a living soul or creature, of itself rendered him essentially higher and better than the orders that preceded him. But still there is a manifest difference, and on his side a marked superiority—not merely in his being produced as the last and crowning act of the creative energy of God, but also in the very mode and style of his creation. The living creatures generally, which were formed to dwell upon the face of the earth, are represented as coming forth from the earth when impregnated with the creative power of God's Spirit, and assuming as they rose into being their severally distinctive forms, like so many items in a great mass of animal existence. But in the case of man it is not the spirit-impregnated earth that brings forth; it is God himself who takes of the earth, and by a separate individualizing act, fashions his frame, and breathes into it directly from himself the breath of life;—a distinct personality, and in the attributes of that personality, a closer relationship to God, a form of being that might fitly be designated “God's offspring,” Ac. xvii. 28. This is plainly what the narrative of Adam's creation ascribes to him, in contradistinction to the beasts of the field. And so it was understood by Elihu, in Job xxxiii. 4, when he said, “The Spirit of God hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath given me life”—i. e. so made and so enlivened me, that I have in me somewhat that is of God, and can again give it forth for the understanding and profit of others.

This, however, becomes still more plain—the incomparable greatness and superiority of nature in Adam, and through him in humanity at large, impresses itself upon us yet more forcibly in the other account of his creation, which has for its leading aim the exhibition of that wherein he differed from the inferior creatures. After the earth, at the divine bidding, had brought forth these, the Lord said, “Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion,” &c. “So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them.” Here the prominent point obviously is, not man's relation to the living creaturehood, but his relation, as the highest of earthly creatures, to God—the resemblance of the created to the Creator. And in giving expression to this, it will be observed, two terms are used, “in our image, after our likeness,” which, though nearly related in meaning, are not quite identical. The one has respect more to the form, the other to the substance or ground on which that form is based: man was constituted in his being the shadow (so tzelem originally imports), the visible reflex of God, and, in order to be this, he received the impress of his likeness. It may seem to savour of the carnal to speak of a form in God, as if it ascribed to him something like corporeal lineaments. But possibly such an impression only arises from our imperfect conception of spirit, which, while opposed to corporeity, may be perfectly compatible with form; and certainly, what seems implied here as to form in God, is in other parts of Scripture distinctly indicated; as when the Psalmist gives vent to the expectation of his heart, in the words, "I shall be satisfied when I awake with thy form:" for so it should be rendered, Pa. xvii. 15. Undoubtedly, however, the resemblance to Deity, in which man was made, has respect, primarily and fundamentally, to the soul; like God he was formed with an intelligent, rational spirit, with an understanding and a will of its own, capable of going forth in free and controlling agency upon all around it, and disposed by the innate bent of its faculties to employ its powers to wise and righteous ends. The implantation of such a spirit in man is what rendered him as by right of nature, the lord of this lower world, and, as such, the representative of Deity. But a spirit so formed required for its calling and destiny a corresponding framework—a body skilfully adapted to be the organ of its communications with the external world, to express its feelings and execute its purposes; so that if his spirit is the immediate likeness or image of God, his body is the image of that image; and in what he does through the instrumentality of this body—in the acted results of his thoughts and inclinations—there was from the first designed to be, and there should in reality ever have been, exhibited a shadow of Godhead.

Such, according to the account in Genesis, is the high place assigned in the work of creation to man, primarily as an intelligent and moral being, and secondarily as possessing a fitting bodily organization. As the two were by the divine Architect linked together into one compound personal being, so in both man holds the same relative superiority; in his bodily structure, not less than in his intellectual and moral nature, he is the crowning act and issue of creation. And it is singular, that in this respect also modern science lends its confirmation to the handwriting of Moses. It has discovered, by searching into the remains of preceding ages and generations of living creatures, that there has been a manifest progress in the succession of beings on the surface of the earth—a progress in the direction of an increasing resemblance to the existing forms of being, and in particular to man. The human form was the archetypal idea or exemplar that was from the first in the divine mind, and which, by successive acts of creation, it was ever approximating, till the period of full realization arrived. But the connection between the earlier and the later, the imperfect and the perfect, is not that of direct lineage or parental descent, as if it came in the way merely of natural growth and development. The connection, as Agassiz has said in his Principles of Zoology, "is of a higher and immaterial nature; it is to be sought in the view of the Creator himself, whose aim in forming the earth, in allowing it to undergo the successive changes which geology has pointed out, and in creating successively all the different types of animals which have passed away, was to introduce man upon the surface of our globe. Man is the end toward which the animal creation has tended from the first appearance of the first palaeozoic fishes."

Thus there appears a remarkable analogy between the works of God in nature and his operations in grace; the earlier creations typified man, much as afterwards the earlier dispensations typified the God-man. "The advent of man, simply as such, was the great event prefigured during the old geologic ages. The advent of that divine Man, 'who hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light,' was the great event prefigured during the historic ages. It is these two grand events, equally portions of one sublime scheme, originated when God took counsel with himself in the depths of eternity, that bind together past, present, and future—the geologic with the patriarchal and the Christian ages, and all together with that new heavens and new earth, the last of many creations, in which there shall be 'no more death nor curse, but the throne of God and the Lamb shall be in it, and his servants shall serve him.'"—(Miller's Testimony of the Rocks, p. 216.)

The divine record says nothing of the personal appearance of Adam when he came from the hands of his Creator; but fashioned, as he was, by the immediate agency of God, and standing chief among the productions which were all pronounced "very good," we cannot doubt that in form and aspect he belonged to the highest type of humanity. The region, too, where, according to all the indications of modern research as well as of ancient tradition, the human family had its first local habitation, favours the supposition. The exact site of Paradise has, by subsequent changes on the earth's surface, been hopelessly placed beyond the reach of our investigations, but there can be no doubt that it lay somewhere within that district of Western Asia in which the Caucasian territory is situated; and from the earliest periods to the present times the Caucasian type of man has always been placed by naturalists in the highest rank. The sculptured figures in the ancient Assyrian, Grecian, and even Egyptian remains bear much of this cast; and in proportion as the offshoots of the original race receded from that Caucasian centre, and planted themselves in the more distant extremities of the globe, they became deteriorated in appearance. It is, therefore, in perfect accordance with all that we know, and have reason to believe, that the first pair were, even in a physical respect, cast in the finest mould of humanity, and that there is more than poetical sentiment in the delineation of Milton, when he described them as "the loveliest pair

That ever yet in love's embraces met;
Adam, the goodliest man of men since born,
His sons; the fairest of her daughters, Eve."

That the intellectual and moral condition of Adam was correspondingly high is still more certain—it is matter of positive revelation. The divinely-formed image of Godhead, like every workmanship of God, could not be otherwise than in its own nature perfect—"very good"—especially in those higher elements which constitute the distinctive excellence of man, and the more peculiar resemblance of Deity. Hence it is written, "God made man upright"—intellectually and morally a pattern man; nothing awry in his constitution or character; the powers of his nature rightly balanced, and hence clear in his perceptions, solid in his judgment; above all, sound and healthful in the spiritual temperament of his soul. The evidence of this appears in the whole account given of Adam's primal condition. God familiarly converses with him, as finding in him a fit image and representative of himself; and Adam proves capable of understanding, and learning from his divine Teacher. Not only does he enter intelligently into the instructions given him respecting his business and calling in the garden of Eden, but the Lord caused the inferior creatures that had been made to come before him, "to see what he would call them; and whatsoever Adam called every living creature, that was the name thereof." The meaning plainly is, that the Lord knew he had discernment to perceive the distinctive natures of each, and the skill needed to express this in appropriate designations; a reach of thought, and especially a power of embodying thought in utterance, which many have deemed too high for primeval man! But in this they are again rebuked by the profounder philosophy of recent times, which justly refuses to take its gauge of original and proper humanity from the half-brutalized forms of savage life. "According to my fullest conviction," says William von Humboldt, one of the greatest students of the philosophy of language, "speech must be regarded as immediately inherent in man; for it is altogether inexplicable as the work of his understanding in its simple consciousness. We are none the better for allowing thousands and thousands of years for its invention. There could be no invention of language unless its type already existed in the human understanding." Strictly speaking, however, man did not need actually to invent; he had but to tread in the footsteps of his divine Teacher. God, according to the inspired record, first spake, addressing himself to that type of language which was imprinted on the human soul, and Adam caught up the lesson; he formed his speech after the pattern set him by God. And looking, as Adam could then do, into the nature of things with a cloudless intellect and an untroubled bosom, the language in which, as deputed lord of creation, he designated the various creatures presented to him, we may well conceive, was most aptly significant of the respective qualities of each, and afforded ample illustration of his own quick discernment and penetrating insight.

But the survey which Adam was thus called to take of the inferior creation served, in another respect, to bring out his high position; for, while he saw in the creatures qualities fitted to subserve his purposes, and so far must have looked upon them with complacency, he recognized, at the same time, their essential inferiority to himself—in none of them was there found a nature like his own, or an individual fitted to be a meet associate for him. Yet they had each their own proper associates—the male with his female; and the thought could scarcely fail to press itself on his bosom, why should he not also, amid the wealth of creation, have a mate provided for him! The bountiful Author of his being, however, was himself conscious of this need, and proceeded to meet it in a manner alike singular and edifying. He did not set about an entirely new creation, which would have marred the unity of the pair, as together representing complete humanity, and would also have exhibited woman in an attitude of too great isolation and independence; but He cast Adam into a profound sleep, during the unconsciousness of which a rib was taken from his body, and formed into a woman; thus, in the very mode of her formation, imaging her true position and calling in relation to man—first her secondary and dependent place, as derived from him, and for the purpose of entering as a handmaid into the sphere already occupied by him—then, her finer susceptibilities and more delicate structure, as fashioned out of matter refined into human flesh; and, finally, her adaptation for awakening and reciprocating the tenderer feelings of nature, as having been developed from that part of Adam's body which lies near to and envelopes the heart. These were great and fundamental lessons for all times. And Adam again discovered his high intelligence and profound discernment, when, on the presentation to him of this fitting partner, he at once exclaimed, "This now is bone—(or more exactly, "this is the time," spoken in contrast to preceding occasions, when nothing suitable was found, "this is the time, bone")—of my bone, and flesh of my flesh." So, as he had given names to the other creatures, expressive of their respective natures, he does the same also with his wife:—"She shall be called woman (isha), because she was taken out of man (ish);" that is, her name, indicative of her nature and her place, must bear the impress of him from whom she has been derived—her standing must still be in closest connection with him, and in dependent, though free and willing, subjection to him.

Now, that this corporeal and intellectual elevation was accompanied with entire moral purity, appears, not only from the capacity shown for free intercourse with God, and the disposition to fall in with all his arrangements, but also from the express statement respecting both, that "they were naked, and were not ashamed." In other words, they had no consciousness of guilt; sin, as yet, wrought not in their bosoms, and they were not afraid lest their naked bodies should disclose what they would wish to have concealed. Truth alone was in their inward parts—the truth of pure and holy love; and nothing but this could be mirrored in the features or the movements of their external frames.

Such, according to the sacred narrative, was man's original state; and in regard to the constitution under which he was placed, it was, first of all, one of high privilege and enjoyment. His relative means and advantages corresponded to his elevated personal condition. The lordship of all was committed to him; and the region in which he was to have the seat of his dominion, the garden formed for his immediate occupation, was emphatically a region of life and blessing. Copious and refreshing streams watered it; herbs and trees of every kind, fitted to minister to his support and gratification, grew within its borders; and in the midst of all the tree of life, capable, whether by inherent virtue or by sacramental grace, to sustain life in undecaying freshness and vigour; so that provision was made, not only for the preservation of his being, but also for the dew of his youth ever abiding on him. But, secondly, along with this, his position was one of responsibility and action. He was not to dwell in an idle and luxurious repose. The garden itself was to be kept and dressed, that it might yield to him of the abundance and variety which it was capable of affording; and from this, as a select and blessed centre, he was to operate by degrees upon the world around, and subdue it to himself—make it a sort of extended paradise. It is to be understood that the work thus devolved upon him, if the original constitution of things had stood, would have involved no toilsome or oppressive labour, but merely regular and active employment, such as is needful for the healthful condition of the human frame itself, and the happy play of all its faculties; and it implied, besides, the dignity and honour of being a fellow-worker with God, in carrying the appointed theatre of man's existence to the degree of perfection which potentially, indeed, but not yet actually, belonged to it. Finally, there was in Adam's original position the danger inherent in the possession of a will entirely free, and having within its reach an evil as well as a good. The charge, to keep the garden, in part betokened this, as it pointed to the possibility of some unholy intrusion being attempted on the order of God and the well-being of the world. The existence of a tree, beside the tree of life, designated "the tree of the knowledge of good and evil," still more distinctly betokened it; and, most of all, the explicit charge given concerning this tree:—"Of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil thou shalt not eat; for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." Whether the tree might possess in itself noxious properties, which, on the participation of its fruit, would by natural efficacy work the fatal issue here threatened—or whether it was an innocuous tree, set up merely as the test of allegiance, so that the infliction of death should come simply as a moral result through the special visitation of God—may be regarded as in some degree doubtful; though the analogy of the tree of life, which seems to have had quite peculiar life-sustaining virtue implanted in it, Ge. iii. 22, and the further analogy of God's dealings generally, in which entirely arbitrary appointments, not grounded in the nature of things, are rarely, if ever, made, appear to favour the supposition of some inherent noxiousness in the tree of knowledge itself. Either way, however, the existence of this tree in the midst of the garden, with the condition and penalty hung over it, the perfect freedom granted to Adam to keep or violate the condition, and the foreknown results in which this constitution of things was to issue, involves the great question of the origin of evil, which must ever remain for man, in the present life, an inscrutable mystery. Apart from the difficulties of that question, and looking simply to matters as they stood, it is clear that God saw meet to suspend the whole of Adam's state and prospects on an alternative—but an alternative which imposed no hardship, and in which he was at perfect liberty to take the one side or the other, as his own heart might incline. A certain negative disadvantage merely attended the side of obedience; he could not know evil, as, perhaps, it was known by superior intelligences, if he abstained from partaking of the tree of knowledge; but, in the fulness of blessing around him, and the active operations in which his nature might find genial employment, there was enough to satisfy every just desire, and, with the plenteousness of what he had, to prevent any craving desire for what his heavenly Father thought fit to withhold. Granting, therefore, that somehow opportunity and freedom to sin were to be given to man, and that the alternative of falling through sin, as well as of standing through righteousness, must have been placed before him, we cannot conceive how it could have been done on a less exceptionable footing, or coupled with an easier condition.

3. The sacred narrative does not inform us how long Adam and his partner continued in their original state. From no child, however, having been born to them till after they had lost it, the natural inference is, that the unfallen period could not have been of very long duration; and as it is the fallen state, with its disastrous results, which has now become the normal one for mankind at their entrance into the world, the fall of our first parents has acquired for their posterity the most painful interest. The history is a very brief one, and in that respect is in striking contrast with the vastness and multiplicity of its results. The story begins by telling us of the serpent, that there was a subtlety or cunning in it above the other beasts of the field; and as the story proceeds, and informs us how the serpent's subtlety displayed itself, the impression is forced upon our minds, that there were in it more than bestial properties—that the serpent was but the cover and instrument of a higher power; for the part acted by it here lay beyond the sphere of things properly belonging to it, or to any other beast of the field. A broad line of demarcation separated the whole of them from Adam, as Adam himself had recognized when the creatures passed in review before him: none of them were capable of becoming associates to him, or holding discourse of reason. Here, however, the serpent gets the faculty of speech—imperfectly, it might be, and no doubt actually was, as compared with man's—yet such as to render it capable of intelligent utterance, and talking familiarly with Eve. Not only so, but the thought suggested in what was spoken was a thought of evil, first reflecting discredit on the goodness of God, as if he had withheld from man what was in itself good, and then, when Eve interposed the threatened penalty of death as a bar to the proposed eating of the fruit, directly denying the fact that there should be a penalty, as God had declared. This betokened both an exercise of intelligence and a spirit of malice in the serpent, such as could not properly belong to any of the creatures which were not made in the image of God's rational nature, and yet were in their own place very good. We need not wonder, therefore, that the ancient Jews, both in their sacred and their rabbinical writings, held Satan to have been here the prime agent; so that the name of the old serpent, the dragon, and such like, came to be synonymous with the deceiver, or the devil. The allusions of New Testament scripture confirm this view of the matter; in particular, our Lord's words to the Jews, Jn. viii. 44: "Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do. He was a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in the truth, because there is no truth in him. When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own: for he is a liar, and the father of it." The connecting thus the charge of murder with lying, as the means by which the evil was accomplished, and representing this combination of falsehood and murder as having been manifested from the beginning, clearly points to the history of the fall, and identifies the part there ascribed to the serpent with the agency of the devil. So also does the allusion of the apostle Paul in 2 Cor. xi. 3, where the beguiling of Eve by the serpent through subtlety is connected with the deceitful working of satanic agents generally, and in particular with Satan's transforming himself into an angel of light, ver. 12-15. Compare also such passages as Mat. iii. 7; 1 Jn. iii. 8; Re. xii. 9; in which the same allusion is manifest.

We are warranted to assume, then, that the prime actor in the history of the fall on the side of evil was Satan under the disguise of the serpent—some such disguise being necessary in the yet uncorrupt world, that the temptation might acquire the requisite body and form. Under this wicked agency the evil began by an inversion of the natural order of things—raising a beast of the field out of its proper place, leading the irrational to presume to advise and guide the rational. And as it began, so it proceeded; for there was another inversion of the proper order, in the woman—whose name and calling alike bound her to follow and not to lead, to act in connection with and dependence upon her husband, not in disregard and despite of him—of her own will venturing to partake of the tree, and thereafter persuading him to follow her example. The weaker thus, in violation of Heaven's fixed appointment, usurped the place of the stronger vessel, and in the very quarter of danger and conflict assumed the province of giving law and counsel, instead of waiting to receive it. The woman, by improperly yielding to her own more impulsive nature—the man by not less improperly yielding to the direction and example of his wife—both by losing hold of the eternal truthfulness of God's Word, and departing from the order he had prescribed for their observance, fell from their high estate, and involved themselves in guilt, shame, and death. The consequences soon became apparent. The guilty pair presently knew that they were naked; consciousness of sin made them dread lest indications of irregular desire should appear in the unveiled body; and they sought to cover their nakedness with garments of fig-leaves. But still they were not protected; for the sound of the divine footsteps in the garden awoke the cry of guilt in their bosoms, and they fled into the covert of the trees to hide themselves. But this also failed; and they were dragged forth to receive the fatal sentence, which doomed them and all their posterity to suffering and death, tempered, however, by the blessed promise that mercy was to arrest the full execution of the penalty—that the woman should give birth to a seed which should bruise the serpent's head; in other words, should have an offspring, by and in whom the evil now introduced should be again abolished, and the author of the evil himself crushed in his dominion. The promise undoubtedly implied a spiritual victory—deliverance not simply from the effects of the fall, but also from the sin and guilt, in which the essence of the evil and the triumph of the tempter really stood; so that the promised reversion of the evil necessarily carried redemption, in the higher sense, in its bosom. And on the ground of the redemption thus dimly indicated in the first promise, the Lord gave the fallen pair a real clothing—a clothing of skins, derived from slain victims, and fitted to serve as a suitable covering for their bodies, because the sacrifice of the animal life had already been taken as a covering for their guilt. (See SACRIFICE.)

With the introduction, however, of this new constitution of grace and hope for the fallen, the pristine state of things, even in outward form and appearance, had of necessity to be abolished. Having lost the righteousness with which access to the tree of life was inseparably connected, Adam had also to lose his place in Paradise, the gate of which was thenceforth barred against him; and in the way to the tree of life there was planted a flaming sword, to guard against intrusion into the sacred territory; while cherubim of glory took the place of man within, and kept up the testimony from God, that the living creaturehood of earth, and pre-eminently man, its constituted head, were yet destined to occupy the region of pure and blessed life. (See CHERUBIM.) All that we are told further of Adam and his partner is associated with the bestowal of a succession of names. First of all, a new name was given by Adam to his wife: "He called his wife's name EVE (life), because she was mother of all living." It was the expression of faith and hope amid the gloom and desolation of the fall. Life, it virtually said, is yet to prevail in the midst of death, yea, and rise above it; she who has been the occasion of letting in the power of the adversary to destroy is now, through God's grace, to be the channel of introducing a seed of life and blessing. The name therefore, as has been justly said by Delitzsch, "bears the impress of the promise; it stands in contradistinction to the original hava (woman), a proper name, and designates the peculiar individual position of this first of women, in reference to the entire future of the history of salvation." The next name imposed was that given to the first-born of the human family, CAIN [gotten]; given by Eve, however, it would seem, rather than by Adam, and apparently indicating her confidence that she had already got the commencement of that seed of blessing which was to be truly a divine gift, and was to prevail over the tempter. Sad experience came in to correct this natural and joyful expectation; it taught both father and mother, by terrible deeds of sin, that in the bosom of their own offspring there was to be a serpent's, as well as a woman's seed, and that the former was even to have for a time the precedence in place and power. ABEL [emptiness, vanity] was the name given to the next child, though we are not told for what precise reason it was imposed, nor at what particular time, but most probably it came (as already suggested under the life of Abel) after his untimely end, and as an expression of the grief and disappointment which it occasioned in the hearts of the parents. But the next name reverses the picture, and is, perhaps, the most interesting of the series, on account of the cheering light which it throws on the state and feelings of these progenitors of the human family. When another son was given to them after the death of Abel, they called his name SETH [set or appointed]; "for God had appointed them another seed instead of Abel whom Cain slew," Ge. iv. 25. And in the genealogical chain which links together Adam and Christ, and of which the first grand division is given in ch. v., it is this son whom Adam and his wife called Seth, that was accounted to them for a seed; "as if his progeny before this were not to be reckoned; the child of grace had perished, and the other in a sense was not. Adam, therefore, is here distinctly placed at the head of a spiritual offspring—himself with his partner the first link in the grand chain of blessing."—(Typology of Scripture, i. 276). Other sons and daughters, we are told, were born to Adam, though no specific information is given respecting them; and his whole term of life is stated to have been 930 years.

This primeval history is inwrought with several grand moral principles, to say nothing of its incidental lessons. 1. It teaches the original righteousness of man's nature, and his possession of life—pure, blessed, everlasting—as the proper heritage of righteousness. 2. The righteousness and life, it further shows, were suspended on a condition, the easiest that can well be conceived—a condition, therefore, eminently reasonable and just; so that, if Adam, with his finely balanced mind and high moral nature, should fail to keep it in the face of one temptation, humanity at large may justly be inferred to have been also incapable of keeping it; the natural man in his best estate, and with every advantage on his side, could in no circumstances have abidden in holiness. 3. Whatever mysteries lie in the background, defying the reach of our present powers of insight or reason, the loss of the original good, we again learn, as to its immediate origin, came from the abuse of that freedom which was essential to man's intellectual and moral nature as the image of Godhead, and which, viewed in connection with the perfect knowledge he possessed as to the consequences of obedience and transgression, rendered the blame entirely his own. 4. Adam and Eve having been constituted the living root and responsible heads of the human family, their fall necessarily became the fall of mankind; every child of humanity thenceforth must enter the world an heir of sin and death. 5. And since this fall was permitted to enter through one man, only that the hope of recovery to another and more secure state of blessing might be brought in, this hope, in like manner, must be made to stand in one, a second Adam, though in nature and sufficiency unspeakably higher than the first; for thus only could any prospect be afforded to the world of righteousness and life being regained. So far, therefore, Adam was "the type of him that was to come;" the representative character sustained by the one was the image of that to be sustained by the other; and the root of being, which in the first man so soon turned into evil for his natural offspring, becomes in the second man, the Lord from heaven, for all spiritually related to him, the sure ground of a life that cannot die, and a glory that is imperishable.

ADAM, ADAMAH, ADAMI, different modifications of the same word, occur as names of cities in Palestine, of which nothing of any importance is known—the first in Jos. iii. 6, of a town on the Jordan; the second in Jos. xix. 36, and the third in Jos. xix. 33, of towns in the tribe of Naphtali.

ADAMANT, one of the hardest and most costly of the precious stones, and often used as a symbol of impenetrable or enduring firmness. It is found only in the English Bible at Eze. iii. 9 and Zec. vii. 9, but in both cases as the translation of shami, which is also rendered diamond. This latter is now generally regarded as the proper rendering of the original.

ADAR, the name given to the last month in the Jewish year. (See MONTH.)

AD'ASA, a place not far from Beth-horon, nowhere mentioned in Old Testament scripture, but celebrated in later times as the place where Judas Maccabeus routed the Syrian general Nicanor, 1 Mac. vii. 40, seq.

AD'BEEL [sorrow of God], a Hebraism, perhaps, for very great sorrow, the name of Ishmael's third son, Ge. xxv. 13.

ADDAN [probably calamity, but somewhat uncertain], possibly a variation of ADDON [lord or master], for both Addan and Addon occur as the name of one of the returned exiles from Babylon, No. vii. 61; Eze. ii. 59.

ADDER. In the English Bible this is the rendering of four distinct Hebrew words, אַחְשׁוּב (achshoov); פֶּתֶן (pethen), oftener rendered asp; צִיפּוֹנִי (tziponi), oftener rendered cockatrice; and שֶׁפִּיפִּי (shepifpi). Each of these doubtless signifies some kind of venomous serpent.

Among the various tribes of animals which are inimical to man, there is none that can compare with the venomous snakes for the deadly fatality of their enemy:

the lightning stroke of their poison-fangs is the unerring signal of a swift dissolution, preceded by torture the most horrible. The bite of a vigorous serpent has been known to produce death in two minutes. Even where the consummation is not so fearfully rapid, its delay is but a brief prolongation of the intense suffering. The terrible symptoms are thus described:—A sharp pain in the part, which becomes swollen, shining hot, red, then livid, cold, and insensible. The pain and inflammation spread, and become more intense; fierce shooting pains are felt in other parts, and a burning fire pervades the body. The eyes water profusely; then come swoonings, sickness, and bilious vomitings, difficult breathing, cold sweats, and sharp pains in the loins. The skin becomes deadly pale or deep yellow, while a black watery blood runs from the wound, which changes to a yellowish matter. Violent headache succeeds, and giddiness, faintness, and overwhelming terrors, burning thirst, gushing discharges of blood from the orifices of the body, intolerable fetor of breath, convulsive hiccoughs, and death.

From these circumstances we see how appropriate an emblem was a poisonous serpent of any insidious deadly enemy, and in particular of sin, and of Satan, the arch-destroyer. (See SERPENT.)

The agent of these terrible results is an inodorous, tasteless, yellow fluid, secreted by peculiar glands seated on the cheeks, and stored for use in membranous bags, placed at the side of each upper jaw, and enveloping the base of a large, curved, pointed tooth, which is tubular (No. 5). These two teeth, or fangs, are capable of being erected by a muscular apparatus under the power of the animal, when they project at nearly a right angle from the jaw.

The manner in which the deadly blow is inflicted is remarkable, and is alluded to in Scripture. When the rage of the snake is excited, it commonly throws its body into a coil more or less close, and raises the anterior part of its body. The neck is now flattened and dilated, so that the scales, which ordinarily lie in close contact, are separated by wide interspaces of naked skin. The neck is bent more or less back, the head projecting in a horizontal position. In an instant the whole fore part of the animal is launched forward towards the object of its anger, the erected tooth is forcibly struck into the flesh, and withdrawn with the velocity of a thought. No doubt the rage which stimulates the action calls forth an increased action of the poison-glands, by which the store-sac is filled with the secretion. The muscular contraction which gives the rapid blow compresses at the same instant the sac, and as the acute point of the fang enters the flesh, the venom is forced through the tubular centre into the wound.

It is impossible to say with certainty what particular species is indicated by each Hebrew word. It has been supposed that the achshoov is a species of Naja or hooded snake, probably Naja haje; that the pethen may be the batan of the modern Arabs (Vipera lebetinalis); and that the shepipôn is the Cerastes, or horned viper. The tziponi seems not to have been identified.

[7.] Horned Viper—Cerastes cornutus. Length about 14 inches.

The achshoov is alluded to but once in Scripture, viz. in Ps. cxl. 3, "Adders' poison is under their lips;" a passage which is cited by Paul, Ro. iii. 13, among others, to prove the utter corruption of man, and his apostasy from God. It is equivalent to saying, "Their speech is wholly and intensely wicked."

The pethen is mentioned in the following passages:—In De. xxxii. 33, where its venom is used to express the excessive vileness of the Gentile world; Job xx. 14, 16, where it expresses the doom of the wicked man (in the former of these verses the poison-fluid is called "gall," doubtless in allusion to its yellowness); Ps. lviii. 4, where the indifference of this species to the arts of the charmers (to be described presently) represents the stupid deafness of sinners to the warnings and invitations of the Holy Spirit; Ps. xci. 13, where, in prophetic promise, the Lord Jesus is assured of victory over Satan; and Is. xi. 8, where the absence of all hurtfulness from the millennial earth is expressed by the immunity of a little child playing over the hole in which the pethen lurks.

The word tziponi occurs as follows:—In Pr. xxiii. 32, the insinuating character of the love of strong drink, and its dreadful result, are compared to the treacherous death-blow of a glittering snake; Is. xi. 8 (see above); Is. lix. 5, apostate Israel is described as producing nothing but wickedness—as if one should hatch eggs and they should prove to contain venomous adders; Je. viii. 17, here the indifference of this viper (like the pethen) to the psyllic art, is used to express the cruelty of the Chaldean invaders, not to be thwarted or evaded.

But a single notice occurs of the shepipôn, viz. in Ge. xlix. 17, where the traitor-character of the tribe of Dan—the first outbursting of the power of Satan in apostasy in Israel—is compared to an unseen adder in the path, which causes the overthrow of the mounted horseman. A curious illustration of this danger is given by Henniker:—"I was hurrying forward, when on a sudden my camel stopped short; I spoke to it, but without effect; I goaded it gently, but in vain; at length I struck it, and it immediately threw itself viciously upon its side, flinging me with considerable force. . . . The cause was its refusal to pass by a small snake that lay coiled up in the path."

The subject of serpent-charming, alluded to in the negative descriptions of the pethen, Pa. lviii. 4, and the tziponi, Je. viii. 17, as well as in the epithet "deaf," applied to the former, is one involved in much obscurity. [The term deaf, it may be noted in passing, like that of "stopping the ears," is merely metaphoric. None of the serpent tribe have any external auditory orifice, nor the least appearance of a tympanum. The story which Calmet cites, of the adder clapping one ear on the ground, and stopping the other with the tip of its tail, is a sheer absurdity.] From time immemorial it has been a well-known fact that certain persons have exercised a wonderful power over the most venomous serpents. Multitudes of modern observers have described the practices of the snake-charmers in such terms as to leave no doubt of the fact. One instance may suffice for illustration. Mr. Gogerly, a missionary in India, says, that some persons being incredulous on the subject, after taking the most careful precautions against any trick or artifice being played, sent a charmer into the garden to prove his powers:—"The man began to play upon his pipe, and proceeding from one part of the garden to another, for some minutes stopped at a part of the wall much injured by age, and intimated that a serpent was within. He then played quicker, and his notes were louder, when almost immediately a large cobra-di-capello put forth its hooded head, and the man ran fearlessly to the spot, seized it by the throat, and drew it forth. He then showed the poison-fangs, and beat them out; afterwards it was taken to the room where his baskets were left, and deposited among the rest." "The snake-charmer," observes the same writer, "applies his pipe to his mouth, and sends forth a few of his peculiar notes, and all the serpents stop as though enchanted; they then turn towards the musician, and approaching him within two feet, raise their heads from the ground, and bending backwards and forwards keep time with the tune. When he ceases playing they drop their heads and remain quiet on the ground."

It may be observed that the different species of Naja (cobra-di-capello, hooded snake, spectacled snake), and of Cerastes (horned viper), are those which manifest an interest in musical sounds, and are capable of being "charmed." [P. H. G.]

ADINA [slender, pliant], the name of one of David's chief captains, of the tribe Reuben, 1 Ch. xi. 42.

AD'INO THE EZNITE [his pleasure-the-spear], the chief of David's heroes, called also the Tachmonite, who is said to have lifted up his spear and slain 300 men at one time, 2Sa. xxiii. 8. (See JASHOBRAM.)

AD'MAH [red], one of the cities of the plain, that perished in the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah. It seems to have been of small size, and is seldom expressly mentioned, but occurs in Ge. x. 19; xiv. 2, 8; De. xxix. 23; Ho. xi. 8.

ADONAI, the Hebrew word for LORD, and by the Jews always substituted for JEHOVAH in the reading of the Hebrew Scriptures. The practice is of old standing, and seems even to have been in existence at the time of the Septuagint translation of the Old Testament, some centuries before the birth of Christ. It appears to have arisen out of a superstitious dread of pronouncing in a light or irreverent manner what was regarded as the more peculiar name of God, and thereby incurring the guilt denounced in the third commandment. With very few exceptions, our translators have followed the example of the Septuagint, and rendered Jehovah as well as Adonai by Lord. (See LORD and JEHOVAH.)

ADONI-BEZEK [lord of Bezek]. Bezek was a Canaanitish town, somewhere either within or on the confines of the territory of Judah. In the first chapter of Judges an account is given of the capture of the place by the men of Judah, and of what befell its king Adoni-bezek. When they got him into their hands, it is said, they cut off his thumbs and his great toes, requiting the same measure to him that he had dealt to others. "Threescore and ten kings," he said, "having their thumbs and their great toes cut off, gathered under my table"—a shocking example of petty lordship and barbarous cruelty. The kings, of course, who were subjected to this inhuman treatment, must have been chieftains, rather than kings, in the ordinary sense of the term, heads of little townships or clans; they could not otherwise have fallen in such numbers under the sway of such a little tyrant as Adoni-bezek. But however small their jurisdiction, they certainly had a right to look for more considerate and gentle treatment than they received from their conqueror; and he became at last sensible of his enormity, and recognized the divine retribution in the severity inflicted upon himself; for he added, "As I have done, so hath God requited me." By the victorious party he was taken to Jerusalem, where he died.

ADONI'JAH [Lord-Jehovah], the son of David by Haggith, born in Hebron, and the next in order to Absalom. He seems to have partaken, to a considerable extent, both of the faults and of the superficial excellencies of Absalom. Some time after the death of Absalom, and on the ground of his being the eldest that survived of David's family, he also laid claim to the right of succession to the throne, and when his father was sinking under the infirmities of age, he took steps to have his claim established. Like Absalom, he was a person of graceful exterior and attractive manners; and with the view of drawing around him a party, and pushing his way to the throne, he prepared for himself chariots and horses, and footmen to run before him, 1 Ki. i. 5, 6. It is possible, and seems indeed to be implied, that David had not been at sufficient pains to check these indications of an aspiring disposition in Adonijah at their commencement; and no attempt appears to have been made to meet the advances Adonijah was visibly making toward the throne, by an explicit announcement of the divine purpose in behalf of Solomon. That the will of God in this respect had been intimated at a comparatively early period, and that David's determination also was taken, is evident; but only a limited number, it would appear, had been fully let into the secret, until the plans of Adonijah had ripened, and he was actually proclaimed king at En-rogel. It is only in this way we can explain the adherence of such men as Abiathar the priest and Joab to Adonijah. They were not likely to have taken part in his design, if they had distinctly understood that the matter of the succession was already definitely fixed, both on God's part and on David's; and so when the open proclamation of Adonijah as king roused David and those about him from their supineness, and Solomon was officially consecrated as successor to his father, the party of Adonijah melted away from him, and he himself fled to lay hold on the horns of the altar, as one who had no hope, even for his life, but in the mercy of Heaven. It had been well for him if this spirit had continued to hold its sway; as he was forgiven for the past, so he might have lived on peaceably in the future. But an aspiring disposition again broke out in him; and after relating to Bathsheba what reasons he had, from priority of birth, for expecting the kingdom, and from the sentiments of the people generally being on his side, he got her to ask for him Abishag to wife, 1 Ki. i. 15. In this request, coupled probably with other things that appeared in Adonijah, Solomon descried the old spirit of ambition watching its opportunity to grasp after the dominion, and gave orders for his instant execution. If in this the procedure of Solomon should seem somewhat hasty and violent, it must be remembered that, from the altered circumstances of modern times and European manners, we are scarcely competent judges; and that, according even to still prevailing notions in the East, such a request as was made by Adonijah would be regarded as trenching on the prerogatives of the reigning sovereign. Solomon, there is good reason to think, acted from necessity rather than from choice.

ADONIRAM [lord of height], apparently contracted in some passages into ADOBAM, 2 Sa. xx. 24; 1 Ki. xii. 18; and again changed into HADOBAM, 2 Ch. x. 18; the name of a principal officer in the times of Solomon and Rehoboam, who had charge of levies and tributes. On the occasion of the revolt which took place at the commencement of Rehoboam's reign, he was sent to communicate the king's mind to the people, and was stoned to death in the uproar that ensued. This probably arose, less from the offensive nature of the reply given to the people's demands, than from the general odium which Adoniram had drawn upon himself in connection with the heavy exactions that had been laid upon the people. As being at the head of that department, he would naturally urge on the matter as vigorously as possible, and he consequently drew upon himself the popular fury.

ADONI-ZE'DEK [lord of righteousness, or upright lord], the king of Jerusalem, at the time when the Israelites invaded the land of Canaan. The name is substantially of the same import with that which was borne, at a much earlier period, by the ruler of what there is every reason to believe was the same place. Melchizedek, which means king of righteousness, was, in Abraham's day, king of Salem, which is understood to have been the original designation of Jerusalem; and it would seem that succeeding rulers of the place had made it a point of honour, or regarded it as a matter of policy, to keep up the ancient title, or one of its synonyms. But, unfortunately, they had not been equally careful to keep up the reality which the name indicated. Melchizedek was actually a righteous king, and a priest of the most high God, but since his days corruption of all kinds had made fearful progress in the land of Canaan; and from the active part which Adonizedek took in resisting the purposes of God toward Israel, we can have little doubt that he was concerned in all the abominations for which summary judgment was inflicted on the people of the land. He and the surrounding tribes belonged to the race of the Amorites, who appear to have occupied nearly all that part of Canaan which afterwards fell to the tribe of Judah, and of the fulness of whose iniquity at the time of the conquest special mention is made. What more immediately, however, brought Adoni-zedek and the neighbouring princes into conflict with the Israelites, was their combined determination to destroy the Gibeonites for having made a covenant of peace with Joshua. For this purpose, headed by Adoni-zedek, they laid siege to Gibeon; but tidings were sent by the besieged to Joshua, who, in consequence, fell upon the combined forces of the Amorites, utterly discomfited them, and put Adonizedek and the other princes to death, after having dragged them from the cave in which they had found a temporary asylum, Jos. x. 1-27. It was on this memorable occasion that Joshua is related to have called upon the sun to stand still, that he might have time to complete the victory he had won over the enemy. (For the consideration of this point, see JOSHUA.)

ADOPTION, as a term, occurs only in the New Testament, and with reference to the relation in which the people of God stand to him, as his children by grace, the objects of his special love and favour. The original word, υιοθετια, denotes properly the act of receiving into a family one who does not belong to it by birth; literally, placing such an one in the position of a son, or setting him among the children; then, by transference, the condition or privilege of the adopted child—sonship. The practice, in its merely human connection, was evidently of very remote origin, as appears from the readiness with which Abraham first, then Sarah, thought of another than their own actual offspring being admitted to the standing of a child, and constituted heir of the family name and possessions, Ge. xv. 2; xvi. 2. We have also early examples of adoption in the case of Moses, who was taken by Pharaoh's daughter, and brought up as her son; and of Ephraim and Manasseh, the sons of Joseph, to whom their grandfather Jacob gave a place among his own children, as entitled to rank with them in the promised inheritance, Ge. xlviii. 5, 6. In some countries adoption has been formally recognized and regulated by law. It was so both among the Greeks and Romans. The right of adoption was somewhat restricted by the Greeks, at least by the Athenians, with whose usages in this respect we are best acquainted; for only an Athenian citizen could be adopted by any one, and that only when the person adopting had no offspring of his own. An Athenian citizen was obliged to divide his property among his own children. By the Roman law the right of selection was less limited, but it also proceeded on the principle that the adoptive father had no son of his own, and no reasonable expectation of having any. The act of adoption had to be done under the authority of a magistrate; and, when thus legally done, it constituted in law the relation of father and son precisely as if the adopted son had been born to the father in lawful wedlock. If the father had a daughter, the adopted son stood to her in the relation of a brother; and if the father died intestate, the same son succeeded to the property as heir at law. There appears to be an allusion to this right of the adopted child to the name and possessions of the father, in the reference that the apostle Paul makes to the custom of adoption, Ro. viii. 15-17.

In Scripture the people of God are constantly spoken of as his children, the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty; as such, not by nature, but by grace—not by birth, but by a sovereign act of favour on God's part. It is as marking this distinction, that the word adoption has its special significance; it expresses at once the nature of the privilege and the manner in which it is bestowed. It is peculiarly a New Testament term; for, though the idea of sonship often occurs in the Old Testament in connection with the chosen people, it is only by the revelation of Jesus Christ that we have clearly explained to us on what ground, in what way, and to what extent, this privilege can be enjoyed by fallen creatures.

The word adoption occurs only in five instances, Ro. viii. 15, 23; ix. 4; Ga. iv. 5; Ep. i. 5; but the subject is often referred to elsewhere, and is presented under a variety of aspects. On God's part, adoption is represented—
1. As having its origin in his eternal counsel and purpose, Ep. i. 4, 5. 2. As flowing immediately from Christ and the union of his people with him, Jn. i. 12; Ga. iii. 26; iv. 4, 5. Hence the parallel between the relation of the Father to Christ and to his people, Jn. xx. 17;—Christ is their elder brother, Ro. viii. 29; they are joint-heirs with him, Ro. viii. 17. 3. As sealed by the work of the Holy Spirit, producing in them the character and disposition of children, Jn. i. 12, 13; Ro. viii. 14-16; Ga. iv. 6. 4. As consummated at the resurrection, Ro. viii. 23. On the other hand, the privilege of sonship, as enjoyed by God's people, includes—1. The love and favour of God in a special and pre-eminent degree, 1 Jn. iii. 1; Ep. v. 1; Jn. xvii. 23, 26. 2. Fatherly provision, protection, and discipline at God's hand, Mat. vi. 31-33; x. 29, 30; He. xii. 5-8. 3. Access to God with filial confidence, Ro. viii. 15, 26, 27; 1 Jn. v. 14; Mat. vi. 8, 9. 4. The inheritance of future glory and blessedness, Ro. viii. 17, 18; Ro. xxi. 7; 1 Pe. i. 4.

Christian adoption is to be distinguished—1. From the sonship of Adam, who is spoken of as the son of God, Lu. iii. 38, because, as the first man, he derived his being immediately from the hand of God, and was made in God's image and likeness; this was the sonship of creation. 2. From the sonship ascribed, in a still more limited sense, to the whole human family. They are all the offspring of God, because in him they live, and move, and have their being, Ac. xvii. 28, 29. 3. From the sonship or adoption ascribed to the ancient people, Ex. iv. 22, 23; Je. iii. 10; Ro. ix. 4. This, as regarded the nation at large, and the earthly inheritance which they enjoyed, was only a typical adoption—the shadow, and not the substance. The true saints of God, indeed, in Old Testament times, had a spiritual sonship, essentially the same as that which is enjoyed under the gospel; though, in the measure of its manifestation to them, and of their present enjoyment of it, it fell far short of the Christian privilege, Ga. iv. 1-7.

Old Testament believers could not have more than a very partial revelation of it; for the grace and love of God were not manifested with any such distinctness as they now are, in the person, and work, and word of the Lord Jesus. The law, under which believers were then placed, naturally tended to produce a spirit of bondage and fear; its effect upon the conscience, to some extent, interfered with the freedom of sonship. Hence they are compared to the heir while he is a child, under tutors and governors, kept under restraint—no better than a servant, as regards the present enjoyment of his privilege, though in reality lord of all. Add to all this, that the Holy Ghost was not yet given; the dispensation of the Spirit had not yet come; the communication of grace and of spiritual light to the souls of believers was comparatively limited and partial;—and it will be manifest how imperfect must have been their understanding and enjoyment of the privilege of sonship, though it did really belong to them.

It is otherwise with New Testament believers. In the gospel they have a clear discovery of the riches of God's grace, as well as of his gracious purposes of kindness toward those who enjoy this particular privilege, and of the ground and manner of their entering into it, through the mediatorial work of Christ. Besides, along with this revelation, they have the gift of the Spirit, in all the fulness of his gracious influences, to open their understanding, and to bear witness with their spirit that they are the children of God. Thus they receive the adoption of sons, as regards the actual enjoyment of it. See the contrast between the law and the gospel, in this respect, strikingly illustrated in Gal. iv. [w. L.]

ADORAM. See ADONIRAM.

ADRAMMELECH [magnificence of the king, splendid king]. 1. The name of one of the idol-deities that were worshipped by the Assyrian colonists who occupied the land of Israel after the captivity of the ten tribes, 2 Kt. xvii. 31. The Sepharvites burned their children in the fire to him, whence Adrammelech may be inferred to have been substantially identical with Moloch (Selden, De Diis Syriis, i. 9). Some have also sought to connect the worship of Adrammelech with that of the sun-worship of the Persians; and still again with that of the Chronos of the Greeks; but these are rather speculations than opinions resting on any sure historical grounds. 2. The name of one of the sons of Sennacherib, who, along with his brother Sharezer, murdered his father, when engaged in an act of worship, 2 Kt. xix. 37.

ADRAMYTITUM, sometimes also written ATRAMYTITUM, and ADRAMYTTEOS, a town of Asia Minor, in the province of Mysia, situated over against Lesbos, on the river Caicus, and at the head of the bay, which, from the town, was called Adramyttenus. It was in a vessel belonging to the port of Adramyttium that Paul embarked at Cesarea for Italy, Ac. xxvii. 2, from which he was afterwards transferred to an Alexandrian ship. It is said to have derived its name from Adramys, a brother of Croesus, king of Lydia. But, if such was originally the case, the town appears ultimately to have assumed a Greek, rather than an Asiatic character.

An Athenian colony is related by Strabo to have settled at it, and a party from Delos also emigrated thither (Thucyd. v. 1). It is known to have been a flourishing seaport in the times of the kings of Pergamos; and so recently as the seventeenth century it still carried on a considerable trade in boat-building (Pococke's Travels, ii. 2, 16); but it has now become a comparatively poor and filthy village (Fellows' Asia Minor). It is still called Adramyt or Endramit; but there are no remains about it of ancient grandeur.

ADRIA, also HADRIA, properly the gulf that lies between Italy on the west, and the coasts of Dalmatia and Albania on the east. It was often, however, regarded as a sea, part of the Ionian, and very commonly the Latins called it Mare Superum, the Upper Sea, in contradistinction to the Tyrrhenian, which they designated Mare Inferum, the Lower Sea. Adria, or Hadria, was rather the Greek than the Latin name for it. As to the limits which the Hadriatic was understood to embrace, these appear to have been extremely variable. Strabo and Pliny placed them at the point where the heel of Italy approaches nearest to the coast of Greece, and forms a sort of strait, not more than forty miles wide; but very ancient writers, in particular Scylax, represented the Adriatic as all one with the Ionian Sea. Even Strabo speaks of the Ionian as part of the Adriatic; and Ptolemy (iii. 1) designates the sea which washes the eastern shores of Bruttium and Sicily the Adriatic (τὸ Ἀδριατικὸν πέλαγος). The term thus came to comprehend the whole of that part of the Mediterranean which lies around the southern coast of Italy; so that, when the writer of the Acts speaks of the ship in which Paul sailed being tossed about in Adria, shortly before she struck on the coast of Malta, he uses language in perfect accordance with the current geometrical phraseology; and the term Adria in Ac. xxvii. 27, gives no countenance to the idea that the scene of the shipwreck was not Malta but some small island far up in the gulf. (See Smith's Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, where this point, and many others connected with it, are most carefully investigated.)

ADRIEL [flock of God], the person to whom Saul gave in marriage his daughter Merab, after having promised her to David, 1 Sa. xviii. 19. Five of his sons were slain in connection with the request of the Gibeonites for exemplary punishment on Saul's bloody house, 2 Sa. xxi. 8. They are called Adriel's sons, which Michal, not Merab, bare to him; for which see MICHAL; and for the slaughter itself, see GIBEONITES.

ADUL/LAM. 1. A very ancient town, situated in what was afterwards the plain country of the tribe of Judah, Jos. xv. 35, but which is mentioned as a well-known place at a much earlier period, Ge. xxxviii. 1, 12. At the time of the invasion of Canaan by the Israelites, it is placed among the royal cities, which had each a king of its own, Jos. xii. 16; and after the revolt of the ten tribes it was one of the places which Rehoboam fortified, 2 Ch. xi. 7. At a later period still it is referred to by the prophet Micah, ch. i. 15, and, according to the common rendering, is called "the glory of Israel." But it is scarcely possible that this can be the correct meaning; as, from anything known respecting Adullam, it would savour of extravagance to designate such a place emphatically the glory of Israel; the more so as the city belonged to the territory of Judah, and not to what, in the days of Micah, went by the name of Israel, the name commonly appropriated to the ten tribes. The more proper rendering is that which is given in the margin, "the glory of Israel shall come to Adullam;" and the meaning of the clause seems to be, that the men of rank and wealth, who might be said to constitute Israel's glory, should be driven southwards as far as Adullam, by the victorious hosts that were to break in upon them from the north; for Adullam lay in the south-west portion of Judah, not very far from Gath, and the passage in which this announcement occurs contains an account of the troubles and calamities that were to sweep over the land by the northern invaders, first in the case of the house of Israel, and then in that of Judah.

2. ADULLAM, a cave, the favourite haunt of David, to which he retreated in the time of greatest danger, and whither also his parents and others went down to join him, after he had escaped both from Saul and from the king of Gath, 1 Sa. xxii. 1-3, has often been supposed to belong to the neighbourhood of the city of the same name; but this is altogether improbable, as the situation of the city was not in a mountainous and rugged district, where caves naturally abound, but in a comparatively plain and level tract of country. And it is certain that modern travellers have found no caves near the site which is supposed to have been occupied by Adullam, capable of affording a safe retreat for David, and for holding, as we are told were for a time lodged in it, 400 men. The old tradition, which places this cave in a valley near the Frank mountain, not far from the Dead Sea, known by the name of Wady Khureitun, seems to indicate the proper locality; and it also accords best with the fact, that David, on escaping from it, is represented as passing into the confines of Moab, which lay on the other side of the Dead Sea, and leaving there his father and mother, 1 Sa. xxii. 3, 4. This cave is in a deep ravine, surrounded on each side by precipitous rocks, and capable of being approached only on foot, along the side of the cliffs. Dr. Robinson was not able himself to visit it, but his companion had done so, and fully confirmed the description given of it by Irby and Mangles. These gentlemen, who were not aware of this being the reputed cave of Adullam, present such an account of it as most strikingly accords with the purposes to which it was applied by David. They say:—"It runs in by a long, winding, narrow passage, with small chambers or cavities on either side. We soon came to a large chamber, with natural arches of great height; from this last were numerous passages, leading in all directions, occasionally joined by others at right angles, and forming a perfect labyrinth, which our guides assured us had never been thoroughly explored, the people being afraid of losing themselves. The passages were generally four feet high, by three feet wide, and were all on a level with each other. The grotto was perfectly clear, and the air pure and good." One can easily perceive how admirably adapted such a vast and curiously constructed cavern would be as a hiding-place for David and his persecuted band; and with what facility they could lie concealed, as on one occasion they did, 1 Sa. xxiv., in some of those dark transverse passages, while Saul came in to the mouth of the cave, and knew not that he was at the mercy of those whose life he was pursuing. It is the more probable that this was the cave of David's peculiar resort, as it lay only about six miles to the south of Bethlehem, his native place; and nothing was more likely than that, while tending his father's flocks, he should have made himself intimately acquainted with a cavern so near at hand, and so remarkable in its structure.

ADULTERY is a wilful breach of the marriage vow by either of the parties contracting it; and, according to the original ideal of married life, presented in the formation of one man and one woman, joined by the ordination of God into one flesh, such a breach is made whenever, on the one side or the other, there is sexual intercourse with a third party. The junction of the pair into one body or flesh comes, in that case, to be virtually dissolved. As this is the view implied in the original constitution of the human pair, so it is that which is expressly exhibited in New Testament scripture. In the deliverances pronounced, first by our Lord, and then by the apostle Paul, on the subject of marriage, it was not the introduction of something new which was set forth, but the assertion and re-establishment of what was from the beginning; and no distinction is made between the two parties, as if what were adultery in the one might not be sufficient to constitute adultery in the other. There is one and the same law for both. In answer to the question put to him by the Pharisees, "Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause?" our Lord answered, "Have ye not read, that He which made them at the beginning, made them male and female? And said, For this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife; and they twain shall be one flesh. Wherefore, they are no more twain, but one flesh. What, therefore, God hath joined together, let not man put asunder." And when, with the hope of eliciting some modification of this deliverance in behalf of the husband, the further question was asked, "Why did Moses then command to give a writing of divorcement, and to put her away?" Jesus replied, "Moses, because of the hardness of your hearts, suffered you to put away your wives: but from the beginning it was not so. And I say unto you, Whosoever shall put away his wife, except it be for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery; and whoso marrieth her which is put away, doth commit adultery," Mat. xix. 3-9. In perfect accordance with this, also, is the doctrine laid down by the apostle Paul, Ep. v. 25-33; 1 Co. vii. 1-13; 1 Ti. iii. 12. But while, doctrinally, the teaching of both covenants is the same in this respect, and, according to the fundamental law of both, it is adultery in the man as well as in the woman to have commerce with another person than the one proper spouse, practically, a difference on the man's side was admitted in ancient times. In consequence of the introduction of concubinage and polygamy, from which even the chosen seed did not remain free, that only came to be regarded as adultery which involved a fraudulent intermingling of seeds—such an intercourse as exposed a man to the fatherhood and charge of an offspring that did not belong to him. A married man, in this view of things, might have more wives than one without being an adulterer; he might also have carnal intercourse with a person not espoused or married to him, and still not be deemed liable to the charge of adultery, for no neighbour was thereby wronged in his conjugal rights, or had a spurious offspring fathered upon him: there was fornication, but not, in the conventional sense of the term, adultery. The crime of adultery was limited to the case of those, whether men or women, who, when married or betrothed to one party, had sexual intercourse with another; though, in the case of the man, only if this other was also a married or betrothed party; but not so in the case of the woman, because the wrong in her case was equally done, whether the person with whom she transgressed were single or married. In short, it was the condition of the female which determined the legal character of adultery; if she was not betrothed or married, neither she nor the person having intercourse with her was counted liable to the charge. And among the Greeks and Romans the same view substantially obtained—adultery was simply the violation of another man's bed, or the corruption of his seed.

Why the divine legislation should have allowed a practical treatment of the matter in the man's case, differing so materially from the woman's, and from the view exhibited in the ideal set up at the creation of the first pair, will be considered under the subject DIVORCE. But in regard to the act itself of adultery, understood in the sense now explained, the law of the Old Testament was very severe; it prescribed the punishment of death, both for the adulterer and for the adulteress, Le. xx. 10. This, indeed, was required by the theory of the constitution, which, being framed with a view to the securing of a commonwealth conformed to the fundamental laws of the two tables, could not tolerate the deliberate breach of any of the great commandments. Death was the penalty attached to the open violation of each of them. It is not expressly said in the passage of Leviticus how the persons guilty of adultery were to be slain; but in De. xxii. 22-24, where the law is again enacted, the additional case is supposed of a betrothed damsel having been guilty of the crime, and both parties are adjudged to death by stoning. The case of such persons, and that of those who violated the sanctity of the marriage vow, were so nearly akin, that the Jews of our Lord's time could scarcely be said to err, when they affirmed, respecting adultery in general, that Moses commanded the person guilty of it to be stoned to death, Ja. viii. 5. It does not appear, however, that the penalty in this most public and disgraceful form, or even that death in any form, was usually inflicted on adulterers. Too commonly a sense of guilt on the part of those who had the administration of the law committed to them, would restrain them from executing the judgment written; and as, in the majority of cases, it was likely to be left much in the hands of the injured party, it was natural that he should generally take the milder course which the law allowed, of ridding himself of the culprit by a bill of divorcement. Accordingly, we read of no case in Old Testament scripture in which a woman taken in adultery was actually put to death; and Lightfoot (Hor. Heb. on Matt. xix. 8) testifies that, amid all his multifarious reading in the rabbinical writings, he had never met with an instance mentioned of an adulteress being capitally punished. There might, no doubt, be cases of the kind, though no notice is taken of them either in the sacred or the rabbinical records; and the allusion in Pr. vi. 32-35, to the implacable spirit of revenge which the conduct of the adulterer might expect to awaken in the bosom of the injured husband, plainly indicates that the aggrieved party sometimes took the full scope which the law allowed him, of recompensing for the loss of domestic peace and honour he had sustained upon the head of the offender. Yet, from the comparative seclusion in which women lived in Palestine, coupled with the license practically allowed in respect to concubines and divorces, the probability is, that the cases were very rare in which the rigour of the law was enforced either upon the male or the female guilty of incontinence.

In Greece and Rome the law respecting adultery was not uniform, either in the provisions enacted or in the manner of enforcing them. In both countries it was competent to the husband, if he detected the adulterer in his evil course, to take summary vengeance on him, by putting him to death. But he might also take a pecuniary compensation; or he might institute a legal process against either of the offending parties, and, if the guilt was established, the parties were placed very much at the mercy of the husband, though not to the extent of allowing him to fall upon them with a knife or a dagger (Demos. Karà Neap. § 18). In the time of Augustus a law was enacted at Rome, called the Julian law, which introduced various regulations as to the mode of conducting prosecutions against adulterers; and the penalties it enacted, in case of conviction, were for a woman, the loss of half her dowry, with the third part of her property, and liability to banishment to some remote place; for the man, the loss of half his property, with a like liability to banishment. The times were, however, too degenerate to admit of such a law being generally enforced; profligacy of every kind not only kept its ground, but grew more shameless, in spite of the law, till the spread of Christianity leavened society with a better spirit, and rendered more stringent measures practicable. By a mistaken policy, however, Constantine introduced the old Jewish law, and made the offence capital. Justinian somewhat modified the statute, by sending the adulteress, after being scourged, to a convent, allowing the husband to take her out within the period of two years; and, failing this, she was compelled to assume the habit, and spend the remainder of her life in the convent.

Such barbarous practices as cutting off the nose and ears of the guilty parties do not appear to have been ever formally enacted, either among the Hebrews or among the Greeks and Romans. It is reported by Diodorus (i. 89, 90) to have been the punishment specially inflicted upon the female in Egypt, while the male was simply beaten with rods. The Persians are also said to have sanctioned it; and references exist, both in Scripture (for example, Eze. xxiii. 25) and in the classics (Virg. Æn. vi. 496), to such personal mutilations as not unknown. But they are probably to be understood as only among the indignities which an injured husband was deemed at liberty to inflict, and by which, occasionally at least, he sought to consign to infamy the person who had brought shame and dishonour upon his family. In the Christian code, we need scarcely say, no corporeal inflictions are prescribed. It has higher weapons to wield than the carnal sword; and its prime object is rather, by means of nobler influences, to prevent such crimes from blotting the face of society, than smiting them with specific penalties when they have appeared. It speaks only of separation, or putting away, as the ultimate remedy in the hand of the injured party; and even that is rather mentioned as a right that may be used, than as a measure that must in every case be adopted.

THE TRIAL OF ADULTERY, or the bringing to the test of a special religious service a woman suspected by her husband to have been guilty of unfaithfulness, is the most peculiar thing connected with this subject in the legislation of the Old Testament. The prescription for it is given in Nu. v. 11-31. Attempts have been made by various writers (lists of whom may be found in Kitto's Cyclopaedia, here, and in Winer's Real-Wörterbuch, under "Ehebruch") to establish a substantial agreement between the prescriptions of Moses in this matter and the ordeals practised among barbarous and heathen nations; and it has been thought that the main object of the one, as well as of the others with which it is compared, was to give the suspected person an opportunity of vindicating her innocence, by a sort of oath of purgation, so solemnly administered, that, if not innocent, she would almost certainly shrink from the trial. There may, undoubtedly, be some measure of truth in this view. Moses, in this, as in so many other things, may have been led by God to build upon a foundation already, to some extent, laid in the practices of surrounding nations, rather than prescribe what was absolutely new. But a general resemblance is all that can, with any truth, be supposed to have existed; and, for much that is peculiar in the ordinance before us, we must look to the nature of the theocracy itself, and the great end aimed at in all its institutions. Adultery, it must be remembered, was the only suspected crime for which such an ordeal was appointed by Moses, and not, as among other nations, one of several which were placed in the same category; and in this case, also, the one suspected crime for which such an ordeal was instituted was, by the prescribed ritual, brought into a connection with the ministers and the sanctuary of God not common elsewhere. Here it was a strictly religious matter, and differed materially from the kind of voluntary, hap-hazard trials in other lands. The ground of the prescribed trial for suspected adultery—as, indeed, for the Mosaic legislation generally upon this subject—stood in the sort of married relationship, the solemn covenant-engagement between God and Israel. The great national covenant was to have its parallel in every family of Israel, in the marriage-tie that bound together man and wife; and hence, even in Moses, Nu. xv. 38, as often afterwards in the prophets, unfaithfulness to God is exhibited under the image of a wanton breach of the marriage-vow. With such a close relation between the individual and the general, it was especially necessary to have the connection between man and wife placed under the sanctions of religion, guarded on every hand with most jealous care, and rendered practically, as far as possible, an image of the behaviour that should be maintained between Israel and God. There was the more propriety in this, as it was in connection with the propagation of a godly seed that the covenant proposed to reach the great end it contemplated, of blessing the world. Adultery, therefore, as being not only the breach of the family compact, but an image also and a prelude of the breach of the national compact, must be visited with death; and even the strong suspicion of its having been committed, where no actual proof of guilt could be obtained, must be brought as by appeal to God, that he might either vindicate the innocence, or, by special visitations of judgment, establish the guilt of the suspected party. It was only, as the language implies, when there were grounds for very strong suspicion being entertained, that the matter was to be made the occasion of such a solemn appeal; and, when it was demanded, the husband and wife were to go together to the sanctuary, bringing what is called alike "her offering," and "an offering of jealousy," ver. 15-25. They were both to bring it, although it was more properly the woman's offering than the man's, as appears from its being consigned to her while the priest was going through the appointed ritual, ver. 18. It was merely a corban or meat-offering, consisting of the tenth part of an ephah of barleymeal, but without the usual accompaniments of oil and frankincense, which were symbols, the one of the Holy Spirit, the other of acceptable prayer. The absence of these denoted that it was a matter of doubt whether such an offering—a symbol of good works, as all meat-offerings were—had any real connection with the Spirit of grace, or could rise with acceptance before God; it was to be an offering presented, as it were, at a venture. Coming, then, with this in their hands, the woman was solemnly set by the priest before the Lord, made to understand that she had come to transact with him; her head-covering, the distinctive badge of her chastity, was next taken off, being meanwhile suspected to have lost her title to wear it; then the meat-offering was put into her hands, as one maintaining her innocence, and claiming the privilege to present to God the symbol of a righteous life; while, on the other hand, the priest, representing the interests at once of the jealous husband and the jealous God of Israel, stood in front of her with the symbol of the curse. This consisted of holy water—most probably water taken from the laver before the door of the tabernacle—mingled with dust from the floor of the tabernacle, with a reference to the dust mentioned in the original curse which was pronounced upon the serpent and his seed. On this account, not only was the water to be put into an earthen vessel—earthen, as contradistinguished from something of higher mould—but was also designated bitter, since it was employed in connection with a humiliating transaction, and for the purpose of working (on the supposition of guilt having been incurred) a painful result. The priest then, with this symbol of the curse in his hand, standing before the woman with the symbol of righteousness in hers, pronounced over her the following adjuration:—"If no man have lain with thee, and if thou hast not gone aside unto uncleanness under thy husband—(so the words should be rendered, meaning, while under law to him),—be thou free from this bitter water that causeth the curse. But if thou hast gone aside under thy husband, and if thou be defiled, and some man have lain with thee while under thy husband, the Lord make thee a curse and an oath among thy people, by the Lord making thy thigh to rot, and thy belly to swell; and this water that causeth the curse, shall go into thy bowels, to make thy belly to swell, and thy thigh to rot." To which the woman was to say "Amen, amen;" and the priest accepting this response as a protestation of the woman's innocence, finished the ceremony, by first blotting out the curse with the bitter water, then waving the meat-offering before the Lord, burning a portion of it on the altar, and giving the woman what remained of the bitter water to drink. The matter was thus solemnly left in the hands of God, the Supreme Judge and Arbitrer of causes. If he saw that the suspicion was groundless he would also see to it, that "the curse causeless should not come;" but if otherwise, then rottenness and corruption was to seize upon the culprit in those very parts of her body which she had prostituted to purposes of iniquity; her moral depravity should find its meet recompense and image in a corresponding outward depravation. This, of course, could only happen if the Lord really lent his countenance to the transaction, and was ready, by his special providence, to carry into effect what was done in his name. But the entire covenant made with Israel proceeded on the ground of such a real presence and such a special providence on the part of God; and if undoubted proofs of this appeared in the more general affairs of the covenant, it were unreasonable to question the appearance of the same here, as often as circumstances might call for the divine interposition. That no instances are on record of the waters of the curse having been administered and taken effect, is no evidence of such an event never having occurred; for, in the nature of things, they must have been of very rare occurrence.

ADULTERY, IN THE SPIRITUAL SENSE, meant, as already indicated, unfaithfulness to covenant-engagements on the part of the people of Israel. In the later prophets of the Old Testament a charge to this effect, and under this form of representation, was with great frequency brought against the covenant-people, Je. iii. 1-11; Eze. xvi. xliii.; Hos. i. ii. iii. The same language is occasionally found in the New Testament, as when our Lord charges the people of his day with being "an adulterous generation;" and in the symbolical language of the Revelation, as the true and faithful church is presented under the image of the Lamb's wife, so the corrupt and apostate church is characterized as a spouse giving herself up to the seductive arts and forbidden pleasures of adultery; only, on account of the greater guilt connected with such a course in New Testament times, the stronger figure of a harlot is more commonly employed, and an "unfaithful wife" is exchanged for a "mother of abominations," Re. xvii. 1-5.

ADUMMIM, found only twice in Scripture, Jos. xv. 7; xviii. 17, and each time in connection with MAALEH, going up, or ascend, the ascent of Adummim. The word Adummim itself means redness, or red earths, not without reference, it has been thought, to the shedding of blood, of which the place in question was the frequent scene. It lay in the neighbourhood of Jericho, in the direction toward Jerusalem, a district which has always been the favourite haunt of robbers, whence our Lord took it as the scene of the parable of the good Samaritan, who rescued the man that fell among robbers; and Jerome expressly interprets the word (which he writes Adomin) by bloods, "because," says he, "much blood was shed in it by the frequent assaults of robbers" (Epist. ad Eust. cviii. § 12). But that the place derived its name in this way must be regarded as quite uncertain, and indeed not very probable. It is more likely that the colour of the ground, or some such natural circumstance, gave rise to the designation. The ancient characteristic, however, of that part of the road between Jerusalem and Jericho has been retained to comparatively recent times; for the complaints of travellers have scarcely yet ceased as to the depredations of robbers in that quarter.

ADVOCATE. This word occurs only once in the English Bible, 1 Jn. ii. 1, as an appellation of the glorified Saviour. "If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous." It is there used, however, as the rendering of a Greek word which occurs more frequently—παράκλητος, paraclete—but which is always rendered elsewhere comforter. It is one of those complex words for which it is impossible to find an exact parallel in the English language, or indeed in almost any other. Literally, and originally, it denotes a person called to one's aid, as does also the

Latin word advocatus, from which our word advocate comes; but then the specific purposes for which persons might be thus called are so various, that the word, in consequence, acquired a variety of secondary meanings. It might designate one who was called in to assist as a witness, or one who, in a legal difficulty, was applied to for advice—a consulting lawyer, or one who pled the cause of a client in open court; or still again, one who, in times of trial or hardship, sympathized with the afflicted, and administered suitable direction and support. The Latin advocatus, also, was used in all these shades of meaning except the last; and it was not till the latter days of Rome, till the republic had given way to the empire, that it came to signify the public pleader or orator (Smith's Gr. and Rom. Ant.) In this sense it was not used by Cicero, though the corresponding word παράκλητος had long before been so employed in Greece by Demosthenes; for example, at the beginning of his speech, παρὰ παραπτες. It was quite natural, therefore, for the fathers to understand the word, when applied to Christ, in the sense of advocate, which many of them did, although, in our use of the term advocate, regard is had more to the simple pleading of a cause in court, less to the general guidance and management of the cause, than they were wont to associate with the term. Both shades of meaning should undoubtedly be included in the idea we form of Christ as our advocate in the heavenly places. It presents him to our view as charging himself with the interests of his people, and especially when they fall into sin, and are in danger of having sentence passed against them, interposing in their behalf, and, through the merits of his death and intercession, averting the evil. Even before he entered within the veil, he gave a striking exemplification of what, in this department of his mediatorial work, he would do for them, when he said to Peter, "Simon, Simon, behold Satan hath desired to have you, that he may sift you as wheat, but I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not."

It is obvious, however, that this sense of the word paraclete is scarcely proper, if understood of the Holy Spirit, to whom it is applied in the other passages where it occurs, Jn. xiv. 16; xv. 26; xvi. 7. To a certain extent there was a resemblance between what the Holy Spirit was to do for the disciples after Christ had withdrawn his personal presence from them, and what Christ himself had till then been doing; and hence, in the first of the passages above referred to, the Lord said he would pray the Father to send them another paraclete, implying that the Spirit should, in a sense, fulfil the part which Christ himself had done; but this, manifestly, with respect to the directing, sustaining, and comforting influence Christ had exercised among them rather than to any distinct advocacy he had plied in their behalf. Accordingly, the Greek fathers generally gave the word in the Gospel of John a meaning more adapted to this aspect of the matter; they threw into it, indeed, very much of the sense of comfort, or consolation, which the cognate verb and nouns have in New Testament and Hellenistic Greek. Following them, our translators have rendered the word there by comforter, which is perhaps as good a single term as could be found. It has, however, the disadvantage of presenting only a part—though undoubtedly a most prominent part—of the complex idea which the original word conveys; and along with or under the comfort which was to be connected with the presence of the Spirit, there should also be associated in our minds the strengthening and monitory aid which, as the representative and gift of Christ, he was intended to minister. In the words of Archdeacon Hare, who, in his Mission of the Comforter, note K, has given a discriminating outline of the literature on the subject, and a sensible view of the subject itself, "We should bear in mind that the Spirit is the Comforter, in the primary as well as the secondary sense of that word, and that he did not come merely to console the disciples for their loss, but mainly to strengthen their hearts and minds, by enabling them to understand the whole truth, and to feel the whole power of the gospel."

ÆNON, a place at which John is said to have baptized, and the locality of which is no further indicated than that it is described as being near Salem, Jn. iii. 23. The reason assigned for its being chosen as a place for the administration of baptism is that "there was much water there." And indeed the name, which is simply the Chaldee word for springs (ܦܘܢܝܢ), plainly implies as much. But the precise spot is still involved in uncertainty. It could not be quite near to the Jordan, otherwise the waters of that river would rather have been resorted to for baptism. The probability is that it lay considerably to the north, and towards Galilee, if not actually within its borders, as the later labours of the Baptist undoubtedly embraced the region which belonged to the jurisdiction of Philip. AFFINITY. See MARRIAGE.

AGABUS, the name of a prophet in the Christian church at Jerusalem, who, on two several occasions, is mentioned as having come from Jerusalem to other places, and delivered a very specific prediction. The first of these took place at Antioch, not long apparently after Paul had been brought by Barnabas to make that the scene of his regular ministrations. Along with some others who are also said to have possessed prophetic gifts, Agabus appeared at Antioch, and "signified by the Spirit that there should be great dearth throughout all the world; which came to pass in the days of Claudius Cæsar," Ac. xi. 28. It is matter of historical certainty that the reign of Claudius was marked by the frequent prevalence of famine. We have distinct notices of at least three—one more especially in connection with Greece, another with Rome, during which the emperor was openly assaulted, and in some danger of his life (Suet. Claud. c. 18), and a third which pressed heavily upon Judea and the parts around. Josephus mentions the last, which, in point of time, was one of the earliest occurrences of famine in the time of Claudius, probably about A.D. 44, and states that the queen of Adiabene, who was at Jerusalem during the calamity, showed great liberality and vigour in endeavouring to mitigate the evil, and even sent for supplies to Alexandria and Cyprus (Ant. xx. 2, 5). That special respect might be had in the prophecy of Agabus to this local dearth may readily be admitted, can scarcely indeed be doubted, from the practical application immediately made by the disciples at Antioch of the knowledge communicated to them in behalf of the brethren in Judea; for, in anticipation of the approaching evil, they resolved on sending thither a contribution. But still there is no reason why the prophecy, which has quite a general aspect, should (with Lardner and many commentators on the Acts) be con-

finied to that comparatively restricted theatre of the famine. We should rather regard the spirit of prophecy in Agabus as following up the testimony of Jesus, and giving indication of the immediate approach of one of those signs of evil which were to precede and herald the downfall of the Jewish state. There should first be famine, our Lord had said, in divers places, Mat. xxiv. 7; and famine, in a very marked and distressing manner, Agabus now announced was on the eve of breaking forth. In this form of evil the period of judgment, which was to have so fearful a termination, was presently to make a commencement; and the disciples at Antioch, rightly conceiving, both from the nature of prophecy, which, in revealing the future, always has an eye especially to the kingdom of God, and from the peculiar relation of Judea to the coming judgments of heaven, that, however widely the famine might spread, it was sure to make its appearance—possibly its earliest and severest appearance—in Judea, deemed it a matter of Christian duty to gather up something beforehand for their brethren in that region. There they knew the carcases more especially was, and there should the eagles assuredly be gathered together. Still, not there alone; the world generally was to have experience of famine, as we have good reason to believe it soon had, though not always at the same moment. And we thus see how, without any straining, the prophecy of Agabus had at once a general and a special application, and how naturally the disciples at Antioch should have turned their regards toward Judea, when they heard the announcement that a season of famine was ready to come on the world.

The other occasion on which Agabus came down from Jerusalem and delivered a prophecy, which presently passed into fulfilment, was probably about sixteen years later, when Paul was at Cæsarea, on his way to Jerusalem for the last time. Tarrying there for some days with Philip the Evangelist, Agabus came from Jerusalem, and having taken Paul's girdle, and bound his own hands and feet, he said, "Thus saith the Holy Ghost, so shall the Jews at Jerusalem bind the man that owneth this girdle, and shall deliver him into the hands of the Gentiles," Ac. xxi. 11. In this prediction again Agabus treads closely on the footsteps of Jesus, in the great prophecy respecting the time of the end, Mat. xxiv., and announced that what was there said of Christ's followers going to be delivered up to be afflicted, or even killed, should now take effect at Jerusalem on the apostle of the Gentiles. It doubtless pressed upon the spirit of Agabus, as well as upon those who heard the announcement, as a sign that Jerusalem was fast filling up the measure of her sins, and that the day of vengeance must be drawing on. We hear no more of this prophet; but, from the two instances recorded of his supernatural insight into the future, we can have no doubt that he was one of those who received the Spirit in peculiar measure, as promised to the disciples for the purpose of showing them things to come, Jn. xvi. 13.

AGAG, derived, it is understood, from an Arabic verb, which signifies to burn, to be fervent, and consequently bearing, as a noun, the import of the fiery, or splendid one. It occurs only as the name of the king of Amalek, Nu. xxiv. 7; 1Sa. xv. 8, 9, seq.; and the question is, whether it is to be understood as a proper name, the distinctive appellation of a particular king, or as a name of dignity applicable alike to a succession of Amalekite kings? The latter supposition is undoubtedly favoured by the reference to Agag, for the first time, in the prophecy of Balaam, Nu. xxiv. 7, where speaking of the might and glory of Israel's future king, he says, "His king shall be higher than Agag." If understood of a single individual, this allusion would be in ill keeping with the rest of the prophecy, which is of a strongly ideal and elevated nature, and would also but poorly illustrate the peerless honour of him who was to be exalted to the dominion over God's heritage. Besides, as the name Agag itself, from its most probable import, very well suits as a general name of dignity for the head of a warlike and impetuous race like the Amalekites, so it is in perfect accordance with the prevailing usage of those times, that the Amalekite kings should have had such a common designation. Of a similar kind was the Pharaoh of the Egyptians, Abimelech of the Philistines, Melchizedek or Adoni-zedek of the Jebusites, &c. It was only falling in with this general custom when the heads of the royal line in Amalek took the name of Agag. So that, when we come to the history in 1 Sa. xv., where the triumph of Israel over the Amalekites is recorded, the Agag spoken of should be understood precisely as the Pharaoh in Ex. xv.; he was for the time being the reigning head of the Amalekite race; and it would appear, from the words of Samuel to him (ver. 33, "As thy sword hath made women childless, so shall thy mother be childless among women"), he had kept up the fierce character of those who boasted in the name of the fiery one. But he at length reaped as he sowed; and, though fragments of the race of Amalek still survived, no future Agag ever appears in connection with their history.

AGAGITE is found, Est. iii. 1, 10; viii. 3, 5; ix. 24, in connection with Haman, the enemy of Mordecai. Josephus explains it as a synonym of Amalekite, and so it possibly was; but we are without the proper materials for either invalidating or substantiating the explanation.

AGAPÆ, the Greek term for love-feasts, or feasts of charity, as they are called in St. Jude's epistle. (See FEASTS.)

AGATE is given in our version, after the Septuagint (ἀγαθός) and Vulgate, as the rendering of the Hebrew אֶבֶן, Ex. xxviii. 19; xxxix. 12. These are the only two passages where the Hebrew shero occurs, both times as the name of one of the precious stones in the high-priest's breastplate. But in other two passages, Is. liv. 12; Eze. xxvii. 6, the word agate is used in our English Bibles, not however as the translation of the same Hebrew word, but for one entirely different, kadcod (קַדְקֹדִים)—a proof how arbitrarily sometimes the meaning of such specific terms was fixed. Modern interpretation is rather disposed to identify the kadcod with the ruby than with the agate, so that there will only remain the two passages in Exodus as those in which mention is made of the agate; and even for this we are entirely dependent on the authority of the Septuagint translation. But, on the supposition of the agate being really the stone meant, we may simply state, that the term is a general name for the class of semi-pellucid stones which in this country usually go by the name of Scotch pebbles. They are composed of crystal intermixed with earth, in different forms and proportions, variegated with veins and clouds. They are usually arranged according to the different colours of their ground, and thus divided into a variety of species, into the description of which it is needless to enter here. They were found in Egypt, usually of a reddish colour, veined with white, and in many other countries. The name agate, in Greek achates, is said to have been derived from the river Achates in Sicily, in the bed of which they were found. Specimens of ancient agates, of various kinds, and often beautifully engraved, have descended to modern times, and are to be met with in antique collections.

AGE is used in a great variety of significations—often in the sense of a lifetime or a century; sometimes in the restricted sense of personal maturity, as when we say of such an one, that he is of age, Ja. ix. 21; but most commonly in contradistinction to infancy or youth, and as indicative of the more advanced period of human life. To distinguish this from the other senses of the word, the epithet old is commonly prefixed; and, with reference to age in this sense, there is scarcely any peculiarity in Scripture that calls for particular explanation. It frequently gives expression to the respect that is due from youth to old age, and even enjoins it as a matter of obligation; as, Le. xix. 32, "Before the hoary head thou shalt stand up, and honour the face of the aged." But this has also been the common feeling and judgment of mankind, even in heathen states; and probably among the Egyptians and Greeks of ancient times, and the Chinese and Mussulmans of the present, a simple respect for the hoary head of age has been carried as high as it usually was among the Hebrews; for, among the Hebrews, the moral element came in here, as in other things, to qualify considerations of a merely natural kind. Thus Solomon, while he pronounces the hoary head to be "a crown of glory," adds the important qualification, "if it be found in the way of righteousness," Pr. xvi. 31; and Job also speaks of "the aged rising and standing up" at his presence, ch. xlii. 8, implying that there were higher elements than age entering into the account that should be made of the social rank of individuals. But still age had, among the Hebrews, as it must have in every well-constituted community, a character of weight attached to it, unless when this may have been forfeited by a course of profligacy or crime. In ordinary circumstances, the prolongation of life to an advanced period was always regarded as a mark of the divine mercy and loving-kindness; it was the subject even of special promises, Zec. viii. 4; Job v. 26; Is. xlii. 4; while the cutting short of life in the midst is represented as the proper portion of the wicked, Ps. lv. 23; cii. 24. But this was only what might be called the normal condition of things; and many circumstances might arise to prevent its being carried uniformly into execution. If God's covenant with Israel, pledging long life and prosperity to those who remained steadfast to its engagements, had been maintained in its purity and completeness by the great mass of the people, the exceptions, either on the one side or the other, would have been comparatively rare; but, with the manifold imperfections and disorders that too commonly prevailed, it is only what might have been expected, if premature death should sometimes have befallen the comparatively good, and if extended age was often reached by those who should have been cut off in the midtime of their days. Still, for the most part, even in this respect, the Lord knew how to distinguish between the righteous and the wicked: it was usually made to go well with the one and ill with the other.

AGES OF THE WORLD. In various passages of Scripture, mention is made of ages with reference to the history of the world, and God's successive dispensations in connection with them, Ep. ii. 7; iii. 5, 21; Col. i. 26, also in the marginal reading of Pa. cxiv. 13 and Ia. xxvi. 4. The word would, however, have been found in a great variety of other passages, if a more literal and uniform rendering had been adhered to; for often where ages might, and sometimes also should have been found, our translators have adopted worlds. The original word (αἰών, αἰώνες), in its primary meaning, denotes continuance of time; hence an age or extended period of the world's history, then the world itself as composed of a succession of such ages: finally, the succession apart from the world, amounting in the sum to an indefinite prolongation—eternity. It is sometimes difficult to say, in which precisely of these senses the word is employed; and examples may be found of all of them in Scripture. Very commonly the meaning is expressed with substantial accuracy by world—as in the phrases, “the cares of this world,” “the children of this world,” “the god of this world,” &c., Mat. xiii. 22; Lu. xvi. 8; 3 Co. iv. 4.—the world being contemplated with respect to its present corrupt and perishable state, the existing age. In many passages, again, the meaning substantially coincides with eternity, contemplated either as past or future—from before time, or to beyond it, for ever, Ep. iii. 11; Jn. ix. 32; Lu. i. 70; 2 Pe. iii. 18; 1 Th. i. 17, &c. But in such passages as He. i. 2, “through whom also he made the worlds;” ch. vi. 5, “the powers of the world to come;” Ep. i. 21, “the world that is to come,” and a few more of like import, it would perhaps have been better to substitute age or ages instead; for in such cases the reference is not, as the mere English reader might be apt to imagine, to the material fabric of things, but to its divinely appointed form and constitution. The world, or age to come, was a familiar expression among the Jews for the Messiah's kingdom; and in the New Testament it is employed partly in regard to the kingdom as now established, and partly in regard to its future development—the age of glory. It is used in this latter sense by our Lord, Mat. xii. 32; Mar. x. 30; Lu. xx. 36. The ages of the world are, therefore, the great cycles, whether of degeneracy and corruption, or of progression and development, through which it has been destined to pass, and in part has passed already.

AGONY is the term used by the evangelist Luke to express the state of mind in which our Lord was when he entered on his last sufferings, Lu. xxii. 44. The English word directs our thoughts upon the mere suffering experienced more than the original, ἀγωνία, which expresses more immediately the terrible mental struggle or conflict through which our Lord was passing, and only as subordinate to that indicates the sense of pain. Wherein precisely the struggle consisted, the evangelist is entirely silent; but he gives us some idea of its fearful nature when he tells us that, in consequence, “his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground;” that is, a heavy sweat, not wholly of blood, but of water intermingled with blood. If it had been simply blood, the as it were (ὡσεύ) would not have been used; and if there had not been blood actually present, we can see no proper reason why mention should have been made of it; nor, apart from some intermingling of real blood, would the description convey the idea of extreme anxiety and distress of soul which was evidently meant to be indicated. What fell, therefore, was sweat, but sweat mingled with blood. Much the same impression also is conveyed by another particular in St. Luke's account of this terrible moment in our Lord's history—the circumstance of an angel appearing from heaven to strengthen him; and still further, by the prayer, mentioned in all the three gospels, which he thrice uttered with intense earnestness, “Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt.” The symptoms and effects only have been discovered to us; but from these we can easily perceive how mighty a conflict agitated the soul of the Redeemer—a conflict which it is impossible to resolve into the anticipation of mere bodily suffering and outward indignity. We are constrained to look beyond this to the awful consciousness of human guilt which then began to press in its full weight upon the heart of Jesus, and filled his human spirit with indescribable horror, on account of the evil involved in such guilt-bearing. But it is not for us to penetrate further, or to attempt to lift the veil which the pen of inspiration has allowed to rest on this part of the Redeemer's internal history.

AGRICULTURE. Under this head we propose to give a brief account of some of the more distinctive peculiarities which attached to the cultivation of the land in those countries of which the Bible speaks, and more particularly in Palestine. There are points of agreement in the agriculture of all nations, general conditions necessary to be observed by those who, in any region, would obtain a return of produce from the earth. To these it is needless to refer here. It is understood that the ancients as well as the moderns, the Hebrews as well as other people, had to till and manure, and sow their ground, when they expected to derive from it a fruitful produce; to keep under the weeds, that would otherwise choke the vegetation; to observe the proper seasons both for sowing and reaping; and to take the requisite measures for securing, thrashing, and disposing of the respective crops. But, in connection with these common operations, there are some things characteristic of the East which do not precisely hold of the West; and some things also which distinguished the portions of the East with which we have now to do, in ancient times, from what belongs to them in the present day. It is such only that require any special notice.

In all countries the climate must exert a modifying influence on the kind of agriculture that is pursued in them; and in eastern countries generally, in Palestine among the rest, the heat and dryness which prevail during a great portion of the year naturally call for some peculiar modes of treatment; not nearly to such an extent, however, as in Egypt on the one side, or in Assyria on the other. In these regions the rains are greatly less frequent than in Palestine, and if cultivation is to be carried on over any considerable tract of country, irrigation by means of canals and aqueducts is indispensable. When Babylonia was in its state of ancient richness and prosperity, the country was all intersected with these channels of artificial irrigation, the remains of which are still to be seen in the present day; and in Egypt they have been maintained in great variety and abundance from the earliest times. While these countries require to be thus supplied with moisture, in order to sustain vegetation through the long-continued droughts of summer, they also have the means of furnishing it, in such large rivers as the Euphrates, the Tigris, and the Nile. But in Palestine the streams are all small, with the exception of the Jordan; even it does not contain any great volume of water, and it flows besides, during the main part of its course, in so depressed a channel, that the waters could not be conducted over any extent of surrounding country. Artificial irrigation, therefore, never appears to have been much practised in Canaan; and the few aqueducts, of which the remains have been noticed by travellers, seem to have been chiefly for the purpose of driving mills, supplying dwelling-houses, or occasionally perhaps watering orchards. The passages often produced in proof of agricultural fertility by artificial means of irrigation, Ps. l. 3; Is. xxx. 25, evidently refer to the naturally fructifying influence of streams and rivers. The country possesses natural advantages which, without such expedients, rendered it capable of general cultivation and fruitfulness. Its mountainous character serves to abate the temperature, while it also enriches the country with many brooks and rivulets. Even in June, Dr. Robinson writes, respecting what he experienced at Jerusalem, "the air was fine, and the heat not oppressive. The nights are uniformly cool, often with a heavy dew; and our friends had never occasion to dispense with a coverlet upon their beds during summer." Then, the rains are more frequent and continued than in many other eastern countries. Those which in Scripture are called the early rains, commence usually about the latter half of October, yet not setting in so heavily, or prevailing so continuously, but that during the intervals seed-corn may be deposited in the ground. Accordingly, it is about the end of October, or in the earlier part of November, that wheat begins to be sown, and the sowing is continued, according to the demands of climate and other circumstances, till the approach of winter. The proper seed-time for barley is in January, and to about the middle of February. The rains increase, and often fall heavily during the last five or six weeks of the year; but, after the turn of the year, they moderate, and only come at intervals till the end of March, when they usually cease, though there are occasional showers even in April and May. The crops thus obtain, in ordinary seasons, enough of moisture to bring them to maturity, if the seed has been committed at the proper time to the ground. They ripen early; the barley, in the more forward districts, being commonly ready for the sickle about the end of April, and the wheat nearly a fortnight later; but in the more hilly districts two or three weeks more must be added to the account. On the 5th of June, Dr. Robinson found the people at Hebron gathering their wheat harvest; while, on the 12th of May, the thrashing-floors at Jericho had nearly completed their work.

The chief crops raised in Palestine were undoubtedly barley and wheat; from these were derived the common bread of the country. Oats are not grown there, but are occasionally found in other parts of Syria. Mention, however, is occasionally made of other kinds of produce, such as beans, lentiles, cummin, cucumbers, flax, &c., Jos. ii. 6; Ho. ii. 6; 2 Sa. xvii. 28; xxiii. 11; but they appear to have existed only in small quantities, not in such abundance as to tell materially on the general produce of the country. From the subdivision of the land among all the families of Israel, and the pains taken to secure the perpetuity of heritages, the farms must, for the most part, have been small, and particular fields could seldom exceed a few acres. Names occasionally occur in history—those, for example, of Boaz and Barzillai—who had comparatively large possessions, and a considerable number of persons in their employ;

but such instances must have been rare; and the large proportion of lands in cultivation were undoubtedly such as a single family, with the aid of a hired servant or two, could conveniently manage. We are led to expect, therefore, that the mode of cultivation would be simple, and that no approach would be made to the scientific skill which the energy of the European mind has introduced into the implements and general resources of husbandry.

Such, certainly, is the case. The farming implements which were anciently used in Syria and the East, and which, indeed, have retained their place to the present day, are of a comparatively rude description. It is to the monuments of Egypt that we are chiefly indebted for our representations of these; but, as Egypt stood at the head of the ancient world in agricultural matters, there is every reason to believe that, for the districts of Syria and the East, the same representations are equally suitable. No. 9 exhibits probably one of the most improved ploughs of those times, as it has both a well-pointed share, and a plough-tail with two handles, though these are certainly not adjusted so as to give the ploughman much command over the share. Ploughs of simpler construction were no doubt then in use, as they are even now, in various parts of Asia. Sir C. Fellows, in his Excursion in Asia Minor, gives a representation of the plough that he found used in Mysia, in 1838, with its several parts and accompaniments (No. 10). "This plough," he says, "is very simple, and seems only suited to the light soil which prevails here. It is held by one hand only. The shape of the share varies, and the plough is frequently used without any. It is drawn by two oxen, yoked from the pole, and guided by a long reed or thin stick, which has a spade or scraper for cleaning the share." Ploughs of this description appear often to have been made of the trunk of a young tree, which had two branches running in opposite directions, the trunk serving for the pole; and of the two branches, one, rising upwards, stood for the tail, while the other, covered with bronze or iron, entered the ground, and acted as the share. But most commonly the several parts were formed of separate pieces of timber, and joined together. They appear always, however, to have been of very imperfect construction, and in Palestine and the adjoining countries were almost invariably drawn by oxen. Such is the general practice also in the present day, though occasionally camels and asses are employed in the service. No reference is made in Scripture, nor is there anything on the ancient monuments corresponding to the modern harrow. It seems to have been common in Egypt and Syria, as it also was in Italy, to plough in practice of pulling up by the roots, instead of cutting the corn, also prevailed to a considerable extent in ancient times. The corn seldom yields so much straw as in this country, and pulling is resorted to in order to obtain a larger supply of fodder. Maundrell thus describes the practice as he noticed it in 1697:—"All that occurred to us new in these days' travel was a particular way used by the country people in gathering their corn, it being now harvest time. They plucked it up by handfuls from the roots, leaving the most fruitful fields as naked as if nothing had ever grown on them. This was their practice in all the places of the East that I have seen; and the reason is, that they may lose none of their straw, which is generally very short, and necessary for the sustenance of their cattle, no hay being here made. I mention this," he adds, "because it seems to give light to that expression of the Psalms, cxix. 6, 'which withereth before it be plucked up,' where there seems to be a manifest allusion to the custom." This undoubtedly is the correct meaning of the expression; and the real allusion is lost sight of by the rendering in the authorized version, "before it groweth up." It grows, but withers before the plucking time comes; an the seed, care having first been taken, after the first ploughing, where necessary, to break the clods, and have the ground prepared for a thin furrow, Is. xxviii. 24; Ho. x. 11 (No. 11). It is known that the elder Roman writers considered harrowing after sowing a proof of bad husbandry (Colum. ii. 4; Pliny, H. N. xviii. 20). The lighter form of the ancient and eastern plough, which a man can easily lift in his hand, also suited this method better than the heavier ploughs which are used in this country. The goads used in Palestine, in earlier as well as later times, appear to have been somewhat larger than the one represented in the woodcut. Maundrell, in his Travels, tells us that he found them about eight feet long, tipped at the smaller end with a sharp point; while the larger, which was about six inches in emblem of the premature decay and fruitlessness of the wicked.

The thrashing of the corn partook, and in Syria still partakes, of the same rude and simple style of operation which characterizes the general husbandry of the East. The sheaves were carried straight from the field, either in carts, or, as more commonly happens in the present day, on the backs of camels and asses, to the thrashing-floor. What was used for this purpose was some open and elevated spot, where there was a free circulation of air, formed into a circular shape, and pounded or beaten into a hard consistence. On this open space the sheaves were spread out, and sometimes beaten with flails—a method practised especially with the lighter kinds of grain, such as fitches or cumin, Is. xxviii. 27—but more generally by means of oxen. For this purpose the oxen were yoked side by side, and driven round over the corn, circumference, had an iron spade or paddle. One can easily understand how such a weapon might do execution in more important labour than that of urging oxen in the plough, as Shamgar is reported to have killed six hundred Philistines with one of them, Ju. iii. 31.

Reaping in Palestine was frequently done by the sickle, to which reference is occasionally made in Scripture. But there can be little doubt that the modern by a man who superintended the operation, so as to subject the entire mass to a sufficient pressure, as shown in No. 14: or the oxen were yoked to a sort of machine (what the Latins called tribulum or trahea), which consisted of a board or block of wood, with bits of stone or pieces of iron fastened into the lower surface to make it rough, and rendered heavy by some weight, such as the person of the driver, placed on it; this was dragged over the corn, and hastened the operation, Is. xxviii. 27; xli. 15. The same practices are still followed, only mules and horses are occasionally employed instead of oxen, but very rarely. Dr. Robinson describes the operation as he witnessed it near Jericho:—"Here there were no less than five floors, all trodden by oxen, cows, and younger cattle, arranged in each case five abreast, and driven round in a circle, or rather in all directions, over the floor. The sled or sledge is not here in use, though we afterwards met with it in the north of Palestine. By this process the straw is broken up and becomes chaff. It is occasionally turned with a large wooden fork, having two prongs; and, when sufficiently trodden, is thrown up with the same fork against the wind, in order to separate the grain, which is then gathered up and winnowed. "The whole process," he adds, "is exceedingly wasteful, from the transportation of the corn on the backs of animals to the treading out upon the bare ground" (vol. ii. p. 277). During this operation the Mahometans, it seems, generally observe the ancient precept of not muzzling the ox while he treadeth out the corn; but the Greek Christians as commonly keep them tightly muzzled.

The winnowing, it may also be noted, went along with the thrashing. As, from time to time, the mass of chaff, straw, and corn was tossed up with the pitchfork, the lighter particles were carried away by the wind; and when the wind was not sufficiently strong to effect the separation, a winnowing-shovel (πρόον) was employed to throw it more forward against the wind, and create an additional ventilation (No. 17). By this

Two thrashing instruments, still used in Asia Minor, are exhibited in No. 15. One of them exactly resembles the ancient tribulum. It consists of two stout boards firmly joined together at a convenient angle; the under side of the one that rests on the ground being set full of sharp flints or agates. To this machine the animals are yoked by means of ropes. The other is simply a roller formed of the trunk of a tree, with a pole to which the animals are attached. The roller is merely dragged over the grain, without revolving; the driver occasionally sitting on it to increase its weight.

In the Egyptian sledge or wain, represented in No. 16, the sledge, it will be observed, was fixed upon a few wooden rollers, which were armed with iron rings, and sometimes also serrated edges, for the purpose of chopping the straw and bruising out the corn.

means the heavier particles fell by themselves at a shorter distance from the winnower. It is this part of the process that is referred to by John the Baptist, when, speaking of the spiritual purification to be effected by the coming of the Messiah, he said, "Whose winnowing-shovel [so it should be, not fan—πρόον] is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor," Mat. iii. 12. In addition to these winnowing processes, a sieve was also employed to separate the corn, not so much from the chaff, as from the earthy and other foreign ingredients that might be mixed with it. Reference is made to this, Am. ix. 9, when the Lord says, "I will command, and I will sift the house of Israel among all nations, like as corn is sifted in a sieve, yet shall not the least grain fall to the earth"—the earthy and heavier portions being, in this operation, the particles to be detached by falling through; and since no grain, in the figure here employed, was to be allowed to fall to the earth, it was in effect to say that all should be preserved. Our Lord also refers to the same operation when he says to Peter, "Simon, Simon, behold Satan hath desired to have you, that he may sift you as wheat," Lu. xxii. 31.

It is manifest that, where fields of any extent were in cultivation, these thrashing and winnowing processes must have taken a considerable time, and the owners would consequently need to keep careful watch over their thrashing-floors till the whole was finished. Especially would this need to be done where hostile tribes or wandering Arabs were in the neighbourhood. Accordingly, we find Dr. Robinson stating, respecting the thrashing-floors around Hebron, and in the region of Gaza, that the owners came every night and slept on them, as a security against lawless depredations. "We were," he says, "in the midst of scenes precisely like those of the book of Ruth; where Boaz winnowed barley in his thrashing-floor, and laid himself down at night to guard the heap of corn" (vol. ii. p. 446).

The grain thus thrashed and winnowed—the crop of the season—was laid up in granaries, whence it was taken to be sold or used, as occasion required. No. 18 represents the storing of corn in Egypt, where, from early times, it is known to have been largely practised.

[18.] Vaulted Granaries.—Wilkinson.

Reference is frequently made to it also in Scripture, but without any distinct indication of the kind of places employed for the purpose—except that from being familiarly called barns, it may be inferred buildings of some sort were usually adopted, De. xxviii. 6; Pr. iii. 10; Mat. vi. 26; xiii. 30; Lu. xii. 18. Subterranean grottoes or cellars are known to be largely employed now for this purpose in some places in the East (Russell's Aleppo, i. 77); but there is nothing in Scripture to indicate the existence among the Israelites of granaries of that description. That, in the better periods of Israel's history, grain was produced in very considerable quantities—notwithstanding the imperfection in the implements and the arts of husbandry—admits of no doubt. Many notices, both in profane and sacred writers, show that Palestine was long distinguished as a grain country; and the remains of terraces constructed along the sides of mountains, on a basis of mason-work, for the purpose of retaining the soil, and rendering them capable of bearing a crop, still attest the spirit of enterprise and activity which at one time characterized the agriculturists of Palestine. That the country now lies in such comparative barrenness and desolation is a witness, more immediately, of the arbitrariness and abuse of Turkish misrule, and remotely of the judgment of Heaven on the sin and apostasy of those who caused the Lord to turn against them and become their enemy. That better times are in store for the land may justly be anticipated; but that it will ever be a very favourable region for the exercise of agricultural skill, and the raising of agricultural produce, in the sense now understood regarding such things in the more fertile and industrial countries of the world, is against all probability. The climate and the soil of Palestine are alike hostile to such an expectation; even in the most favourable circumstances, the most that can be looked for is an improved mode of cultivation, and a certain moderate degree of fruitfulness.

A'GUR, a word of unknown import, and the name of a teacher, otherwise also unknown, whose words, addressed to Ithiel and Ucal (most probably his pupils), form the thirtieth chapter of the book of Proverbs. Many conjectures have been formed in regard to the name—some identifying it with Solomon, and many explanations given of the insertion of the words of this chapter under that name; but, as nothing has been certainly ascertained, it is needless to recount what has been attempted. The chapter itself contains a fresh collection of proverbial utterances, much in the style of Solomon's; and they are called massa, not strictly prophecy, as in the authorized version, but burden, or weighty deliverance, probably because of the important matter they contained, or because of the heavy issues that, to a certain extent, were wrapped up in them. The word is often used to designate the message of a prophet, but only when the message delivered was predominantly of a severe nature, fraught in some respect with heavy tidings; so that it was not so properly the prospective import of the words spoken—the predictive element in them—as that which gave them a weighty and judicial aspect, on account of which they were termed a massa. The same name on another, but quite parallel ground, is here applied to the utterances of Agur.

A'HAB [brother of father], the son and successor of Omri, himself the seventh king of Israel as a separate kingdom, reigning from about 918 to 897 before Christ, twenty-one years and some months. The name of Ahab is in some respects the blackest in the whole list of Israelitish monarchs; it bears upon it the darkest stain of infamy. Jeroboam, indeed, had the bad pre-eminence of beginning the course of idolatrous defection from the true worship of Jehovah; he was emphatically "the man who made Israel to sin;" but the still worse pre-eminence belongs to Ahab of having turned what was but a tendency in Jeroboam's policy into a grievous reality, of proceeding from a corruption in worship to the worship of corruption itself. For thus the sacred historian draws the distinction between Ahab and the other kings of Israel:—"He did evil in the sight of the Lord above all that were before him. And it came to pass, as if it had been a light thing for him to walk in the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, that he took to wife Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Zidonians, and went and served Baal, and worshipped him. And he reared up an altar for Baal in the house of Baal, which he built in Samaria," 1 KI. xvi. 30-32. The thing in which Ahab, under the influence of his heathen wife, went so far beyond his predecessors in iniquity was, his openly establishing the worship of Baal, and consecrating, as we afterwards learn, 400 priests for this false worship, while the priests and prophets of Jehovah were cut off, 1 KI. xviii. Nothing so flagrant as this had been done before. The sin of Jeroboam and his immediate followers consisted in corrupting the worship of Jehovah by setting up images in Dan and Bethel, which, indeed, was so expressly contrary to the law of Moses and the fundamental principles of the theocratic constitution, that it is often branded as idolatry and heathenism. Even Jeroboam himself was charged by the prophet Ahijah with having "gone and made him other gods and molten images to provoke the Lord to anger," 1 KI. xiv. 9. Apparently this is at the outset the very sin of Ahab—the worship of other gods besides Jehovah. But it was not so in reality. Jeroboam and his adherents did not intend to set up another object of worship than Jehovah, but they so depraved this worship, and gave such false representations of his character and service that He refused to own it; it was not He they worshipped, but other gods. They had excuses and sophistical explanations by which they endeavoured to show that, while they formally departed from the ritual of Moses in some unimportant particulars, they still kept to the one great object of worship, and were servants of the living God. In reference to such pretexts it is said, 2 KI. xvii. 9, "And the children of Israel covered words (so the exact rendering is) that were not so, over the Lord their God, and built them high places," &c.; that is, they veiled the true character of their corruptions in worship by false and deceitful interpretations of God's Word and their own procedure, much as the Romanists do now. And the Lord, stripping off this flimsy veil, disregarding all their vain excuses, charged upon them as direct apostasy and falling off to heathenism what was substantially of that description, though formally it was different. Ahab, however, followed out the tendency of Jeroboam's course to its natural results; he did not sin by halves, like his predecessors, but, casting off all disguises and restraints, he openly set up the worship of Baal, as if Baal and Jehovah were but one God, or Jehovah, in so far as he was different, were to have his claims disallowed. And this, of course, involved the further step of giving up all that was peculiar in the worship of God—the discontinuance of the stated feasts, the substitution of heathenish for the Levitical rites of sacrifice, and the introduction of many foul abominations. It was Jezebel, rather than Ahab, who was the active agent in bringing about this religious revolution; his guilt consisted in weakly allowing himself to be led by the will of a corrupt and imperious woman to subvert the principles of the constitution he was bound to uphold. We read of moments of relenting on his part, and occasions when better impulses prevailed over his spirit, but none in hers; she "strengthened herself in her wickedness." But a stronger than both mingled in the conflict; and not only did the brave, dauntless, single-handed Elijah stand his ground against all their machinations, but he was enabled also, by the special help vouchsafed to him from above, to pour confusion on their policy, to procure the destruction of Baal's worshippers, and fearlessly pronounce the doom of Ahab and Jezebel themselves, as destined to a violent and ignominious end. Even before this end was reached, Ahab and his partner had practically to own themselves vanquished; for the purpose they had formed to supplant the worship of Jehovah by that of Baal was ultimately resiled from; the stern witness-bearing of Elijah and of the faithful remnant that adhered to him, seconded, as it was, by the appalling judgments of Heaven, held the impious monarch in check, and won for the worshippers of Jehovah a freedom and security in their obedience to the covenant which was denied them at the outset. The terrible fate, too, of Ahab and his wife, both of them slain, as Elijah had foretold, and their blood licked by dogs on the field which their wickedness had imbrued with the blood of the guiltless, read a salutary lesson to future times; so that the worship of Baal was never again so openly practised and so fiercely prosecuted. It still, however, covertly held its place; and, from the references in the later prophets, Ho. ii. 16, "It shall be at that day, saith the Lord, thou shalt call me Ishi [my husband], and shalt call me no more Baali [my Baal]," Am. v. 25-27; Zec. xiii. 2, it appears that in the religion which commonly prevailed there was a recognition of Baal as well as of Jehovah. The people, it would seem, formed a sort of compromise between the two, abandoned the exclusiveness of the true worship, and only regarded the religion of the old covenant as one form of the homage that might be paid to the God of heaven, while Baal's was another. Thus practically the worship of Jehovah was made to shake hands with heathenism; and the leaven introduced by Ahab and his guilty partner was never wholly purged out, till the dissolution of the kingdom scattered to the winds all the base compromises and attendant corruptions which had so long held their place against every warning and remonstrance. (See JEZEBEL, ELIJAH.)

2. AHAB, son of Kolaiah, a false prophet, who, along with another of the name of Zedekiah, uttered predictions that were fitted to deceive the Babylonian exiles, Je. xxix. 21. Jeremiah wrote a letter to the children of the captivity, partly to warn them against giving heed to the predictions thus addressed to them, because they were false, and denouncing the judgment of Heaven against those who uttered them, ch. xxix. 4-23.

AHASUERUS, according to the Hebrew Ahash-verush, of which many modifications and not a few derivations have been produced. It is needless to give more than the last, also probably the most correct, from Gesenius—"The true orthography of the name has come to light of late from what is called the cuneiform writing, in which it is written Khashyarsá or Khashwershe. This appears to be an old and harsher form of the Persian word for lion-king. In imitation of this harsher form, the Greeks formed the word Xerxes; the Hebrews, by prefixing aleph prosthetic, made Akhashverosh. Instead of the letters of softer pronunciation, s and sh, which the modern Persians use, the ancients enunciated much harsher sounds." The Syriac version writes it

Achshresh, and the Septuagint Ἀσσοῦρος. The name occurs three times in Scripture; first, in Da. ix. 1, where it is said, that "Darius, the son of Ahasuerus, of the seed of the Medes, was made king over the Chaldeans;" again in Ezr. iv. 6, where the adversaries of the returned Jews are represented as writing an accusation against them in the reign of Ahasuerus; and lastly, in the book of Esther, in which Ahasuerus is given as the name of the great Medo-Persian king who reigned from India unto Ethiopia, and who, in a freak of vanity and caprice, put away his queen Vashti and married the Jewess Esther. It is impossible that the three persons thus successively designated by the name of Ahasuerus can have been the same; indeed, it seems next to certain that the whole three were different. He who was the father of the person designated in Daniel Darius the Mede, whether he might be alive or dead at the time of the conquest of Babylon, was not, at least, recognized as king over the Chaldeans, and could not have been the Ahasuerus to whom, some years afterwards, the adversaries presented their accusation against the returned Jews; and the events recorded in the book of Esther belong so manifestly to a period considerably posterior to that of the return from Babylon, that the Ahasuerus there mentioned cannot, with the least show of probability, be identified with either of the other two. The only question of any moment connected with them is, What names in profane history correspond with the one thus variously applied in Scripture? Who, in the Medo-Persian dynasty, are to be understood as answering to the first, to the second, and to the third Ahasuerus of sacred history? The question has been variously answered, and even in the latest investigations is still receiving different solutions, for which the tangled web of Greek Persian history (full of apparent or real inconsistencies), and the attempted decipherings of the Assyrian inscriptions, afford ample scope. The subject is encompassed with too much of the conjectural and the uncertain to render it advisable, or even practicable within any reasonable bounds, to present an outline of the manifold explanations and adjustments that have been resorted to. As matters yet stand it is needless to go beyond a statement of what seem the greater probabilities of the case. It is probable, in regard to the word itself (Ahashverosh, Khshyarsha, or Xerxes), that, somewhat like the Pharaoh of Egypt, the Abimelech of the Philistines, &c., it had an appellative import, and may consequently have been applied by foreigners as a proper name to several individual kings, whose special names and characteristics were but partially known at a distance. But, as regards the three applications found of it in Scripture, it is probable that the first named, the father of the Median Darius, was the Astyages of profane history (Astyages, Cyaxares, and Ahashverosh being but different names of the same person, or forms of the same name); that the second, who appears in Ezra as the successor of Cyrus, is the vain, arbitrary, and hair-brained Cambyses; and that the third, the equally capricious and luxurious husband of Vashti and Esther, the lordly monarch of all the countries lying between India and Ethiopia, the magnificent banquet-master, who entertained his nobles and princes for an hundred and fourscore days, showing them the riches of his glorious kingdom and the honour of his excellent majesty—that this was no other than the Xerxes so celebrated in Grecian history for his pomp and luxury, his countless retinue of servants and soldiers, and almost incredible displays of passion and of pleasure. The probable period and the apparent circumstances of the time accord best with those of his reign; and the attempts which have been made to associate the events narrated in Esther with Artaxerxes Longimanus or Darius Hystaspes have never succeeded in obtaining general credit. Some historical points of a collateral nature will be touched upon in connection with ESTHER, the DARIUS who became master of Babylon, CYRUS the author of the decree for the restoration of the Jews, and the Jew MORDECAI, who rendered such important services, first to the king of Persia, and then to his own countrymen when their lives were sought to gratify the cruel ambition of Haman.

The AHASUERUS mentioned in Tobit xiv. 15, in connection with the destruction of Nineveh, must be understood to be the same that is mentioned in Da. ix. 1, the Astyages or Cyaxares already referred to of profane history.

AHAVA [derivation and meaning uncertain], a river beside which the Jewish exiles who accompanied Ezra from Babylon assembled, and from which they set out together on their march to Jerusalem. It is both called the river Ahava and the river that runs to Ahava, Ezr. viii. 15, 31. The conjectures that have been made respecting the precise stream and place meant have attained to no certainty. In all probability it was one of the smaller rivers that flowed into the Euphrates in the direction nearest to Palestine.

AHAZ [possessor], son and successor of Jotham, the eleventh king of Judah, who reigned for sixteen years. Apparently some error has crept into the text of 2 Ki. xvi. 2, which gives twenty as the age at which he ascended the throne, while his son Hezekiah is affirmed to have been twenty-five years old when he succeeded his father Ahaz, ch. xviii. 2. Dying, as Ahaz did, at the early age of thirty-six, Hezekiah, according to the above statement, must have been born to him when he was but eleven years old. This is incredible; and it is therefore probable that the number twenty-five given by the Septuagint, Syriac, and Arabic versions at the parallel passage, 2 Ch. xxviii. 1, was really the age at which Ahaz ascended the throne; so that his death would take place, not in his thirty-sixth but in his forty-first year. The notices given of his conduct in sacred history present him to our view as an extremely weak, hypocritical, pusillanimous, and idolatrous sovereign. His religion was such as naturally springs from the fears of guilt when guided, not by an enlightened knowledge of God, but by the false and gloomy lights of superstition. Departing from the law of God, and following the perverse procedure of the kings of Syria and Israel, he fell into many heathen abominations, and even made his son pass through the fire in sacrifice, 2 Ki. xvi. 3. In his mistaken zeal, also, for a worship not authorized in the law of God, he caused an altar to be made after the pattern of one he had seen in Damascus, and which, no doubt, was of a more ornate description than the brazen altar made after the pattern shown to Moses in the mount, ver. 10-16. (See ALTAR.) But, like all who have tried the same wilful and superstitious course, he failed in the great object he had in view; in the time of danger his confidence forsook him. Terrified at the threatening and combined aspect of the kings of Syria and Israel, he foolishly resorted for aid to the king of Assyria, and even robbed the temple to pay for his assistance—thus, to get relief from an immediate evil, from which, too, the Lord by the prophet Isaiah gave him the assurance of a safe deliverance, 1s. vii., bringing his kingdom under tribute to the Assyrian monarchy. The stern rebuke of the prophet for this distrust of Jehovah does not seem to have awakened him from his dream of mingled worldliness and superstition. He died to all appearance as he lived; and the kingdom was only saved—saved even then but for a time—from the consequences of his sinful and base procedure, by the believing and magnanimous conduct of his son Hezekiah.

AHAZIAH—properly AHAZ-JAH, or AHAZ-JAHU—[whom the Lord possesses or upholds].—1. A king of Israel, the son of the idolatrous and wicked Ahab. His brief history is given in 2 Ki. i., together with the concluding verses of 1 Ki. xxii. That such a name should have been appropriated to the eldest son of such a king, shows with how little meaning the most significant names were sometimes imposed among the ancient Israelites, and with how little effect as regards the character of him who bore it; for this Ahaziah trod, as far as he well could, in the footsteps of his father Ahab; "he walked," it is said, "in the way of his father, and in the way of his mother, and in the way of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin." His reign only lasted two years; and, in addition to the general account given of its perverse and idolatrous character, only two specific acts are noticed respecting it. The first is his joining with Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, in a project for building ships of merchandise to trade to Tarshish; but the project miscarried, as the ships were shattered by a tempest at Ezion-gaber. This disaster came, we are told in the book of Chronicles, more peculiarly as the judgment of Heaven on the king of Judah, for entering into so close an alliance with one whose intimacy he ought to have shunned; for a prophet of the name of Eliezer prophesied on the occasion against Jehoshaphat, and said, "Because thou hast joined thyself with Ahaziah, the Lord hath broken thy works," 2 Ch. xx. 37. The king of Judah, in consequence, broke off the alliance, and refused to have any further commercial dealings with Ahaziah, 1 Ki. i. 49. The other circumstance particularly noticed in the history of Ahaziah is, his having fallen down through a lattice in the upper chamber of his house, by which he sustained very serious injury; so that he sent to inquire of Baal-zebub, the god of Ekron, whether he should recover from the evil. It was this fresh manifestation of the heathenish spirit, which had been so awfully rebuked in the death of his father Ahab, that again awoke into living force the resolute spirit of Elijah. The messengers of the king were met by the prophet on their way to Ekron, and sent back to their master with the solemn charge and announcement, "Is it not because there is not a god in Israel that ye go to inquire of Baal-zebub, the god of Ekron? Now, therefore, thus saith the Lord, thou shalt not come down from that bed on which thou art gone up, but shalt surely die." The reception of this message, instead of humbling the king, and leading him to seek in a penitent spirit after the God of Israel, only kindled his indignation against Elijah, whom he readily understood to have been the author of the communication, and led to the successive despatch of three companies of soldiers, charged with the commission of bringing the prophet to Samaria. Of these, the two first were consumed by fire from heaven; but on the third captain assuming a humbler attitude, and not commanding, but entreating the prophet to accompany him, Elijah complied; and beside the couch of Ahaziah repeated afresh the word he had at first put into the mouth of the king's messengers, declaring that, as Ahaziah had virtually disowned the existence of a God in Israel, he should not recover from the illness under which he laboured. And so it proved: by severe acts of righteousness he was made to know that there was a God in Israel, to whom the issues of life and death belonged. And the lesson, though too late in being learned for his own good, was not altogether in vain for his successors; for the more rampant idolatry that had been introduced by Ahab and Jezebel might be said to die with Ahaziah—future kings on the throne of Israel sinned after the pattern of Jeroboam rather than that of Ahab.

2. AHAZIAH, called also AZARIAH, was the son of Jehoram, king of Judah. He was the nephew of the former Ahaziah, and probably was named after him; for his father Jehoram married a daughter of Ahab, 2 Ki. viii. 18—the infamous Athaliah. In the book of Kings he is said to have been twenty-two years old when he began to reign; but, in 2 Ch. xxii. 2, it is made forty and two—undoubtedly a corruption of the text, arising from the substitution of the Hebrew ר , the letter for forty, instead of כ , which represents twenty; for his father Jehoram only reigned eight years, and ascended the throne at the age of thirty-two—making together forty, 2 Ch. xxi. 5; so that Ahaziah could by no possibility be forty-two when he succeeded his father in the kingdom. His reign was short and unhappy. In the course of the first year of it he went to visit his uncle Joram, the son of Ahab, who had been wounded by the Syrians at Ramoth-Gilead; and while there he fell among the victims of Jehu's revolt. He was not actually slain, indeed, upon the spot, but died presently after, at Megiddo, of the wounds he had received. This is distinctly stated in the book of Kings, 2 Ki. ix. 27, which is more full and explicit in its account of the circumstances than the narrative in Chronicles. In the latter there is some vagueness; and there appears also a singular looseness and variety in the application of names to this unfortunate king. In ch. xxi. 17, he is called Jehoahaz; but in ch. xxii. 2, the name Ahaziah is given to him, on the occasion of his ascending the throne; while presently, in ver. 6 of the same chapter, he is designated Azariah. Perhaps this variableness in respect to the names associated with him was intended to be a sort of reflection of the outward weakness and instability of his character and government; but, as to the formal ground of it, it has its explanation in the substantial agreement of all the names referred to. They are but different modes of expression for the same idea; AHAZIAH means the possessed, or upheld by the Lord; AZARIAH, the helped of the Lord; and JEHOHAZ is merely a transposition of the two words of which Ahaziah is composed—Ahab and Jah, or Jehovah. Like the other, it points to the Lord's holding fast; but, alas! from the want of right principle in the man, the name, in all its forms, was like a satire on the reality: instability, not holding fast, abandoned to his enemies, not possessed by the Lord, was the motto that might fitly have been written over his history.

AHI [brother] occurs once, by itself, as the name of an individual, 1 Ch. vii. 34; but more frequently it has another term appended to it, as jah, Lord; am, mother; azer, help; húd, Jew; húd, junction or union; examples of which, and various other compounds of AHI, are to be found among the names of Old Testament scripture; but we notice only those of whom any particular incidents are recorded.

AHI'JAH, or AHI'AH [brother of the Lord], appears to have been a name in frequent use among the Jews, as examples occur of a considerable number of persons to whom it is applied, 1 Ch. viii. 7; xi. 36; xxvi. 20, &c. But the only person of any note who bore the name was the prophet of Shiloh, who first announced to Jeroboam his destined elevation to the throne, and afterwards denounced in severe terms the guilt of Jeroboam to his wife, when she went to inquire concerning the life of Abijah, the son of Jeroboam, and foretold also the certainty of this child's death, 1 Kt. xi. 29-30; xiv. 2-16. On both of these occasions he acted an important part, and gave abundant evidence of being a true messenger of God. (See JEROBOAM.) He lived to a great age; as, at the time of the visit of Jeroboam's wife, his eyes are said to have been set, by reason of his age.

AHI'KAM [brother of rising up, or elevation], the son of Shaphan, a person of note in the time of Josiah and immediately subsequent periods. He was one of four persons sent by Josiah to inquire at the prophetess Huldah respecting the book of the law, 2 Kt. xxii. 12; and in the corrupt and perilous times that followed, he acted as the faithful friend and protector of the prophet Jeremiah, Je. xxvi. 24; as did also his son Gedaliah, who, under the Chaldeans, became governor of Judea, Je. xxix. 14; xl. 5, 6, &c.

AHIMA'AZ [brother of anger, choleric] was the name of one of Zadok's sons, who was employed in carrying messages between David and the party that stood faithful to him in the time of Absalom's rebellion, 2 Sa. xv. 27, 36; xvii. 17, 20; xviii. 19-29. At that period he showed great steadfastness in adhering to the cause of David, and hearty zeal in endeavouring to advance its interests; but nothing further is recorded of him. Two others are found bearing the same name—the father-in-law of Saul, 1 Sa. xiv. 50, and a son-in-law of Solomon, 1 Kt. iv. 15.

AHI'MAN [my brother, who! i.e. who is my fellow!] one of the seed of giants, or Anakim, who remained still in the land of Canaan at the time it was entered by the children of Israel. He dwelt in Mount Hebron with his two brothers, from whence they were driven by the valour of Caleb, who got possession of their inheritance. There can be little doubt that the name of Ahiman was given to the chief of the three, to denote his supposed invincible might. The passages that refer to him are Nu. xiii. 22; Jos. xv. 14; Ju. i. 10, 20.

AHIMELECH [king's brother], the great-grandson of Eli, and the son of Ahitub, supposed by some to be the same with the AHIAH mentioned in 1 Sa. xiv. 3, 18, though he may have been a brother, but the priest who presided at the sanctuary in Nob, when David, fleeing from the presence of Saul, obtained the shew-bread for the relief of his present necessities, and the sword of Goliath for his protection, 1 Sa. xxi. 1. The immediate consequences of the transaction in respect to Ahimelech were of unhappy moment, as it furnished, through the malignant testimony of Doeg, the ground of a charge of conspiracy with David against the life and crown of Saul, on which Ahimelech and the priests at Nob were ruthlessly put to death. That there was most cruel injustice in such treatment there can be no doubt; for, whatever sins of a more general kind there may have been in those descendants of Eli, rendering, it may be, some fresh manifestation of divine severity a matter of righteous retribution, in the particular act referred to there was not the shadow of an evil design against Saul and his house. It was rather in deference to existing authorities than in defiance of them that the transaction was accomplished. So arbitrary and unjust was the sentence felt to be that the captain of the guard even refused to put it in execution, and the work of destruction was handed over to Doeg, who carried it out with true Edomite malice and revenge. In the higher aspect of the matter, also—that which concerned the violation of a standing order in regard to the consumption of the shew-bread—the part acted by Ahimelech received its justification in the appeal made to it by our Lord as a rule and precedent in like circumstances for future times, Mat. xii. 3; Mar. ii. 26. The Lord always desires mercy rather than sacrifice; and the ritual prescription that the shew-bread should be eaten only by the priests, while imperatively binding in ordinary circumstances, was yet properly allowed to give way when the urgent wants of David called for immediate relief. So both David and Ahimelech concluded at the time, with a true insight into the nature of the divine institutions; and the principle which formed the ground of this conclusion was distinctly announced by our Lord as a fundamental one in the divine administration, and one that admitted of various applications. Ahimelech therefore stands fully acquitted for the part he took in ministering to the necessities of David, although other defections in him and those about him, may justly have rendered them liable to the special judgments of Heaven. (For the mention of Abiathar instead of Ahimelech, Mar. ii. 26, see under ABIATHAR.)

In two passages, 2 Sa. viii. 17; 1 Ch. xxiv. 6, 31, Ahimelech, son of Abiathar, is mentioned along with Zadok as filling the higher places of the priesthood in the time of David. This must either be a textual mistake for Abiathar, the son of Ahimelech, or Abiathar must have had a son named Ahimelech after the priest of Nob, who, in the latter period of David's reign, came to be recognized as the virtual head of the priesthood in that line. This is quite possible, though the other supposition seems rather more probable, since, even at the close of David's life, Abiathar appeared still capable of taking an active part in public affairs, and continued to bear the designation of Abiathar the priest, 1 Kt. i. 7.

AHIN'ADAB [brother of nobility], one of the twelve officers, presidents of so many districts, who had by turns for a single month to keep the table of Solomon supplied with provisions. Ahinadab's district was Mahanaim, on the south-east side of the Jordan, 1 Kt. iv. 14.

AHIN'OAM [brother of grace, or brother's delight] occurs as the name of a wife of Saul, 1 Sa. xiv. 50; and also of a wife of David—the mother of Amnon, his first-born son; and when the Amalekites took Ziklag she was among the spoil, but was again recovered by the skill and prowess of David, 1 Sa. xxv. 43; xxvii. 3; xxx.

AHIO [his brother, brotherly], one of the sons of Abinadab, who, along with Uziah, drove the new cart on which the ark of the Lord was placed when conducted from Gibeah toward Jerusalem. Ahio went in front, probably for the purpose of guiding the oxen, and did not share in the calamity which befell his brother Uziah, 2 Sa. vi. 1-4.

AHITHOPHEL [brother of folly, foolish], a somewhat singular name for one whose sagacity and prudence raised him to the highest place among the counsellors of David. He comes for the first time into notice in connection with the unnatural revolt of Absalom; and it is given as an evidence both of the cunning policy of Absalom and of the strength of the conspiracy he had formed, that Ahithophel had been won over to his side, 2Sa. xv. 12. Ahithophel is called emphatically David's counsellor, the Gilohnite, and it is even said respecting the counsel he gave that it was "as if a man had inquired at the oracle of God," 2Sa. xvi. 23. We need not, therefore, be surprised that it was counted a dexterous stroke on the part of Absalom to have gained such a friend, as it was felt by David to be a severe blow to have lost his support. On hearing of Ahithophel's defection, David felt the bitterness of being deserted by one who had been his "guide," his "companion," his "familiar friend," and, with evident reference to the import of his name, gave vent to the supplication, "O Lord, I pray thee, turn the counsel of Ahithophel into foolishness," 2Sa. xv. 31—let the name he bears of the foolish one be stamped on his history. So, against all human expectation, it proved—not so much, however, from the failure of politic shrewdness or discernment on the part of Ahithophel, as from the confusion that was poured into the counsel-chamber of those with whom he was associated. The counsels he gave, first that Absalom should go in to his father's concubines, and then that they should instantly pursue and attack the army of David, were both entirely suited to the emergency; as it was only by bold and unscrupulous measures, such as those proposed by Ahithophel, that so wicked a cause was likely to gain even a temporary success. By the one advice he sought to shut effectually the door against all reconciliation with the king, and by the other, had it been followed, he would in all probability have utterly discomfited the king himself. But God had determined to defeat the counsel of Ahithophel; and the stratagem he had planned of pursuing instantly after David was, through the artful policy of Hushai, rejected for a more cautious and dilatory course. Ahithophel, mortified at the slight thus put upon him, and no doubt also anticipating the disastrous result which was sure to overtake such unskilful leaders, forthwith returned to his house and hanged himself, 2Sa. xvii. 23—a striking example of the insufficiency of mere worldly wisdom to guide itself aright in times of trial and perplexity, and of the folly which must inevitably, in the long run, appear in the conduct of every one who has no higher principle to follow than earthly honour or ambition! When piety was in the ascendant, Ahithophel's sagacity led him to fall in with the spirit of the times, and he became a chosen counsellor of David; but, when the aspect of affairs changed, and the tide seemed to run in a direction more in accordance with the native bent of his mind, he threw off the mask, and trusted his sagacity would equally guide him to fortune in the camp of the ungodly. But he forgot that in this he had to do with One who brings to nought the understanding of the prudent, and takes the wise in their own craftiness. His wisdom could avail nothing against the purposes of Heaven; and of him, as of the fool, it might be said, "he died for want of wisdom."

AHITUB [brother of goodness], the son of Phinehas, Eli's son, and the father of Ahimelech, 1Sa. xxii. 9, 11; the father also of Zadok, 2Sa. viii. 17; 1Ch. vi. 6, &c.; and there was also a high-priest of this name under Jothan, the son of Amariah, 1Ch. vi. 11, 12.

AHOLAH and AHOLIBAH, two fictitious or symbolical names, under which the prophet Ezekiel, in the 23d chapter of his book, delineates the story of Israel and Judah, with special reference to their defections from the love and service of God, and the heritage of evil which this drew upon them. AHOLAH, which means her tent—her own (that is), as opposed to another's—stands for Israel or Samaria; and AHOLIBAH, which means my tent in her, represents Judah. The epithets point to what formed the most fundamental characteristic and distinction of the two portions respectively of the covenant-people—Samaria having, from the very commencement of her independent existence, separated herself from the true worship of Jehovah at the tabernacle of the congregation, and set up a tent or temple of her own; while Judah still continued to have God's tent with her, and with that the true symbols of worship, and divinely authorized medium of access to God. This difference however appears, in the description of the prophet, as little more than a theoretical one; it is no further made account of, than as affording a ground for regarding Samaria as the elder sister, and ascribing to her the precedence in guilt and punishment. Corruption reached its maturity sooner in that portion of the covenant-people than in the other, and, as a natural consequence, divine retribution also sooner ran its course; but as this had no effect in deterring the other portion from following in the same career of degeneracy, so the same disastrous results ensued, only by a slower process of development. Accordingly, the symbolical delineation ends in respect to both with the exhibition of total disgrace and overwhelming ruin.

AHOLLIB [father's tent], the name of a skilful artificer of the tribe of Dan, who, along with Bezaleel, was employed in constructing some of the more ornate parts and furniture of the temple. For this, not only were his natural and acquired gifts called into requisition, but he was also furnished with special endowments from above for the occasion, Ex. xxxi. 1-6; xxxv. 34.

AHOLIBAMAH [tent of the high-place], one of Esau's wives, the daughter of Anah the Canaanite. This, however, is only the name given to her in Ge. xxxvi. 2; for, when originally mentioned, she is called Judith, the daughter of Beeri the Hittite. For the two names of the father, see ANAH; but, in regard to the wife, it is remarkable that all the three wives of Esau appear with two different names, and that, in the case of each, the new names appear in the genealogical table of ch. xxxvi. Judith has the additional name of Aholibamah, Bashemath the Hittite of Adah, and Mahalath the Ishmaelite of Bashemath. The only way of explaining this, and it is a quite natural way of doing so, is, that each of them received new names on the occasion of their marriage, in accordance with a custom that still very commonly obtains in the East. Of this custom Sir J. Chardin remarks—"The women change their names more frequently than the men. Women who marry again, or bind themselves to any fresh engagement, commonly alter their names on such changes." It was the more likely, also, that new names would be imposed on Esau's wives, as they were derived from quarters distasteful to Isaac and Rebekah; and the new name might be designed to indicate that, with the change of relationship, there should be also a certain change in the views and feelings of the parties entering into it. But on the supposition of, the new name having been assumed at marriage, it was natural that that name should have been given at the mention of the marriage; while, afterwards, when the genealogy of the families was presented, it was not less natural that the original name should be adhered to. This is precisely what we find in the book of Genesis.

AHUZZATH [possession], the "friend" or favourite of the Abimelech who reigned at Gera in Isaac's time. The Septuagint explains it by νυμφαγωγός [bride's man], the person who conducts the bride from her father's house to her new abode. As employed, Ge. xxvi. 29, it is probably meant to describe Ahuzzath as one of those about Abimelech in whom he reposed confidence, and who could negotiate for him in any delicate affair, such as that which concerned the differences that had arisen between his servants and those of Isaac. (See ISAAC.)

AI [ruins], a royal city of the Canaanites, to the east of Bethel; sometimes written HAI, and so written more frequently in the original Hebrew than in the English Bible. It was a place evidently of great antiquity, as mention is made of it at the first appearance of Abraham in the land of Canaan, Ge. xii. 6; xiii. 3. It was not, however, a large place, even at the time of the invasion of Canaan by the Israelites; and is spoken of as of such limited dimensions and slender defences, that two or three thousand men might readily make themselves masters of it, Jos. vii. 3. This confidence, indeed, proved to be misplaced; yet not from any misapprehension as to the magnitude of the place, but from the sin which had been committed by the Israelites, and which, in righteous judgment, was made the occasion of spreading fear and confusion through their ranks. When the sin was put away, the capture of Ai became an easy matter. Though laid in ashes by Joshua, it appears to have been afterwards rebuilt, as in subsequent times it is mentioned among the cities of Judea, Is. x. 28; Ezr. ii. 28; Ne. vii. 32; but modern research has failed to discover any ruins near Bethel bearing a name approaching to that of Ai. After carefully exploring the whole district, Robinson states that he came to the conclusion of assigning as the probable site a place with some ruins south of Deir Diwán. It is an hour distant from Bethel, having a deep wady on the north, and two smaller wadies on the south, in which the ambushade of the Israelites might easily have been concealed.

AIN, or EN, a fountain, and is probably used in that sense, Nu. xxxiv. 11, of a specific fountain, one of those that contributed to form the river Jordan; or if of a town, then probably of one situated on such a fountain. In Jos. xv. 32, and other places, it does occur as the name of a city belonging to the tribe of Judah; but most commonly it occurs in composition with other words, denoting places which were in some way remarkable for the fountains connected with them, as Engedi, Enmishpat, Enrogel, &c. It was also the Hebrew word for eye.

A'JALON, or AI'JALON, [a large stag], the name of several villages, which, however, were of no note; one in the tribe of Dan, Ju. i. 35; another in the tribe of Ephraim, 1 Ch. vi. 66; another in the tribe of Zebulun, Ju. xii. 13; and still another in the tribe of Benjamin, 1 Ch. viii. 13; but it is chiefly remarkable as the name of the valley over which Joshua prayed God to cause the moon to stand still, in the day of his victory over the combined forces of the Canaanite kings, Jos. x. 12. It appears to have been a valley in the neighbourhood of that Ajalon which belonged to the tribe of Dan. Robinson found in the supposed direction a village called Yalo, which he conceived to be the modern representative of this Ajalon; and on the north of it lay a broad and very fertile valley, the same, in all probability, that was referred to in the address of Joshua. Yalo lies on the road from Ramleh to Jerusalem, about midway between them, and two miles or so from Amwas, the ancient Nicopolis.

AKRAB'BIM [scorpions] gave the name to an ascent or chain of mountains on the southern border of Palestine, stretching towards the Dead Sea. It is supposed to have been so called from being infested by scorpions. Its position is not very definitely marked in Scripture, Nu. xxxiv. 4; Jos. xv. 3; Ju. i. 36; and the precise ridge to be understood by it is not certainly known.

ALABASTER [ἀλάβαστρος, in the common Greek dialect and the New Testament, but in older Greek ἀλάβαστος, and in some authors as plural, ἀλάβαστρα] was originally the name of a rock, the compact and fine-grained gypsum—gypseous alabaster. It differs from marble in the calcareous matter being combined, not with carbonic, but with sulphuric acid, and in its incapacity for receiving so fine a polish. It approached, however, in hardness to the marble; and by the Greeks was sometimes called onyx, and by the Latins marmor onychitis. It is of a whitish colour; and was chiefly prized by the ancients on account of its adaptation for vases, urns, jars, and boxes for holding perfumes and ointments. So much was it used for these purposes that the term alabaster passed into a common designation for vases and articles appropriated to the reception of the costlier perfumes, though they were often made of glass, ivory, and other substances, as well as of the alabaster rock. The expression even occurs in Theocritus of golden alabasters (χρυσέαι ἀλάβαστρα, Idyl. xv. 114); and specimens of them, of various kinds of stone and other materials, have been found in the Egyptian tombs. Vessels of this description were commonly made of a tapering shape, not unfrequently with a long narrow neck, as may be seen from the above woodcut.

It will thus be readily perceived how the woman in the gospels who came to anoint Jesus with some precious spikenard, might, in her anxiety to have the work done, break some part of the alabaster vase or box, instead of taking time to open it, and get at the contents in the more regular way, Mat. xxvi. 7; Mar. xiv. 3. It is perhaps not very probable that she would have taken such a course if the vessel had really been of alabaster, as in that case it would both have been in itself of some value, and would have been less easily broken; but if made of glass, as it most likely was, the method she adopted on the occasion would be quite natural.

ALEX'ANDER, THE GREAT, as he has been usually styled, is not expressly named in the canonical Scriptures, though he is more than once referred to in connection with the kingdom which he was destined to establish in Asia; and in the first book of Macca-bees is explicitly mentioned, ch. i. 1-8. In the 8th chapter of Daniel's prophecies, the king or kingdom of Grecia is symbolized by the he-goat which came from the West, and which ran with violence against the ram that symbolized the Medo-Persian kingdom, beat it down, and destroyed it; and a remarkable horn, that appeared between the eyes of the he-goat is distinctly explained to represent the first head or founder of that Grecian kingdom, ver. 21. It is impossible to understand this of another than Alexander; and there are other passages which also point, though less explicitly, in the same direction. In particular, the symbol of the leopard, ch. vii. 6, which had four wings on its back, and four heads in front—the image of the third great worldly dominion, beginning with the Chaldean; and the kingdom of brass, represented by the belly and thighs of the vision exhibited to Nebuchadnezzar, ch. ii. 32, 39, found their realization in the kingdom which had its foundations laid, and its character formed, by the military prowess and European policy of Alexander. On this account alone a certain acquaintance with the life and exploits of this singular man are necessary to the proper understanding of Scripture. But this is still further important and necessary, on account of the influence which the conquests of Alexander exercised over the future affairs of the divine kingdom; for the institutions and government planted by him in Asia, introduced a powerful European element into the simply eastern relations, amid which hitherto the covenant-people had been placed, and in their experience linked the Asiatic to the Grecian modes of thought and expression. It turned henceforth the main current of Jewish enterprise and colonization chiefly in a westerly direction; and even brought them at length so much into contact with a Grecian population and Grecian culture, that Greek came as naturally to be the original language of New Testament scripture, as Hebrew had been that of the Old.

The person who was the primary agent in effecting this revolution was the son of Philip of Macedon, and was born in the year 356 B.C. His father had already made himself master of all Greece, and had also begun to cast his eyes upon the vast dominion of Persia in the East, when the hand of death cut short his ambitious projects. Alexander, however, who inherited the father's ambition, and possessed more than the father's military skill and accomplishments, combined with surpassing energy of character, promptly took up the project of avenging on Persia the ancient wrongs of Greece, and got himself created by the Grecian states general of the forces which were destined to that mission. Proceeding thus at the head of a large and well-disciplined army, and furnished with all needful appliances, his march through Asia seemed indeed to be with the spring and velocity of a leopard; the luxurious and debilitated monarchy of Persia fell as a helpless prey into his hands, and the whole of the East and Egypt became in a comparatively brief period subject to his sway. From his fiery temper, however, and his irregular habits, he was better fitted for achieving conquests than establishing a compact and enduring dominion; and dying, as he did, after a reign of little more than twelve years—dying, too, in the midst of revels and debauchery—he left behind him an empire in Asia the elements of which necessarily hung somewhat loosely together. But withal they took root; and the supreme power in the Syrian part of the empire being continued for generations in the hands of men who were ambitious of treading as far as possible in the footsteps of Alexander, the new channels of civilization and commerce which he opened were preserved and deepened; so that, when at length the dominion passed over to the Romans, the Grecian culture and impress had been too deeply stamped upon the region to be greatly affected by the change; and, while the persons who administered the government were Roman, the administration itself, the language, the literature, the manners retained much of their Grecian character.

The leading object of the policy of Alexander and his successors in Asia was to secure the political and social ascendancy of Greece. This required the strong arm of war in the first instance; but the penetrating mind of the conqueror readily perceived that more than this was needed to accomplish the end in view, and that the footing primarily gained by the sword must be kept and consolidated by more permanent and vital influences. Accordingly, every encouragement was from the first given to the settlement of Greeks in Asia, and to the adoption of Greek culture and manners by Asiatics. Alexander himself married first one eastern princess (Roxana), then another (Parysatis), and eighty of his generals and 10,000 of his troops followed the example of their leader by marrying Asiatic wives, and received presents for doing so. On the other side, large numbers of Asiatics were enrolled among his troops, and initiated into the Macedonian tactics and discipline. Greek cities were founded partly by him, but in still greater number by his successors, which, as from so many centres, diffused throughout the East the language and customs of Greece. By the overthrow, also, of Tyre on the one hand, and the establishment on the other of Alexandria, with its facilities of communication with the East by the way of the Red Sea, a new direction was given to the commerce of the world. This now was laid open in a manner it had never been before to Greek and also to Jewish enterprise. Both at Alexandria and in other Greek settlements the Jews had equal rights and privileges granted them with the Greeks, being permitted to live in the free enjoyment of their religious customs, and to use without restraint the advantages for trade and commerce which their position afforded. The account given by Josephus (Ant. xi. 8) of the reception which Alexander met with at Jerusalem by the high-priest, and the interview held between them, is probably in great part fabulous; but the indulgence there spoken of as having been accorded to the Jews, and the rapid increase and prosperity ascribed to them afterwards in connection with Grecian rule and institutions, admits of no doubt. However little, therefore, it might enter into the projects of Alexander and those who were chiefly instrumental in perpetuating and extending his policy in the East, a very important influence was thereby exerted on the external relations of the covenant-people; and when the things of the old economy came to be supplanted by those of the gospel dispensation, changes of place and position, of language and modes of thought, press upon our notice, which ever remind us of the conquests of Alexander the Great, and of the revolution effected through his policy over that part of the world where the ancient people of God were chiefly located. Then more especially, and through this instrumentality, it was that Japhet came to dwell in the tents of Shem, and began to exercise that mediate and directive sway over the affairs of the divine kingdom which is one of the great characteristics of later, as compared with earlier times, Ge. ix. 27.

ALEXANDER (BALAS), a pretended natural son of Antiochus Epiphanes, but of doubtful parentage, who makes a considerable figure in the history of the Maccabees, and in Josephus. In opposition to Demetrius Soter, he laid claim to the kingdom of Syria, and obtained a temporary success; but he was ultimately defeated by Nicator, and fled into Arabia, where he was murdered by the emir Zabdiel, who sent his head as an acceptable present to the king of Egypt. He only reigned four years over Syria, and was altogether selfish in his views, and voluptuous in his character (see 1 Mac. x. xi., and Josephus, xiii. 2).

ALEXANDER (JANNÆUS), a personage distinguished in apocryphal history, a prince of the Maccabean family. (See MACCABEES.)

ALEXANDER, the name of four persons in gospel history:—1. The son of Simon the Cyrenian, who was compelled to bear, for a portion of the way, the cross of Jesus, Mar. xv. 21. That the father should thus have been designated from the son renders it probable that the son had become a person of note among the disciples.

2. ALEXANDER. A leading Jew, apparently of the kindred of the high-priest, and of the sect of the Sadducees, who took an active part in endeavouring to silence the apostles, when they preached Christ and the resurrection, Ac. iv. 6.

3. ALEXANDER. A Jew at Ephesus, for whom the Jewish party there were anxious to secure a hearing in the midst of the commotion which took place on account of the success of Paul's preaching, that he might offer certain explanations in their behalf, Ac. xix. 33. As the effort was unsuccessful, it is impossible to say what line of defence Alexander would have taken up, or to what precise party he belonged.

4. ALEXANDER. A coppersmith, who had professed to embrace Christianity, but who afterwards, along with Hymeneus, fell into grievous errors, and acted the part of an enemy of the gospel, 1 Ti. i. 20; 2 Ti. iv. 14. It is probable that this person had his settled residence in Ephesus, as it is only in the epistles to Timothy, who had been sent to labour for a time there, that he is expressly mentioned by Paul; though the allusion in the second epistle seems most naturally to imply that the apostle had met him also in Rome. The false opinions he had adopted are not particularly described; but, from being coupled with Hymeneus, who, in one of the passages referred to, is represented as denying the doctrine of the resurrection, and saying that it was past already, 2 Ti. ii. 18, the probability is, that both Alexander and Hymeneus were tinged with that Gnostic spirit which sought continually to impair the realities of gospel truth, and to sublimate them into certain lofty but vain speculations. They would hold, it is likely, that the resurrection of the believer was his being raised by the knowledge of the truth into a higher sphere; and this would probably be coupled with the usual Gnostic licentiousness, of holding all such privileged to follow freely the promptings of their own spirit, wherever that might lead them. In such a case, we can easily understand how Paul should have so earnestly warned Timothy to be on his guard against persons of so subtle, sophistical, and dangerous a spirit.

ALEXANDRIA, a celebrated city and seaport of Egypt, situated on the Mediterranean, about 12 miles west from the Canopic mouth of the Nile. It was founded, B.C. 332, by Alexander the Great, upon the site of the small village of Rhacotis (Strabo, xvii. c. i. 6), and opposite to the little island of Pharos, which, even before the time of Homer, had given shelter to the Greek traders on the coast. Alexander selected this spot for the Greek colony which he proposed to found, from the great natural advantages which it presented, and from the capability of forming the deep water between Rhacotis and the isle of Pharos into a harbour that might become the port of all Egypt. He accordingly ordered Dinocrates, the architect who rebuilt the temple of Diana at Ephesus, to improve the harbour, and to lay down the plan of the new city; and he further appointed Cleomenes of Naucratis, in Egypt, to act as superintendent. The lighthouse upon the isle of Pharos was to be named after his friend, Hephæstion, and all contracts between merchants in the port were to commence "In the name of Hephæstion." The great market which had hitherto existed at Canopus was speedily removed to the new city, which thus at once rose to commercial importance. After the death of Alexander, the building of the city was carried on briskly by his successor, Ptolemy Lagus, or Soter, but many of the public works were not completed till the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus. The city was built upon a strip of land between the sea and the Lake Mareotis, and its ground plan resembled the form of a Greek chlamys, or soldier's cloak. The two main streets, 240 feet wide, left a free passage for the north wind, which alone conveys coolness in Egypt. They crossed each other at right angles in the middle of the city, which was three miles long and seven broad, and the whole of the streets were wide enough for carriages. The long narrow island of Pharos was formed into a sort of breakwater to the port, by joining the middle of the island to the mainland by means of a mole, seven stadia in length, and hence called the Heptastadium. To let the water pass, there were two breaks in the mole, over which bridges were thrown. The public grounds and palaces occupied nearly a third of the whole extent of the city. The Royal Docks, the Exchange, the Poseidon, or Temple of Neptune, and many other public buildings, fronted the harbour. There also stood the burial place for the Greek kings of Egypt, called "the Soma," because it held "the body," as that of Alexander was called. On the western side of the Heptastadium, and on the outside of the city, were other docks, and a ship-canal into Lake Mareotis, as likewise the Necropolis, or public burial place of the city. There were also a theatre, an amphitheatre, a gymnasium, with a large portico, more than 600 feet long, and supported by several rows of marble columns; a stadium, in which games were celebrated every fifth year; a hall of justice; public groves or gardens; a hippodrome for chariot races; and towering above all was the temple of Serapis, the Serapeum. The most famous of all the public buildings planned by Ptolemy Soter were the library and museum, or College of Philosophy. They were built near the royal palace, in that part of the city called Bruchion, and contained a great hall, used as a lecture-room and common dining-room; and had a covered walk all round the outside, and a seat on which the philosophers sometimes sat in the open air. Within the verge of the Serapeum was a supplementary library, called the daughter of the former. The professors of the college were supported out of the public income. The library, which was open equally to all, soon became the largest in the world, being augmented in succeeding reigns until it contained 700,000 volumes, including 200,000 volumes of the library of Pergamos, which Mark Antony had given to Cleopatra in reparation of the loss by the fire during the war between Julius Caesar and the inhabitants of the city. Alexandria became so illustrious for its schools, that the most celebrated philosophers, and men eminent in all branches of science, resorted thither for instruction. The astronomical school, founded by Ptolemy Philadelphus, maintained its reputation till the time of the Saracens.

The lighthouse at Alexandria was not finished till the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, B.C. 284-246. It was built by the architect Sostratus. The royal burial place was also finished in this reign, and Philadelphus removed the body of Alexander from Memphis to this city, which the conqueror himself had planned, and hither pilgrims came and bowed before the golden sarcophagus in which the hero's body was placed. Seleucus Cybiasactes, B.C. 54, is said to have stolen the golden coffin of Alexander. The Ptolemies reigned over Alexandria 292 years, and on the death of Cleopatra, B.C. 30, the city came under the rule of the Romans, who rendered it a most extensive market for grain. The emperor Claudius, A.D. 41-55, founded the Claudian Museum; and Antoninus, A.D. 162-218, built the Gates of the Sun and of the Moon, and likewise made a hippodrome. At the great rebellion of Egypt, A.D. 207, Alexandria was besieged by Diocletian, when, in commemoration of his humanity in staying the pillage of the city, the inhabitants erected an equestrian statue, now lost, but which there is little doubt surmounted the lofty column known by the name of Pompey's Pillar, the base of which still bears the inscription, "To the most honoured emperor, the saviour of Alexandria, the unconquerable Diocletian."

Alexandria was the seat of many terrible massacres, the most severe of which—those under Ptolemy Euergetes II. or Physcon, B.C. 145, and under Caracalla, A.D. 211—so entirely depopulated the city, as to render it necessary to invite strangers from various countries to re-people it, and thus to restore its former splendour.

Although Alexandria is not mentioned in the Old Testament, and only incidentally in the New, Ac. ii. 10; vi. 9; xviii. 24; xxvii. 6, it is most important in connection with the history of the Jews, and from the foundation of an independent sect of the Jewish religion. The Jews, being highly valued as citizens, were encouraged to settle in the new colony, and a large part of the city was allotted to them. Of the three classes into which the population was divided—namely, the Macedonians, the mercenaries, and the native Egyptians—the Jews were admitted into the first class (Hecataeus in Josephus, cont. Ap. ii. 4), having equal rights with the Greek inhabitants, while they were governed under their own code of laws by their own governor, termed atabarcha.

Aug. Cæsar erected for them a pillar of brass, declaring their privileges as citizens (Josephus, Ant. xiv. c. viii.) Amongst their numerous privileges was that of the custody of the river Nile (Josephus, cont. Ap. ii. 5). They had many fine synagogues in the city, and likewise one at Jerusalem, together with an academy for the instruction of their youth in the law and in the Hebrew language. The Jews of this synagogue were among the most violent opponents of Stephen, Ac. vi. 9.

In the reign of Tiberius, A.D. 16, the Jews in Alexandria numbered about one-third of the population, as they formed the majority in two wards out of the five into which the city was divided, and which two were called the Jews' wards. Notwithstanding many persecutions and massacres, they continued to form a large proportion of the population, and retained their civil rights till A.D. 415, when 40,000 of them were expelled at the instigation of Cyril, the Christian patriarch; but they recovered their strength, and appear to have become very numerous at the time of the Saracen conquest.

In the list of Alexandrian authors is Jesus, the son of Sirach, who translated into Greek the book of Wisdom, or Ecclesiasticus, B.C. 132. A hundred and fifty years later, the Alexandrian Jews had taken such a high literary position, that even the Greeks acknowledged them as the first writers of the Alexandrian school. Philo, the historian of their sufferings under Flaccus (Philo, M. Flacc. de Ley.), occupies the highest rank amongst the scholars of the Jews, and his writings raised the school of Alexandria to a place equal to that it had attained under the first two Ptolemies. In the history of philosophy and religion, the writings of Philo must always command the student's most careful attention. It was at Alexandria that the Greek version of the Old Testament, called the Septuagint, because supposed to have been translated by seventy or seventy-two learned men, was made at the instance of Ptolemy Philadelphus, according to the authority of Aristeas, and after him Josephus (cont. Ap. ii.) This history, however, is now considered doubtful, but there are good grounds for believing that this early translation had a place in the famous library.

Alexandria is reported to have enjoyed the ministry of the evangelist Mark, A.D. 59-60, who is also said to have suffered martyrdom there, and to have been succeeded by Anianus. Apollon was born at Alexandria, Ac. xviii. 24. We have an instance of the attention paid by the Christian school at Alexandria to copying the books of Holy Writ, in the very ancient MS. now extant in the British Museum, called the Alexandrine MS., bearing to be written by Thecla, a lady who lived early in the fifth century. The Christians of the present day reverence the churches dedicated to St. Catharine and St. Mark. The last is celebrated for the tomb of the evangelist, whose body is said to have been carried away by the Venetians. The Copts are the possessors of this church, and they say that a picture which it contains, representing the archangel Michael with a sword in his hand, was painted by St. Luke.

A.D. 618, the Persians entered Alexandria, and soon held all the Delta. A.D. 640, 22d December, after a siege of fourteen months, the city fell into the hands of the Arabs. Amrou-ibn-al-Aad, the conqueror, wrote to the caliph, Omar III., that he had taken a city in which he found 4000 palaces, 4000 public baths, 400 theatres, 12,000 sellers of herbs, and 40,000 Jews paying tribute. Such was the store of wheat that he sent on camels' backs to Medina, that the Arabian historian declares, "that the first of an unbroken line of camels entered the holy city before the last camel had left Egypt." When Alexandria was taken, Amrou set his seal upon the public library and the other public property of the city. John Philoponus begged that the books might be spared; but, on applying to the caliph, Omar ordered the whole to be burned. Amrou obeyed, and sent the books to the public baths of the city, which were heated by them for the space of six months, A.D. 642. Alexandria remained under the government of the caliphs till A.D. 924, when it was taken by the Mogrebeens, or Western Arabs; after which it suffered many changes and revolutions, so serious to its prosperity, that in one year, 928 (according to Eutychus), above 200,000 of the inhabitants perished.

Napoleon Bonaparte took Alexandria in 1798, and it remained in the possession of the French till they surrendered to the British, September 2, 1801, when they were finally expelled from the country. Among the trophies taken was a sarcophagus (now in the British Museum), bearing the name of Amyrtæus, and supposed to have subsequently contained the body of Alexander the Great.

Mohammed Ali dug a canal, called El Mahmoudieh, in compliment to Mahmoud, the father of the present sultan Abd-el-Mejid, which opened a water communication with the Nile, entering that river at a place called Fouah, a few miles distant from the city. All about the city, but particularly to the south and east, are extensive mounds, and fragments of ancient luxury and magnificence, granite columns, marble statues, and broken pottery. Among this last are frequently found the handles of amphoræ, stamped with a device significative of the place, and with the name of the archon who was governor at the time the amphoræ left the shores of Greece. It would appear, from the great number of these handles that have been picked up, that the Alexandrians carried on an extensive trade in the various wines produced on the volcanic soil of the Greek islands. Houses are now being built by foreign merchants at some distance from the thickly inhabited part of the city, especially along the banks of the canal, and there is a constant digging among the ruins of the ancient city for building materials, many a piece of Grecian art being broken up to make lime. It was from one of these excavations that the colossal foot presented to the British Museum by Mr. Harris, was saved from the lime-kiln. This foot probably belonged to the statue of Jupiter Serapis, from the temple already mentioned. In 1854, in preparing foundations for a new building, the workmen turned up some massive remains, supposed to be those of the celebrated museum and library. Mr. Francis Power Cobbe gives, in the Athenæum, April 3, 1858, an account of the discovery of a kind of sepulchral Greek chapel, excavated in the rocky elevation on which Pompey's Pillar stands. It is a very irregular cross. In the north transept there is an apse or niche, with small Ionic pilasters at the sides. The chamber opposite this is about twenty feet long and eight feet wide; and on each side, and at the end, is a double row of deep holes, thirty-six in number, in the walls, for the insertion of the coffins or mummy cases—something between a Roman columbarium and a modern English vault. The chancel contains some frescoes and Greek inscriptions much effaced, but on the apse is still visible a picture of the miracle of the loaves and fishes. On the walls of the chancel arch are two life-size figures, one having wings, the other being Christ resting on a staff. The attitudes and draperies are simple, resembling the inferior Pompeian frescoes.

Under the immediate successors of Alexander, the free population of Alexandria numbered 300,000; and, including slaves, it has been calculated to have contained at least 600,000 inhabitants when in its glory. Modern Alexandria contains about 40,000 inhabitants (Hogg's Visit to Alexandria)—the Jews numbering only 500 (St. John's Egypt and Mohammed Ali, ii.); but it is again fast rising into importance as a seat of commerce and the grand road to the East. The modern city of Alexandria is surrounded by a high wall, built by the Saracens between A.D. 1200-1300. Some parts of the walls of the old city still exist, and the ancient vaulted reservoirs, extending under the whole town, are almost entire. The ancient necropolis is excavated out of the solid rock. The excavation is described by De Tott as 200 feet long by 40 feet wide. It has several openings at the sides, forming subterranean streets, containing horizontal niches, 20 inches square by 6 feet deep, narrowed at the bottom, and separated from each other by partitions in the rock 7 or 8 inches thick, for the reception of the mummies. The site of that part known to have been Rhacotis is now covered by the sea; but beneath the surface of the water are visible the remains of ancient Egyptian statues and columns.

ALGUM. See ALMUG.

ALIEN. See STRANGER.

ALLEGORY occurs only once in all Scripture, and in that one place owes its existence to a scarcely accurate translation. The passage is Ga. iv. 24, where, with reference to the story of Hagar and Ishmael, Sarah and Isaac, as an embodiment of spiritual truth, the apostle says, "which things are to be allegorized" (ἃ τῶν ἐστὶν ἀλληγοροῦμενα), or transferred to another and higher line of things—not precisely, as in the authorized version, "are an allegory." For an allegory, in the strict and proper sense, is a narrative either expressly feigned for the purpose, or, if describing facts which really took place, describing them only for the purpose of representing other things than the narrative, in its immediate aspect, brings into view; so that the narrative is either fictitious, or treated as if it were so, the secondary or moral import being alone regarded. St. Paul, however, as Bishop Marsh justly remarks (Lecture v. on the Interpretation of the Bible), "did not pronounce the history itself an allegory; he declared only that it was allegorized. It is one thing to say that a history is allegorized, it is another thing to say that it is allegory itself. If we only allegorize a historical narrative, we do not of necessity convert it into allegory. And though allegorical interpretation, when applied to history, may be applied either so as to preserve or so as to destroy its historical verity, yet, when we use the verb allegorize as St. Paul has used it, the allegorical interpretation is manifestly of the former kind. In short, when St. Paul allegorized the history of the two sons of Abraham, and compared them with the two covenants, he did nothing more than represent the first as types, the latter as antitypes." His object was simply to state that the portion of Old Testament history referred to was of the nature of a revelation concerning the great things of salvation, and to indicate what were the truths which, when spiritually understood, it was intended to convey; namely, that the real seed of God in every age is, like Isaac, begotten by the special agency of God, and as such, is free to serve and honour him; while those who, like Ishmael, are born merely after the flesh, who have in them nothing more or higher than nature has conferred, are in bondage to corruption, and can be no more than nominally children of God.

Neither in this passage, nor in any other part of New Testament scripture, is a warrant given for that allegorical mode of interpreting the historical portions of the Old Testament which prevailed in early times, and reached its climax in the writings and school of Origen. By that mode the scriptural narratives were held sometimes to be unreal accounts as regards the letter; but more commonly they were treated precisely as if they were such, being accommodated to things, not simply involving higher exemplifications of divine truth and principle, but totally different in kind, consequently arbitrary and capricious in the particular use made of them. The actual source of such interpretations lay, not in Scripture itself, but in the allegorizings of Philo and the later Platonists generally. The only allegories to be found in Scripture are its parabolical representations, such as, in the Old Testament, Canticles, Psalms xlv. lxxx., Isa. v. 1-7, and in the New, the parables of our Lord. In these there is an immediate or ostensible representation of certain circumstances and transactions, simply for the purpose of giving an exhibition of another, though corresponding class of things, in a different and higher sphere; and but for the sake of the one the other would not have been introduced. (See PARABLES and TYPES.)

ALLELUIA, or HALLELUIA, a Hebrew word, signifying Praise ye the Lord. It was a common form of adoration and thanksgiving in the Jewish worship, as appears from its frequent employment at the beginning and the close of Psalms, Ps. cvi. cxl. cxvii. cxviii. cxxxv.; and from the earthly it is transferred by St. John to the heavenly temple, Ra. xix. 1, 3, 4, 6.

ALLIANCES. Under this term may be comprehended the relations, whether of a political or a social nature, which the people of God were, or were not, permitted to form with strangers—national alliances, and alliances by marriage. In regard to the former, nothing very definite was laid down in the legislation of Moses, except as regards the original inhabitants of the land of Canaan. With them the Israelites were enjoined to make no league, public or private, but to carry into effect the decree of Heaven, which doomed them for their enormous sins to utter destruction, De. vii. 2; Ju. ii. 2. What was said respecting the surrounding nations bore upon the religion and manners prevalent among them, rather than upon the people themselves: Israel was not to copy after their idolatrous and sinful practices, but still was, if possible, to cultivate peaceful and friendly relations with them. This possibility, and the prospect of realizing it in a way honourable to Israel, was even held out as a promise by the lawgiver, dependent on the fidelity of the people to their covenant-engagements. In that case, God should give them favour among the nations, should even put the fear of them upon the nations, and should enable them to lend to these as having more than they themselves might need, and standing in such relations to others that the latter should be disposed to receive help at their hands, De. ii. 25; xv. 6; Ge. xxvii. 29. So that, if it was a part of Israel's calling to dwell in some sense alone, and not to be numbered with the nations, they were not the less expected and bound to cultivate friendly relations with those around them, and to seek their good. No otherwise, indeed, could they fulfil their mission as destined to give light and blessing to the world. Accordingly, when the commonwealth of Israel was fully established in Canaan, and it was numbered in the community of nations, formal alliances sprung up between it and others, which were not denounced as in themselves wrong: if they erred, it was only in respect to the extent to which they were carried, or the consequences which they were suffered to entail. The alliance between Solomon and Tyre, established and continued for perfectly proper and even sacred ends, bears throughout the aspect of a legitimate character, 1 Ki. v. 2-12; ix. 27; and in later times, it is charged as a special ground of judgment against Tyre, that she had not remembered the brotherly covenant, Am. i. 7. The other alliances of Solomon, those with Pharaoh of Egypt and several states in the neighbourhood of Palestine, are represented in a less favourable light, simply because he allowed them to entangle him in a sinful compliance with their idolatrous practices and licentious system of concubinage. And such undoubtedly was the general tendency of the political alliances of the Israelitish people in later times: they led to too close an imitation of heathen manners, and ultimately to too great dependence upon heathen counsel and support, and so became among the more immediate causes that led to the degradation and overthrow of the kingdoms both of Israel and Judah. The prophets are consequently full of reproofs and warnings on the subject, and some of their more striking and pungent delineations, such as Eze. xvi. xxiii., Ho. v., turn especially on the improper character and disastrous results of those heathen alliances.

In respect to the other form of alliances—those which pertain to the family—the law was perfectly explicit: Israel, the covenant-people of Jehovah, could lawfully enter into no marriage-covenant with the daughter of a strange god; for this was to poison the life of the covenant-people at its very fountain-head. The whole character and aim of the covenant protested against alliances of such a description, and they were both expressly forbidden in the law, De. vii. 3, and in actual life denounced as violations of the fundamental principles of the covenant, Ezra ix. x.; Ne. xiii.; Mal. ii. 11-17. But it was always open to members of the covenant to marry wives from other nations, on the understanding that the persons so wedded renounced the gods and corrupt manners of their country, and embraced instead those of Israel. Of this various examples occurred, and some are expressly noticed—in particular, Rahab, Ruth, Zipporah.

ALTON-BACH'UTH [oak of weeping], a place near Bethel where Deborah, Rebekah's nurse, was buried, Ge. xxxv. 8. The place is remarkable for nothing else, and never occurs again.

ALMOND. The almond (Amygdalus communis) belongs to a botanical family, Amygdaleæ, the members of which are widely diffused, and most of them very popular. They are all shrubs, or at the utmost trees of unambitious stature, such as the sloe, the plum, the cherry, the peach, the cherry-laurel. The fruit of this family consists of a two-lobed kernel, inclosed in a shell, which again is surrounded by a drupe or juicy covering. In some members of the family this pulpy covering, when ripe, is remarkably rich and succulent, as in the case of the peach and nectarine, and the more liquid and acidulous cherry; but the drupe of the almond is dry and coriaceous, and the kernel alone is valued. In England, in favourable summers, the almond matures its fruit; but we are chiefly familiar with it as a kernel, or as a nut divested of its soft outward coating. All amygdaleous plants contain in their blossoms, leaves, and fruit, a perceptible trace of a peculiar principle, with the aromatic gust of which every one is familiar, but which usually occurs associated with one of our deadliest poisons. This prussic acid, however, in nature's laboratory, and under the hand of the Creator, is so infinitesimally diffused as seldom to exert a noxious influence. The cook or confectioner puts a fragment of cherry-laurel leaf into his dainty dish, and gives it that agreeable souppçon so dear to epicures; and the manufacturer of liqueurs digests in alcohol the kernels of the peach, the nectarine, or cherry, and produces the costly noyau, ratafia, and maraschino.

The almond is diffused by culture from China to Spain, and is found to bear fruit well on both sides of the Mediterranean; but there is no region where it thrives better than Syria, or where it is so truly at home. Accordingly, when Jacob was sending a present of those productions of Canaan which were likely to be acceptable to an Egyptian grandee, "the best fruits of the land," besides balm, and myrrh, and honey, he bade his sons take "nuts and almonds," Ge. xliii. 11; and the original name of that place so endeared to his memory as Bethel, originally called Luz, was probably derived from some well-known tree of this species; for there can be little doubt that luz, amongst the Hebrews, as amongst the modern Arabs (who call it louz), was one of the names for the almond-tree, Ge. xlviii. 12. If so, they were rods not of "hazel" (as the authorized version renders), but of "almond," luz, which Jacob employed in his singular experiment on the flocks of his father-in-law at Padan-aram, Ge. xxx. 37. To this day "Jordan almonds" is the recognized market-name for the best samples of this fruit, in common with Tafilat dates, Eleme figs, &c. The name, however, is little more than a tradition. The best "Jordan almonds" come from Malaga.

With its oblong oval, sharpened at one end and rounded at the other, the shape of the almond-nut is remarkably graceful, and it was the pattern selected for the bowls of the golden candlestick, Ex. xxv. 31-37; xxxvii. 17; unless, indeed, we suppose that the entire fruit was represented in its ripe and opening state, displaying the pointed nut within, which would be a peculiarly elegant design for the cup of an oil candelabrum: the round sarcocarp containing the oil, and the flame-shaped nut of gold emitting the light from its apex. Amongst our designers the almond still does good service; although in British ornamentation it yields to the national symbol the oak, with its beautiful acorn and cup. But it is worthy of notice that pieces of crystal, called "almonds," are still used by the manufacturer in the adorning of cut-glass chandeliers.

The rod of Aaron which miraculously budded and bore fruit in a single night, yielded "almonds," Nu. xvi. 8.

As we have mentioned, it is extremely probable that luz was one of the Hebrew names for the almond; but in the Old Testament it is usually called shaked (שָׂקֵד), "the waker," from its being the earliest tree that awakes from the winter's sleep. Hence it is employed as an expressive emblem in the outset of Jeremiah's prophecies:—"The word of the Lord came unto me, saying, Jeremiah, what seest thou? And I said, I see a rod of an almond tree. Then the Lord said to me, Thou has rightly seen: for I will be early awake with respect to my word to perform it," Je. i. 11, 12—Dr. E. Henderson's translation. In Syria, the almond blossoms in February (Schubert's Reise in das Morgenland); and in the squares and parks of London, as early as March or April, its welcome harbinger anticipates the boldest of our native foresters, and brings to the frost-bound citizens good tidings of the spring.

But not only is it Flora's precursor among the trees; its blossoms expand weeks before its leaves. This propensity to display its blossoms on bare branches the almond shares with several of its kindred; and, as a parallel to Solomon's image, we may refer to its cousin-german the sloe, in our own cold clime so familiar, with its snowy petals sprinkled on the black and dead-looking boughs. To this it has usually been supposed that the royal preacher alludes in his description of old age, "when the almond tree shall flourish," Ec. xii. 5, the blossoms on the leafless branches denoting the beautiful crown which surmounts the unverdant trunk of advancing years. To this it has of late been objected that the blossom "is not white but pink, or rather partly pink and partly white."—(Bonar's Desert of Sinai, p. 354; Balfour's Plants of the Bible.) As far as concerns the colour of the blossom, the criticism is entirely just, and the compilers, who have followed one another in speaking of the "snowy" or "silvery" almond flower, are altogether wrong; but we fancy that the force of the comparison lies, not in the tint of the flower, but in its beauty and its loveliness. "The hoary head is a crown of glory," Pr. xvi. 31; but an eastern crown was usually not white, but golden. Yet who can find fault with the metaphor? The hoary locks are the crown of old age, and the almond blossom is the garland of winter. Often have we seen its hardy petals doing battle with snow-storms and sleet; and though the hoar-frost was on its branches over-night, its frank and fearless smile was ready for the morning's sun. How pleasant if we could always carry the metaphor a little farther: "The hoary head is a crown of glory, if it be found in the way of righteousness." In such a case, "the flourishing of the almond tree" would be the blossom of immortality; and on behalf of the old disciple we should rejoice because "summer is near"—a brighter association than that which is contained in Moore's well-known lines:—

"The hope, in dreams, of a happier hour,
That alights on misery's brow,
Springs out of the silvery almond flower,
That blooms on a leafless bough."

However, it is right to add that Gesenius adopts a less poetical rendering, "and the almond is spurned," rejected by the old and toothless man, although in itself a delicious and much-prized fruit. [J. H.]

ALMS, ALMS-DEEDS. The word alms is not only equivalent in meaning to the Greek ἐλεημοσύνη, of which it is the uniform rendering in Scripture, Mat. vi. 2, 3, Ac. iii. 2, &c., but is also derived from it; it is the same word in an abbreviated and modified form. As found in the old Saxon translation it comes pretty near the original, almessan, which, in the German, became changed into almosen; in Wickliffe's translation it is given almesse; in Scotland awmous is still familiarly used; but in England it passed first into almes (which is the form employed by Tyndale), and then, by further contraction, into alms. It is really, therefore, a singular, though it has the form of a plural word. The English term so far differs from the Greek original, that it bears only one of the two significations which belong to the other; ἐλεημοσύνη first denotes pity, then the special exercise of pity, which consists in bestowing charity on the poor, while our word alms is confined to the bestowal of charity. Hence, to mark this more definitely, the word deed or deeds is sometimes added to it, as at Ac. ix. 36, where it is said concerning Dorcas, that "she was full of alms-deeds which she did." What is done, however, or given in this respect, is no further entitled to the name of alms, than as it may be the expression of a feeling of mercy toward the destitute.

In every age the readiness to bestow alms upon the really necessitous has formed a distinguishing characteristic of the goodness which is required and commended in the Word of God; but there can be no doubt, that the attribute of beneficence holds a more prominent place in the New Testament than it did in the Old. Under the dispensation brought in by Moses there was less room for the development of such a virtue than commonly exists in Christian times; nor had it motives to present of nearly such commanding energy for the grace of liberality as are now exhibited in the gospel. From the general distribution of property in Israel, and the precautions taken to prevent the alienation of inheritances on the one hand, as well as the undue accumulation of wealth on the other, cases of extreme poverty, or forms of pauperism, must have been comparatively rare. Indeed, if the laws established by Moses had been faithfully administered, and the polity in its main provisions had been wrought in any measure according to its idea, there would have been such a general diffusion of the means of support and comfort as must have rendered scenes of destitution almost unknown. For, along with an ample territory, the people of Israel were assured by the covenant of a special blessing upon their fields and labours, and were solemnly engaged to the practice of that righteousness which is itself the best safeguard against misery and want. It was clearly enough foreseen, however, by Moses, that the ideal he set before them would be but imperfectly realized; and therefore, while legislating for the existence and perpetuation of a state of things which should well-nigh have excluded poverty, and rendered alms-giving a work of supererogation, he yet anticipated the frequent occurrence of circumstances which should call for the exercise of a bountiful disposition. He even announced it as a matter of undoubted certainty that "the poor should never cease out of the land;" and "therefore"—such was the obligation he imposed for all times—"therefore I command thee, saying, Thou shalt open thine hand wide unto thy brother, to thy poor, and to thy needy, in thy land," De. xv. 11. The command was not only to give alms in such a case, but to give liberally, and to do it in an ungrudging, compassionate spirit, "not grieving when they gave" (as it is urged in ver. 10), and so "the Lord their God should bless them for this thing in all their works, and in all that they put their hand to." Many other instructions of like import are scattered through the Pentateuch, accompanied by considerations drawn both from the past history of Israel and from the expected future; and certain specific provisions were even made for the regular distribution of alms on a large scale among the poorer members of the commonwealth. The institution of the sabbatical year was of this description, since the foremost reason for its appointment was, "that the poor of the people might eat," Ex. xxiii. 11. Such, also, were the gleanings of corn and fruit which were annually to be left on purpose that the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow might participate in the bounties of the season, De. xxiv. 19-22; and still more, the tithings every third year which were to be laid up in store, that "the Levite, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow, who were within their gates, might come, and eat, and be satisfied," De. xiv. 28, 29. A most benign and charitable spirit, it thus appears, pervaded the legislation of Moses. The people could not enter into the genius of the institutions he set up without being led to seek their prosperity and well-being in connection with showing mercy to the poor. The writings of the prophets also re-echo the instruction, while they show how grievously the spirit of the Mosaic polity in this respect was violated. "The oppression of the poor," robbing the fatherless and the widow, binding instead of breaking every yoke, and refusing to deal out their bread to the hungry, are among the heaviest charges brought against the leading members of the community, and are specially mentioned among the sins which drew down the judgments of Heaven, Is. lviii. 4-7; Eze. xviii. 7; Am. ii. 7, &c.

With the commencement of the gospel age a new era in almsgiving, as in the spirit of kindness and good-will generally, dawned upon the world. This had at once the spring of its activity and the pattern of its working in the personal history and mission of the Lord Jesus Christ, which, with special reference to this subject, is summed up by the apostle in the memorable words, that "though he was rich, yet for our sakes he became poor, that we through his poverty might be made rich." The seeming paradox which the same apostle applied to himself, "poor, yet making many rich," had unspeakably its highest exemplification in Christ—primarily, indeed, and mainly in respect to the spiritual benefits which more especially constitute the well-being of an intelligent and accountable creature, yet not without regard also to the lower comforts which are required to meet their bodily wants. Not a few of his most striking miracles were wrought for the purpose of making provision for these in times of emergency; and in healing the sick, opening the eyes of the blind, relieving those that were oppressed of the devil, He acted as the bestower of bounties the same in kind as those ministered to the poor by the alms of the rich, only far superior in degree. In his teaching, too, He gave a prominent place to exercises of beneficence in this direction; as when He exhorted the disciples to "give alms of such things as they had;" nay, to give with such pure and single aim that their "left hand should not know what their right hand did," and on objects so utterly poor and destitute as to preclude the hope of any other recompense than that which should await them at the resurrection of the just; above all, the emphasis He laid upon alms-deeds and other offices of mercy to the poor of the flock in the grand delineation of the final judgment, in which they are made to stand as the test of preparation for the kingdom of the Father, Mat. vi. 3; xxv. 31-46; Lu. vi. 35; xi. 41; xiv. 13, 14. It is impossible, therefore, to look to the example or to the teaching of Christ—impossible yet more, to come under the influence of his own, free, generous, self-sacrificing love, without feeling convinced that almsgiving must form a distinguishing characteristic in his genuine followers, so far as they may have the means and the call to manifest it. If any doubt could have been entertained upon the subject, the records of the apostolic church would have been sufficient to dispel it, exhibiting as they do, simultaneously with the gift of the Spirit and the experience of life and joy in the hearts of believers, an amazing outburst of liberality towards the poorer members of the body. The common faith in Jesus, and the full indwelling of his Spirit, made them feel as "of one heart and one soul," members together of a select brotherhood; so that it seemed no more than just, that the superfluity of some should go to relieve the necessities of others. And recognizing this as an abiding relationship, and the claim arising out of it as one that must be ever responded to in the church of Christ, they presently appointed a distinct class of officers (deacons) to take the oversight of the matter, and see to it that none of the really destitute were neglected in the daily ministrations. Thus almsgiving was from the first identified with the church of Christ, ingrafted, we may say, as an essential element into her constitution; and no one who is at all acquainted with the early history of the church can be ignorant what a powerful element it proved in subduing the opposition of the world, and winning aliens to the fold of Christ.

It is not, however, the simple fact of such a spirit of charity springing forth with the establishment of the Christian church that demands our regard, but the healthfulness of tone and practical sagacity that characterized its development. Both in respect to giver and receiver there was an admirable balancing of principles and duties. On the one side all was perfectly free and spontaneous. The necessity of giving, however generally felt, was not imposed as a condition of membership, far less was any attempt made to impose a definite proportion of income, like the old law of tithes, as the amount that must or ought to be contributed by the richer members of the church for the relief of their poorer brethren. "Whiles it remained," was the word of Peter in the first testing case that arose about the matter of giving, "was it not thine own? and after it was sold, was it not in thine own power?" Ac. v. 4. Without constraint of any kind, but the constraint of inward principle and feeling, it was left to themselves to determine whether they should give at all to the common fund, or to what extent they should give. And, in like manner, the apostle Paul, when pressing on the church at Corinth the duty of contributing to the poor saints at Jerusalem, was careful to urge it upon their consciences, not as speaking by commandment, but simply "as a matter of bounty," and to "prove the sincerity of their love." Sought thus, on the one side, as the fruit of a willing mind, and urged by arguments of moral suasion, all occasion was cut off, on the other, for claiming the benefactions of the rich as a right to be possessed, or leaning on them as an excuse for improvidence and sloth. The almsgiving taught and exemplified in the apostolic church has nothing in common with the confiscating and leveling doctrine of Socialism. It did not merge the individual in the community, or transfer to the one what, by natural right and lawful possession, belonged to the other; and recognizing thus the rights of the individual, it, of necessity, also recognized the imperative obligation of each member of the church to support himself and those dependent upon him, by his own exertions; and only in the event of this failing or proving inadequate, gave him a title to look for aid from the treasury of the church. Even in the first ardours of Christian charity, distribution was made, not to all indiscriminately, but to such merely as had need, Ac. ii. 45. Afterwards, it was distinctly announced that if any one would not work (provided he was capable of doing so), neither should he eat, 2 Th. iii. 10; and by proclaiming the elevated principle of its being "more blessed to give than to receive," Ac. xx. 35, the recipient of charity was made to occupy relatively an inferior place: all, even those in the humbler ranks of life, were taught to aim at the nobler distinction of doing something to relieve the wants of others, rather than being indebted to others for their own relief. Hence, nothing can well be conceived more alien to the spirit and genius of Christianity, as exhibited in the acts and precepts of the apostolic age, than such almsgiving as might encourage an idle vagrancy or thriftless improvidence, even in individuals, and, still more, as might foster a mendicant order, making choice of poverty and dependence as a thing of merit, and for its own sake to be desired. Nor is it a greatly less palpable misreading of the apostolic history, in this respect, which is made by communist leaders, and by certain theologians (such as Baur and Zeller), when it is held that in the primitive church there was a virtual abolition of the rights of property.

The church of the apostles in this matter of almsgiving, while it is a witness against these flagrant perversions and false theories, is also, it must be confessed with sorrow, a model which no longer finds in Christendom its proper living exemplification: it is at most seen only in broken lines and partial resemblances. As the church grew and expanded in the world, it naturally became more difficult to keep up, in its life and vigour, the spirit of brotherly love, of which Christian almsgiving is to so large an extent the expression. But for generations the characteristic was more or less preserved in all the churches, and many noble manifestations of liberality continued from time to time to be given. In Justin Martyr's time it was the regular custom after divine service to allow the rich and such as were willing to give according as they were severally minded; and the collection was deposited with the presiding minister or bishop for the relief of orphans and widows, or those who, through disease or any other cause, had fallen into straits, and persons generally in indigent circumstances (Apol. § 67). The departure from apostolic order indicated here, in giving the alms of the church to the pastor, instead of to deacons or inferior officers appointed for the purpose, could scarcely have become common in Justin's time. It may have arisen in certain places partly from the difficulty of getting a separate class of officers to manage it, and partly, it may be, from a disposition to have it placed in connection with the highest office and ministrations in the church. There can be no doubt that, at a somewhat later period, when the hierarchical spirit became more fully developed, the alms of the church came also to be considered as eucharistical offerings, and lost their character as simply acts of beneficence. They were of the things that pertained to the altar, and hence in their administration were regarded as properly belonging to priestly functions. This was an obvious departure from the simplicity of the gospel, and proved in after-times one of the greatest sources both of the influence and of the corruption of the clergy. But a deviation not less marked took place in another direction, when the state formally embraced Christianity, and by civil enactments enforced the observance of what was at first, and in its own nature properly is, a free-will service. The citizens, simply as such, then came to be legally bound to support their own poor; and, reciprocally, the poor began to claim as a right their title to share in the possessions of the rich. The spontaneous, consequently religious, character of the public alms for relieving the necessities of the poor, thus fell into abeyance; and, excepting in so far as the hierarchical spirit prevailed to possess itself of funds that were considered strictly ecclesiastical, all became matter of state regulation and official routine. That it should have so become, is undoubtedly a striking proof of the influence which Christianity exercised on the world, and draws a broad line of demarcation between the times before and subsequent to the gospel; for heathendom knew of no such provision for the wants of the poor as, since the establishment of Christianity, has in most Christian countries found public recognition in the laws of the state. But if the world may be said thereby to have gained, the church certainly has lost, and no longer realizes—at least in the manner she did at first—the ideal of a just representation of the mind and will of Christ. For as He, to use the words of Baumgarten, “in the days of his flesh sought the needy and the sick, and kindly ministered help and consolation, so it is his will that his church shall exemplify the same spirit towards the poor and afflicted, and substitute its offices of charity for his own gracious words and helping hand. To this end He has promised, through the Holy Spirit, to make the church the abode of that all-subduing love which is able to relieve the wants of the whole world. If the church would be true to her lord, and obey the impulses of this divine love, she would become more deeply conscious of her own wonderful organism, as it was in apostolic times; and meeting the wants of the world in the power of this spirit of active benevolence, she would win myriads of hearts now bound by Satan and fettered by sin, and gain greater victories than were achieved in her earlier conflicts with pagan Rome. And who shall estimate how much the church suffers, both in her inward character and her external prosperity, by neglecting this important part of her mission? Shrinking from the work imposed upon her for the relief of human woe, and transferring it into an organism not endowed with the requisite qualifications for its proper performance, is it astonishing that that which should prove itself the most vital and powerful organism in the world has become so much like a mere mechanism, or rather, indeed, like a lifeless corpse?”

The merit belongs to Dr. Chalmers of having first, in recent times, drawn public attention to this subject; and the preceding remarks are but the echo of many powerful statements and appeals which he made in regard to it. He had the singular merit, also, of practically proving among the neglected and miscellaneous population of a city, as well as in his writings eloquently expounding, what he called “the omnipotence of Christian charity,” and the vast difference both in character and results between the “charity of law and the charity of the gospel.” There may, indeed, be a degree of exaggeration in the evils he ascribed to the existing poor-law system; but no one who has been called to take part in its administration can refuse to own that there is a painful amount of truth in his representations, and that it is not without reason he asks, “With what success can one acquit himself as a minister of the New Testament in the presence of a temptation, by which every peasant of our land is solicited to cast away from him the brightest of those virtues wherewith the morality of the sacred volume is adorned? By what charm shall he woo them from earth, and bear their hearts aspiringly to heaven, while such a bait and such a bribery are held forth to all the appetites of earthliness? or, how can he find a footing for the religion of charity and peace in a land broiling with litigation throughout all its parishes, and where charity, transformed out of its loveliness, has now become an angry firebrand for lighting up the most vindictive passions and the fiercest jealousies of our nature?”—(Christian and Civic Economy of Large Towns, c. 10.)

In the meantime the churches of Christ collectively, and individual Christians, where the poor-law system prevails should adapt themselves to their position and circumstances—not renouncing the law of Christ, not ceasing their almsgiving as Christians, but seeking rather to turn it into such channels as open for it the fittest employments. In the present state of evangelical Christendom, especially in the existing condition of its large towns, it may well be doubted whether there is enough of living Christianity in its churches, and of co-operative love, to enable them adequately to undertake the oversight of the poor, if such a charge were to be devolved upon them. But while they are neither called nor permitted to assume this charge, there is a great deal with which they may charge themselves; and if not in meeting the lower wants—relieving the bare necessities of the poor around them, yet in ministering to their substantial comfort in times of trouble and distress, and in providing for their higher interests, by contributions for schools and hospitals, reformatory, missionary, sanatory institutions, ample scope will still be found, as well for particular churches as for single individuals giving alms of such things as they have. Dislocated as matters in many respects are, it shall not be for want of opportunity, if any Christian person or community fails to give evidence of a Christian spirit by devising liberal things, and turning “the mammon of unrighteousness” into an active instrument for advancing the cause of Christ, and elevating the condition of the poorer members of society.

ALMUG TREE. In the commission which Solomon gave to Hiram, we find him saying, “Send me also cedar trees, fir trees, and algum trees out of Lebanon,” 2 Ch. ii. 8; but, in executing the commission we are told that, whilst Lebanon supplied the firs and the cedars, it was from Ophir that Hiram’s navy fetched the algums or almugs, 1 Ki. x. 11; 2 Ch. ix. 10. And as there can be little doubt that Ophir was a port in the Red Sea or the Persian Gulf, there can be equally little doubt that the almug was some prized wood of Eastern Asia. The purposes for which Solomon used it were to make “pillars for the house of the Lord, and for the king’s house,” as well as “harps and psalteries,” 1 Ki. x. 12. Its eastern derivation, together with a costliness entitling it to be named alongside of “precious stones,” has suggested the famous sandal-wood of India, and there are many presumptions in favour of the conjecture; such as the remote period at which the wood has been known and valued—its early introduction into Indian architecture—its employment in the manufacture, not only of boxes and cabinets, but musical instruments—and the fondness of Solomon and his contemporaries for other fragrant kinds of timber, such as the pine and the cedar.

Sandal-wood (Santalum album), giving name to the natural family of Santalaceæ, is a native of the mountains of Malabar. It grows to a height of twenty-five or thirty feet, and would probably attain a loftier stature were it not for the temptation of its costly timber. The outer portions of the trunk have little fragrance, but nothing can be more delightful than the perfume of the inner layers, especially towards the root; and, which is no small recommendation in regions alive with white ants, it is said to defy the attacks of all insects. At a distant period the portals of the temple of Somnauth, in Gujerat, were adorned with gates of sandal-wood, 18 feet high by 15 broad, and 3 inches thick, carved in elaborate arabesques. These were carried off in 1024 by Mahmood of Ghuznee, to adorn his tomb in this famous fortress of Afghanistan, and there they remained till Ghuznee was dismantled by the British in 1842. They were still in perfect preservation, and were restored to the idol-temple with much pomp and circumstance by the Earl of Ellenborough. [J. H.]

ALOE. Our usual association with the aloe is pharmaceutical, and far from agreeable. The bitter purgative of the apothecary is an extract from the Aloe spicata, A. socotrina, A. indica, &c., plants of the liliaceous order, and with the general appearance of which we are sufficiently acquainted through their representative and ally, the stately Yucca gloriosa. Those stiff tin-like specimens which, under the name of "American aloes" (Agave americana), keep their station throughout the summer in green tubs on well-trimmed lawns, but which are expected to blossom no more than the painted chevaux-de-frise on the wall above them, belong to the amaryllid order. Between these aloes and the aloes of the Bible there is no connection whatever. The latter are what the Hebrew original denominates ahalim and ahaloth (אֶהָלִים and אֶהָלוֹת). This (or lign-aloës, as it is sometimes called) was undoubtedly a fragrant wood which the Jews received by importation from the East, and the Indian name of which the Hebrews adopted. Called agila in Malay, and elwa in Hindee, and agura in the ancient Sanscrit, it was called ahaloth by the Jews, and ἀλόη by the Greeks—even as it is still called agalugen by the Arabs. It is by no means improbable that this fragrant wood was yielded by several kinds of tree; but the late lamented Dr. Forbes Royle has succeeded in identifying it beyond all dispute with the Aquilaria agallocha (more properly A. agallochum).—See Royle's Himalayan Mountains,

p. 171, and Plate 36. This is an immense tree, of the order Aquilariaceæ, growing on the mountainous regions south and east of Silhet. Portions of the wood become gorged with a fragrant resin, and (in common, probably, with the similar wood of another tree) are pounded, mixed with a gummy substance, and burned by the Chinese in their temples. This aloës or eagle-wood (so misnamed by the Portuguese confounding the Malay agila with the Latin aquila), was a favourite perfume of the emperor Napoleon I., and was frequently burned in his palaces.

From Pr. vii. 17, and Ps. xlv. 8, we find that it was customary to perfume couches, wearing apparel, &c., with odoriferous substances, one of which was lign-aloës.

"All thy garments smell of myrrh, and aloës, and cassia,
Out of the ivory palaces" [or wardrobe, as some render it].

Describing the coronation of the king of Abyssinia, Bruce mentions that he was anointed, then crowned, and finally "fumigated with incense and myrrh, aloës, and cassia."—(See Mant. on Psalm xlv.) But by far the worthiest and most memorable use made of this precious perfume was on the occasion mentioned, Jn. xix. 39, where we are told that Nicodemus, having obtained leave to bury the body of Jesus, "brought a mixture of myrrh and aloës, about a hundred pound weight," and placed it in and around the winding-sheet in which the precious remains were enveloped. The quantity here mentioned is very great, and it is likely that the less expensive myrrh bore a large proportion to the aloës,—the best samples of which were worth their weight in gold. But on such occasions Hebrew affection, and sometimes, perhaps, Hebrew ostentation, were exceedingly lavish. Thus eighty pounds of spices were used at the funeral of Rabbi Gamaliel, the elder; and 500 attendants followed the bier of Herod, carrying spices.—(Wetstein in Jo. xix. 39; Josephus, Antiq. book xvii. 8, 3.) [J. H.]

ALPHA, the first letter in the Greek alphabet, corresponding to the Hebrew aleph; and, indeed, our word alphabet is simply made up of the two first names of the Greek letters, alpha-beta. As previously among the Hebrews, so among the Greeks and Romans, the letters of the alphabet were employed as numerals; and hence it became quite natural to use the first and the last, alpha and omega, for the commencement and the conclusion of a series, or quite absolutely for first and last. So they are used by our Lord in the Apocalypse, when He styles himself "the Alpha and the Omega," Ro. 1.7; xxi. 6; xxii. 13, and explains it in the two latter passages by the synonyms "the beginning and the end," "the first and the last." The representation, however expressed, has respect to what Christ is causally: it indicates, not simply that He is the first and the last of a series, but that the whole has in Him alike its commencement and its termination. He originated the present order of things, and He will also bring it to the proper issue; so that the end shall correspond to the beginning, and be all very good.

ALPHÆUS, or ALPHE'US, the father of the second James, who is commonly called James the Less, to distinguish him from the more eminent apostle, James the son of Zebedee, Mat. x. 3; Mar. iii. 18; Lu. vi. 15. As James is also represented as the son of that Mary who was sister to our Lord's mother, whose husband is usually called Cleophas, Jn. xix. 25; Lu. xxiv. 10; Mat. x. 3, it would appear that Alpheus and Cleophas are but different names for the same person. In Jn. xix. 25 it is not properly Cleophas, but Clôpas (Κλώπας) that is used; and the probability is that Alpheus and Clôpas are equally derived from the Hebrew אֶלְפָּהי (alpai), the one from dropping the aspirate, and making Alphæus, the other changing it into k or hard c, and making Clôpas. It would seem, however, that there is another Alpheus mentioned in New Testament scripture, the father of Levi or Matthew, Mar. ix. 9; Mat. ii. 14. But in this case nothing whatever is known of the father excepting the simple fact of his having had such a son; while in respect to the former Alpheus, supposing him to be the same with Cleophas, we know besides that he was among the early disciples of our Lord, and along with another disciple had the memorable interview with Jesus on the way to Emmaus, immediately after the resurrection, Lu. xxiv.

ALTAR is the English form of the Latin altare, which, in the strictly classical writers, occurs only in the plural, but in later times was familiarly used also in the singular. It was a derivative of altus (high or lofty), and hence designated the erection to which it was applied as emphatically a height. So, indeed, did the other Latin word, which is of like import, and was more commonly used—ara, derived from alpo, I raise, or lift up. The two words in Latin were often interchanged, as if entirely synonymous; but properly altare was a high altar, and ara simply an altar—the former such as was dedicated only to the supreme gods, while the latter was common to them and inferior objects of worship (Virgil, Ecl. v. 65). The term most commonly employed in Greek is quite similar in its meaning and derivation—βωμός, originally signifying an elevation of any sort, but afterwards appropriated to the particular height, or erection raised for divine worship. The Hebrew word בִּמְתָר (bamath) or בִּמְזֵל (bamoth), from which probably the Greek was derived, has the sense of high-place, on which sacrifices were so often presented to Jehovah as well as to false gods, that the term high-places came to denote, not merely the heights themselves, but also the altars, with their sanctuaries and instruments of worship, erected on them; whence they could be spoken of as being built or removed, 1 Ki. xi. 7; 2 Ki. xxiii. 15. The proper name, however, for altar, in the Hebrew worship, was מִזְבֵּחַ (misbeach), the sacrificing-place, derived from the verb to sacrifice; corresponding to which is the word commonly used for rendering it in the Septuagint, θυσιαστήριον, from θυσία, sacrifice. It indicated nothing as to the form or position of the object it was applied to, but simply characterized it as the place or structure which was set apart for the presentation of slain victims to God.

Looking to the general import, however, of the names anciently employed to designate the place of sacrifice, coupled with the tendency, which so often discovered itself in Israel, to resort to heights for the purpose of offering it, it would seem that some instinctive feeling in men's bosoms led them to associate sacrifice with an elevated position, as the fittest theatre for its presentation, and that something of that description, if not naturally provided, should be artificially constructed. It is probable that this feeling arose from the idea of the local habitation of deity being in the heavens above; whence sacrifice on a height seemed in closer contact with the object of worship, or the mind more readily followed it to its proper destination. In the pure worship of Jehovah, who ever represented himself as the God of the whole earth, and present with his people wherever they might perform acceptable service, we could not expect much regard to be paid to thoughts and feelings of that nature; indeed, they are plainly discouraged, as inevitably tending to superstition and idolatry. Nor was any encouragement ever given to the use of costly materials or elaborate workmanship in the construction of altars. In this respect, there was the reverse of uniformity in the altars of heathen antiquity: they existed in a great diversity of forms, rising from the rudest style of art to the most ornate, and constructed sometimes of the commonest, sometimes of the costliest materials. Those here exhibited from some of the older nations of the world, are evidently specimens of comparatively simple structure.

stones which were found upon the spot; but those erected for regular service, in connection with some statue or temple, were usually constructed of brick or of stone—occasionally in a square, but more commonly, at least among the Greeks and Romans, in a round form, and very often adorned with sculpture of the most tasteful and elaborate description, while others appeared without any ornament whatever. have been preserved of both kinds, as those in No. 31, of the square form—one quite simple, another more ornate, and a third highly decorated; others are given in No. 32, and are at once round and ornate.

We have no description of the altar which was seen by King Ahaz at Damascus, with the beauty of which he was so struck that he obtained a pattern of it, and caused Urijah the priest to have one made at Jerusalem, "after the fashion of it, and according to all the workmanship thereof," 2 Ki. xvi. 10. But it probably did not differ materially from some of those here exhibited; though it must have been greatly more attractive in form and appearance than that hitherto standing in the court of the temple at Jerusalem, for Ahaz to have taken the strong step of removing the latter from its wonted place, and on his own authority substituting another in its stead. The Lord had himself prescribed the form of the altar on which he wished his people to present their offerings; and it was an evidence of a presumptuous spirit on the part of Ahaz—a fruit, indeed, of that vacillating, temporizing, and superstitious policy which characterized his whole procedure—to introduce such an innovation in worship, and stamp on the very altar of Jehovah the impress of heathenism. No wonder that a mark of reprobation is set upon him when pursuing such courses; and so it is said, with emphasis, "This is that King Ahaz," 2 Ch. xxxviii. 22.

It does not appear that any particular form of altar had been delivered to the true worshippers of God down to the period of the giving of the law; and, as far as can be gathered from the records of the patriarchal religion, the simplest structures seem to have been deemed sufficient. But, at the institution of the tabernacle worship, specific instructions were given for the erection of the altar, or, as we may rather say, of the two altars; for two structures under that name were recognized in the furniture of the tabernacle—the altar of burnt-offering and the altar of incense. It was the former of these, however, that was emphatically called the altar, as it was on it that all sacrifices of blood were presented, while the other was simply placed as a stand or table within the tabernacle for the officiating priest to use in connection with the pot of incense. In regard to this altar, prior to any instructions concerning the erection of the tabernacle, and immediately after the delivery of the ten commandments from Sinai, the following specific directions were given:—"An altar of earth shalt thou make unto me, and shalt sacrifice thereon thy burnt-offerings," &c.; "And if thou wilt make me an altar of stone, thou shalt not build it of hewn stone; for if thou lift up thy tool upon it, thou hast polluted it. Neither shalt thou go up by steps unto mine altar, that thy nakedness be not discovered thereon," Ex. xx. 24-26. There is here an evident repudiation of all pomp and ornament in connection with this altar of burnt-offering—the preferable material to be used in it being earth, or, if stone, yet stone unhewn, and consequently not graven by art or man's device. The reason of this cannot be sought in any general dislike to the costly and ornamental in divine worship; for, in the structure of the tabernacle itself, and, still more, afterwards in the erection of the temple, both the richest materials and the most skilful artificers were employed. It is rather to be sought in the general purport and design of the altar, which was such as to consist best with the simplest form, and materials of the plainest description; for it was peculiarly the monument and remembrancer of man's sin—the special meeting-place between God and his creatures, as sinful; on which account it must be perpetually receiving the blood of slain victims, since the way to fellowship with God for guilty beings could only be found through an avenue of death. And because the altar must thus be ever bearing on it the blood-stained memorials and fruits of sin, "what so suitable for the material of which it should be formed as the mother-dust of earth, or earth's rough, unpolished stones, taken just as God and nature provided them? For thus the worshippers might most easily discern the appointed place of meeting to be of God's providing, and His in such a sense that no art or device of theirs could be of any avail to fit it for the high end it was intended to serve; nay, that their workmanship, being that of sinful creatures, must tend rather to pollute than to consecrate and enhance the medium of reconciliation. Materials directly fashioned by the hand of God were the most suitable here; nor these of the more rare and costly descriptions, but the simple earth, made originally for man's support and nourishment, and now become the witness of his sin, the drinker-in of his forfeited life, the theatre and home of death."—(Typology, ii. p. 286.)

In the directions afterwards given, Ex. xxvii. 1-8, for the construction of the altar that was to be placed in the outer court of the tabernacle, it may seem strange that no explicit mention is made either of earth or of stone. It was to be made of boards of shittim or acacia wood, overlaid with brass, to be in form a square of 5 cubits, or about 8 feet; in height 3 cubits, or somewhere about 5 feet, and with projecting points or horns at each of the four corners. It was to be made "hollow with boards," and Jewish writers have held, apparently with reason, that this hollow space between the boards priest, a mere ledge or projecting border on the side would be quite sufficient, with a gentle incline towards it formed of earth or of stones. This seems really to have been provided by the original construction of the altar, according to the now commonly received interpretation of Ex. xxvii. 4, 5, where it is said, "And thou shalt make for it (the altar) a grate of network of brass; and upon the net shalt thou make four brazen rings in the four corners thereof. And thou shalt put it under the carcob (circuit or border, as the word seems to mean) of the altar beneath, that the net may be even to the midst of the altar." That is, as V. Meyer has, we believe, correctly explained it (Bibeldeutungen, p. 201), there was to be a sort of terrace or projecting board half-way up the altar and compassing it about, on which the priests might stand, or articles connected with the offerings might be laid, and this was to be supported by a grating of brass underneath, of net-like construction, as exhibited in No. 33.

This pattern probably approaches nearer than any other that has been presented to the altar originally was to be filled with earth or stones when the altar was fixed in a particular place; so that the original direction applied also to it, and the boards might be regarded as having their chief use in holding the earth or stones together, and supporting the fire-place, with the fuel and the sacrifice. Having an elevation of no more than 4½ or 5 feet, no steps could be required for the officiating formed to accompany the tabernacle. The older, and still very prevalent idea of its structure, differed chiefly in regard to the network of brass, which it regarded as the grating for the fire, and furnished with four rings that it might be sunk down within the boards and at some distance from them, as exhibited, for example, in No. 34, taken from Witsius, and often reproduced with little variation. The chief objection to this form is, that it places the network of brass near the top and within the boards, instead of being, as the description seems to require, from the ground upwards to the middle, and consequently without—a support, in short, for the projecting carcob, not for the fire and the sacrifice. The things connected with the fire are not minutely described, but are included in the enumeration given at ver. 3, "And thou shalt make his pans to receive his ashes, and his shovels, and his basons, and his flesh-hooks, and his fire-pans; all the vessels thereof thou shalt make of brass." The probability is that there was no grating upon the top, but simply the pans for fire and ashes resting upon stone or earth within the boards, and which might thus be easily scraped, or removed for cleansing, as occasion required. In the last figure, the four corners are made to assume a crooked or horn-like shape; and in that respect, perhaps, it differs to the better from the former, which, in other respects, we deem greatly the best. It is possible, indeed, that the projecting corners might have been called horns without actually having the crooked shape of a horn; they might have been called such simply as abrupt and pointed projections. But, on the other hand, Josephus in his description of the altar connected with the Herodian temple (to be quoted presently), distinctly indicates the horn-like appearance of the corners; and the prominence given to them, not only at the erection of the altar, but also in the more important sacrifices, in which they were uniformly touched with the blood, Ex. xxix. 12; Le. iv. 7, &c., seems most easily explained by a reference to the idea which the name in its natural meaning suggests. In Scripture a horn is constantly used as a symbol of power and prevailing might; and the culminating points of the altar, where God revealed himself in mercy to inquiring sinners, might fitly be made to assume the appearance of horns, not merely for ornament, but, along with that, for the purpose of symbolizing the strength and security of the divine protection which was extended to those who came to share in its provisions. Hence, to lay hold on the horns of the altar was but another name for grasping at the power and protection of Deity.

In the arrangements made for adapting the instruments of worship to the larger proportions of the temple, the altar of burnt-offering necessarily partook of the general character of the change. It became now a square of 20 cubits (from 30 to 35 feet), instead of 5, and was raised to the height of 10 cubits; it was made also entirely of brass, but in other respects it was probably much the same. And the altar attached to the temple of Herod, we learn from Josephus, again greatly exceeded in its dimensions that of the temple of Solomon. "Before the temple," says he (Wars, v. 5, 6), "stood the altar, 15 cubits high, and equal in length and breadth, being each way 50 cubits. It was built in the figure of a square, and it had corners like horns (literally, jutting up into horn-shaped corners—κερατοειδῆς προερέχων γωνίας), and the passage up to it was by an insensible acclivity." This was, no doubt, with the view of meeting the requirement in Ex. xx. 26; and in like manner, for the purpose of complying with the instruction to avoid any hewn work, it was, we are told, "formed without any iron tool, nor was it ever so much as touched by such iron tool." In this latter statement the Mishna agrees with Josephus; but it differs materially as to the dimensions, making the base only a square of 32 cubits and the top of 26; so that it is impossible to pronounce with certainty upon the exact measurement. But there can be little doubt it was considerably larger than Solomon's, as it was a leading part of Herod's ambition, in his costly reparation of the temple, to make all its external proportions superior to that which had preceded. And it had, we are informed, what must also in some form have belonged to the altar of the first temple, a pipe connected with the south-west horn, for conveying away the blood of the sacrifices. This discharged itself by a subterranean passage into the brook Kedron.

It was a marked peculiarity in the religion of the Old Testament, and bespoke an essential difference betwixt it and the religions of heathendom, that it not only prescribed so definitely the form of the altar to be used in sacrifice, but allowed only of the erection of one such altar. On special occasions, such as the dedication of Solomon's temple, when the one altar proved insufficient for the numerous offerings that were presented, the circumstances were justly deemed sufficient to warrant the temporary consecration and use of another, 1 KI. viii. 64. And in times of general backsliding and disorder, such as occurred in the life of Samuel, when the tabernacle itself had fallen asunder, and still more in that of Elijah, when the very foundations were out of course—a certain freedom was required, and used also by prophetic men who strove against the evil of the times, in respect to the employment of occasional altars for the service of God. But these were seasons of emergency, and as such, exceptions to the general rule. In ordinary cases the offering of sacrifice even to the true God, and without any intermixture of superstitious rites, elsewhere than at the one altar of burnt-offering, is always marked as a relative defection from the pure worship of Jehovah; and this, no doubt, chiefly because of its tendency to mar the idea of the divine unity, and lead to the introduction of other gods. There might seem, at first thought, to be no necessary connection between the two; the one God of Israel might have been worshipped, it may be imagined, as well at a thousand altars in the land of Canaan as He is now in a thousand churches of Christendom. So, doubtless, He might; the freedom granted to the patriarchs in the erection of altars, and the divine acceptance which crowned their worship, is undoubted evidence of its possibility. But the tendency was all in the other direction; for the spirit of heathenism was the deification of nature in its varied aspects, and even separate localities; and during the ages when that spirit acted like a moral contagion, the most effectual way of checking its influence was to concentrate the greater rites of worship into a single spot—to stamp upon the national mind the idea of one God, by the palpable and ever-abiding fact of His one temple and one altar. Once let in such a multiplicity of shrines as heathendom boasted of possessing, and its multiplicity of gods would have followed as an infallible sequence. Therefore, while it certainly was a restraint upon the spirit in regard to fellowship with Heaven—a restraint which persons of ardent piety could scarcely help at times longing to have removed—it was still, upon the whole, better than such liberty as was sure to degenerate into license. And the restraint itself was greatly lightened to earnest and reflecting minds: it was even turned into an occasion of elevating their views concerning God, and raising their spirits to more habitual commerce with Heaven, by the consideration, which was grounded in the very nature of the Levitical institution, that every believing Israelite, wherever he might be, had his representation in the priesthood that daily ministered at the one altar, and an interest in the morning and evening sacrifice which was there perpetually proceeding. Infinitely better than the possession of many tutelary deities, with their local altars, was for him the thought, that the praise and worship of the whole covenant-people was ever waiting for God in Zion, and that from Zion this God ruled to the very ends of the earth.

In regard to the typical import of the altar of burnt-offering, or its bearing on Christian times, it should undoubtedly be viewed in its totality, and not, as was the custom with the elder typologists, considered piecemeal, that in every individual part a separate and diverse representation may be found of the person or work of Christ. It is easy, in such a way, to find a great variety of resemblances between the old and the new; to see, for example, in the materials of the altar, a prefiguration of the humanity of Christ—in the horn, of his divinity—in the hollowness between the boards, of his emptying himself of heavenly glory, and so on. But such resemblances are of little worth, being quite superficial in their nature, and obtained in too much isolation from the one grand aim of the altar. What we have primarily to ascertain, and mainly to found upon, is the leading design, with which the altar was set up in connection with the symbolical religion of the old covenant. In that respect it formed the appointed medium of communication between a holy God and sinful man; its materials, its structure, the sacrifices of blood presented on it, were all adjusted with a view to its proper adaptation to this end; and in the great idea which it thus embodied, we readily discover a fundamental agreement with the character and mission of Christ. In him now is found the appointed medium of intercourse between the sinner and God; through him, but through him alone, can the sinner's guilt be atoned, and his services of faith and love rise with acceptance to the Father; so that what purposes the altar served to the Old Testament worshipper, the same, and in a far higher manner, does Christ serve to the believer in the gospel; and the oneness of the appointed medium of sacrificial worship in former times, has now also its counterpart in the one name given under heaven whereby we can be saved. All this implies, no doubt, the union of the divine and human in the person of Christ, his humiliation from the highest to the lowest condition, his vicarious intercession, and much besides; but pre-indications of such specific points in the Christian scheme are to be sought in other parts of the Tabernacle worship, rather than in the altar itself, which forms the common basis and portal of them all. (See TYPES, TYPOLOGY.)

2. ALTAR OF INCENSE, another instrument of worship, bearing the same general name of altar, differed materially, both in its structure and in its use, from that already noticed. In form it presented the appearance of a square-like box, standing erect, 2 cubits or 3½ feet in height, with a top 21 inches square, surrounded with a crown of gold, and formed of boards all covered with gold. At the four corners it had also what were called horns, Ex. xxx. 3. (The supposed form of this altar is represented, No. 35). It could not be strictly termed an altar, in the sense of misdeach (sacrificing place), for it was not for the presentation of slain victims, but was merely a bearer or stand for the incense-pot within the tabernacle. It stood, however, in a very close connection with the altar of burnt-offering, and on that account, probably, had the same general name applied to it; for the pot or censer which was to stand on it was every morning and evening to be taken by the officiating priest, and replenished first with live coals from the altar of burnt-offering, and then with a handful of sweet spices or incense.

This done, it was to be placed on the altar of incense, which stood in the sanctuary, immediately before the veil, causing to ascend, as it is said, Ex. xxx. 8, "a perpetual incense before the Lord throughout their generations." This perpetual incense, rising within the tabernacle, thus formed a sort of accompaniment to the burnt-offering perpetually ascending without; one fire slowly consumed both; and any fire employed to raise the cloud of incense in the sanctuary, except what had been taken from the altar of burnt-offering, was designated strange fire, rendering the incense produced by it an unhallowed offering. It was for this offence that Nadab and Abihu were visited with the stroke of death, Le. x. 1, seq., because attempting to break the link that connected the offering of incense with the altar of burnt-offering. And still farther, to indicate the connection between the two altars and their respective offerings on the great day of atonement, the horns of the altar of incense—the altar, as it is called, before the Lord, i.e. in front of the most holy place, Le. xvi. 18, 19, were to be sprinkled with the blood of atonement, as well as the mercy-seat. All clearly and distinctly imported that this altar, and the incense appointed to be ever ascending from it, were, in a manner, nothing, except as connected with and based upon that altar, in the stricter sense, on which sacrifices of blood were continually presented, and the fire was kept perpetually alive that had been sent down from above.

The mere circumstance of this altar being placed within the sanctuary, and directly in front of the mercy-seat, implied that the offering presented on it had to do with the more inward part of religion, and bore rather upon the soul's habitual intercourse with God, than its first initiation into his service. The same impression, also, is conveyed by the richer and more ornate appearance it presented—its coating and crown of gold, as if signs of honour, not of humiliation, were becoming in connection with the service to which it was specially appropriated. These impressions are confirmed, when we look to the service itself—the continual presentation of incense before the throne of God; for of what was this a symbol but of acceptable, believing prayer? So Old Testament worshippers themselves understood; as we learn from the Psalmist, when he entreats that his prayer might be set before God as incense (literally, "Let my prayer, incense, be set before thee," Ps. cxlii. 2), and from the action noticed in Luke i. 10, in which the people are reported to have continued praying without, while Zecharias was offering incense within the temple—doing for themselves in the reality what he was doing for all the people in symbol. Hence, too, in Rev. v. 8, viii. 3, 4, the frankincense or sweet odours offered by the angel on the golden altar, are expressly called "the prayers of saints." Was it not a most fitting emblem of prayer in its truest and largest sense, as the child-like outpouring of the heart's feelings and desires toward its heavenly Father? Like the fragrance of the sweetest spices, these are the expression of the spirit of life which, through Divine grace, has come to live and breathe in the children of faith; and not less grateful than the one to the natural sense of man, is the other to the heart of God. But to be this it must be the genuine breathing of a true spirit of life—nor only so, but this life kindled as with live coals from the altar of sacrifice—drawing alike its vitality and its fragrance from believing contact with the one great medium of atonement and intercession. In that altar of incense, therefore, together with the place and order of service appointed for it, there is a solemn and instructive lesson for the church of every age, showing how prayer must be, as it were, the daily breath of the believing soul, must be ever ascending from those who spiritually dwell in the house of God; and that to get and to maintain it in real efficacy, there must be an incessant repairing to the one great act of sacrifice, which has been presented through the blood of Christ.

Altars, in the modern sense, as part of the furniture in certain Christian churches, do not come into consideration here; since, at whatever precise period introduced, they are certainly subsequent to the Christian era, and have nothing properly to countenance them in the writings of the New Testament. For the altar spoken of in He. xiii. 10, of which Christians have a right to eat, as contradistinguished from those who served the tabernacle, is manifestly Christ himself—Christ considered as the spiritual food and nourishment of the soul, and so placed in contrast with the fleshly and outward ordinances to which the adherents of Judaism still cling.

AM'ALEK [supposed to be derived from am, people, and liqak, to lick up], occurs only once as the name of an individual; it is in the genealogy of Esau's offspring, at Ge. xxxvi. 16, where Timna, the concubine of Eliphaz, Esau's son, is said to have borne him a son, Amalek. Certain traditions, however, have been raked up from among the Arabians, which point to an earlier Amalek, of the fifth generation from Noah, and who is supposed to have been the founder of a tribe of Amalekites, that made some figure in very remote antiquity; and are also, it is alleged, referred to in a few passages of Scripture. Though Gesenius, however, with Le Clerc, Michaelis, and several other men of eminent learning, have adopted this view, there seems no solid foundation for it so far as Scripture is concerned; and it calls for no farther consideration here.

AMALEKITES, an ancient nomadic tribe, who are found at various points in Arabia Petrea, ranging from the south of Palestine to the neighbourhood of Sinai. The notions formed of them in Scripture are somewhat embarrassing; but are still, when carefully considered, perfectly compatible with the idea of their being the offspring of the grandson of Esau—if only it is supposed (what involves no improbability), that while they belonged to the common stock of the Edomites, they formed to some extent a tribe by themselves, and consequently sometimes acted in concert with the other Edomites, and sometimes appeared as occupying an independent position and territory of their own. But in the several notices given of them, they appear in close connection with the Edomite territory; and, though found in different quarters, like other tribes of predatory habits, the western parts of Mount Seir seem to have furnished their more regular haunts.

A very early notice occurs of them in Ge. xiv. 7, in connection with the invasion of Chedorlaomer, and the kings who were confederate with him, which has been held by the authorities just referred to, to imply their existence as a people even in the time of Abraham. It is there said of the marauding host, that "they returned and came to Enmishpat, which is Kadesh, and smote all the country of the Amalekites, and also the Amorites, that dwelt in Hazezon-tamar." But a marked distinction is to be noted here between the Amalekites and the other tribes specified; it is only the country of the Amalekites that is said to have been smitten, while in regard to the Amorites and the various tribes mentioned in ver. 5, 6, who had suffered in the southward march of the invaders, it is the people themselves that were smitten. This cannot be regarded as accidental: it is plainly intended to fix attention only on the tract of country which was afterwards known as that occupied by the Amalekites; and it is denominated from them rather than from those who originally possessed it, merely because it could thereby, in the time of the Israelites, be more readily identified. This is the more probable as, in respect to the place mentioned immediately before, the later designation is given as well as the earlier, and given first: Enmishpat (well of judgment), which is Kadesh—its proper name being Kadesh, but Enmishpat came also to be given to it, on account of the judgment afterwards inflicted there upon Moses and Aaron, Nu. xx. 1-13. Nor is there any great difficulty in another passage, which has also been urged as indicating the extreme antiquity of the Amalekites as a people. It is where Balaam, looking upon Amalek, took up his parable concerning them, and said, "Amalek, the first of the nations, but his latter end shall be that he perish for ever," Nu. xxiv. 20. The question here is, in what sense are they designated the first?—absolutely, or relatively to the point of view of the speaker? The latter is clearly the most natural supposition, especially when the concluding part of the announcement is taken into account, that they are destined to perish for ever. Why? Because, like Moab and the other tribes spoken of in the context, they took up the position of enemies against the people of God. For this their latter end was to become one, not of strength and glory, but of extinction; and the natural inference therefore is, that when they are mentioned as having been the first, it is not priority of existence as a people that is meant, but priority in that enmity which formed their most marked characteristic, and which was to prove the cause of their ruin. They had taken the lead in opposition to God's cause and people, and, as examples of the divine lex talionis, a pre-eminence was also to be appointed them in judgment—utter extinction was to be their lot. This is the view that best accords with the connection, and with the whole style of Balaam's prophecies; and it is that which ancient Jewish and Christian interpreters put upon it. Thus the paraphrase of Onkelos, on the first of the nations, is "the beginning of the wars of Israel;" Jonathan, and the note of the Jerusalem Targum have, "the first of the peoples who waged war against the house of Israel." And, in like manner, Jerome explains, "the first of the nations who attacked the Israelites."

However Balaam may have learned the facts of Israel's history, there can be no doubt that he had obtained a considerable acquaintance with them; and in this deliverance upon Amalek he points to the part which Amalek had taken after Israel had escaped from the bondage of Egypt, and were marching as a people to occupy the place that had been destined for them. When they were still only at Rephidim, one of their earliest encampments, the Amalekites gathered their forces together, and came forth to attack them, Ex. xvii. 8, seq. That the attack was made in a very bitter spirit, and aimed at nothing less than the defeating of God's purposes by the virtual destruction of his peculiar people, is evident from what is said by the Lord to Moses, after the assailants had been discomfited by Joshua, "Write this for a memorial in a book, and rehearse it in the ears of Joshua; for I will utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek under heaven;" and also from what Moses himself said in respect to the altar he raised on the occasion—"He called it Jehovah-nisi (Jehovah my banner), for he said, Because the hand—viz., of Amalek—was upon the banner of the Lord (so it should be rendered), the Lord will have war with Amalek from generation to generation." Acquainted, from his relationship to Esau, with the peculiar promises made to the seed of Jacob, but with the Esau-like spirit of envy in its rankest form, Amalek sought, at what seemed a favourable juncture, to lay his hand, as it were, on the throne of God, and destroy the people whom God had specially pledged his word to protect and bless—yea, whom he had just most signally honoured by the miraculous passage through the Red Sea, and the destruction of the host of Pharaoh. Therefore, divine retribution in its severest form must overtake him; Amalek, as a nation, must perish from the face of the earth.

The conduct of Amalek on the occasion referred to, and the purpose of God respecting it, were not lost sight of; both were again called into remembrance in one of the concluding addresses of Moses. While the dying legislator bequeathed a legacy of kindness for the Edomites generally, and for the Egyptians, notwithstanding all the wrongs that had been suffered at their hands ("Thou shalt not abhor an Edomite, for he is thy brother; thou shalt not abhor an Egyptian, because thou wast a stranger in his land"), De. xliii. 7, he said respecting Amalek, "Remember what Amalek did unto thee by the way, when ye were come forth out of Egypt; how he met thee by the way, and smote the hindmost of thee, all that were feeble behind thee, when thou wast faint and weary; and he feared not God. Therefore, it shall be, when the Lord thy God hath given thee rest from all thine enemies round about, in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee for an inheritance to possess it, that thou shalt blot out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven," De. xxv. 17-19. The peculiar guilt and malice of the Amalekites, it will be observed, forms the ground of this charge for their extermination. In their treatment of Israel they had not only evinced a spirit of bitterest spite, and gone out of their way to make a cruel and unprovoked attack, but had also cast off the fear of God, whom they had sufficient means of knowing; and hence—though only, of course, on the supposition that the same spirit should continue to animate them as a people—the Lord took Israel bound to make them monuments of the righteous judgment of Heaven. Too clear evidences were given of the continuance of such a spirit; for they appear to have continually hung on the march of the Israelites, and joined with the Canaanites in the first encounter with the Israelites on the borders of Canaan, Nu. xiv. 42-45; and after the people were settled in the land, they made incursions, along with the Midianites and the children of the East, destroying, on the southern portions of the land, the increase of the earth, and leaving it behind them little better than a desert. Ju. vi. 3; vii. 12. At that time they sustained a great defeat through Gideon, and for a considerable period are no more heard of. But that they still retained their former enmity, and only watched their opportunity, may be certainly inferred from what we otherwise know of them, and especially from the notice given in connection with the earlier victories of Saul, in which, after mentioning what he did against the Philistines, Moab, Ammon, Edom, and the kings of Zobah, it is added, "And he gathered an host, and smote the Amalekites, and delivered Israel out of the hands of them that spoiled them," 1 Sa. xiv. 48. Then came the special charge of Samuel to Saul to go and utterly destroy Amalek, 1 Sa. xv. 3, grounded formally on what Amalek had done to Israel at his departure from Egypt, but on that, it must be remembered, as sanctioned and endorsed by the successive generations of the tribe, who had always showed themselves ready to join hands with whatever adversary might rise up against Israel. The hostility of such a people was evidently of a kind that could not be conciliated; it could be mastered only by the people themselves being destroyed; and such now was the commission delivered into the hands of Saul. He failed to execute it so fully as he should have done; yet their power as a separate people was from that time completely broken; and the predatory incursions they made upon the south of Judah in the time of David, with the retaliations he practised upon them, were but as the smoking tail of an expiring firebrand, 1 Sa. xxx. For henceforth they disappear from the field of history, with the exception of a small remnant somewhere on Mount Seir, who are simply mentioned as being put to the rout in Hezekiah's time by certain of the tribe of Simeon, and finally despoiled of their territory, 1 Ch. iv. 42, 43. So that the Word of God here also stood fast; and the first of the surrounding tribes who impiously sought to measure their strength with the cause and people of God were likewise the first to lose their national existence.

In an earlier article, AGAG, we had occasion to show that this name was rather indicative of the royal dignity of the chief of the Amalekites, than the designation of any individual possessor of the throne. It was used in a similar manner to Pharaoh among the Egyptians, and Abimelech among the Philistines; and was itself expressive of the fierce and warlike character which was cultivated alike by prince and people. AMANA [confirmation], mentioned as a mountain-top in Canticles iv. 8, apparently one of the Lebanon range, and supposed by some also to be the same with the river Abana, 2 Ki. v. 12. Possibly the mountain may have been that from which the river derived both its source and its name. But this is matter merely of conjecture.

AMARIAH [spoken of by Jehovah], the name of a great number of persons, none of whom, however, attained to eminence, 1 Ch. vi. 7; vii. 62; xliii. 19, &c.

AMASA [burden], 1. A son of Ithra, or Jether, by Abigail, the sister of Zeruiah, and consequently cousin of Joab, but apparently an illegitimate son, as it is not said that Abigail was the wife of Ithra, but merely that he went in unto her, and she bore him Amasa, 2 Sa. xvii. 26. In the passage just referred to the father is called Ithra an Israelite, while in 1 Ch. ii. 17 he is designated Jether the Ishmaelite. Various explanations have been given of this discrepancy; and among later critics the tendency seems to be to regard the text in Samuel as a corruption; not only because it differs from the reading in 1 Chronicles, but because, on the supposition of the father having been an Israelite, there would have been no occasion for mentioning it. He was, in that case, one of her own people; but if, on the other hand, he was an Ishmaelite, this was so peculiar a circumstance that it naturally called for remark. It is not improbable that this solution may be the correct one; yet it is also possible that the name of Israelite may have been applied to him as indicating that he merely belonged in general to the covenant people, not to the tribe of Judah in particular; and his being also called an

Ishmaelite may denote, what the word sometimes indicates, Ju viii. 24, that he followed the customs and manners of the Ishmaelites. Though he was an Israelite by birth, he was an Arab by his mode of life; and so, his Israelitish birth might on this account also require to be noted. Anyhow, it is clear there was something irregular and unhappy in Amasa's parentage and birth. And one can easily understand how this may have led to some estrangement between him and his mother's kindred, and how, in the distractions that arose in the kingdom, Amasa should have been found to espouse the opposite side from that which was headed by David and the sons of Zeruiah. No mention is made of him in the earlier struggles and conflicts of David's life; and, even after David came to the throne, it is only with the outbreak of Absalom's rebellion that he rises into notice, and then as appointed by Absalom to the chief command of his army. Absalom would not have thought of setting Amasa so high in office unless he had been already known as a man of superior energy and valour; nor is it likely he could have got him to accept of the appointment unless there had been some secret grudge in his bosom—a conviction of his merits having been overlooked, or his person treated with disregard, by David and those about him. To David himself it must have been an affecting thought, that, while a son headed the rebellion, a nephew was placed over the forces by which it was hoped to carry the project into effect, and lay at once the life and the empire of David in the dust. It is possible, too, that some conviction of wrong, or at least of ungenerous behaviour towards Amasa, may have had its share in the motives that prompted David, after the army of the rebels had been overthrown, to hold out proposals of honour and advancement to his nephew. He then at last recognized Amasa as his kinsman, and sent to him the gracious message, "Art thou not of my bone and of my flesh? God do so to me, and more also, if thou be not captain of the host before me continually, in the room of Joab," 2 Sa. xix. 13. This, however, was a rush to the opposite extreme; for, whatever reasons there might be to dispose the king to supersede Joab in the chief command, certainly Amasa, fresh from the crime of an active participation in the rebellion, which had shaken the kingdom of David to its very foundation, was not the man to take his place. Joab had indeed sinned against the king's command regarding Absalom, and had sorely lacerated the parent's heart by violently terminating the guilty career of the son. It was when still smarting under this severe wound that David sent such proposals of advancement to Amasa; so that a sense of injury sustained at the hand of Joab, as well as, it may be, a consciousness of former injury or neglect shown to Amasa, tended to produce this recoil in the heart of the king. But Joab proved again too strong for his master; he saw the adverse turn which affairs were beginning to take; and when Sheba's rebellion broke out, and Amasa, who had been sent to quell it, was slower in his movements than was expected, Joab seized the opportunity, when suspicions were entertained of his faithfulness or energy, and Amasa himself was off his guard, to thrust a dagger into his heart, 2 Sa. xx. 5-10. On Joab's part, doubtless, it was a most unprincipled and cruel act, and could not but call forth at the time the mournful lamentation of David, as it afterwards received at the hands of Solomon its meet retribution. Yet, as regards Amasa himself, when we think of the countenance he had given to the wicked rebellion of Absalom, and the impious attempt he had made to cast to the ground the crown set by God himself on the head of David, it were hard to say, without other evidence of godly sorrow and repentance than is found in the sacred narrative, that Amasa deserved a better fate. Thousands of lives had been sacrificed through that treachery and revolt which he abetted; and unless deep contrition had penetrated his soul, condign punishment, rather than the most marked promotion, was the kind of treatment he had reason to expect. Still, if such punishment was to have been awarded, it should have been administered in another manner, and inflicted by a different hand.

2. AMASA, the name of an Ephraimite chief, who earnestly urged the dismissal of the prisoners whom Pekah, king of Israel, had brought captive from Judah, 2 Ch. xxviii. 12.

AMAS'AI, probably a variation of the name Amasa. It is used of at least four different persons, but of whom nothing very particular is known, 1 Ch. xii. 18; vi. 25; xv. 24; 2 Ch. xxxix. 12.

AMAZIAH [strengthened of the Lord], 1. The name of one of the kings of Judah—the son of Joash. He reigned twenty-five years, from about B.C. 838 to 809. His reign was of a very mixed description, both as to the measures pursued under it and the results with which they were attended. His first step of a public nature was to punish those who had conspired and murdered his father; and in this part of his procedure he is commended for his justice, as taking vengeance only upon the guilty, and sparing their children, who had no participation in the crime. When he found himself firmly seated upon the throne, he set about reducing the Edomites to obedience; for during the miserable administration of Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat, these had cast off their allegiance to Judah, and had doubtless often been renewing their predatory incursions into the Jewish territory. So feeble, however, had the kingdom of Judah become, that Amaziah was afraid to venture on this undertaking with such forces as he could raise among his own people; and he hired with an hundred talents of silver an hundred thousand troops from the king of Israel. It is the first instance on record of a strictly mercenary army employed by the covenant people. And it was in itself a false step; for it necessarily brought the kingdom of Judah into a dangerous alliance with the corrupt court of Israel, and placed the one in a kind of dependence upon the other. A prophet, therefore, remonstrated against it, forewarned Amaziah of the certain withdrawal of the divine favour if he leaned upon such auxiliaries, and assured him of success if he put his trust in God, and went forward with the resources which were more properly his own. In compliance with this counsel, he dismissed the Israelitish troops, who were greatly offended at the treatment they met with, and revenged themselves by spreading havoc and desolation through various cities on their way back. Amaziah, however, succeeded in his expedition: the Edomites were defeated in a great battle in the valley of Salt, with the loss altogether of twenty thousand men; and their chief city, Selah (or Petra), was taken and garrisoned by Jewish soldiers. But while on the field of battle he prevailed, he was himself conquered by the idolatry of Edom. At the very time when the God of his fathers had given him a distinguishing token of his favour and efficient help, he fell off from his allegiance, and did service to the gods of his prostrate enemies. It was a display of weakness and inconstancy which it is difficult to account for, unless it were from the false policy—of which too many examples have been given in later times—of seeking to conciliate the conquered to his sway by paying homage to their superstitions. On this second, and still worse defection from the right path, a prophet again came to him with the word of admonition, reproving him for the palpable folly of “seeking after gods, which could not deliver their own people out of his hand.” But Amaziah, elated with success, and confident of the wisdom of his policy, refused now to listen to the friendly monitor who spake to him—even threatened him with chastisement if he should persist in his remonstrances; and was left to know in bitter experience the truth of the proverb, that “He who hardeneth his heart shall fall into mischief.” Such, the dishonoured prophet assured him, would be the case. “He knew,” he said, “that God had determined to destroy him, because he had not hearkened to the counsel given him.” And so it proved; for, in the pride of his heart, Amaziah sent a challenge to Joash, the king of Israel, the ground of which is not stated, though it probably arose out of the exasperation produced by Amaziah’s treatment of the forces he had hired from Joash, and the disorders that followed. Joash, however, was rather disinclined to enter into direct conflict with Judah, and, by a parable, endeavoured to dissuade Amaziah from his purpose: but in vain. The king of Judah was bent on measuring his strength with the king of Israel; and, doing so without any just cause, and in defiance of the counsel of Heaven, he was smitten before his adversary, and was carried by Joash in triumph into his own city, Jerusalem. Amaziah had his life spared; for Joash was satisfied with having thoroughly humbled him, and returned from Jerusalem with much treasure and a number of hostages. But the kingdom never recovered, in Amaziah’s time, the blow thus inflicted upon it; and he himself at last fell, like his father, a victim to a conspiracy formed against his life. He appears to have got notice of it in time to flee to Lachish; but the conspirators followed him thither, and despatched him. He was buried in Jerusalem: 2 Kt. xiv., 2 Ch. xxiv.

2. AMAZIAH, a priest in the house of the golden calf at Bethel, in the time of Jeroboam II. The only thing besides recorded of him is the offence he took at the reproofs and predictions of the prophet Amos, whom he would fain have silenced, or remanded to his native country, as one spreading disaffection against the king’s government. The interference of Amaziah only drew from the prophet a fresh rebuke, and a solemn denunciation of coming judgment upon him, and upon the whole people of Israel, Am. vii. 10. 17.

AMBASSADOR, a person formally deputed by a king or state to carry some message of importance, or transact some official business in the name of the party he represents. From the comparatively isolated position of ancient Israel, and the relation in which they stood to the surrounding countries, the employment of ambassadors could not be a stated or even very frequent practice; but circumstances did occasionally arise which led to its adoption, as when David sent ambassadors to Hanun, king of the Amorites, to congratulate him on his ascension to the throne, and Hiram for a like purpose sent them to Solomon, 2 Sa. x. 2; 1 Kt. v. 1. Sometimes they were sent both from and to the kings of Israel and Judah, on more questionable errands—for conducting negotiations that should not have been entered into; but, for whatever purpose sent, it always was the part of an ambassador to personate the authority he represented, and the reception given or withheld from him was necessarily regarded as virtually given or withheld in respect to the party whose representative he was.

The word occurs but once in New Testament scripture, 2 Co. v. 20, and is there employed by the apostle Paul to designate the nature and dignity of the office exercised by him and all properly qualified preachers of the gospel. They are ambassadors for Christ, in his stead and on God’s behalf, beseeching all men to be reconciled to God. It presents a striking view of the importance and dignity of an evangelical ministry, and should have its effect in imparting gravity, seriousness, and fidelity to those who exercise it, as well as awakening earnest consideration and ready acquiescence from those among whom it is exercised.

AMBER. See CHARNIL.

AMEN, a Hebrew word, transferred first to the Greek, then to the Latin, whence it has passed into most modern languages. Commonly it is regarded as primarily an adjective, signifying firm, faithful, sure, as when used by the glorified Redeemer in Re. iii. 14, where he styles himself “the Amen, the faithful and true witness.” But even here it may be quite fitly taken as an adverb in the sense of verily; as also in Is. lxv. 16, where it is employed as an epithet, the God of the verily. The verily, He who is absolutely and emphatically such, as Hengstenberg has justly remarked, “is He who in all he says, whether in disclosing the depths of the heart, or in giving forth threatenings and promises, can always add with the fullest right the verily; while, in regard to everything that a short-sighted man may speak, there constantly goes along with it a mark of interrogation, and the more so, indeed, the more confidently he speaks.” Hence, it is very frequently used by our Lord, especially in connection with those utterances which referred to the deeper things of God, or the things which were apt to awaken the incredulity, if not the opposition, of flesh and blood. On this account, also, it occurs most frequently, and often in a reduplicated form in the Gospel of John, which records more of such discourses of our Lord than any of the others. In its more common and popular use, its object is to express an assured belief of something that has been spoken, whether by one’s self or by another, or the earnest desire and expectation of something that has been announced; therefore importing, so it is, or so be it. It is hence fitly used at the close of a prayer, or by way of response to the prayers presented by others; in which there is no difference among Christians, except in regard to the extent to which the responsive Amen—whether with suppressed or distinctly uttered acquiescence—should be admitted in the services of the sanctuary—a difference, at most, but of form.

AMETHYST, the Greek term (Ἀμέθυστος), for the Heb. אֶמֶתֶשֶׁת, and thence derived into the English.

and other modern languages. The stone so designated was one of those which entered into the high-priest’s breastplate—the ninth in number; and is supposed to have derived its name from some imagined property in regard to dreams (the Heb. root signifying to dream), as the Greek did in regard to drunkenness. The stone so called, like the herb of the same name, was conceived to act as a sort of charm against intoxication, and wine-bibbers are reported to have usually worn it about their necks. Of course, it was from no such ideas that the stone in question was admitted into the sacred breastplate; but merely from its having a recognized place among the precious gems.

The amethyst is a transparent gem, exhibiting a sort of purple appearance, composed partly of a strong blue and of a deep red, but these variously proportioned, and the purple accordingly presenting different tinges from the violet to the rose colour. The oriental amethyst is by much the hardest and most valuable species of this gem; it is even the hardest substance known, next to the diamond. The ground of its composition is alumina, intermingled with small proportions of iron and silica, whence it is closely related to the sapphire. The European or western amethyst is not much harder than crystal, and is indeed a sort of rock-crystal, or variety of quartz. This species is to be found in considerable abundance in most countries of Europe, and is that which, both in ancient and modern times, has been most frequently employed for articles of jewellery. To which kind that in the breastplate of the high-priest belonged, we have no means of ascertaining.

AMMINADAB [people of liberality, bounteous], occurs—to say nothing of its occasional appearance in some genealogical tables, 1 Ch. vi. 22; xv. 10—as the name of one of the ancestors of David, the father of Elisheba, who became the wife of Aaron; and in Ca. vi. 12 the chariots of Amminadab are spoken of apparently as an image of fervent action and lightning speed. It is probable there was some person of that name who gave occasion to the proverbial use of the expression, but no trace is found of him in history.

AMMON [originally BEN AMMI, Ge. xix. 38, son of my relative, then for the descendants BENE AMMON, CHILDREN OF AMMON, or AMMONITES], the descendants of one of the sons of Lot. Ge. xix. 38. Their original territory, after they became a people, lay toward the east of Palestine, beyond the river Jabbok, having the possessions of Reuben and Gad upon the west, and those of Moab on the south, bounded by the river Arnon. It would appear, however, that they were not the original occupants of the region, but wrested it from the Zamzumim, a race of giants, De. ii. 20, and thereafter settled down in it, and grew into a considerable people. The Israelites approached the border of their territory, when on their way to the possession of Canaan, but did not actually interfere with any part of it—at least with no part that at the time was held by them; though a portion of what was taken from the Amorites—that, namely, lying between the rivers Arnon and Jabbok—was afterwards claimed as by right theirs, Ju. xi. 12. They appear, however, to have taken a very active part in the efforts that were made by the tribes on the farther side of Jordan to oppose the march of the Israelites, and crush their hopes of entering the land of Canaan. For, in the prohibition laid down by Moses as to receiving the Ammonites into the congregation of the Lord, it is stated as the ground of the prohibition, that “they had not met them with bread and water by the way, when the Israelites came out of Egypt;” not only so, but “had hired,” that is, had gone along with Moab and Midian in hiring “against them Balaam, the son of Beor, to curse them.” On this account they were not to be received into the congregation till the tenth generation; De. xxiii. 3, which is further explained by saying in ver. 6, “Thou shalt not seek their peace nor their prosperity all thy days for ever”—a perpetual interdict. And so the matter was understood in Nehemiah’s time; for it is there recorded that on a certain day “they read in the book of Moses in the audience of the people; and therein it was found written that the Ammonite and the Moabite should not come into the congregation of the Lord for ever,” Ne. xiii. 1. It may well be doubted, however, if this exclusion was intended to bar the way against their participating in any measure in the blessing of Israel. The ancient Jewish writers certainly did not so understand it; they considered the prohibition only as referring to the full rights of citizenship, not to the privilege of entering into the bond and blessing of the covenant; and justified their view both by the case of Ruth, and by the general principles of the theocracy. They said, as quoted by Ainsworth on De. xxiii. 3, “All heathens whosoever, when they become proselytes, and have taken upon them all the commandments which are in the law; likewise bond-servants when they are made free, lo! they are as Israelites in all respects, Nu. iv. 15, and it is lawful for them to come into the congregation of the Lord immediately. And the proselyte or freed man may marry a daughter of Israel; and the Israelite may marry her that is a proselyte or made free; except of four people only, which are Ammon, Moab, Edom, and Egypt; for these people, when any of them cometh a proselyte, he is an Israelite in all respects, save in the case of entering into the congregation of the Lord. The Ammonite and the Moabite are forbidden for ever—the males, but not the females. We have it as a tradition from Mount Sinai, that the Ammonite is the male, and the Moabite is the male, that is forbidden for ever to marry a daughter of Israel, though it be his son’s son, to the world’s end. But an Ammonitess and a Moabitess are lawful immediately, as the other people.” According to this view, which seems to be grounded in reason, and supported by the facts of history, what is meant by entering into the congregation of the Lord, is complete identification as a people, admission to a place and standing as members of the commonwealth of Israel: this is what was to be refused to the Ammonites and Moabites, so long as the peculiar constitution of Israel stood, but without prejudice to the reception of believing individuals to the spiritual benefits of the covenant.

In reality, however, the Ammonites, as a people, were as little disposed to ask, as the Israelites to give, a common participation in national honours and advantages. The unbrotherly and hostile spirit which they evinced at the outset was transmitted as a heritage to future generations, and exploded in many fierce encounters. Shortly after the children of Israel had entered on their new possessions, they were assailed, and kept for a time in a sort of bondage, by the Ammonites, in conjunction with the people of Moab and Amalek, Ju. iii. 13. The oppression proved but temporary, as the enemies were again driven back with great slaughter. But at a subsequent period, probably about a century and a half later, and as a chastisement to Israel for their spiritual defections, the Ammonites again rose to the ascendant, at least in respect to the Israelites beyond the Jordan, and pressed heavily upon them. It was on this occasion that the Israelites, in the depth of their distress, called in the aid of Jephthah, whose sinister birth and somewhat lawless character would, but for the emergency of the time, have disposed them to shun any intimate connection with him. When he had assumed the command of the Israelitish host, he sent a challenge to the king of the Ammonites, demanding to know the grounds of his quarrel with the covenant people; which was answered by calling to remembrance an alleged wrong that was sustained by Ammon at the hands of the children of Israel when they came out of Egypt—the seizure, already referred to, of a portion of their territory. This charge was repelled by Jephthah, in a detailed recital of the circumstances relating to Israel's progress toward Canaan, and of the exact position of the Ammonites at the time as to the portion of territory in question. The matter, therefore, came to a conflict, in which the Ammonites sustained a complete defeat, Ju. xi. But in process of time the old spirit again revived. In the age of Saul the Ammonites appear among the enemies over whom he gained decisive victories, 1 Sa. xi. 11; and though David endeavoured to cultivate friendly relations with them, he so completely failed in his design, that it was from them he received some of his greatest provocations and deadliest assaults, 2 Sa. x.; Ps. lxxxiii. 7; and from him, in return, that they met with their most dreadful castigation and humiliating reverse, 2 Sa. xii. 28-31. Still, they were not wholly subdued. Even in the next reign they had so far regained their position that Solomon obtained some of his many wives from them; and receiving these—not like Ruth, humble converts to the truth of God, but with all their idolatry cleaving to them—he reared for them, in defiance of all reason and the whole spirit of the theocracy, “a temple to Molech, the abomination of the children of Ammon,” 1 Ki. xi. 7. In the eye of Heaven this was the saddest victory ever gained by the Ammonites over the children of Israel, and it could not fail to draw down the inflictions of its righteous displeasure. The rending of the kingdom soon followed, and the permanent depression of the house of David. During the decline and fall of the kingdom, the Ammonites from time to time renewed their hostility; though, from their diminished strength, they rather aided the attempts of others than made any vigorous assaults of their own, 2 Ch. xx.; Je. xlix. 1; Am. i. 13; Eze. xxv. 3-6; and, at the return of the Jews from Babylon, they showed their spite by endeavouring, though in vain, to arrest the building of the temple. Some of the exiled Jews had found refuge among them during the dispersion, and, it would seem, had intermarried with them; so that a considerable portion of the heathen leaven, which it cost Ezra and Nehemiah such difficulty to get purged out, was derived from this quarter, Ezr. x.; Ne. xiii. At a later period, in the time of the Maccabees, various battles were fought with them, in which success was chiefly on the Jewish side; but amid the changes that ensued, first under the Grecian, then under the Roman supremacy, the Ammonites, in common with the smaller tribes in their neighbourhood, lost their independent position, and gradually became amalgamated with the general Arab population. In Origen's time their country was comprised under the common title of Arabia.

AMNON [faithful], David's eldest son, by Ahinoam the Jezreelitess. He was born at Hebron. Nothing is recorded of him except his atrocious conduct toward his half-sister Tamar, which cost him his life, 2 Sa. xiii 14, 20. The circumstances connected with it and his own unhappy end, are noticed under ABSALOM.

AMON [workman, architect], was borne as a name by various persons, two of whom are little more than mentioned, 1 Ki. xxii. 26; 2 Ch. xviii. 25; Na. vii. 59, and a third is only mentioned to his discredit. This was the son of Manasseh, and his successor on the throne of Judah. His reign commenced about B.C. 644, and ended miserably in the course of two years. In his personal conduct and public administration he followed the worse, not the later and better part of his father's procedure, restoring idolatry in its most obnoxious form, and with its wonted abominations. His servants conspired against him, on what grounds is not stated, and killed him in the palace; but the people of the land, not participating in their views, conspired in turn and slew the murderers, 2 Ki. xxi. 19-20.

AMON, the name of one of the Egyptian deities. The references to it in Scripture are somewhat obscured to the English reader by the word, through an old misapprehension, being unfortunately translated, instead of being taken as a proper name. Thus, in Jer. xlvi. 25, “Behold, I will punish the multitude of No”—should be, “Behold, I will punish Amon of No”—the god that was peculiarly worshipped there; after which naturally follows Pharaoh, and Egypt generally, as alike doomed to severe chastisement. So, again, in Nahum iii. 8, “Art thou better than populous No?” is properly, “Art thou better than No-Amon?”—the city which was devoted to the worship of Amon, Eze. xxx. 15. No is the same as Thebes, where, it is well known, the deity whom the Greeks compared or identified with their Jupiter was worshipped with much devotion. They called him Ammon or Jupiter-Ammon; but on the Egyptian monuments the name is written Amn or Amn-Re (Amon the Sun), and was supposed by the Greeks and Romans to be represented under the figure of a human form with a ram's head. But this, though still often repeated, has been proved by the more accurate investigations of modern times to be a mistake. It was the god Neph, sometimes written Kneph, and by the Greeks Chnoubis, who was so represented, and the proper seat of whose worship was not Thebes, but Merûe, and who also had a famous oracle in the Lybian desert. The Amon of Thebes, “king of gods,” as he was called, always had the form simply of a man assigned him, and in one of the characters under which he was worshipped appears to have been virtually identified with the sun, in another with the Egyptian Pan (Wilkinson's Manners and Customs of the Egyptians, ch. xiii.) Being represented as the king of gods, and holding a supreme place in the mythology of Egypt, we can easily understand why he should have been specially mentioned in Scripture when the gods of Egypt are singled out for vengeance. The worship paid him, like that of the worship generally which was celebrated in Egypt, partook of much that was impure, as well as frivolous and absurd.

AMORITE [more properly EMORITE (Sept. Ἀμορῆται), probably meaning properly mountaineer], one of the original, and, indeed, by much the largest and most powerful of the original tribes that inhabited the land of Canaan before the Israelitish conquest. The territory they occupied lay toward the south, and so early as the time of Abraham they were met with about Hebron and Hazezon-tamar. At the time of the conquest, they are represented as having five kings, whose respective seats were Jerusalem, Hebron, Jar-muth, Lachish, and Egion, Jos. x. 5; and they had also possessed themselves of considerable territory on the other side of the Jordan, where Sihon and Og latterly reigned, Nu. xxi. 21-24. Partly from being so numerous and powerful a tribe, and partly also from their occupying that portion of the Canaanitish territory with which the covenant people came into earliest and closest contact, the Amorites are sometimes spoken of as if they were the only inhabitants of the land, Ge. xv. 16; xviii. 2; De. i. 20. And their strength and valour, as well as numerical greatness, is particularly mentioned by the prophet Amos: "I destroyed the Amorite before them, whose height was like the height of the cedars, and he was strong as the oaks," ch. ii. 9.

The Amorites were the descendants of Emor, the fourth son of Canaan, and seem early to have attained to a bad pre-eminence among the Canaanite progeny, for the corrupt and dissolute manners which distinguished the race. In the time of Abraham their iniquity was emphatically noticed, though it had not become full, except in the case of those who inhabited the fertile plain where Sodom and Gomorrah stood; and these, for a warning to the rest, were made monuments of divine judgment. What effect the warning might have had at the time, or how far its voice may have reached, we have no particular means of ascertaining, as the chosen seed were soon afterwards entirely removed from the region. But at the period when they returned, under the divine guidance, to get possession of the land, we are distinctly informed that the rankest corruptions had again taken root amongst the Amorites, as well as the other inhabitants, and that the time of retribution had come. That portion of them, however, who dwelt on the east side of Jordan, being beyond the limits of the land properly destined for the children of Israel, were not necessarily included in the doom which was pronounced upon the occupants of Canaan, and might have been spared, if they had listened to the dictates of wisdom and discretion. Moses, on approaching their territory, sent a message to Sihon, king of Heshbon, simply requesting permission to pass unmolested through his borders. But this was sternly refused, and all the forces of Sihon were presently gathered together to cut off the host of Israel. It ended, however, in the destruction of Sihon and his people, as a similar conflict shortly afterwards also terminated with Og, king of Bashan, the other chief of that section of the Amorites; and the tract of country, thus cleared of its former occupants, was divided among the tribes of Reuben, Manasseh, and Gad, as being peculiarly suited for the pasturage of cattle, in which they were richer than the other tribes, Nu. xxxii. This was done at their own request, and in connection with many protestations on their part, and solemn vows exacted from them, that they would remain faithful to covenant engagements, and consider themselves one with their brethren in worship and polity, notwithstanding the natural boundary-line of the Jordan lying between them, Jos. xii. But in the result it turned out rather unfavourable to the higher interests of the portion of the people located there. Their greater distance from the sanctuary—their more isolated position in respect to their brethren, and greater exposure to heathen and warlike neighbours on the east and south, tended to keep them morally lower than the rest of the tribes—excepting Dan, upon the extreme north—and subjected them also to more frequent hostile incursions.

headed by their five kings and subordinate chiefs, made a stout resistance to the arms of the Israelites; but without avail: their time had at length come, and no power or resources at their command could save them. They were not, indeed, utterly exterminated; but they henceforth existed only in fragments or detached portions, and were chiefly confined to the more mountainous parts of the country, Ju. i. 34-36. Occasional skirmishes, it would seem, still took place between them and their conquerors; for it is noted in Samuel's time, as a thing distinctive of the period, that there was then peace between Israel and the Amorites, 1 Sa. vii. 14. This was not equally characteristic of the age that followed; for the Gibeonites, who were of the stock of the Amorites, were so severely and unjustly dealt with by Saul that a divine judgment was afterwards sent to avenge it, 2 Sa. xxi.; and David made war upon the Jebusites, another section of the old Amorite race, and wrested the stronghold of Zion out of their hand, 2 Sa. v. 6-9. It was from one of these—Araunah, the Jebusite—that David afterwards obtained the site for the future temple (see ARAUNAH). The last notice that occurs of them is one given in connection with the reign of Solomon, to the effect that he imposed a tribute upon them, along with the remnants of the other native tribes still existing in the land, 1 Ki. ix. 20. They must by that time have become comparatively few in number, and thenceforth ceased to be regarded, or at least taken notice of, as a separate people.

AMOS [אָמֹס, burden], the Prophet of Tekoa, a town of Judah, formed one of that remarkable group of prophets who appeared during, and shortly after the reign of Uzziah [Hosea, Isaiah, Micah]. Of his personal condition and history, our information, though it embraces only a few leading facts, is larger than in the case of some other of the prophets. For these ancient men of God were truly worthy of the name. With them God was all in all; and everything personal to themselves was kept in the back-ground, except in so far as it might help to illustrate the message with which they were intrusted.

I. Character of the times: national sins and dangers.—Amos appeared at a great crisis in the history of Israel. The virgin daughter of Israel had fallen. With the reign of Solomon the power and grandeur of the nation had passed away. Indeed, before Solomon died the seeds of national dissolution had been scattered abroad; and they had ever since been rising and ripening into an abundant harvest of evils. The separation of the ten tribes from Judah, viewed only in its political aspect, was in itself a fatal blow to the pre-eminence which David had won for Israel over all the surrounding nations. His kingdom, divided against itself, was no longer formidable; and it was not long before a succession of revolts, on the part of the tribes he had subdued, reduced it again within its ancient narrow boundaries. But this was not all. The separation of the ten tribes was followed by results still more fatal. In order to maintain their political independence of Judah and of the house of David, it was necessary to break up the religious unity which was represented and maintained by the one temple, and the great annual gatherings of all the males of Israel within its walls. By withdrawing the ten tribes from the place in which Jehovah had specially chosen to set his name, and erecting two rival sanctuaries at

Dan and Bethel, where, in direct violation of the second commandment, Jehovah was worshipped under an animal form, Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, while apparently yielding only to the demands of political necessity, struck with fatal effect at the ascendancy and free action of those religious feelings and convictions, which, though often ignored by the mere politician, are the only stable foundation on which can be reared the glory or happiness of a nation. Nor were the fatal results of the measures of Jeroboam confined to the kingdom of the ten tribes. The people of Judah, though still clinging to Jerusalem as the centre of their religious worship, and still faithful to the divinely chosen house of David, could not, and did not remain uncontaminated by the evil example of their neighbours and brethren. Among them, too, the worship on the high places superseded in a great measure the worship of Jehovah in Zion; and at last, even the abominations of Baal and Ashtoreth were imported from the northern kingdom, chiefly through the influence of the family of Ahab, with which the house of David had foolishly and sinfully entered into close alliance. Thus the house of Israel, in both its branches, sank deeper and deeper, until they lost almost entirely their distinctive character as God's chosen people, and He was compelled to say of them, as He does by the mouth of the prophet Amos, "Are ye not as children of the Ethiopians unto me, O children of Israel?" Am. ix. 7. But God did not cast away his people whom He foreknew. From the regions of the north He stirred up a mighty nation, and called it to his foot, and bade it execute his wrath upon apostate Israel. And within Israel He caused the voice of the prophet again to be heard with power; by the mouth of his servants he laid bare his people's sin, pointed to the overhanging cloud of wrath which was ready to burst upon them, and called on them by a timely penitence to avert the impending doom.

No reader of Scripture can fail to remark the wonderful harmony with which this twofold operation upon the part of God was carried forward. Both parts of it were essential to success—the external and the internal. The one without the other would have failed to wake up dead Israel. In vain would Adonai have stirred up the armies of the north, and led them forward even to the borders of his chosen heritage, had not Jehovah at the same time summoned forth his prophets to proclaim to Israel that these armies were his—that He led them on, and that a return to him was the only way of averting the threatened destruction.¹ And equally vain would it have been for Jehovah to summon forth his prophets and put in their mouth words of loud warning and earnest expostulation, had not Adonai, at the same time, stirred up the armies of the north to come, and by their dreaded presence give power to the prophets' words. The movements of God's armies must be explained by the representations of his ambassadors; and the representations of his ambassadors must be enforced by the movements of his armies. The consideration of this harmonious operation of God beyond and within Israel, will help to explain that wonderful revival of prophetic activity which distinguished the reign of Uzziah and his immediate successors. For it was then that the great Assyrian power began to menace Israel; and the earlier conflicts with the surrounding kingdoms of Syria, and Ammon, and Moab, and Edom, and Philistia were not remembered, every eye being turned to that cloud in the north, at first no bigger than a man's hand, which was gradually spreading wider and wider, and threatening to cover with its black shade the whole sky.

It is true that when Amos prophesied, the danger from Assyria did not appear imminent to the mass of his countrymen. Under Jeroboam the kingdom of the ten tribes had risen from the prostration consequent upon the successful assaults of Hazael and the armies of Syria. And in the joy of victory over enemies close at hand, whom they regarded with all the animosity of an ancient rivalry, they marked not the onward advance of a more distant though more formidable foe, Am. vi. But the prophet of the Lord saw not with the eye of a common man. Already he beheld Israel prostrate, and trampled under the chariot of the Assyrian invader; and, with loud call, he tried to wake up the slumbering nation, Am. vii. 11.

II. Remedies proposed: teaching of the prophets.—But how shall Israel be saved from the overwhelming rush of the northern host? Every one who reads carefully the writings of this period must be aware that this was the great question which pressed for an immediate solution. It was so, even when Amos wrote, to the far-seeing prophet himself, and very soon thereafter to the whole nation. Many were the replies which this question called forth, traces of which we find in the historical and prophetic scriptures. With a large party, especially in the southern kingdom, the policy most in favour was, to call in to their aid the armies of Egypt, the only great power which was strong enough to enter into conflict with the northern invader. And hence the many and earnest denunciations of this party and this policy, which we meet with in the writings of the prophets—denunciations which were all the more vehement the more dangerous the policy they contended against, and the more specious and plausible the arguments by which it was recommended. Certainly nothing could be more agreeable to those politicians, who thought only of averting the present danger, heedless of the remote consequences of the policy they pursued, than the suggestion, that safety for Israel was to be found in the rivalries of Assyria and Egypt. But the prophets, who looked deeper than the common sort of thinkers, saw in this specious and temporizing measure—and saw truly, as experience proved—nothing less than the renunciation of Jehovah, and the ruin of Israel. But what then? Did the prophets of Jehovah rest satisfied with denouncing the policy recommended by others? Had they no policy of their own? They had; and in the writings of Amos and his contemporaries we find the principles of their policy fully unfolded. And what was their policy? What were the measures they recommended as alone sufficient to meet the demands of the crisis? They may all be summed up in a few words: Return unto the Lord, and He will return unto you. Strange policy this wherewith to meet the intrigues and the arms of Assyria. We can scarcely wonder that the prophets who recommended it were looked upon as a class of one-ided and impracticable people, far behind the age, whom it was useless to argue with, and necessary to get rid of as soon as possible.

But let us trace the operation of this despised policy as we find it developed in the writings of the prophets. We find it branching out into two different directions, and thus furnishing an antidote, and the only antidote, to the two great evils which were destroying Israel. These evils were unrighteousness and division, and the antidote to these, obedience to Jehovah's law and faith in Jehovah's promise. Why was it that Israel, once a great power on the earth, had now become the prey of every invader? It was because unrighteousness, like a slow poison, was eating away, and division, like a sharp sword, had cleft asunder the strength of the nation. And of what avail the armies of Egypt to counteract the working of that poison, or to heal the divisions of the house of Israel? Far different must be the remedy. What was wanted, as the prophets clearly saw, was moral power and union; and these were to be found only in Jehovah—in his law and in his promise. Every other remedy they knew to be utterly inadequate.

But though the prophets knew well that theirs was the only effective remedy, they had no expectation that it would at once commend itself to their hearers. Such radical measures as they urged are rarely had recourse to by a nation, till every other measure has been tried in vain, and the nation has been brought to the brink of ruin. The rotten foundation usually remains unheeded until the superstructure, so often patched, and plastered, and painted, falling in ruins, lays it bare, and reveals to every eye the folly and infatuation of the short-sighted occupants. Such the prophets already foresaw would be the fate of Israel. They had little hope of a thorough reformation, until every sort of prop and patchwork had been tried in vain, and Israel had again learned, by bitter experience, that in Jehovah alone help was to be found. Hence the darkness which overspreads the greater part of their prophecies. There was nothing in the present or in the near future to cheer and encourage: it was only in the far distance they marked some faint streaks of light, presages of a happier day.

III. Character and contents of the prophecy of Amos.

—If now we take up the book of the prophet Amos, we shall find that the preceding investigation has not been fruitless. Regarding it as a whole, the prophecies are, for the most part, of a dark and gloomy character. The wrath of Jehovah is not turned away, but his hand is stretched out still. Every means of awakening penitence has been tried, and tried in vain. Jehovah has wrought in mercy and in judgment; but both have proved equally ineffectual, ch. ii. 9-11; iii. 2; iv. 6-11. His forbearance and long-suffering, instead of leading to repentance, have been despised, ch. vi. 3, 6; and now there is but very faint hope of any immediate change for the better, ch. v. 15. Many dark days are still in store for rebellious Israel; even the captivity is already clearly foreseen, ch. iii. 11-13; v. 6, vi. 14; vii. 17, &c. It is only towards the close of the prophecy that the language becomes bright and hopeful, ch. ix. 11-15. The prophet expresses his firm faith in Jehovah, and in the glorious future reserved for humbled and penitent Israel. But though Amos prophesies, for the most part, of national disaster and overthrow, yet in no part of his writings do we discover any traces of a dull, desponding spirit. He seems to have been by nature a man of strong mind, and by grace a man of bright and firm faith. We never find him brooding over the future despairingly: even his darkest predictions are evidently the utterances of a man of faith, who is not afraid to look men and things in the face, having confidence in that God who maketh all things work for good to them that love him. He had, indeed, a tender heart, and he loved his nation, ch. vii. 2, 6; but he never allowed his tenderness of heart to degenerate into effeminacy, or to blunt the sharp words of reproof with which he felt inwardly constrained, divinely called, to lay bare the wounds of his country.

But though Amos had little hope of being listened to by the rulers of Israel, he did not on that account refuse to obey the divine impulse, and address to them another call to return to Jehovah, ch. v. 4, &c. And he enforces this call by many a stirring appeal—by reminding them, in language of wonderful sublimity, who Jehovah is, ch. iv. 13; v. 8, &c.; ix. 5, 6, and how great things He had done for his people in the days of old, ch. ii. 9, and what evils their revolt from him had already brought upon them, ch. iv. 6, &c. To enlarge their views of the divine glory, he frequently introduces the names Adonai and God of Hosts, names by which the Lordship and all-embracing Sovereignty of Jehovah are most fittingly expressed. The compound name Adonai-Jehovah is with him, as with others of the prophets, a special favourite, because by this name God is described at once in his distance and in his nearness—in his might and in his love.

Nor did he stop here. Not satisfied with a general call to return to Jehovah, as the one essential condition of safety, he proclaimed clearly, and in language which none could mistake, what is implied in such a return. These two things are implied—the reformation of the national morals, and the reconstruction and extension of the Davidic empire. Like Isaiah, and almost in the very words which that greatest of all the prophets afterwards employed, he taught the impotence of the ceremonial part of religion when separated from the moral, ch. v. 21, &c.; declaring that a deep moral change was the great desideratum, the one thing needful, apart from which there was no hope for the nation. "Seek good and not evil, that ye may live, and so the Lord, the God of Hosts, shall be with you. Hate the evil and love the good, and establish judgment in the gate; it may be that the Lord God of Hosts will be gracious unto the remnant of Joseph," ch. v. 14, 15. The oppressions and wrongs done to the poor and helpless he again and again denounces with peculiar vehemence, ch. ii. 6; v. 7, 9-12; viii. 4.

But the moral change which the prophet demanded could not stand alone. It must have its root in an earnest seeking after Jehovah, and its fruit in the reunion of Israel into one people, and the restoration of the ancient monarchy in the line of David. The altars at Dan, and Bethel, and Beersheba must be broken in pieces, ch. iii. 14; iv. 4; v. 5; vii. 10, and united Israel again through the courts of Zion. Though Amos addresses his prophecies chiefly to the northern kingdom, yet again and again he loses sight of the unholy separation, and speaks as if the two kingdoms were yet one, ch. iii. 1; v. 25-27; vi. 1; viii. 14. And he closes his prophecy with a joyous anticipation of the time when "the tabernacle of David that is fallen shall be raised up, and the breaches thereof shall be closed," and all the nations around shall again submit themselves to the rule of David's line, ch. ix. 11, &c.

of Amos. What was the view which he himself took of the Messianic kingdom we know not; but we cannot doubt that this part of his prophecy receives its ultimate fulfilment, not in any viable restoration of a temporal sovereignty, but in the spiritual triumphs of Him who is the Prince of Peace, and in the universal extension of that kingdom which is righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost, ch. ix. 11, 12, compared with Acts xv. 16.

This prophecy of the revival of the Davidic kingdom, and the renewed subjection of Edom and all the nations around to the yoke of Israel, connects the close of the book with its commencement, and furnishes an argument for the unity and mutual connectedness of all the parts of the composition. The short predictions with which the book begins, against Damascus, and Tyre, and Philistia, and Edom, and Moab, and Ammon, are by no means to be viewed apart and out of connection with the prophecies which follow. For these are regarded by the prophet, not as independent states, but as states which had either formed part of the empire of David or had been bound in close alliance with it. That ancient union had been broken, and the relation of subjection or friendship had given place to one of rivalry and unnatural and violent hostility, ch. i. 3, 6, 9, &c. To the re-establishment of the Davidic empire, it was necessary that these states should be humbled; and this accordingly is the substance of the prophecies against them, from ch. i. 3 to ch. ii. 3. The result of this humbling we find in the close of the book, in which it is prophesied that Israel, penitent and again united under the sceptre of David, "should inherit the remnant of Edom and all the nations on which Jehovah's name had been called," i. e. all the nations which had formerly been subject to the theocratic kingdom of David. This kingdom re-established, Assyria would no longer be formidable, and Egypt would no longer be sued for help. Wider and wider would the boundaries of this divine kingdom and its beneficent influence extend, until all the earth should be filled with the knowledge of Jehovah as the waters cover the sea.

IV. Personal character and history of Amos.—Who is the man who gives utterance to these great thoughts? The prophet Amos is distinguished from most of the other prophets by having received no regular preparatory training for the work to which he was suddenly called. He was neither prophet nor prophet's son (or disciple), but had been all his life occupied with cattle, and with the cultivation of sycamore trees, ch. vii. 14. It has been doubted whether Amos belonged to what may be called the middle or the lower class of society. The determination of this question depends upon the meaning which is assigned to an expression (גֹּבֵי שִׁמְרֵי) translated in our version, "a gatherer of sycamore fruit."

It has been thought that when Amos uses these words of himself, he means that he belonged to the very poorest class of society, by whom alone the sweet but coarse fruit of the sycamore was commonly eaten. But it is quite evident that Amos in this passage describes, not the sort of food he ate, but the occupation in which he was engaged. And the sycamore fruit does not appear to have been so contemptible as it is sometimes represented, as we find it in Scripture associated with the fruit of the vine and the olive, Ps. lxxviii. 47; 1 Ch. xxvii. 28. On the whole, we are inclined to believe with the Targumist that Amos did not belong to the lowest class, but was himself the proprietor of a sycamore plantation, and also of the flocks and herds he speaks of.¹ Notwithstanding his not having received the customary training in the schools of the prophets, it is evident that there was nothing in his appearance or manner of address to give indication of this, as the priest of Bethel evidently regards him as a member of the class of prophets, and depending for his subsistence on the exercise of his prophetic powers, ch. vii. 12. And it seems to have been in reply to the insinuation conveyed by the words of Amaziah, "Go and eat bread," &c., that Amos gives the account of himself contained in ver. 14. He tells the haughty priest that he is no prophet by trade—that he does not prophesy as a means of procuring a living, but in obedience to the command of Jehovah, who has called him away from his ordinary occupations for the express purpose of making known his will to his people Israel: so far from prophesying for his bread, he has left all to obey the heavenly impulse.

The township of Tekoa was the ordinary residence of Amos, a district with which were associated some stirring recollections of the olden time, which could not fail powerfully to affect the character of its population. The town was situated on high ground, and from its walls the eye might range over a wide prospect, including part of the Dead Sea and the mountains of Moab (Robinson, i. 486). At not more than two hours' distance northward, and quite in view, was the town of Bethlehem, ennobled by so many sacred associations. In the immediate vicinity had been wrought, not more than a century before Amos prophesied, a great work of Jehovah in his people's defence, the invading armies of Ammon, and Moab, and Edom being discomfited and destroyed, not by the sword, but by the prayers of Jehoshaphat and his people; on which occasion it was that that pious king uttered the memorable words—"Hear me, O Judah, and ye inhabitants of Jerusalem, Believe in the Lord your God, so shall ye be established; believe his prophets, so shall ye prosper," 2 Ch. xx. 20. We cannot wonder that this hallowed region should have been the birthplace of one of the Lord's prophets.

It was while Amos was pursuing his wonted occupations in this district that he felt himself divinely impelled to leave home and friends, that in Bethel, the head-quarters of Israel's apostasy, he might lift up his voice for Jehovah, and warn Israel of the coming wrath. By nature he was endowed with a strong and resolute spirit. Though we know nothing of his parentage, we cannot doubt that he was early instructed in the law and ways of the Lord. The associations of his birthplace must have rendered this instruction peculiarly impressive. As he wandered in the wilderness of Tekoa, and thought of Bethlehem and the family of David, now brought so low, and the glory of Israel a memory of the past, his spirit would burn within him. O that the days of old were brought back, and that another king after God's own heart were enthroned in Zion over penitent and united Israel! The war between Judah and Israel, which took place under Amaziah, the father of Uzziah, and which issued so disastrously for Judah, 2 Ki. xiv. 13, must have deeply affected him; and his anxiety would be greatly increased by the now alarming aspect of affairs in the north, and the utter unpreparedness of his country, divided and degenerate, to ward off the threatened danger. It was probably after some such preparation as this that he received the divine call to go and prophesy to Israel.¹

In the time of Amos the prophetic class had greatly degenerated. From the words of Amaziah, the priest of Bethel, we conclude that prophesying had become as it were a trade, and that many enrolled themselves among the prophets, not with a view to the religious improvement of themselves or others, but only to get a living in a way which was perhaps less laborious and more agreeable than other occupations allowed of. It was probably to mark his condemnation of this gross perversion of the prophetic institution, that Jehovah raised up Amos from among the herdsmen of Tekoa to be the bearer of his message to Israel. Amos executed the commission intrusted to him with fearless courage. Like another man of God, whose name is not recorded, 1 KI. xiii. 1, he went up from Judah to Bethel, and there, in the very head-quarters of superstition, and before the men highest in power, he declared the word of Jehovah, ch. vii. 10. He counted not his life dear unto him. The high-priest's warning to flee he replied to only by denouncing the divine judgment on him and his house. How long he remained in Bethel we know not.

V. The book of Amos, its special characteristics, date, authenticity, and canonical authority.—The book of Amos, as it is now arranged, was probably written after his return to Judah, and contains the substance of his prophetic discourses in the form of a continuous composition. It is usually divided into two parts, ch. i.–vi. and ch. vii.–ix., the latter containing the notice of his journey, and an account of the visions, by means of which the announcements he was to make of divine judgment were apprehended by himself more vividly, and communicated in a more lively and impressive way to others. The last five verses, containing the strictly Messianic part of the book, ought perhaps to form a separate division.

Of the subject-matter of the book we have already given an account. The language is pure, though not without certain peculiarities which, it has been supposed, bear the character of provincialisms. The vigour and liveliness of the style is maintained throughout. Not a few vivid pictures are scattered over the book, ch. i. 2; iii. 12; v. 19; vi. 9, 10: occasionally the thoughts and language almost equal the sublimity of Isaiah. The whole of the last chapter is not surpassed, either in thoughts or in language, by any other portion of equal length of the prophetic writings.

The date of the composition of the book as it now stands is probably posterior to the earthquake mentioned in ch. i. 1 as having happened two years after the word of the Lord came to Amos. Probably, as has been supposed, he regarded that terrible earthquake, the memory of which was long preserved, Zec. xiv. 5, as a sign from heaven confirmatory of his words—the divine echo of his denunciations. And as, amid the excitement and consternation caused by such an event, the Ephraimites would probably be more willing than formerly to give ear to the divine message, the prophet, it may be, availed himself of this favourable disposition to repeat his appeals to them, not now in person, but by a written summary of the prophecies he had formerly addressed to them in vain. It is certain that we meet with references to the earthquake in all parts of the book. Everywhere the prophet regards it as the symbol and the presage of the more terrible judgments which impended over Israel, ch. i. 2; ii. 14; iv. 2, 11; v. 8; vi. 11; viii. 8; ix. 1, 5.

Of the authorship of the book there is no doubt. Its internal character is in perfect harmony with the uniform testimony of tradition. In every page we discover the mind and hand of a man familiar with agricultural and pastoral pursuits, ch. i. 2; ii. 13; iii. 4, 5, 12; iv. 1; v. 16, 19; vi. 12; vii. 1; viii. 1.

The canonical authority of the book is likewise beyond question; and the great thoughts to which it gives such fervid utterance are not less precious to the church now than when Amos wrote.² That Jehovah, our covenant God, is also God of nature and of nations, shaking the mountains and ruling amid the crash of empires; that all the evils which have ever afflicted or do now afflict the church flow from one source—separation from Jehovah—and that these evils can be removed only by re-union with him and faith in him; that the sacrifices, however costly, of the unrighteous and ungodly are an abomination to Jehovah; that sin is never so hateful to Jehovah as when found in his own people, ch. iii. 2; that national safety and greatness depend not on external alliances but on righteousness and union within; that cruelty and covetousness destroy a people more surely than the assault of the most powerful enemies, ch. viii. 4, &c.; that reverses and disasters, whether befalling individuals or nations, are Jehovah's calls to self-searching and penitence, ch. iv. 6, &c.; that Jehovah will not consent to accept a divided homage, ch. v. 4, 5; that no policy is so destructive as the temporizing policy which regards only the present emergency, to the neglect of great principles and permanent interests; that Jehovah's covenant with David and Israel—in New Testament language, with Christ and his church—shall stand for evermore, ch. ix. 8; and that neither the opposition of his enemies, nor the unfaithfulness of his people, though they may retard, shall ultimately prevent the fulfilment of all its conditions and promises: these are truths which can never grow old, which belong to no one age or dispensation of religion, but are the common property of all ages, and the only true foundation of the progress and happiness of mankind. the appearance of a sort of promontory. It was about three miles from the sea; and, standing in a pass which traverses the mountains that border the Strymonic Gulf, it occupied a very important and commanding position, since only by it could any available communication be kept up between the gulf and the plains in the interior. It had also in its vicinity the gold and silver mines of Pangaeus, and large forests of ship-timber. It was the Athenians who properly laid the foundation of its future greatness and prosperity; for, about the year B.C. 437, they succeeded, though not without considerable loss of men and treasure, in planting a colony there, which soon attained to a flourishing condition. It fell afterwards into the hands of Philip of Macedon, and, for more than a century and a-half before the Christian era, was included in the Roman empire. It had the privileges of a free city. It stood on one of the public highways (Via Egnatia), and was passed by Paul and Silas when journeying from Philippi to Thessalonica. Why they did not also remain there, and endeavour to lay the foundation of a Christian church, we are not told; it is merely said that they passed through it, Ac. xvii. 1.; but, from its being immediately added that, after passing through it, "they came to Thessalonica, where was a synagogue of the Jews," we may with some probability infer, that one reason, at least, of so short a stay being made at Amphipolis consisted in the circumstance of there being no Jews in it, or too few to form the proper nucleus of a Christian community. No subsequent notice occurs respecting it in Scripture, nor does it make any figure in ecclesiastical history. A miserable village now occupies the site, called Yenikeni, "new town," and another wretched village near it, called by the Turks Yamboli; and a few remains are still to be seen of the ancient town.

AMRAM, [people of exaltation], a son of Kohath, and father of Moses and Aaron. His wife, it is said, was his father's sister, Ex. vi. 20.; if sister in the strict sense, then she must have been within the degrees afterwards prohibited, Le. xviii. 12.; but possibly the term is used in a looser sense. He lived to the age of one hundred and thirty-seven.

AMRAPHEL [meaning unknown], king of Shinar, or Babylonia, in the days of Abraham, Ge. xiv. 1, 9. He is known only as one of the four kings from the north-east, who made a predatory incursion into the land of Canaan, and were overthrown chiefly through the valour and energy of Abraham.

AMULET, some sort of superstitious ornament, used as a charm against evil influences, such as were supposed to come from enchantments, demoniac agencies, noxious stars, epidemic diseases, or what in some eastern countries has been from time immemorial the source of greatest anxiety, the evil eye. The articles most commonly used for this purpose of guardianship in ancient times, were gems and precious stones, particularly ear-rings, or pieces of gold and silver, on which frequently magical formulæ were inscribed, and which were carried about the person. The English word nowhere occurs in Scripture; but the word לְחָשִׁים (lehashim), found in Is. iii. 20. and translated in our version ear-rings, is now generally understood to have the meaning of amulets; for the word is elsewhere used in the sense of incantations, magic, and was hence naturally applied to what was supposed magically to counteract the influence of such things—an anti-spell. The precise object indicated by the word may still have been ear-rings. Aben Ezra considered them to be pieces of silver or gold with charms inscribed on them; but ear-rings were, as they still indeed are, in very frequent use for such purposes, and hence they formed part of the idolatrous trappings and furniture which Jacob commanded his household to put away, Ge. xxxv. 4.—only, if ear-rings were the articles intended by the prophet, it must be in the superstitious sense now indicated. It was probably with the view, in part, of weaning the Israelites from this form of superstition that Moses instructed them to wear fringes upon the borders of their garments, with a ribband of blue, "that they might look upon it, and remember all the commandments of the Lord and do them, and might not seek after their own heart and their own eyes, after which they used to go a whoring," Nu. xv. 38, 39. That is, apparently, in place of certain idolatrous or superstitious badges, which they were wont to carry about them, as means of safety and protection, they were now to substitute those fringes, simply as remembrancers that they were under the care of God, and were in all things to follow the path of his commandments. But so strong was the tendency in the false direction, that the very ordinance intended to preserve them from superstition was itself turned into an occasion of fostering it, and the border-fringes became practically amulets. Thus, one of the Rabbinical authorities writes, on the passage above cited, "When a man is clothed with the fringe, and goeth out therewith to the door of his habitation, he is safe, and God rejoiceth, and the destroying angel departeth from thence, and the man shall be delivered from all hurt, and from all destruction" (R. Menachem). The same foolish and superstitious use was substantially made of other two or three passages of the law, Ex. xiii. 9.; De. vi. 8.; xi. 18.; in which, with the view of enforcing upon the people the necessity of being at great pains to remember and observe the statutes imposed upon them, they were told to bind them as signs upon their hands, and put them as frontlets between their eyes; that is, to be as careful and constant in their regard to them as if they actually had them emblazoned on these conspicuous parts of their body. This, however, they understood in later times to refer to the mere writing out on bits of parchment certain passages of the law, and binding them on their hands and heads as sacred charms. (See FRONTLETS, FRINGES.)

It was not, however, among eastern nations merely, or the Jews, who caught the infection of their idolatry, that the use of amulets prevailed—the evil had spread far and wide through the heathen world generally; and in the earlier ages of Christianity we find it pressing into the church, as one of the relics of superstition to which the people fondly clung, even after they had forsaken the grosser forms of idolatry, and to which they sought to give a kind of Christian direction. Pendants and preservatives, called periammata and phylacteria, were quite commonly worn by converts from heathenism, having a text of Scripture or some other charm written on them, as a security against danger, or a means of defence from disease and other dreaded evils. Augustine, in his epistle to Posidius, speaks also of ear-rings as being worn by some professing Christians for like purposes, and which they insisted on retaining because such things were not specifically condemned in Scripture. Hence the fathers often denounce the practice, and the church even sometimes interposed its authority with those who persisted in it. The Council of Laodicea (about the middle of the fourth century) designated amulet bands "chains and fetters to the soul," and prohibited all clergymen from wearing them on pain of excommunication (Canon 36). Chrysostom, in several of his homilies, points out the guilt and folly of those who used them, exhorts people rather to die as martyrs than resort to them, and even threatens with ecclesiastical censure those who should, after admonition, continue to employ them (Hom. 6 cont. Judaeos, 8 in Colos., etc.). In Augustine, Basil, and others, like passages occur. But, unfortunately, the remedies prescribed by those fathers to meet the evil approached too closely to the evil itself; and the sign of the cross, on which they laid such peculiar stress, and the use of the sacramental elements, especially of the consecrated bread, and latterly of dead men's bones, came to be turned very much to the same purposes as had wont to be served by ear-rings, texts of Scripture, and other pendant charms. Where superstition nestles it may change the form, but the reality remains; in one shape or another, it must have its amulets.

In modern Egypt, amulets, very similar in form to those employed by the ancient Jews and early Christians, are in common use. The most esteemed of all kegabs, or charms, we are told by Mr. Lane, is a mus-hab, or copy of the Koran. To it, as also to several other charms—especially to scrolls of chapters from the Koran, or names of the prophet—very peculiar efficacy is attributed: they are esteemed preservatives against disease, enchantment, the evil eye, and many other things. The names or passages written for such purposes are first covered with waxen cloth, to preserve the writing from injury or pollution, then inclosed in a case of thin embossed gold or silver, which is attached to a silk string or a chain, and generally hung on the right side, above the girdle. No. 37 exhibits three of these. The central one is a thin, flat case, containing a folded paper; it is about the third of an inch thick. The others are cylindrical cases, with hemispherical ends, and contain scrolls: they are worn by many women, as well as children; but those of the poorer sort have them of a somewhat different description.

ANAB [probably place of grapes], a town in the mountainous district of Judah, from which, as from Hebron, Debir, and other places, Joshua cut off the Anakim, Jos. xi. 21. A small place of the same name and in the same locality has been discovered in recent times, about ten miles S.S.W. of Hebron, near to Shoco.

A'NAH [response, answer], a person who is once represented as a son of Seir the Horite, Ge. xxxvi. 20, and again is more specially named a grandson of Seir, and son of Zibeon, whose daughter became one of the wives of Esau, ch. xxxvi. 2, 24, 25. That this is the true statement of the case, and not, as commonly given, that there are two Anahs, appears thus:—The Anah in ver. 2 and ver. 25 must be the same; for each is declared to be the father of Aholibamah, Esau's wife. But the same Anah must be identical with the Anah in ver. 24, for the one as well as the other was the son of Zibeon. Hence, when Anah is first mentioned in the genealogy at verse 20 among the sons of Seir, it must be sons in the wider sense that is meant. Anah was really the son of Zibeon; but he became the founder of a distinct family, and so, like Ephraim and Manasseh, he took rank with the elder generation. It is remarkable, and has sometimes been treated as incapable of proper explanation, that this Anah is assigned to three different tribes. In Genesis xxxvi. 34, where he is first mentioned, he is called a Hittite; in xxxvi. 2, he is represented as the son of Zibeon the Hivite; and at ver. 24 of the same chapter he is numbered among the descendants of Seir the Horite. Occurring as these different designations do at such comparatively short intervals, it seems evident that they must have presented no difficulty to those who were conversant with the circumstances of the time, and that they appear strange to us merely because we are so far removed from these. In regard to Horite, however, there is no proper difficulty; for this is simply an appellative, signifying mountaineer, or troglodite, as the ancients called it—applied to those who lived in rocky regions, and occupied caves instead of houses. And then of the two other designations, Hivite and Hittite, it is to be noted that the one appears to have been the more general and the other the more specific genealogical distinction. Hittite is undoubtedly used at times in a somewhat comprehensive sense, as including various tribes or communities, with their several kings, Jos. i. 4; 2 Ki. vii. 6; 1 Ki. x. 29. Hence also, when the prophet Ezekiel proceeds to give an allegorical representation of the waywardness and guilt of the covenant-people, he begins by saying, "Thy nativity is of the land of Canaan; thy father was an Amorite, and thy mother was an Hittite," Eze. xvi. 3—as if these two names were comprehensive of all the Canaanite race. When, therefore, the wife of Esau is first mentioned in the history, Ge. xvi. 34, she is simply designated as the daughter of one who belonged to the Hittites—the object being to indicate that she was a Canaanite by birth, and of that extensive branch which went by the general name of Hittite. But when the genealogy is given in chapter xxxvi. her place is more definitely marked as that of one belonging to the Hivite section of the Hittite species. (Hengstenberg, Authentic. ii., Diss. vi.)

Another remarkable thing connected with this Anah is the double name he seems to have borne. It is only in the genealogical table that he appears under the name of Anah; for in the history, Ge. xvi. 34, where the marriage of his daughter with Esau is mentioned, he is called BEERI the Hittite. The word Beeri means fontanus, the man of the fountain; and in chapter xxxvi. 24, we have a notice introduced which explains the matter—though it is unhappily rendered in our English version in a manner that quite obscures the light it serves to throw on the peculiarity referred to. The notice is, "It was this Anah that found the warm springs [so, it is now generally agreed, the word should be rendered, not mules] in the wilderness, as he fed the asses of Zibeon his father." The springs meant are supposed to have been those afterwards known by the name of Callirhoë, warm springs to the south-east of the Dead Sea, lying in a secluded place, which could only be reached by a narrow zigzag path along the edge of a precipice. This path opens into a valley, which is crowded with different sorts of canes, aspens, and palms, and into which various warm springs precipitate themselves: they do so in such quantities, that Irby and Mangles say, on reaching a particular shelf of the rock, "We found ourselves at what might be termed a hot river, so copious and rapid is it, and its heat so little abated. This continues, as it passes downwards, by its receiving constant supplies of water of the same temperature. We passed four abundant springs, all within the distance of half a mile, discharging themselves into the stream at right angles to its course." Supposing these to be the springs discovered by Anah—as is every way probable—one can easily understand how, both from their inclosed situation, their extreme copiousness, and their singular warmth, the discovery of them should have been noted as a remarkable circumstance in his life, and should have led to his being thereafter familiarly designated Beeri—the man of the fountain. At the same time, when his name was given in the genealogy, it fitly appeared, not under this somewhat accidental appellative, but as that which originally and properly distinguished him—Anah.

ANAK, ANAKIM. The singular word anak means neck-chain; and, in the plural, anakim is understood to have denoted persons with marked necks, long-necked, and then, by way of eminence, a race of men with long necks and of gigantic stature, who inhabited Hebron and the surrounding country at the time the Israelites entered the promised land. The name always appears either as the sons of Anak, Nu. xiii. 33; Jos. xv. 14; Ju. i. 29; or the sons of the Anakim, De. i. 28; ix. 2; or simply Anakim, De. ii. 10, 11, 21; Jos. xi. 21, 22; xv. 15; so that it is doubtful whether they were descended from one of the name of Anak, or bore the name of sons of Anak, and Anakim, merely from their being men of lofty stature. In Jos. xv. 13, Arba is called the father of Anak, which makes it probable that the Anakim sprung from Arba; and the immediate children of Anak were Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmai. The report of their great stature at first inspired the Israelites with terror, and was one of the circumstances which led them to rebel against the word of God at their first approach to the land of Canaan, Nu. xiii. 33. But afterwards these Anakim were driven from their possessions by Joshua, and seem to have been extinguished as a people, excepting that a few families of the race continued to exist in the country of the Philistines, out of whom doubtless came the afterwards famous

Goliath of Gath. These people are depicted on the Egyptian monuments as a tall, light-complexioned race. In the hieroglyphic inscription they are named Tanmahu, which may be the Egyptian rendering of the Hebrew word Talmal, allowing for the interchange of the liquid l for n, so constant in all languages. The figure is from a picture on a wall of the tomb of Oimeneptah I., supposed to represent a man of the tribe of Talmal, one of the sons of Anak. (See GIANTS.) (Burton's Excerpta Hieroglyphica.) [J. B.]

ANAMMELECH [compounded probably of anam, a statue or image, and melekh, a king, idol-god, or kingly image], applied as a name to the peculiar deity worshipped by the people of Sepharvaim. The worship paid him was closely allied to that which is more commonly known as belonging to the Syrian Moloch; for his devotees caused their children to pass through the fire, 2 Ki. xvii. 31. Various other derivations of the name have been given, and conjectures thrown out as to the deity, and the particular forms of idolatry connected with it; but as nothing certain has been established, it is needless to go into details.

ANANIAS. 1. A member of the original Christian community at Jerusalem; in which, for a time, he occupied an honourable place, till his unhappy aberration from the path of uprightness, with the fearful retribution it provoked, brought over his name the shade of a perpetual infamy, Ac. v. 1-11. He and his wife Sapphira are striking examples of the mischievous results which will sometimes arise, even now, from the endeavour to carry profession beyond principle—from people aiming at being accounted better in the church than they really are. That, to a certain extent, these persons had come under the influence of the truth, and had sincerely made up their minds to take part with the followers of Jesus, there can be no reasonable doubt. In formally enlisting themselves among the number of the little company, they showed their readiness to brave opposition and to encounter obloquy for the sake of Jesus; and, in following the example of others—an example which they were equally as free to shun as to follow—by disposing of their property to make a contribution to the common funds of the church, they proved their willingness to make at least some temporal sacrifice for the welfare of their poorer brethren. Their hearts, in short, were to a certain extent alive to the faith, and moved by the benignant impulses, of the gospel; but still not sufficiently moved to dispose them to take, by the largeness of their benefactions, the place which their wealth and consideration seemed to indicate as proper for them. They would therefore compromise the matter between their worldliness on the one side, and their Christian reputation on the other—part with a certain portion of the money they received for the property they had sold, and make it appear as if that portion formed the whole proceeds of the sale. Whether they had calmly weighed what this compromise involved, or had, without due consideration, resorted to it as from the sudden impulse of a worldly instinct, it plainly did involve a sacrifice of right principle—a mournful disregard of truth and rectitude, such as, if allowed to proceed in the church, would have brought within her pale the hypocrisy, the fraud, the selfishness, the false show and parade of the world. Therefore, it was met with a searching exposure and an appalling rebuke. How the falsehood and fraud intended to be practised on the occasion of Ananias

and Sapphira should have come to light, is not stated. Possibly something in their previous character had given rise to the suspicion that they were going here to play a deceitful part, and may have led to investigations which established their guilt; or, without any previous inquiry and formal evidence, supernatural discernment may have been imparted to the apostles, enabling them to penetrate through the false guise that was assumed, and bring to light the real state of the case. However it may have been, by the time that the contribution came to be laid at the apostles' feet—and it appears to have been done, when they were solemnly met to receive the free-will offerings of the brethren—Peter was in a condition to charge Ananias with deliberate fraud, in pretending that what he now offered was the whole he had received by the sale of his property. In making this charge the only thing that seems peculiar is the strength of the language employed by the apostle. He asked Ananias, "Why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie to the Holy Ghost, and to keep back part of the price?" And, after reminding him that it was entirely in his own power to sell the property or not, and when sold to give a part or the whole as he himself might determine, the apostle again charges him with lying, "not unto men, but unto God." The special aggravation of the sin is thus made to stand in the religious character of the transaction—in the gift being presented as an offering to God, and an offering which, as made, carried a falsehood in its front. The apostles were acting on the occasion in their official capacity; they were sitting as the Spirit's agents and representatives, to receive the alms of the church; so that what he said and did to them was in effect said and done to the Lord—it was a daring attempt to practise imposition on the Holy Ghost. Ananias himself could not be ignorant of this; he must have felt that he was in a manner defiling the sanctuary of God, and provoking the eyes of his glory; consequently, his heart must have been previously strung to a very considerable hardihood in evil; he must so far have surrendered himself to the spirit of covetousness, that it might be said of him, as of one in the latter stages of degeneracy, Satan had entered his heart to tempt him to such ungodliness; comp. Lu. xxi. 3. But the bringing of this charge against Ananias, and laying bare both the reality and the heinousness of his guilt, is the whole that St. Peter does on the occasion; there is no infliction of corporeal judgment from his hand, no threatening even of any such as being ready to descend from the presence of God; and had no divine interposition followed, the utmost that we can suppose likely to have happened in the way of judicial procedure, would have been to cast him out of the church as unworthy of a place in the house of the living God. But as a seal to the condemnation that was pronounced upon his sin—as a warning to others who might in future seek to bring corruption into the spiritual community of believers—as a sign raised by the hand of God at the commencement of the New Testament church, to testify of the guileless simplicity and incorrupt sincerity which should belong to all who join themselves to its membership—the doom of death instantly fell upon the convicted transgressor. We need not be too curious in inquiring how this death was brought about; whether the startling discovery of his guilt that was made all at once to burst on him, may have itself operated like a convulsive shock, or, along with this, some miraculous agency may have suddenly arrested the pulse of life; the result in either case, especially when taken in connection with what presently after befell his wife, must be ascribed to the direct interposition of God. Ananias first, and then his wife Sapphira, who became his partner alike in guilt and punishment, perished under the judgment of God, as the corrupters of his infant church.

One cannot but mark a close resemblance between what thus took place at the commencement of the Christian church, and the mournful occurrence that struck terror into the members of the Israelitish commonwealth, shortly after their entrance within the boundaries of Canaan. It was as a holy community they went thither, and were to be made possessors of the land, as God's special witnesses against the crimes and abominations that polluted it; precisely as it was by being a holy temple to the Lord, and keeping itself separate from the corruptions of the world, that the church of the New Testament was to make head against the powers of evil and bring all under its sway. In the one case, however, as well as in the other, the world entered with its pollutions at the very threshold of the history; and both times in a similar guise, as a spirit of covetousness, clinging to the mammon of unrighteousness, and cloaking itself over with hypocrisy and guile. The transgressors in the ancient community, Achan and his family, were, by the special interposition of God, dragged to light, and consigned to destruction; and Ananias and Sapphira, the transgressors in New Testament times, were by a like interposition detected and punished. The immediate effects, too, of the divine interposition were much alike: a salutary fear of sin was struck into the respective communities, and the hearts of all more thoroughly roused in behalf of the interests of righteousness. But, unfortunately, the results in both cases proved but of temporary duration. The awful warning given against sin fell into oblivion; and before the apostles had finished their course, as in former times before Joshua had been gathered to his fathers, many forms of corruption had gained a footing within the sacred territory. The last testimony from the hand of the apostle, who, on this occasion, so sternly rebuked the incipient evil—the second Epistle of Peter—had for its chief object the lifting of a loud and emphatic warning against the hypocrisy and guile, the licentiousness and corruption, which were already making their appearance among the churches of Christ, and which he foresaw were destined to become yet more rampant. Still, the first great practical testimony was not in vain: it stands as a finger-post for all who have eyes to see it, and makes clear as noon-day the purpose of God to recognize only such as true members of his church who have left behind them the corruptions of the world, and in godly sincerity are yielding themselves to his service.

Certain petty and frivolous objections, which have been raised on the subject by rationalist interpreters, so obviously arise from partial or mistaken views of the transaction, or of St. Peter's conduct in relation to it, that they deserve no particular notice.

2. ANANIAS, a Jewish disciple at Damascus, to whom the Lord appeared in a vision, and instructed him to go where Saul of Tarsus at the time was, that he might lay on him his hands, and impart to him anew his sight, Ac. ix. 10-17. Ananias expressed his astonishment at receiving such a commission, having heard only of the fiery zeal with which Saul had been persecuting the church of Christ, and of the authority with which, for that end, he had come armed against the disciples in Damascus. But his fears and suspicions were laid to rest by the divine assurance, that this man had now become a chosen vessel to bear the name of Jesus before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel, and to suffer great things for his sake. He accordingly went as commanded, and both restored sight to Saul through the imposition of hands, and received him by baptism into the Christian community. Nothing farther is known for certain of Ananias, nor have we any more specific information than that given above of his position in the church at Damascus. Tradition has sought to compensate for this defect by telling us that he became bishop of Damascus, and of course, like all apostles and primitive bishops, died a martyr. But no credit is due to such legends.

3. ANANIAS, the high-priest at the time of St. Paul's seizure and appearance before the Sanhedrim at Jerusalem, Ac. xxiii. 2. We learn nothing more of him in the New Testament than that on Paul declaring he had lived in all good conscience before God till that day, he commanded those beside Paul to smite him (showing himself to be, at least, a person of violent temper and coarse manners), and that he afterwards went down to Cæsarea with certain elders, to lay a regular charge of sedition against the apostle, Ac. xxiv. 1. Various notices are given of him in Josephus, and they fully confirm the idea conveyed of his character by what is written in the Acts. He had been nominated to the office of high-priest by Herod, king of Chalcia, in A. D. 48, but was afterwards obliged to go to Rome and defend himself against heavy charges that were brought against him (Ant. xx. 5. 2; also 6. 2). There, however, he was acquitted, and it is supposed resumed the office of high-priest on his return to Judea. But shortly before the departure of Felix he was deprived of the office; and after carrying on a series of lawless practices by the hands of what Josephus calls "very wicked servants," he was himself at last killed by the Sicarii, or zealot-robbers (Ant. xx. 8. 8; also 9. 2). He appears to have been altogether one of the most worthless and desperate characters that ever filled the office of high-priest.

ANATHEMA [Gr. ἀνάθεμα, from the verb ἀνάρθνημι, to lay up or suspend] was, properly, anything presented as a gift to a temple, and hung up there as a sacred memorial. When used, however, in this general sense, as it often is in the classical authors, it is written with a long e, ἀνάθημα; and as such it occurs only once in the New Testament, at Luke xxi. 5, where the disciples remarked to the Lord concerning the temple, "how it was adorned with goodly stones and gifts" (ἀνάθημασι). Things given up to God in this sense were esteemed honourable as well as sacred; they were associated with the more gracious and benignant aspect of his character. But as his character has another aspect—that, namely, which it assumes when brought into contact with incorrigible and hardened iniquity, calling forth severe and punitive justice—so if, with respect to this aspect of the divine character, any person or object were solemnly given up to God, it would be indeed for God's glory, but for the dishonour and destruction of what was so surrendered. And this is the idea of the cherem (כֶּרֶם), the religious curse of the Hebrews, to which commonly in the Greek translation of the Old Testament, and always in the original of the New, the word ἀνάθεμα corresponds. It denoted something, not merely dedicated to God, but forcibly dedicated to him—something that had been withdrawn from his service and worship, so that he was not glorified in it, and was again, by the hands of another, devoted to him, that he might be glorified upon it. This is a kind of consecration peculiar to the Bible, as the view of the divine justice, or righteousness, on which it is based, is only found there; heathenism never attained in this respect to any proper knowledge of Deity. And the thought it presents is, certainly, a very solemnizing one; bespeaking, as it does, the setting apart of things or persons from a common to a sacred use, hallowing them in a sense to the Lord, in order that he may consume them, or otherwise pour upon them his righteous indignation. Hence we have the singular expression, not unusual in the original Scriptures, "Accursed to the Lord" (כֶּרֶם לַיהוָה, Le. xxvii. 23, 29; Jos. vi. 19, 21), but in our translation softened into such phrases as "devoted to the Lord," or "consecrated to the Lord." On the first historical occasion that this kind of consecration was put in force, dactroy is the word used in our version, though it does not convey the precise idea of the original. The circumstance is recorded in Numbers xxi. 1-3, "And Israel vowed a vow unto the Lord, and said, If thou wilt indeed deliver this people into my hand, then I will utterly destroy [כֶּרֶם אֶתְּרָם, I will make a cherem or anathema of] their cities. And the Lord hearkened unto the voice of Israel, and delivered up the Canaanites; and they utterly destroyed [made an anathema of] them and their cities; and he called the name of that place Hormah [the anathematized, or devoted to destruction]." It is evidently not simple destruction that is here described by the putting under cherem or anathema, but the doing of this as a sacrifice to God—an act justified and demanded by the interests of holiness—and one, therefore, which required to be performed in a peculiarly solemn frame of mind, free from carnal passion and selfishness of spirit.

Such is the idea of the Old Testament cherem or anathema; whatever was put under it was entirely withdrawn from its human use, or natural relationship, and given wholly to the Lord—to be employed in his service, if capable of such employment; if not, to be utterly consumed. Hence, what was thus devoted could not be redeemed; it could not, by any ransom or substitutionary arrangement, be taken back and applied to ordinary purposes; it must either be reserved for strictly sacred uses, or, if unfit for these, devoted to destruction. "No devoted thing [lit. "nothing that is cherem."] shall be sold or redeemed; it is most holy to the Lord. None devoted, which shall be devoted of men, shall be redeemed, but shall surely be put to death," Le. xxvii. 23, 29. Hence it was that when the Canaanites, as a people, were, on account of their flagrant enormities and foul abominations, put under the same ban as those mentioned above that dwelt about Hormah, extermination was the necessary result: they were separated to the Lord—sacredly destined, in a manner, to the severity which their sins had provoked—consigned to perdition. And as a clear sign to the Israelites themselves that such was the nature of the decree which they had to put in force against the Canaanites; that what they had to do in this respect was strictly a work of God, and that everything they might acquire by doing it—the land, the cities, the goods, which reverted to them for a possession—were properly the Lord's, and came to them as a sacred dowry from his hand;—as a sign of all this, Jericho, the first city in the land which they had to attack, had the anathema laid upon it in the most stringent manner, and the most comprehensive form. Nothing belonging to it was to be appropriated as the people's own; the treasure was to be brought into the Lord's house; and all that could be consumed—houses, garments, and the inhabitants themselves, with the exception of Rahab—utterly made an end of. In like manner, and with reference specifically to idols, it was said, "And thou shalt not bring an abomination into thine house, and become a cursed thing [an anathema, or cherem] like it; thou shalt utterly detest, and thou shalt utterly abhor it; for it is cherem," Da. vii. 25. It is wrong to say of such cases that it is simply the vile and execrable nature of the object that is indicated, and that there is no idea of consecration to the Lord; the general principle still holds good, that everything cherem is most holy to the Lord. Only, in the case of sinful persons and polluted objects, the consecration was with a view, not to honourable and blessed service, but to the exhibition of divine justice in their destruction.

In the New Testament use of the word anathema the idea of consecration is, perhaps, less prominent than in the old Testament cherem, though it is still included; only, the thought is turned somewhat more upon the execrable nature and fearful doom of the subject of it. It occurs altogether only five or six times, and in one of these it is a company of Jews who use it, so that it is not brought into contact with any Christian element. "Certain Jews bound themselves under a curse," as it is in our version [literal'y, anathematized themselves], "saying that they would neither eat nor drink till they had killed Paul," Ac. xviii. 12; that is, they devoted themselves in this way to destruction, if they should refile from executing the purpose they had formed respecting Paul. Probably, as the providence of God, by removing Paul suddenly to a distance from them, rendered the execution of their scheme impracticable, they would hold themselves released from the penalty they had voluntarily incurred. But the feeling which prompted them to enter into the engagement was doubtless much the same as that which animated the conspirators against Herod's life; of whom Josephus tells us that, when detected and seized, "they showed no shame for what they were about, nor did they deny it; but exhibited their daggers, and protested that the conspiracy they had sworn to was a holy and pious action; that what they intended to do was not for gain, or for any indulgence to their passions, but principally for those common customs of their country which all the Jews were obliged to observe, or else to die for them" (Ant. xv. 8. 6). The idea here, however misapplied as to its particular direction, was still that of the religious curse, devoting to God as by a sacred act, and for the infliction of the heaviest doom, what, in the circumstances, was deemed unworthy of life. So, in the bosom of those who conspired against Paul, the sentiment seems to have been, Let our life be forfeited to God, as a thing which he may justly exact at our hands, if we withhold our hand from compassing the death of such a miscreant.

It is the apostle Paul himself who, in the other places referred to, makes use of the anathema. Once he does it like those Jews, in regard to himself, when, speaking of his deep sorrow on account of the apostate condition of his countrymen, and his fervent desire for their salvation, he says, "For I could wish (or more exactly, I was wishing—implying that the act was in process of forming itself, but remained incomplete, was checked by some counter-consideration) that I myself were anathema from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh," Ro. ix. 3. The expression has given rise to much disputation, and many attempts have been made to draw it into an inferior sense than what the words seem naturally to import. But such attempts are to be discouraged, as tending rather to embarrass than to explicate the subject. Let it only be understood, that the apostle is himself in the highest mood of spiritual feeling, and, in consequence, capable of being fully sympathized with by such only as are familiar with the more elevated frames of the Christian life. Let it be understood, further, that the thought expressed is not a decision formally come to, or a purpose calmly entertained and brought forth into deliberate action, but rather a sentiment stirred in his bosom by the agony of unutterable sorrow—a wish cherished and yet again repressed, as if it must not pass beyond the region of thought and feeling. Let this only be understood as to the state of mind here indicated by the apostle, and there will be found in it nothing either inconceivable or absolutely singular. It is just that state of rapt devotion so finely described by Bacon, as sometimes attained by "God's elected saints, who have wished themselves razed out of the book of life in an ecstasy of charity and feeling of infinite communion"—a feeling as if life would be intolerable to them, should the common well-being of the brotherhood, after which they so ardently longed, fail to be realized. It is this aspect of the matter which in such a case, should be contemplated as alone present to the mind; and to bring into view the physical and moral ruin, the final despair and wretchedness of the lost—as if this were the alternative which were almost preferred by the individual to his existing state and prospects—were entirely to mistake the real condition and temper of soul expressed on such occasions.

The other passages in which St. Paul employs anathema point more distinctly to the moral guilt of the subject of it, and his fit destination to the heaviest curse. "No one," he says, 1 Co. xii. 3, "speaking in God's Spirit, calls Jesus anathema;" he cannot possibly think and speak of him as a fit object of divine execration. But, at the commencement of his epistle to the Galatians, the apostle himself twice over pronounces an anathema upon the person, be he man or angel, who should come preaching another gospel than that which he had himself preached; thereby solemnly consigning such a person, as guilty of the greatest impiety, to the justice of God for everlasting reprobation; and, at the close of his first epistle to the Corinthians, he breathes forth the weighty utterance, "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be anathema maranatha." Here, again, from the idea of its being supposed to be contrary to the proper spirit of an apostle that he should wish any one to become, in the full and proper sense, an anathema, the import of the expression has been softened to mean simply that such an one should be excluded from the Christian communion—that he has no proper right to a place among Christ's flock. But there is no evidence of the word anathema being so used in Scripture, nor is there any need for resorting to it here; since, if it is the revealed will of God that they who are destitute of love to Jesus should be doomed to final perdition, there can be nothing improper in an apostle, nor even in the most seraphic bosom in heaven, wishing it to be so. It is but praying that God's will be done. Besides, such a diluted meaning would leave altogether unexplained the connecting so closely together of the two Aramaic words, anathema and maranatha. Such a connection, especially in an epistle written not to a Syrian but to a Grecian community, seems to demand that the words be taken in their fullest sense, and also to imply that they were words either themselves in familiar use with the Christians, or grounded upon some well-known passage of Scripture which was thereby recalled to their mind. Maran-atha is the Syriac phrase for the Lord comes; and, to place this in such immediate conjunction with the announcement of an anathema, and to do so in one of the last sentences of the epistle, was to remind the disciples, in the most impressive manner, that the curse as well as the blessing has its operation in the kingdom of Christ, and, so far from ceasing at the moment of his coming, only rises then to its highest development; so that it behoves all to look well, in the meantime, to the reality of their interest in Christ, and their love to him. The apostle does not, indeed, overlook the blessing; for, in the very next verse, he prays that the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ might be with them. But, knowing as he did, that there were many elements of corruption working in the church at Corinth, he gives special prominence to the other and darker aspect of the matter; and, in doing so, he exactly follows the example of the prophet Malachi, whose closing announcement regarding the coming of the Lord may be said to form the ground of the apostle's representation; for, while there making promise of the Lord to those that feared his name, as coming to bless his heritage, he, at the same time, proclaims the necessity of a great and general reformation, if this result was to be generally experienced; but, if it failed, if there should not be a real turning of hearts to the Lord, then the coming would be to smite the earth with a cherem, or anathema. Because the danger was so great of a disastrous result, this was the last thought the prophet left upon the members of the old covenant in connection with the subject. In like manner here, and on the same account, the apostle makes it one of his very latest and most impressive utterances to the church at Corinth. The anathema therefore, in this case also, is the solemn adjudication of the characters named to the doom of perdition, as fit objects of the punitive justice of God—pronounced now, in order that those who were in danger of incurring it might hasten their escape from the wrath to come. (Lightfoot correctly indicated this interpretation of the passage, and the allusion it contains, to Mal. iv. 2-6, but improperly and unnaturally limited its application to the Jews. Hengstenberg, in his Christology, justly excepts to that part of Lightfoot's interpretation.)

There can be no doubt, however, that while the word anathema in the New Testament, as cherem in the Old, always bears the higher sense we have ascribed to it, and a direct reference to the judgment of Heaven upon the abominable and reprobate, a certain change was introduced both by the ecclesiastical authorities in the use of anathema, and by at least the later Rabbinical writers in the use of cherem. Both terms came to be applied to church censures—to excommunication in its lighter or heavier form. What was strictly called the cherem was the final sentence of excommunication, after lighter censures had proved unavailing; and it contains (as given, for example, by Buxtorf, in his Lex. Chald. Talm. et Rabbin., or in a more accessible work, by Brown, in his Antiquities of the Jews, ii. 207) a revolting and detailed multiplication of all imaginable curses and inflictions of evil on the head of the unhappy subject. But the name was also applied to other forms of censure on the part of the synagogue. With the fathers, anathema was used indifferently of excision from the church, and separation from God; sometimes the one explanation is given and sometimes the other, as may be seen by consulting Suicer's Theaurus on the word. Theodoret even explains the "Let him be anathema," in 1 Co. xvi. 22, by "Let him be removed from the common body of the church"—erroneously, we certainly think; but it shows how soon the word had come to receive this lower application. In the decrees of later councils, and with Romish writers generally, to be anathema is but another term for being excommunicated, or cut off externally from the number of the faithful.

AN'ATHOTH [answers to prayers], occurs as a personal name in some of the genealogies, 1 Ch. vii. 8; No. x. 19; but it is chiefly known as a Levitical town, Jeremiah's birth-place and proper residence—Je. i. 1. Very little besides is known of the town itself, though it is occasionally mentioned, 2 Sa. xiii. 27; Ex. ii. 23; and so much identified had it become in later times with the prophet, that in Jerome's day it went by his name: "Anathoth, quæ hodie appellatur Jeremia" (Onomast.) It lay about three or four miles north of Jerusalem; and is supposed to have been the same with the Anata discovered by Professor Robinson, which is at the distance of an hour and a quarter from Jerusalem, and stands on a broad ridge of hills, from which one looks down upon the eastern slopes of the hilly ground of Benjamin, and sees as far as the valley of the Jordan. It is now a mere village, of some fifteen or twenty houses, but possesses remains of ancient walls and of foundations that seem to have borne houses of respectable size.

ANCIENT OF DAYS, an expression applied to Jehovah thrice in a vision of Daniel, ch. vii. 9, 13, 22, apparently much in the same sense as Eternal. The expression viewed by itself is somewhat peculiar; but it is doubtless employed by way of contrast to the successive monarchies which appeared one after another rising before the eye of the prophet. These all proved to be ephemeral existences, partaking of the corruption and evanescence of earth: and so, when the supreme Lord and Governor of all appeared to pronounce their doom, and set up his own everlasting kingdom, He is not unnaturally symbolized as the Ancient of Days—one who was not like those new formations, the offspring of a particular time, but who had all time, in a manner, in his possession—one whose days were past reckoning.

ANDREW [Gr. Ἀνδρέας], one of the earliest disciples of our Lord, and latterly one of his twelve apostles. He had previously attended the ministry of John the Baptist, but came to Jesus, after the Baptist distinctly pointed him out as the Lamb of God, Jn. i. 35-40. He was a fisherman of Bethsaida, and the brother of Simon Peter. No sooner had he found satisfaction in his own mind respecting the Messiahship of Jesus than he sought for his brother Simon, whom he presently brought to Jesus, and who, in like manner, became a disciple of the Nazarene. It was some time, however, before either Andrew or Simon left their regular occupation, and gave themselves to constant attendance upon the ministry of Jesus. And even after they did this, extremely little is recorded of Andrew, who seems to have been much inferior to his brother in those qualifications which are required for taking a lead in public affairs. He is mentioned individually on but three occasions—once, when the difficulty presented itself of feeding the five thousand that waited on Christ, and when he signified that a lad was there who had five barley loaves and two fishes, Jn. vi. 9; again, when he took some part in introducing certain Greeks to Jesus, who were anxious to see him, Jn. xii. 22; and finally, when, along with Peter, James, and John, he went privately to Jesus to get a fuller revelation of his mind respecting the destruction of the temple-buildings, Mar. xiii. 1. This was the only occasion on which Andrew is related to have been admitted with the other three to a more private interview with Jesus, and to witness a manifestation of his divine fulness, which was withheld from the rest. For anything farther, we know simply that Andrew took part with his brethren in their apostolic labours, and shared the common perils of their calling; but in what precise departments of labour, or through what specific trials and difficulties, we have no information in Scripture or in other records of authentic history. Tradition, in one of its forms, speaks of his having gone preaching the gospel to Scythia; in another, to Greece; in still others, to Asia Minor, Thrace, &c. (Euseb. Hist. iii. 1; Sophron. ap. Hieron. de Scrip. Niceph. ii. 20); and finally reports him to have suffered martyrdom at Patræ in Achaia, on the peculiar form of cross, crux decussata (X), which still bears his name. But no trace is found of these traditions till a comparatively late period; and it is impossible to tell what degree of credit, or whether any credit whatever, is due to them. Mention is made by some early writers of a book called the "Acts of Andrew," and also of a "Gospel of St. Andrew," but both were held by the church to be spurious productions, and have long since perished.

ANDRONICUS [man-conqueror], a kinsman and fellow-prisoner of Paul, who is also declared to have been a Christian before the apostle, and to have so distinguished himself in the faith and labours of a Christian life, that he had acquired a name among the apostles generally. In calling Andronicus his fellow-prisoner, the apostle must have referred to some previous part of his history, when they had suffered together for the cause of Christ; for at the time he wrote to the Romans he was not in bonds, Ro. xvi. 7.

A'NER [meaning uncertain], a Canaanite chief, who, with Eschol and Mamre, joined Abraham in pursuing the host of Chedorlaomer, Ge. xiv.; also the name of a Levitical town in the tribe of Manasseh, 1 Ch. vi. 70.

ANGELS [in Greek ἀγγελοι, and in Hebrew מַלְאָכִים, malakim]. Both the Greek and Hebrew terms originally import any kind of persons or agencies sent forth—messengers; and they are occasionally employed in Scripture in this original sense, though usually, in such cases, the rendering in our English version is not angels, but messengers. (For ex. Job i. 14, 1 Sa. xi. 3; Lu. ix. 52.) There are other passages, however, in which the rendering angels is sometimes preserved, but in which the reference still is to beings or agencies of an earthly kind, not to those possessed of angelic natures. Of that description probably is Ps. civ. 4, quoted in He. i. 7, "who maketh his angels spirits, his ministers a flaming fire;" for the rendering, "He maketh winds his messengers" or angels, certainly appears to fit in most naturally with the train of thought in the psalm, and also to serve best the purpose for which it is introduced in the epistle to the Hebrews. Of the same description are those passages in which the term is applied to prophets, as persons commissioned by God to deliver messages in his name; thus Haggai is called the Lord's angel, ch. i. 13 (messenger in English version), as is Messiah's forerunner in Mal. iii. 1; and the epithet is even applied to Israel generally, with reference more especially to his prophetic calling, as appointed by God to be the light and benefactor of the world, Isa. xlii. 19. So, again, and with reference merely to another aspect of the delegated trust committed to the covenant-people, there are passages in which the priesthood has the term applied to it; as at Mal. ii. 7, "The priest's lips should keep knowledge, and they should seek the law at his mouth; for he is the angel (English version, messenger) of the Lord of hosts." This plainly is said, not of each individual priest, but of the priesthood as a body; collectively they were the Lord's authorized ministry, his angel to make known to the people the things pertaining to his will and worship. And the same explanation substantially is to be given of a passage in Ecclesiastes, often little understood, ch. v. 4-6: "When thou vowest a vow unto God, defer not to pay it; for he hath no pleasure in fools: pay that which thou hast vowed. Better is it that thou shouldst not vow, than that thou shouldst vow and not pay. Suffer not thy mouth to cause thy flesh to sin; neither say thou before the angel that it was an error;" that is, neither rashly utter with thy lips what thou hast not moral strength and fixedness of purpose enough to perform; nor—if thou shouldst have uttered it—go before the priesthood, the Lord's delegated ministry to attend to such things, and say it was an error, thinking to get off by an easy confession, that thou hadst done wrong in making the vow. These later uses of the word angel, in the Old Testament, to denote those who were delegated by the Lord to do prophetic or priestly work—strictly, indeed, in each case, the work of authoritative instruction and oversight—serve also to explain the peculiar expression in the addresses to the seven churches of Asia in the Apocalypse, which were sent to "the angels of the churches." From the Old Testament usage, which is here undoubtedly followed, the word determines nothing as to the question, whether what is meant by angel was one individual or a collection of individuals; it simply designates the party, whether consisting of one or more, to whom belonged the authoritative instruction and oversight of the Christian community in the several churches, and by the very name suggests the greatness and responsibility of the trust.

Generally speaking, however, when angels are mentioned in Scripture, it is with reference to superhuman existences—rational and immortal beings, but spirits, as contradistinguished from men in flesh and blood, the tenants of regions suited to their ethereal natures, not occupying a local habitation on earth. Yet, even when thus limited, there is considerable latitude in the expression, and several orders of being are comprised in it. 1. First, there are those more commonly understood by the expression—the angels of heaven, or of God, as they are called, Mat. xxiv. 36; xlii. 41; Jn. 1. 61; Mat. xxii. 30. They are named in connection with heaven, as having their more peculiar abode there, where are also the brighter manifestations of the divine presence and glory, and which is always represented as, relatively to this world of ours, a higher and more blissful region. God's angels, also, they are emphatically called; not merely because they derived their being from him, and are sustained by his power—for this belongs to them in common with all creation—but more especially because they are in a state of peculiar nearness to God, and are his immediate agents in executing the purposes of his will. It is as possessing the ministry of such glorious agents, and possessing it in vast numbers as well as invincible strength, that he takes to himself the name of “the Lord of hosts”—the head of angelic myriads, who ever hearken to his voice, and are ready to fulfil his pleasure. 2. Then there are the angels of darkness, who are scarcely ever designated simply angels, or the angels, but usually with some qualifying terms, indicative of their real character and position—such as “the devil's angels,” as contrasted with the angels of God; or the “angels that sinned,” “that kept not their first estate,” in contradistinction, as well to what they themselves once were, as to the party that remained steadfast, Mat. xxv. 41; 2 Pa. ii. 4; Jude 6. 3. Finally, there is the angel, by way of eminence—one who, from the epithets applied to him, and the acts ascribed to him, appears to be infinitely raised above all besides who bear the name of angel—designated sometimes “the angel of the Lord's presence,” “the angel in whom his name is,” “the angel of the covenant and Lord of the temple,” “Michael the archangel,” Is. lxiii. 9; Ex. xxiii. 21; Mal. iii. 1; Jude 9, &c., and represented as offering up the prayers of God's people, discomfiting their enemies, and symbolically taking possession of the whole world as his proper heritage, Re. viii. 3; xii. 7; x. 2. It is uniformly but one being to whom such peculiar acts and designations are ascribed; they are never spoken of as belonging to a company, or as shared by one in common with some others; and, as they clearly imply divine properties, and performances strictly mediatorial and redemptive, they can be understood of none but the Lord Jesus Christ. Precisely as he was called “the apostle and high-priest of our profession,” from being in these respects the original and perfection of which others were but the copy; so in a sense altogether peculiar he bore the name of angel, because he was, as no other could be, the delegate of Heaven to sinful men—“He whom the Father sent” to reveal to them his counsel, and for ever establish the covenant of their peace.

It is only to those comprised in the first of these three divisions that the name of angels is distinctively appropriated, and respecting whom we have now to adduce the testimony and information of Scripture. This may be briefly presented under two points of inquiry—first, What, according to the revelations of Scripture, is their own state? and then, What, in relation to us, is their proper function and employment?

1. In regard to the first point, the language of Scripture always presents the angels to our view as in the most elevated state of intelligence, purity, and bliss. Endowed with faculties which fit them for the highest sphere of existence, they excel in strength, and without injury can endure the intuition of God, Pa. ciii. 20; Mat. xviii. 10. In moral excellence they are equally exalted, and are therefore called emphatically “the holy angels,” “elect angels,” “angels of light,” Mar. viii. 38; 1 Th. v. 21; 2 Co. xi. 14; and are represented as ever doing the will of God—doing it so uniformly and perfectly that we can seek for nothing higher and better in ourselves than to aim at being like them. Nor in the sphere of their being and enjoyment is there aught of want or disorder; all is in delightful harmony with their natural and moral perfections; and to have our destiny associated with theirs—our condition made equal to theirs, in its functions of life and elements of blessing—is set forth as the very glory of the resurrection-state to which Christ has called us, Lu. xx. 36; He. xii. 22. The two, indeed, may not be in all respects identical; but that which is exhibited as the pattern cannot, in any essential respect, be inferior to what is to be fashioned after it.

That the angelic state was from the first substantially what it still is can scarcely be doubted, from the general tenor of the scriptural representations. Yet, in these a certain change is indicated; not, indeed, from evil to good, or from feebleness to strength, but from a state in which it was at least possible to fall, to another in which this has ceased to be possible—to a state of abiding holiness and endless felicity. The actual fall and perdition of a portion of their number implies that, somehow, the possibility we speak of did at one period exist; and the angels that kept their first estate, and have received the designation of elect angels—yea, are ranked among the ministers and members of Christ's eternal kingdom—must have made some advance in the security of their condition. And this, we naturally think, must infer some advance also in relative perfection; for absolute security to rational beings in the enjoyment of life and blessing we can only conceive of as the result of absolute holiness; they have it—they alone, we imagine, can have it—in whom holiness has become so deeply rooted, so thoroughly pervasive of all the powers and susceptibilities of their being, that these can no longer feel and act but in subservience to holy aims and principles of righteousness. So far, therefore, the angels appear to have become what they now are—that a measure of security, and, by consequence, a degree of perfection—whether in spiritual knowledge or in moral energy—is now theirs, which sometime was not.

From the representations of Scripture, there is room also for another distinction in regard to the state of angels, though, like the one just noticed, it cannot be more than generally indicated or vaguely apprehended. The distinction we refer to is a diversity in rank and power, which, there seems ground for asserting, exists among the heavenly hosts. There are indications in Scripture of something like angelic orders. For, though the term archangel cannot be applied in this connection, being used only as the designation of a single personage—whom we take to be the Messiah—yet the name Gabriel (hero, or mighty one of God), assumed by the particular angel who announced to Zacharias the birth of John the Baptist, Lu. 1. 19, seems to import that he stood in some nearer relationship to God than others; it appears to distinguish him, not from men—for his angelic nature alone was there a sufficient distinction—but from other angels less elevated in power and glory. So also, in Re. xviii. 21, we read of “a mighty angel,” as if all were not precisely such. Then, in various places there is an accumulation of epithets, as of different orders, when referring to the heavenly inhabitants, as in Ep. i. 20, 21, where Christ is said to be exalted "above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come;" and in 1 Pe. iii. 22, where he is again said, in his heavenly exaltation, to have "angels, principalities, and powers made subject to him." But if such expressions appear to render probable or certain the existence of some kind of personal distinctions among the angels of glory, it leaves all minutest details respecting it under a veil of impenetrable secrecy. And to presume, like the ancient Jews, to single out four, or seven primary angels; or, like the Rabbins, to distribute the angelic hosts into ten separate classes; or, still again, with many of the Scholastics, to distribute them into nine orders or choirs, each consisting of three classes, regularly graduated in knowledge and authority, is vainly to intrude into those things which eye hath not seen, and to attempt being wise above what is written. Calvin, with his accustomed sense and gravity, remarks—"If we would be truly wise, we shall give no heed to those foolish notions which have been delivered by idle men concerning angelic orders, without warrant from the Word of God" (Inst. i. c. 14, 4).

In whatever the distinctions among angels may consist, or to whatever extent it may reach, it cannot in the least interfere with the happiness they individually enjoy. For this happiness arises, in the first instance, from each being in a proper relation to the Great Centre of life and blessing; and then, from their being appointed to occupy such a sphere, and take part in such services and employments, as are altogether adapted to their state and faculties. These fundamental conditions being preserved, it is easy to conceive how certain diversities, both in natural capacity and in relative position, may be perfectly compatible with their mutual satisfaction and general well-being, and may even contribute to secure it. For it may tend to the happy order and adjustment of the several parts.

2. The information of Scripture is somewhat more varied and specific upon the other point of inquiry—their proper function and employment in relation to us; for it is with this that we have more especially to do. In not a few passages their knowledge of what pertains to affairs on earth is distinctly intimated; and their interest also in it is expressed, as yielding an occasion of joy, or a deeper insight into the purposes of God. Thus, they are spoken of as frequently taking part in communications made from heaven to earth—as desiring to look into the things which concern the scheme of salvation—as learning from the successive evolution of the divine plan more than they otherwise knew of God's manifold wisdom—as rejoicing together at the birth of Jesus, and even over the return of individual wanderers to his fold, 1 Pa. i. 12; Ep. iii. 10; Lu. ii. 13; xv. 10. But there are other passages in which they are represented as directly and actively ministering to the good of believers, and shielding or delivering them from the evils incident to their earthly lot. The office of angels in this respect was distinctly understood even in Old Testament times, as is implied alone in the name the "Lord of hosts," so often given there to God in his relation to the covenant-people—in the frequent interposition of angels to disclose tidings or accomplish works of deliverance—and in such general assurances as these, "The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them;" "He shall give his angels charge concerning thee to keep thee in all thy ways; they shall bear thee up in their hands, lest thou dash thy foot against a stone," Ps. xxiiv. 7; xci. 11, 12. Similar representations of angelic agency are contained in New Testament scripture, and occupy, indeed, a more prominent place, in conformity with the general character and design of the gospel to render more patent the connection between this lower world and the world of spirits. So that it is only what might have been expected beforehand, when we learn that our Lord, in the days of his flesh, was from time to time ministered to by the angels; that, on ascending to the regions of glory, he had the angels made subject to him for carrying forward the operations of his kingdom; that various commissions of importance were executed through their instrumentality during the lifetime of the apostles; and that, generally, the doctrine concerning them is announced, for the comfort of believers, "that they are all ministering spirits sent forth to minister to those who are heirs of salvation," Mar. i. 13; Lu. xxi. 43; Phi. ii. 10; 1 Pa. iii. 21; Ac. xii. 1; He. i. 14.

In regard, however, to the kind of services which are actually rendered to believers by the ministry of angels, or the benefits which may justly be expected from it, we know too little of the nexus which binds together in any particular case the world of sense with the world of spirits, to be able with much accuracy to determine. Negatively, we can so far define as to exclude from the field of their agency the actual communication of life and grace to the soul. Nowhere is this ascribed to them in Scripture; on the contrary, it is uniformly represented as an essentially divine work, and therefore not to be accomplished by a created agency. Father, Son, and Spirit are here the only effective agents, working, in so far as subordinate means are employed, through a human, not an angelic instrumentality, in connection with the word and ordinances of the gospel. The things which come within the sphere of angelic ministration bear incidentally upon the work of salvation, rather than directly touch it; and, as regards the ordinary history of the Church and the common experience of believers, they have to do with the averting of evils which might too seriously affect the interests of righteousness, or the bringing about of results and operations in the world which are fitted to promote them. When it is reflected how much even the children of God are dependent upon circumstances of good or evil, and how much for the cause of God, whether in the world at large or in the case of single individuals, often turns upon a particular event in providence, one can easily see what ample room there may be in the world for such timely and subtle influences as the quick messengers of light are capable of imparting. It might be too much to say, as has occasionally been said by divines, that all the beneficent powers of nature are under angelic direction, and that every auspicious event is owing to their interference; there are, at least, no sufficient grounds in Scripture on which to build so sweeping an inference. But, on the other hand, it is equally possible to err in the opposite direction; and as Scripture gives us clearly to understand, that there are myriads of angelic beings in the heavenly world, who are continually ascending and descending on errands of mercy for men on earth, it may not be doubted that, in many a change which takes place around us, there are important operations performed by them, as well as by the ostensible actors and by the material agencies of nature.

But whatever individuals or the collective body of believers may owe to this source, there are certain laws and limitations under which it must always be understood to be conveyed. The fundamental ground of these is, that the efficiency of angels is essentially different from that of the several Persons of the Godhead; it is such merely as one finite being is capable of exercising toward another. Consequently, it never can involve any violent interference with the natural powers of thought and reason in those who are the subjects of it; it must adapt itself to the laws of reciprocal action established between finite beings, and so can only work to the hand, or set bounds to the actings of nature, cannot bring into play elements that are absolutely new. Hence, as a further necessary deduction, all that is done by angels must be done in connection with, and by means of natural causes; and only by intensifying, or in some particular way directing these, can they exert any decisive influence on the events in progress. Thus, at the Pool of Bethesda the angel's power wrought through the waters, not independently of them; at Herod Agrippa's death, through the worms that consumed him; at the jail of Philippi, through the earthquake that shook the foundations of the building; and if thus in these more peculiar, certainly not less in the more regular and ordinary interpositions of their power. But this takes nothing from the comfort or efficacy of their ministrations; it only implies that these ministrations are incapable of being viewed apart from the channels through which they come, and that the beings who render them are not to be taken as the objects of a personal regard and adoring reverence. Hence, while the hearts of believers are cheered by the thought of the ministry of angels, the worshipping of angels has been from the first expressly interdicted, Col. ii. 18; Re. xxii. 9.

Various fanciful and groundless notions have been entertained on the subject of angelic ministrations, and still to some extent prevail; such as that a part of their number are separated for the special work of praise in the heavenly places, and observe hours of devotion; that angels act as a kind of subordinate intercessors, mediating between believers and Christ; that individual angels are appointed as guardians to particular persons, or (as it has sometimes been believed) that each individual has both a good and a bad angel attending on him in particular. Of such notions, this latter idea of guardian angels to every believer, and even to every child, is the only one that in Protestant countries can be said now to find support; it is based more especially on the saying of our Lord in Mat. xviii. 10, "Take heed, that ye despise not one of these little ones; for I say unto you, that in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father, which is in heaven." Our Lord, however, is not speaking here of little children as such, but of his disciples under the character of little children (whom, in humility and lowliness of spirit, he had presented as their proper type); nor does he speak of individual relationships subsisting between these and the angels, but rather of the common interest they have in angelic ministrations, ready to be applied as each one of them has need. But of a separate guardianship for each individual, there is not a word dropped here, nor in any other part of Scripture. Even in Ac. xii. 7, where a very special work had to be done for Peter by the hand of an angel, there is nothing of the historian's own that implies any individual or personal relationship of the one to the other; the angel is not called Peter's angel, nor is the angel represented as waiting upon him like a tutelary guardian; on the contrary, he is designated "the angel of the Lord," and is spoken of as coming to Peter to do the particular office required, and departing again from him when it was done. It is true, the inmates of Mary's house, when they could not credit the report of the damsel, that Peter himself was at the door, said, as if finding in the thought the only conceivable explanation of the matter, "It is his angel." But, as Ode has justly remarked (De Angelis, § viii. c. 4), "It is not everything that is recorded by the evangelists as spoken by the Jews, or even by the disciples of Christ, which is sound and worthy of credit. Nor can what in this particular case was true of Peter be affirmed of all believers, or ought it to be so. And, indeed, that Peter himself did not believe that a particular angel was assigned to him for guardianship, clearly enough appears from this, that when Peter got out of the prison, and followed the angel as his guide, he did not as yet know it to be true that an angel was the actor, but thought he saw a vision; and at length, after the departure of the angel, having come to himself, he said, 'Now, I know of a surety that the Lord hath sent his angel, and delivered me from the hand of Herod.'" ANKLET; an ornament made of gold, silver, or ivory, and worn about the ankle by the gayer portion of the female sex in various oriental countries, both in ancient and in modern times, for the purpose chiefly of attracting notice, and drawing upon them the eyes of men. They were so constructed as to produce a sort of tinkling noise when the person walked; and, though they are not expressly named in Scripture, yet they are undoubtedly referred to by Isaiah, when, among other excesses in the use of female ornaments, he describes the daughters of Zion as "walking and mincing as they go, and making a tinkling with their feet," ch. iii. 16. It has been supposed that they are also alluded to in the Koran, (c. xxv.), where, amid various injunctions respecting proper modesty of attire and behaviour, women are ordered "not to make a noise with their feet, that their ornaments which they hide may be discovered." Such is Sale's translation; but Savary renders, "Let them not move about their feet, so as to allow those charms to be seen which ought to be veiled," so that it may well be doubted if the passage contains any allusion to anklets. Ornaments of this description, however, were undoubtedly in frequent use among many of the ancient nations, and to this day still exist in Egypt, India, and elsewhere throughout the East. Specimens are given of them in the ring form by Wilkinson (Ancient Egyptians, iii. 375), and by Lane in his Modern Egyptians, iii. App. A. He says of them— "Anklets (khulkhal) of solid gold or silver, and of the form here sketched, are worn by some ladies, but are more uncommon than they formerly were. They are, of course, very heavy, and, knocking together as the wearer walks, make a ringing noise: hence, it is said in a song, 'The ringing of thine anklets has deprived me of reason.'" He adds, a little further on, that

"small khulhâts of iron are worn by many children. It was also a common custom among the Arabs for girls or young women to wear a string of bells on their feet. I have seen many little girls in Cairo with small round bells attached to their anklets." He thinks that it is to anklets of this description that the prophet Isaiah probably alludes in the passage above referred to; but that may be doubted.

ANNA, daughter of Phanuel, of the tribe of Asher, and, at the period when she is mentioned in the gospel narrative, a widow of the advanced age of eighty-four. She is described as a prophetess, not probably from any regular or stated manifestation of prophetic gifts, but because she was one of those whose hearts were more steadfastly set on the expectation of Messiah's advent, and, by the superior grace conferred on her, was enabled to announce his presence when he actually appeared in the temple, and broke forth on the occasion in words of thanksgiving and praise, Lu. ii. 36, 37. That she should have been enabled at such a time to take this part, indicated the possession of a certain measure of the prophetic spirit. The more peculiar notice, however, which is given of this pious woman, is contained in the words, "She was of a great age, and had lived with an husband seven years from her virginity, and departed not from the temple, but served (God) with fastings and prayers night and day." The meaning of this statement plainly is, that Anna had lived but seven years in the married state; that having then lost her husband, instead of marrying again, or taking up with other things, she devoted herself to a life of fasting and prayer, continually attending upon the ministrations of the sanctuary. Not that she actually had apartments in the temple buildings—for there is no reason to suppose that any females had such—but that she stately presented herself there among the worshippers, and took part in the services which were proceeding. Even from the earliest times there seem to have been pious females dedicating themselves thus to a sort of priest-like consecration and constant service; for at Ex. xxxviii. 8 the laver of brass is said to have been made out of the mirrors of the women who daily assembled at the door of the tabernacle; it is, literally, the serving-women who served. Anna, in her latter years, joined herself to this class; and in answer to her faithful and devoted service, had the high honour conferred on her of becoming one of the immediate heralds of the Saviour of the world.

ANNAS, called in Josephus ANANUS, is first mentioned by St. Luke along with Caiaphas, as being together high-priests at the period when John the Baptist entered on his ministry, Lu. iii. 2. He is mentioned a few years later in the narrative of our Lord's last sufferings, not as the high-priest, but as the father-in-law of Caiaphas, who at the time held the office, and as having a considerable sway in the management of affairs, for when Christ was seized by the band of officers he was first led away to Annas, Ja. xviii. 13. And again, at a period somewhat, though not very much later, he reappears in the narrative of St. Luke in connection with the persecution of the apostles, and is styled simply the high-priest, while Caiaphas, John, and Alexander are coupled with him as his coadjutors and kindred, Ac. iv. 6. By comparing the history of Josephus (Ant. xviii. 2, 1; xx. 10, 1), we learn that, during the active ministry of our Lord, and for some years afterwards, the office of high-priest, in its stricter sense, was filled by Caiaphas. But the term high-priest (see ABIATHAR) was very commonly used of those who, though not in possession of the office, shared with its possessor the higher places of judicial power and authority; for, as matters stood in the apostolic age, the mere work of ministering in holy things, peculiar to the high-priest's office, comprised but a small part of the prerogatives connected with it. And there never, perhaps, was a person who, for a longer period, and with a more influential sway, exercised those accessories of priestly rank than the Annas before us. He had been himself high-priest for upwards of twenty years, and no fewer than five of his sons, and his son-in-law Caiaphas, successively held the office, so that he could scarcely fail to be regarded as a sort of perpetual high-priest; so far, indeed, as administration was concerned, the virtual high-priest, whether he was actually in the office or not. This sufficiently explains why he should have been called high-priest along with Caiaphas, by Luke, and why so prominent a share should have been ascribed to him both by Luke and John in the transactions of the gospel era. And there is no need for going into the question whether he may not have held the official presidency of the Sanhedrim, even when he had ceased to be high-priest; a question which there are not sufficient materials for determining, and one on which, in such a case as this, nothing can be said to depend.

ANNUNCIATION. See MARY.

ANOINT, ANOINTING. The practice of anointing with oil, or with oil intermingled with certain perfumes, seems to have been of great antiquity in the warm regions of the South and East. Its use falls into two leading divisions—the common and the sacred; the one being designed for purposes of invigoration or refreshment, the other as a symbol and means of consecration.

1. Probably the earliest authentic notice or representation of the use of oil for any special purpose, is that in the history of Jacob, when, after his remarkable dream at Bethel, he poured oil on the stone that had served him for a pillow. This belongs to the religious use of oil; but as the religious in this, as in other things, doubtless had its foundation in the natural, no reasonable doubt can be entertained that the patriarchs were then in the habit of employing it on ordinary occasions. In Egypt the practice of anointing, at least the heads of persons, was so common in ancient times that it appears to have been among the civilities which were shown to guests when they entered the house where they were to be entertained.

The practice was equally common among the Greeks. In the apostolic age it was so common among the Jews of Palestine that our Lord could notice the omission of it by Simon the Pharisee as a plain mark of coldness, if not a breach of civility, Lu. vii. 46. But the unguents used on such occasions in later times seem to have been perfumes rather than oils, at least they were compositions in which the fragrance of the perfume was regarded as the more peculiar excellence. Such, especially, were those contained in alabaster boxes or porcelain vases, which had so strong an odour, and in which the several ingredients were so finely blended, that the vessel has been known to retain its scent for hundreds of years. In the simpler and earlier form, however, in which the custom of anointing was practised, the oily substance appears to have been the principal, if not the only article employed; and the main object in using it was the preservation of the health and elasticity of the bodily frame. For this it was serviceable in the hot and arid countries of the East. The clothing there is necessarily thin, and the exposure to heat and sand naturally induces a feeling of lassitude, or sometimes of irritation, which the application of oil is fitted to relieve. The strong evaporation, also, caused by the heat, requires to be met by oily and odoriferous unguents. "Anointing the skin prevents the excessive evaporation of the fluids of the body, and acts as clothing in both sun and shade."—(Livingstone's Travels in S. Africa, p. 246.) In like manner the elder Niebuhr testifies that in Yemen, where the climate is only some degrees warmer than in Palestine, "the anointing of the body is believed to strengthen and protect it from the heat of the sun, by which the inhabitants of this province, as they wear but little clothing, are very liable to suffer. Oil, by closing up the pores of the skin, is supposed to prevent that too copious perspiration which enfeebles the frame. When the intense heat comes in they always anoint their bodies with oil." The allusions to the practice, in Old and New Testament scripture, are of great frequency, although, in by far the greater number of instances, it is evidently spoken of as a species of luxury, as connected with refreshment, invigoration, and gladness still more than with health, and therefore, in all probability, consisting in the application of perfumed oil, and that not so much to the body generally as to the head. In a variety of passages it is directly mentioned as a source of hilarity and joy, as in Ps. xxiii. 5, "Thou anointest my head with oil;" Ps. xiv. 7; Pr. xxi. 17, "He that loveth wine and oil shall not be rich;" ch. xxvii. 9, "Ointment and perfume rejoice the heart." In another set of passages the disuse of it in times of mourning is represented as a fit and proper thing, among other signs and accompaniments of grief; as at 2 Sa. xiv. 2, where the widow of Tekoah, when disguising herself as a mourner, is enjoined not to anoint herself with oil; and in like manner Daniel, when engaged in exercises of fasting and humiliation, tells us he did not anoint himself at all, ch. x. 3; comp. also 1a. lxi. 3; Mt. vi. 15; Mat. vi. 17. In still another class of passages the use of oil with the sick is spoken of as customary and proper, partly, it would appear, as a medicament, and partly as a proof of kind and sympathetic treatment, Is. i. 6; Mar. vi. 13; Ja. v. 14. In these two latter cases, which mention the use of oil in immediate connection with the cure of the diseased—the miraculous cure in one of the cases at least, if not in both—there is probably some reference to the symbolical import which oil came to bear in things pertaining to the glory and service of God, so that they may in part be referred to the next division.

2. It is rather singular that the first instance on record of the religious use of oil—that already referred to, of Jacob's anointing the stone at Bethel—has respect, not to a person, but to a thing. It was evidently designed to be a formal consecration of the stone, or the spot where it lay, to a sacred purpose; though, under what consideration oil was employed to that end, and why oil rather than several other things that might be named, no indication whatever is given in the narrative. The intercourse with Egypt had as yet scarcely commenced on the part of the chosen family; and there is no ground for affirming it to have been derived from that quarter; we might rather suppose it had descended from the rites and customs of primeval times. It is certain, however, that oil was used at a very early period in Egypt for purposes of consecration. Monarchs at their coronation were thus set apart, and were called "the anointed of the gods." So we are told by Wilkinson (ch. xv.), who adds, "With the Egyptians, as with the Jews, the investiture to any sacred office, as that of king or priest, was confirmed by this external sign; and as the Jewish lawgiver mentions the ceremony of pouring oil upon the head of the high-priest after he had put on his entire dress, with the mitre and crown, the Egyptians represent the anointing of their priests and kings after they were attired in their full robes, with the cap and crown upon their head. Some of the sculptures introduce a priest pouring oil over the monarch, in the presence of Thoth, Hor-Hat, Ombte, or Nilus, which may be considered a representation of the ceremony before the statues of those gods. The functionary who officiated was the high-priest of the king. He was clad in a leopard skin, and was the same who attended on all occasions which required him to assist or assume the duties of the monarch in the temple. They also anointed the statues of the gods ; which was done with the little finger of the right hand."

The formal agreement above noticed by Sir G. Wilkinson, between the use of oil among the Egyptians and the Israelites in consecrating to an office, may undoubtedly be regarded as evidence that the Mosaic prescription was framed with some regard to the observances in Egypt ; for by the time the former was instituted, the Israelitish people had been long habituated to the customs of Egypt ; and it was the part of wisdom, when setting up a better polity, to take advantage of what existed there, so far as it could be safely employed. But then it must be borne in mind, that the formal coincidence in such cases by no means argued a substantial agreement, and that the real meaning of the observance in the two cases may have been very different—it must, indeed, have been so ; for all symbolical institutions necessarily derive their distinctive value and signifi- cance from the character of the religion with which they are associated ; they embody, in some respect or another, its spirit and design ; and between the Egyptian and the Jewish religion, there was this grand fundamental disparity, that the one was only a deification of nature, while the other was throughout moral, based on the spiritual and righteous character of God. Hence the consecration of a king or a statue by the effusion of oil in an Egyptian temple had nothing of what may be called the morally sacred about it ; it merely indicated to the spectators that the subject of it was recognized by the god of the temple, and was treated with that mark of personal consideration which it was usual for men in their dwellings to bestow on such persons and things as they sought specially to honour or exalt. The king so anointed was solemnly recognized as the guest and protégé of the lord of the temple ; the statue was set apart for, and so far identified with, the god it represented, and both were stamped as fit for their respective destinations. But in the true religion something more and higher was involved in the act of consecration. The article or subject was brought into contact with the holiness of Jehovah, and was made a vessel and instrument of the Spirit of God. Hence, anointing with oil in the times of the old covenant was always a symbol of the gift and grace of the Holy Spirit—in the case of inanimate objects imparting to them a ceremonial sacredness, so as to fit them for holy ministrations ; and in the case of persons, not only designating them to a sacred office, but sealing to them the spiritual qualifications needed for its efficient discharge. Hence, after describing the preparation for the oil which was to be used in the work of consecration, it is said, "And thou shalt sanctify them, that they (the sanctuary and its furniture) may be most holy ; whatsoever toucheth them shall be holy. And thou shalt anoint Aaron and his sons, and consecrate them, that they may minister unto me in the priest's office," Ex. xxx. 29, 30.

In later passages of Scripture, the meaning of the rite is brought out still more distinctly, and its respect to the gift of the Holy Spirit left without any doubt. Thus, when Saul was anointed to be king, Samuel added, "And the Spirit of the Lord shall come upon thee," 1 Sa. x. 6. And when David was appointed in the room of Saul, we are told, "Then Samuel took the horn of oil, and anointed him in the midst of his brethren ; and the Spirit of the Lord came upon David from that day forward (along with the sign he got the thing signified) ; but the Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul," 1 Sa. xvi. 13-14—having forfeited his right to the blessing, his former anointing now became to him but an empty ceremony. The same connection is brought out by Isaiah prophetically of the Messiah, when he introduces the latter as speaking, "The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach good tidings to the meek," Is. lxi. 1—a causal connection : the Spirit is upon me, because he hath anointed me ; for, in Messiah's case, there could be no separation between the form and the reality. Indeed, in the actual history of Jesus, the form itself fell into abeyance, the reality alone comes into view ; without any external anointing, the Spirit of the Lord descended upon him without measure. But the prophet spake from the Old Testament point of view, in which everything presented itself under the aspect of shadow and symbol. When New Testament times come these fall away, while the language derived from them is still often retained. Hence, in Ac. iv. 27, the apostles, in their address to God, say of Jesus, "Thy holy child whom thou hast anointed ;" and still more expressly Peter, in his speech to Cornelius, "God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost and with power," Ac. x. 38. So also of Christians generally, it is said by Paul, "He who hath anointed us is God," 2 Co. i. 21 ; and by John, "Ye have an unction from the Holy One, and ye know all things," 1 Jn. ii. 20.

The practice of anointing with oil as regards persons in Old Testament times, was almost entirely confined to those who attained to the higher offices of king and priest. There is only one distinct occasion on record, in which anointing is mentioned in connection with the designation of a prophet ; it is in respect to Elisha, when chosen to take the place of Elijah, 1 Ki. xix. 16 ; and it was so on that particular occasion, probably because, in the peculiar circumstances of the time, the call to prophetic ministrations assumed more than usually the character of a specific office or function to be discharged. Elisha was, in a manner, to judge for God in Israel, and to exercise a kind of supernatural authority and control. Even in this case, however, it may be doubted whether there was any actual effusion of oil, and whether the casting of Elijah's mantle over Elisha did not itself constitute the act of anointing. For, that the term was sometimes employed even in Old Testament times, when there was no actual administration of oil, is evident from Is. xlv. 1, where Cyrus is spoken of as anointed by God. If oil was used, it would probably be not simple oil, but, as in the case of the priesthood, a compound of various sweet spices mixed with olive oil. These are called in our version stacte, onycha, and galbanum, Ex. xxx. 34; but the names are somewhat conjectural; and nothing further can be affirmed regarding the compound, than that it was doubtless formed in such a manner as to yield the most fragrant and refreshing perfume; so that, from its delightful and exhilarating influence on the bodily sense, it might aptly image the blissful effect of the Spirit's grace on the soul.

After the explanations that have been given, it is scarcely necessary to do more than notice, that the terms Messiah and Christ have become personal designations of the Redeemer, simply on the ground of his anointing in the spiritual sense. (See CHRIST.) In an inferior sense, both priests and kings were called the Lord's anointed ones, or his Messiahs, as it might be rendered (for example, La. vi. 22; 1 Ch. xvi. 22). But the distinctive name of the Messiah, or Anointed One, came in the later books of Old Testament scripture to be appropriated to Him, on whom the hopes and expectations of God's people were hung, Pa. ii. 2; Da. ix. 25, 26.

ANT [אַנְתּ, nemálah], the name of a family of four-winged insects (Formicidæ), very numerous in species, and abundant in every country in the world except the Arctic regions. The ants, more than any other insects, manifest that division of the body into segments which characterizes their class (insectum, cut into); the abdomen is connected with the thorax by an exceedingly slender pedicle, and frequently the former division of the body is subdivided into segments, which are connected only by a similarly attenuated thread. This remarkable appearance is doubtless commemorated in the Hebrew name, from אָנַף, námal, to cut off, to circumcise, Ge. xvii. 11.

To some of our readers it may seem strange that ants should be considered four-winged insects, whereas they may have never seen a winged individual among the thousands of ants they may have looked upon. The fact is, this tribe presents the curious anomaly (paralleled also in the Termites, or white ants, of another order) of three forms of individuals—we might almost say, three sexes. The males and females are furnished with four wings on their leaving the chrysalis state, but soon drop them spontaneously. These are compara-at all. These are sexless, but are considered as imperfectly developed females.

No insects are more deservedly celebrated than these for that wonderfully elaborate instinct which imitates the actings of reason, and that not the reason of the isolated and selfish savage, but of the civilized man, living in society, and labouring with self-denying toil and well-directed energy for the general benefit of the commonwealth. In the societies of bees, there is the semblance of a central authority, which we have agreed to call the queen, and so those industrious insects are poetically assumed to live under monarchical government; but no such conspicuous personage exists in an ant's nest, and these may be considered true republicans, who carry on their labours without "guide, overseer, or ruler," Pr. vi. 7, prompted by the unerring instinct implanted in the sensorium of each.

In two passages of the book just cited, Pr. vi. 6-8; xxx. 24, 25, the ant is held up as an example of diligence, and, according to the plain sense of the words, of that prudence which provides in a time of plenty for the season of scarcity. Thus Solomon, in the former passage, sends the sluggard to the ant for wisdom, "which provideth her meat in the summer, and gathereth her food in the harvest." And Agur, in the latter passage, extols their exceeding wisdom, because, though little and not strong, "yet they prepare their meat in the summer."

These statements have acquired a more than usual measure of notoriety, because it has been supposed that they present an example of popular error in natural history, which the investigations of modern science have refuted. A great multitude of ancient writers have asserted that ants store up grains of corn in their nests, gathering them in the harvest; and modern popular belief has confirmed the assertion, adding to it the remarkable circumstance that the plumule, or germinating point, is carefully bitten out of every grain, before it is committed to the subterranean granary, lest it should sprout and become unfit for food in the damp earth. "Any one," says Addison, in his interesting paper, No. 156 of the Guardian, "may make the experiment, and even see that there is no germ in their corn."

Now the precision of modern science has shown that our European ants do not eat corn; but that they do take care of, and carry to and fro, objects which in shape, size, and colour bear so close a resemblance to grains of wheat, as readily to deceive a cursory observer. These objects, however, are the pupæ of the young brood in their cocoons. It has hence been somewhat hastily concluded, that the whole belief of antiquity on the subject has been erroneous, and that the statement, though backed by the authority of the sacred writers, must be consigned to the category of vulgar errors.¹

We had need, however, to be very sure of our facts when we attempt to correct the Spirit of God. Neither Solomon nor Agur expressly names "corn," as stored up: "food," "meat," are the general terms used; and though harvest is named, it may be understood only as the time when the "food," whatever it be, is abundant. It is now known that European ants subsist largely on the saccharine juice secreted by aphides, and exuded by the latter expressly at the solicitation of the former; nay, tively few in number; but there is another race, which are the workers, and which constitute the main body of the teeming population, which never have any wings

the highest authority on the subject, M. Huber, confirmed by others, has ascertained that the ants imprison a number of aphides in their nests, to serve during the winter for their supply, like milch cows in a paddock.

But we have evidence bearing on the question still more directly. Colonel Sykes, an accomplished zoologist, finds an oriental ant which literally bears out the statements of Solomon and Agur: he has named it Atta providens. The following note from his diary illustrates the habits of this interesting species:—

“Poonah (India), June 19, 1829.—In my morning walk I observed more than a score of little heaps of grass-seeds (panicum) in several places, on uncultivated land near the parade ground; each heap contained about a handful. On examination I found they were raised by the above species of ant, hundreds of which were employed in bringing up the seeds to the surface from a store below: the grain had probably got wet at the setting in of the monsoon, and the ants had taken advantage of the first sunny day to bring it up to dry. The store must have been laid up from the time of the ripening of the grass-seeds in January and February. As I was aware this fact militated against the observations of entomologists in Europe, I was careful not to deceive myself by confounding the seeds of a panicum with the pupæ of the insect. Each ant was charged with a single seed; but as it was too weighty for many of them, and as the strongest had some difficulty in scaling the perpendicular sides of the cylindrical hole leading to the nest below, many were the falls of the weaker ants with their burdens from near the summit to the bottom. I observed they never relaxed their hold; and with a perseverance affording a useful lesson to humanity, steadily recommenced the ascent after each successive tumble, nor halted in their labour until they had crowned the summit, and lodged their burden on the common heap.” “On the 13th of October of the same year,” adds the same naturalist, “after the closing thunderstorms of the monsoon, I found this species in various places similarly employed as they had been in June preceding: one heap contained a double handful of grass-seeds. It is probable that the Atta providens is a field species of ant, as I have not observed it in houses.”

The Rev. T. W. Hope, an entomologist of known eminence, in a memoir on the same subject, comments on the above statement. He cites many authors, not only of classical antiquity, but Persian and Arabic writers, who maintain that ants collect and store up their food, contrary to the belief of modern entomologists. Then he observes:—“If Colonel Sykes is accurate in his statements—and he can scarcely be otherwise, for he has specimens of the seeds he saw the ants bringing up from below to the heap on the surface of the earth, specimens of the grass producing the seed, and he wrote down in his diary the same day the facts as he had witnessed them—I think it will be seen at once that his facts tend to confirm the opinion of the ancients, that ants provide against a season of need, call it winter, or any other season. . . . So little is known respecting the economy of our indigenous insects, and even less regarding exotic species, that it would be rash to hazard a decided opinion concerning them. And it will be borne in mind (as we find to be the case among some species of birds and mammalia), that a habit which characterizes a species in a particular climate, is no longer the characteristic of that species in a different climate. The same species of animal that hibernates in extra-tropical climates no longer does so within the tropics. It will be borne in mind also that, in the great family of the ants, the species of some genera may have a provident instinct, and others be destitute of it. . . . I think it probable that the ant of which Solomon has made mention belongs to the genus Atta.”²

It may not be out of place to adduce the parallel economy of a tribe of insects, which, though they belong to another zoological order, so greatly resemble ants in their most remarkable peculiarities, as to be popularly associated with them. We refer to the white ants (Termites), so abundant in all tropical countries. These, too, form populous societies, living in commonwealth, in elaborate structures, which are constructed by the united labours of the whole. We have not any detailed accounts of the oriental species; but in the minute and careful description, by Smeathman, of the African kinds, he speaks of their magazines of stored food. These are “chambers of clay, always well filled with provisions, which to the naked eye seem to consist of the raspings of wood, and plants which the termites destroy: but are found by the microscope to be principally the gums and inspissated juices of plants. These are thrown together in little masses, some of which are finer than others, and resemble the sugar about preserved fruits; others are like tears of gum, one quite transparent, another like amber, a third brown, and a fourth quite opaque, as we see often in parcels of ordinary gums.”³

ANTEDILUVIAN AGE. There are certain distinctive characteristics of the age before the flood, as exhibited in the brief narratives of that period in Old Testament scripture, which will be more advantageously considered together, than distributed into separate articles. They fall naturally into two divisions—those which respect the divine administration toward man, and those which respect the conduct of men toward God and toward each other.

1. The divine administration during the antediluvian period of the world's history, appears to have been characterized above all subsequent ages by the general mildness and forbearance that distinguished it. Whether it might be, that the Lord thought good, for the better display of his paternal character, to restrain the natural consequences of the fall till the moral had more fully developed themselves, or because the infancy of the human race required to have indulgences extended to it which in after ages were wisely withheld, there certainly are appearances that seem to mark a restraint on the judicial procedure of God, and a singular extension of merely natural powers and liberties. Thus, there is almost an entire absence of the stringent enactments and penalties of law. In the facts of creation, and the dispensations of God consequent on the fall, clear indications had been given to men of the greater landmarks of duty; and until it was seen what use should be made of these, the more specific forms of prohibition and command were fitly kept in abeyance. It was not yet the proper period of formal law. Hence, when Cain was found guilty of the atrocious murder of his brother, the sentence pronounced against him was very different from that afterwards promulgated—"Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed," Ge. ix. 6; it simply involved an exclusion from the society of his kindred, the necessity of retiring to a distance from their common residence, and a consequent aggravation of the difficulties attendant on the cultivation of the soil for his support; "the earth," it was said, "should henceforth not yield unto him her strength," that is, he should find it more difficult than formerly, from the disadvantages of his position, to obtain the means of sustenance by the labour of his hands. But when he complained of the severity of this sentence, and urged the possibility of his being fallen upon and destroyed as a common outlaw, he was so far reassured by the declaration, that sevenfold vengeance was to be taken of any one that might kill him for the murder of Abel, Ge. iv. 11-15. And so throughout the generations that followed, great leniency was exercised in regard to the infliction of judgment—a leniency which was abused only to the more prolific growth of wickedness and crime, and which in the long run so palpably failed in its object, that it required at last to be supplanted by the terrors of the most overwhelming judgment.

Another striking proof of the mild and beneficent rule in natural things, which characterized the divine procedure during the antediluvian period, appears in the longevity of the patriarchs who then lived. The term allotted them was, on an average, fully ten times as large as that which in later ages has been assigned as the measure of human life on earth. And one can easily perceive the mercifulness of the arrangement, as it gave to the original members of the human family, who had everything to learn for themselves, the advantage of a protracted experience to mature their skill and knowledge, and ample opportunities for imparting to others the benefit of their acquisitions. In regard, however, to the question, how the longevity itself may have been produced, and wherein lies the constitutional difference, as to human life, between the antediluvian and subsequent periods of the world's history, all must be matter of conjecture. Instances have occurred in comparatively recent times of persons living to the age of 150 and upwards, while again individuals have been known to go through the whole cycle of youth, manhood, and old age, and die at little more than 20 years old. The diversity in these cases is relatively as great as between the prolonged age attained by the antediluvians and the reduced longevity of modern times; while, in the one class of cases as well as the other, we are without any principle to account for the difference. Possibly, a very minute difference in the temperature of the antediluvian world, or of the ingredients entering into the composition of the atmosphere, may have been perfectly sufficient to account for the lengthened period which the human frame usually survived then, as compared with the limits prescribed to it now. But however produced, the facts referred to are sufficient to remove all objection against it on the ground of natural impossibility; and in the peculiar circumstances of the human family at that early period, it was worthy of the divine benignity to extend the term of life greatly beyond the limits within which it has been ultimately confined.

We have no very exact data for ascertaining what influence the longevity of the antediluvians might have had upon the population of the world, or at what rate of progress the population may have proceeded as compared with modern times. Most extravagant calculations have sometimes been made upon the subject; and a recent popular commentary tells us, that the population of the world at the time of the deluge "has even been estimated as high as two millions of millions," that is, more than two thousand times the number of its present inhabitants, after the work of increase has been going on for thousands of years. Such calculations are too extravagant to deserve refutation, and they derive no countenance whatever from the sacred records of the period. These not only leave altogether unnoticed any bearing the longevity of men might have upon the ratio of increase, but they contain notices which appear to indicate that the ratio was by no means great. For example, the birth of Seth—the son who was given to our first parents in the room of Abel—does not take place till 130 years after the creation; and though we cannot doubt that there were births in Adam's family of which no express notice is taken, yet when the third son specified, the one child of hope and blessing after Abel, stands at the distance of nearly a century and a half from the commencement of the human family, it is impossible to avoid the conviction that the births were comparatively few and far between. Then, in the representations given of antediluvian times, there is nothing that seems to indicate a wide dispersion of inhabitants over the surface of the earth, nor is there any appearance of distinct nations or kingdoms. On the contrary, the human family presents still the appearance of a kind of unity—divided, indeed, into two great sections, the Cainites and the believing portion, or followers of Abel; the latter, however, ultimately merging again, almost entirely, into the former—a state of things which can scarcely be conceived of, either on the one side or the other, as embracing a very extensive circuit, or even admitting much diversity of classes or interests. And still further, mention is made in those early records of only one centre of religious worship—that, namely, of the divine presence towards the east of the garden of Eden, from which Cain is said to have gone out, Ge. iv. 16; and also of but one preacher of righteousness (Noah), from the time that the work of judgment was distinctly announced and the general call to repentance began to be pressed upon the world. These things, taken collectively, seem to leave little room to doubt that the race of mankind was of comparatively limited amount down to the close of the antediluvian period, and was spread over no very extensive range of territory. This also is the result which physical considerations might have led us to arrive at as the most probable; since it is but very gradually, and in consequence of changes and accretions forming through successive ages, that the soil of the earth became properly fitted for the support of man and beast. At first, it is probable, a limited portion only of its surface was capable of yielding a fair produce; and when, with the general thinness and poverty of the soil, we take into account the comparative want of skill and resources that must for a considerable time have existed as to its proper cultivation, it is against all reasonable belief to suppose, that the first inhabited region should have been equal to the comfortable support of what would now be reckoned a numerous and teeming population. The necessities of the time may rather be said to have demanded a slow rate of increase, and a population far from densely compacted; it may even be regarded as an essential proof of the divine benignity toward the inhabitants of the antediluvian world, to have restrained both their numbers, and the territory they occupied, within comparatively moderate limits.

2. The characteristics on the other side, those which appeared in the conduct of men toward God and toward each other, were far from presenting a proper correspondence with the procedure of God. If the one was marked by its mildness and benignity, the other was not less marked by its general lawlessness and violence. This is the leading feature that is brought out in the history of antediluvian times, although other points are incidentally noticed. It is evident from what is recorded, that considerable advance was made during the period in the arts of civilization and improvement; and so far from emerging out of a state of barbarism, in which men burrowed under ground, and fed on roots and spontaneous products of the earth, they appear from the first in the exercise of intelligent foresight, and the possession of a certain degree of civilization, which only required to grow in the multitude and variety of its resources. Cain, the first son of the human pair, became a tiller of the ground, as his brother Abel was a feeder of sheep—both doubtless taught how to pursue their respective occupations by their common parent. When Cain was forced by his unnatural crime to retire to some distance from the original centre of the human family, he did not betake to the manners of savage life, but built for himself a city. It must, of course, have been a city of small dimensions, resembling more what we understand by a village; but in its very projection it implied a certain degree of knowledge and art, an appreciation of the advantages of social life, and, at the same time, perhaps an effort to alleviate by means of human companionship the apprehensions and consequences of guilt. This last may even have been the more immediate prompter of the undertaking; but skill and art must have been at hand to second the design and bring it into shape. Other things came afterwards—the invention of instruments of music, of harps and organs, tools of brass and iron, and not only the cultivation of the vine, but the manufacture of wine from its fruit, of which the sad incident in Noah's declining years proved too mournful a witness. There can be no doubt, therefore, that the antediluvian period was one of civilization, and, in the Cainite line especially, one of invention and progress.

It were well, however, if this were the only kind of progress indicated in antediluvian life; but the advancement in natural skill and resources was accompanied with a fearful progression in moral evil. It would seem that the superiority of the elder, the Cainite branch of the human family, in inventive and useful arts was turned into an occasion of domineering pride, and violent usurpation and wrong toward their fellowmen. For, immediately after the notices given of their workmanship in brass and iron, and apparently in efficient connection with these, the inspired narrative proceeds to make mention of deeds of outrage and bloodshed, Ge. iv. 21-24. And when this line of procedure was once generally entered on, we can readily conceive how the forbearance and benignity which characterized the divine administration, the comparative freedom that was enjoyed from the restraints and penalties of law, and the protracted duration of human life, would tend to swell the tide of the world's depravity, and make the worse portion of mankind in a great degree indifferent to the consequences of their proceedings. The goodness of God, instead of leading men to repentance, was only taken as an encouragement to sin, and nursed the lawlessness of their spirits to proceed to further excesses.

There were, doubtless, checks of various kinds interposed—rebukes and judgments in providence, from time to time administered, that ought to have arrested the progress of iniquity. Among the more remarkable of these was the protest raised against the prevailing wickedness by the pre-eminently godly life of Enoch, and the loud warning note of coming judgment which he uttered before he was translated. Nor was his translation itself a more marked seal of the divine approval of the piety which distinguished Enoch, than a condemnation of the evil courses against which he had habitually witnessed. But whatever means of a repressive or reformatory kind were used, they all failed of the proper effect. The ungodly section of the human family continually encroached upon the other; so that at last, it is said, "the sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair, and took to them wives of all which they chose," Ge. vi. 2; by forbidden alliances they broke down the barriers that should have continued to separate the good from the evil, and gave rise to a general deprivation of order and rectitude. That this is the meaning of the statement there can be little doubt. Some of the earlier fathers held, that by the sons of God here the angels were to be understood, and that in consequence of unnatural loves formed between them and those daughters of men a Titanic brood were produced, an offspring of gigantic strength, and of equally gigantic wickedness. This opinion, which at intervals has always had its advocates, has recently been revived, and with considerable ardour maintained by certain Lutheran theologians (in particular, Baumgarten, Kurtz, Delitzsch, and Stier). They argue that the term "sons of God" was never applied to believers among men till a comparatively late period; that it must, therefore, have been used with reference to the angels; and that these may in certain circumstances be capable of maintaining sexual intercourse with persons on earth, and producing seed by them. But this is at variance alike with reason and revelation. Neither nature nor Scripture in such a way confounds heaven and earth, one species with another. Even among the living creatures that on earth are capable of producing offspring, it is the settled law of nature, that each propagates only after its kind; and it were an unheard of travesty of such a general law, if angelic beings, the tenants of an entirely different sphere, were to become the parents of a fleshly offspring by daughters of men. Besides, it is not simply the producing of offspring that the words speak of, but marrying wives, which can only be predicated of men in flesh and blood; while of the angelic state it is given as a distinguishing characteristic, that they who possess it "neither marry nor are given in marriage." The sons of God, therefore, must be a portion of the human family itself (see SONS OF GOD); they were simply the better portion of Adam's descendants, who, though not hitherto nor usually in that early age called expressly God's sons, yet here fitly have their position and calling designated by this its higher relationship, in order to indicate more emphatically the degeneracy and the guilt involved in wedding themselves to those who knew of nothing better or higher than what belonged to them as the daughters of men. From Seth downwards, that smaller section of the human family had stood apart from the rest, and were honourably distinguished by their relation to the worship and service of God; they had all along borne his name, and represented his interest in the world. But now, at length, the distinction between them and others gave way; they caught the general infection, preferred beauty to godliness, followed the will of the flesh instead of the will of God. What could then be looked for but rampant iniquity, and total dissolution of manners! This result the sacred narrative marks when it says, "And also after that, when the sons of God came in unto the daughters of men, and they bare children to them, the same became mighty men, which were of old, men of renown:" that is, renowned for their great and heaven-daring wickedness, which reached its maturity only after the intermarrying of the more select with the looser portion of mankind. The salt had lost its savour, and all rushed headlong to ruin; a memorable and instructive warning to the people of God in every age! And a warning, doubtless, intended to tell with special effect upon the chosen people of Israel, to keep them from those promiscuous alliances with the heathen around them, which ultimately proved one of their deadliest snares, Ex. xxxiv. 15, 16; De. vii. 3, &c.

Thus ended the moral and religious constitution of things in the world before the flood. The corruption that wrought in man's nature proved too strong for the barriers raised against it, and the reformatory discipline under which it was placed. Another phase of things must needs be introduced, if God's purpose to provide a seed of the woman, destined to bruise the head of the serpent, should not fail of its accomplishment. And as preparatory to this, the remnant that was still left in the person and house of Noah must be preserved, and the destroying judgment, long threatened but still delayed, be at last executed upon the ungodly race, who had resolutely defied God and hid repentance from their eyes. In that judgment the old world perishes, that other forms of administration, better adapted to the existing condition of human nature, might have room to develop themselves.

ANTICHRIST, ANTICHRISTS. The word is used only by the apostle John, and by him four times in the singular, 1 Jn. ii. 18, 22; iv. 3, 2 Jn. v. 7, and once in the plural, 1 Jn. ii. 18. The interchange between the singular and the plural is itself a clear proof, that when the singular is employed, it is not to be understood as denoting the same kind of exclusive personality which is indicated by the Christ. Before the close of the apostolic age, St. John found what he meant by the antichrist already realized in a number of individuals. "Ye have heard," says he, "that antichrist cometh, and already many have become antichrists" (so the words in 1 Jn. ii. 18 should be rendered); they had become such, having originally professed to belong to the Christian community, but afterwards, in accordance with their real principles, separated themselves from it. This seems to imply, that what the apostle meant by antichristianism was some sort of apostasy, or depravation of the faith, which rendered those who fell into it really opponents of the truth of the gospel of Christ, though without setting themselves in formal contrariety to it. They did not avowedly abjure the Christian name, but they evacuated it of its proper and essential elements. And so we are taught more expressly in the other passages, which describe the antichrist as "denying that Jesus is the Christ," "denying the Father and the Son," "not confessing that Jesus is of God," or "not confessing that Jesus is come in the flesh"—this, he emphatically adds in his 2d Epistle, ver. 7, "is the deceiver and the antichrist." The doctrinal error denounced in these expressions might almost seem to be identical with Judaism, since the unbelieving portion of the Jews denied Jesus to be the Christ, or to be of God. Yet it could not be the apostle's design to speak simply of Jews, since such would never have been represented as going forth from the Christian communities; nor would it have been at all a natural form of expression to say of them, that they did not confess Jesus to have come in the flesh, or to be of God. The "not confessing" rather points to the defective and essentially hollow nature of the faith maintained, than to its formal contrariety to the truth of the gospel: the parties in question made some pretensions to this, but they did not, in any proper sense, confess that Jesus is of God, and that he has come in the flesh; and so they virtually denied both the Father and the Son, or were ignorant of the true nature and mutual relations of both. It is, indeed, scarcely possible to understand the expressions used, coupled with the assertion that there were many to whom even then they applied, but by supposing that the apostle alludes in them to those who became infected with the Gnostic spirit, and who were thereby led, not formally to disavow the name of Jesus, but in some sense to deny the realities of his being or passion; explaining away either his proper humanity or his essential divinity, and, by means of doctetic appearances or shadowy emanations, substantially making void the true doctrine of the incarnation. We know, from other sources, that a tendency of this description manifested itself at a very early period among the Asiatic churches, although the regular development of the Gnostic systems belongs to a later time. And St. John stamps even the first imperfect exhibitions of the tendency, which struck at the historical basis of the Christian faith, as the manifestation of the spirit of antichrist.

It is clear, from this comparison of the statements in John's writings, that it is equally against the apostle's use of the word antichrist to regard it as denoting, in its primary application at least, either one who avows himself the enemy of Christ or one who usurps the place of Christ. Both of these opinions found an early advocacy in the Christian church, and still have their respective supporters. Tertullian, expressing the former view, asks, "Who are the antichrists but those who take the part of rebels toward Christ?" (De Præsc. Hæret. c. 4); and the other is exhibited by Hippolytus, when he describes the antichrist as "wishing in all things to make himself like the Son of God" (De Antichristo, § 6); also in the Actis Martyr., which designates antichrist a quasi-Christus. The Greek preposition anti, in composition, no doubt, often denotes substitution, the taking the room of another, and often also direct and formal opposition. So far as the composition of the word is concerned, the antichrist might have been either the one or the other. But the connection in which the word is used indicates a somewhat different shade of meaning: it imports a species of opposition, indeed, rather than of substitution (for it is against all evidence to suppose that, in the apostolic age, many had appeared among the churches setting themselves forth to be Christs); yet a covert and virtual, rather than an avowed opposition—an opposition in respect to the realities of the faith combined with a professed friendliness in its behalf. Had the opposition been of a different kind, had it betokened an open resistance to the claims of Jesus, or a total renunciation of the Christian name, the persons could not have been characterized as emphatically deceivers, and warned against as peculiarly dangerous to the flock of Christ.

It thus appears to be beyond any reasonable doubt that, in St. John's use of the term antichrist, there is a reference to the early heretics, who sought, by philosophical subtleties, to explain away, after one fashion or another, the facts of the incarnation, and infringe upon the true doctrine of our Lord's person. In several of the fathers we find this view expressly stated. Thus Cyprian (Ep. lxxiii. 13), when writing of the heretics of his own day, refers to 1 Jn. iv. 3, and asks, "How can they do spiritual and divine things who are enemies of God, and whose breast the spirit of antichrist has possessed?" In like manner, Cæcumenius thus endeavours to express the mind of the apostle, "He declares antichrist to be already in the world, not corporeally, but by means of those who prepare the way for his coming, of which sort are false apostles, false prophets, and heretics." This last quotation, however, by its peculiar form of expression, points to another opinion which also prevailed from the earliest times; viz. that the broachers of heresy and corruption in the apostolic and immediately subsequent times, were but preliminary exhibitions of the antichristian power—heralds and forerunners of the anticipated evil, rather than the evil itself. They are said to have been the antichrist, yet not corporeally—not in that personal and concentrated form which the antichristian power was expected to assume at a future time, and, as was thought, immediately before the second advent of the Lord. Some individual, it was conceived, should then arise, who, by way of eminence, should be fitly called the antichrist, and who, before being destroyed by the victorious energy of Christ, should both utter the most horrid blasphemies against the Most High, and practise the greatest enormities upon the saints (Justin Martyr, Tryph. § 110; Aug. De Civ. Dei, xx. 12, 13, &c.) But this view was founded, not solely, or even chiefly, on the passages in John's epistles which expressly mention the antichrist, or antichrists; it came rather from connecting these with the descriptions in Daniel and the Apocalypse of the great God-opposing power, that should persecute the saints of the Most High, and of St. Paul's "man of sin" in 2 Th. ii. 3-8. It would be too wide an inquiry to enter here into the investigation of this subject, which has proved the occasion of a voluminous controversy. We may state, however, that so far the fathers, and those who have followed them in later times, have right upon their side, in that they regard the descriptions of St. John as belonging to the same class, and substantially parallel in import, with those in 2 Thes. and the other passages referred to. They were probably wrong—it certainly is our conviction that they were wrong—in connecting the man of sin, the lawless one, the God-opposing head of the mystery of iniquity, with a single individual instead of an incorporated system, the growth of ages, and reaching its height only through a course of circumstances favourable to its development. This seems the natural and proper import of the description in the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians, where the evil is represented as the result of a great defection from the faith—the apostasy, by way of eminence, of which the elements were already in operation, and hence had formed the subject of the apostle's expostulations and warnings. The same holds, we believe, of the descriptions given in Daniel and the Apocalypse, when they are carefully examined; so that a system of error and corruption, culminating sometime in a particular form, and directed by a powerful head, appears to have been indicated in the descriptions in question, not the rise of a single individual of pre-eminent wickedness. But, with this exception, the view under consideration rests on a solid foundation. St. John's antichrists were corrupters of the faith; and St. Paul's man of sin and mystery of iniquity are, in like manner, the perfected result of an apostasy from the faith. Then, as the spirit of antichrist, in the one apostle, involved some kind of antithesis in doctrine and practice to Christ, a certain use of Christ's name with a design entirely subversive of Christ's cause; so, with the other apostle, the power described is portrayed as the opposer (ὁ ἀντικείμενος), aspiring against all authority to the highest place of honour and glory. Yet, with this unholy and presumptuous daring in fact, there was to be no open defiance of things sacred in form; for the power is represented as developing itself by a mystery of iniquity (that is, by subtle and hypocritical pretences, cloaking the most unhallowed and selfish aims), and by signs, and lying wonders, and all deceivableness of unrighteousness. Not only so, but it is spoken of as seating itself in the temple of God, by which can only be understood, in Christian times, the professing church of God, as in that also alone can be found the theatre of a widespread apostasy from the faith. The general idea, therefore, is the same in both sets of representations, though, in the descriptions of St. Paul and the Apocalypse, the features are more darkly drawn and strikingly portrayed. And if we may not say, as possibly it were wrong to say, that in the Romish apostasy and its papal head, there is the complete and final realization of the predicted evil, it still is there that the terms of the description are most fully met, and the features of the mournful picture most palpably exhibited.

ANTI-LIBANUS. See LEBANON.

ANTIOCH (Ἀντιόχεια), the name of two cities, both of considerable note.

1. ANTIOCH IN SYRIA, for long the capital of the Greek kings of Syria. It lay at the distance of about 300 miles from Jerusalem, north-west; and was situated upon the Orontes, on the left bank of the river, and near the point where it turns from a northerly to a westerly direction. The winding course of the Orontes, from Antioch to the sea, is fully 40 miles in length; but the distance by the road is somewhat under 20. Its situation was altogether happily chosen. It stood upon a beautiful and fertile plain, about 10 miles in length, by half as many in breadth; and on each side of this plain rose ranges of hills—on the south those of Casius, which reached an elevation of 5000 feet; and on the north the heights of Amanus, which were connected with the lofty and extensive range of Taurus. The neighbourhood of these hills, and of the Mediterranean Sea, imparted a freshness and salubrity to the climate of Antioch which few Syrian towns enjoyed, and its copious supply of water, which is said to have furnished almost every house with a fountain, rendered it little inferior in that respect to Damascus. Its commercial advantages also were great; for, on the one side, its river, navigable below the city, brought it into easy communication with the traffic of the Mediterranean; while, on the other, it was conveniently situated for a large caravan trade with the countries in the interior, especially in the direction of Damascus and the East.

The site, therefore, was well chosen for a flourishing, healthful, and agreeable city; it was particularly so, when viewed as the capital of the Greek-Syrian monarchy; since it stood mid-way between the eastern possessions of the kingdom and those which lay along the Mediterranean Sea. As a convenient and pleasant residence it was accordingly fixed upon by Seleucus Nicator, who named it from his father, Antiochus, and laid its foundation as a city immediately after the battle of Ipsus in B.C. 301. It was only, however, what formed ultimately about a fourth part of the city that was built in the time of Seleucus. Other three parts were successively added, the last by Antiochus Epiphanes; on which account it had the name of Tetrapolis applied to it. Some of its chief embellishments were due to Antiochus; and in particular a magnificent street of about four miles in length, with double colonnades, and crossed at right angles by other streets. Subsequent monarchs added to its public buildings, among which was a fine museum built by Antiochus Philopater. In its more flourishing periods the population must have been very large; as many as 100,000 persons are said to have been slaughtered in it by the Jews in a single day, 1 Mac. xi. 47; even in the age of Chrysostom, centuries after its more peculiar glory had passed away, it is supposed to have contained about 200,000 inhabitants. From the first the Jews formed a considerable proportion of these, and enjoyed equal privileges with the Greeks. They had an ethnarch of their own (Josephus, Wars, vii. 3). About B.C. 64 it fell, with other parts of Syria, into the hands of the Romans, but was allowed to retain its self-government; and several of the Roman emperors are known to have expended large sums in embellishing it. It shared also in the architectural prodigality of Herod the Great. (See HEROD.)

About the commencement of the Christian era Antioch appears to have lost little of its greatness and refinement. Cicero speaks of it as being in his day a place of high culture, renowned for the cultivation of art and the possession of men of learning (Pro Archia, § 3). It was not less renowned, however, for its luxurious living, its effeminate manners, its gay and

jocular humour, and, worst of all, its gross superstition and licentious idolatry. Not only did the city itself contain the usual incitements to false worship, with their accompanying pollutions, but in the immediate neighbourhood, and forming, indeed, a kind of suburb of the city, was the village of Daphne, with a famous temple and grove of Apollo. "The temple and the village," says Gibbon (c. 23), "were deeply bosomed in a thick grove of laurels and cypresses, which reached as far as a circumference of ten miles, and formed in the most sultry summers a cool and impenetrable shade. A thousand streams of the purest water, issuing from every hill, preserved the verdure of the earth and the temperature of the air; the senses were gratified with harmonious sounds and aromatic odours; and the peaceful grove was consecrated to health and joy, to luxury and love. The vigorous youth pursued, like Apollo, the object of his desires; and the blushing maid was warned, by the fate of Daphne, to shun the folly of unreasonable coyness. The soldier and philosopher (he adds) wisely avoided the temptation of this sensual paradise, where pleasure, assuming the character of religion, imperceptibly dissolved the firmness of manly virtue." They certainly would have been wise to avoid the contaminations of such a place; but how many of them actually did so, and what a pernicious, corrupting influence it must have exerted upon the manners of Antioch, which from its proximity to this infamous but attractive centre of heathenish pollution was called Epidaphnes, may readily be conjectured from the known influence of far inferior temptations in modern times, and also from the fact, mentioned by Gibbon, that this very place, which was so destructive to decency and virtue, not only enjoyed a stated revenue of thirty thousand pounds sterling for public pleasures, but was continually receiving fresh gifts from nobles and emperors to increase the splendour of its buildings, and the attraction of the adjacent grounds. It gives one a high idea of the assailing vigour and regenerating power of Christianity, that in the face of such powerful means and corrupting agencies, it could even, within the limits of the apostolic age, find in Antioch one of its firmest strongholds; from thence, also, near the commencement of the following age, derive, in the person of Ignatius, one of its most heroic martyrs; and in the course of two centuries more, so completely turn the tide against the long-continued and richly-endowed idolatry of the place, that when the emperor Julian went, on the occasion of the annual festival, after huge preparations, and with apparent enthusiasm, to pay his devotions to the Daphnian Apollo, no offering was presented along with his "but a single goose, provided at the expense of a priest, the pale and solitary inhabitant of the decayed temple" (Gibbon). That Julian also should have attempted to revive the glory of a shrine, which even heathen writers had characterized as a nursery of licentiousness and vice, is an instructive commentary on his pretensions to purity, and his boasted regard for the sanctities of the old worship.

At the time when Antioch came into contact with Christianity, it was probably as large in population, and as flourishing in appearance, as at any former period; for though it had ceased to be the capital of a separate kingdom, it was liberally supported and encouraged by the Romans; and some of its costliest works owed their existence to the munificence of the Roman emperors—such as the baths of Caligula, Trajan, and Hadrian, the granite pavement of the great street by Antoninus Pius, the palace built by Diocletian, &c. From its own importance, therefore, as the finest and largest city in that part of Asia, and also from its commanding position between Asia Minor on the one side, and the regions of Syria on the other, we can readily understand how the first heralds of the gospel should have sought, at an early period, to carry there the tidings of salvation, and lay the foundations of a Christian church. Indeed, the Lord appears to have directed the course of his providence so as to secure an early introduction of the gospel into Antioch; for the disciples, who had been scattered abroad on the persecution following on the death of Stephen, went, we are told, as far as Antioch preaching the Word, though still only to the Jews, Ac. xi. 19. Presently, however, some who were of Cyprus and Cyrene proceeded a step farther, and spake also to the Greeks. The labours of both parties were remarkably blessed, so that "a great number" are said to have believed and turned to the Lord. On hearing of such a result, the apostles sent forth Barnabas, himself also a man of Cyprus, to carry forward the work that had been so auspiciously begun, and to organize the church at Antioch. After labouring in this capacity for some time alone, he went to Tarsus, where Paul had been residing, and brought this person to aid him in the work of establishing a church at Antioch. Their joint ministry was continued for a whole year, and with such success that the church became distinguished for the variety of its gifts, its liberality of spirit, and its forwardness in the cause of Christ. Of its own motion it sent forth Paul and Barnabas on their first missionary tour, Ac. xiii. 1; and from the incidental notices found respecting it in the Acts of the Apostles, it is clear that the church at Antioch continued throughout the apostolic age, as we know it remained long afterwards, a centre of vigorous Christian operations. It is noted that the disciples were first called Christians there, Ac. xi. 26—a result, it is very commonly supposed, of the satirical and scurrilous spirit for which the Antiochians were proverbial. But this may very well be doubted; for it is in immediate connection with the rapid growth of the church itself that the notice is given, and it looks rather as if the disciples in their youthful ardour and zeal assumed the name to themselves, than had it thrust on them from without. Nor does the name betray anything of a contemptuous or sneering spirit; on the contrary, it is the fitting designation of the people of Christ, as being all partakers, in a measure, of that Spirit which rests in its fulness upon him. And accordingly, it was no sooner formed than it began to be everywhere appropriated by believers as their common appellation, 1 Pe. iv. 16; Ac. xxvi. 28.

After the public recognition of Christianity, Antioch took rank with Jerusalem and Alexandria as the seat of a patriarchal see. In the time of Chrysostom it is said to have contained 100,000 Christians, with about as many more, who, whether avowed pagans or not, continued outside the pale of the church; and Chrysostom speaks of 3000 regular paupers receiving alms from the church, while still there were numbers of unrelieved poor (Hom. 26, in Math.) The city suffered greatly by earthquakes, and partly through these, partly through the desolations of the Persians under Chosroes, it had sunk so low in the time of Justinian, that it required to be nearly rebuilt. It never regained its former importance, and had its share in all the vicissitudes that passed over the district in which it is situated—conquered by the Saracens, reconquered by the Greeks, again in the hands of the Mahometans, for a time held by the Crusaders, regained anew by the followers of the false Prophet. It is now, and has been for a long period, little more than a village, bearing the Syrian form of its ancient name, Antakieh, and containing a few thousand inhabitants. So recently, however, as 1822, when it was again visited by a destructive earthquake, in which thousands of lives were lost, it is said to have contained about 20,000 inhabitants. Many broken and scattered remains of its ancient greatness are still to be seen among its ruins. The few Christians in it have no church; and the only external mark that appears to have survived of its ancient Christianity, is the name that is borne by the eastern or Aleppo gate. It is called after St. Paul, Bab Boulous.

2. ANTIOCH IN PISIDIA. This place is distinctly connected with Pisidia in Acts xiii. 14, as the region within which it was situated; but it actually stood upon the mountain boundary between Pisidia and Phrygia, on the south side of the ridge, and so was sometimes coupled with Phrygia, sometimes with Pisidia. Ptolemy even assigns it to Pamphylia; but this must have been a mistake, as Pisidia lay between Pamphylia and Phrygia, and Antioch stood on the borders of the latter. Strabo connects it with Phrygia, who also tells us that it was founded by a colony from Magnesia on the Mæander. On the defeat of Antiochus III. by the Romans, in B. C. 190, it was transferred, along with a considerable territory in Asia Minor, to the dominions of Eumenes II. of Pergamos. The whole district was in process of time added to the Roman empire, and Antioch was made the seat of a provincial government. It had the Italian rights conferred on it, which put it constitutionally on a footing of equality with the Italian towns, and it was also called Cæsarea. Such was its rank and position when visited by the first heralds of the gospel, Paul and Barnabas. Though far from rivalling in size and importance the Syrian Antioch, which had sent them forth on their missionary tour, it still was undoubtedly a place of some note, and must have possessed a pretty numerous population. The sacred historian speaks not only of its having a Jewish synagogue, but also a considerable class of religious proselytes, or fearers of God, Ac. xiii. 16, 43, who joined in the services of the synagogue. To this class, it would appear, the greatest part belonged who joined themselves to Paul and Barnabas; and though these ambassadors of Christ themselves were soon obliged to depart on account of the bigotry and violence that were exhibited by the unbelieving portion of the Jews, yet they were enabled to leave behind them a band of steadfast disciples of the faith, who are said to have been "filled with joy and with the Holy Ghost."

No further notices occur in New Testament scripture of the church planted in this Antioch; nor does it figure in the ecclesiastical history of the first centuries. We know little more of it than that it formed one of twenty churches in Pisidia, which were each presided over by a bishop. Modern research, conducted first by the Rev. F. Arundell, British chaplain at Smyrna, and more recently by Mr. Hamilton, has identified the site of Antioch with a place called Yalobatch, on the north-west border of Karamania, near Lake Egerdir. There have been found at it the remains of several large buildings, of which one appears to have been a spacious church, another a temple, possibly that of Men Arcæus, who was peculiarly worshipped there; and as many as twenty arches of a vast aqueduct exist in a state of comparative perfection. Descriptions of these may be found in Arundell's Discoveries in Asia Minor, 1834; and Hamilton's Researches in Asia Minor, Pontus and Armenia, 1842.

ANTIOCHUS does not occur as the name of any individual in the canonical writings of the Old or New Testament, but from the frequent mention made of it in the apocryphal books of the Maccabees, and the reference in the prophecies of Daniel to a particular king who was to bear the name, it is fit that a brief account should here be given of the Syrian kings who, under the name of Antiochus, came more or less into contact with the covenant people. There were altogether thirteen of this name, who belonged to the Greek-Asiatic kingdom.

1. ANTIOCHUS I., surnamed Soter, the son of Seleucus Nicator, one of the generals of Alexander, scarcely requires to be noticed, as, from having his possessions, in the first instance, assigned him in Upper Asia, and afterwards, from being almost constantly engaged in contests, partly for the kingdom of Macedonia and partly with the Gauls in Asia Minor, he played no part in connection with the territory of Palestine.

2. ANTIOCHUS II., surnamed Theos, son of the preceding, who succeeded his father B.C. 260 or 261, was, in like manner, involved in continual broils and warfare. Ptolemy Philadelphus of Egypt gained such advantages over him that his kingdom became greatly weakened. And having concluded a peace with Ptolemy on condition of putting away his wife, Laodice, and marrying Ptolemy's daughter Berenice, the former succeeded, a few years afterwards, in effecting her reunion with Antiochus, but only to murder both him and Berenice. This took place in B.C. 246, after Antiochus had reigned between fourteen and fifteen years. It appears to be to this king of Syria that prospective allusion is made in Da. xi. 5, where the king's daughter of the south (Egypt) is spoken of as coming to the king of the north (Syria) to make an agreement; and it is said that she should not retain her power, but should be given up.

3. ANTIOCHUS, surnamed the Great, the next in order, was not the son, but the grandson of the preceding, the son of Seleucus Callinicus, who attained to the throne after the death of an elder brother in the year B.C. 223. He was then only fifteen years old. His reign commenced prosperously, though for this prosperity he was greatly indebted to a cousin, Achæus, who generously took his part. Possessions in Asia Minor were regained that had been appropriated by Attalus, king of Pergamos; the provinces of Media and Persia were also, after some reverses, recovered; and a successful conflict was entered into with Ptolemy Philopater of Egypt, for the provinces of Cœle-Syria, Phœnicia, and Palestine, which had once belonged to the Syrian dominion, but latterly had fallen into the hands of the king of Egypt. But this was only a temporary success as regards his struggle with the king of Egypt; for Antiochus suffered a severe defeat the year afterwards, B.C. 217, and was obliged to give up his claim to the provinces in question. About thirteen years after, and when Egypt had a boy of five years old for king (Ptolemy Epiphanes), Antiochus again entered into a war with that country and regained Palestine and Cœle-Syria, though he afterwards made a peace with Ptolemy, gave him his daughter in marriage, and gave also those two provinces as her dowry. The Jews gave him valuable assistance in that war with Egypt, and obtained in return important privileges from him (Josephus, Ant. xii. 3, 3). At a later period still, he came into conflict with the Romans, and was defeated in a succession of battles, lost a considerable portion of his territory, and had such a heavy tribute to pay (15,000 Euboic talents), that he was tempted to lay his hands on the treasures of a temple in Elymais, which cost him his life; for the people rose up against him and put him to death, B.C. 187. This appears to be the king of the north that is referred to in several verses of Da. xi., beginning at ver. 11.

4. ANTIOCHUS, surnamed Epiphanes, and also on coins Theos, was the one who beyond all the rest figured in Jewish history; not, however, as the friend or ally of the covenant people, but as their bitter and relentless enemy. In his youth he had been given by his father as a hostage to the Romans, but was released through the kindness of his brother Seleucus Philopater, who sent his own son in his stead. In the same year, B.C. 175, Seleucus himself was murdered by one Heliodorus, who seized upon the throne, but was speedily dispossessed by Antiochus. His sister Cleopatra, who had been married to the king of Egypt, having died, Antiochus laid claim to the provinces of Cœle-Syria and Palestine. The raising of this claim led to a war against Egypt, which was prosecuted through four campaigns in those provinces (during the years B.C. 171-168), and was at last carried into Egypt; but the Romans there interposed, and obliged Antiochus to desist. It was in the course of those campaigns for the conquest of Cœle-Syria and Palestine, that he practised the cruelties upon the Jews which are recorded in the books of the Maccabees, and which gave rise to the heroic strivings for independence that issued in a state of comparative, though but temporary freedom. Antiochus twice got possession of Jerusalem; but his insane attempt to extirpate the Jewish religion, and establish in its stead that of the Greek divinities, roused the national spirit against him, and his troops, under the command of Lysias, sustained a severe defeat. When hastening from the eastern parts of the kingdom to revenge this disaster, Antiochus died at Tabæ in Persia, in a state of madness. There can be little doubt that he is the person specially referred to in several passages of the book of Daniel, ch. viii. 23-25; xi. 31, seq.; which describe, prospectively, the violent and sacrilegious proceedings of a Syrian king against the covenant people and the sanctuary of God. He not only killed multitudes of the people in Jerusalem, but also suppressed the Jewish worship, and defiled the sanctuary by introducing into it the statue of Jupiter Olympus; so that for a time the adversary triumphed, and in the temple of God he exalted himself against what was there worshipped and adored.

5. ANTIUCHUS V., surnamed Eupator, was the son of Epiphanes, a boy of nine years old when he succeeded his father, and he only reigned two years (B.C. 164-162). The government was more that of Lysias, who assumed the guardianship of the young king, than of the king himself, and for both the one and the other it soon came to an end; for, after various conflicts with the Jews and others, they fell into the hands of Demetrius Soter, of Egypt, who appeared as a claimant for the kingdom of Syria, and were put to death.

6. ANTIUCHUS VI., surnamed Theos, was the son of Alexander Balas, who claimed to be the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, and was killed in his efforts to make good his title to the throne. Nor did the son succeed in establishing his kingdom; for, though he had the support of Jonathan and Simon, the Jewish leaders, and also won the homage of the larger part of Syria, he was killed by Tryphon, who had professed to espouse the interest of the young king. This Tryphon was in turn killed by the next who bore the name and acquired the dominion.

7. ANTIUCHUS VII., surnamed Sidetes, was a younger son of Demetrius Soter, and obtained possession of the throne in B.C. 137. The Jews, who had been zealous supporters of the opposite interest, suffered severely at his hands; and, after a long siege, Jerusalem was taken by him in B.C. 133. He did not, however, press his victory, but granted them an honourable peace. He afterwards fell fighting against the Parthians. In the last chapters of 1 Mac. an account is given of the earlier transactions of this king's reign; but the history abruptly terminates. It is needless to prosecute the history of this race of monarchs farther, as it is little else than a history of civil broils and contentions, and the chief actors came greatly less into contact with the affairs of Palestine, than those who belonged to the earlier half of the series.

AN'TIPAS, a faithful martyr at Pergamos in Asia Minor. Ra. ii. 13; but we know nothing more of him. And it may be questioned, perhaps, whether Antipas was the actual name of the person referred to, and not rather an epithet indicative of the steadfast resistance he made to the evil-doers and corruptions around him; for the word means against all; and possibly this, like the name Jezebel in the next address, was a designation of character, not a proper name.

ANTIPATER, a son of Herod. See HERODIAN FAMILY.

ANTIP'ATRIS, a city built by Herod the Great, and called after his father (Josephus, Ant. xvi. 5, 2; Wars, i. 21, 9). It is reported to have been built in the plain Capharsaba—"the finest plain in the kingdom," well supplied with water, and having in its neighbourhood groves of large trees. Elsewhere the historian describes the site of this plain and city to have been not very far from the sea of Joppa (Ant. xiii. 15, 1), from which it was distant about 120 stadia. We learn also from A.C. xxiii. 31, that it lay on the road between Jerusalem and Cæsarea, from which an ancient itinerary makes it distant 26 Roman miles. It has been ascertained that the ancient name Capharsaba still exists in the plain where Antipatris stood, under the Arabic form of Kefr Säba, in the province of Nablus. The Crusaders erroneously identified the city with Arsûf, a place much nearer the shore, and the mistake has been kept up till comparatively recent times (Robinson's Researches, iii. p. 45).

ANTITYPE. See TYPE.

APES occur in Scripture only in connection with the merchant-ships of Solomon, which are said in their Tarshish trade to have imported them among other rare productions, 1 KI. x. 22; 2 Ch. ix. 21. The word employed for these in the original is the plural of אָפִי (kophi), which appears in Sanscrit and Malabar as kapi, and in Greek as κῆρος, κῆρος, κῆρος. There can be no doubt that the word is rightly translated apes; but as nothing is said of the particular species of apes referred to, of the countries whence they were brought, or the purposes to which they were applied, we deem it quite unnecessary to enter into the natural history of the animal. Nothing of importance could be derived from such an inquiry for the illustration of Scripture. As apes abound in Africa, and various species of them are indigenous to the countries which lie along the African side of the Red Sea, it is probable that they were obtained from some port in that region. It is certain that several classes were known to the ancients, and were chiefly derived from Ethiopia (Plin. viii. 80); specimens of them, with long tails, were exhibited in the games celebrated at Rome, both by Pompey and Cæsar (Plin. viii. 19; Solinus, De Ethiop.) They appear to have been chiefly prized as natural curiosities or monsters; and as such, in all probability, they were found among the importations of the Tarshish navy of Solomon. But no particulars are known to us beyond the fact of such importations.

APHAR'SACHITES, the name of one of the sections of colonists brought by the king of Assyria to people Samaria, after the captivity of the ten tribes, Ezr. v. 6. Their original place and history are altogether unknown.—APHARSATHCHITES, in Ezr. iv. 9, is probably but another form of the same name.

APHAR'SITES appear to have been a distinct tribe from the preceding, Ezr. iv. 9; but closely allied to them.

APHEK [strength; hence applied as an appropriate designation to a fortified town]. Three places, apparently, though not quite certainly, all distinct, are so designated in Scripture: one in the tribe of Asher, which at first the tribe was unable to get possession of,

Ju. i. 33, and possibly the same as the village Afka, in Lebanon, mentioned by Burckhardt and others; another, near which Benhadad was defeated by the Israelites, 1 Ki. xx. 26, which seems to have lain much farther south, though its locality is left very undefined; and another in the tribe of Issachar, not far from Jezreel, in the neighbourhood of which the Philistines once and again encamped before joining battle with Israel, 1 Sa. iv. 1; xxix. 1.

APOCALYPSE. See REVELATION.

APOCRYPHA, properly concealed or hidden, but from early times used as a designation of writings, which stand in a certain relation to the canonical Scriptures, while still they want canonical authority. It is not quite certain on what grounds the term came to be so applied, and various reasons have been assigned. The most probable account seems to be that it was, in the first instance, used to denote writings secret as to their origin and contents. Then, as the canonical Scriptures were the writings publicly read and appealed to as standards of faith and duty, those others were also denominated apocryphal, as being fitted for use in private, but not entitled to occupy a recognized place among writings strictly authoritative and divine. The word, however, often received a more extended application, and characterized writings which were of spurious origin, and objectionable in character. It is now, and for long has been appropriated, by way of eminence, to certain books that came into existence between the close of the Old Testament canon and the commencement of the Gospel dispensation. They are the two books of Esdras, Tobit, Judith, the sequel of Esther, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, the Song of the Three Children, the Story of Susanna, the Idol Bel and the Dragon, the Prayer of Manasses, and the two books of Maccabees. These productions have come down to us only in the Greek language, and have no place in the Jewish canon. But they have existed from the earliest times in the Greek scriptures of the Old Testament, the Septuagint, and appear there interspersed among the other books, as if there was no essential difference between them.

This intermixture of the two classes of productions in the Septuagint proved to be an unfortunate circumstance for the views of the ancient church. The Greek-speaking Jews still had a measure of acquaintance with the Hebrew Bibles, and could thus readily distinguish between the Scriptures which composed the canon of inspiration and the subsequent additions. But comparatively few of the Christian fathers knew anything of Hebrew: they could usually go no nearer to the original than the Greek scriptures, and thus naturally fell into the mistake of putting the apocryphal, much on a footing with the canonical, writings. Portions, at least, of the one class, as well as the other, were frequently read in the churches; and books so read, whether strictly authoritative or not, went by the name of canonical, the term meaning, however, nothing more than that they belonged to the list of works adapted for use in the public worship of God. When the question was, what, in the stricter sense, were the canonical books of the Old Testament, the Apocrypha was not reckoned in earlier times—for example, in the enumeration of the Jewish Scriptures by Melito of Sardis, as given by Eusebius (Ecccl. Hist. iv. 26), and by Origen, as also given by Eusebius (iv. 25). But the apocryphal writings gradually crept into use. The councils of Carthage in 397 and 419 prohibited any books from being publicly read which were not canonical, and at the same time included most of the Apocrypha among the canonical—specifying Judith, Tobit, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, the two books of Maccabees. Augustine exercised a preponderating influence at these councils, and unfortunately on this subject he was disqualified, from want of Jewish learning, for being a safe guide. He seems, indeed, to have been perfectly aware that the apocryphal books were not included in the Hebrew canon, and in regard to some of them occasionally takes notice of the fact. But he does not on this account allow any exception against their sacred character; he quotes from Baruch as a genuine production of Jeremiah, in contrariety to some, who attributed it to his scribe (De Civ. xviii. 33); and names Tobit, Judith, the two books of Maccabees, the two of Esdras, Wisdom, and Ecclesiasticus, as strictly authoritative productions, and the two later as even worthy of being placed among the prophetic (De Doc. Christiana, ii. 13). Jerome in this contrasted favourably with Augustine, a distinction he doubtless owed chiefly to his more accurate learning. According to him, that alone is canonical which is given by inspiration of God; and though, as he says in his introduction to Judith, the church reads that and other books of the Apocrypha, it is “only for the edification of the people, not to establish the authority of ecclesiastical doctrines.” In the famous Prologus Galeatus he enumerates the twenty-two books of the Jewish canon, and adds, “Whatever is beside these, is to be placed in the Apocrypha and is to be read only for edification.” Ruffinus, his contemporary, was of the same mind, and expressly distinguishes between those books by which matters of faith are to be established, and others “not canonical, but ecclesiastical (mentioning various books of the Apocrypha), which the fathers wished, indeed, to be read in churches, but not to be produced for authoritative decisions in matters of doctrine (Expos. in Symb. Apost. 26). The Benedictine editors of Jerome say, in their Prologomena to his Translation (Op. vol. iii.), that “the apocryphal books were not for some time after the age of Jerome and Ruffinus received into the sacred canon,” quoting an old MS. of the Vulgate Bible in proof; and they affirm that the writings to which was assigned the weight of canonical Scripture “consisted of such as composed the canon of Hebrew verity, in which the books called either apocryphal or ecclesiastical by the fathers were never reckoned. Now, however (they add, to save their Catholic orthodoxy), that they have been received into the ecclesiastical canon without difference as to authority, they deserve equal regard with the other books from all the truly pious, who glory in adhering to the decree of the council of Trent respecting the canonical Scriptures.”

The two great authorities of the Roman church having thus assumed different positions respecting the writings of the Apocrypha, different views continued to be set forth from time to time on the subject. Gregory the Great, treading in the footsteps of Jerome, clearly distinguishes between the apocryphal and canonical, as between the human and divine; when he cites from “holy Scripture,” it is always the inspired books that he refers to (Moral. in Job, viii. c. 28, v. c. 13); but when he appeals to the first book of Maccabees, it is coupled with an apology for making use of writings which have no proper authority, but are only for edification (Ibid. xix. 13). Later writers are also to be found at intervals expressing opinions at variance with their proper canonicity. Bede for example, in the eighth century distinguishes properly between them and the sacred writings (Comment. in Apoc. iv.); and Nicolas de Lyra, in the fourteenth century, one of the great authorities of the Catholic church, refers to the distinction drawn by Jerome between canonical and non-canonical, but states that it had commonly been lost sight of, and represents the canonical as in all things surpassing the others in dignity (Pref. in Tob. &c.) How, then, it may naturally be asked, should the Romish church, in the face of so many conflicting testimonies, have elevated the Apocrypha at the council of Trent to a level with the inspired writings? It was certainly done in the face of one of her favourite maxims—the unanimous consent of the fathers; but this was counterbalanced by the desire of retaining the support which the Apocrypha yielded to some of the Romish tenets, and by determined opposition to the Protestants, who had unanimously excluded the Apocrypha from the canonical Scriptures, though in certain quarters it was allowed to be read for edification. Romish ecclesiastics have sometimes endeavoured to give a modified view of the Tridentine council, by distinguishing between canonical of the first and canonical of the second rank, and holding that the decree of the council does not oblige one to assign the Apocrypha to a higher than the secondary place. But the language is too explicit to admit of such an interpretation, and hence it has never been generally recognized.

In regard to the question itself, whether the Apocrypha should be admitted into the Old Testament canon or excluded from it, the following may be taken as a brief summary of the reasons for maintaining the negative side:—1. There is, first of all, the historical argument against it—it was not received as authoritative Scripture by those who had intrusted to them the formation of the Old Testament canon. Nor have the Jews at any period of their history put the apocryphal writings on a level with those of the sacred books. Josephus expressly distinguishes them from the latter; Philo never refers to them; and the Jewish authorities of later times, so far from showing any desire to exalt the Apocrypha unduly, not unfrequently point to it as among the differences subsisting between them and Christians (meaning, of course, Romish Christians), that they reject, while the others receive, as authoritative the apocryphal books. 2. Then, there is the entire silence of our Lord and the apostles respecting them. By these the scriptures of the Old Testament are quoted with endless frequency, but never the Apocrypha. The Jewish canon just as it stood was recognized and sanctioned as the Word of God by the founders of the Christian church, and all not belonging to it was by implication excluded. For, the character ascribed by them to the Jewish Scriptures was distinctive and peculiar; it neither was nor could be shared in by any other writings, otherwise a charge of unfaithful dealing in regard to the letter of Scripture must have lain against the spiritual guides of the Jewish people, which is never brought. 3. The writings of the New Testament stand in immediate juxtaposition with those of the Old; the commencement of the gospel history resumes the thread of the divine communications where the later prophets of the preceding dispensation dropped it; and, as if nothing of inspired matter came between, the first utterances of the New Testament, carry us directly back to what had been written in Malachi, and those who went before him, Lu. i. 17, &c. Equally striking is the apparent oblivion of the Apocrypha in the last book of Scripture—the Apocalypse—which gathers its imagery and language from all the earlier revelations of God, but takes no contribution from the writings composing the Apocrypha. 4. In these apocryphal writings themselves also there is to be noted a general and marked deficiency as compared with the canonical Scriptures—a deficiency in respect to originality, majesty, simplicity, and power. Nor have they, like the sacred books, any proper connection among themselves; they are without any regular plan or progressive order, but are simply an aggregate of human productions. And the difference in these respects betwixt them and the canonical Scriptures is plainly indicated in the writings themselves; for the son of Sirach claims nothing higher than the merit of learning and wisdom—praises the learned, indeed, as in his day the highest class, Prol. and ch. xxxix.; and in 1 Mac. iv. 46, ix. 27, xiv. 41, the period subsequent to the closing of the canon appears to be regarded as a poor and depressed one, as compared with those that had enjoyed prophetic gifts. 5. They contain things utterly at variance with the proper character of a divine revelation—fables, falsehoods, and errors of doctrine. Thus the angel in Tobit, who at last declares himself to be Raphael, had at the first given himself out to be Azarias, the son of Ananias the Great. Judith not only acts throughout a deceitful part, but even prays God to own and make use of her deceit, ch. ix. 10. The two books of Maccabees contain various historical errors and contradictions—as in regard to Judas, who is said in the first book to have died in the 152d year, while in the first chapter of the second book he is represented as joining in a letter to Aristobulus in the 188th year; so in regard to Antiochus, whom the first book represents to have died in Elymais, and the second to have perished in the mountains after having been repulsed at Persepolis. Then, there are the ridiculous fables of the fish in Tobit, ch. vi. 1-8; of Jeremiah's taking the ark and altar to Mount Pisgah, and hiding them in a cave, 2 Mac. ii.; of Bel and the Dragon, and, indeed, the whole story of Judith seems little else than a fable, as there is no period in the history of post-Babylonish times to which the transactions narrated in it can with any probability be referred. The value of alms, too, and the worth of human righteousness, are sometimes discoursed of in a style little accordant with the spirit of the Bible; and even the better parts of the apocryphal books have not a little heterogeneous matter mixed up with the good contained in them.

Upon the whole, therefore, there is ample reason, in a doctrinal as well as historical respect, to justify the Protestant churches in excluding the Apocrypha from the sacred canon, and to condemn Rome for receiving it. In the controversy also, which from time to time has been waged within the bounds of Protestantism, as to whether the Apocrypha should be bound up with the books of Scripture, it seems obvious that the grounds which decide the one question should also be held decisive of the other. For, whatever secondary or incidental benefits may be derived from the study of the apocryphal books as the word of man, they should, as a general rule, be placed in no such dangerous proximity to the Word of God. What is emphatically

The Book of God's revelation should stand alone in its sacredness before the world; so that none may be tempted to confound with it what neither possesses the same divine character nor is free from the infusion of human error and corruption. "Ecclesiastical approval and usage," as stated in Herzog's Encycl. regarding the last controversy of this description, "is indeed a weighty consideration; but if the usage has been proved wrong, a thousand years' continuance would not make it right. And the charges preferred against the Apocrypha have not been satisfactorily answered."

APOCRYPHAL BOOKS, with reference to New Testament times, as understood by the ancients, comprise various classes of writings—sometimes genuine productions, though not of apostolical authority, such as the Epistle of Clement, or the Shepherd of Hermas; more commonly spurious productions, like the Protevangelium of James, the Apostolical Constitutions, the Preaching of Peter, &c., falsely assuming the name, or pretending to represent the views and sentiments of the founders of the Christian church; and sometimes also the dangerous books composed by Gnostic speculators and heretical teachers, with the view of propagating their tenets. Undue weight was occasionally attached to certain of these productions by some of the fathers of the Christian church, and the spurious have sometimes been considered as genuine; but no serious attempt has been made to exalt them to the rank of sacred Scripture, although the things contained in some of them have been held by Romanists for apostolical traditions. But we are not called to any investigation of this point here.

APOLLONIA, a city of Macedonia, in the district of Migdonia, and somewhere about 30 Roman miles from Amphipolis. Paul and Silas took it on their way to Thessalonica, from which it was distant about 37 Roman miles, Ac. xvii. 1. They appear to have made no stay in it.

APOLLOS, a Jew of Alexandria, who took a prominent part in the vindication of the truth and cause of Jesus. He is first mentioned in Acts xviii. 24, where he is described as a gifted and persuasive orator, and mighty in the Scriptures. He had come to Ephesus, probably about A.D. 56, for what specific reason is not stated; but when there he gave evidence at once of his oratorical powers, and of his zeal in the work of the Lord, by holding disputations with his countrymen in the synagogue. He had been instructed, we are told, in the way of the Lord before coming to Ephesus, and "spake and taught diligently the things concerning Jesus" (for so the correct reading is in ver. 25). Yet his knowledge of these things was still imperfect, for he knew, it is said, only the baptism of John. It is not quite certain, however, how much of defect is indicated in this statement. It cannot well be understood as importing simply, that he knew only of John's testimony respecting the immediate approach of Messiah, and his baptism of repentance as a preparation for it. For such knowledge had been far too limited as a basis for controversial discussion, and diligent teaching of the things concerning Jesus in the synagogue. The probability rather is, that he was acquainted generally with the facts of Christ's history, and was penetrated with a conviction of his being the Messiah promised to the fathers; but was still ignorant of the proper results of Christ's mission, in respect to the gifts of grace provided for his people, and the new constitution of the divine kingdom in him. That it was something more than a merely reformatory work, which Christ came to accomplish; that not repentance alone, but remission of sins also was now to be preached in his name; that in him the whole of the typical economy had found its completion, and a new order of things, with its appropriate ordinances, and manifold endowments of the Spirit suited to them, had been instituted—all this Apollos had yet to learn when he came to Ephesus, although he knew enough to make him a formidable opponent to his unbelieving countrymen. But in Aquila and Priscilla, recent converts of St. Paul, he met with more enlightened believers, who were at once able and willing to instruct him in the way of the Lord more perfectly; and when he had received this fuller instruction he set out for the regions of Achaia, which for the present were deprived of the benefit of Paul's ministrations. There he laboured for some time with great success, especially among the Jews, whom, it is said, he mightily convinced, Ac. xviii. 28; and at Corinth the impression he made was so deep, that a party began to form themselves under his name. This, along with other schismatical courses of a like kind, the apostle rebuked in his first epistle to the Corinthians, but he gives to Apollos the honour, conceded in such terms to no other fellow-labourer, of watering the seed which he himself had sown. Not only so, but as a proof of the confidence he had in his teaching, and of the benefit he expected it to yield to the church, he urged Apollos at a later period to return again to Corinth, after the divisions in it had been rebuked, and, as he might reasonably hope, were likely to be healed, 1 Co. xvi. 12. Apollos, however, declined, probably from a feeling of dislike at the dissensions which his former presence had in some degree occasioned. The only other notice we have of him is in Titus iii. 13, from which it would appear that he had been labouring in Crete. An ancient tradition has represented him as ultimately going back to Corinth, and becoming settled pastor or bishop of the place, but this rests on no good authority. His appearance in the Christian territory, and the sphere he occupied there, must be regarded as somewhat peculiar. He took a kind of independent position, while still he got his more special instruction not from an apostle, but from two converts of an apostle, and after getting this, he does not seem to have felt himself called to plant churches, but gave himself (though not as an ordinary assistant) to the work of carrying forward what Paul had begun. Such he probably saw to be the sphere of Christian action most suited to his powers and advantages; and there can be little doubt, that in cleaving to it as he did, he nobly served his generation according to the will of God.

APOLLYON [destroyer], applied as a proper name to Satan in Re. ix. 11. (See DEVIL.)

APOSTASY [falling away—namely, from the true faith and worship of God]. The term is applied in an emphatic manner to a great and general defection in the Christian church, by St. Paul, in 2 Thes. ii. 3. (See ANTICHRIST.)

APOSTLE [Gr. ἀπόστολος], one sent forth with any special message or commission. So it is used in the Septuagint, 1 Ki. xiv. 6; Is. xviii. 2; and in a few passages also in the new Testament, Ja. xiii. 16, where our Lord says generally "the apostle (person sent) is not greater than he who sent him;" and 2 Co. viii. 23; Phi. ii. 25, where persons deputed by churches on special errands are called their apostles, or messengers. These are too often loosely confounded together, but the name in its more distinctive and peculiar sense, as descriptive of one holding office in the Christian church, was applied only to those who were Christ's ambassadors—his ambassadors in the stricter sense—his chosen delegates to disclose his mind to men, and settle the affairs of his kingdom upon earth. Under him they occupied the highest official position in the church, and while they had some things in common with ordinary ministers of the gospel, their more distinctive characteristics belonged exclusively to themselves.

1. They stood alone in respect to the manner of their appointment; it came from without, direct from Christ himself, while in all other cases the appointment of rulers was to spring up from within the church. The original twelve were all called and designated to their office by Christ, while still no organized society or church in the ordinary sense existed. When one was to be ordained in the room of Judas, the company of disciples did nothing further than choose two from their number who had the external qualifications necessary for the work; but left the actual selection in the hands of the Lord, to be decided by lot, Ac. i. 24. And Paul once and again points to his immediate designation by Christ as the primary and most essential element in his title to the apostleship, Ga. i. 1-12; Ro. i. 1; 1 Co. xv. 1. He so puts the question as plainly to indicate, that if he had not received his calling from Christ he could have had no right to the place of an apostle. And this necessarily arose from the proper destination of the apostles, which was, in Christ's name to lay the foundations of the Christian church. It was their part to form and organize the society of the faithful; and consequently they must themselves have a prior existence in their official capacity—they must hold directly, not of the church, but of Christ. It is otherwise with the ordinary ministry; the Lord bestows the gifts necessary for its exercise, but it is the part of the church to recognize the bestowal of the gifts, and call those who have received them to the work; so that "the ministry does not sustain the church, but the church the ministry." 2. The number also of the apostles is a sign of their singular and special calling, as contradistinguished from the regular and permanent officers of the church. Their number is a fixed one—the twelve—so fixed, doubtless, with reference to the twelve tribes of Israel, that the several constituent parts of the covenant-people might see themselves represented in the apostleship. Not only was this historically the original number of the apostles chosen by the Lord, but ideally also it continued the same; and in the apocalyptic vision, when the church presents itself to view in its perfected condition as a glorious building, its walls appear resting "on twelve foundations, which had on them twelve names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb," Re. xxi. 14. In reality, after the calling of Paul to the office, there were thirteen in the office; precisely as in Old Testament times there were thirteen tribes after the elevation of two of Joseph's sons to the rank of separate tribal heads, though twelve remained still the ideal number. But this, again, distinguishes the apostles from all the abiding rulers of the church, who require to be progressively multiplied, as the church itself grows in extent. 3. The distinction is equally marked in the power and authority that belonged to the office. The apostles were authorized to settle everything in the church as by divine right; the Lord himself spake and acted through them. Hence St. Paul charges the Corinthians to acknowledge that the things which he wrote to them were the commandments of the Lord, 1 Co. xiv. 37, which was but a particular mode of claiming the power granted to the apostles collectively by the Lord, when he gave them authority to bind and loose in the things of the kingdom, Mat. xviii. 18; Jn. xx. 21-23. This plainly required the higher endowments of the Spirit—infallible guidance, and marked them as extraordinary, not as regular and permanent officers in the church. Their singular power in this respect had its signature in another—the peculiar command given them over the more remarkable operations of the Spirit. Miraculous gifts were not altogether confined to the apostles; but they had them in largest measure; and to them, it would appear, belonged exclusively the power of imparting such gifts by the laying on of their hands. No evidence whatever exists of any besides the apostles having been empowered to confer the Spirit in this manner. Even Philip, with all the grace bestowed on him, and the wonderful effects wrought by him in Samaria, could prevail nothing here; only when the apostles Peter and John went and laid their hands on the disciples did the Spirit come with his supernatural operations. And such things were doubtless among "the signs of an apostle," which St. Paul appeals to as having been wrought by him among the Corinthians, 2 Co. xii. 12; it was through his instrumentality that such a rich effusion of spiritual gifts came down upon the members of the church. 4. The apostolic office, with all the powers and privileges belonging to it, in this also was singular, that it bore respect to the whole Christian church. There was nothing local or particular in their destination; their field was to be the world, like the church which they were appointed to found. They were each to the entire Christian community what elders or episcopoi were to the particular communities over which they presided—in which sense alone Peter and John alike designate themselves elders, 1 Pe. v. 1; 2 Jn. 1. So that, as on other accounts, on this also, apostles could have no successors; for no particular section of the church could have the right to appoint officers to so indefinite a sphere of action; and bishops, successors of the apostles, would be virtually diocesans without a diocese.

It seems to have been but gradually that the full import of their calling opened itself out to the minds of the apostles, especially in respect to its world-wide aspect and bearing. For a number of years they continued in a compact body about Jerusalem; and it was through the evangelistic zeal of others rather than themselves that the sphere of their operations in the first instance was made to embrace a larger compass. They had, no doubt, a great work to do in Jerusalem, and ample opportunities of testifying of the things respecting the kingdom, on account of the constant resort of Jews from all quarters to that centre of religious worship. Even while residing there they could come into contact with men from nearly every part of the known world; and probably the time they actually spent together at Jerusalem, in availing themselves of these opportunities, and building up the church of Christ in its original home, was not more than the exigencies of the case actually required. But it was not the less necessary, that other portions of the field should be occupied; and in the providence of God circumstances were made to arise, and agencies were employed, which in a manner compelled the apostles to extend their operations, and go to some distance from Jerusalem. The fruits that sprang from the dispersion attendant on the death of Stephen, the labours of Philip in Samaria, then the message from Cornelius, followed immediately after by the conversion and missionary labours of Paul, contributed, step by step, to give the truth of the gospel a wider diffusion, and to call forth the apostles to superintend and direct its establishment in different regions. As these operations in the foreign field increased, the presence of the apostles elsewhere than at Jerusalem must have been more frequently required; and though we cannot attach much credit to the traditions which have been handed down respecting the several countries to which they are said respectively to have carried the gospel, there yet can be no reasonable doubt, that most of them, before they died, had travelled into other lands, and contributed to plant in them Christian churches. We know for certain of John's connection with Asia Minor, of Peter's with Babylon, of Paul's with the regions of the West; and though similar information has not reached us concerning the rest, we may justly conclude that their zeal led them severally to take a part in the great outward movements for the diffusion of Christianity.

The term APOSTLE is once, though only once, in Scripture applied to our Lord; in He. iii. 1 he is called the "apostle and high-priest of our profession." It merely turns into a personal designation the idea of his being the One emphatically sent by the Father to reveal his mind and accomplish the work of reconciliation, comp. Jn. iv. 34; v. 23, &c.

APPAREL. See DRESS.

APPII-FORUM, or FORUM-APPII, a market-town on the Appian Way, at the distance of 43 Roman miles from Rome. It is understood to have derived its name from the Appius Claudius Cæcus who constructed the Appian Way, somewhat more than three centuries before the Christian era. It grew up to be a considerable town, and enjoyed municipal privileges. From the account of Horace (Sat. i. 5), it seems to have been the usual resting-place of travellers, at the close of the first day's journey, on the way from Rome to Brundisium. And standing, as it did, on the border of the Pontine Marshes, where travellers commonly entered on a canal that extended to near Tarracina, it became very much a town of boatmen and innkeepers. The only notice of it that occurs in sacred history is in connection with St. Paul's journey to Rome after his shipwreck. He was met on his way at Appii-Forum by certain brethren from Rome, Ac. xxviii. 15, who had somehow got intelligence of his approach. He appears to have made no stay in it. The place has long since fallen into total decay, and its site is only marked by certain ruins, which are found on each side of the road, and by the forty-third milestone, which still keeps its place.

APPLE. No word is more loosely used than this and its equivalents in various languages. For instance, the Romans called almost every kind of globular fruit pomum, apples, pears, peaches, cherries, &c., not even walnuts excepted (see Facciolati Lexicon); and we ourselves speak of love-apples, earth-apples, oak-apples, pine-apples, when we mean the tomatum, the tuberous root of the buniun, the spongy excrescence which grows on the leaves and branches of the oak, or the most exquisite of all fruits, the Peruvian ananassa. Like the Arabs, who apply the name indiscriminately to the lemon, peach, and apricot, as well as the true apple, it is probable that the Hebrews employed their תפוח (tappuach) in a wide and comprehensive way to denote any round and fragrant fruit—the root being תפ, "to breathe;" but it may be questioned whether they had much acquaintance with the true apple, the Pyrus malus of Linnæus, which is a native of more northern latitudes.

In his account of Alexander Jannæus, Josephus tells us, "His own people were seditious against him; for at a festival which was then celebrated, when he stood upon the altar, and was going to sacrifice, the nation rose upon him, and pelted him with citrons; for the law of the Jews required that at the feast of tabernacles every one should have branches of the palm tree and citron tree" (Antiq. book xiii. ch. 13). This passage shows not only that the "thick" or umbrageous trees of Le. xxxiii. 40, suggested to Jewish minds the citron, but it also proves how plentiful in the Holy Land was the citron tree, when every worshipper could be furnished with a living and fruit-laden branch of it. Nor can there be any reasonable doubt that the tappuach or "apple" of Scripture is the citron, which, besides its former abundance in Palestine, admirably bears out the allusions of the sacred writers. The citron, or Citrus medica—so called because it was from Media that the Romans first received it—belongs to the natural order of Aurantiaceæ, a delightful group, including the orange, the lime, the lemon, and the shaddock. With its dark, glossy, laurel-looking leaves, its ever-green branches, often bearing simultaneously ripe fruits and newly opened flowers, and thus vouchsafing to the pilgrim who rests in its deep shadow the twofold refreshment of a delicious banquet and a fragrant breeze, the citron may well claim pre-eminence "among the trees of the wood," Ca. ii. 3.

"As the citron tree among the trees of the wood,
So is my Beloved among the sons:
I sat down under his shadow with great delight,
And his fruit was delicious to my taste."

In our own climate on a summer's day the fragrance of a flowering orange or citron tree, wafted through the open casement or through the door of a conservatory into a cool apartment, is one of those exquisite visitations which, lending an exotic richness to the air, add luxury to the shade, and fill with southern day-dreams the moments of repose. But in glaring climes "shade and greenery are everything;" and describing a fairy-like eastern garden, the traveller says, "It was passing pleasant to stroll along these paths, all shadowy with orange trees, whose fruit, 'like lamps in a night of green,' hung temptingly over our heads. The fragrance of large beds of roses mingled with that of the orange flower, and seemed to repose on the quiet airs of the calm evening. In the midst of the garden we came to a vast pavilion, glittering like porcelain, and supported on light pillars, which formed cloisters surrounding an immense marble basin, in the centre of which sparkling waters gushed from a picturesque fountain. Through the clear depths of the water gleamed shoals of gold and silver fish."—(Warburton's Crescent and Cross.) We need not say that the apple tree is by no means remarkable for the depth or deliciousness of its shade.

Abounding in malic and citric acid, the juice of the orange and its congeners is one of the most agreeable antidotes which the Creator's bounty has provided against the exhausting thirst and incipient fever of sultry climes. A settler in the torrid swamps of the Amazon will devour a dozen oranges before his morning meal (Voyage up the Amazon, in the "Home and Colonial Library"), and in tropical regions such acidulous fruits are invaluable on account of their anti-febrile virtues. These were doubtless well known to the Hebrews, and, in common with all antiquity, they greatly prized the pleasant pungent odour emitted by the rind. Macrobius speaks of "citrosa vestis," showing that it was usual to keep citrons in wardrobes for the sake of their perfume; and, like the modern oriental ladies, whose favourite vinaigrette is a citron, in our own country two or three centuries ago an orange was so commonly used as a scent-bottle, that it may often be seen in old pictures of our queens and peeresses. It was also believed to have a disinfecting potency; and during the plague of London, people walked the streets smelling at oranges. In keeping with these medicinal and restorative attributes of its order, we find such expressions in the Song as—

"Cheer me with cordials,

Support me with citrons,

For I am faint with love."—ch. ii. 5.

"The odour of thy breath is as citrons."—ch. vii. 8.

Understood as belonging to this beautiful family there is a peculiar felicity in the comparison, "A word fitly spoken is like citrons of gold in salvers (or baskets) of silver." Pr. xxv. 11. The famous golden apples which grew in the gardens of the Hesperides were unquestionably either citrons or oranges.

The late amiable and accomplished Lady Callcott, who beguiled years of invalidism compiling A Scripture Herbal, but who will by no means give up the apple as one of the trees of the Bible, mentions that, as the modern Jews still use citrons at the feast of tabernacles, "in London considerable sums of money are expended in importing them of the best kind, for the purpose. They must be without blemish, and the stalk must still adhere to them. After the feast is over, the citrons are openly sold, and the money produced by the sale is placed in the common treasury, as part of the provision for the poor of the congregation." Their anxiety to obtain them with the stalk still adhering, is no doubt a faint effort to secure the "thick" branches and "boughs of goodly trees" mentioned in Le. xxiii. 40.

In our own country there is a large consumption of the various species of the citrus family. The citron itself, with sugar and water, furnishes an agreeable refrigerent beverage; its rind and pulp are candied and converted into sweetmeats, and its essential oil is extensively employed in perfumery. Of the juice of lemons and limes, until of late, thousands of gallons were yearly required for our navy, where it greatly contributed to avert the ravages of such scorbutic disorders as last century often converted a ship of war into a floating hospital; and in the form of crystallized citric acid, it is still indispensable. For oranges, such is the demand that it was calculated that in 1851, as many as 233,442,300 were entered for home consumption—an estimate, however, in which lemons are included.—(Pereira's Materia Medica; M'Culloch's Dictionary of Commerce.)

The apple, properly so called (Pyrus malus), is now cultivated in Palestine. In the month of March, Schubert found the country around Bethlehem and Hebron embellished with blossoming fruit-trees, amongst which he observed the apricot, the pear, and the apple (Reise in das Morgenland). It is not unlikely that it was first introduced by monks from Western Europe. At all events, the apple does not occur native in Palestine, like its parent, the crab-tree, in our own hedgerows. The amelioration of this unpromising plant, and its gradual elevation into the Newtown pippin and the reinettes of Normandy, are amongst the most wonderful triumphs of horticultural skill, and are significant examples of the rewards with which a bountiful Creator is ready to crown industry and perseverance. The London Horticultural Society's Catalogue enumerates 1400 varieties of apple as now known in Europe and America; and in his elaborate British Pomology (1851), Mr. Robert Hogg describes 942 sorts as more or less cultivated in Britain.

Although it is so usual to speak of the forbidden fruit of paradise as an "apple," we need hardly say that there is nothing in Scripture to indicate what kind of tree was "the tree of the knowledge of good and evil." But in the fabled "apples of discord," and in the golden apple which Paris gave to the goddess of love, thereby kindling the Trojan war, is it not probable that the primeval tradition reappears of "the fruit

Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste

Brought death into the world, and all our woe?" [J. H.]

APPLE OF SODOM is a name given to a fruit growing on the shores of the Dead Sea. Josephus says that the ashes of the five cities "still grow in their fruits," "which have a colour as if they were fit to be eaten, but if you pluck them with your hands, they dissolve into smoke and ashes" (Wars, book iv. ch. 8, 4). Fantastic as is his theory, the latter portion of his statement is by no means fabulous. At 'Ain Jidy, Professor Robinson found several specimens of the tree, from ten to fifteen feet high. "The fruit greatly resembles externally a large smooth apple or orange, hanging in clusters of three or four together; and when ripe is of a yellow colour. It was now (May 10) fair and delicious to the eye, and soft to the touch; but on being pressed or struck, it explodes with a puff, like a bladder or puff-ball, leaving in the hand only the shreds of the thin rind and a few fibres. It is indeed filled chiefly with air, like a bladder, which gives it the round form; while in the centre a small slender pod runs through it from the stem, and is connected by thin filaments with the rind. The pod contains a small quantity of fine silk with seeds. The Arabs collect the silk and twist it into matches for their guns; preferring it to the common match, because it requires no sulphur to render it combustible."—(Biblical Researches, 2d edit. vol. i. p. 523. See also Irby and Mangles' Travels, ch. viii.) This would appear to be the Asclepias gigantea (Linn.), which is described and figured by Prosper Alpinus, under the name of the "Beid el ossar."—(Hist. Nat. Egypti, Lugd. Bat. 1735, pars 1, 43.) [J. H.]

AQUILA and PRISCILLA, husband and wife, not to be separated here, as they are always united together when mentioned in sacred Scripture. Priscilla is the diminutive of Prisca, which indeed was the proper name of the spouse of Aquila, and in all the better authorities is the name actually found in Ro. xvi. 3, as it is also in 2 Ti. iv. 19; but Priscilla seems to have been more commonly used by way of familiarity or endearment. And as she is commonly named first, it is natural to suppose that she was, if not actually the first convert of the two (for that can only be matter of conjecture), at least the most active and devoted believer. When the two are first mentioned in the sacred narrative, it is in the character of Jews, who had been driven from Rome by the decree of Claudius (noticed by Suetonius, Claud. c. 25), which compelled Jews, on account of certain disturbances said to have been raised by them, to leave the city. Aquila and Priscilla took up their abode at Corinth, and were found by the apostle Paul there, on the occasion of his first visit to the city, Ac. xviii. 2. It seems not to have been a common faith, but rather a common occupation, which first brought them together—that, namely, of tent-makers; for Aquila is simply designated a Jew of Pontus, and as a Jew an exile from Rome, not as a believer in Christ, when Paul joined himself to the household, and wrought with them at the tent-making. But Aquila and Priscilla soon became among his most devout converts; and in his first epistle to the Corinthians, he sent a salutation, not only from Aquila and Priscilla (who were then with him), but also "from the church in their house." Being at Ephesus, when Apollos first appeared there, they proved of eminent service to him by the fuller instructions they were enabled to impart to him in the Christian faith, Ac. xviii. 26. Further on still, when Paul wrote his epistle to the Romans, he sends one of his tenderest salutations to Aquila and Priscilla, whence they must by that time have removed thither; and speaks of them as having "for his life laid down their own necks," Ro. xvi. 4. By and by they appear to have again left Rome, for in the second epistle to Timothy, ch. iv. 19, a salutation is conveyed to them as in the immediate neighbourhood of Timothy, who was at the time sojourning about Ephesus. Possibly their reception of the Christian faith rendered it somewhat difficult for them to earn a livelihood, or even to carry on their trade in peace; and this may have necessitated frequent changes in their place of abode. But whether such may have been the case or not, there can be no doubt that they were in private life among the steadiest adherents in early times of the cause of Jesus, and contributed not a little, by their exemplary conduct and self-sacrificing zeal, to aid its propagation in the world.

AR [city], the ancient capital of Moab, the city by way of eminence; sometimes also called Ar of Moab, Nu. xxi. 15, 28; De. ii. 9. It stood upon the southern shore of the river Arnon, at the distance of a few miles from the Dead Sea, and nearly on a line with the middle part of that sea. Its later name was Rabbath-Moab, and the ruins, which are about a mile and a half in circuit, still bear the name of Rabba. The remains of a temple are found among them, and some Corinthian pillars (Robinson, Researches, ii. 569); but as a whole they are of little importance. In Jerome's time the place, which was then the seat of a bishop, commonly bore the name of Areopolis, which, as Jerome remarks, was simply a compound made up of the Hebrew and Greek words signifying city.

ARABIA [Heb. ארבי, from ארבה, an arid, sterile tract], the name of an extensive country of S.W. Asia, between 12° 35' and 33° 45' N. lat., and 33° 50' and 59° 55' E. lon. As at present known, it is bounded, N. by Palestine and Syria; E. by the Euphrates, the Persian Gulf, and the Arabian Sea; S. by the Arabian Sea and the Sea of Bab-el-Mandeb; and W. by the Red Sea and Egypt. Greatest length, from its Egyptian frontier to the Arabian Sea, nearly 1700 miles; greatest width, 1400 miles; area, about 1,100,000 sq. miles. A range of mountains runs nearly south-east from the Dead Sea to the Sea of Bab-el-Mandeb.

Owing to the difficulties in the way of a complete exploration of Arabia, we still remain imperfectly acquainted with it. Travellers have but partially penetrated a short distance from the coast, and the only European who has as yet crossed the country from sea to sea, is Captain Sadleir, who, in 1819, proceeded from El Katif, on the shores of the Persian Gulf, to Derrayah, and thence to Yembo, on the Red Sea. Notwithstanding the deficiency of precise observations, we know that Arabia has no considerable, and scarcely any permanent rivers or lakes, and that taken collectively it is a dreary waste of arid wilderness, naked rock, rough stones, and drifting sand, with occasional green spots and cultivated valleys, which, however, bear but a small proportion to the sterile wastes. The desert of Ahkaf (waves of sand), N. of Hadramaut, is of a peculiar character, swallowing up everything which falls into it. The Baron von Wrede threw into the sand a weight with sixty fathoms of line attached to it, and saw the whole disappear in five minutes.

The southern desert does not possess a single fountain of water, and there are no rivers or perennial streams throughout the continent. The sandy plains called the Tehama, which have been left by the retiring of the sea, as well as the sands of the interior, produce the same plants as in North Africa, and which form food for the camel. The Tehamas are occasionally relieved by wadies or valleys, with little streamlets among the hills; and there are besides wells or watering-stations carefully preserved, the tanks being often built of stone. Water is the most valuable property to the Arab, and the possession of a well has often caused disputes and even civil wars, Ge. xxi. 26-31; xxvi. 15-22. The Tehamas, where watered or cultivated, and the valleys in the mountains are abundantly fertile.

This country was long distinguished into two parts—Arabia Deserta and Arabia Felix. To these Ptolemy, the great Alexandrian geographer, added a third district, determining the northern limit, which he named Arabia Petræa. Maculloch (Geog. Dict.) considers that these divisions never had existence among the Arabs themselves, and that the ancient Arabic divisions of the country are as identical as the people and the language with those existing at the present day. The Arabia of the Hebrews included only the tract between Palestine and the Red Sea, known as the peninsula of Mount Sinai, though the term Kedem, "the East," probably referred to Arabia Deserta. Eusebius, and other ancient authors, considered as parts of Arabia the cities beyond Jordan, and of what they called the third Palestine. To these we may add yet another—namely, the desert between the Nile and the Red Sea (Strabo, xvii. c. i. 21-30)—which, by the ancient writers, is always called the Arabian Desert, while that on the west of the Nile is called the Libyan Desert.

1. ARABIA DESERTA lay to the N., and was bounded, E. by the Euphrates, and W. by the mountains of Gilead. It included the northern parts of the elevated table-land known at the present day as Nedsjed and El-Ahsa, and of the surrounding belt of plain country called Gaur or Tehama, which varies in width from one to two days' journey, to less than a mile. The hills of Oman form the east shoulder of the table-land, and the plains of El-Ahsa terminate its inclination towards the Persian Gulf. The characteristic features of this table-land are extensive deserts of moving sand, with a few thorny shrubs and an occasional palm tree and spring of brackish water. Jeremiah most truly describes the desert, ch. ii. 6. Tadmor or Palmyra was on the north-east frontier, 1 Ki. ix. 18; 2 Ch. viii. 4. Paul resorted for a time to that part of this district which was near to Damascus, Gal. i. 17. The early inhabitants of Arabia Deserta were the Rephaim, the Emim, the Zuzim, and Zamzumim, Ge. xiv. 6; De. ii. 10, 11, succeeded by the Ammonites, the Moabites, the Edomites, the Hagarenes, the Nabatheans, the people of Kedar, and many wandering tribes, who had neither towns nor other fixed habitations, but dwelt wholly in tents, like their descendants, the modern Bedouins.

The part called the Haûran or Syrian Desert is strewn with the ruins of towns and villages. A recent traveller, Mr. Cyril Graham, has discovered numerous inscriptions in Greek, Palmyrene, and in an unknown character; and also the remains of some very ancient cities, built of large square stones of basalt, united without cement. He describes the houses as perfect, even to the stone doors, which turn on pivots let into the lintel and sill. These cities are in the country of Og, king of Bashan, one province of which contained "threescore great cities with walls," besides "unwalled towns a great many," De. iii. 4, 5, 1 Ki. iv. 13. (See HAURAN.) Farther south is Um-el-Gamal, which Mr. Graham is disposed to identify with the Beth-gamul of Jeremiah, ch. xlviii. 23 (Royal Society of Literature, May 19, 1858).

2. ARABIA FELIX, or the Happy, was the most southern district, and was bounded, E. by the Persian Gulf, S. by the Arabian Sea, and W. by the Red Sea. Yemen and Hadramaut (Hazarmaveth, Ge. x. 26) formed part of the Arabia Felix of Strabo and Ptolemy, which probably comprised the whole of Hedjaz and Oman, with part of El-Ahsa and Nedsjed. Within its boundary were Seba and Sheba, whose kings are mentioned in the Psalms, lxxxi. 10; and whence it is surmised came the queen of Sheba who visited Solomon, 1 Ki. x. 1; 2 Ch. x. 1. This district is now called El-Hedjaz (the land of pilgrimage), on account of the cities of Mecca, the birth-place, and Medina, the burial-place of the prophet Mahomet, the founder of the Moslim religion. It is peopled chiefly by Ishmaelites, but the inhabitants claim descent from Joktan, son of Eber, Ge. x. 25, who erected a kingdom in Yemen. They have always lived in cities and permanent houses, practised agriculture and commerce, and were anciently reputed very wealthy (Pliny, lib. vi.). Hadramaut, along the southern borders of Arabia, was, and indeed still is, marked by the large number of Jews that dwell there. Lieutenant Wellsted discovered at Hadramaut ruins called Nakabel-Hajar (the excavation in the rock), consisting of a wall 30 or 40 feet high, and flanked with square towers. Within the entrance was an inscription in characters 8 inches long.

Arabia Felix was rich in gems and gold, 1 Ki. x. 10; Eze. xxvii. 22; and in spices, odoriferous shrubs, and fragrant gums, Ex. xxx. 23, 24, 34. The riches and luxuries enumerated by ancient writers were not, however, all native products of the country; but as they reached Palestine and Egypt through Arabia, they were supposed to have been found there.

3. ARABIA PETRÆA, or the Rock; so called from its city PETRA (which see), the Selah of Holy Writ, 2 Ki. xiv. 7; Is. xvi. 1, is now called Hagar or Hadjar, which signifies stone or rock—the peninsula between the gulfs of Suez and Akabah, and bounded N. by Palestine and Egypt. The modern Burr-et-tour-Sinai, Desert of Mount Sinai, the scene of the wanderings of the tribes of Israel, is nearly identical with the Arabia Petræa of Ptolemy. It comprehended the Syrian Desert, the countries of the Cushites, Moabites, Edomites, Nabatheans, and around the southern coast of the Dead Sea to the Red Sea and Egypt, the Hivites, Amalekites, Midianites, and the desert of Mount Sinai. In this district were situated Kadesh-barnea, Pharán, Rephidim, Ezion-gaber, Rithmah, Oboth, Arad, Heshbon, &c., and

Mounts Sinai and Hor. The chief characteristics of Arabia Petrea are wildernesses of rocks and craggy precipices, interspersed with narrow defiles and innumerable sandy valleys, many of which are nearly as barren as the rocks. The valley of the mountain-range Et-Tigh affords fine springs and excellent pasturage. That of Wady Leja, supposed valley of Rephidim, near Jebel Mousa, is described as most delightful; and Wady e' Sheik, and its continuation Wady Feiran (Paran, Nu. xiii. 3), present a succession of gardens and date plantations, almost every one of which has a well. About thirty-three miles S.E. of Ayoun Mousa (the fountain of Moses), is the well of Hawarah, the Marah of Scripture; and about six or seven miles S. of this is Wady Gûrûndel, supposed to be the Elim of Moses. Those parts of the country remote from the ocean are rocky and mountainous. The southern coast is a wall of naked rocks, with here and there a low sandy beach totally devoid of herbage. The mountains, brown and bare, rise one behind another to the height of 1000 or 1500 feet.

Climate.—The climate of Arabia resembles greatly that of North Africa, varying according to the elevation, soil, and proximity to the sea. It has its dry and rainy seasons; in the mountains of Yemen showery weather prevailing regularly from June to September, and in the east, at Oman, from November to February. The neighbouring plains are rarely visited by rain. About the period of the summer solstice the deserts suffer from the fearful blast known as the simoom or hot poison wind from the south, called by the Turks Samyeli.

Mineralogy.—Although at present there are neither gold nor silver mines in Arabia, there can be little doubt that Yemen once yielded gold. There are some iron mines to the north of Yemen. The onyx and an inferior description of emerald are also found in the same district. The other minerals are basalt, blue alabaster, and several kinds of spars and selenite (Niebuhr).

Botany.—Among the vegetable products are the manna of commerce, nutmegs, dates, 2 Ch. xxxi. 5, cocoa and fan-leaved palms, banana, sugar cane (Arrian), tamarind, coffee, the cotton tree, various hard woods, melons, Nu. xi. 5, and pumpkins, all of which are indigenous, or have grown in the valleys from the earliest ages: with these grow lavender, wormwood, jasmine, and other scented plants. Likewise the fig, vine, pomegranate, orange, lemon, quince, plantain, almond, Ge. xliii. 11, apricot, acacia vera, castor-oil plant, senna, white lily, aloe, Pa. xiv. 8, sesamum, all kinds of grain, tobacco, indigo, and different dye herbs, with numerous sorts of fruit and vegetables. To these products are to be added spicery, balm, myrrh, Ge. xxxvii. 25, besides frankincense, Ex. xxx. 34, and many other aromatic gums.

Zoology.—The most remarkable of the domestic animals are the camel, the horse, the ass, Ge. xii. 16; xxx. 43; xxxvii. 25, and broad-tailed sheep, 2 Ch. xvii. 11. There are also humped oxen, like those of Syria, and the goat. The horses are of two kinds, those used for the purposes of labour, and the true Arab horse of the desert, descended, they say, from the breed of Solomon, and of which they pretend to have preserved the genealogy unbroken. This breed is not by any means numerous; Burckhardt supposed that throughout the country the number did not exceed 50,000. Of the two varieties of ass, one is peculiarly strong and courageous, and most valuable in travelling. The beasts of burden are oxen, mules, 2 Ki.

v. 17; 1 Ch. xii. 40, and camels. The camel is so important to the Arab that it may well be termed by him the ship of the desert. It is the most frugal of all domestic animals, costs less than a horse to keep, carries a greater weight, and can endure greater fatigue. From its frugality and laboriousness is derived its name, gemel, camel, which signifies "to requite," because more than any animal it requites its master. In Cairo the widow, at the funeral of the husband, cries, "O thou camel of the house," or, O thou who bearest the burden of the house. On the removal of a tribe, the camel carries the furniture and the tents, Is. xxx. 6; Je. ii. 23; Es. viii. 10. The she-camel furnishes the people with milk. Among the wild animals are the leopard, hyena, panther, jackal, jerboa, wolf, fox, boar, apea, wild asses, wild oxen, goats, and antelopes. Serpents and lizards abound, Nu. xxi. 4, 6, as do likewise land and sea turtles. In the fertile districts domestic fowl, pheasants, partridges, guinea fowl, pigeons, and a species of quail, are plentiful. The most celebrated bird is the locust-destroyer, a species of thrush, called by the natives samar-mog. The ostrich, named by the Turks the camel-bird, inhabits the desert, and eagles build in the mountains.

Origin of the Arabs.—Arabia was originally peopled by Cush, the son of Ham, and his descendants, Ge. x. 7, 20-30, who were succeeded by the posterity of Nahor, Abraham, and Lot, the various tribes thus formed, of whatsoever denomination, being now comprehended in the general name of Arabians. These peoples are divided into those who dwell in houses and towns, and those who live in tents in the open country or desert; and so striking are the differences between the two divisions as to leave little doubt of their distinct origin, each class still retaining the distinguishing features which marked it in the earliest times. The native writers describe two classes of settlers, the old tribes, now extinct, descended from the sons of Iram (Aram), and the present inhabitants, divided into the pure, descended from Joktan, and the Most-Arabi, the mixed or naturalized Arabs, said to be descended from Ishmael, by a daughter of Modad, king of Hedjaz. The tribes of Mahrak and Dhofar speak a language called Ehkilli, which circumstances combine to identify with the Hamyaritic, the general language of Southern Arabia before the time of Mahomet, but it does not follow, on this account, that they are a distinct race, and it has been surmised that they are only descendants of the portion of the population who rejected Islamism in the first instance. Jews have always been numerous in Arabia, but it is probable that the majority are not Israelites by descent. In Yemen, the native Jews still form a considerable community, and towards Asir are the warlike tribes of the Beni Hobab, Nu. x. 29; Ju. iv. 11, and the Beni Arhab (Rechab), Jo. xxxv. 12.

Government and Character of the Arabs.—The head of each tribe is called a sheikh, or elder, and the government is hereditary in his family, but elective as regards the individual. In character the Arab is proud of his descent, generous, hospitable, intelligent, eloquent, and fond of poetry. His hospitality is such, that he kindles beacon-fires on every hill to conduct the way-faring traveller. On the other hand, he is superstitious, dishonest, holding robbery to be a right, irascible, vindictive, and unforgiving, all quarrels being hereditary. The war of the two houses, Dahes and Ghebra, about a contested race, lasted forty years; that of Basus sprung from killing a camel which had drunk at a forbidden spring, and raged many years, during which nearly all the principal men of the tribes engaged were cut off. Niebuhr esteems the Bedouin as the only true Arab—the "wild man" fulfilling his destiny, Ge. xvi. 10-12, still preserving his liberty, each tribe living apart and in tents, and retaining the habits of his forefathers, Exr. viii. 31; Job i. 15; Is. xxi. 13. Arab tents are from 20 to 30 feet long, and not more than 6 or 8 feet high. They are of goats' or camels' hair cloth, and black or brown in colour, Ca. i. 5 (Pliny, Nat. Hist. vi.) Each tent is divided into two parts, one of which is for the women. When encamped, the tents are arranged in a ring, the inclosure within serving as a pen for the cattle. The Arab of the desert has never been subdued by any conqueror, the most ancient and powerful tribes at once retiring into the desert when attacked by a foreign enemy, Je. xlix. 8. The Arab of the towns, in consequence of commerce and of intercourse with strangers, has lost many of his peculiar traits, and his character is much deteriorated, being not only dishonest, but deceitful and untruthful.

Religion.—The Arabians seem to have regarded Mecca and the Kaaba, or Square, with holy feelings from the earliest times. Mecca is asserted to be the spot where Ishmael was saved, and where Hagar died and was buried; and the sacred Zemzem is believed to be the well pointed out by the angel. The Mahometans also assert that the Kaaba was built by Seth, of stone and clay, and, being destroyed by the deluge, was rebuilt by Abraham and Ishmael, 10,000 angels being appointed to guard it. In religion, the ancient Arabians were pure Sabæans, worshipping one God, and regarding the sun, moon, and stars as subordinate intelligences. In course of ages this religion became less pure; innumerable angels were admitted into their worship, 360 being enshrined in the Kaaba as tutelary guardians of the Arab year; other deities were gradually added, and even the Virgin Mary with the infant Jesus was carved on one of the pillars of the Kaaba as an object of adoration. Other religions were also established, until, at the time of the birth of Mahomet, A.D. 570, the people were nearly equally divided into Sabæans, Jews, Magians, and Christians. Arabia became united in the Moslim faith, A.D. 628.

History.—The Arabs have a variety of traditions respecting Abraham, Moses, Jethro, Solomon, and other Scripture personages; but we have no knowledge of any perfect history of the country; although a few fixed periods have been ascertained which would be of use as data for comparison. In the fourth century A.D., a king of Yemen embraced Judaism and persecuted the Christians, putting several thousands of them to the sword.

A.D. 632-33, the successors of Mahomet removed the seat of the empire from Medina to Damascus, and thence, by Al Mansur, A.D. 763, to Bagdad, where it remained until the taking of the city by Houlakou, grandson of Jenghis Khan, A.D. 1259. Under Caliph Haroun al Raschid, A.D. 786-809, Al Amin, 809-13, and Al Mamoun, 813-33, the Arabs rose to great power, and attained such high literary and scientific eminence, that the court at Bagdad became the centre of learning and civilization at the darkest period of European history. The ambassadors and agents of Al Mamoun had orders to collect the most important books that could be discovered; and the literary relics of conquered provinces were laid at the foot of the throne as the most precious tribute. The caliphs disseminated learning throughout their whole dominions, first in Africa, where they built many universities, and thence through Spain. To the Arabs we owe the system of arithmetical characters now in general use; and in astronomy, chemistry, algebra, medicine, and architecture, they were unequalled. It is worthy of remark that, numerous as are the beautiful specimens of Saracenic architecture of the middle ages in the countries conquered by the Arabs, no remains of the period are found in Arabia herself.

Notwithstanding the rapid and extended conquests of the Arabs, Arabia their mother country has always escaped being conquered in turn. She has only suffered two revolutions since the time of Mahomet, both of a religious character. The first—the objects of which were to alter the ceremonial, rescind the prohibition of wine, and prevent the holy pilgrimages—was headed by Ermath, A.D. 890, and desolated the country for more than sixty years. The second, at the beginning of the last century, to reform the abuses that had encroached upon the pure doctrines of Mahomet, was headed by Abd-el-Wahab. The Wahabee doctrine made great progress, and at the beginning of the present century both Mecca and Medina were in the hands of the Wahabees. In 1813, Mahomet Ali conquered and expelled them from the western coast; but the sect is still extensive at Neilsjed, though its power and numbers are on the decline.

The present population of the whole of Arabia has been estimated at between 11,000,000 and 12,000,000, but the data are quite uncertain.

Manufactures and Trade.—Gunpowder was known to the Arabs at least a century before it appears in European history; and we owe to them the introduction and cultivation of the sugar-cane. The mechanical arts, however, are at the lowest point with them, all handicraft occupations being esteemed as degrading. The Bedouins know little else than the tanning of leather and the weaving of coarse fabrics; they have a few blacksmiths and saddlers. In Yemen there are workers in glass, gold, and silver; but the artificers in the precious metals are all Jews and Banians.

Although the pearl banks in the Persian Gulf yield a considerable revenue, and the fishermen on the south coasts of Arabia collect an abundance of both ambergris and tortoise-shell, it is now known that the valuable commodities anciently supposed to be the produce of Arabia, were imported from India, Caramania, and elsewhere. Aden was the ancient centre of traffic between India and the Red Sea, and Gherra, on the Persian Gulf. The transit trade enriched Arabia until the passage round the Cape was discovered; but steam navigation has restored the ancient route for travellers, and the railway and the telegraph may yet revive the commerce of the country.

Of all nations, the Arabs have spread farthest over the world, colonies being found in every region from the Senegal to the Indus—from the Euphrates to Madagascar (Ritter, Erdkunde, th. ii.) Throughout their wanderings they have preserved their language, and peculiar manners and customs, many being precisely the same at this day as are described in Scripture, demonstrating the stationary nature of the usages and habits which form the general character of the East (Laborde), and rendering an intimate knowledge of this people essential to the biblical student; while their language, being closely allied to the Hebrew, affords a most important aid in illustrating Holy Writ.

ARABIC LANGUAGE. This language, as is well known, is the great living representative of the class of languages usually called Semitic, to which the Hebrew also belongs. And it is the fact of its close relationship to the Hebrew, and its consequent value to the expositor of the Old Testament scriptures, that entitles it to a place in a work such as this.

Of the general characteristics of the Semitic languages some account will be given in another place. (See HEBREW LANGUAGE.) Our object at present is to point out the special relation in which two of these languages, the Arabic and Hebrew, stand to one another, and thus to indicate the nature and extent of the assistance which we may expect to derive from the study of the one in enlarging our knowledge of the other.

Independently, indeed, of its connection with the Hebrew, the Arabic language has many claims on the attention of the student; and these, though the exposition of them is not our principal object, must not be left altogether unnoticed.

1. The language itself is very remarkable: its dictionary is of wonderful extent, whilst its grammar is most simple and regular, and at the same time makes ample provision for the expression even of most delicate shades of thought.

2. No language has been spoken over a larger portion of the earth's surface.—From its home in the deserts it has extended its conquests beyond the Indus on the east, and to the shores of the Atlantic on the west; and southward it is even at the present day making considerable advances, spreading over the central regions of Africa, and even beyond the equator.—(Barth's Travels in Africa, iii. 465.)

3. The extent and variety of the Arabic literature.—Few languages have embraced such a large and varied field of literature as the Arabic, though the days of its power have passed away. During the middle ages, it may be confidently affirmed that as many books were written in Arabic as in all the other languages of the earth taken together, and these books embraced every department of knowledge.—(Compare Hammer-Purgstall's great work, in German, On the History of the Literature of the Arabians.) And the influence of this wonderful mental activity is felt even to the present day. Our obligations to the Arabian writers, not only for much positive knowledge, but, what is of still more consequence, for helping to communicate to the European mind that impulse, which has resulted in the advanced knowledge and civilization of modern times, are well known. These obligations are not mere matter of history; our very language bears in its composition, and will continue to bear as long as it endures, evidence of the mental power and superiority which distinguished the Arabians of the middle-ages.—(Trench's English, Past and Present, p. 7.)

4. The historical associations of the Arabic language constitute for it another claim on our interest. It was the language of those sons of the East whose wisdom had become proverbial three thousand years ago. It was the language in which Mohammed promulgated that system of mingled truth and falsehood which occupies so large a space in the history of the world, and which even now has not ceased to influence the destinies of mankind.

But not to dwell on these topics, we return to what constitutes the principal claim of this language on the attention of the student of Scripture, viz. the close affinity in which it stands to the Hebrew, and the valuable aid which it furnishes in the interpretation of the Hebrew Scriptures.

What is the relation in which the Hebrew and Arabic languages stand to one another? Are they sister tongues, or is the one the parent of the other? If the latter, to which is the position of priority to be assigned? These are questions which have been very variously answered. Formerly there was no hesitation in assigning the priority to the Hebrew; at present the prevailing sentiment of Semitic scholars seems rather to favour the priority of the Arabic. The latter is very decidedly the view of Rödiger, the distinguished professor of oriental languages at Berlin, formerly at Halle.

There are two acknowledged facts, the one of which seems to favour the former of these views (the priority of the Hebrew), as the other seems to favour the latter (the priority of the Arabic). The one fact is that, while the commencement of the existing Hebrew literature dates from the fifteenth century before Christ, the commencement of the existing Arabic literature dates only from the fifth century after Christ. It seems scarce credible that the Hebrew literature should be two thousand years older than the Arabic, and, notwithstanding, that the Arabic language should be older than the Hebrew. The other fact, which seems to lead to a conclusion just the reverse, is that the modern Arabic bears a much closer resemblance to the Hebrew than the ancient Arabic does.

A little consideration, however, is sufficient to show that neither of the facts just mentioned, however striking and decisive they seem at first glance, is of itself sufficient to determine the question of the relative antiquity of the two languages. The Arabic language had its home among a people who lived secluded from the other nations of the world, and preserved during many centuries the simple manners of their ancestors, untainted by the corrupting influence of foreign associations. And, therefore, we cannot at once pronounce untenable the hypothesis, that among that simple secluded people was preserved during many ages a form of the Semitic tongue, more closely approaching to the original than those forms which we find prevailing among the Hebrews, Chaldees, and Syrians—nations which acted a much more prominent part on the world's stage, and were much more powerfully acted upon by foreign influences. On the other hand, the fact that the Hebrew language accords with the modern in some forms in which it differs from the ancient Arabic, does not at all necessitate the conclusion that it must have gone through a series of changes similar to that through which the Arabic has passed. We have no reason to believe that the Hebrew ever was so highly cultivated and so largely developed as the Arabic. And therefore we do not hesitate to accept as sufficient the solution of the difficulty which is suggested by Ewald: "In multis lingua recentior ad ea rediit quæ politior et cultior mutaverat."—(Arabic Grammar, i. 6; and compare Bunsen's Phil. of History, i. 182.)

We believe the Hebrew to be the elder sister of the Arabic. In the latter we find the original Semitic language much more fully developed than in the former, and larger provision made for the exact and discriminating expression of the various shades of thought. Much that the Hebrew leaves to be caught up from the tone, manner, gesture, is formally expressed in the Arabic. There is also very little of composition about the Hebrew literature, as is evident even from our own version. Its great thoughts are expressed in the simplest way. The Arabic, though also simple in its structure, is far more artificial than the Hebrew. The thoughts which it expresses are more formally connected and regularly subordinated. When we first meet it in history, it has evidently lost much of the antique simplicity and artlessness which we mark at once in the Hebrew writings. It is less the pure unrestrained outflowing of thought. It has been more wrought upon, and shaped and moulded.

At the same time, while we believe the Hebrew language, as a whole, to be a more ancient form of the Semitic language than the Arabic, we are quite prepared to admit that there have been preserved to us in the Arabic, probably from the operation of the causes already mentioned, not a few forms which approximate more closely to those of the original language than the corresponding forms in Hebrew.

But, though scholars may differ as to the relative position and antiquity of the Hebrew and Arabic, there is no doubt that the two languages are very closely allied, so closely that it is impossible to have a thorough mastery of the one language without being at the same time acquainted with the other, at least in its general principles and leading forms. To the Hebrew student especially, a knowledge of Arabic is of great importance, as the limited extent of the ancient Hebrew literature is the occasion of the expositor of many difficulties, for the removal of which he must carefully gather in, and make diligent use of, all the aids within his reach.

I. Points of resemblance between the Hebrew and Arabic.—Comparative philologists have discussed the question whether the dictionary or the grammar furnishes the better test of the relationship of languages. In the investigation of the Semitic languages this question has no place; as the resemblances between all these languages in dictionary and in grammar are alike numerous and decisive.

1. Dictionary or root resemblances.—The greater number of the Hebrew roots are found also in Arabic, and each bearing a signification either identical or evidently related. In both languages the roots consist usually of three letters: and there is the same distinction in sense between the three classes of roots technically called middle A, middle E, and middle U. The pronouns and numerals are substantially the same.

From the copious dictionary of the living Arabic language we may, therefore, draw large materials for the use of the Hebrew lexicographer. It is a necessary consequence of the ancient Hebrew writings being so few and at the same time so varied in their character, that many Hebrew roots are met with only once or twice, and the lexicographer has therefore, in many cases, great difficulty in determining their exact signification. In such cases it is the suggestion of common sense that he should turn to the Arabic dictionary, in which he will probably find the root of which he is in doubt, with its various significations annexed; and, from a comparison of these, he will usually be able, if not absolutely to determine the signification of the root in Hebrew, at least to arrive at a conclusion in which he may for the present acquiesce, until some new source of illustration is opened up to him. Though this course of procedure, which seems to be the dictate of common sense, was once condemned by many Hebrew scholars, among whom Guesetius, whose lexicon is still valuable, was probably the most eminent, it is now universally adopted, and has been the means of eliciting many important results.

But the Arabic dictionary has been of good service not only in determining the signification of rare Hebrew roots, but also in throwing new light upon roots which are neither rare nor of doubtful signification. It is now the recognized duty of the lexicographer, not merely to collect the various significations of each root, but to arrange these significations in the natural and probable order of their development; or, if a root has only one signification, to explain as far as possible how it came to bear it. It is obvious, however, that in order to do this with any approach to accuracy, a range of observation much more extensive than is furnished by the scanty remains of the ancient Hebrew literature is indispensable. Hence the extreme importance of the Arabic dictionary to the Hebrew lexicographer, who is able, as is evident even on a cursory inspection of such a lexicon as that of Gesenius, to draw from thence a new and large store of materials. Take for example the Hebrew verb, שָׁצַר , he saved. This verb, like many others, is not met with in Hebrew in the simple kal form. Why so? For what reason is the hiphil form preferred? We find the explanation in the Arabic, which has preserved the simple form lost in Hebrew (عَمَّ , amplus et patulus fuit), and thus enables us to decide that the original signification of שָׁצַר is to make wide, to enlarge; hence, to extricate, to deliver, to save.

Again, there are other roots in Hebrew which are found to bear two or more significations so widely different, that it is scarcely possible, by any exercise of ingenuity to trace them to a common origin. Turning to the Arabic dictionary we find that what appears in Hebrew as a single root is in reality two. Thus

حَرَسَ = حَرَس and حَرَّز ; حَرَس = حَرَس and حَرَس
(See Gesenius, Lehrgeb. pp. 14, 19.)

Indeed, so fully recognized at the present time is the value of the Arabic language in determining and illustrating the signification of the Hebrew roots, that it is perhaps more necessary to caution against the abuse of this valuable aid than to recommend its use. By the German scholars especially, the Arabic has often been repaired to for aid when no aid was needed. If the signification of a root is already sufficiently determined by the usage of the Hebrew Bible, we must not, as has sometimes been done, ransack the cognate languages for some new rendering, unsupported by Hebrew usage, but more consonant with the dogmatic prepossessions of the interpreter. We cannot but think that something of this sort has been done by the majority of modern expositors in affixing to the root $\text{נָחַ$ in Is. lii. 15, the signification of exult.¹

2. Resemblances in grammatical formations.—These are not less marked than the resemblances in root-forms. In both languages we have the same distribution of the letters into radicals and serviles (the only difference being that in Arabic Phe is a servile, He not, while in Hebrew it is just the reverse); the same close connection between verb and noun; the same use of fragmentary pronouns, prefixed and affixed, in the inflection of the roots; in the verb a similar system of conjugations, modes, tenses, &c.; in the noun corresponding forms and inflections; in the numerals from 3 to 10 the same peculiarity of the masculine gender being represented by the feminine form, the feminine by the masculine; and in the particles of most common occurrence a very close correspondence. The principles by which the syntax of both languages is regulated are also the same. In both the subject of the sentence frequently stands absolutely at the beginning of the sentence; when it does not, the predicate usually precedes it: in both the adjective stands after the substantive which it defines or characterizes: in both the tense usages, though by no means identical, can be shown to rest upon the same principles: in both a verb is often followed by its cognate noun either with or without an adjective: in both comparison is expressed by means of the preposition "from:" in both two nouns in construction often stand for a noun and adjective, or simply for an adjective: in both the numerals higher than units are for the most part followed by a singular noun. Such resemblances as these might be multiplied; but the above are sufficient to show how closely the two languages are allied in structure, as well as in root-forms.

II. Points of difference between the Hebrew and Arabic.—The study of these will be found of not less consequence in ascertaining the principles of the Semitic language, than the study of the points of resemblance. For a principle is always the better understood, when it is seen working not always in the same direction, but in different directions, and under different influences.

1. Root differences.—When we find an Arabic root consisting of the same letters as a Hebrew one, we must not at once conclude that both have the same signification. We must not overlook the changes caused by the influences of place, and time, and circumstance. The two roots were once, indeed, identical in signification—they had the same starting point; but from that point onward they have been acted upon by different influences, these influences modifying the original signification, sometimes indeed very slightly, but sometimes so decidedly as to render it doubtful whether roots which now stand so far apart could ever have been one. For example, no roots are more common in Hebrew than the verbs הָלַךְ , he went, and דָּבַר , he spoke. But turn to the Arabic lexicon. We discover indeed corresponding roots; but how different the significations attached to them! The former, we find, means in Arabic he perished; the latter, he arranged, he ruled. How do we explain this? It is the part of the lexicographer to trace back these different significations to a common root; and in the attempt to do so he is often led to important results which would otherwise have escaped his notice. The truth is, if we found in Arabic the same roots bearing exactly the same significations as in Hebrew, the comparative study of these languages would lose much of its importance. It is from the study of their differences that the most valuable results have been obtained.

2. Grammatical differences.—Not a few of the forms and inflections of the Arabic grammar appear to be older and more original than the corresponding forms in Hebrew. For example, the pronouns of the second person in Arabic, anta, anti, . . . antum, antunna, are older than the Hebrew forms atta, att, attem, atten. So the suffixes ka, ki, . . . kum, kunna, are older than ka, k, kem, ken. It is evident that the Hebrew katal was originally katali, as in Arabic, because we find that form still preserved before the suffixes: for the same reason ketaltum must be a corruption of ketaltum (the Arabic form). The vocalization also of the Arabic seems purer than that of the Hebrew, e.g. Ar. yaktul, Heb. yiktol; Ar. katal, Heb. kotel; Ar. kattala, Heb. kittel, &c. So the diphthongs ai, au, retained in Arabic, are corrupted into ae, ô in Hebrew.

Again, in Arabic we find a much larger development of many Hebrew formations. Much that seems somewhat fragmentary and isolated in Hebrew appears in Arabic systematically wrought out and completed.

This is seen in the various forms of the Arabic future tense, of which we have the germs in the long and short future of the Hebrew: in the regularity with which the passive formation by means of the vowel u is carried through all the conjugations of the verb which are capable of receiving a passive signification: in the case terminations of the noun, of which in Hebrew we have only the first beginnings: perhaps also in the larger use of the dual number.

Many parts also of the Arabic grammar, which seem most distinctive and peculiar, may be traced to principles, the operation of which we observe also in Hebrew. The most remarkable of these is the mode in which plurality is usually expressed, viz. by means of a feminine singular abstract noun, technically called the plurialis fractus. This formation, indeed, is not peculiar to the Arabic, nor even to the Semitic languages (Bunsen's Philosophy of Universal History, i. 292), but in Arabic it seems more regularly and widely developed than in any other language. In Hebrew, examples of the converse, i. e. of the plural form employed to denote a singular idea, are more common. In both the ideal predominates over the real.

With regard to the structure and connection of sentences, in Arabic the vau consecutive disappears; but instead of it we find other forms of construction, which show that the two tenses have substantially the same import as in Hebrew. There is also a larger use of the substantive verb as an auxiliary. Thus, as in Syriac, a pluperfect tense is formed by means of it; and it is also found standing before the future to describe past continued, or habitual action.

But, not to delay longer on details, it only remains to remark in general, that the Arabic is distinguished from the Hebrew by being less stiff and formal and more flexible, abounding in vowel sounds. In both each syllable begins with a consonant; but in Arabic no syllable either begins or ends with two consonants. In both the syllable which ends with a consonant most frequently takes a short vowel; but the Arabic differs from the Hebrew in admitting the short vowel also into the unaccented open syllable, i. e. the syllable ending with a vowel. Such differences in the language have their root in the character of the people. The Arabic is the language of a people light, gay, impulsive; the Hebrew, of a people grave, earnest, resolved.

In connection with the Arabic language ought to be studied the Ethiopic, which in some of its forms approaches still nearer to the Hebrew. The fragmentary Himyaritic inscriptions, when discovered in larger numbers and fully investigated, will probably be found to present the Arabic language in its oldest form. Connected with these are the inscriptions found on Mount Sinai, which are still in process of decipherment.

[The Arabic dictionary which is perhaps most accessible is Freitag's, larger and smaller. The best grammars are De Sacy's and Ewald's, each in two volumes. Of the smaller sort the best is that of Caspari, by Wright of Dublin. Humbert's Chrestomathy is excellent; but Arnold's has the advantage of having a lexicon attached. The student may also avail himself of Professor Wright's Jonah, in four Semitic versions; and of the Arabic Reading Lessons, published by Bagster. Compare also Schultens' Origines Hebrææ et Dissertatio Theol. Phil. de utilitate Lingue Arabicæ; Professor Robertson's (Edinburgh) Dissertatio de Origine et Antiquitate Lingue Arabicæ; and the notices of the Arabic language in Hävernick's Introduction (Clarke's Library); and similar works.]

ARABIC VERSIONS. Of these, printed and unprinted, there is a considerable number; none, however, embracing the whole of the Scriptures, and few so ancient as to render the study of them a profitable labour to the biblical student.

Christianity does not appear at any time to have taken deep root in the peninsula of Arabia. We read, it is true, in Scripture, Ga. 1.17, of a journey of Paul into Arabia soon after his conversion, but to what part of Arabia he repaired, or whether his residence there resulted in the conversion of any to the Christian faith, is unknown. "His object does not seem to have been the preaching of the gospel, but preparation for the apostolic work" (Alford). It is certain that in the sixth century, the greater number of the Arabians were still pagans. And though scattered here and there over the peninsula we do find tribes and families of Christians and Jews, and read also of churches erected in various parts, even in the extreme south, and of bishops appointed to minister in them, yet no such decided success was achieved as in the adjacent regions of Syria, Mesopotamia, and Egypt. (Pococke, Spec. Hist. Arab. pp. 136, 137, ed. 1650; Neander, iii. 156, Trans.; Sale's Koran, Prel. Dis. § 1.) It is scarcely matter of surprise, therefore, that we have no undoubted evidence of any translation of the Scriptures into Arabic having been executed before the time of Mohammed. (See Dr. Davidson's Biblical Crit. i. 255.) Theodoret and Chrysostom make mention of translations into the Latin, Coptic, Persian, Syrian, Indian, Armenian, and Ethiopic languages, but they make no mention of translations into Arabic. (See the passages quoted in Walton, Prolegomenon, v. § 1.) Yet, when we consider that some of the Arabian tribes had at an early period been converted to Christianity; that Christian assemblies were held, in which assemblies the public reading of the Scriptures in the native language always formed part of the service; and more especially when we take into account the influence which Christianity, as well as Judaism, exercised on the teaching of Mohammed and the doctrines of the Koran, we cannot but conclude that part at least of the Christian and Jewish Scriptures had been translated into Arabic before his time. Whether, however, this conclusion be well founded or not, is of no great moment, as no such translation, if it ever existed, is now extant.

It is to the rise and wonderful extension of the Mohammedan religion, and the consequent elevation of the Arabic language to a rank among the languages of the earth, at least equal to that of the Greek and Latin, that we are indebted for the versions of Scripture in that language of which we are now in possession. In a short time it almost superseded the Syriac language in the north, and the Greek and Coptic in Egypt; so that it became necessary, for the maintenance of Christian worship in those regions, to have the Scriptures translated from languages which were falling into disuse into the southern tongue which was so rapidly supplanting them. Even in distant Spain this necessity was felt; and one of the earliest Arabic versions we read of was from the pen of a bishop of Seville, who lived in the beginning of the eighth century.—(Walton's Prol. v. 1, 9.)

It is unnecessary to give any detailed account of the versions which thus came into use. For, as might be anticipated from the circumstances in which these versions originated, most of them were derived not directly from the original but from some other translation, Syriac, Greek, or Latin, and are of little importance, except for the criticism of the versions from which they were taken. Those again which have come directly from the Hebrew of the Old Testament, and the Greek of the New, are none of them older than the tenth century, and cannot therefore possess the same authority or excite the same interest, as the other versions which have descended to us from a much higher antiquity.

The Arabic translation of the Old Testament, contained in the London Polyglott, consists of various parts written by different authors, of whom, with one exception, not even the name is known. The one author, whose name is known, is R. Saadias, distinguished by the title Gaon or Haggaoon, the Excellent, who rose to high eminence among the teachers of the Jewish schools or colleges in Babylonia in the beginning of the tenth century. It is supposed that he translated the whole of the Old Testament into Arabic; but if this supposition be correct, the greater part of his translation has been lost, all that is now extant being the Arabic Pentateuch, printed in the Polyglott Isaiah, printed at Jena, 1790-91, and Job, still in manuscript. His translation of the Pentateuch, though free and displaying a strong tendency to modernize ancient ideas and modes of expression, and also occasionally to modify doctrinal statements, ought not to be called a paraphrase, as it is for the most part sufficiently exact, and does not occupy larger space than the other more literal versions. Its modernizing character may be judged of by the following examples:—And God willed that there should be light, Ge. 1. 3; this is an account of the production, &c. (Eng. ver. "these are the generations of," &c.) Ge. 11. 4; Enoch walked in obedience to God, Ge. v. 22; sons of the nobles with the daughters of the common people ("sons of God with daughters of men"), Ge. vi. 2; cursed be the father of Canaan ("cursed be Canaan"), Ge. ix. 25; The Eternal ("I am that I am"), Ex. 11. 14; punishing the faults of the fathers with the children ("visiting on the children"), Ex. xx. 5; do not swear falsely by the name of God thy Lord, &c. Ex. xx. 7. It has been remarked (see Poccoke's Introd. in Walton's Polyglott, vol. vi.) that he avoids what are called the anthropomorphisms of Scripture, substituting "the angel of God," or "the voice of God," or some such expression, where the Hebrew has God or Jehovah, as in Ge. iii. 8; xi. 5, &c. Frequently in giving names of places or nations, he substitutes the modern for the ancient name, as in Ge. x., into which he introduces Greeks, Turks, Franks, Slavonians, Chinese, &c.

The only other part of the Polyglott Arabic version translated from the Hebrew, is the book of Joshua, which closes with a statement to that effect; and this statement is quite borne out by an examination of the translation itself, though there are passages in which it seems to have been interpolated from the LXX., as in ch. vi. end, and xxiv. 30. It is evidently not from the pen of Saadias, though it agrees with his translation in some particulars, as in substituting modern for ancient names (e.g. Shâm for Canaan, ch. v. 6, &c.; Irak for Shinar, ch. vii. 21; Nablous for Shechem, ch. xxi. 21.) The translator, whoever he was, does not appear to have been a person of much capacity, as he makes the absurd blunder of taking the geographical name Shittim for a common noun, and translating "the unbelievers"—a translation, however, which proves that he must have had an unpointed Hebrew MS. before him, ch. 11. 1; 111. 1.

The other books of the Old Testament, with the exception of 1 Ki. xii.—2 Ki. xii. 16, which Rödiger refers to a Hebrew original, are translated either from the Peaschito version or from the LXX.; Job, and most of the historical books from the Syriac; the Prophets, Psalms, and books of Solomon from the Greek. In the New Testament, the Gospels are translated from the Vulgate, and the other books, though not at second hand, are too modern to be of much value. For details with regard to these and the other Arabic versions, printed and unprinted, not forming part of the London Polyglott, the student is referred to such works as Walton's Prolegomena, Davidson's Biblical Criticism, and the Introductions. [D. H. W.]

AR'AD, the name of a Canaanite city somewhere on the southern border of the Promised Land. In the English version it is sometimes unhappily taken for the name of a man—"king Arad," instead of "the king of Arad," Nu. xxi. 1; xxxiii. 40; while, again, in other passages Arad is represented as a city, Jos. xii. 14; Ju. 1. 16. There can be little doubt that it was the name of a city, though the exact site of it is not certainly known. In the passage of Judges referred to it is spoken of in connection with the wilderness of Judah; and there is much probability in the conjecture of Robinson, that a hill on the way from Petra to Hebron, called Tel Arad, may indicate the region where it stood. This accords pretty well also with the notice of Eusebius and Jerome, who make the place twenty miles from Hebron.

AR'ARAT [the root uncertain, but supposed by Gesenius to be Sanscrit, and to mean holy ground], a province in Armenia, upon whose mountains the ark of Noah rested, Ge. viii. 4. The mountain known as Ararat, lat. 39° 30' N.; lon. 44° 35' E., is about 35 miles south-west of Erivan, and 150 from Erzeroom, and forms the termination of a range of mountains connected with the Caucasian chain, the eastern and north-eastern base being washed by the river Aras (Araxes). The mountain consists of two conical peaks, the highest of which, according to Dr. Parrot, is 17,323 English feet above the level of the sea, and 14,320 feet above the plain of the Aras. The lesser peak, which joins the higher by a gentle descent, is 13,100 feet above the sea, and 10,140 feet above the plain of the Aras. The two peaks, in a direct line, are about 36,000 feet apart. The summit of the highest peak is a slightly convex, and nearly cruciform platform of about 213 English feet in diameter, composed of eternal ice unbroken by rock or stone. The entire upper region, from the height of 12,750 English feet, is covered with perpetual snow and ice, immense avalanches being frequently precipitated down its sides. On one side of the greater Ararat is a chasm having the appearance of the crater of a volcano, which Tournefort describes as blackened by smoke, and from which Dr. Reineggs states that he saw fire and smoke issue during three successive days in 1785. In 1840 the whole region of Ararat was visited by an eruption and earthquake, which continued at intervals from the end of June to the middle of September. Dr. Wagner, who visited the spot in 1843, furnishes an account of that event as related by Sahatel Chotschaieff, brother to Stephen Aga, village elder of Arguri, and confirmed by other eye-witnesses. The substance of the account is, that on July 2d, half an hour before sunset, the atmosphere clear, the inhabitants of Armenia were frightened by a loud thundering noise in the vicinity of the Great Ararat. During an undulating motion of the earth, lasting about two seconds, which wrought great destruction, a rent was found in the end of the great chasm about

3 miles above Arguri, out of which rose gas and vapour, hurling with immense force stones and earth over the slope of the mountain down into the plain. The vapour rose higher than the summit of Ararat, and appears to have been wholly of aqueous composition. It was at first of various colours, principally blue and red, but whether flames burst forth could not be ascertained. The air was filled with the smell of sulphur; the mountain heaved, and the earth shook with unremitting thunder; and large masses of rock, some upwards of 50 tons weight, were hurled through the air. The eruption continued a full hour. When the vapour had cleared away, and the shower of mud and stones had ceased, the village of Arguri, and the monastery and chapel of St. James, were not to be seen, all, along with their inmates, being buried under the mass that had been ejected. The accompanying earthquake destroyed 6000 houses in the neighbouring districts. Four days later, a second catastrophe spread still farther the work of destruction at the foot of the mountain. After the rent in the chasm had closed, there remained in the same place a deep basin filled with water; the mass of stone and clay which formed a dam, and surrounded the lake, was burst by the weight of water, and poured down the mountain a stream of thick mud, which spread into the plain, and partly stopped up the bed, and altered the course of the small river Karasu. This stream of mud was three times repeated, and was accompanied by subterranean noises (Wagner's Reise nach dem Ararat).

Tournefort mentions that the middle region of Ararat, even to the borders of the snow limit, is inhabited by tigers, and that he saw them within 700 yards of him. Ker Porter, Morier, Smith and Dwight, and Layard, have supplied most graphic descriptions of Ararat and the adjacent country, and all travellers in that district, whether before or since the earthquake of 1840, have been equally surprised and filled with admiration at the sublime form of the mountain, and the awe-inspiring radiance of its peaks. Near the base of Ararat at Korvirah is the celebrated Armenian church, as well as the prison of St. Gregory, the apostle of Armenia. The prison is a narrow cave about 30 feet deep. The plain of Erivan, and the valley of the Aras, are extremely beautiful and fertile, but the climate is not healthy.

The Armenians assert, that in order to preserve the ark of Noah, no one is permitted to reach the top of the mountain. They therefore deny the practicability of the ascent; nevertheless the attempt has been made at various periods, though for a long time unsuccessfully. In 1700 the enterprising French traveller Tournefort, after unremitting exertions, and repeated attempts, failed in reaching the top. About forty years ago the Turkish Pasha of Bayazeed fitted out an expedition well supplied with huts and provisions, but, after suffering severely, the explorers failed. Some ten years afterward a party, headed by a German, Professor Parrot, of the university of Dorpat (Jourief), in Russia, made a fresh and well-sustained effort, and after two previous failures, actually reached the summit on 9th October, 1829.

The observations effected by Parrot have been fully confirmed by another Russian traveller, H. Abich, who, with six companions, reached the top of the Great Ararat without difficulty, July 29, 1845. He reports that, from the valley between the two peaks nearly 8000 feet above the level of the sea, the ascent can with facility be accomplished. It would appear even that the ascent is easier than that of Mont Blanc; and the best period for the enterprise is the end of July or beginning of August, when there is annually a period of atmospheric quiet, and a clear unclouded sky.

Another Russian, M. Antonomoff, has also ascended to the top; and an Englishman, named Scymour, accompanied by a guide to tourists, named Orvione, and escorted by four Cossacks and three Armenians, claims likewise to have ascended the mountain, and to have reached the level summit of the highest peak on 17th September, 1846.—(See extract from a letter in the Caucase, a St. Petersburg journal, Athenæum, No. 1035, p. 914.)

All eastern countries point to some mountain within their bounds or vicinity connected by tradition with the deluge. On the road to Peshawur and Cabul there is the Sufued-Koh, or White Mountain, on one side, and the hill of Noorghill, or Koorner, on the other, believed by the Afghans to be the mountains of the ark. There is also Adam's Peak in the island of Ceylon; but the most prevalent tradition fixes on the mountains which separate the southern part of Armenia from Mesopotamia, and inclose the land of the Kurds, whence Kardu, or Carduchæan range—otherwise Gordian, Corcyræan, or Cordyæan. Berosus and Abydenus give very full descriptions of the deluge, perfectly consonant with the Mosaic account. They name Armenia as the resting-place of the ark, mention the report—a report accredited by Chrysostom and other writers—that the remains were still existing when they wrote, and that the natives made bracelets and amulets of its wood. Nicolaus Damascenus calls the mountain on which the ark was carried Baris (ship); Epiphanius styles it Lubar, and the Zendavesta Albordi (Cory's Ancient Fragments, p. 29, 33, 34, 49). The Chaldean or Targum version of the Bible called that of Onkelos, reads Mount Kardu for Ararat, and another Targum version, called that of Jonathan, reads, by mis-spelling, Kadrum Mountains (Ainsworth's Travels in Asia Minor, &c.) Kardyou, in the Chaldee, is said by Buxtorf to be synonymous with Armenian. Erpenius' Arabic version of the Pentateuch, and the Book of Adam of the Sabæans, read Jebel el Karud—the mountain of the Kurds. The Koran says, "the ark rested on El Judi," a mountain east of Jezirah ibn Omar (Bezabde), in the country of Mosul, on the Tigris; at the base of the mountain is a village called Karya Themaneen, the village of the eighty—the number saved from the deluge according to the Mahometan belief. In the neighbourhood of El Judi was the Nestorian "Monastery of the Ark," destroyed by lightning A.D. 776. Ararat is called by the Turks Aghur Dagh, the great mountain; by the modern Armenians, Macis; by the Persians, Asis, the happy or fortunate mountain, and Koh-i-Nuh, Noah's mountain. The city of Nakhchevan to the east of it, and about 100 miles from Erivan, is, according to tradition, and as its name also imports, the first place of descent, or permanent resting-place after the flood.

The only passages in the original text in which Ararat occurs, are Ge. viii. 4; 2 Ki. xix. 37; Is. xxxvii. 38; Je. li. 27, and in the apocryphal book of Tobit. In the Vulgate the word in 2 Ki. and in Isaiah is rendered Armenia. In no place in the Bible is it given as the name of a mountain:—"The ark rested . . . upon the mountains of Ararat," Ge. viii. 4; the sons of Sennacherib "escaped into the land of Ararat" (rendered Armenia), 2 Ki. xix. 37; Is. xxxvii. 38; "the kingdoms of Ararat Minni (the Minegas of Nicolaus Damascenus) and Ashchenaz," Je. li. 27; Is. xlii. 2-4; and "mountains of Ararath," Tobit. i. Armenian writers mention that Ararat was an ancient province of their country, supposed to be the same as Kars Bayazeed, and part of Kurdistan; and Moses Chorenensis contains a tradition that the name of Ararat is derived from Arai, a contemporary of Semiramis, who was killed in battle with the Babylonians, whence the province was called Arai-Arat—the ruin of Arai. Thus, both from holy writ and local tradition, the land of Ararat may be satisfactorily identified with Armenia, although the precise resting place of the ark cannot be defined with an equal approach to certainty.

ARAU'NAH [written also AARNAB, 2Sa. xxiv. 16, 18, 20, and in 1 Chronicles, ch. xxi. 15, ORNAN], the proper name of a Jebusite, at whose thrashing-floor the plague, in David's time, was stayed. The ground was afterwards bought as a site for the temple, 2Ch. iii. 1; and from the frank and liberal manner in which Araunah acted on the occasion, the natural inference is, that, though a Jebusite by birth, he had already become an Israelite by embracing the faith of his conquerors.

ARCHIPPUS, a person mentioned in Col. iv. 17, as one to whom a solemn charge was to be addressed respecting the fulfilment of his ministerial duties: "And say to Archippus, Take heed to the ministry which thou has received from the Lord, that thou fulfil it." What precisely was the office he held, and whether the sphere of its operations lay in Colosse or in Læodicea (which is mentioned in the verse immediately preceding) is not quite clear; and the records of New Testament scripture supply no collateral information on the subject. From the earnestness of the charge, and the admonitory form given to it, there is some apparent ground for inferring that a lack of fidelity had begun to discover itself in Archippus.

ARCTURUS, the constellation called by the Latins Ursa Major, the Great Bear, usually designated in this country the Wain, and in Job ix. 9; xxxviii. 32, adopted by our translators as the proper equivalent of the Heb. וְיָ or וְיָ, ash or aiash. The best lexicographers of the present day concur in this view. (See Gesen. Theo. at the words.)

AREOPAGUS [Mars-hill], or the court which was held on that part of Athens. See ATHENS.

ARETAS, the only person mentioned under this name in Scripture is one who is also styled king, and is represented as being in possession of the city of Damascus, 2Co. xi. 32. The allusion to him comes in quite incidentally, while St. Paul is relating the struggles and dangers through which he had passed in the course of his apostleship; and we are not told either on what account the title of king was applied to Aretas, or how he should have held at the time referred to the government of Damascus. It appears, however, that Aretas was quite a common name among Arabian princes; one is mentioned in 2 Mac. v. 8, a contemporary of Antiochus Epiphanes; another is discoursed of at some length by Josephus, Ant. xiii. 13, &c., who flourished from seventy to eighty years before the Christian era. The Aretas referred to by the apostle was beyond doubt the king of the Nabathean Arabs, whose daughter had been married to Herod Antipas. Certain misunderstandings arose between him and his son-in-law about their respective territories, and these were greatly aggravated by the wicked conduct of Herod, in divorcing the daughter of Aretas, and assuming his brother Philip's wife, Herodias. A war in consequence broke out between the two parties, in the course of which the army of Herod sustained a total defeat. He then sought the intervention and aid of Tiberius Cæsar, who ordered Vitellius, at that time president of Syria, to take Aretas dead or alive. Vitellius was on his way to execute this order when he heard of the death of Tiberius (which took place in March, A.D. 37), and he abandoned the expedition. These warlike operations occurred much about the time when it is probable St. Paul made his visit to Damascus; and it is quite possible—though we have no historical notices to furnish us with certain information on the subject—that in the course of them Aretas had pushed his advantage against Herod so far as to gain possession for a time of Damascus, and appoint over it his ethnarch or local governor. Wieseler, in his Chronology of the Apostolic Age, adopts rather the supposition, that Caligula, who, in so many things, reversed the policy of his predecessor Tiberius, may have conferred on Aretas the sovereignty of Damascus. Various circumstances tend to render this idea quite probable, especially as it is known he so far went counter to the plans of the preceding emperor, as to banish Herod Antipas, and raise to honour his rival and nephew, Herod Agrippa. Mr. Howson also seems inclined to fall in with this latter view (vol. i. p. 83). Either of the two suppositions might be sufficient adequately to account for the connection of Aretas with Damascus at the time of the apostle's sojourn in it; but his allusion to the historical circumstance is at once so entirely incidental, and so closely entwined with his own personal knowledge and experience, that it may justly be held independent of support from any extraneous sources. It may be added, that by comparing the two accounts of what befell the apostle on the occasion, Ac. ix. 23-25; 2 Co. xi. 32, 33, the veritableness of both is confirmed. The historian gives it in the most general manner: the Jews sought to kill Paul, watched the city day and night in order to accomplish their purpose, and to avoid their vigilance he was let down from the city wall by night in a basket. The apostle himself, who naturally was somewhat more specific, mentions the additional circumstances that the ethnarch of the city had been got interested against him, so as even to station guards to apprehend him; and that not by night only, but through a window (namely, in a house on the wall of the city) he was let down in a basket, and escaped.

ARGOB [heap of stones, stony], a region on the east of Jordan, belonging to the territory of Og, king of Bashan, and said to contain sixty cities, De. iii. 4, 13. It fell to the tribe of Manasseh, and was taken possession of by Jair, and the towns in it came to be known as HAVOTH-JAIR, which see; also BASHAN.

ARIEL, [lion of God, that is, very mighty hero]. In 2 Sa. xxiii. 20 it is said of Benaiah that he slew "two lion-like men (two ariels) of Moab." But in Is. xxix. 1, 2 it is applied to a city—the city where David dwelt, by which we must doubtless understand Jerusalem. Why it should have been so called is a matter of some doubt, and different reasons have been assigned by commentators. But the probability is that it is used as an epithet, to denote the strong and victorious might, which, under God, belonged to that city as the chosen residence of David—a might, however, which was now departing from it on account of the sins of David's successors, and hence the prophet goes on to represent it as beleaguered and distressed. The same term is also, in Eze. xliii. 15, 16, applied to something about the altar, most probably the hearth or fireplace; but on what account is not known.

ARIMATHEA, the city of that Joseph who had the courage to ask, and the honour to receive for burial, the body of our Lord. But, like himself, the place where he dwelt is wrapped in obscurity. It never occurs again in the evangelical history; and it is no further described, when it does occur, than as a city of the Jews, Lu. xxiii. 51. The Sept. form of Ramathaim, 1 Sa. i. 1, is Armathaim, which has been supposed to be the original of Arimathea; and both alike have been identified with Ramleh, a village about 8 miles south-east of Joppa; with Ramah, and various other places. The matter is still under dispute, and apparently nothing certain can be fixed.—(See Stanley's Sinai and Palestine, p. 224.)

ARISTARCHUS, a Macedonian, one of Paul's companions in travel and spiritual labour, Ac. xix. 29; xx. 4, &c., and at last, it would seem, his companion in tribulation; for in Col. iv. 10 he designates him his fellow-prisoner. We have, however, no account of his apprehension, or of any charge laid against him; and it is possible, as Meyer suggests, that he may have voluntarily shared with the apostle in his imprisonment. The same term is applied in Philemon, ver. 23, to Epaphras; whence, it has been supposed, that the two faithful and attached friends may have alternately participated in the apostle's bonds. If so, we have in such fellowship one of the finest exemplifications of the depth and tenderness of Christian sympathy. But the supposition cannot be regarded as by any means certain.

ARISTOBULUS, not personally, but his household forms the subject of a salutation in Ro. xvi. 10. It is possible that he may have been dead, or may have remained an unbeliever, while his family embraced the Christian faith. Nothing is known of him individually.

ARK, the rendering of תֵּבָה, tebah, is the scriptural designation of two vessels, very different in size, and also in structure—the mighty bark of Noah, and the little coffer of bulrushes, in which the infant Moses floated upon the waters of the Nile. The etymology of the original is unknown; and it can, therefore, be only matter of conjecture why the same term should have had such different applications. But for the only one of the two that is of any moment here—the ARK OF NOAH—see DELUGE.

ARK OF THE COVENANT. The Hebrew term for ark in this sense is אֲרוֹן, aron, which signifies a wooden chest of any sort, corresponding to the Latin arca, and our ark, or chest. As connected with the sanctuary of God it receives its nearer determination from the epithets attached to it, and the place it was appointed to occupy. It is called "the ark of the testimony," Ex. xxv. 22; also the "ark of the covenant," Nu. x. 33; De. xxxi. 26, &c., and more generally "the ark of God," 1 Sa. iii. 3; iv. 11, &c. The specific purpose for which it was made, was to preserve, as a sacred deposit, the two tables of the covenant—the law of the ten commandments. And as these commandments were emphatically the terms of God's covenant with Israel at Sinai, and the tables on which they were written the tables of the covenant, Ex. xxxiv. 28; De. iv. 13; ix. 9, 11, so the ark into which they were put, was fitly designated "the ark of the covenant." These same commandments were also, in a peculiar sense, God's testimony—his testimony in respect to his own holiness and the people's sin—and as containing such an awful testimony, the sacred chest was with equal propriety designated "the ark of the testimony." The materials of which it was made were shittim, or rather acacia wood—the timber used in the fabrication of all the furniture of the tabernacle; but the boards formed of this wood for the ark were overlaid with gold, both within and without, Ex. xxv. 11. It was of an oblong form, $2\frac{1}{2}$ cubits long by $1\frac{1}{2}$ broad, that is about $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet by about $2\frac{1}{2}$, surmounted by a crown, or raised and ornamented border, around the top. The dimensions, therefore, were comparatively small; and it is necessary to suppose that the two tables of the covenant should have been placed edge-wise within this chest; otherwise it could not have been large enough to admit them. Over these tables was placed the lid of the ark, called the caporeth, or mercy-seat. And at either end, looking toward each other, were two composite figures, called cherubim (for which see under CHERUBIM). It is a question, whether the tables of the law alone occupied the interior of the ark, or whether it contained besides the rod of Aaron and the golden pot of manna. In He. ix. 4 the two latter are coupled with the tables of the covenant, as alike related to the ark, "wherein was the golden pot that had manna, and Aaron's rod that budded, and the tables of the covenant." But at 1 Ki. viii. 9, it is stated, that when the ark was brought into the temple of Solomon there was "nothing in it save the two tables of stone, which Moses put there at Horeb." And the language used respecting the other two articles in the original passages does not seem to indicate an actual deposition in the ark. The pot of manna was "laid up before the testimony to be kept," Ex. xvi. 34. In like manner, Aaron's rod that had budded was "brought before the testimony to be kept for a token against the rebels," Nu. xvi. 10. The expression, "before the testimony," in both cases points to a position in the most holy place, and in the immediate presence or neighbourhood of the ark, rather than within its boards—precisely as the vail, also, which separated the holy from the most holy place, is described as being "before the testimony," Ex. xxvii. 21. The Jewish tradition, however, has been, that the little pot of manna and Aaron's rod were also put within the ark; which, as a matter of fact, one can readily enough suppose they might be, were it only for the sake of better preservation. In that case, the passage in 1 Ki. should merely be regarded as indicating what were the contents of the ark, according to the ultimate arrangements adopted for the temple—yet without implying that in this, as in some other points, they may actually have slightly differed in the tabernacle. So Delitzsch at He. ix. 4. Either this view must be taken, or it must be supposed that, in the epistle to the Hebrews, the pot of manna and Aaron's rod are associated with "the ark in the looser sense—not as being actually in it, like the tables of the covenant, but forming, along with them and it, a kind of sacred whole."

There can be no doubt, however, that the proper contents of the ark were the two tables of the covenant, and that to be the repository of these was the special purpose for which it was made. Simply as containing these, it formed the most hallowed portion of the furniture in the tabernacle—was the peculiar shrine of God-

head—so that with it the presence of Jehovah was more especially associated, and an irreverence done to it was regarded as done to the Majesty of heaven. Hence the awful solemnity with which it was to be approached, and the severity that sometimes avenged any improper familiarity with which it might be treated, Nu. iv. 20; 1 Sa. vi. 19; 2 Sa. vi. 6. Rightly considered, this was fitted to give a sublime view of the character of the Old Testament religion, and placed it at an immeasurable distance from the idolatrous religions of heathendom. These, too, had their sacred shrines, and shrines that occasionally took a form not very dissimilar to the ark of the covenant; but in reality how different! "The innermost sanctuary of their temples," says Clement of Alexandria, respecting the Egyptians, "is overhung with gilded tapestry; but let the priest remove the covering, and there appears a cat, or a crocodile, or a domesticated serpent wrapped in purple." In other places, they only so far differed, that, instead of these inferior creatures revered as symbols of Deity, there was usually a statue of some sort representing the person of the object worshipped, and supposed to be peculiarly identified with his presence and power. In Egypt itself some of the sacred shrines, or arks, we are told by Wilkinson, contained the emblems of life and stability, and others presented the sacred beetle of the sun, overshadowed by the wings of two figures of the goddess Thmei, or Truth (Ancient Egyptians, v. 275). Here however, in the centre of the Old Testament religion, the mind was carried far above all such inadequate symbols and imperfect representations of Deity, which were greatly more fitted to mislead and degrade its views regarding the true object of worship, than to give them a proper character and direction. The aspect in which God was here presented to men's spiritual contemplation and religious homage was that of the moral lawgiver—revealing himself as the Holy One and the Just, himself perfectly good, and demanding a corresponding goodness from his covenant-people; so that continually as they drew near to the place of his sanctuary, the worshippers were called to think of Him as the consummation of all excellence, and to aim at a resemblance of the same as the design of all the privileges they enjoyed, and the services they engaged in. Nothing could show more clearly than such a deposit in the ark of God, the essential difference between the Mosaic institution and the rites of heathenism, and how, with all that it possessed of the symbolical and the ritual, there still lay at its foundation, and breathed throughout its services, an intensely moral and spiritual element. For it was this that gave the tone to everything prescribed in the ceremonial of worship, and that should have characterized with its spirit of holiness every act of homage and obedience performed in compliance with its enactments.

If this, however, had been all that belonged to the ark, and characterized the religion which was connected with it, a most important and necessary element had been wanting, which is required to adapt the worship of God to the circumstances of sinful men. It must have tended to overawe their hearts and keep them at a distance from God, rather than to draw them near to him; for the tables of testimony continually witnessed against their guilt, and proclaimed their liability to condemnation. Hence, the ark was furnished with a plate of gold upon the top, which, from the name given to it, and the purposes to which it was applied, served to present an entirely different aspect of the character of God from that mainly exhibited in the tables of the covenant. This plate was called the caporeth or covering, not simply, however, in the sense of a mere top or lid to the ark and its contents, but rather on account of its concealing and putting out of view what these disclosed of evil. It was the λασθηριον or propitiatory (as the Septuagint renders it)—the mercy-seat, in connection with which the pardon of guilt was to be obtained. It was therefore an atonement-covering, and was the appointed place on which the blood of reconciliation was annually sprinkled on the great day of atonement, to blot out all the transgressions which the law of the testimony underneath was ever charging against the people. On account of this important relation of the caporeth to the sins of the people, on the one hand, and the forgiveness of God upon the other, it is never represented merely as the lid of the ark, but has a separate place assigned it in the descriptions given of the sacred furniture, Ex. xv. 17; xxvi. 34, &c., and sometimes even appears as the most peculiar and prominent thing in the most holy place, Le. xvi. 2. In 1 Ch. xxviii. 11, this place is even denominated from it "the house of the propitiatory," or atonement-house. Thus, while the ark, as the depository of the two tables of the law, kept up before Israel a perpetual testimony to the holiness of God's character—nay, exhibited this as the very ground of all the revelations he made to Israel, and of the service he required at their hands—by means of the propitiatory, which formed its covering above, it not less prominently displayed the pardoning mercy of God, which, in accordance with the prior covenant, the covenant of promise, he was ever ready to impart to those who were conscious of sin, and sought to him with true penitence of heart. (See FEASTS, DAY OF ATONEMENT.)

The history of this ark is in perfect accordance with its intensely moral character. Its usual and stated residence was in the holy of holies of the tabernacle; but, to a certain extent, it had a separate place and history. As the more peculiar symbol of the Lord's presence, it was borne by the priests, in advance of the whole host, Nu. x. 33; De. i. 33; on which account also the word is used in Ps. cxxxii. 8, "Arise, O Lord, into thy rest, thou, and the ark of thy strength." In the passage through the Jordan, it was at the presence of the ark that the waters began to be cut off from above, and only when it was withdrawn from the channel of the river that the waters returned to their wonted course, Jos. iii. 11-17. But at a future time, when Israel had corrupted their ways before God, and treated with contempt the holiness embodied in the ark as a revelation of his character, it was found to carry no charm with it when brought upon the field of battle; the great end of its appointment was frustrated by the wickedness of men, and the Lord, to revenge the quarrel of his injured holiness, "delivered his strength into captivity, and his glory into the enemy's hands," Pt. lxxviii. 61; 1 Sa. iv. 11. The ark thus taken by the Philistines, though it did not continue long in their possession, still remained for years in a state of separation from the tabernacle; it was only restored to its proper place in the tabernacle, after, through the strenuous efforts of David, the interests of godliness had been again revived, 2 Sa. vi. It was afterwards transferred, along with the other sacred furniture, to the temple erected by Solomon, where it appears to have remained (for the passage in 2 Ch. xxxv. 3, in which Josiah commands the priests to put it in its place, and not to bear it on the shoulders, can only be understood of some custom that had crept in contrary to the law, or, it may be, some temporary removal for repairs) till the period of the Babylonish exile. But then again the aggravated and inveterate sins of the people drew down the divine vengeance, and the ark, instead of proving a bulwark of strength and safety, itself perished in the general conflagration. The tradition of its having been removed by Jeremiah before the conquest of Jerusalem, and deposited in a cave on Mount Pisgah, 2 Mac. ii. 4, is undoubtedly fabulous. As the temple itself was burned with fire, so we may certainly conclude was the furniture contained in it. And though we have the best grounds for believing, that in the construction of the second temple most of the articles belonging to it were made as near as possible after the pattern of those in the first, yet there is some ground for thinking that the peculiar sacredness of the ark and its contents stood in the way of its re-construction. For Josephus expressly testifies, that the most holy place of the second temple was empty (Wars, v. 5, 5), and Jewish writers generally represent the absence of the ark from the second temple as one of the great signs of its inferiority to the first. They state, that in place of the ark there was an altar-stone slightly elevated above the floor, on which the high-priest sprinkled the blood on the day of atonement. This cannot, however, be regarded as certain; and there are writers, among others Prideaux (Connection, sub anno 564), who maintain that there was an imitation also of the ark in the second temple, since it was required for the stated service of the law. The testimony of Josephus seems too explicit to admit of that supposition; but if not the ark, certainly some sort of substitute for it must be supposed to have been in the most holy place, otherwise it could not have been possible for the later Jews to keep the great day of atonement, which yet, we know, they were wont to do.

The relation of the ark of God to articles, sometimes designated by a like name among the heathen, can in no respect be regarded as close; it has more and greater points of diversity with them than of similitude. The shrines of Egypt, says Sir G. Wilkinson, "were of two kinds; the one a sort of canopy, the other an ark or sacred boat, which may be termed the great shrine. This was carried with great pomp by the priests, a certain number being selected for that duty, who, supporting it on their shoulders by means of long staves, passing through metal rings at the side of the sledge on which it stood, brought it into the temple, where it was placed on a stand or table, in order that the prescribed ceremonies might be performed before it" (vol. v. ch. xv.) Even in external form there is but a slender resemblance between such shrines and the ark of the covenant. The following cut from Wilkinson is perhaps the one that comes nearest to it. The two figures without (a and b) are taken to be representations, one of the king, the other of the sphinx, and the two winged figures within are forms of the goddess Thmei or Truth—resembling cherubim, says Wilkinson, but the resemblance is certainly a very faint one, even externally, and in its design and object entirely different. The boat-like form of the structure also, which is common to it with other Egyptian shrines, has no parallel in the ark; and the practice of carrying forth the shrines as preparatory to their being placed in a conspicuous position, where they might receive the marks of homage and veneration paid to them, is entirely the reverse of what was prescribed respecting the ark of the covenant. It was set in the secret place of the Most High; and was not allowed to be carried thence except for purposes of travel, and even then only when it had been wrapped up in coverings that concealed it from the eyes of the people. As regards its sacred deposit—the tables of the law—and the relation in which these and it together stood to the whole Mosaic worship, there is not only, as stated before, nothing similar in the religions of ancient heathendom, but much that is strictly antagonistic. We are therefore of opinion, that a great deal more has often been made of supposed resemblances between the ark, and certain things in the temples of Egypt and elsewhere, than the actual circumstances of the case can fairly warrant.

ARKITES, a tribe of Canaanites, mentioned in Ge. x. 17; 1 Ch. i. 15, among the other races that peopled Phœnicia and Palestine. Their chief city, with which at once their name and their territory were associated, is generally agreed to have been the Akra or Acra which lay near the base of Lebanon, on the north-west side, between Tripolis and Antaradus (Pliny, v. 16; Josephus, Ant. i. 6, 2). It was distant thirty-two Roman miles from the latter place, and latterly received the name of Cæsarea Libani. Its ruins were seen by Shaw and Burckhardt.

ARM, the more common instrument of human strength and agency, is very often employed in Scripture as a symbol of power. The arm of God is thus used as but another expression for the might of God, Ps. lxxxix. 13; Is. llii. 1, &c.; and to break the arm of any one is all one with destroying his power, Eze. xxx. 21. Such expressions as "making bare the arm," or "redeeming with a stretched-out arm," refer to the action of warriors, or other persons employed in vigorous and energetic working, who must have full and free scope for their arm, in order to accomplish the purpose on which they are intent; when spoken of God, it is, in plain terms, to give a striking, triumphant display of the divine power and glory.

ARMAGED'DON [mountain of Megiddo], occurs only once as a compound proper name in Scripture, and that in the figurative language of prophecy, Re. xvi. 16. Historically, however, Megiddo (whether as a hill, or a town built in its neighbourhood) is connected with a memorable and mournful event—the overthrow and death of Josiah by the host of Pharaoh, 2 Kl. xxiii. 29, 30. Not only did this event cause great distress and lamentation at the time, as is particularly mentioned in 2 Ch. xxxv. 25, and awakened in men's minds sad forebodings respecting the future, but in Zec. xii. 11, it is incidentally referred to as one of the greatest instances of general and heartfelt grief on record: "There shall be a great mourning in Jerusalem, as the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon." In the Apocalypse the reference is not to the mourning connected with the event that took place at Megiddo, but to the event itself—namely, the discomfiture of the professing church or people of God, as represented by Josiah and his army, by the profane worldly power. On this account it served to the eye of the apocalypticist as a fit type of a similar, but much grander event in the far-distant future, in which the ungodly world should rise up with such concentrated force as to gain the ascendancy over a degenerate and corrupt, though still professing church. This spiritual crisis is appropriately called the battle of Armageddon, since in it the old catastrophe at Megiddo should, in a manner, be enacted over again; and the mention of it is, therefore, fitly introduced by the significant warning, "Behold, I come as a thief: blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame." (See Fairbairn on Prophecy in its Distinctive Nature, &c., p. 424.)

ARMS, ARMOUR. The weapons, defensive and offensive, in use amongst the nations of antiquity mentioned in Scripture, are, on the whole, essentially the same in all; the general species undergoing modifications according to age and country. It is only in a few instances that national usages, entirely peculiar, are found to prevail. In the following remarks, we shall endeavour to give a description of ancient armour, under its principal heads; noticing, as we advance, the subordinate peculiarities which distinguished one nation from another, or the same nation in different periods of its history.

By way of introduction, we present our readers with a figure of a Greek heavy-armed warrior, attired for battle, whose equipment may be taken as a standard with which to compare ancient armour in general (No. 52). It will be perceived that it consists of six distinct portions:—first, the spear (ἔγχος, ὄρου, hasta, Heb. עֵצֵי מִלְחָמָה or עֵצֵי מִלְחָמָה), or, sometimes, two spears, in the right hand; secondly, the helmet (κόρυς, κυρέη, galea, כִּנְיָע); thirdly, the shield (ἀσπίς, clipeus—thureos, scutum, i. e. the Roman shield (Ep. vi. 16), כִּנְיָע, כִּנְיָע), supported on the left arm; fourthly, the sword (ξίφος, gladius, יָדִיעַ), suspended on the left side by a belt, which passed over the right shoulder; fifthly, the cuirass (θώραξ, lorica, יָדִיעַ), covering the body, with its zone or girdle, (ζώνη, cingulum, יָדִיעַ); and sixthly, the greaves (κνημίδες, ocreae, יָדִיעַ), which protected the legs. Sandals in this figure are wanting. The portions of armour were put on in an order the reverse of that here mentioned. By the shield and cuirass these warriors were distinguished from the light-armed troops, who were protected merely by a garment of cloth or leather, and who fought with darts, stones, bows, and slings; and from the pelastai (πελῆσται), a description of soldiers found in the later Greek armies, and who, instead of the large round shield, carried a small one (called πέλαγη), and in other respects were more lightly equipped than the heavy-armed soldiers (ὀπλιῖται).

In No. 53, copied from the arch of Septimus Severus at Rome, a Roman soldier of that age is represented.

[53.] Roman Soldier.—Bartoli's Arch of Severus.

The several parts of the armour will be seen to correspond with those of the Greek hoplite, except that, in place of a sword, the Roman bears a dagger (μάχαιρα, pugio) on his right side; and instead of greaves wears breeches, and sandals (caligæ). By St Paul, in a well-known passage, Ep. vi. 14-17, all the parts of the Roman armour, except the spear, are mentioned.

With respect to the eastern nations;—the Egyptians were armed, offensively, with the bow, spear, two species of javelin, sling, a short and straight sword, dagger, knife, falchion, pole-axe, battle-axe, mace or club, and lissan, a curved stick, still in use among the modern Ethiopians: and defensively, with a helmet of metal, or a quilted head-piece; a cuirass, made of metal plates, or quilted with metal bands; and an ample shield. But they had no greaves, nor any covering for the arms, save a short sleeve, which was a part of the cuirass, and extended about half-way to the elbow (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, i. p. 298). The arms of the early Assyrians were the spear, the bow, the sword, the dagger, and the battle-axe. The sling is not found in the most ancient monuments as an Assyrian weapon; it was perhaps introduced at a later period. The Assyrian warrior was protected by a helmet and shield; and, according to the nature of the service he had to perform, sometimes with a coat of scale armour, reaching down to the knees or ankles, and sometimes with an embroidered tunic, probably of felt or leather. They wore sandals; and the spearmen and slingers had greaves, which appear to have been laced in front.—(Layard, Nineveh and its Remains, ii. c. 4). In the army of Xerxes, the Assyrians wore helmets of brass, and carried shields, spears, daggers, and wooden clubs knotted with iron (Herod. 7, 63): the Persians, with the exception of the club, were similarly equipped (Ibid. c. 61). Of the Babylonians, too, these were no doubt the ordinary weapons. Nos. 54 and 55 represent an Assyrian spearman and Egyptian heavy-armed soldier attired for battle.

We now proceed to a more minute description of the several portions of armour, as they are given above; adopting the ordinary division into defensive and offensive.

DEFENSIVE ARMOUR. 1. The Shield.—The ancient warrior's chief defence was his shield, the form and material of which were various. The Egyptian shield was about half the soldier's height, and generally double its own breadth. It was probably formed of wicker-work, or a wooden frame, and was covered with bull's hide, having the hair outwards, with one or more rims of metal, and metal studs. In form it resembled an ordinary funereal tablet, being circular at the summit, and square at the base; and near the upper part of the outer surface was a circular cavity in lieu of a boss, the sides of which were deeper than its centre, where it rose nearly to the level of the shield (No. 56, fig. 1). For what purpose this was intended is uncertain. To the inside of the shield was attached a thong, by which they suspended it upon their shoulders; and a handle, with which it was grasped (No. 56, figs. 2, 3). Some of the lighter bucklers were furnished with a wooden bar (No. 56, fig. 4) placed across the upper part, which was held with the hand. Sometimes the Egyptian shield was of extraordinary size, and pointed at the summit; but instances of this kind are rare (Wilkinson, i. c. 3).

[57.] Egyptian large Shield. Wilkinson.

The shields of the Assyrians, in the more ancient bas-reliefs, are either circular or oblong; sometimes of gold and silver, but more frequently of wicker-work, covered with hides; they were held by a handle fixed to the centre. The round shield is often highly ornamented. The shield used in a siege covered the whole person of the warrior, and was furnished at the top with a curved point, or a square projection, like a roof, at right angles to the body of the shield; which may have served to defend the heads of the combatants against missiles from the walls of a castle.—(Layard, Nineveh, ii. c. 4).

The Hebrews had four designations for the shield;—צִנָּה, tzinnah, מָגֵן, magén, שֵׁלֶט, shelet, סוֹהֵרָה, sohèrah. The tzinnah was a large shield, covering the whole body, the magén a smaller one; the former probably used by the heavy-armed, the latter by the light-armed troops (1 Ki. x. 16, 17; Ezek. xxxix. 9). The shelet seems to have differed but little from the magén. (It occurs only in the plural number, 2 Sa. viii. 7; 2 Ki. xi. 10). The word sohèrah is found only in Ps. xci. 4. The larger shields were usually of wood, covered with hides; it was common to smear them with oil, that they might glitter in the distance, and resist moisture, 1a. xxi. 5. Brazen shields appear to have been the exception; the whole of the giant's armour, 1 Sa. xvii. 5, 6, was of this metal. Shields overlaid with gold were the ornament of princes, [60.] Greek Shield (Clipeus).—Hope.

1 Ki. x. 16, or their immediate attendants, 2 Sa. viii. 7; and were sometimes employed to decorate the walls of palaces, 1 Ki. xiv. 26. The shields of David were suspended, as a memorial, in the temple. During a march the soldier carried the shield on his shoulder, covered with a piece of leather, as a protection against the dust, Jer. xxi 6; and, in the conflict, on his left arm. (See Winer, Real-Wörterbuch, s. 5.)

The large shield (dorís, clipeus) of the Greeks and Romans, was originally of a circular form; and in the Homeric times, was large enough to cover the whole body. It was made, sometimes of osiers twisted together, sometimes of wood; covered with ox-hides, several folds thick. On the centre was a projection, called ὀμφάλος, umbo, or boss, which sometimes terminated in a spike.

After the Roman soldier received pay, the clipeus was discontinued for the scutum, θυρεός; of oval or oblong form, and adapted to the shape of the body.

Significant devices on shields are of great antiquity. Each Roman soldier had his name inscribed on his shield. St. Paul, Ep. vi. 16, uses the word θυρεός rather than dorís, because he is describing the armour of a Roman soldier.

2. The Helmet.—The Assyrian helmet assumed different shapes in different ages; but the earliest, and properly Assyrian form, was a cap of iron, terminating above in a point, and sometimes furnished with flaps, covered with metal scales, protecting the ears, the back of the head, and falling over the shoulders (No. 62, fig. 1). Sometimes plain circular caps, fitting closely to the head, were worn (No. 62, fig. 2). At a later period, this primitive form was varied with a curved crest or plume, which exhibits considerable variety and even elegance (No. 62, fig. 3).

The helmet of the Egyptians was usually of linen cloth quilted, which served as an effectual protection to the head, without the inconvenience of metal in a hot climate. Some helmets descended to the shoulder, others only a short distance below the ear; and the summit, terminating in an obtuse point, was ornamented with two tassels, of a green, red, or black colour. No Egyptian helmet occurs with a crest.

Whether the Hebrews wore helmets of this kind is uncertain. They seem to have been commonly of brass, 1 Sa. xvii. 38; but of what particular form we have no account.

The form of the Greek and Roman helmets (περικεφαλαία, Ep. vi. 17) is so well known as not to require further notice.

3. The Cuirass or Breast-plate.—The skins of beasts were probably the earliest material used to protect the body. These were soon abandoned for the coat of mail, of which there were various kinds. The Egyptian cuirass consisted of about eleven horizontal rows of metal plates, well secured by brass pins; and at the hollow of the throat a narrower range of plates was introduced, above which were two more, completing the collar, or covering the neck. The breadth of each plate or scale was little more than an inch, twelve of them sufficing to cover the front of the body; and the sleeves, which were sometimes so short as to extend less than half-way to the elbow, consisted of two rows of similar plates. Most of these cuirasses were without collars. In length the cuirasses may have been little less than two feet and a half; it sometimes covered the thigh nearly to the knee; and in order to prevent its pressing too heavily on the shoulder, it was bound with a girdle round the waist. The thigh, and that part of the body below the girdle, were usually protected with a kind of kilt, detached from the cuirass. Such was the covering of the heavy-armed troops. But with the light-armed infantry, and, indeed, among the Asiatic nations in general, the quilted linen cuirass was in much request (Herod. 2. 182); and the epithet λευκώρηξ, which occurs more than once in Homer, indicates the use of it among the early Greeks. In the tombs of the kings near Thebes, a coat of mail, of the description first mentioned, is represented; it is composed of small pieces of metal disposed in rows, alternately red, yellow, and green; each piece being in shape a parallelogram, with the lower edge circular, and working, by means of a slit and button, into the place beneath it (No. 65, fig. 1); and in the tomb of Rameses III., there is painted a piece of defensive armour, which seems to have been a sort of coat, and, were it not so highly ornamented, might be considered a vest, to be worn beneath the cuirass. It is made of a rich stuff, worked or painted, with the figures of lions and other animals, such as are common upon the Greek shield, and is edged with a neat border (No. 65, fig. 2). It may have been intended as a substitute for the heavy coat of mail.—(Wilkinson, Ancient Egypt. i. c. 3). Occasionally, corslets were worn, reaching only from the waist to the upper part of the breast, and supported by straps over the shoulder, which, from the sculptured representations of them, appear to have been faced with metal plates.

On the bas-reliefs of Nineveh, the warriors who fought in chariots, and held the shield for the defence of the king, are generally seen in coats of scale armour, which descend to the knees or the ankles. In excavating the earliest palace of Nimroud, Mr. Layard discovered a quantity of the scales used for this armour. Each scale was separate, and was of iron, from two to three inches in length, rounded at one end, and squared at the other, with a raised or embossed line in the centre; and some were inlaid with copper. They were probably fastened on a tunic of felt or linen. This is the armour always represented on the more ancient sculptures. At a later period other kinds were used; the scales were larger, and appear to have been fastened to bands of iron or copper. The armour was frequently embossed with groups of figures and fanciful ornaments. Not unfrequently the warriors are dressed in an embroidered tunic, probably of felt or leather, and sufficiently thick to resist the weapons then in use. Their arms were bare from above the elbow, and their legs from the knees downwards, except when they wore the long coats of mail reaching to the ankles (Layard, Nineveh, ii. c. 4).

The Hebrew קַסָּת , shiryón, or coat of mail, was frequently of brass, fashioned with scales, קַסָּתֵי בְרָזָה , kaskassim, 1 Sa. xvii. 5; or of leather covered with brazen scales. The vulnerable part was where the scales were connected, or where the coat of mail joined on to the other parts of the armour, 1 Ki. xxii. 34. Of linen, or quilted cuirasses, no mention occurs in Scripture.

The Greeks and Romans occasionally used the linen cuirass, but it was soon superseded, first, by cuirasses of horn, composed of small pieces, fastened, like feathers, upon linen shirts, the hoofs of animals being sometimes employed for this purpose; and then by the metallic scale armour. Of this there were two kinds: the $\theta\omega\rho\alpha\zeta$ $\lambda\epsilon\pi\iota\delta\omega\rho\tau\acute{\omicron}\varsigma$, the scales of which resembled those of a fish; and the $\theta\omega\rho\alpha\zeta$ $\phi\omicron\lambda\iota\delta\omega\rho\tau\acute{\omicron}\varsigma$, in which the long and narrow scales of a serpent are imitated.

posed of rings, hooked into each other (loricam consertam hamis), which may have been a species of chain-mail; such as was worn by the Roman hastati.

Besides the flexible cuirass, the Greeks and Romans, especially in early times, wore one composed of two solid plates; one for the breast, and the other for the back, fitted to the shape of the body, and joined by bands over the shoulders. On the right side of the body the plates were united by hinges; and on the left, they were fastened by means of buckles. Bands of metal, terminated by a lion's head, or some other device, often supplied the place of the leathern straps over the shoulders; and here, too, in front, the Roman soldier was accustomed to wear his decorations of honour. A beautiful pair of bronze shoulder-bands, found, A.D. 1820, near the river Siris in Southern Italy, is preserved in the British Museum. Around the lower edge of the cuirass were attached straps, four or five inches long, of leather, or perhaps of felt (ritte), and covered with small plates of metal. These straps were partly for ornament, and partly for a protection to the lower part of the body.

4. Greaves.—The Egyptians, as has been observed, used no greaves; the Assyrians only occasionally so. On the sculptures of Kouyunjik, spearmen and slingers appear with greaves, probably of leather or brass, which were laced in front (Layard, Nineveh, ii. c. 4). Goliath's greaves were of brass, 1 Sa. xvii. 6; and such probably were in use among the Israelites. Among the Greeks and Romans greaves were made of bronze, of brass, of tin, and sometimes of silver or gold, with a lining of leather, felt, or cloth. They were usually secured with straps round the calf and the ankles. They were gradually abandoned by the Roman soldier; and under the emperors were chiefly worn by the gladiators.

5. From the greaves must be distinguished the war-shoe (ἄσπις, Is. ix. 5—see Gesen. Lexicon, sub voce), caliga.

The Roman caliga was a heavy shoe, worn by the common soldiers and the centurions, but not by the superior officers. It was composed of leather, and the sole was thickly studded with large nails (Juv. 16, 24).

OFFENSIVE WEAPONS. 1. The Sword.—The Egyptian sword was short and straight, from two and a half to three feet in length, having apparently a double edge, and tapering to a sharp point. It was used to cut and thrust; but sometimes it was held downwards, and used as a dagger. The handle was plain, hollowed in the centre, and gradually increasing in thickness at either extremity; sometimes inlaid with costly stones, precious woods, or metals. That worn by the king in his girdle was frequently surmounted by one or two heads of a hawk, the symbol of the sun, a title given to the Egyptian monarchs (No. 72, fig. 1).

The sword thus worn was in reality a dagger, which was also a common Egyptian weapon. It was much smaller than the sword; about ten or seven inches in length, tapering gradually to a point. The handle, like that of the sword, was generally inlaid: the blade was of bronze, thicker in the middle than in the edges, and slightly grooved in that part. It was inclosed in a leathern sheath (No. 72. figs. 2, 3).

The falchion, with a single edge, intended only for cutting, was borne by light as well as heavy armed troops: the blade was of iron or bronze, the handle of wood or horn (No. 72. figs. 4, 5).

The Assyrians wore swords and daggers very similar to those of the Egyptians, with handles elaborately ornamented. Generally two, and sometimes three, daggers appear inserted in one sheath, which was then passed through the girdle (Layard, Nineveh, ii. c. 4). The sword of the Hebrews probably resembled that of other eastern nations. It hung on the left side, in a girle,

1 Sa. xvii. 30, and was sometimes two-edged (διστομος, He. iv. 12), Ju. iii. 16. The Greek and Roman sword had a straight, two-edged blade, of nearly equal width from hilt to point. It was worn in a scabbard on the left side, and was thus distinguished from the dagger

(μάχαρα, pugio—Persice, acinaces, Hor. Od. i. 27, 5), which was worn on the right. The LXX. generally render כרעב, cherab, by the word μάχαρα; and this latter is the expression usually employed in the New Testament, Ep. vi. 17. Μάχαρα, or pugio, however, properly signifies a dagger or two-edged knife, such as is worn at this day among the Arnauts, the descendants of the ancient Greeks. Among the later Jews, the Roman sica, or curved dagger—the chosen weapon of assassins—came into use.

2. The Spear, Javelin, &c.—This weapon was common to all the nations of antiquity. The Egyptians used a spear of wood, with a metal head, between five and six feet long. The head was of bronze or iron, usually with a double edge, like that of the Greeks; but the weapon had no spike at the other extremity (σαυπαρῆς) by which to fix it into the ground. (See 1 Sa. xxvi. 7.) The javelin, lighter and shorter than the spear, was also of wood, and similarly armed with a two-edged metal head, generally of an elongated diamond shape; and the upper extremity of the shaft terminated in a bronze knob, surmounted by a ball, to which were attached two thongs or tassels. It was sometimes used as a spear for thrusting; and sometimes it was darted, the knob at the extremity preventing it from escaping from the warrior's grasp. Lighter javelins, of wood, tapering to a sharp point, or with a small bronze point, were also in use (Wilkinson, Ancient Egypt. i. c. 3).

The spear of the Assyrian footman was short, scarcely exceeding the height of a man; that of the horseman appears to have been considerably longer. The iron head of a spear from Nimroud has been deposited in the British Museum. The shaft was probably of some strong wood, and not a reed, like that of the modern Arabs (Layard, Nineveh. ii. c. 4). How the several terms (קֶסֶף, תַּיִתָּה, קֶנֶן, and כִּיּוּן) which, in the Old Testament, are used to denote a spear or javelin, are to be distinguished, is uncertain. These weapons were used more commonly for thrusting than for throwing. They had a wooden shaft, 1 Sa. xvii. 7, and a brazen or iron head, 2 Sa. xxi. 16; and were furnished at the other extremity with an iron spike, capable of being used against an enemy, 2 Sa. ii. 23. The only peculiarity which the Greek and Roman spears, which were of various kinds;—lancea, pilum (peculiar to the Romans), jaculum, &c.—present, is the amentum, a leathern thong attached to the middle of the shaft, and used to assist the warrior in throwing: of this no trace appears in the Egyptian or Assyrian sculptures.

3. The Bow.—This was a principal weapon of the Egyptians, Assyrians, and Hebrews; as it was, in after times, of the Saxons.

[75.] Egyptian Bow.—Wilkinson.

The Egyptian bow was a round piece of wood, from five to five feet and a half in length, either almost straight, and tapering to a point at both ends, or curving inward in the middle when unstrung. The string was fixed upon a projecting piece of horn, or inserted into a groove or notch of the wood at either extremity. In stringing it, the lower point was fixed on the ground, and the knee being pressed against the inner side, the string was passed into the notch. Their mode of drawing it was either with the forefinger and thumb, or the two forefingers; and, like the old English archers, they carried the arrow to the ear, the shaft passing nearly in a line with the eye;—a much more effective mode of using this weapon than that adopted by the Greeks, who drew the string to the body (Hom. Il. 4, 123). Indeed, the bow was more characteristic of Asia than of Europe: the Greeks and Romans never attached much importance to it, though both had in their armies a corps of archers, who were usually Cretans. In the army of Xerxes, on the contrary, nearly all the troops were armed with the bow (Herod. 7, 61–80). The Egyptian bow-string was of hide, catgut, or string; among the early Greeks it was usually of twisted leather (πέπυρα βόεια). The arrows varied from twenty-two to thirty-four inches in length; some were of wood, others of reed; frequently tipped with a metal head, and winged with three feathers, as on our own arrows. Sometimes, instead of the metal head, a piece of hard wood, tapering to a point, was inserted into the reed; and sometimes a piece of flint supplied its place.

Each Bowman was furnished with a capacious quiver, about four inches in diameter, containing a plentiful supply of arrows. Unlike the Greeks, who carried the quiver on their shoulder, the Egyptian archer, when engaged in combat, had it slung, nearly horizontally, beneath his arm: the sculptures, indeed, both Egyptian and Assyrian (Layard, Nineveh, ii. p. 338), also represent the quiver as resting on the back; but this was probably only during a march, or when the arrows were not required. It was closed by a lid or cover, which, like the quiver itself, was highly decorated.

The bow, when not used, was kept in a case, intended to protect it against the sun or damp, and to preserve its elasticity. It was always attached to the war-chariots; and across it lay another large case containing an abundant stock of arrows (Wilkinson, Ancient Egypt, i. c. 3).

On the bas-reliefs of Nineveh, the Assyrian archer is seen equipped in all respects like the Egyptian. The bows are of two kinds: one long and slightly curved, the other short, and almost angular: the two appear to have been carried at the same time by those who fought in chariots. The quivers appear slung over the back; and, like the Egyptian, the archer draws the arrow to the cheek or the ear. When in battle, it was customary for the warrior to hold two arrows in reserve in his right hand: they were placed within the fingers, and did not interfere with the motion of the arm when drawing the bow. A leather or linen guard was fastened by straps to the inside of the left arm, to protect it when the arrow was discharged (Layard, Nin. ii. c. 4).

5, Theban, with case and quiver.

The Hebrew bow was sometimes of metal, 2Sa. xxii. 35; and, when large, was strung by treading it; and what is occasionally rendered to bend the bow, literally means to tread it (קשת קרר, Ps. vii. 12; 1 Ch. v. 18). When not in use, it was kept in a case, Hab. iii. 9. The arrows were probably of reed, and were sometimes poisoned, Job vi. 4. Whether they were ever tipped with combustible materials ("fiery darts," Ep. vi. 16) is uncertain; though some have discovered in Ps. vii. 12 an allusion to this practice. Among the Israelites, the Benjamites, 1 Ch. vii. 40, and of the other nations of Canaan the Philistines, 1 Sa. xxxi. 3, and the Elamites, Is. xlii. 6, were celebrated as archers.

The Scythian and Parthian bows, and generally those of the ancient cavalry, were in the form of a Roman C: those of the Greeks had a double curvature, and were composed of two circular pieces, often made of horn (κέρας, cornu), united in the middle.

4. The Sling (γυνή, σφενδόνη).—This weapon was in common use among the Egyptians, Assyrians, and Hebrews; and afterwards the light-armed troops of the Greek and Roman armies consisted, in great part, of slingers. The sling was made sometimes of leather, and sometimes of a doubled rope, with a broad thong in the middle to receive the stone. It had a loop at one end, by which it was firmly fixed to the hand, the other extremity escaping from the grasp as the stone was thrown. As a supply of missiles, the Egyptians carried a bag of round stones hanging over the shoulder; while, on the sculptures of Nineveh, a heap of pebbles, ready for use, lies at the feet of the slinger.

[82.] Egyptian Slinger.

The illustration, No. 83, represents a Roman soldier in the act of slinging; he has a provision of stones in the fold of his pallium or cloak.

Besides stones, plummets of lead, in shape like an acorn, were thrown from slings, and could be sent to a distance of 600 feet. The Hebrew light-armed troops commonly used slings, 2 Ki. iii. 25; it was the favourite weapon of the Benjamites, who could sling equally well with either hand, Ju. xx. 16. Shepherds used it to drive off beasts, 1 Sa. xvii. 40; and with what precision the stone could be cast, appears from the encounter of David with the giant.

The sling does not appear to have been in use among the early Greeks: at least no mention of it occurs in the Iliad. Afterwards the Acarnanians, and then the Achæans, attained the greatest expertness in managing it; but of all the peoples of antiquity, the natives of the Balearic Isles (Majorca and Minorca) enjoyed the greatest celebrity as slingers. Their skill is said to have arisen from their not having been permitted, when children, to taste their food, until they had dislodged it from a beam with the sling.

[83.] Roman Slinger. - Column of Antoninus.

5. The Battle-axe and Mace.—Allusions to these weapons have been supposed to occur in Ps. xxxiv. 3 (גִּיּוֹר, σάγαρις, Herod. 4, 70), Prov. xxv. 18 (רֶבֶר, LXX. ρόπαλον), and Ps. ii. 9. But to what extent they were in use among the Hebrews is uncertain. The Egyptian battle-axe occurs frequently on the sculptures. It was about two or two and a half feet in length, and with a single blade; no instance being found of a double axe, resembling the bipennis of the Romans. The blade was secured by bronze pins, and the handle bound in that part with thongs, to prevent the wood from splitting. The soldier, on a march, either held it in his hand, or suspended it on his back, with the blade downwards. In shape the blade resembled the segment of a circle, divided at the back into two smaller segments, whose three points were fastened to the handle with metal pins. It was of bronze, and sometimes of steel; and the length of the handle was double that of the blade, and sometimes even more.

1, 2, Battle-axes. 3, Pole-axe. 4, Maces. 5, Curved Club.

The Egyptian pole-axe was about three feet in length, with a large metal ball, to which the blade was fixed. It is usually seen in the hand of chiefs.

The mace was similar to the pole-axe, but without a blade. It was of wood, bound with bronze, about two and a half feet in length, and furnished with an angular piece of metal projecting from the handle, which may have been intended as a guard. Another kind of mace, of frequent occurrence on the sculptures, had no ball; and though not so formidable, must have been a more manageable weapon than the former. These maces were borne by the heavy-armed infantry; and each charioteer was furnished with one or more, which he carried in a case attached, with the quiver, to the side of his car.

On the monuments is sometimes seen a curved stick (now called by the Arabs liisan, i.e. tongue), which was probably used both as a missile, and as a club in close combat. It was about two feet and a half in length, and made of a hard wood resembling thorn (Wilkinson, Ancient Egypt. i. c. 3).

The Chaldaic battle-axes (קִרְרֹשִׁתַּי) are mentioned by Jeremiah, ch. xlv. 22.

At an early period royal armouries (בְּתֵי כְלִים) appear established. See 2 Kt. xx. 13. [E. A. L.]

ARNON [rushing, roaring], a torrent-stream, which anciently formed the northern boundary of the Moabite, and the southern of the Amorite territory, Nu. xxi. 13; xli. 36; De. ii. 24, 36, &c. It rises in the mountains of Gilead, near Katrane, and flows by a circuitous route into the Dead Sea. The bed of the river is rocky, and its course lies sometimes through narrow and precipitous ravines. In summer it becomes nearly dried up, but in winter forms often, what its name imports, and what many large blocks along its course tossed considerably above the proper channel clearly evince it to be, a rushing torrent. The modern name of the wady is Modjeb or Mōjib. Descriptions are given of it in the Travels of Burckhardt, and of Irby and Mangles.

AR'OEER [naked or needy], the name of several towns mentioned in Scripture. 1. The first is one on the north of the river Arnon, and is mentioned among the cities taken from Sihon, king of the Amorites, and afterwards assigned to the tribe of Reuben, De. ii. 36; Jos. xiii. 16. It stood, however, close on the border of Moab, and in Jeremiah, ch. xlv. 19, is brought into notice in connection with the desolations of that country. But it is not expressly said to have belonged to the territory of Moab. 2. A town of this name is connected with the tribe of Gad, as one of several towns built by that tribe after the conquest of Canaan, Nu. xxxii. 34. In Jos. xiii. 25, it is described as being "before Rabbah," meaning, probably, that it lay on the road from Palestine to Rabbah, or somewhat to the west of it. Nothing besides is known of it. 3. There was also an Arnon in the south of the tribe of Judah, one of the places to which David sent portions after his victory over the Amalekites at Ziklag, 1 Sa. xxx. 28. It is supposed by Dr. Robinson to have been situated in a broad wady, bearing the name of 'Arārah, about 20 geographical miles to the south of Hebron. He found there remains of old foundations, and various pits, apparently dug for the reception of water.

ARPAD, or ARPHAD, a Syrian city, somewhere in the neighbourhood of Hamath, with which it is always associated in Scripture as having alike fallen under the stroke of Sennacherib, 2 Kt. xviii. 34; Is. x. 9; xxxvi. 19. Various places, more or less known, have been fixed upon by different writers as probably the same with it, but certainty has not yet been gained.

ARPHAX'AD [meaning uncertain], son of Shem, born two years after the flood; he was the father of Salah, and lived till he was 438 years old. Josephus represents him as the stem-father of the Chaldeans (Ant. i. 6, 4), which is thought by some to be favoured by the etymology of the compound word arpa-keshad, probably Chaldee-boundary. (See Gesenius, Lex., and Bochart, Phaleg. ii. 4.)

ARROW. See ARMS.

ARTAXERXES, in Hebrew ARTACHSHAST, and ARTACHSHASHTA, Ezr. iv. 7, 8; vii. 7; other variations are those of the Armenian, Artashir, and of the Persian, Artachshetz. It is supposed to be compounded of two words signifying strong and king, which nearly accords with the explanation of Herodotus (l. vi. 98), who makes it "great warrior." The name, which thus appears to have been a sort of title, seems beyond doubt to have been applied in Scripture to more persons than one, though commentators are not altogether agreed as to the kings meant on the different occasions on which it is employed. The first Artaxerxes, mentioned in Ezra iv. cannot, as Josephus imagined (Ant. xi. 2, 1), be Cambyzes, but must rather be the pseudo-Smerdis, who for a short time obtained possession of the throne, and who was succeeded by Darius Hystaspes, B.C. 522. In Ezra also, ch. iv. 24, Darius appears as the successor of the Artaxerxes previously mentioned. It was during the time of that monarch, that the operations connected with the building of the temple at Jerusalem were most completely suspended; which perfectly accords with the supposition of its being the time of the usurpation of the pseudo-Smerdis, as the disorder and feebleness at the centre could scarcely fail to make themselves felt in the provinces. The supposition is further confirmed by the mention of an Ahasuerus (Ahasverosh) in verse 6, who appears to have come between Cyrus and the Artaxerxes mentioned in the latter part of the chapter. But the Artaxerxes mentioned in Ezra vii. 1, in the seventh year of whose reign Ezra went up to Jerusalem with a second company of Israelites, must have been a different person. In all probability this was the Artaxerxes Longimanus of the Greeks, the same who is also called Artaxerxes in the book of Nehemiah. He ascended the throne in B.C. 464. Some have endeavoured to identify the Artaxerxes of Ezra with Xerxes; but as there is every reason for believing this monarch to be the Ahasuerus of Ezra iv. 6, it is not probable that he should be spoken of in the same book under two such different names. But as this part of sacred history is very fragmentary, and has nothing in common with what remains of the profane history of the period, as it is also without any distinct specification of dates, it is impossible to attain to more than a probable opinion as to the precise persons indicated by the several names; and there will always, perhaps, be some room for difference of opinion on the subject. The later authorities, Winer, Bertheau, Gesenius, Bertholdt, &c., make out the correspondence in the manner briefly given above.

ARTEMAS, the name of a Christian, whom St. Paul had some thoughts of sending to Crete, when Titus was labouring as an evangelist in the island, Tit. iii. 12; but of whom nothing further is known.

ARUMAH, a town near Shechem, at which Abimelech encamped, Ju. ix. 41. Nothing further is known of it.

ARVAD [probably wandering-place, or place for fugitives], the Aradus of the Greeks—an island, with a town on it of the same name, on the coast of Phœnicia, and according to Strabo originally occupied, and the town built, by Sidonian fugitives (xvi. 2, § 13, 14). The island was little more than a rock, of about a mile in circumference, with steep sides, and with lofty houses erected on it. Antaradus, on the opposite coast, also belonged to it. It is referred to in Eze. xxvii. 8, 11; from which it appears that its inhabitants had a considerable share in the navigation and commerce of the Phœnicians. They would seem for a time to have had a king of their own (Arrian, Alex. ii. 90); and even in the time of the Maccabees they formed so considerable a state, that the Roman consul is represented as having made known to them the alliance entered into with Simon Maccabeus, 1 Macc. xv. 23. Its modern name is Ruad, and from the good anchorage it affords on the side toward the mainland, it is still frequented. The inhabitants, who number near 1000, are chiefly employed as pilots, shipbuilders, and sailors. A good many of the coasting vessels are built there.

A'SA [healing, or physician], the name of the son and successor of Abijah, and the third king of Judah, after the separation from Israel, 1 Ki. xv.; 2 Ch. xvi. He reigned forty-one years, the commencement of which is variously assigned to 955, 958, 965 B.C. In 1 Ki. xv. 10, he is said to have had the same mother as his father (ver. 2), namely, Maachah, the daughter of Abishalom. There can be little doubt that his grandmother is there meant, and that she is designated his mother, because, being himself a comparative youth when he ascended the throne, she was assumed as the Gebirah, or reigning queen, the queen-mother in this case, who was to have a recognized place of honour and influence around the throne. But this arrangement did not continue long; for Asa proved to be of a better spirit in religion than those who immediately preceded him on the throne of Judah; and setting his heart on the removal of the badges and instruments of idolatry out of the land, he also removed Maachah from the place he had at first assigned her in the kingdom, because she had made an idol in a grove (or, as it should rather be, to Ashera, the Sidonian Venus, 1 Ki. xv. 13). This idol Asa caused to be cut down, and burned beside the brook Kidron. Other reformations were carried forward by Asa, and all the more flagrant abuses rectified, only, it is said in 1 Ki. xv. 14, the high places were not removed; while, on the other hand, in 2 Ch. xiv. 2, the high places are among the things mentioned as having been taken away. The same apparent contradiction occurs in the case of Jehoshaphat, compare 2 Ch. xvii. 6 and xx. 33. And the most natural explanation seems to be, that the high places were of two sorts—one kind appropriated to the worship of false deities (hence sometimes connected with the Ashera images, as at 2 Ch. xvii. 6), which would be abolished along with the grosser forms of idolatry; and another in which the worship was avowedly paid to Jehovah. The latter, as only an irregularity in form (though one that was very apt to degenerate into more serious error), might be tolerated, at least for a time, even in a reforming age; and such seems to have been the case in the time of Asa. The high places were removed in so far as they had been employed in the service of false gods; but they were allowed to continue as convenient meeting-places, where the people had been wont to assemble for the purpose of doing homage to Jehovah—their zeal not being yet strong enough to carry them as often as they should have gone to Jerusalem. Asa appears to have been chiefly engaged during the first ten years of his reign, which were years of external peace, in the prosecution of those religious reforms; but in the eleventh year a formidable adversary appeared in the person of Zerah, the Ethiopian, who came against him, it is said, "with an army of a thousand thousand, and three hundred chariots," 2 Ch. xiv. 9. It seems to have been simply a marauding expedition; for no reason is mooted in connection with the political relations of the two countries to warrant such a hostile invasion. But it was defeated of its object; for Asa and his people, without neglecting military preparations, cast themselves on the divine protection, and obtained a decisive victory over the enemy. This gratifying result was blessed to the further spread of godliness at home; for, seeing that God was with them, Asa and the more faithful portion of the people devoted themselves anew to the work of reformation, to which they were also stimulated and encouraged by the address of Azariah the prophet, on their return from the conflict, 2 Ch. xv. 1-8. They were now joined by many out of the other tribes, who along with the people of Judah and Benjamin kept a grand festival of joy and thanksgiving in the fifteenth year of the reign of Asa.

The festival now mentioned was probably, in a religious point of view, the crowning period of Asa's reign; at least, after this, partial defections begin to appear, which grow at length into manifestly improper courses. Baasha, king of Israel, jealous of the prosperity of the kingdom of Judah, and anxious to impose a check on the influx of people to it from the northern parts of Israel, set about fortifying Ramah, which lay on the north of Jerusalem, and commanded the main road in that direction. This is said to have been done in the thirty-sixth year of the reign of Asa, 2 Ch. xvi. 1; but as Baasha began to reign in the third, and died in the twenty-sixth year of Asa's government, 1 Ki. xv. 23, 33, there must be some mistake in the period assigned for the fortifying of Ramah; or, perhaps, the thirty-six years mentioned must be understood, not of the reign of Asa, but of the separate existence of the kingdom of Judah, over which he reigned. Such is the view taken by some commentators, which, at all events, brings the circumstance to much about the time when it must have taken place, namely, to the sixteenth or seventeenth year of Asa's reign. What we have chiefly to notice, however, in connection with it, is the questionable policy of Asa to counterwork the hostile attempt of Baasha. He entered into a league with Ben-hadad of Syria, and prompted him with gifts of money to make war upon Israel. This had the desired effect of compelling Baasha to desist from the fortification of Ramah; but it indicated a misgiving of heart in Asa himself, in respect to the great source of strength and hope, and drew down upon him the solemn rebuke of heaven. The rebuke was administered by the mouth of Hanani the prophet, who charged him with having exhibited a spirit of distrust toward God, and unduly relied on the king of Israel; in consequence of which he declared, there might certainly be looked for the occurrence of future wars, though none such have been expressly recorded. Asa was irritated, not humbled, by the rebuke thus administered to him; he even so far departed from the better spirit that had animated his earlier years, as to lay violent hands on the prophet, and cast him into prison, 2 Ch. xvi. 10. This, it may be hoped, was only a temporary outburst of unsanctified passion. But we have no reason to think that Asa ever properly recovered his lost ground; and his case must be added to the number of those who, though they may not wholly depart from the faith, yet have their strength weakened in the way, and end their spiritual course very differently from the manner in which it was begun. For Asa, we are informed, acted oppressively to others, as well as to Hanani; and in his latter days, when afflicted with a disease in his feet, he gave way again to the same distrustful spirit, for which he had been rebuked by the prophet; he sought to the physicians, but not to the Lord. He appears to have been a man more distinguished for the soundness of his understanding in spiritual things, than for the liveliness or vigour of his faith. He clearly perceived the sin and folly of idolatry, and so far as concerned the removal of its abominations, his measures were promptly taken and resolutely pursued. But in the steadfast and onward prosecution of the good his heart faltered, and when the work of external reform was accomplished, it seemed as if he had nothing more to do for God; consequently he retrograded rather than advanced; and only on the negative side fulfilled the covenant into which he entered along with his people, "to seek the Lord God of their fathers with all their heart, and all their soul," 2 Ch. xv. 12. It was a marked and mournful failing, but one that unfortunately has too many exemplifications in every age of the church.

ASAHEL [made of God], nephew of David, and brother of Joab and Abishai. His chief peculiarity was his swiftness of foot, which probably saved him in many an encounter, but at last cost him his life; for in his hot pursuit after Abner, he suffered himself to be thrust through by the spear of the flying but still valiant chief, 2 Sa. ii. (See ABNER.)

ASAPH [assembler or collector]. 1. A Levite, and son of Barachias, 1 Ch. vi. 39; xv. 17. In 2 Ch. xxix. 30 he is designated a seer, whose effusions, along with those of David, were adapted to the celebration of God's praise in song. This no doubt refers to certain of the psalms as the composition of Asaph. Twelve of these bear his name—Psalm l., and all from lxxiii. to lxxxiii. inclusive. It is therefore to rate the place and calling of Asaph too low to characterize him as simply an eminent musician, and on this account appointed to preside over the choral services instituted by David in connection with the tabernacle-worship. He had qualifications of a higher kind for such a service, being one to whom the Spirit of God gave grace to indite sacred songs, as well as to direct and regulate the chanting of such songs in the service of the sanctuary. Even of his sons, who inherited a portion of his spirit, along with those of Heman and Jeduthun, it is said that they "were separated by David to prophecy with harps, with psalteries, and with cymbals," 1 Ch. xvi. 1, indicating the important nature of the work given them to do, and the high position of the persons appointed to perform it. The separation of the Asaph family for this work seems to have been perpetuated for many generations (for we read of them still in Ezer. ii. 41; Ne. vii. 44), though, doubtless, it was the official charge only in connection with the choral services of the temple, not the higher endowments bestowed at first on the family, that is to be understood as thus descending to a late posterity.— 2. Beside the Asaph of David's time, there was one a recorder to King Hezekiah, 2 Ki. xviii. 18, and another a keeper of the royal forests under Artaxerxes, Ne. ii. 8.

AS'CALON. See ASKELON.

AS'ENATH, an Egyptian term, and the name of the daughter of Potipherah, priest of On, who became the spouse of Joseph. (See JOSEPH.) It is generally supposed that the latter part of the name is that of the goddess Neith, the Minerva of the Egyptians; and the compound term is by Gesenius conceived to mean, she who is of Neith. Jablonski interpreted it to mean worshipper of Neith. In such a matter, certainty is unattainable.

ASH. In the derisive description of the idol-maker, 1a. xlii. 14, we are told—

"He heweth him down cedars,
He taketh the cypress and the oak,
Which he strengtheneth for himself among the trees of the forest;
He planteth an ash, and the rain doth nourish it."

The Hebrew is אֲשׁוּר (ash), which probably suggested to translators the Latin ornus; but we have no evidence that either the manna-ash (Ornus europæa), or our own noble ash tree (Fraxinus excelsior), is a native of Palestine. Martin Luther translates it cedar, the Dutch version elm (olmboom), and the oldest of all, the Septuagint, pine (πιτρυς), which, as usual, is followed by the Vulgate (pinus). [J. H.]

ASHDOD [fortified place, castle], the Azotus of the Greeks and Romans, modern name Esdud, 1 Mac. iv. 16; Ac. viii. 40; a city of the Philistines, on the sea-coast, about mid-way between Gaza and Joppa, and the capital of one of their five states, Jos. xiii. 3; 1 Sa. vi. 17. In the original division of Palestine among the twelve tribes, Ashdod was assigned to the tribe of Judah, Jos. xv. 47; but it remained for many generations in the hands of its ancient inhabitants. It was there that the ark of God was dishonoured by being carried as a trophy into the temple of a heathen deity; but there also that the superior might and glory of the God of Israel became manifest in the prostration of Dagon's image in the temple, 1 Sa. v. 4. When the Philistines generally were subdued by the Israelites, this town must also have been subject to their sway; but we read of no special acts of violence or marks of subjugation being inflicted upon it till the time of Uzziah, who "broke down the wall of Ashdod and built cities about it," 2 Ch. xxvi. 6. Even this did not prove more than a temporary humiliation; for upwards of a century later, it withstood for twenty-nine years the force of Egypt, the longest siege on record, though at last it was taken by Psammetichus about B.C. 630; and when, more than a century later still, the Jews returned from Babylon, the population of Ashdod was in so flourishing a condition, that the women of the place became a snare to them, and for taking wives from Ashdod they incurred the severe reproof of Nehemiah, Ne. xiii. 23, 24. To have been able to survive such changes and assaults, proves it to have been a place of great strength, and well situated as to the general sources of prosperity and greatness. But its decay was only a question of time. The prophets gave clear intimations of its ultimate ruin, Je. xxv. 20; Am. i. 8, &c.; and in the wars of the Maccabees it suffered so severely that even then the predictions appear to have been in good measure fulfilled, 1 Mac. v. 63; x. 77, seq.; xi. 4. In the gospel age, however, it was still a place of some note, and was bestowed by Augustus as a gift on Salome (Joseph. xvii. 13, 5).

It was among the places visited by Philip the evangelist, Ac. viii. 40; and became at an early period the seat of a Christian church. A bishop from Azotus was present at the councils of Nice and Chalcedon, also at those of Seleucia and Jerusalem. But this is no proof of any great importance having at the time belonged to the place in a political respect. From the dawn of European civilization, it has been known only as an Arab village, situated on a grassy hill, and possessing in its environs the remains of former greatness. So it is described by Irby and Mangles, who detected among the ruins broken arches and fragments of marble pillars.

ASHER [happy, fortunate], the son of Jacob by Zilpah, the handmaid of Leah, Ge. xxx. 13, and the patriarchal head of one of the twelve tribes. The blessings pronounced, first by Jacob, and afterwards by Moses, upon this tribe, consist chiefly of a play on the import of the name Asher, and an indication that the reality should correspond with the happy omen implied in it: there should belong to the tribe a rich portion and a numerous offspring, Ge. xlix. 20; De. xxxiii. 24. The tribe soon began to realize this description; for, though Asher himself had only four sons and one daughter, who became the heads of so many families, Nu. xvi. 4-16, yet by the time of the departure from Egypt, they were 41,500 strong, and at the numbering toward the close of the wilderness sojourn, they ranked the fifth of the tribes in multitude—having 53,400 full-grown men, ver. 47. On the division of the Promised Land, their portion was assigned them in one of the most fertile regions, stretching along the sea-coast between Carmel and Lebanon, and bounded on the east by the territories of Zebulon and Naphtali. The inheritance, however, was but partially conquered at the first, Ju. i. 31, 32; and there is reason to believe was never by any means fully possessed, especially on the northern side, which stretched within the boundaries of the Zidonians. There seems no proper ground for excluding, with Kitto, the district proper of Zidon from the inheritance of Asher; the passage, in particular, of Jos. xix. 25, seq., seems plainly to favour the common view. In a moral aspect the proximity of Asher to the idolatrous and dissolute superstition of the Zidonians must have been anything but favourable to their spiritual health; and as some of the worst abominations that flowed in upon the covenant-people had their origin in that quarter, we may well conceive that the Asherites, who were the nearest to the region of pollution, were also among the first to fall under its corrupting influence; the more so, as the corn, the wine, and the oil, which their territory yielded in such abundance, must naturally have led them to cultivate a close commercial intercourse with the populous but non-agricultural districts of Tyre and Sidon. Accordingly, the Asherites never appear taking any prominent part in the religious struggles of their country; the great deliverances all came from other quarters.

ASHES have a considerable place in the symbolical and descriptive imagery of Scripture, and usually in a somewhat different way from what the usages of modern European society would naturally suggest. The custom of burning a taken city has been common in all ages; and so to reduce a place or country to ashes, is a general and well-understood expression everywhere for effecting a complete destruction, or producing a total desolation. Thus, also in 2 Pe. ii. 6, "turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes," Eze. xxviii. 18. But by far the most frequent figurative employment of the term in Scripture is derived from the practice, which from the earliest times prevailed in the East, of sitting down among ashes, or covering one's self with ashes, as a symbol of grief and mourning. Thus Job in the time of his calamity sat down among the ashes; and when expressing at the close the pungency of his contrition for past sins and shortcomings, he said "he repented in dust and ashes," ch. ii. 8; xiii. 6. A great variety of allusions have reference to this custom, Ez. iv. 1; Is. lviii. 5; Is. lxi. 3; Je. vi. 26; Mat. xi. 21, &c. Sometimes the image is carried a little further, and persons are spoken of as eating ashes, turning them not only into a sort of attire, but even into an article of food, Ps. cii. 9; Is. xlv. 20; It is the deepest misery and degradation that is meant thereby to be expressed. These are the more peculiar allusions of this sort in Scripture; but occasionally also reference is made to the light and comparatively worthless nature of ashes—especially of such ashes as form the refuse of wood—which may be driven about by the wind, or heedlessly trodden upon by the foot of man. In this respect Abraham spoke of himself as "dust and ashes," and the wicked are represented as "ashes under the soles of the feet" to the righteous, Ge. xviii. 27. Mal. iv. 3.

ASHTMA, the name of a divinity worshipped by the people of Hamath, and of doubtful origin. It is mentioned only once in Scripture, 2 Ki. xvii. 30. Some of the rabbinical Jews report that the deity was worshipped under the form of a goat, and a goat without wool. If so—for the tradition cannot be relied on with any certainty—it was probably one of the widespread forms of the Pan worship of heathen antiquity. Various other conjectures have been thrown out, on which it is needless to enter, as none of them have been established.

ASH'KENAZ, the proper name of a son of Gomer, and grandson of Japhet, Ge. x. 3. In Je. li. 27, it is coupled with Ararat and Minni, apparently as the name of a province and people somewhere about Armenia. The modern Jews have identified it with Germany, but this is universally regarded as an entirely erroneous application of the term.

ASH'PENAZ, chief of the Babylonian eunuchs, to whom was committed the charge of Daniel and his companions, Da. i. 3, 7.

ASHTAROTH, or ASTAROTH, one of the ancient towns in the district of Bashan, and one of the seats of Og, the king of that region at the time of the conquest of Canaan. He is said to have dwelt at Ashtaroth, and at Edrei, De. i. 4; Jos. ix. 10; xii. 4. In the subsequent division of the land it fell to the half-tribe of Manasseh, and was made a Levitical city by being given to the Gershonites, Jos. xiii. 31; 1 Ch. vi. 71. The name was in all probability derived from the female deity that from remote times usurped so much of the worship which prevailed in the Syrian portions of Asia. (See ASHTORETH.) The place is reported by Jerome to have stood about six miles from Edrei; but the site has not been identified in modern times.

ASHTAROTH-KARNATHM, or Ashtaroth of the Two Horns, the Horned, mentioned in Ge. xiv. 5, as one of the cities occupied by the Rephaim, and smitten by Chederlaomer and his host, is generally supposed to be the same place as that simply called Ashtaroth. The name Karnaim was probably applied to it from the identification of the goddess Ashtoreth with the moon, or from the ox-head symbol used in her worship. It is also supposed to be the same that in later history was called simply Karnaim, 1 Mac. v. 24, 43 (Josephus, Ant. xii. 8, § 4, &c.) But this cannot be reckoned certain.

ASHTORETH, the great goddess of the Canaanitish nations (Αστροτη ή μεγιστη, Sanchon.), the partner of Baal, with whose worship that of Ashtoreth was frequently associated. In the only two passages in which the singular form of the name appears in the Hebrew Scriptures, 1 Ki. xi. 5, 33, and 2 Ki. xxiii. 13, it is followed by the title "God of the Zidonians," from which it is evident that Zidon was one of the principal seats—probably the principal seat—of her worship in Canaan: a conclusion which quite accords with the statements of the Greek and Roman writers, and with the monumental evidence furnished by the inscriptions which still survive in the Phœnician tongue (Gesenius, Mon. Phœn. and Theol.)

[The longest and most important of these inscriptions which has yet been brought to light, is that on the sarcophagus of a Zidonian king called Esmunazar, accidentally discovered at Zidon in the commencement of 1855. The inscription records the building of a temple for the worship of Astarte by the king and his mother, Am-Astarte by name, who was herself a priestess of the goddess. It has been translated by several scholars. The translation of Rüdiger will be found in the Zeitschrift der D. M. G. ix. 647-659.]

But the worship of Ashtoreth was by no means confined within the narrow limits of Phœnicia. We have scriptural evidence that it extended over the whole of Canaan. For we find it prevailing not only among the Philistines on the south-west, 1 Sa. xxxi. 10, but likewise in the region east of Jordan, where it must have taken firm root at a very early period, one of the chief cities of that region being called by the name of Ashtoreth, Ge. xiv. 6; De. i. 4; Jos. ix. 10; xii. 4; xiii. 12, 31; 1 Ch. vi. 56; xl. 44.¹

It is remarkable, however, that in the name of this city, Ashtaroth or Ashteroth-Karnaim, the goddess-name Ashtoreth appears not in its singular but in its plural form. This is true likewise of the goddess-name itself, which is met with more frequently in the plural form Ashtaroth than in the singular form Ashtoreth, comp. Ju. ii. 13; x. 6; 1 Sa. vii. 3, 4; xii. 10.

It is evident that the use of this form must be explained in the same way as the use of the corresponding plural form Baalim, with which it is so frequently associated. Now, that the plural form Baalim does not denote, as Gesenius and others have supposed, images or other material symbols, representative of the presence and attributes of Baal, appears from the distinction which is uniformly observed between the Baalim and the מַצְבֹּת הַבַּעַל, matzeboth habaal, the images or pillars of Baal, the latter of which only is found in connection with verbs which necessarily point to some material object. With Baalim we find connected the verbs "to serve, worship, seek to, go after, go a whoring after, put away," &c.; but never to "set up" or "cast down," to "adorn" or to "break in pieces." And we find the same distinction observed in the use of the corresponding plural Ashtaroth, which is associated only with the verbs "serve" and "put away."

The true explanation of the plural forms Baalim and Ashtaroth is very much the same as that of the plural form Elohim. They describe these false gods, or the powers which these gods represent and embody, in the wide extent of their influence, and the varied forms of their manifestation (comp. Movers, Die Phönizier, vol. i. p. 172-175). If this be so, we have in the prevailing use of the form Ashtaroth another evidence of the predominance of the Ashtoreth worship among the nations of Canaan.²

The important question now presents itself, What was the character of this worship, of the wide prevalence of which even in the most ancient times we have so decisive evidence? This is a question to which we are unable to give a perfectly satisfactory reply, partly because the Hebrew Scriptures which constitute our principal source of information, being originally intended for the use of those who were themselves for the most part well acquainted with the character of the Ashtoreth rites, present us rather with general statements than with any detailed account of these rites, and partly because of the confusion introduced into the notices of this subject which may be gathered from the Greek and Roman writers, by the desire of these writers to connect the rites of the Ashtoreth worship with rites of their own, which seemed to them to have a similar origin and import, though the resemblance of the one to the other was by no means perfect. Still, there are certain general conclusions, on the correctness of which we may rely with confidence.

The first passage in which the name Ashtaroth, as the name of a heathen goddess, appears is Ju. ii. 13, where we are told how the Israelites served Jehovah all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the elders that outlived Joshua; but on their death "there arose another generation after them which knew not Jehovah, nor yet the works which he had done for Israel, . . . and they forsook Jehovah and served Baal and Ashtaroth." Compare with this Ju. x. 6, "And the children of Israel did evil again in the sight of Jehovah, and served Baalim and Ashtaroth, and the gods of Syria, and the gods of Zidon, and the gods of Moab," &c. From these passages it appears that among the multitude of gods worshipped by the grossly superstitious and degraded nations of Canaan when Israel invaded and conquered their land, Baalim and Ashtaroth held the first place, the one as the great male divinity, the other as the great female divinity. This worship of the gods in pairs, as male and female, we find very widely spread over the ancient heathen world. And it probably had a poetic origin. The world and its multiform changes were regarded as a birth, or a succession of births, in which, as in the birth of a living being, they traced the operation of a twofold generating power—an active and passive, a male and female (Movers, Die Phönizier, i. 149).

¹ If the Athtar (𐤀𐤄𐤌𐤓) of the Himyaritic inscriptions be, as has been with much probability conjectured, another form of the name Ashtoreth, the worship of that goddess must have extended itself even to the most southern region of Arabia (Zeitschrift der D. M. G. x. 62). It is certain that it was likewise carried westward, along the shores of the Mediterranean, by the Phœnician colonists. And in Assyria we find in great repute "our lady" Ishtar, who was probably the same person, the two names being in their essential elements identical (Rawlinson's Herodotus, i. 634-636).

Vol. I.

² It is worthy of remark, that the author of the books of Kings seems carefully to avoid the use of these plural forms. He is the only one of the sacred writers who employs the singular form of the name Ashtoreth, and he never employs the plural Ashtaroth, which alone appears in the other books of Scripture. So in his references to the worship of Baal, we find the singular form of the name introduced more than thirty times, the plural form only once (1 Ki. xviii. 18).

The former of these the Canaanitish nations named Baal, i.e. the lord or husband, or when conceived of rather as a power than as a person, Baalim; the latter received the name Ashtoreth or Ashtaroth—a name, of the origin and signification of which no probable account has yet been given. To the united operation of these two gods or powers they traced all the evolutions of nature and of providence. The one was the great father, and the other the great mother of all. To these, therefore, they bowed themselves down in worship, they offered sacrifices, they made prayers, and adopted whatever means might seem to their blinded minds most effectual to gain their favour.

We know little of the various forms under which Ashtoreth was worshipped. Eusebius preserves a statement by the Phœnician historian Sanchoniathon that her images had the head of an ox; whence perhaps the name Ashtaroth-Karnaim, i.e. Ashtaroth of the Horns. This was probably one of many forms, by which the imagination sought to give visible expression to the qualities and powers supposed to reside in the divinity. Perhaps it was a natural consequence of the conception which lay at the root of their superstition, that the rites by which these divinities were worshipped should frequently have been of a most gross and lascivious description. This we know was the case, even at the earliest period. No sooner had Israel entered the land of Canaan, than we find them seduced and entangled by the lascivious orgies attendant upon the worship of Baal-peor, Nu. xxv. 1-3. And doubtless these orgies are specially referred to in those scriptures which speak of the horrible abominations which had drawn down the righteous vengeance of Jehovah, and doomed the Canaanitish nations to utter destruction. It is not necessary that we should go into detail in describing these abominable practices. The notices of them which we find in heathen writers, and which amply confirm the statements of Scripture, are well known, and need not here be repeated.¹

The statements just made with regard to the place which Ashtoreth held among the Canaanitish objects of worship, and the rites by which she was thought to be appropriately honoured, will sufficiently explain the use of her name as a common noun in various passages of Deuteronomy, vii. 13; xxviii. 4, 18, 51, to denote the ewes of the flock—veneres pecoris, as Gesenius explains it, femelle gregem propagantes.

Such being the place of Astarte among the Syrian divinities, we cannot wonder that she should sometimes be represented by western writers as the Juno, sometimes as the Venus of Syria.² There is no doubt that there were combined in her character and worship some of the attributes of both these goddesses. She was the great goddess—the consort of the lord and king of gods and men: and she was the great mother—the source of generation, power, and fruitfulness.

Ashtoreth has also been connected with the moon: and this connection rests in part upon a scriptural basis. Yet the statements of Scripture, usually appealed to on this point, are by no means very clear and decisive, De. iv. 19; xvi. 3; Je. viii. 9; 2 Kl. xvi. 16; 2 Ch. xxxiii. 3-5. It is certain that Baal and the sun were not identical: the former name Baal being a name of much larger import. The sun, doubtless, was regarded as a Baal, but not as Baal (בַּעַל). The Phœnicians had a god or gods called Baal-shemen and Baal-hamon (Ges. Mon. Phœn.), and it is probable by these names the sun is to be understood. But the name Baal, without any such addition, is not to be so restricted. On the contrary, there is at least one passage of Scripture in which Baal seems to be expressly distinguished from the sun, 2 Kl. xxxiii. 5: "They burnt incense to Baal, to the sun, and to the moon," &c. And certainly in the numerous passages in which not the singular but the plural form Baalim is used, we are constrained to attach to the name a much wider significance.

Still it must be allowed that, especially in the later periods of Israelitish history, Baal seems to have become more and more the sun-god. And this is not difficult to account for. It arose from the natural tendency of the human mind to materialize and localize, and to give visible form and shape to its vague and shadowy conceptions. There is no doubt that the worship of the heavenly bodies can be traced back to a very ancient period, but it does not seem to have been the earliest form of idolatry among the Canaanites. It seems rather to have been a later growth—partly natural, partly stimulated by contact with other nations. However this may be, it could have been no difficult matter to engraft the worship of the sun, moon, and stars on the simpler system in which Baalim and Ashtaroth were the great objects of worship. What more fitting representative and embodiment (so to speak) of the great Father than the glorious and beneficent orb of day, the source of light, and life, and beauty? And then, this step being taken, the lesser of the two great orbs became the natural representative and embodiment of his female companion Ashtoreth. And the early and wide-spread belief of a close and mysterious connection between heaven and earth, between the stars above and the course of nature and providence in the earth below, would necessarily tend to confirm and perpetuate the connection thus established.

In the mythologies of all nations, we find the same close connection between the heavenly and the earthly. Thus the great goddess of the Egyptians, Isis, whose character and worship seem to have resembled in many parts those of Ashtoreth, was in ancient times regarded sometimes as representing the earth, sometimes the moon, sometimes as the common mother of all (Jablonski, Panth. Egypt. ii. 8, 17, 21). The same is true of the Greek goddess Aphrodite, who seems to have been originally the same as the Syrian Ashtoreth, as indeed the very name Aphrodite may possibly indicate. But on this we need not enlarge.³

² Οἱ μὲν Ἀφροδίτην, ἡ δὲ Ἥρα, ἡ δὲ τῆς ἀρχῆς καὶ ἐπιφανείας πᾶσι ἐξ ἑσπέρου παρασκευασθεῖσιν αἰτίαι καὶ φύσιν νομίζουσι. Plutarch, quoted by Selden, De Diis Syris. See also the other passages from the ancients, quoted in that treatise and likewise by Gesenius, Theol., and Winer, Real-Wörterbuch.

This being so, it is probable that by the queen of heaven, mentioned by Jeremiah, vii. 18, and xlv. 17, 18, as a chief object of worship to the Jews, and especially to the Jewish women of his day, we are to understand Ashtaroth, which name, it is somewhat remarkable, is nowhere found in the prophetic Scriptures. Still we cannot draw from this fact the conclusion that the title queen of heaven would have been equally descriptive of the Ashtoreth of earlier times. It is not till very late in the history of Israel, that we find mention made of the introduction of the worship of the host of heaven, 2 Ki. xvii. 16; xxi. 3, 5; xxiii. 4, 5, &c. And it is not improbable that the influence of this worship, which some have connected with the presence of the Assyrians in Palestine, may have modified the conceptions formed of the ancient divinities and the leading attributes with which they were invested.¹

With regard to the forms and observances which accompanied the worship of Ashtaroth, we have no detailed information in Scripture, for the reason already given. We read in one passage of a house or temple of Ashtaroth, 1 Sa. xxxi. 10; in another of a high place or artificial eminence erected for her worship, 2 Ki. xxiii. 13; but the two localities which are most frequently mentioned as the scene of the ancient idol-rites, are the high hill and the shade of the green tree, Da. xii. 2; 2 Ki. xvi. 4, &c. It is probable that the worship of Baalim was more frequently connected with the former of these localities, the worship of Ashtaroth with the latter: but the two divinities were so closely allied in character, in the powers attributed and the worship presented to them, that the symbols of their presence were often erected on the same spot, and both received at one and the same time the homage and the gifts of their worshippers.

One question of importance remains. What were the symbols employed to mark out the spot where these divinities were supposed to be specially present? This leads us to investigate the meaning of a word of frequent occurrence in Scripture, with regard to which there has been very great difference of opinion among Hebrew scholars—the word אַשְׁרָה, Ashera.

Three principal opinions have been propounded:

1. That Ashera means grove. This is the most ancient view, being that of the LXX., and it was followed by the translators of our version.

2. That Ashera was a goddess-name, nearly identical with Ashtoreth. This view is in substance that of Gesenius.

3. That it was a symbolic figure, at first nothing more than the stock or stem of a tree fixed in the ground, afterwards some wooden pillar or image, more artificially prepared and adorned, 2 Ki. xxi. 7. Of those who hold this view, some, with whom we have no hesitation in agreeing, regard the Ashera as the symbol of the goddess Ashtoreth: others, as Movers, deny the existence of any such connection, distinguishing between Ashera and Ashtoreth as two separate divinities.

1. With regard to the first and most ancient of these views, it is now abandoned by nearly all who have made accurate inquiry into the subject. There is not a single passage in which the adoption of the rendering "grove" is unavoidable; and there are many passages in which that rendering is altogether inadmissible. For example, we find the Ashera frequently connected with the verbs עָשָׂה, to make, 1 Ki. xvi. 33; 2 Ki. xvii. 16; xxi. 3; 2 Ch. xxxiii. 3; עָשָׂה, to set up, 2 Ch. xxxiii. 10; אָרָה, to bring out, 2 Ki. xxiii. 6. We find an Ashera forming the wood on which a single ox was sacrificed, Ju. vi. 20; another set up in the city of Samaria, 2 Ki. xiii. 6; and another in the temple of Jehovah at Jerusalem, 2 Ki. xxi. 7. We find Asherim under green trees, and covered over by curtains or tents (בְּתָיִם) wrought for them by their female attendants and worshippers. In all these cases the rendering "grove" is quite unsuitable. And even the passage which is most frequently appealed to in defence of that rendering, Da. xvi. 21, "Thou shalt not plant (נָטַע) thee an Ashera, any tree (עֵץ-אֲשֵׁרָה), near the altar of Jehovah; neither shalt thou set thee up a stone pillar" (אֲבָנֵי), is really, when closely examined, rather adverse to it than otherwise. The most obvious meaning is, Thou shalt not plant, Da. xi. 45, near the altar of Jehovah an Ashera formed out of any tree, nor set up any stone pillar; and the natural conclusion even from this passage, which alone gives even the semblance of support to the rendering "grove," is, that the Ashera was a wooden pillar, or trunk of a tree, perhaps of some peculiar and well-known form, to which a symbolic character of some kind was attached—a conclusion borne out by other passages of Deuteronomy, ch. iv. 23; xviii. 36, 64; xix. 16, in which the idol pillars or images are described as chiefly of two sorts, "wood and stone;" by the former of which we may suppose the Ashera to be meant, by the latter, the אֲבָנֵי, with which, not only in the passage now under consideration, but in a multitude of others, the Ashera stands in close and immediate connection.

2. Neither have we any authority for regarding the Ashera as a goddess worshipped by the Canaanites, either the goddess Astarte or any other. The passage which seems most strongly to support this view is 1 Ki. xviii. 19, where we read of Elijah's encounter with the prophets of Baal, four hundred and fifty in number, and the prophets of the Ashera, in number four hundred. At first glance this passage would seem to present Ashera as a goddess, the companion of Baal, and nearly equal in rank. But on looking back two chapters to the account which the historian gives of the introduction by Ahab of the worship of Baal and of the Ashera, we find there is a clear distinction drawn between them; for it is said, "Ahab set up an altar to Baal in the house of Baal . . . and Ahab made (עָשָׂה) the Ashera," 1 Ki. xvi. 32, 33, plainly distinguishing between Baal, the divinity in whose honour altars were erected and temples built, and the Ashera, a thing made and fashioned by human hands.

3. This leads to the true view of Ashera, as an idol symbol, and more particularly a symbol of the goddess Ashtoreth. That the Ashera had some intimate connection with the worship of Ashtoreth, is evident from the passage just remarked on, 1 Ki. xviii. 19, and many others, Ju. vi. 25; 1 Ki. xvi. 33; 2 Ki. xvii. 10, 16; xviii. 4; xix. 3, &c., in which it is mentioned along with Baal or the אֲשֶׁרֶת הַבַּיִת, just as Ashtoreth is in other passages.

See also 2 Ki. xiii. 7, for a notice of the Ashera-rites. But at the same time we must be careful not to confound the Ashera with the goddess Ashtoreth; for the Scripture never does. The latter (Ashtoreth or Ashtaroth) the Scripture always speaks of as a divinity, followed after, and served and worshipped by the blinded heathen (see the passages already quoted): the former (the Ashera) as a material symbol, a tree, a trunk, which is planted (נָטַע), made (עָשָׂה), set up (קָמַד); in only one passage, 2 Ch. xiv. 18, is it connected with עָבַד, to serve, the symbol being put for the divinity. Again, the Ashtaroth Israel is commanded to put away (הֲסִירָה); the Asherim to cut down (כָּרַת) and burn with fire (בְּעֵר שָׂרִף), just as they were enjoined to put away Baal from among them, but to break in pieces (שָׁבַר) the pillars of Baal, which were of stone. Moreover, the Asherim are constantly connected with altars, images, and other materials of idolatry: the Ashtaroth never, Ex. xxxiv. 13; De. vii. 12; xii. 3, &c.¹

We are thus led to the conclusion that, just as the אֲשֶׁרֶת of stone was usually the symbol of Baal, so the Ashera of wood was the symbol of Ashtaroth. And this conclusion is quite in harmony with what we learn from other sources as to the nature of the idol symbols which were in use in most ancient times.—(Potter's Greek Antiq. i. 225, 226; Sale's Koran, Prel. Disc. § 1; Movers, i. 569; Euseb. Præp. Evang. p. 35, 99.) They were nothing more dignified than stocks and stones. The reason why the symbol of Baal was of stone, that of Ashtoreth of wood, is perhaps to be found in the difference of sex; the stone representing the idea of strength, the tree that of fruitfulness.

ASIA; the origin of the name is involved in obscurity, but as a designation, along with Europe and Africa, of one of the greater divisions of the known world, it began to come into use in the fifth century B.C. In the New Testament, however, it is used in a narrower sense, as it also very generally was among the ancients, sometimes for Asia Minor and sometimes for pro-consular Asia, which latterly included the provinces of Phrygia, Mysia, Caria, and Lydia (Cicero, Pro Flacco, c. 27). But the province was originally not so extensive; and even afterwards Phrygia is occasionally mentioned in another connection—with Cilicia, for example, as when Cicero charges Dolabella and his quaestor Verres with ravaging Phrygia, during the time that the former held the province of Cilicia Verres, Act. ii. 1, c. 38). So in Acts xvi. 6, Phrygia is distinguished from Asia, as if it did not properly belong to the province so designated; and so also in ch. ii. 9, 10. In these passages it is probably used, as it appears also to be in the Apocalypse with respect to the seven churches of Asia, for the comparatively small sea-board district, which comprised Mysia, Ionia, and Lydia, and which had Ephesus for its centre and capital.

ASIARCHÆ, ASIARCHS, or rulers of Asia, rendered in the English version the chief of Asia, Ac. xix. 31, were the annually appointed governors of the cities in pro-consular Asia. They had the superintendence of the public games and religious rites in honour of the gods and the emperor, which they had to conduct at their own expense. Hence, only wealthy persons could hold the office, and in respect to social position they must always have been among the chief men of the place. Each city, it would appear, chose one of their own number with a view to the office, and out of the whole number thus chosen, ten were selected by the assembly of deputies, who formed a sort of council of Asiarchs, and one was nominated to be the president or head of the body. It is disputed whether the title Asiarch belonged only to this president, or to the whole ten. The language in the passage above referred to from the Acts of the Apostles seems to favour the idea that they existed in considerable numbers; so that either the whole body must have had the title of Asiarchs, or the title must have been kept up by way of courtesy, toward those who had formerly enjoyed the dignity. One Asiarch alone is noticed in Eusebius as having had the charge of matters at the trial of Polycarp (Ecll. Hist. iv. 15); but this, as Winer remarks, may simply have arisen from one being appointed to look after that particular business, while for the public solemnities generally others may have been associated with him. Indeed, the notices that have come down to us regarding the office are so incidental and fragmentary, that it is not possible to decide with confidence on the details; and it is not improbable that the customs and mode of procedure regarding it differed at one time as compared with another.

ASKELON [Heb. אֲשְׁקֶלֶן, probably migration], one of the chief cities of the Philistines, on the sea-coast between Gaza and Ashdod. It lay within the compass of the territory of Judah, and was about 37 geographical miles south-west of Jerusalem. Derketo, which seems to have been the same with Atergatis, was the deity chiefly worshipped there, under the form of a female head and shoulders, tapering away into a fish's tail (Lucian, De Dea Syria, xiv.) There was probably some affinity between this worship and that of Dagon, the tutelary deity of Ashdod. The city had not only the advantages of a seaport, but also stood in a fruitful region, prolific even in some of the finer productions, such as vines and aromatic plants (Pliny, xix. 32; Strabo, xvi. 759). It was strongly fortified, and from its position must have been the theatre of many a conflict, especially during the wars that were carried on between Egypt and Syria. It was sometimes subject to the one and sometimes to the other, 1 Mac. i. 86; xl. 6; xii. 33 (Josephus, Ant. xii. 4, 5). Herod the Great was born there, and he afterwards adorned it with baths, colonnades, and other ornamental works (Joseph. Wars, i. 12, 11). After his death his sister Salome made it her residence, having obtained from Augustus the use of a palace. It continued to be a place of considerable importance in later times, and is often mentioned in the history of the crusades. Richard held his court within its walls. In the time of Sandys (A.D. 1610) it still was the seat of a garrison, although it had otherwise, he tells us, become a place of no importance. But it has long since fallen into decay and ruin. Richardson found "not an inhabitant within its walls" (Travels, ii.

204); and Robinson's companion, Mr. Smith, who passed by it in 1827, described it "as one of the most mournful scenes of desolation he had ever beheld" (Researches, ii, 260). Compare Zec. ix. 5; Zep. ii. 4; Am. i. 8.

ASNAPPER, designated the Great and the Noble, is mentioned in connection with the introduction into Palestine of the different tribes from the East, who were sent to take the place of the exiled Israelites, Ezr. iv. 10. He is not called king of Assyria, and it is more than probable that he was only a prince or satrap of the empire, who had the charge of this particular business.

ASS (אֲסוּדָה, hamor, he-ass), (אֲתוֹן, athôn, she-ass), (אֲיִר, ayir, ass-colt). The most familiar species of the genus Asinus, belonging to the horse family (Equidæ), of which the generic distinctions are, a short, erect mane, a tail furnished with a terminal tuft of hairs, and a tendency to a banded or striped, rather than a spotted arrangement in the colours.

The prohibition of the use of horses (see HORSE) to Israel, caused the ass to be held in higher estimation than it holds in our times. It was, at least down to the days of Solomon, the principal beast of burden. But we must not attribute this election wholly to the absence or scarcity of the horse, for in Western Asia the ass is still largely used for the saddle. Though inferior in dignity to the horse, he is still in his native regions a very superior animal to the poor, weather-beaten, stunted, half-starved beast of our commons. Chardin and others describe the Arabian ass as a really elegant creature. The coat is smooth and clean, the carriage is erect and proud; the limbs are clean, well-formed, and muscular, and are well thrown out in walking or galloping.

Asses of this Arab breed are used exclusively for the saddle, and are imported into Syria and Persia, where they are highly valued, especially by the mollahs or lawyers, the sheiks or religious teachers, and elderly persons of the opulent classes. They are fed and dressed with the same care as horses, the head-gear is highly ornamented, and the saddle is covered with a fine carpet. They are active, spirited, and yet sufficiently docile.

Other breeds are equally useful in the more humble labours of ploughing and carrying burdens.

White asses, distinguished not only by their colour, but by their stature and symmetry, are frequently seen in Western Asia, and are always more highly esteemed than those of more ordinary hue. The editor of the Pictorial Bible says, that these "are usually in every respect the finest of their species, and their owners certainly take more pride in them than in any other of their asses. They sell at a much higher price; and those hackney ass-men who make a livelihood by hiring out their asses to persons who want a ride, always expect better pay for the white ass than for any of the others." After describing their more highly ornamented trappings, he observes, "but above all, their white hides are fantastically streaked and spotted with the red stains of the henna plant, a barbarous kind of ornament which the Western Asiatics are fond of applying to their own beards and to the manes and tails of their white horses." Col. Hamilton Smith thinks that this red-spotted character is what is intended by the word אֲסוּדָה (tzahor), in Ju. v. 10, "Ye that ride on painted asses."

The constitution of the ass is formed for a dry rugged region, a rocky wilderness. Its hoofs are long, hollow beneath, with very sharp edges, a peculiarity which makes it sure-footed in ascending and descending steep mountain passes, where the flat hoof of the horse would be insecure. It prefers aromatic, dry, prickly herbs to the most succulent and tender grass; is fond of rolling in the dry dust; suffers but little from thirst or heat; drinks seldom and little; and seems to have no sensible perspiration, its skin being hard, tough and insensitive. All these characters suit the arid rocky wildernesses of Persia and Western Asia, the native country of this valuable animal.

Like all other quadrupeds, except the cloven-hoofed ruminants, the ass was unclean by the Mosaic law; and it is recorded as a proof of the extremity of famine to which the inhabitants of Samaria were reduced, during Benhadad's siege of that city, not only that ass's flesh was eaten, but that the head, a part which would yield but little flesh, was sold for fourscore pieces of silver, 2 Ki. vi. 25.

Notwithstanding what has been said above of the universality of the use of the ass for the saddle, the horse was employed in the Gentile nations for the carrying of warriors and persons of royal dignity. And from Solomon, who first broke the divine prohibition, downward, horses formed part of the royal state in Judah and Israel. Therefore it is adduced as an example of the lowliness and meekness of Him who was to come the Anointed King of Israel, that He should "ride upon an ass, and upon a colt, the foal of an ass," Zec. ix. 9.

An ass was chosen, in the sovereignty of God, to rebuke the covetous eagerness of Balaam for reward, human reason and speech being miraculously conferred on her for the occasion:—"The dumb ass, speaking with man's voice, forbid the madness of the prophet," 2 Pe. ii. 16. A solemn lesson, teaching us of how little value in God's sight are gifts, compared with obedient love.

It is supposed by some that the athôn was distinguished from the hamor not merely by sex (though the word is feminine), but by breed; that it was a superior race, obtained by crossing the domestic with the wild ass, perch. Thus the possession of athonah would always imply riches or dignity. The circumstance, however, that Job had before his calamity 500 of these athonah, and 1000 afterwards, seems to us to militate strongly against the supposition that these were the offspring of the perch, unless that shy and swift animal was far more abundant than it is now.

In Is. xxi. 7, "a chariot of asses" is seen by the watchman; and as it is in connection with the fall of Babylon, perhaps it was a mode of draught peculiar to the Medes. No pictorial representation exists, so far as we are aware, of asses yoked to a chariot, either in the monuments of ancient Egypt or of Assyria. But it is curious that among the tributary nations that swelled the army of Xerxes, Herodotus enumerates "Indians" (meaning by that term a people from the banks of the Indus, whom he mentions between the Medes and the Bactrians), as yoking wild asses (probably the ghoor-khur) to their war-chariots. (See the following article.) [P. H. G.]

ASS, WILD [אֲסוּס, perch; אֲסוּסִים, drod]. There seems good reason to believe that at least four wild species of Asinus exist in Western Asia, viz. the greater wild ass, ghoor-khur, or dziggetai (A. hemionus); the khur of Persia (A. hamar); the onager, koulan, or cross-barred wild ass (A. onager) of Tartary and Northern Persia; and a species recently described by M. Geoff. St. Hilaire, under the name of A. hemippus, from a specimen sent to the empress of the French from Egypt. It is intermediate between the ghoor-khur and the horse, agreeing with the former in colour and in the possession of a dorsal line, but of much smaller size. It is supposed to be a native of the Syrian desert.

Each of these is characterized by great fleetness, so that it is very difficult to overtake them even with the swiftest horses. Colonel Sykes says that a friend of his,

in his morning rides, was used to start a particular wild ass (probably of the first-named species), so frequently that it became familiarly known to him; he always gave chase to it; but though he piqued himself on being mounted on an extremely fleet Arabian horse, he never could come up with the animal. Sir Robert Ker Porter has graphically described his fruitless chase of the khur, when mounted on a "very swift Arab." The koulan has the same habits.

Colonel H. Smith, a high authority, considers the perch to be the ghoor-khur, and the drod to be the khur. If this be correct, we must suppose either that the koulan was unknown to the Hebrews, though it was well known to the Greeks, or—which is more likely—that it was confounded with the khur. The ghoor-khur is mouse-brown, with a broad dorsal stripe, but no cross stripe on the shoulders; the khur is of a light reddish colour, becoming gray beneath and behind, with neither stripe nor cross; the koulan is silvery white, with a coffee-coloured dorsal stripe, and a cross stripe over the shoulders.

The notices of these animals in the sacred Scriptures are—allusions to their indomitable love of freedom and hatred of restraint, Ge. xvi. 12, where Ishmael is described literally as "a wild-ass man," Job xxix. 6; xxxix. 5; to their self-will, Job xi. 12; Je. ii. 24; to their silence when their wants are satisfied, Job vi. 5; to their fondness for wild and lone places, Ps. civ. 11; Is. xxxii. 14; to their solitary habits, Ho. viii. 9; and to their custom of standing on elevated places, Je. xiv. 6.

It has been common to consider the domestic ass as the progeny of some one or other of the wild species, originally caught and subdued by the power of man, and trained in the course of generations to subjection and servitude; and this because it has been assumed, as if it were a self-evident truth, that man could have come into possession of the numerous animals which constitute so many valuable domestic servants, in no other way than by reducing them from a primeval condition of freedom to bondage. It is acknowledged that the wild types of many of our domestic creatures are either not to be found, or not to be satisfactorily identified; but a sort of necessary existence is demanded for them; and efforts are made to unite the domestic animals now with one, now with another, species which is known in an unsubdued state. Our neat cattle, sheep, goat, dog, and cat, are familiar examples of animals whose wild parentage is altogether unknown. In the case of the horse and of the ass, we have indeed wild as well as tame individuals existing at the same period; but it is quite as legitimate to assume that the former are the progeny of individuals which have emancipated themselves and have maintained their freedom, as that the latter are descended from captive parents—supposing, what is by no means proved, the specific identity of the wild and tame races.

To us, however, it seems highly probable that many animals were originally created in the condition which we call domestication, and in no other; and were from the very first given by God to man, as his humble companions and servants. Even in Eden the duty of man "to dress and keep" the garden, implies the use of implements; and still more does the command to "till the ground," which was imposed on him when he fell. But, as has been well shown, these implements could not have been of his own invention and manufacture, since the first would require the existence of ready-made implements to construct them; and therefore we are compelled to suppose, what, indeed, is entirely consonant with all we are taught of the condition of the newly created man—that such mechanical aids as were needed for the due performance of the duties imposed upon him, together with skill to use them, were bestowed on him from the gracious hands of his Creator. If this be a reasonable conclusion, it seems only a legitimate following up of the same process of reasoning, to presume that docile and subject animals were given him at the same time. If, for example, a plough was put into his hand, that a yoke of cattle accompanied it; if agricultural products were to be gathered, that an ass or two would be provided to carry the fruits of the earth; if the wool and the milk of the flock were to form an important portion of his dependence, and particularly if a lamb was appointed to be a frequent sacrifice, that a flock of sheep would be furnished for his care, and probably a dog to guard them from the wild beasts, now alienated from, and inimical to, man.

Accordingly, the very first picture of human life subsequent to the expulsion from Eden, which the Holy Spirit has drawn, presents us with this condition of things:—"Abel was a keeper of sheep," and the sacrifice of "the firstlings of his flock" was a regular act of worship.

To come to the subject of this article: the manner in which it is spoken of in the sacred Scripture, appears more favourable to the notion that the wild ass is an emancipated domestic ass, than that the latter is a reclaimed wild one. Jehovah himself, in the magnificent reproof of Job out of the whirlwind, asks, "Who hath sent out the wild ass (the perch) free? or who hath loosed the bands of the wild ass (the doad)?" It may be said that this is only a figurative way of presenting the condition of the creature; but certainly the words imply a state of servitude anterior to its freedom. The question, in whatever way it be decided, does not touch the other question, of the specific identity of certain wild and tame races. Whether, for example, the tame ass is specifically identical with the khur, does not depend on the relative priority of the conditions of servitude and freedom.

ASSH'UR, a son of Shem, from whom the name Assyria is derived, Ge. x. 11-22. (See ASSYRIA.)

ASSOS, or AS'SUS, a city of Mysia, in Asia Minor, on the Adramyttian Gulf, with the island Lesbos lying over against it. It stood on the height above the harbour, occupying a strong natural position, which was also well fortified by art; and the town appears to have been for long a flourishing and well-frequented sea-port. It occurs in the history of St. Paul's travels, when on his way from Greece to Jerusalem for the last time. His companions took ship at Troas, while he went on foot and joined them again at Assos, Ac. xx. 13, 14. The vessel, it would appear, had to touch at Assos, and as to reach it she had to sail round the promontory of Lectum. Paul took the straight route on foot from Troas to Assos, which was only about half the distance (20 Roman miles), which he could easily accomplish in the requisite time. There are still numerous remains of the ancient town, one of the most remarkable of which is what is called the Street of Tombs, extending to a great distance on the north-west of the city, and each tomb formed of one block of granite. These, and the other remains, consisting of strong walls, theatres, temples, &c., have been described by Fellows in his Asia Minor, p. 52. A stone found in its neighbourhood, called the Assian stone, was much used in ancient times for coffins, being remarkable for its flesh-consuming property. They were hence named sarcophagi, flesh-consumers, which came by and by to be applied to stone coffins generally. The property in the Assian stone is understood to have been derived from its limestone ingredients; but there was probably some exaggeration in the supposed power and rapidity with which it acted on the bodies committed to its keeping.

ASSYRIA, THE COUNTRY OR MONARCHY OF ASSYRIA, and the ASSYRIAN EMPIRE. Both, as well as the people, are designated in Hebrew Asshur, from Asshur, Shem's son; in the Vulgate it is rendered by Assur and Assyrii; by the Greeks Assyria (Ptolemy, vi. 1) and Aturia (Strabo, xvi. 507), Athuria (Dion. Cass. xviii. 26), being merely the dialectic exchange of s into t. Rich mentions Nimroud on the Tigris, between five and six hours north-east of Mosul, which the Turks "said was Al Athur, or Ashur, from which the whole country was denominated" (Residence in Kurdistan, ii. 129; Abu el Fedah). Among classical writers the words Assyria and Syria are frequently found interchanged (Strabo, xvi. c. i.), and some modern commentators have conjectured that this is likewise the case in Scripture (Hitzig, Begriff d. Kritik Alt. Test. p. 98, Heidelberg, 1831; Henderson on Isaiah, p. 173, London, 1840).

The lion was the emblematic symbol of the Assyrian empire, Da. vii. 4. The symbolic form of the bull guarding the entrances at the Ninevite palaces, according to some, was adopted by the king of Assyria in allusion to the name of the people: "For the bull is called achour and tour, following the dialects of the Semitic idiom, as Assyria, Aschour, and Aturia. The addition of the article before these words would produce Haschour or Hatour. Thus the goddess Hathor, borrowed by Egypt from Assyria, is represented under the form of a cow. This Hathor is the same as Venus; and the dove consecrated to this goddess in Syria and Cyprus, is called thur, like the bull or cow" (A. de Longperier, Notice des Antiq. Ass. Bab. Pers. et Heb. du Musée du Louvre, 3d edit. 1854).

The country or monarchy of Assyria, or Assyria Proper, was originally of but small extent, and had not, like Babylonia, any great natural frontiers to determine its limits, while the sites of the cities founded by Asshur are as yet uncertain. It is stated to have been "bounded on the north by Mount Niphates and part of Armenia; on the east by that part of Media which lies towards Mounts Chaboras and Zagros; on the south by Susiana, as well as part of Babylonia; and finally, on the west by the Tigris" (Chesney's Survey of Euphrates, i.; Ptolemy, vi. 1.; Pliny, Nat. Hist. v. 13.; Strabo, xvi. c. i.) It very nearly corresponds to the modern Kurdistan with a part of the pashalic of Mosul. Of Asshur's cities the site of Rehoboth has been shifted everywhere, but we learn from Chesney, that "on the right bank of the Euphrates, at the north-western extremity of the plain of Shinar, and 3½ miles south-west of the town of Mayadin, are extensive ruins, around a castle, still bearing the name of Rehoboth." The ruins of Kalah Shergat, on the right bank of the Tigris, have with great probability been identified with the ancient Calah (Ainsworth, Trans. Lond. Geog. Society, vol. ix.) Nimroud has been identified with Resen (Survey of Euphrat.; Jour. Roy. Geog. Society, ix. 35; and sequel of Rawlinson's Notes; Xenophon, Anab. b. iii.); and the site of Nineveh may now be spoken of with certainty. The conclusive identification of the sites of Erech, Accad, and Calneh, the frontier towns of Nimrod's kingdom, would mark the southern boundary of Assyria. Erech is believed to be the modern Warkah, the Orchoe of the Greeks (Fraser's Mesopotamia and Assyria, p. 115; Chesney; Rawlinson's Outline of Assyrian History, Trans. Roy. Soc. Lit. 2d series, vi. 1); Accad or Accur, supposed modern Akkerkuf (Ainsworth's Researches in Assyria); and Calneh is fixed by the concurrence of a great mass of authority, ancient and modern, at what was the ancient Ctesiphon, on the banks of the Tigris about 18 miles below Bagdad, the surrounding district being called by the Greeks Chalonitis. The site was afterwards occupied by El Madair. This site does not agree with that mentioned by Chesney, who identifies it with the modern Charchemish, supporting his conjecture by the note in Calmet that its name implied "last built town," or "border town."

Ptolemy divides Assyria proper into six provinces: Arrapachitis (from Arphaxad? Ge. x. 22-24, Vater on Genesis, i. 151) on the north; Calakine, or Calachene (Strabo), perhaps Chalack, 2KI. xvii. 6, on the south; Adiabene Chadyab, or Hadyab; Arbelitis, in which was Arbela, now Arbil, where Alexander defeated Darius; and south of this, Apolloniatis and Sittakene; the capital of the whole country being Nineveh, on the east bank of the Tigris. Mr. Ainsworth states (Researches in Assyria, Lond. 1838), that "Assyria, including Taurus, is distinguished into three districts; by its structure into a district of plutonic and metamorphic rocks, a district of sedentary formations, and a district of alluvial deposits; by configuration into a district of mountains, a district of stony or sandy places, and a district of low watery plains; by natural productions into a country of forests and fruit-trees, of olives, wine, corn, and pasturage, or of barren rocks; a country of mulberry, cotton, maize, tobacco, or of barren clay, sand, pebbly or rocky plains; and into a country of date trees, rice, and pasturage, or a land of saline plants. The vegetation of Taurus is remarkable for the abundance of trees, shrubs, and plants in the northern, and their comparative absence in the southern district." When Alexander the Great designed to build a fleet he was forced to use cypress brought from Assyria, and from the groves and parks, as there was a scarcity of timber in Babylonia (Arrian in Alex. lib. vii.; Strabo, xvi. 1, 12). "Besides the productions above enumerated, Kurdistan yields gall-nuts, gum-arabic, mastic, manna, madder, castor-oil, and various kinds of grain, pulse, and fruit. There are naphtha springs on the eastern shores of the Tigris. The animals of the mountain district include bears, panthers, wolves, lynxes, foxes, marmots, dormice, fallow and red deer, roebucks, antelopes, and goats. In the plains are found lions, tigers, hyenas, jerboas, wild boars, beavers, camels," &c. (Ainsworth); the sculptures also show us sheep, oxen, horses, dogs, hares, partridges, and pheasants. To the north is a mass of mountains with snowy peaks; on the west is the impetuous Tigris (Hiddekel, Ge. II. 14; Da. x. 4), across which, 28 miles by the river below Nineveh, is the celebrated dyke of solid masonry called Zikru-l-awáz. The stream when full rushes with great force over this obstruction: 7 miles lower down there is another dyke, Zikr Ismail, but in a dilapidated state. In its progress the Tigris receives from Assyria two mountain streams, the Great and Little Zab, the Sykos and Capros of the Greeks.

ASSYRIAN EMPIRE.—As the sovereigns of Assyria increased their possessions by conquest, the name of the parent country was given to each new acquisition, so that the limits of the empire varied at different periods; and even long after it was overthrown, the name was retained in Mesopotamia and Babylonia. Thus, Isaiah describes the Assyrians as beyond "the river" (Euphrates), ch. vi. 20. Nebuchadnezzar, though ruling at Babylonia, is termed king of Assyria, 2KI. xxii. 20; and Darius, king of Persia, is called king of Assyria, Ez. vi. 22. The empire under Tiglath Pileser comprehended not only Assyria proper, the mountains of Kurdistan, and the country between Kurdistan and the Caucasus, but likewise Media, Syria, and the northern part of Palestine. Shalmaneser added Israel, Sidon, Acre, and Cyprus to the empire. The Assyrian empire attained its greatest limits under the Chaldeo-Babylonian rule, in the time of Nebuchadnezzar, when it comprised all Western Asia as far as the Mediterranean and confines of Egypt. Evidences of the sway of the Assyrians still exist in the pillars, boundary tablets, and inscriptions at Mount Elwand (ancient Orontes); Behistun; the pass of Keli Shin; on the shores of Lake Van; at Nahr-al-keib, tablets with portrait of king (a cast of one in the British Museum); at Larnaka in Cyprus, tablet with portrait of the same king (the original in the museum at Berlin); in the desert between the Nile and the Red Sea; at Dash Tappeh in the plain of Mirgaudab; one on the banks of the Euphrates; some at Mel Amir; and the broken obelisk at Susa. Though many of the inscriptions are the chronicles of Median and Persian sovereigns, they still mark with certainty the extent of the preceding Assyrian empire.

History.—"Out of that land went forth Asshur, and builded Nineveh, and the city Rehoboth, and Calah, and Resen, between Nineveh and Calah: the same is a great city," Ge. x. 11-20 (Aspin, Anal. Un. Hist. i. 297). Of the sons of Shem Scripture has recorded nothing except of Asshur, but of him the record is of the highest importance, as it fixes the epoch of the kingdom of Assyria. It may be inferred from Genesis that Asshur had originally dwelt in the plains of Shinar, and that he led a company or tribe from Babel, travelling up the Tigris and settling in the land to which he gave his name, Assyria being the Greek derivative from the Hebrew Asahur. Some adopt the marginal reading, "he (Nimrod) went out into Assyria;" but the verse in Micah, ch. v. 6, strongly corroborates the received text, "And they shall waste the land of Assyria with the sword, and the land of Nimrod in the entrances thereof," a passage which implies distinct founders for the separate kingdoms of Nineveh and Babylon, which were both united in the Assyrian monarchy about the time of this prophecy. How long Asshur lived, or how far he established his power, are not to be learned from the sacred narrative.

After the foundation of the kingdoms of Nimrod and Asshur, we meet with no direct mention in Scripture of either Nineveh or its king for a period of 1500 years. Dr. Faber and other learned men are inclined to adopt the Samaritan text, which augments the time from the deluge to Abraham; this does not however affect the question of the nearly coeval foundation of the two kingdoms, but merely throws the date of their origin forward. In Genesis xiv. 1-4, Chedorlaomer, king of Elam (in the south of Persia), held five petty kings of Palestine in subjection during twelve years. He is mentioned as being in league with Amraphel, king of Shinar, who (Josephus, Antiq. lib. i. c. 9) was a commander in the Assyrian army, and likewise with Arioch, king of Ellasar, El-Asar—may not this be "the Assyrians"? It is probable that these kings were Assyrian satraps or viceroys, according to the subsequent Assyrian boast, "Are not my princes altogether kings?" Is. x. 8. Towards the close of the Mosaic age, we again meet with traces of Assyria as an independent and formidable state. Balaam the seer, addressing the Kenites, a tribe of highlanders east of the Jordan, took up this parable, "Strong is thy dwelling-place, and thou puttest thy nest in a rock. Nevertheless the Kenites shall be wasted, until Asshur shall carry thee away captive." And his subsequent parable of vengeance upon Assyria: "And ships shall come from the coast of Chittim, and shall afflict Asshur," Nu. xxiv. 21-24. We also find that shortly after the death of Joshua, the Israelites submitted to the arms of Chushan-rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia, which was then a separate government from Assyria, Ju. iii. 7-10, though Josephus calls him king of Assyria (Ant. v. 3, 2). Psalm lxxxiii. 8 says, "Assur also is joined with them" against Israel, but we have no other express mention of the Assyrian kings, until the reign of Jeroboam II. (825 B.C.), although we are not without allusions to the state of the kingdom during the latter part of this period, Ge. xv. 16; Ex. xxiii. 31; 1 Ki. iv. 21-24; Ch. xviii. 3; Ps. lxxii. 8. This terminates what may be styled the first historical period of the Assyrian empire according to Scripture. Before entering upon the second period, which is derived from Holy Writ, with some aid from profane historians, it is desirable to supply a brief history from the Greek and Armenian writers.

According to Scripture, Nineveh was founded by Asshur about 2230 B.C., but according to Diodorus Siculus, quoting Ctesias, it was founded 2183 B.C. (lib. ii. c. 1). Herodotus is silent upon this point, but Africanus, quoted by Syncellus, states that the foundation of the

Vol. I.

Assyrian monarchy took place 2284 B.C. The Armenian historian Eusebius places it 1340 years before the first Olympiad, or 2116 B.C. Æmilius Sura, quoted by Paterculus, says it was 2145 B.C. An extract from Polyhistor, found in the Armenian Chronicle, and believed to be an extract from Berosus, the ancient native historian, contains a table from the dynasties of the old Assyrian empire, assigning the date of each, and the computation of the whole gives the epoch 2317 B.C. as that of the foundation of the first monarchy. This date differs so immaterially from that of the Biblical chronology, that it would not be unreasonable to assume that Ninus may have been the great-grandson, or, at all events, no very remote descendant of Asshur. Abydenus, in the Armenian edition of Eusebius' Chronicle, places Ninus sixth in descent from Belus, the first king of the Assyrians; and the editor, in a note produces some passages from Moses Choronensis and others, to show that such was the general opinion among the Armenians (Cory's Fragments, p. 69). This account, which makes Ninus contemporary with Abraham (Cory, p. 36), the tenth generation from Shem (Petavius says Abraham was born in the twenty-fourth year of Semiramis' reign, lib. i. c. 2) perfectly accords with the duration of the Assyrian empire, which, it is generally agreed, did not exceed 1300 years from its rise to the fall of Sardanapalus, about 804 B.C., but which Eusebius says lasted 1460 years (Cory, p. 74). If we reckon backwards 1300 years, we shall find that the reign of Ninus commenced 140 years after Nimrod began to be mighty on earth. Some have inferred from the statement of Berosus that Ninus was the son of Nimrod; but independently of this the whole evidence of the Armenian chroniclers is highly corroborative of the hypothesis that Babylonia and Assyria were originally two distinct kingdoms, and it is likewise perfectly consistent with the authorities who ascribe the foundation of the Assyrian empire to Ninus. Asshur was the founder of the monarchy only of Assyria, but the beginning of the empire, Eze. xliii. 23, may be computed from his descendant Ninus, who was king of both Assyria and Babylonia, which were for the first time united in his reign.

Ninus confirmed the magnitude of his domination by continual possession until he had subdued the whole of the East. His last war was with Oxyartes or Zoroaster, king of the Bactrians (Justin, lib. i. c. 1), whom he at last conquered through the expeditions of Semiramis, wife of Menon (Diod. Sic. lib. ii. c. 1). Ninus subsequently married Semiramis, who succeeded to his throne. In the course of a reign of forty-two years (Africanus and Eusebius) this queen, the first on record, helped to consolidate the oldest empire named in history. Her son Ninyas was the next king of the empire, and has been identified with Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, Ge. xiv., 14, 5, 9; Is. x. 8; (Shuckford's Sac. and Prof. Hist. Con. b. vi.) He died after a reign of thirty-eight years, transmitting to his successors an empire so well constituted as to remain in the hands of a series of kings for thirty generations. Although we have no direct history of the acts of any of these sovereigns, beyond those sure indications of their rule afforded by the sculptures and inscriptions which have been found in Persia, Media, Armenia, Cœle-Syria, and Cyprus, the records of other nations furnish occasional gleams of information connected with Assyria.

Scripture tells us of Jacob's visit to his uncle Laban in Mesopotamia, Ge. xxix. 1-14, and of the servitude of the Israelites under Chushan-rishathaim, about 1409 B.C., Ju. iii. 1-9. Heykab, king of Armenia, after a protracted contest, subdued Amyntas, seventeenth king of Assyria; but his successor, Belochus, recovered his territory, and killed Heykab (Cory's Frag. p. 72, 73, 77). The most interesting revelations are likely to result from the readings of Egyptian monuments, some of which leave it beyond doubt that Mesopotamia was conquered, and siege laid to Nineveh and Babylon, by the Egyptians, between 1400 and 1300 B.C. (Birch's Observations on Obelisk of the At Meidan, and on the Tablet of Karnak, Trans. Roy. Soc. Lit. 2d series, vol. ii. p. 218, 317, 345; Lepeius Auswahl, t. xiv; Vyses' Journal, vol. iii.) The Egyptian monuments do not as yet furnish us with later data connected with Assyria, but it was under the reign of its early kings that Rameses the Great (Sesostris of the Greeks) pursued his conquests in the East far beyond Assyria. Plato makes the kingdom of Troy at the time of Priam, 1184 B.C., a dependant of the Assyrian empire (De Leg. lib. iii. 685; Rollin, vol. ii.); and Diodorus says (lib. ii. c. 2) that Teutamus, the twentieth from Ninyas, sent 20,000 troops and 200 chariots to the assistance of the Trojans, whose king, Priam, was a prince under the Assyrian empire. Herodotus says nothing of Assyria until he begins to relate how Media became a nation. Thus, he says, when speaking of an event which happened 711 B.C., that the Assyrians had ruled Upper Asia 520 years before that: (Clio, xc.)—a discrepancy from the statements of other writers, to be easily reconciled by the supposition that Ctesias dated from the earliest establishment of the monarchy, while Herodotus confines himself to the establishment of the great empire over Central Asia.

The historical period, properly so called, of Assyrian history begins with the fall of the first empire under Sardanapalus, whose true name was perhaps Asser-Hadan-Pul, syllables which we shall find used in many of the names of the later kings. His throne was overturned by the Medes, commanded by Arbaces, who made himself king of Assyria about B.C. 804. After the death of Arbaces the Mede, the Assyrians made themselves again independent. The first of the new line of kings was Pul, 1 Ch. v. 26, in whose reign Menahem, king of Israel, provoked a war with Assyria, B.C. 773. He conquered Tiphah or Thapsacus on the Euphrates, and put the inhabitants to death with great cruelty, 2 Ki. xv. 16. The following year Pul marched into Samaria, and the Israelites purchased a peace at the price of 1000 talents of silver. B.C. 753, Tiglath-Pileser, or Pul-Asser, the next king of Assyria, also found an excuse for invading Samaria. In the civil war between Israel and Judah, when the Israelites called to their help the king of Syria, whose capital was Damascus, Ahaz, king of Judah, sent a large sum of money to purchase the help of the Assyrians. Tiglath accordingly led an army against Syria, conquered Damascus, and slew Rezin the king.

He entirely vanquished the Israelites, and took from them the larger part of the kingdom. He then added to the Assyrian empire not only Syria, but Gilead and Naphtali, on the east of the Jordan, and Galilee to the north, leaving to the Israelites only the province of Samaria. He carried his captives to the farthest end of his own kingdom, the banks of the river Kir, which flows into the Caspian Sea. Ahaz, king of Judah, went in person to Damascus to pay homage to the Assyrian conqueror, 2 Ki. xv. 29; xvi. 6-10; 1 Ch. v. 26; 2 Ch. xxviii. 16. Shalmaneser, the next king of Assyria, B.C. 734, is also called Shalman by the prophet Hosea, and Enemessar by Tobit, ch. 1. 2. In the Canons of Syncellus and Ptolemy he is called Nabonassar (Cory, Anc. Frag. p. 78, 79). In the ninth year of his reign he led an army against Hoheba, king of Israel, which was now reduced within the limits of Samaria. At the end of three years he had wholly conquered this people, carrying away into captivity the chief men of the ten tribes. He placed them at Halah near Nineveh, at Habor on the river Gozan, and in some of the cities of the Medes, and settled Cutheans from Babylonia in their place, 2 Kt. xviii. 9-11; xvii. 3-6. He also conquered Sidon and Acre, and the island of Cyprus, Tyre alone holding out against a siege (Menander in Josephus, Antiq. x. 14, 2). Shalmaneser died before the removal of the Israelites was completed, and the prisoners were sent home as a present to his successor, Ho. x. a Sennacherib, called Jareb by Hosea, succeeded Shalmaneser (B.C. 720). Gesenius is disposed to identify him with the Sardanapalus who is said to have built the cities of Anchiale and Tarsus in Cilicia (Arrian, Exped. of Alex. ii. 5; Strabo, xiv. 4, 8). He completed the deportation of the Israelites, and then invaded Judea, in the fourteenth year of the reign of Hezekiah (B.C. 714). He marched without interruption through Galilee and Samaria, which were now provinces of Assyria, and entered the country of Benjamin at Aiath and Migron. He laid up his carriages at Michmash as he came upon the hill country around Jerusalem. The people fled at his approach, and all resistance seemed hopeless. While Sennacherib was besieging

Lachish in person, Hezekiah sent messengers to make terms of submission, and he had to drain his own treasury, and to borrow from that of the temple, to raise the tribute exacted, 300 talents of silver and 30 talents of gold, i.e. about £266,850,¹ 2 Kt. viii. 14; 2 Ch xxxii. In the meantime Sennacherib sent part of his army, under the command of Tartan, 2 Kt. xviii. 17, southward, against the cities of the south. Tartan endeavoured to persuade the people of Jerusalem to open the gates, but made no attempt to storm the city. He then moved forward, laid siege to Azotus, and soon captured the place, Is. xxxvi. xxxvii. When Sennacherib had made terms with Hezekiah, he led his army against Tirhakah the Ethiopian, king of Egypt, who was marching to the relief of the Jews. At Pelusium, the frontier town on the most easterly branch of the Nile, he was met by an Egyptian army under the command of Sethos, a priest of Memphis. But before any battle took place, the Assyrian host was cut off by that signal catastrophe which is described with such beautiful simplicity by Isaiah, ch. xxxvii. 36; 2 Kt. xix. 36; Herod

ii. 141. Sennacherib himself escaped alive, and returned home "and dwelt at" Nineveh (Gesenius' Comment on Isaiah, p. 999). Merodach Baladan, who was then reigning at Babylon, may have felt himself too strong to be treated as the vassal of Nineveh; he made a treaty with Hezekiah. This probably provoked Sennacherib, and caused the latter years of his reign to be employed in wars with the Babylonians (A. Polyhistor in Euseb. Ar. Chron.; Cory's Fragments, p. 61); till at length, as he was worshipping in the temple of the Assyrian god Nisroch, he was murdered by his sons Adrammelech and Sharezer. They escaped from punishment over the northern frontier into Armenia, which had been able to hold itself independent of Assyria, and Eсарhaddon his son reigned in his stead, 1s. xxxvii. 37, 38; 2 Kl. xix. 37. Sennacherib had reigned for perhaps thirty-seven years over Assyria, Media, Galilee, and Samaria, and probably held Babylon as a dependent province, governed by a tributary monarch. Isaiah, ch. xx. 1, mentions a king of Assyria named Sargon, who is identified by some with Sennacherib, and by others, either with Shalmaneser (Von Gumpach), or with Eсарhaddon (Calmet, Sharpe). Gesenius (Comment on Isa.) is of opinion that Sargon was a king of Assyria, who succeeded Shalmaneser. M. Longperier (Notice des Antiquités Assyriennes, &c., du Musée de Louvre, 3d edition, 1854) states that the principal inscription on one of the bulls at Khorsabad commences with the royal formula, "Sargon, king of the country of Assur." There are cylinders bearing the name of Sargon, and Oppert calls him the father of Sennacherib (Chron. of Assyrians). The date of Eсарhaddon's gaining the throne of Nineveh is uncertain; but the time that he became king of Babylon is better known, for in the year B.C. 680 he put an end to a line of kings who had reigned there for sixty-seven years (Ptolemy's Canon, and that of Synceollus in Cory's Frag. p. 80, 81, 83). Towards the end of his reign he sent an army against Manasseh, king of Judah, and carried him prisoner to Babylon, but after a short time he released him, and again seated him on the throne of Jerusalem, 2 Ch. xxxiii. 11. Eсарhaddon is the Sarchedon of Tobit, ch. i. 21, the Asaradinus of Ptolemy's Canon, and is supposed to be the Assnapper of Ezra, ch. iv. 2, 10. There are cylinders and fragments of Eсарhaddon, and likewise of Sennacherib in the British Museum (Rawlinson, London Monthly Review, No. 1). Sardocheus, the next king (B.C. 667), reigned over Nineveh, Babylon, and Israel for twenty years; and over Media, also, till that country revolted, remaining independent for one hundred and twenty-eight years. Chyniladan (B.C. 647) reigned twenty-two years; but during this reign Assyria was still further weakened by the loss of Babylon, which then fell into the hands of the Chaldeans. In 625 B.C. their leader, Nabopolassar (Nebuchodonosor of Judith), was king of that city, and of the lower half of the valley of the Tigris and Euphrates. Two years later he marched northward against Nineveh, which he stormed and sacked, Tobit. xiv. 4, 10, 15; Na. i. 8-14; ii. 3, 8, 9; iii. 13-15. On the conquest of Nineveh by Nabopolassar the city was by no means destroyed; but the empire of Assyria fell, and merged in that of Babylonia. It is likely that the book of Jonah was written about this time. The Jews had expected that Nineveh, the great enemy of their nation, would have been for ever and wholly destroyed; but Assyria is no longer unfriendly to them, and the purport of the book of Jonah is to explain the justice of God's government in sparing that city, which had repented of its enmity, and should now find favour in their sight. Josiah, king of Judah, finds a friend and protector in Nabopolassar, king of Assyria. During the civil wars between Nineveh and Babylon, Assyria was yet further weakened by an inroad of the Scythians, who first came upon the Medes, and wholly routed the army which Cyaxares the king sent against them. They then crossed Mesopotamia, laying waste the country as they passed (Herodotus, i. 103). At this period Necho, king of Egypt, pushed his arms eastward, claiming authority over Samaria and Judea; but Josiah, king of Judah, was true to the Babylonians. The Egyptians were victorious—Josiah was slain, and the whole of Palestine fell into the power of the Egyptians, who set up a new king over Judah. A few years later, however, Nabopolassar again reduced the Jews to their former state of vassalage under Babylon, 2 Kl. xiii. 22. Nabopolassar was now old, and his son Nebuchadnezzar (Cylinders) commanded for him as general, carrying on the war against the Egyptians on the debateable ground of Palestine. After three years Necho again entered the country, and marched as far as Carchemish, on the Euphrates, where he was totally defeated by Nebuchadnezzar, 2 Kl. xxv. 1; 2 Ch. xxxv. 20; xxxvi. 1; Berosus in Josephus. By this battle the Babylonians regained their power over Jerusalem, and drove the Egyptians out of the country. Nebuchadnezzar carried the Jewish nobles captive to Babylon, and Judea remained a province of that monarchy. Nebuchadnezzar succeeded his father B.C. 605, and fixed his seat of government at Babylon. Jerusalem twice rebelled, but he reduced it to obedience, although, on the second rebellion, Hophra, king of Egypt, came to aid the Jews. Nebuchadnezzar defeated the Egyptians, and deprived them of every possession that they had held in Palestine, Arabia, or the island of Cyprus.

After the death of Nebuchadnezzar, B.C. 562, Evil-Merodach, Nergal-sarezer, of whom there is one cylinder at Trinity College, Cambridge, Laboussardochus (Oppert, Chron. Ass. et Bab.), and Nabonidas, the latest king of whom we have cylinders (Rawlinson, London Monthly Review, No. 1, 1857), reigned over Babylon, and held Nineveh; but the Median power was now rising, and Cyrus, at the head of the united armies of Media and Persia, conquered Babylon and put an end to the monarchy. After a few years Cyrus united the kingdoms of Media and Persia, by right of inheritance—thus, B.C. 536, adding to the land of his birth the whole of the possessions which had been held by Sennacherib, and more than those of Nebuchadnezzar.

When the cuneiform shall have been more certainly read, further particulars of Assyrian history may be obtained, especially with regard to the kings who built the palaces of Nineveh. The sculptures that have been discovered, which appeal so directly to the understanding through the universal language of art, also throw an important light on the history, and manners and customs of the people; while the inscribed tablets or pillars (see article TABLETS) set up at various places, furnish indisputable data as to the boundaries of the empire.

The government of Assyria was strictly despotic, and the monarch was especially styled "the great king," 2 Kl. xviii. 9; 1s. xxxvi. 4. He was entirely surrounded by the numerous officers of his household, who were chiefly eunuchs, and whose portraits and relative duties have been handed down to us in the Ninevite sculptures. The governors of provinces and towns, Da. i. 6; iii. 2 (see GOVERNORS), were apparently powerful princes. On the sculptures the great king is frequently seen in conference with a richly dressed bearded officer, who would seem to be of nearly equal rank with the king himself. The early religion of the Assyrians was a symbolic worship of the heavenly bodies. This gradually degenerated until numerous gods were included in the worship. Scripture mentions Nisroch, Bel, Nebo, Anammelech, Adrammelech, Tartak, Nibhaz, &c., &c. (Gesenius on Isaiah); and the sculptures likewise show us—Dagon, Ilus, Baal (which see), and many others.

Herodotus supplies many particulars relating to the government and manners and customs of the Assyrians (i. 192-201). In addition to those he details, Strabo describes the mode of disposing of young women in marriage; and likewise mentions three tribunals, one consisting of persons past military service, another of nobles, and a third of old men, besides another appointed by the king. "It was the business of the latter to dispose of the virgins in marriage, and to determine causes respecting adultery; of another, to decide those relative to theft; and of the third, those of assault and violence" (b. xvi. c. i. 20). It is a curious subject for remark and speculation, that the Assyrian remains do not disclose any representations of funeral ceremonies, or indications of respect for the dead—in this, so strongly contrasted with Egyptian monuments, on which funeral subjects are so conspicuous, and evidences of veneration for the dead are so universal. Connected with this subject, it is singular that there should be no instances of sepulture in Assyrian mounds; but Babylonia is full of cemeteries, being apparently the burial ground of Assyria (T. K. Loftus, Travels in Chaldaea, p. 198).

The tract of country which formed Assyria proper is now under the nominal rule of the Porte; some of the people are stationary in villages, while others are nomadic. They profess the faith of Islam, and are of the Sunee sect. The Christian population is scattered over the whole country, but is most numerous in the north: it includes Chaldeans, Nestorians, Syrians, Armenians, &c.

[For accounts of these, and of the country and people of the present day, see Grant's Nestorians, Lond. 1841; Ainsworth's Travels and Researches in Asia Minor, Mesopotamia, &c., Lond. 1842; Layard's Nineveh and its Remains; Badger's Nestorians and their Rituals; Journal of Sacred Literature, vol. iv. p. 373; Perkin's Residence in Persia, 1843; Sharpe's Historic Notes, Lond. 1854; Oppert's Chronologie des Assyriens et des Babyloniens, Paris, 1857.] [J. ASTAROTH, ASTARTE. See ASHTAROTH.

ASTROLOGY. See DIVINATION.

ATAROTH [crowns], occurs, singly or in composition with some other word, as the name of various places in Scripture. There was an Ataroth on the borders of Ephraim, Jos. xvi. 2, 7. Another in the tribe of Gad beyond the Jordan, Nu xxxii. 3, 34; also an Ataroth-Shophan in the same tribe, ch. xxxii. 35, if not the same with that of the preceding verse; and an Ataroth-beth-Joab in the tribe of Judah, 1 Ch. ii. 54. Nothing remarkable is recorded of any of them.

ATHALIAH [afflicted of Jehovah], a daughter of Ahab the infamous king of Israel, and most likely also, though it is not expressly stated, of his still more infamous wife Jezebel. The name was not improbably imposed as a memorial of those severe and, as they would doubtless reckon them, harsh judgments which were inflicted on them, at the instance of Elijah, by the God of Israel. In 2 Ch. xxii. 6, Athaliah is called the daughter of Omri, evidently meaning a daughter of that house of which Omri was the founder and head; for in ch. xxi. 6, of the same book, she is expressly named the daughter of Ahab, the son of Omri. She became the wife of Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah—an alliance that proved the source of incalculable evils to the house of David, and was the bitter fruit of that improper intimacy which Jehoshaphat had contracted with the idolatrous king of Israel. Jehoshaphat himself had maintained the intimacy as a mere matter of policy, but had personally kept aloof from the abominations patronized by the house of Ahab. It was otherwise, however, with his son; he came into contact with the evil, while his mind was still in the susceptibility of youth, and had been but imperfectly fortified with right principle. Jehoram therefore, as might have been expected, "walked in the way of the kings of Israel, as did the house of Ahab, for he had the daughter of Ahab to wife," 2 Ch. xxi. 6. Athaliah, it is evident, inherited much of the imperious will, as well as the depraved moral sense of her mother Jezebel, and exercised a disastrous sway, first over her own husband, then, after his untimely death, over her son Ahaziah, who speedily perished, along with his uncle Jehoram, king of Israel, by the hand of Jehu.

And now, finding the way open to her godless ambition, she planned the diabolical scheme of destroying the whole male children of the seed-royal, that she might have the undisputed management of the kingdom. The design was defeated by the concealment of the infant son of the deceased monarch Ahaziah; and the tidings of his preservation having been communicated to Jehoiada the high-priest, measures were concerted for the seizure of Athaliah, which were successfully executed in the seventh year after Ahaziah's death. Athaliah rushed from the courts of the temple shouting "Treason!" when she saw a multitude assembled there to do the work of vengeance; but she found none to help her in her time of need; and, after having been hurried forth beyond the sacred precincts of the temple, she was summarily despatched by the armed men provided for the occasion, 2 Ch. xiii. Her own measure was thus meted back to her; she had been guilty of foul treason against the God of heaven, and had shed much blood to carry out her wayward, self-exalting projects; and, in turn, her own blood was shed by those who conceived treason against her, only because it was necessary to vindicate their fealty to Jehovah.

ATHENS, the capital of Attica, and the most celebrated city of ancient Greece. It was originally called Cecropia, from Cecrops, an Egyptian, its reputed founder; but in the time of Erectheus or Erecthonius, one of his successors, who introduced the worship of Athena or Minerva, it lost its original name, and acquired that of Ἀθήναι, Athens, after the goddess to whose worship it was principally dedicated.

History.—The history of Athens carries us back to the dim ages of fabulous tradition. The original city appears to have been confined to the Acropolis or citadel, on which Erectheus is said to have dedicated a temple to Athena, in which was preserved the olive-wood statue of the goddess, the most ancient and the most sacred object of the kind in all Athens. As we emerge from the mists of mythology, the name of Theseus, the national hero, meets us, by whom the twelve independent districts into which Cecrops had divided Attica were united into one political body, and the whole legislative and judicial power concentrated at Athens. This measure must have been followed by an increase of population; and accordingly Homer speaks of Athens as a place of some importance. A tradition represents a portion of the wandering Pelasgic race as having fortified the Acropolis, and obtained a settlement on the northern side of the rock. They were expelled for conspiracy, but the northern wall retained their name, and the gloomy spot under the precipice, once their abode, was regarded by the Athenians with feelings of superstitious dread. Between the Trojan war and the age of Peisistratus (B.C. 560–514) a chasm in the history intervenes: the city must have extended itself gradually from the Acropolis to the surrounding plain, but the first authentic attempt to embellish it is ascribed to the enlightened and munificent usurper just named, and his sons. At this time the foundations of the temples of Apollo Pythius and of Olympian Jupiter, the latter the largest structure of the kind in the world, together with those of the Dionysiac theatre, on the south-eastern slope of the Acropolis, were laid. At the invasion of Xerxes the city was reduced to ashes (B.C. 480); but after the tempest had passed, it rose from its ruins with increased magnificence. A succession of eminent men, as distinguished for their political sagacity as for their splendid taste in the arts, presided over the councils of the republic, under whose auspices it not only attained the greatest national prosperity, but became the chosen home of poetry, painting, sculpture, and architecture. The sagacity of Themistocles planned a system of fortifications, of which, however, he lived only to complete that portion which surrounded the city, consisting of a wall the circumference of which was 60 stadia, or about 7½ miles. His plans were carried out by Pericles, who, by the celebrated Long Walls, extending to the sea, connected Athens with its principal port of Piræus. Soon afterwards the promontory containing the harbours of the Piræus and Munychia was similarly fortified, and the wall surrounding it was connected with those just mentioned, which led from Athens. Thus, on the completion of these great works, Athens may be said to have consisted of two circular cities, the town itself, and the Piræus, connected by a street, the space between the Long Walls, about 4½ miles in length, and 550 feet in width; the circumference of the whole being about 174 stadia, or 19 miles. We are not, however, to suppose that the whole of this large area was built upon; much of it was taken up by the public buildings which everywhere abounded, and by the fortifications along the walls and in the Piræus. At its most flourishing period Athens contained, according to Xenophon, more than 10,000 houses, and probably a population, including the inhabitants of Piræus, Munychia, and Phalerum, of about 190,000, or a third of the whole population of Attica; of these, however, by far the greater proportion consisted of slaves. The splendid administration of Pericles was also marked by the erection of those masterpieces of architecture and sculpture which have been the envy and the admiration of the world. Cimon had built the temple of Theseus, the most perfect of the remaining monuments of Athens, and the celebrated Stoa Poecile, a portico adorned with paintings by the first artists of the age, and at his own expense had planted the Academy and adorned the Agora; and now on the Acropolis, under the direction of Phidias, and the architects Callicrates and Ictinus, rose the Parthenon, or temple of Minerva, the most splendid effort of Greek genius; the new Erechtheum; the gigantic bronze statue of Minerva Promachus, the work of Phidias, which with its pedestal measured 70 feet in height, and the crest of whose helmet could be seen towering above the Parthenon by the mariner as soon as, approaching Athens, he doubled Cape Sunium; the Propylæa, at once an entrance and a defence to the classic ground within; and countless other treasures of art, which made this spot the most renowned in all Greece. The Peloponnesian war put a stop to the work of architectural decoration: it was resumed under Lycurgus, after the expulsion of the thirty tyrants, but the altered fortunes of the republic seem to have affected the national genius, which, in the fine arts at least, no longer developed itself with the marvellous luxuriance which characterized a former age. A temporary recovery of political influence, after Conon's victory at Cnidæ, was followed by a complete prostration under the Macedonian power at the fatal battle of Cheronea (B.C. 338), which crushed the liberties of Athens and of Greece. Thenceforward Athens was indebted to foreigners for whatever embellishments were added to the city. It is but just to her conquerors to acknowledge that they for the most part respected her ancient renown, and, to use Cæsar's noble expression after the battle of Pharsalia, "spared the living for the sake of the dead." On two occasions only did she suffer materially from the wars in which Greece was engaged. Exasperated by its various efforts to throw off the Macedonian yoke, Philip, the last king of the name, invaded Attica, and though he could make no impression on the walls of the city, he revenged himself by destroying the sepulchres and temples in the suburbs, and laying waste the surrounding country. A still heavier calamity followed when the ruthless Sulla appeared before Athens with his victorious eagles (B.C. 86), and gaining an entrance into the town by an unguarded path, speedily became master of it, and signaled his conquest by defacing the temples and statues, and destroying the Long Walls, and the fortifications of the city and of the Piræus. From this blow the maritime power of Athens never recovered; but under the emperors the city regained some measure of its ancient external splendour. It became the fashion with her Roman conquerors to connect their names with Athens by some lasting memorial. Julius Cæsar and Augustus contributed to the erection of the portico of Athena Archegetes, which still exists; Hadrian completed the temple of Olympian Zeus, 700 years after its foundation; and under the Antonines, when Pausanias visited the city, it presented a magnificent spectacle. Her buildings retained their splendour till after the third century of the Christian era, when they began gradually to decay, owing partly to the want of funds to keep them in repair, and partly to the conversion of the temples into Christian churches. Paganism, however, long lingered at Athens; as long, indeed, as the schools of philosophy continued to exist, that is, until the middle of the sixth century. But a terrible visitation was impending, which inflicted greater injury than either time or Greek and Roman conquerors had been were reduced to heaps of ruins, and little remained of the former Athens but the imperishable renown. After this blow Athens sunk into insignificance, and became the prey of successive spoilers, until it came into possession of the Turks, A.D. 1445. Some of the most splendid buildings remained in a state of tolerable preservation till the fatal siege in 1687 by the Venetians, when irreparable injury was inflicted on the edifices of the Acropolis by the cannon and mortars of the besieging army. "A few years before the siege, when Wheler, Spon, and De Nointet visited Athens, the Propylæa still preserved its pediment; the temple of Victory Aterus was complete; the Parthenon was perfect, with the exception of the roof, and of the central figures in the eastern, and of two or three in the western pediment; the Erechtheum was so little injured that it was used as the harem of a Turkish house; and there were still some remains of buildings and statues on the southern side of the Parthenon."—(Leake, Topography, i. 86.) The Temple of Victory was entirely destroyed, and the Parthenon, besides being injured by the shells, was reduced to ruin by the explosion of a powder magazine, which, according to their usual practice, the Turks had deposited in the temple. All that was left standing was the western extremity, with part of the opisthodomus, and a few of the lateral columns. On regaining possession of the city, the Turks, to the utmost of their power, completed the work of destruction, mutilating or burning lime the fragments of the overthrown edifices. In 1812 the population of Athens was about 12,000; but during the revolutionary war it became diminished, and no improvement took place, until in 1834 it was declared the capital of the new kingdom of Greece. Since that time some progress has been made in restoring the city, and the excavations necessary for this purpose have brought to light many precious remains of antiquity.

These works are still proceeding, and we may hope that the restoration of tranquillity will be favourable not only to the internal prosperity of the country, but to the illustration of its topography and antiquities.

Situation and Topography.

—Athens lies in a plain of no great extent, which is surrounded by mountains on all sides except the south, where it lies open to the sea. Its limits are determined by the mountain ranges of Parnes and Ægaleos on the north-west and west, and of Pentelicus and Hymettus on the north-east and south-east. The plain is diversified towards the centre by a cluster of rocky protuberances, the most prominent of which either formed part of the ancient city, or were grouped around it. On the north-east rises the conical peak of Mount Lycabettus, now called the hill of St. George, which stood beyond the walls, in a position somewhat resembling that of Arthur's Seat at Edinburgh. About a mile from it, to the south-west, there are four prominences, all of which were within the city.

able to effect. The Goths made their appearance in the reign of Valerian, in Northern Greece; and though for a time the danger was averted, it was but for a time, and in A.D. 398 the fierce Alaric, after ravaging the rest of Greece, fell with barbarian ferocity upon Athens, and gave the city up to destruction. Its treasures of art were pillaged, its magnificent structures were reduced to heaps of ruins, and little remained of the former Athens but the imperishable renown. After this blow Athens sunk into insignificance, and became the prey of successive spoilers, until it came into possession of the Turks, A.D. 1445. Some of the most splendid buildings remained in a state of tolerable preservation till the fatal siege in 1687 by the Venetians, when irreparable injury was inflicted on the edifices of the Acropolis by the cannon and mortars of the besieging army. "A few years before the siege, when Wheler, Spon, and De Nointet visited Athens, the Propylæa still preserved its pediment; the temple of Victory Aterus was complete; the Parthenon was perfect, with the exception of the roof, and of the central figures in the eastern, and of two or three in the western pediment; the Erechtheum was so little injured that it was used as the harem of a Turkish house; and there were still some remains of buildings and statues on the southern side of the Parthenon."—(Leake, Topography, i. 86.) The Temple of Victory was entirely destroyed, and the Parthenon, besides being injured by the shells, was reduced to ruin by the explosion of a powder magazine, which, according to their usual practice, the Turks had deposited in the temple. All that was left standing was the western extremity, with part of the opisthodomus, and a few of the lateral columns. On regaining possession of the city, the Turks, to the utmost of their power, completed the work of destruction, mutilating or burning lime the fragments of the overthrown edifices. In 1812 the population of Athens was about 12,000; but during the revolutionary war it became diminished, and no improvement took place, until in 1834 it was declared the capital of the new kingdom of Greece. Since that time some progress has been made in restoring the city, and the excavations necessary for this purpose have brought to light many precious remains of antiquity.

Of these the first was the Acropolis, at once the citadel, the museum, and the treasury of Athens; an oblong craggy rock, of about 1000 feet in length, by 500 in breadth, terminating abruptly in precipices on every side except the west, where alone it was accessible. Separated from the western end of the Acropolis by a hollow which formed the communication between the northern and southern parts of the city, rises a rocky height, the Areiopagus or Mars' Hill, from the summit of which St. Paul addressed his Athenian audience. To the south-west lie the hills of the Pnyx, on which the assemblies of the people were held, and of the Museum. Two streams on opposite sides of the city flow south-wards, but are lost in the plain before they reach the sea; that on the east, the Ilissus, makes a bend and passes the city in a south-west direction; that on the west, the Cephissus, traverses a long line of dark olive-groves, which winds like a river through the vale, and forms a striking object, from the almost total absence of other vegetation. From the Acropolis, at about five miles' distance, could be seen the Saronic Gulf, now the Gulf of CEGINA, with the harbours of Athens, the Phalerum, and Piræus. The climate was celebrated for its salubrity and beauty. Such was the transparent clearness of the atmosphere, that time seemed to have no effect upon the edifices with which the city was adorned, which, in the time of Pausanias, about A.D. 173, still retained the original beauty of the Pentelic marble of which they were constructed. From the same cause the citizens passed much of their time, and the great public assemblies, whether for business or pleasure, took place, in the open air.

The general appearance of Athens in her palmy days was to a stranger not very inviting. The streets were narrow and crooked, the houses mean, and the town but ill supplied with water. It was not until a later age, when public spirit was on the wane, that private houses began to vie in magnificence with the public edifices. In these latter consisted the real glory of Athens. We shall now request the reader to accompany us in a short expedition through the city, as it may be supposed to have presented itself to a traveller about the middle of the first century of the Christian era.

Ascending from the Piræus along the carriage road which lay between the ruins of the Long Walls, he would enter the city by the Peiraic gate, which stood between the hills of the Pnyx and the Museum. On the sloping ground of the former he would behold the place where the most celebrated orators harangued the most refined audience of antiquity; a semicircle, the radius of which varied from 80 to 80 yards, and the chord of which was formed by a line of rock vertically hewn, so as to present to the spectator the appearance of a wall. At the middle point of this wall a rectangular stone jutted out, the celebrated Bema, from which the speakers addressed the people in the area below them. On this rostrum stood Solon, Aristides, Themistocles, Pericles, and Demosthenes. The stone, together with the steps by which the speakers mounted it, and some remains of seats hewn in the solid rock, are still visible. On the opposite side of the road is the eminence of the Museum, so called from the poet MUSEUS, who is supposed to have been buried there. At a later period its summit was crowned with a building called the monument of Philopappus, who, after being consul at Rome in the reign of Trajan, retired to Athens to spend the remainder of his days in that city. Continuing our course along a street of colonnades, before which stood brazen images of illustrious men, we should come to the Agora, or market-place, in a quarter of the city called Ceramicus, probably from some ancient potteries that once were worked there. Here our attention would be arrested by the Stoa Basileius, or Royal Colonnade, where the archon held his court; the Stoa Eleutherius, containing paintings of the gods, of Theseus, of the People, and of the battle of Mantinea; the altar of the twelve gods; the Metroon, a temple dedicated to the mother of the gods; the Tholus, a circular building, containing silver images of the gods, where the Prytanes took their meals and offered sacrifice; the statues of the Eponymi, or deified heroes, who gave names to the Athenian tribes; the temple of Mars, surrounded with the statues of Hercules, Theseus, Apollo, and Pindar; at a short distance, on the ascent to the Acropolis, the statues of Harmodius and Aristogeiton; and the temple of Venus, containing a statue of the goddess in Parian marble, executed by Phidias. Here too stood the celebrated Stoa Pæcile, so called from the paintings with which it was decorated, representing scenes from the mythical period, and from later Athenian history. In this portico Zeno opened the school of philosophy, called from this circumstance the Stoic, which exercised so important an influence both in Greece and Rome. Passing on northwards towards the gate called Dipylum, we arrive at the temple of Theseus, built about B.C. 465, to receive the bones of this hero, which had been brought for that purpose from Scyros to Athens by Cimon. Its architecture was of the Doric order. The length of this building was about 104 feet, its breadth about 45; and 34 columns, 13 on each side, and 4 at each front, surrounded it. In sanctity it was not inferior to the Parthenon; and its sacred inclosure was so large as occasionally to serve as a place of military assembly. The frieze was covered with sculptures in the highest style of Grecian art, while the interior was decorated with paintings commemorating the achievements of Theseus. This temple is the best preserved of all the ancient edifices of Athens. For many centuries it was used as a Christian church, dedicated to St. George, and is now the national museum of Athens. Retracing our steps southwards, we reach the Areiopagus, already described as lying to the north-west of the Acropolis; it derived its name from the tradition that Ares was here tried by the assembled gods for the murder of the son of Poseidon. On this hill sat the famous council called the Upper, to distinguish it from the Council of Five Hundred, which assembled in another place. Sixteen steps cut in the rock, and still visible, lead up the hill, and terminate in a bench, forming three sides of a square; on this the judges sat when engaged in their official functions. Close underneath a deep fissure in the rock leads to a gloomy cavern, the fabled sanctuary of the Eumenides or Furies—a name never pronounced by the Athenians without a feeling of superstitious fear. At the foot of the hill, on the north-eastern side, the ruins of a small church, dedicated to Dionysius the Areiopagite, have been discovered. Leaving the Areiopagus, we should ascend, by a road which led from the Agora, paved with Pentelic marble, the western side of the Acropolis, and find ourselves confronted by one of the greatest productions of the age of Pericles, the Propylæa, or gateway through which the citadel was entered. At this place the rock is but about 168 feet in width, and the architects conceived the bold design wings, which projected 32 feet in front of the central colonnade. Once a year, through the central door, the magnificent procession of the Panathenæa passed, bearing the peplus, or sacred robe, to the statue of Athena Polias in the Erechtheum. Passing within the Propylæa we are introduced to a scene of unrivalled splendour, the whole surface of the rock being covered with the most precious monuments of art.

The number of statues in particular was prodigious. Our space will only permit us to notice some of the principal structures. A little to the left stood the colossal bronze statue of Athena Promachus, while to the right, on the highest part of the platform, might be seen the Parthenon, the most perfect specimen of Greek architecture. This renowned edifice was of the Doric order, and built entirely of Pentelic marble. It measured about 228 feet in length, by 102 feet in breadth, and 66 feet in height. Its peristyle consisted of eight Doric columns on each front, and seventeen on each side, these columns being 6 feet 2 inches at the base, and 34 feet in height. Within these, at either end, a second range of columns of 5½ feet diameter extended, forming a vestibule to the door. The whole building was adorned within and without with exquisite sculptures from the hand of Phidias, or artists under his direction; and in the eastern portion of the cella was placed the famous chryselephantine, or ivory and gold statue of Athena, also the work of Phidias, which had but one rival in Greece, a statue of Jupiter Olympius, of similar materials, and by the same master. It was ingeniously contrived that the gold, which is said to have been 40 talents in weight, could be removed and replaced at pleasure. The Parthenon was converted into a Christian church, dedicated to the holy Virgin.

Under the Turks it became a mosque, and, with the exception of the roof, continued tolerably perfect until 1687, when, as has been related, it was nearly destroyed by the Venetians. Many of its finest sculptures were at the beginning of this century removed to England by Lord Elgin, and are now deposited in the British Museum. Opposite to the Parthenon, on the northern side of the Acropolis, stood the Erechtheum, or temple of Erechtheus, who seems to have been the same with the god Poseidon, one of the most ancient and venerated structures of Athens. It contained the statue of Athena Polias, said to have fallen from heaven; the sacred olive-tree which Athena caused to spring of filling up the whole space with a building which should at once fortify and adorn the citadel. The central portion consisted of two porticos, one looking towards the city, the other towards the interior, divided by a wall pierced by five doors, by which the Acropolis was entered. These porticos consisted of six fluted Doric columns, 29 feet in height, behind which rose two rows of slender Ionic pillars, supporting a roof of solid marble beams. The sides were occupied by two from the earth in her contest with Poseidon for the possession of Athens; and the salt well which Poseidon produced by the stroke of his trident. The Erechtheum, unlike the other Grecian temples, which were usually simple oblongs with two porticos, one at either end, was almost cruciform in appearance, possessing at the western end two porticos which projected north and south from the main building, that on the northern side consisting of six Ionic columns, four in the front, and one on either flank—that on the southern, of a roof supported by six caryatides, or female figures clothed in long draperies. The Ionic columns and four of the caryatides are still standing; the fifth, lately discovered, has been restored to its place, and the sixth is in the British Museum. A part of the building, from the tradition that Cecrops was buried there, was called the Cecropium. Many other smaller temples and sanctuaries, which it would be tedious to enumerate, covered the rock of Cecrops.

Descending once more the Propylæa, and turning to the right or northern side of the Acropolis, we come to the portico of Athena Archegetes; the Horologium of Andronicus Cyrrhæstes, a building of octagonal shape, with its eight sides facing the eight winds, surmounted by a bronze Triton turning on a pivot, at once the weather-cock and the public clock of Athens; the Prytaneum, where the laws of Solon were preserved; and the street of the Tripods, lined with small temples on which the tripods gained by the victors in the theatrical contests were placed, and where the choragic monument of Lysicrates, commonly called the Lantern of Demosthenes, still exists. Further on, to the south-east, we find the gigantic temple of Olympian Zeus, remaining at St. Paul's visit in pretty much the same state in which it had existed for more than 400 years. Half finished as it was, however, it excited the admiration of strangers, on account of its vast proportions and fine design. It was at length completed by Hadrian. The length of the building was 354 feet, its breadth 171; it was adorned with 120 columns, 16 of which yet remain standing, above 60 feet high, and 8½ feet in diameter. Close to it was the fountain of Callirhoe, or Enneacrunnus (nine-piped), upon which the Athenians chiefly depended for their supplies of water. Continuing our course on the south side of the Acropolis, we should have to notice the Odeum or Music Theatre of Pericles, with its roof formed out of the masts of the Persian ships captured at Salamis; the great Dionysiac Theatre, excavated out of the rock, said to have been capable of accommodating 30,000 spectators; and the Odeum of Regilla. And here we find ourselves once more close to the Agora, our brief survey of the city within the walls being completed. In the suburbs were several remarkable localities. On the north-west side lay the Academy, a grove of plane trees and olive plantations, watered by the Cephissus, and laid out in walks and fountains. The road which led to it from the city was lined with the monuments of illustrious men, especially those who had fallen in battle. In the Academy Plato and his successors taught, whence they received the name of academic philosophers. All that remains of this place, the favourite haunt of philosophy and the muses, is the modern name Athymia, and an open space of ground of about 5 acres in extent, occupied by a few gardens and vineyards. A little to the north of the Academy might be seen the hill of Colonus, the scene of one of the finest tragedies of Sophocles. Cynosarges, at the foot of Mount Lycabettus, was a spot consecrated to Hercules, and possessed a gymnasium; it is supposed to have given its name to the sect of Cynic philosophers, Antisthenes, the founder of that school, having there taught. South of Cynosarges was the Lyceum, a sacred inclosure dedicated to Apollo Lyceus, and decorated with fountains and plantations. It was the principal gymnasium of Athens, and was frequented by such of the youth as addicted themselves to martial exercises.

It was a favorite resort too of the philosophers; and amidst its groves it was that Aristotle delivered those walking prelections which gained for his school the name of Peripatetics. On the other side of the Ilissus, in Agræ, a south-eastern suburb, stood the Eleusinium, or temple of Ceres, and the great Stadium, where the gymnastic contests of the Panathenæic games took place. It rose, in the shape of an amphitheatre, from the bank of the river, and was capable on extraordinary occasions of accommodating 80,000 spectators. Part of it was furnished with marble seats by Herodes Atticus; these have entirely disappeared, but the hollow, covered with grass, and with ruins here and there visible, still remains.

The foregoing is a sketch, necessarily brief, of the principal buildings and localities of Athens. After perusing it the reader will probably better understand how St. Paul's spirit must have been "stirred within him when he saw the whole city given to idolatry," Ac. xvii. 16. In truth the statues, sanctuaries, monuments, and temples were countless; and susceptible as the great apostle evidently was of the impressions of art and poetry, all sentiments of this kind were swallowed up in the mingled feelings of pity and indignation with which he beheld the prevalent superstition. It was, indeed, an idolatry as gross and as really debasing, though veiled under a fairer form, as that of the modern Hindoo, when he worships the hideous creations of his own hands. The altar which he mentions as having met with in the city, with the inscription, "To the unknown God," has occasioned some difficulty to the interpreters of Scripture. No such altar is mentioned by ancient writers; this, however, is no reason why it should not have existed. There were probably several such altars at Athens, dedicated by persons upon whom some calamity had fallen, or to whom some deliverance had been vouchsafed; and who, in ignorance of the particular deity to whom these events were to be thought owing, inscribed them to an unknown god. The apostle lays hold of the circumstance to direct the minds of the Athenians to Him whose existence they thus unconsciously acknowledged, and whom they "ignorantly worshipped." And when we call to mind the scene that must have presented itself to him as he stood on the Areiopagus—the majestic structures, invested with the twofold associations of exquisite beauty and time-honoured sanctity; the groups of statuary which everywhere recalled the traditions of the mythological age; the sanctuaries and altars, each of which had its legend and its presiding genius—we can in some measure estimate the faith and courage with which he announced to his frivolous audience the first truths of natural religion, declaring that the supreme Deity "dwelleth not in temples made with hands, neither is served by the hands of men, as though he needed anything;" that since "we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by the art and device of man."

Institutions.—The political history of Athens does not fall within our province. Suffice it to observe that the government was at first monarchical, to the death of Codrus, B.C. 1068; then aristocratical, the title of king being exchanged for that of Archon, whose office was at first hereditary, and for life, but afterwards was limited to ten years, and at length became annual, the number of Archons at the same time being increased to nine. Disorders arising from the contentions among the ruling body, and from the depressed state of the people, Draco first, and then Solon, was called in to apply a remedy by drawing up a definite code of laws. The laws of Solon formed the groundwork of the civil polity of Athens; and though democratic in tendency, provided a check against popular excesses, by the establishment of the Council of Four Hundred, and by the powers vested in the court of Areiopagus. The usurpation of Peisistratus restored for a brief period monarchical rule, but after his expulsion the power of the nobles declined, and Cleisthenes, by a new arrangement of the Athenian tribes, and by the institution of ostracism, gave the last blow to the oligarchy, and the government thenceforward became a pure democracy. With the maintenance of the democratical spirit the glory of Athens rose and culminated; with its extinction she fell for ever.

The supreme power, legislative and executive, resided in the Ecclesia, or general assembly, of which all legitimate citizens, not labouring under any loss of civil rights, were by right members. The assemblies were originally held in the Agora, afterwards they were transferred to the Pnyx, and finally to the great Dionysiac theatre. All matters, foreign and domestic, of national import were in the last resort determined by this body. Its deliberations were, however, in some measure controlled by the Senate, or Council of Five Hundred, chosen by lot, which discussed and voted upon all matters before they were submitted to the assembly. The Senate was divided into ten sections of fifty each, the members of which were called Prytanæ; they acted as presidents of both the assembly and the council during thirty-five or thirty-six days, so as to complete the lunar year. Each section was again divided into five bodies of ten each, who were called Proëdri, and who presided over the rest for a week in turn; of the Proëdri one was chosen for every day of the week as chairman of the Senate, with the title of Epistates. The Archons, from administering the government, had gradually sunk to the position of municipal magistrates, though they retained the names derived from a more aristocratic period. The first of the nine was called Eponymus, from the year being distinguished by his name; the second was styled king, his functions, as used to be the case with the old kings in their capacity of high-priest, being connected with religion; the third bore the name of Polemarch, and originally, as the name imports, was commander-in-chief of the army; the remaining six were called Thesmothetæ, or legislators, their duty being to review every year the body of laws, with the view of detecting inconsistencies, or supplying what was wanting. At the conclusion of their year of office, if they had discharged their duties satisfactorily, they were admitted members of the Areiopagus. This celebrated court possesses some interest for the biblical student, as being that possibly before which St. Paul was taken when attempting to speak to the motley crowd assembled in the Agora, of "Jesus and the resurrection." It is indeed doubtful whether he was led to the Hill of Mars in order to undergo a formal trial; the language of Scripture rather militates against such a supposition: nor indeed is it clear that the court was then formally sitting, though the mention of Dionysius the Areiopagite as one of the apostle's converts may lead us to think that it was. Be this as it may, a few words on the constitution and functions of this Senate may not be inappropriate. The Areiopagus was a body of very remote antiquity, and its special jurisdiction was in cases of intentional homicide. Ancient legends reported that before it Ares was tried for the murder of Poseidon's son, and Orestes for the murder of his mother. It gradually assumed to itself very extensive powers. It exercised a censorial superintendence over the lives and habits of the citizens, regulated the proceedings of the public assembly, and took cognizance of certain offences against religion, particularly the introduction of new and unauthorized forms of public worship. These powers were not derived from any grant of the people, but from the custom of immemorial antiquity, and were sustained by general reverence and awe. The consecrated locality, crowned with a temple dedicated to Mars, and with the sanctuary of the Furies in a dark cleft of the rock, immediately below the seats of the judges, was regarded by the Athenian populace to a late period with a superstitious veneration. Nor was this feeling undeserved. For a long series of ages no one had ventured to impugn the fairness and impartiality of the decisions of this court. The proceedings were as follows:—The judges sat in the open air, under the presidency of the king-archon. The accuser took a solemn oath over the slaughtered victims that the charge was true; the accused, with the same solemnities, denied it; each party then, in succession, stated his case in the plainest language, all ornaments of oratory or appeals to the passions being forbidden. At the conclusion of the first speech a criminal accused of murder might, if he pleased, expatriate himself, and thus avoid capital punishment; but his exile was in that case perpetual, and his property confiscated and exposed to public sale. The cause being heard, the judges proceeded to give their vote by ballot, two urns being provided for that purpose; if the votes proved equal, an acquittal took place. An assembly of this character, the members of which enjoyed a life-long tenure of office, was naturally aristocratic in tendency; it became therefore a main object with Pericles, the head of the popular party, to diminish the powers of the Areiopagus. This he effected by the institution of dicasteries, or jury-courts, composed of the main body of the citizens, 6000 of whom were annually chosen by lot, and then divided into ten panels, the remainder forming a supplement to fill up vacancies. Before one or other of these panels every cause, civil and criminal, was brought; and the Areiopagus, stripped of its censorial and other judicial competence, became a mere court of homicide. Still it never quite lost its religious character; among other reasons, because the procedure in cases of homicide was among the Greeks not less religious than judicial. Some sentiment of this kind may have influenced the Athenians in conducting the great apostle to the Areiopagus; it probably seemed to them, even if they contemplated no formal judicial process yet, the fittest place for a religious discussion or exposition such as on this occasion they expected to hear.

Schools of Philosophy.—Athens was the chosen home of philosophy, as well as of the fine arts. Nor can the obstacles which Christianity had to overcome, and which apparently prevented the formation of any considerable church in that city, be appreciated without some knowledge of the philosophical tendencies of that age, particularly of those of the two sects which St. Paul seems principally to have encountered, the Stoics and the Epicureans.

Greek philosophy was first cultivated in the Ionic colonies of Asia Minor: from thence it migrated with Pythagoras to Magna Græcia, until the conquests of the Persians and the troubles of Southern Italy compelled it to take refuge at Athens, which thenceforward became to the ancient world the centre of intellectual civilization. Its earlier speculations were physical, in the more limited sense of the word; they were directed to elucidate the constitution of the material universe, and the laws by which it was governed. Socrates was the first who taught that the "proper study of mankind is man," and from his time philosophical inquiry assumed a new direction, and began to labour in the field of ethical science. Plato in the Academy, and Aristotle in the Lyceum, the two greatest of Socrates' successors, enunciated those moral and political theories which have exercised such an important influence on human thought, both within and without the pale of Christianity. But it was not these schools of philosophy which in the first instance arrayed themselves directly against the principles of the gospel. St. Paul's chief opponents were found amongst the followers of Epicurus and Zeno, philosophers whose doctrines at that time divided the attention of thoughtful minds.

Epicurus was born, B.C. 337, in the vicinity of Athens, of poor parents. At an early age he addicted himself to philosophical study; visited in succession Athens, where he only remained one year; Colophon, Mitylene, and Lampsacus; and finally, in his thirty-sixth year, returned to Athens, where, in a garden in the midst of the city, he opened the school of philosophy which bears his name. Epicurus was a materialist, and a virtual atheist. He taught that all things, the universe itself, were formed by a fortuitous concourse of atoms; the idea of an intelligent cause being incompatible with the misery prevalent in the world, and with the tranquil serenity of the gods. The soul was a corporeal substance, and perished with the body. The existence of Deity was not absolutely denied; but the deity of Epicurus was a being removed from all interest or interference in the affairs of men. There was no moral governor of the world. Consistently with these views, Epicurus taught that pleasure is the great end of life, and the sovereign good: virtue itself is to be sought for the pleasure that attends it. He himself is said to have been a man of abstemious tastes and habits; but with persons of stronger passions his philosophy naturally led to the indulgence of the grossest sensuality. At best, it was a system of refined selfishness; and at Athens, and afterwards at Rome, its favourable reception marked the decline of public virtue and patriotism.

The rise of the Stoic philosophy was nearly contemporaneous with that of Epicurus, but it took a diametrically opposite direction. Zeno, its founder, was a native of Citium, whence he passed to Athens, and attended various schools of philosophy. After twenty years' study he opened a school himself in the Stoa Pœcile, or Painted Porch, and taught many years with great reputation. His design was a noble one—to invigorate the soul of Greece, which at that time lay prostrate under enervating influences. Liberty was extinct, and indifference, scepticism, and epicurean softness were the prevailing tendencies. Society seemed on the point of dissolution. Zeno hoped, by the austerity of his doctrines, to arrest the progress of the disease; but he strained the bow till it broke.

Against Epicurus he taught that virtue, not pleasure, is the chief good; but the virtuous man of the Stoics was a being exempt from human passions, self-sufficing, and wrapped in an austere apathy. Pleasure was no good, pain no evil. The quality of neither men nor actions admitted of degrees; all good actions were equally so, and so were all bad ones. Reason was the supreme law of life; virtue consisted in living conformably to reason, vice in disregarding its dictates. The wise man alone was free, and a king. Such was the Stoic morality; their views on other points were equally erroneous. They were pantheists; God was not without, but in the world; God was the reason of the world. They held that the soul is corporeal and perishable. They permitted, and, on certain occasions, recommended suicide. With such a spirit and with such tenets Christianity could have nothing in common; and, even more perhaps than the Epicureans, the Stoics needed to be converted, and become as little children, before they could enter the kingdom of heaven. But both systems were antagonistic to the gospel, which teaches us at once that duty, not self-indulgence, is to be our governing motive, and that humility, not pride, is the temper that befits guilty and sinful man. It is no matter of wonder, therefore, that when they heard the truths of the gospel, some of St. Paul's hearers "mocked, and others said, we will hear thee again of this matter," Ac. xvii. 32, and that the apostle left behind him in this renowned city comparatively few seals to his ministry.

ATONEMENT. This is a strictly English word, and originally meant nothing more than being at one; though usually with an implied reference to a previous alienation or disagreement. Thus Sir Thomas More speaks of "the late made attonemente, in which the king's pleasure hadde more place than the parties willes;" and Tyndall, remarking on the expression in 1 Tim. ii. 5, "One God, and one Mediator," explains, "that is to say, advocate, intercessor, or an atone-maker between God and man." Even in Shakspeare (Othello, act iv.), we have the verb so used: "I would do much to atone them for the love I bear to Cassio." But the transition was very natural and easy from the sense of being or making at one, to that of the means or agency whereby the existing difference was healed, and a good understanding was established. And this by and by came to be the received meaning of the word atonement, as in the following passage from Milton:—

"Atonement for himself, or offering meet, Indebted and undone, hath none to bring."

and in Cowper's Iliad, b. ix.—

"Behold me now,
Prepared to soothe him with atonements large,
Of gifts inestimable."

In this sense the word is used with great frequency in the Old Testament scriptures, and especially in the very common phrase of "making atonement" for a person or an object—i.e. giving or doing that whereby a source of estrangement is removed, a reconciliation is effected. Occasionally the alternative phrase of "making reconciliation," as at Le. viii. 15; Eze. xlv. 15;

Da. ix. 24, is adopted; and as the expression in the original is the same there as in the other cases, the "making reconciliation" must be understood as simply equivalent to "making atonement," and consequently, as used in the English Bible, reconcile and reconciliation are synonymous with atone and atonement. In the New Testament our translators have only used the word atonement once, viz. at Ro. v. 11, "by whom (Christ) we have received the atonement." In other passages, where the same word (καταλλαγή) occurs, whether as a noun or a verb, they have rendered it by reconcile and reconciliation, Ro. xi. 15; 2 Co. v. 18, 19. And there is another word (ἱλάσκομαι, ἱλασμός) for which they have adopted this term also, and occasionally propitiation, as the proper equivalent when it occurs in the New Testament. Thus at He. ii. 17, Christ's priesthood is described as having been what it is in order "to make reconciliation (εἰς τὸ ἱλασθεῖν) for the sins of the people," which might with equal propriety have been rendered "to make atonement" for them. And so again at 1 Jn. ii. 2, what is in our version, "He is the propitiation," might have been, and, in accordance with Old Testament usage, should rather have been, "He is the atonement (ὁ ἱλασμός) of our sins." In the Greek translation of the Old Testament it is this word, or rather its compound (ἐξιλάσκομαι, ἐξιλασμός), which is most commonly used, where our translators have employed the expressions atonement, or making atonement. So far, therefore, as regards the subject itself treated of in the passages referred to, it is of no moment whether these terms be used, or those formed from propitiate, reconcile, and we may add also ransom, which is sometimes employed in lieu of the others, as at Ps. xlix. 8; Job xxxiii. 24.

The form of expression in the Hebrew Scriptures, which has been thus differently rendered, and from which those of the New Testament are derived, is somewhat peculiar. The verb commonly employed is the piel form (kipper, קָפַר) of kaphar, to cover; and being, as it usually is, coupled with the preposition upon (עָלַי) in respect to the person or thing that is the object of the verb, it means to cover upon, so as to conceal or put away, to make expiation for, or atone in respect to what has caused disagreement. The noun employed in the same connection is a derivative of this verb—kopher (קֹפֶר)—and means that which covers in the sense now mentioned, obliterates, as it were, the ground of quarrel, constitutes the matter of expiation, or the atonement-price. And as here undoubtedly the language of the New Testament is entirely based upon that of the Old, and the relations also of the one, in connection with which the terms are applied, closely correspond with those of the other, the ideas associated with their use amid the sensible transactions of the old economy, must go far to establish the same for them when transferred to the higher concerns of the new.

Various points of importance, which possess a collateral relation to the subject, would require to be considered if it were to receive a full and comprehensive treatment; such as, the origin of sacrifices, the different kinds of sacrificial offering, with their appropriate rites, &c. These will be handled under the heads SACRIFICE and OFFERINGS. But, meanwhile, viewing the word atonement in its common use, as indicative of thoughts and ideas which are of frequent occurrence in Scripture, and which enter into the very heart of the religion of the Bible, we have to inquire, What precisely do they include? Does the change, which the term implies, from a hostile to a friendly relationship, affect both parties interested, or one of them alone? And as importing a provision for accomplishing a transition from the one state to the other, does it indicate what was required on the part of God to justify his entering into terms of peace with men, or simply what was just and becoming in men, when seeking to find acceptance with God? Important differences are obviously involved in these alternatives, and it must be well to know, on solid grounds, which it is proper to adopt.

I. In endeavouring to arrive at a correct judgment on the points at issue, we naturally turn to the Old Testament scriptures, where the subject is presented both in its earlier and its more elementary form. There are passages in which atonements are there spoken of in a somewhat loose and popular sense, so that it is scarcely possible to gather anything very definite from them as to the religious bearing of the matter. For example, it is said of the wicked in Pr. xxi. 18, that "he is an atonement," or ransom (kopher) for the righteous, meaning simply that in times of judgment the life of the one is taken for that of the other, the one falls a victim to the stroke of vengeance while the other escapes. The term was also used in civil transactions; as when the owner of a vicious ox, that had gored a person, was obliged to pay an atonement or redemption-price for his own life, Ex. xxi. 30. Even in such cases one can see, that certain fundamental ideas are involved in the representation employed, including a liability to evil somehow incurred, a possibility of escaping from it without personal suffering, and this by the substitution of one thing or one being in the place of another.

But it is only when we turn to the strictly religious province, that we find—as there alone, indeed, could we justly expect to find—the doctrine of atonement brought clearly and distinctly out. We select a few out of many plain, unambiguous passages that exist of this description:—Le. i. 4, which says in respect to the burnt-offering, "He shall put his hand upon the head of the burnt-offering, and it shall be accepted for him to make atonement for him;" Le. iv. 26, in respect to the sin-offering, "and the priest shall make atonement for him from his sin, and it shall be forgiven him;" so again at Le. v. 16, for the trespass-offering; the contrast to which in both cases, when the sacrifice was not offered, was—the soul bears its iniquity, that is, is subject to the penalty of death for the transgression, ch. v. 1, 17. Still more fully and explicitly in regard to the great day of atonement, Le. xvi., on which the high-priest was with various offerings of blood to "make an atonement for the holy sanctuary, and for the tabernacle of the congregation, and for the altar; and he shall make an atonement for the priests, and for all the people of the congregation," ver. 33. Indeed, as it was these alone who were capable of transgression, the atonement could only be understood to be made for the sanctuary and its appendages, as having been defiled by the sins of the people, and thereby, in a manner, rendered unfit for the indwelling of the Holy One of Israel. So that it still was the people's guilt that was atoned for, even when the several parts and articles of the tabernacle were directly contemplated; as is intimated in the closing verse, "And this shall be an everlasting statute unto you to make an atonement for the children of Israel for all their sins once a year." The same had already been stated at ver. 16, "He shall make an atonement for the holy place, because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgression in all their sins." To the like effect in Eze. xlv., which discourses of the sacrifices connected with his ideal temple, it is given as the object of these, that they should be for the reconciliation or atonement of the house, viz. the temple, and for the house of Israel, ver. 15, 17, 18. And, to mention no more, there is the passage in Le. xvii. 11, which in one respect is the most important of the whole, as it enunciates the general principle, on which all the particular statements regarding atonements in the stricter sense are founded. Correctly rendered it runs thus, "For the soul (nephesh) of the flesh is in the blood, and I have given it to you upon the altar, to atone for your souls, for the blood atones through the soul (banephesh)." It occurs in connection with the prohibition against eating blood, and assigns a reason for that, which is to this effect, "You must not eat the blood, because God has appointed it as the means of atonement for your sins. But it is such from being the bearer of the natural life, the soul. Not simply, therefore, as blood, but as having the soul or life in it, does it atone; the soul of the offered victim is given to atone for the soul of the sinner who offers it." Such is the meaning of the statement, and the application to be made of it to the subject under consideration is thus clearly exhibited by Kurtz: "The Lord says, I gave you the blood upon the altar to make atonement for your souls—therefore blood for blood, soul for soul. That the sinner may escape death, death must alight on the sacrifice; the guiltless blood is shed in order to cover, to atone for the guilty. Death is the wages of sin; the sacrificed animal suffers death, not in payment of its own sin (for it is without sin, guiltless), but as payment of another's sin; it therefore suffers death as a substitution for the offerer, and Jehovah, who gave the blood as the means of atonement, recognizes this substitution. The blood shed, then, in the death of the victim, is the atonement for the sinner; as the sin has been imputed to the victim, the satisfaction that has been made through its death is imputed to the sinner."—(Mosaische Opfer, p. 31.)

Now, in the whole of these representations, beside what is implied regarding the previous state of the person who was the subject of the atonement, as one conscious of sin, and in consequence liable to punishment, two great principles were distinctly exhibited. The first of these is, that there was something in the character and government of God, which objectively presented a hinderance to the obtaining of pardon, or getting anew into a state of favour and fellowship with Heaven. Mere desire on the sinner's part, however sincere and earnest, could not accomplish this; an obstacle existed, till it was removed out of the way by a valid operation done for him, and upon him. What really constituted the obstacle, we elsewhere learn, was the relation in which the sinner's guilt placed him to the righteousness of God; before this he stood condemned for his transgression, and had the penalty of death hung over him. But apart from its precise nature, which comes out in other revelations, the suspension of the sinner's pardon on something done in his behalf clearly bespoke the existence of an outstanding difficulty in the way of his return to the divine favour—a hinderance that had to be removed for him, rather than by him. Then, secondly, corresponding to this recognized and felt obstacle, there was for its removal the sacrificial substitution of an animal's life for the forfeited life of the sinner—a substitution appointed by God, and presented by the sinner who sought to be atoned. Manifestly, therefore, throughout the process there was a mutual responsency, in which both parties were alike interested. If the cause of offence and alienation originated with the sinner in his violation of the law of God, when once originated it no longer rested there—a mighty obstacle thenceforth interposed on the part of God, which the sinner could not, if he would, remove out of the way; and it became as necessary for God to be reconciled toward him, as for him to be reconciled toward God. So, again, in respect to the reconciliation itself, while the sinner must fall in with the mode instituted for obtaining it, and must accept of the substitution provided in his behalf, the appointment of the substitution, and endowing it with the requisite efficacy, must be of God: for the sinner could escape from his fears, he could attain to satisfaction respecting his state, only by realizing the fact of a prior or a concurrent satisfaction on the part of God. In short, the sinner's guilt first, then God's justice decreeing death against the guilt, constituted together the ground of disagreement which called for an atonement. And, on the other side, God's pardoning mercy laying open the way of return—this first, then the sinner's faith and repentance embracing the provision made, together met in and constituted the atonement.

Such is the plain import of the Old Testament teaching upon the subject of atonement; which also, in regard to the beliefs involved in it, derived collateral support from the ascertained feelings and practices of ancient heathendom. "By the general practice," to use the words of Bishop Butler (Anal. p. ii. c. 5), "of propitiatory sacrifices over the heathen world, the notion of repentance being alone sufficient to expiate guilt [or rather to deliver from its condemnation], appears to be contrary to the general sense of mankind." It bore unmistakeable evidence to the deep conviction in men's bosoms, that something more than repentance was needed to set them right with the Deity—a sacrificial offering to compensate for their guilt, or turn away the wrath it had justly incurred. And it betokened a belief, though at best a wavering, faltering belief, that the kind of sacrifices actually presented might avail for the end in view. It was here, that for those who wanted the clear light of revelation the grand defect lay: having only nature to consult as to the validity of their sacrificial offerings, they could never assure themselves of a clear warrant or of a satisfactory response. "Even the blithest Greek," says Kreuzer (Symbolik, i. p. 171), "could not but be sensible of a secret dread before each of his gods; in their working lay a sort of demoniacal agency. Every manifestation of a heathen deity carried with it something of an alarming nature, and the felt nearness of the gods, even at the most joyous feasts, was accompanied with a sense of terror. People always felt themselves in the presence of a dread nature-power, on which they knew not how to reckon. For, who could tell what the deity might suspend over him, an abject and weak mortal? As the spring and the river freshen the atmosphere, invigorate plants, animals, and human beings, but also, in the form of rushing torrents, overflow their banks, desolate corn-fields, sweep along with them men and beasts, so could the unlimited power of the gods at any moment manifest itself in terrific outbursts." Hence the perpetual tendency in heathen sacrifice to the shedding of human blood as its proper culmination—nothing less being deemed, in seasons of greater emergency and deeper conviction, an offering of sufficient value to avert the judgment due to human guilt and disobedience. The members of the old covenant were saved from such alarming fears and such revolting expedients by means of the supernatural economy under which they were placed, and which, through a regulated system of animal sacrifice, gave them assurance of the divine forgiveness. So far they stood on a much higher level than the heathen—namely, when they understood and used aright their privileges; but the Jewish, as well as the heathen faith, which embodied itself in acts of sacrificial worship, held pardon of sin to be attainable through offerings of blood presented in the room of the guilty—and no otherwise.

It is true, that on certain occasions we find an atoning value to have been attributed to means which could scarcely be said to possess the character of a proper substitution, by the giving of life for life. Thus persons in very humble circumstances were allowed to make expiation of sin with a little flour, Le. v. 11; and at the outbreaking of the plague in the camp of Israel, Aaron made atonement by rushing in among the people and offering incense, Nu. xvi. 47. But these were manifestly exceptional cases, and in the pressing urgency of the moment were accepted, as by a God who delighteth in mercy, even while he is exercising judgment, though still with no intention whatever of supplanting the proper methods of relief. The incense in the one case, which was a symbolical prayer, what was it but an immediate pleading for mercy, till something further might be done? And the flour, in the other, was expressly given as a substitute for the living victim, which in all ordinary circumstances was required for the expiation of sin. Such palpably provisional appointments were but some of the more evident signs of imperfection in an economy, which was throughout imperfect, and by its very imperfections gave promise of better things to come. The element of vicarious satisfaction was still present, even in its most imperfect services. And as regards the general aspect and tendency of its institutions, it must, we conceive, have been next to impossible for any one to live under them, and fail to imbibe from them the two great principles formerly stated—viz. that by reason of sin a ground of disagreement, an objective hinderance, was raised between the sinner and God; and that this could be removed only by the sacrifice of an animal's life in the room of the sinner's life.

There has been no want of theories, however, to get rid of these conclusions; yet with so little of solid proof, that none of them has been able for any length of time to maintain its ground. Specimens of some earlier theories may be seen in Magee on the Atonement, notes 38, 48, 49; with certain modifications and a few more plausible adjustments they have again appeared. There is the theory of Bähr, for example, in his Symbolik des Mos. Cultus, who rejects the vicarious nature of the ancient sacrifices, and regards them simply as symbolical of the feelings and exercises of the worshipper—the giving away on his part of the animal life of his victim to God, imaging the giving away or giving back of his own life to God, in a spirit of true repentance and faith. By this surrender of the natural selfish principle of life, which dies, as it were, in the act of repentance and faith, sin is covered by being extirpated—the atonement is made. According to this explanation, then, the action with the victim could have had no independent value, it must have been but the reflection and shadow of what pertained to the worshipper; it was all subjective merely, and might have been dispensed with, if the right dispositions were themselves in proper exercise. But this is very different from the impression naturally conveyed to the mind by the language of Scripture on the subject: there the sacrificial offering appears as a sine qua non, a thing without which forgiveness could not be attained, and through which forgiveness was obtained, not so properly by as for the sinner. Then, why such stress laid upon the death of the victim, and the presentation of that which bespoke the death? To image the possession of a higher life by the death of a lower, however common in the New Testament, is foreign to the Old: the time for such a mode of representation had not yet come, and in the circumstances could never have been thought of by the worshippers. To them, as the guilt of their sin formed a great objective hinderance, so the offering of the slain victim must have appeared as a great objective remedy.

Another mode of explanation, revived lately by Keil, would lay stress merely upon the presentation of the blood, apart from the death of the victim: the atonement consists, not in the slaying of the victim laden with the offerer's guilt, but in the bringing of the blood to the altar, which symbolized the reception of the worshipper to the favour and fellowship of God. True, in a certain sense; but this very blood derived its main significance from the judgment of death that had passed on it—from its having been the life-blood of an appointed victim. The presentation of the blood at the altar was the formal acceptance of the life that had been substituted in the room of the sinner's. The theory proceeds on an utter misapprehension of the nature of the relation between the offerer and the victim, as if the one were the symbol of the other. The victim was the offerer's substitute, not his symbol; and the life-blood was given by God as an intermediate thing between himself and the sinner, possessing in it by divine ordination an atoning property, whereby the two might become one again. "The sacrificial offering was a different thing from the offerer; it was simply what it was, and did not import what it was not" (Delitzsch).

Still another theory, which is by no means new, but has received somewhat of a fresh colouring, and has been elaborated with great pains by Hofmann in his Schriftbeweis, regards the offering of sacrificial victims in former times as a sort of payment to God—in peace-offerings a payment by way of thankful acknowledgment for the mercies received or expected from his hand; and in sin or burnt offerings a payment in compensation of the sin, such as God himself sanctioned, and by which he pledged himself to be again gracious to the sinner. There is nothing properly vicarious in the nature of the offering; it is simply a gift put into the hands of the worshipper, which, on being presented at the altar, God agrees to accept as payment. The worshipper was thereby taught to feel, that there was not to be a simple forgiveness of his sin; he had to give a certain compensation, though still it was his own repentance and faith which properly admitted him to blessing. Like the others, this is a mere theory of the closet, which has nothing to countenance it in the more obvious and palpable features of the ancient sacrificial institute, and which could never have occurred to any one living under it. For, if compensation by way of payment were the radical idea of the transaction, why should it have turned so peculiarly upon one kind—the offering of animal life? On that supposition one would have expected offerings from the wine-press or from the barn-floor in some sort of proportion to those from the flock, which was so far, however, from being the case, that offerings of that description are never named in connection with forgiveness of sin, and when presented, as they occasionally were, in the meat and drink offering, it was only in trifling quantities, and as an appendage to sacrifices of blood. Why, again, even in these was such prominence given to the blood, and in connection with that, to the death of the victim? If the offering availed simply as a debt-payment, then, surely, the more it could retain of value the better; and to render that indispensable, which in a manner destroyed its value as a living creature, was a strange thing to associate with the idea of payment. This inevitably forced on men's consideration, not what it was as a valuable commodity, but what it was as a life. Besides, as Delitzsch has justly remarked (on Hebrews, p. 740), the theory entirely mistakes the proper nature of atonement. To atone is strictly to cover (whence the name of the mercy-seat, caporeth or covering), but not in the sense of Hofmann, as covering a debt by paying it. This is a metaphor entirely alien to Hebrew usage. What was covered was sin and impurity, or that wherein these resided. And from what were they covered! From God's righteous judgment, which condemned them as hateful in his sight, or from his wrath, which was ready to flame out against everything opposed to his moral purity. What was put between man and this consuming zeal on the part of God to bear the doom, which would otherwise alight upon the sinner—that, in the sense of Old Testament scripture, is an atonement, it is the covering of guilt. Any other view, however ingeniously supported, must be held to be inconsistent with the plain sense and import of Scripture.

II. But as existing in Old Testament times, all was provisional. The means of atonement in the blood of slain victims was given by God for the time then present; but of so inadequate a kind, when compared with the great object to be accomplished, that it was impossible—especially when coupled with the intimations of prophecy—for the more thoughtful and reflecting minds among the covenant-people not to anticipate a period when the divine administration in this respect would assume a more perfect form. The clearer light of the gospel leaves us now, at least, in no room to doubt, that the whole of the sacrificial institute of the old covenant rested on the assumption, eternally present to the divine mind, of the Son's willing sacrifice of himself on the cross for the sins of men. It is here alone, as the later Scriptures declare, that the real, the only valid and effectual atonement is to be found. But, while there is an infinite difference between this and the temporary expedients that preceded it, in respect to inherent worth, the correspondence between the preparatory and the ultimate in the divine economy indispensably required that the principle of both should be the same—that what the ancient worshipper's relation was to his means of atonement, the same should now be the relation of believers to the perfect offering of Christ. The one could not otherwise have formed the shadow and preparation of the other. If, therefore, the principle of vicarious satisfaction stands fast in the Old Testament sacrifices—not invalidated, but rather confirmed by the attempts that have been made to get rid of it—and if in the carrying out of this principle the blood of slain victims as the bearer of their life was what formed the matter of the atonement, it must equally stand fast in regard to the work of Christ, that it is by the sacrifice of himself, or the presentation of his life-blood to God, and by this as a vicarious satisfaction for the sins of men, that he prevails for their redemption. The proof of the one position is virtually the proof of the other.

But the language of the New Testament also fully bears out this view; and it is found just as impracticable to explain satisfactorily what is stated directly respecting Christ's work, without reference to the atonement in its common acceptance, as to do so with its typical adumbrations. We can here only point to some of the more explicit passages; but they are quite sufficient to establish both of the two fundamental points now indicated. (1.) Vicarious satisfaction is plainly exhibited in the following statements: "The Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and give his life a ransom for many" (δὲν πολλῶν, in the room of many), Mat. xx. 28; "Who gave himself a ransom for all," 1 Ti. ii. 6; "God made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him," 2 Co. v. 21; "Christ loved the church and gave himself for it;" "By one offering he has for ever perfected them that are sanctified;" "He bare our sins in his own body on the tree;" "He suffered for our sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us unto God;" "He is the propitiation for our sins," &c., Ep. v. 25; Ho. x. 14; 1 Pe. ii. 24; iii. 18; 1 Jn. ii. 2. (2.) The sacrificial death of Christ, or giving away of his life to the Father, as in fulfilment of a sentence of condemnation, is not less clearly marked as the act in which the vicarious character of Christ's work concentrated itself, and through which it accomplished the needed redemption. "The Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world," "our passover also was sacrificed for us, Christ," "redeemed with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot," Jn. i. 29; 1 Co. v. 7; 1 Pe. i. 19. "I lay down my life for the sheep," Jn. x. 15; "Him hath God set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past." "He was delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification," Ro. iii. 25; iv. 25; "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us," Gal. iii. 13; "The blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth from all sin," "He hath washed us from our sins in his blood," 1 Jn. i. 7; Re. i. 5; "For if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh; how much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the Eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God," He. ix. 13, 14.

These are after all but a few out of a mass of testimonies, that more or less explicitly speak the same language and breathe the same spirit. Yet with them alone before us, the evidence in favour of the two great points which make up the Christian doctrine of atonement must be held to be incontrovertible by all simple and unsophisticated minds. The affirmation of Soame Jenyns on the subject, frequently quoted, is scarcely too strong: "That Christ suffered and died as an atonement for the sins of mankind, is a doctrine so constantly and so strongly enforced through every part of the New Testament, that whoever will seriously peruse those writings, and deny that it is there, may, with as much reason and truth, after reading the works of Thucydides and Livy, assert, that in them no mention is made of any facts relative to the histories of Greece and Rome" (Internal Evidence).

It is less, however, with direct denials of the doctrine of atonement, than with modes of explanation respecting it which take the very substance out of it, that its advocates in the present age have to do. Theories conceived on a philosophic basis, and drawing support from some incidental and subordinate aspects of the subject, but leaving out the more palpable, which in such a case are necessarily the more vital and important features of it, are constantly rising into notice. Thus, in the hands of a philosophic rationalist the passages which speak of Christ being a curse and ransom for his people, are evacuated of nearly all that bears even the semblance of the real doctrine: "We must distinguish," it is said, "between the spirit and the letter, the inward meaning and the figure of the Jewish law. The inward meaning is, that Christ's teaching, and life, and death drew men to him, until they were taken out of themselves, and in all their thoughts and actions became one with him" (Jowett on St. Paul's Epistles, i. 261). In like manner, the shedding of his blood as an offering for men's sins, is resolved into a Jewish figure, and the thing meant is, "that he was put to death by sinful men, and raised out of the state of sin, in this sense taking their sins upon himself." If this were all, then one could easily understand what the same writer has elsewhere said, that "heathen and Jewish sacrifices rather show us what the sacrifice of Christ was not, than what it is" (ii. 479). Only, an insuperable difficulty on this view of the matter remains, viz. how Christ and his apostles should have so habitually brought his work, not into contrast, but into comparison with the ancient sacrifices, and represented it as the proper realization of the principles on which they proceeded. That they did so can scarcely admit of a question; they constantly point to sacrifice as the most perfect type of Christ's redemption; and if in this we are not disposed to impugn their wisdom or integrity, there seems no alternative left but to hold that their views radically differed from those of the author just quoted. They perceived resemblances where he would find only contrasts. Not only so, but on such a view the same inward meaning substantially may be found in Paul's labours and sufferings as in Christ's: these too tended to take men out of themselves and draw them into a spiritual oneness with himself. Yet Paul abhorred the very thought of being put on a level with Christ, and preached salvation only in the name of Christ.

A similar contrariety to the plain import of the scriptural statements discovers itself in some who preserve a little more of the form of truth, and recognize a sort of atonement. Thus, "Christ's death is a sacrifice, the only complete sacrifice ever offered, the entire surrender of the whole spirit and body to God. . . . In it all the wisdom, and truth, and glory of God were mani-festated to the creature; in it man is presented as a holy and acceptable sacrifice to God" (Maurice's Essays, p. 148). In short, Christ is a kind of embodied humanity, and in his perfect surrender of self, in doing and suffering, to the will of the Father, every member of humanity is entitled to regard himself as represented—Christ's sacrifice of self is his sacrifice. So also substantially Bähr and Hofmann, the latter of whom says, "Christ is not to be regarded as another, who has performed that which humanity should have performed but could not do it; he is not to be viewed so externally in relation to it, but is the one in whom humanity was originally made, and who again comes into it. He is that Son of man, in whom it has its second Adam. Nor is it merely a vicarious work through which he has reconciled us to God; we are not simply through him reconciled, but in him." The Lord himself, however, says expressly the reverse; he came, as he informs us, to give his life a ransom in the room of many—as one in such a sense different from them, that he could take their place, and act between them and God; and through him, says the apostle, not in him, we received the atonement, Ro. v. 11. What becomes, indeed, of the whole office of Christ as mediator, if he is incapable of occupying, or does not in fact occupy, a middle place between man and God? It is true, they who believe in him become spiritually one with him, and are made partakers of his life; but this is the result of the work of atonement in their behalf, and comes from their interest in its provisions. Humanity as Christ found it was laden with sin, and as such under the curse and condemnation of death. On this account he must enter vicariously into its room, and bear its burden; and only when he has done so, and has become the heir of an endless life, does he also become for men the head of a new and better creation. His satisfaction unto death for their guilt is the very ground of the new life and destiny he has secured for those that believe on his name.

If it is impossible on scriptural grounds to hold the identity of Christ with humanity, which the theorists referred to maintain, it is equally impossible to find the objective ground of comfort and satisfaction in his work, which the inspired writers do, on the supposition of its being simply a sublime and perfect surrender of self, in doing and suffering, to the will of the Father—a self-sacrifice which his people are to be blessed in only by being drawn to imbibe its spirit and imitate its example. Strip this notion of its artful accommodation of the language of Scripture concerning sacrifice, and what does it amount to but this?—See in Christ a perfect exemplar of the highest kind of obedience—accepted, blessed, honoured of the Father through that obedience, and proclaiming that if you follow him in the one, you shall share with him in the other! Alas! it is the very thing I want, will be said by the conscience-stricken sinner—the view of Christ's perfection but makes me feel the more intensely the depth of my own sinfulness, and the distance at which I stand from the rectitude of a holy being; and if I can only look to him as a faultless pattern of righteousness, I must cry out with Peter, "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord." Totally different is the view presented in Scripture, when it sets forth the perfection of Christ's work as, in the first instance, the foundation of peace for the sinner, a propitiation for his guilt, through which as a pardoned and accepted believer he may enter into fellowship with God. Primarily it is set before him as an objective ground of confidence, and only by and by is it wrought as a living example into his experience.

This doctrine of the atonement, which has so strong and broad a foundation in Scripture, is also responded to by the profoundest feelings and convictions of the human heart. "However strange it may appear, human nature in every age has craved for expiation of sin as a preliminary to its pardon, and has sought not merely forgiveness, but forgiveness through atonement. It was because the key-note of sacrifice was punishment—because a penal and vicarious death preceded the attempt to approach the Deity acceptably, or offer the surrender of self to his service, that it struck an answering chord in every human heart, and maintained its place in the religion of almost every tribe on the face of the globe, and through every phase of civilization, from the barbarous rites of the wandering Scythian to the refined heathenism of Greece and Rome."—(Macdonell's Donellan Lectures, p. 98.) The explanation is to be sought in the ineradicable impression upon the human heart of the claims of justice or righteousness, which instinctively demands that these be satisfied before the blessings of divine forgiveness and love can be enjoyed. It is because justice is recognized as the fundamental element of all goodness. Every attribute of excellence, love itself, is conditioned by the demands of justice, and if justice is living and sensitive anywhere, as justly remarked by Dr. Shedd of America, "it must be so in its eternal seat and home. If law is jealous for its own authority and maintenance anywhere, it must be in that Being, to whom all eyes in the universe are turned with the inquiry, 'Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?' What, therefore, conscience affirms in the transgressor's case, God affirms, and is the first to affirm. What conscience feels in respect to transgression, God feels, and is the first to feel. All that is requisite in order to the satisfaction and pacification of conscience towards the sinful soul in which it dwells, is also requisite in order to the satisfaction and pacification of God the Just; and it is requisite in the former case, only because it is first requisite in the latter. The subjective in man is shaped by the objective in God, and not the objective in God by the subjective in man. The consciousness of the conscience is but the reflex of the consciousness of God."—(Bib. Sacra for 1859, p. 747.)

In full accordance with such views, we find in the epistle to the Romans, which contains the most systematic and formal exposition of the scheme of salvation in all Scripture, that righteousness, not grace, occupies the foremost place. The apostle declares himself to have been not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, "because therein is revealed the righteousness of God from faith to faith," ch. i. 17; and the grand scope and end of its wonderful provisions of grace is affirmed to be, that "God might be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus," ch. iii. 25—grace with its inexhaustible riches thus raising itself on a background of righteousness, and so far from being impaired, immensely enhanced by the connection. To say, as is often done, that it exhibits God as less willing to forgive than his creatures are bound to be, as taking delight in executing vengeance on sin, or yielding to the extremity of suffering what he withheld on considerations of mercy, is altogether to misrepresent and caricature the truth of God. It is not as if the demands of righteousness were pressed apart from the yearnings of love; but rather that love itself willingly, and with the spontaneous surrender of what was required, moved in the channel of that righteousness which it delights above all to honour. In one and the same act, love rose to its highest exercise, and righteousness accomplished its noblest work—the two together glorifying the Godhead with a perfect glory. The atonement, therefore, does not render God merciful, but admits of his showing mercy in consistence with the moral rectitude of his government, and bestowing a free salvation on the guilty without violence or dishonour to the justice of his administration. Hence, also, of all the means of moral suasion, which have proved of value to awaken or sustain love in the human bosom, none has been known to work with one-half the energy and effect that have flowed from the believing apprehension of the great fact of the atonement—that the Lord Jesus Christ died, the just for the unjust, or that God so loved the world, as to give his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him might not perish, but have eternal life.

III. But there may be shades of difference in regard to the essential nature and proper objects of the atonement. Even those who agree in holding the strictly vicarious character of Christ's sufferings and death, are not entirely at one in their mode of explaining wherein precisely the efficacy and bearing of the atonement consists. The differences here chiefly respect the two points, What is the kind of satisfaction rendered by the atonement of Christ to the divine justice? and for whom has it been rendered? for mankind at large, or an elect portion of them in particular? It was only gradually that the views of theologians on these points were brought out, and thrown into a systematic form. But we are not, on this account, to conclude that the substance of the truth was not held from the very first by the sounder portion of the church. Anselm of Canterbury undoubtedly had the merit of being the first to write a lengthened treatise on the subject, and to reason out in a formal manner what is called the satisfaction theory. The elements of that theory were held from the first, and are plainly exhibited in New Testament scripture, as well as in some of the best of the fathers. There were no doubt in former times, as well as now, partial and defective views occasionally broached respecting the atonement; and, in particular, too great account was sometimes made of the relation in which it stood to the power and dominion of Satan. But Anselm so clearly explained and vindicated the doctrine of the atonement as a satisfaction to the honour or justice of God for the offence caused by human sinfulness, that it came to be generally acquiesced in, and at the time of the Reformation was substantially espoused by all the leading theologians—Roman, Lutheran and Reformed. Undoubtedly the idea was often pressed too far, first by some of the schoolmen and afterwards by certain Protestant divines, as if the guilt of men, on the one hand, and the satisfaction required to meet it, on the other, were capable of being weighed and adjusted like a mercantile transaction. Statements have even been made to the effect, that precisely the amount of penalty due for the sins of those who were to be redeemed was laid upon Jesus, and borne by him in his work of suffering obedience. This, as justly stated by Dr. Macdonell, was to treat redemption as if it "dealt with things, not with persons; and applied to the spiritual necessities of an immortal being, and its relations to the fountain of all holiness and love, the same formula that would solve pecuniary liabilities, and regulate the mere legal relation of creditor and debtor. . . . Dealing as the divine law does with sin and holiness, with purity and impurity of heart, it must have been shaped, so as to dispense punishment and forgiveness according to the wickedness or holiness, not of the acts only, but of the being who acts. Hence, Christ's work of redemption, however mysterious, seems to spring from a deep and intimate relationship to those whom he redeems. It is not only because he suffers what they ought to have suffered, that mercy has become possible; but because He who suffered and did such things bore some deep and mysterious relation to the spirits of those for whom He suffered and acted; so that every pang He felt, and every act He did, vibrated to the extremities of that body of which He is the head, and placed not their acts, but the actors themselves in a new relation to the divine government, and to the fountain of holiness and life."—(Donellan Lectures, p. 140, 241.)

These considerations in no way invalidate, they rather confirm the view, that the sufferings and death of Christ are to be regarded in the light of a penal satisfaction for the sins of men—which is also distinctly indicated in the declarations which exhibit him as having borne our sins, given himself a ransom for many, redeemed or purchased the church with his blood, &c. Short of such a satisfaction, there could be no adequate basis for the dispensation of grace and blessing to the sinful; and every scheme, however shaped and modified, which proceeds on the supposition of less being required, must still lie open to the objection long ago urged by Taylor against that of Dr. Clarke: "If there was any relaxation of punishment in the scheme, anything short of an adequate satisfaction, so far there was a remission of sin freely; and if any part of the sin might be forgiven without a satisfaction, so might the whole. And our justification and salvation may arise entirely from the benevolence, and grace, and love of God to man, and be the free gift of God in the proper sense of the words"—free, he means, as contradistinguished from such benefits grounded on a work of atonement—free, as being the offspring of simple mercy (Ben Mordecai's Letters, ii. 691). A scheme, which carries imperfection in its very nature has no solid footing, not even in the reckoning of men; even they will soon be found (like Taylor) taking from it what it seems to have; for, if God can dispense with the claims of justice in part, they will certainly conclude He can as easily do it in whole; and, indeed, they will be sure to regard a gratuitous absolution more becoming his divine majesty than one providing only a partial satisfaction.

In accordance, therefore, with the tenor of the preceding statements, and with the plain import of many passages of Scripture, we must hold to the necessity of a proper satisfaction. But then we must beware of confounding this satisfaction with transactions of a merely commercial kind. The relation it holds to moral agents, and the high as well as complicated moral elements involved in it, place it in an essentially different category. On this account, even after the satisfaction has been provided and offered, the question respecting the personal state of individuals still remains to be determined; no one is entitled to say, as he might do after the discharge of a pecuniary obligation, The debt is cancelled, and I am no longer liable to be called to account for its liabilities. Here there have also to be brought into view the mutual relations of the respective parties, and the treatment they are disposed to give to the work of Christ, or the account they make of it. The matter, indeed, is of such a kind, that it reaches up to the throne of God, and stretches far and wide in its moral bearings on the interests of his everlasting kingdom. He, therefore, alone can determine what is a proper satisfaction, and in what manner it may be made available to the souls of men, without interfering with the interests of righteousness. To our view mysteries on every side hang around the subject, such as, perhaps, no finite mind can entirely fathom. We should be the more thankful, that He who can do so has done it; and that in the perfect holiness and peerless dignity of the great High-priest, he perceives such an infinite worthiness and sufficiency as renders it not only compatible with his justice, but conducive to his highest glory, to bestow salvation on as many as believe in the name of his Son.

Further, it is impossible to give due weight to the considerations already mentioned, and especially to the relation subsisting between the Mediator and the persons, as well as the actions, of those whom he represents in his great undertaking, without perceiving that his work must be regarded as having a more special bearing and respect to some than to others. This may have been, and doubtless has been incautiously stated by some of the advocates of what is called particular redemption, so as to beget the impression, that Christ's atonement had no distinct bearing on the condition of any, excepting such as may be destined ultimately to share in its blessings. Unquestionably a false impression, whenever produced. For nothing can be plainer from the announcements of Scripture on the subject, than that the atonement of Christ is presented as the grand objective exhibition of the mind and will of God toward the entire world of sinful men—the revelation of what is in his heart for their deliverance from wrath—and the historical ground on which, not only the gospel call is addressed to sinners without distinction, but every individual rejecting the call shall be held deserving of the heaviest condemnation. The ambassadors of the gospel are warranted to go to every creature within the circle of fallen humanity, and, on the basis of Christ's perfected sacrifice, say to each in succession, Here is the provision which Heaven's love has made and freely offers to thee; see here the proper ransom for thy guilt, and the way of access for thee to a full inheritance of life and blessing; believe and live. But in doing this, there is no need for frittering away the work of atonement itself, or representing it in the light merely of some kind of general display of righteousness against the demerit of sin, or satisfaction to public justice, such as simply renders salvation possible to all; for we should thus take from the real worth and efficacy of the atonement, in the same proportion as we widen the sphere of its reference. We should also leave without any satisfactory explanation the many passages which speak of it as actually securing the eternal well-being of those for whom it was more especially given. The particular must have its full weight assigned to it, not less than the general. And in the representations of Scripture upon the subject it is the particular, much more than the general aspects of it which are brought into view; that is to say, they are directed to the end of showing what the work of Christ's satisfaction is and secures for those who individually make it the ground of their faith in God, rather than of explicating the wider relation in which it stands to the impenitent and lost. Even in that most general and gracious exhibition of the truth, which is given near the commencement of John's Gospel, "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life," it still is the mysterious personal relation subsisting, through believing, between the Redeemer and a definite portion of the lost that is rendered prominent; on this is made to turn the whole question as to the extent and validity of the atonement—so far as men have occasion practically to consider it. On either side, it should be borne in mind, that the subject belongs to the deep things of God, and has bearings which it is impossible for men now either to explicate so clearly, or so exactly define as to leave no room for speculative doubts and difficulties. But there is enough to satisfy the humble inquirer, enough even to inspire him with childlike confidence and joy—having this twofold assurance to rest on, that there is in the atoning work of Christ a merit sufficient for all, adapted to all, freely offered to all; and that for as many as receive the gift, and enter through it into the bond of God's covenant, there is a relation formed between them and Christ, which no power can dissolve, and which renders them indefeasible possessors and heirs of all that is his.

[The literature on the atonement is of vast extent, and it is impossible here to do more than indicate a few leading sources, having reference more particularly to the present aspects of the discussions raised on it. For the history of the doctrine Baur's Verständnisslehre is perhaps the fullest and most comprehensive, though it is not altogether free from doctrinal bias (see Brit. and For. Evangelical Review, No. 35). The scholastic development of the subject is treated of in Hampden's Bampton Lectures. The points agitated between the Lutheran and the Reformed, also between Calvinists on the one side and Arminians on the other, with the older Socinians, are discussed at great length in Turretine's Disputationes Theol. vols. ii. and iv., where authorities on the other side are referred to. The work of Outram, De Sacrificiis, may still be consulted with advantage; and so also may Magee on the Atonement, though it is of very unequal merit, and some of its positions cannot be maintained, at least in the form given them by the author. The Four Discourses on the Atonement, with Notes, by Dr. Pye Smith, is a later work, traversing much the same field as that of Magee, and respectable both as to learning and ability. In the Princeton Essays, both series, there are some acute and able essays on the subject and its kindred topics. See also Symington on the Atonement and Intercession of Christ, and for some acute discussions, Dr. Candlish on the Atonement. The later Bampton Lectures by Thompson, Litton, and Mansell, discuss various points connected with the subject, in opposition to recent theories; and Macdonell's Donellan Lectures also handle with ability some of the leading objections lately raised against the doctrine. In Germany the false views of Bähr and Hofmann have been met, among others, by Kurtz in his Mosaische Opfer; Hengstenberg, in various parts of his Christology (new edition); Delitzsch, in an appendix to his Commentary on the Hebrews; also in separate treatises by Philippi, Edward, and Harnack.]

ATONEMENT, DAY OF. See FEASTS.

ATTALIA, a city and sea-port in Pamphylia, on the southern coast of Asia Minor, on the mouth of the river Catarrhactes, and at the head of the gulf Adalia. It was founded by Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamos, and from him derived its name. It received a passing visit from Paul and Barnabas on returning from their first missionary tour; and from that port they took ship to Antioch, Ac. xiv. 25, 26. It exists now in a comparatively reduced condition under the name of Adalia; but abundant ruins, which are all Roman, remain to attest its ancient greatness. It still has a population of about 8000, and is the chief port on the south coast of Asia Minor, holding relatively the same place it did of old.

AUGUSTUS [venerable, majestic], the name of the first Roman emperor, assumed after he became invested with supreme power in the Roman state; himself of the Octavian family, but adopted by his grand-uncle Julius Cæsar. When so adopted, the name he took was Caius Julius Cæsar Octavianus. Very great care was taken of his education, and his training for public life, by Julius Cæsar, who kept him much about himself, and raised him in early life to distinguished honours. He was only in his nineteenth year when his uncle was murdered (B.C. 44), and it fell to him chiefly to revenge the death of his great relative. After many conflicts, and temporary arrangements with other parties, he at last, by the defeat of Antony at Actium, became sole master of the empire. In B.C. 29 he received the title of Emperor for ever. He used the absolute power he had acquired with great prudence and moderation. In Scripture he is mentioned only once, in connection with the decree which formed the incidental occasion of the birth of Jesus at Bethlehem. (See under CYRENIUS.) He died A.D. 14, at the age of seventy-six.

AVA, one of the places from which the king of Assyria brought inhabitants to occupy the depopulated lands of Samaria, 2 Kt. xvii. 24. Various conjectures have been formed regarding its precise locality, but nothing for certain is known concerning it. In all probability it was the capital of a small district, somewhere in the region of Mesopotamia.

AVEN [vanity, wickedness], occurs as the name of a plain in Am. i. 5, and in connection with the kingdom of Syria. No accounts have been preserved elsewhere of a Syrian valley with this name; and it is possible, as has been conjectured by some, that the prophet used the word appellatively—branding some well-known valley within its bounds (that, perhaps, of Lebanon or Coale-Syria) as the valley of vanity or wickedness, on account of the idolatrous and sinful practices with which it had been associated. In this way Beth-aven was certainly used as a nickname of Bethel—house of iniquity, instead of house of God, Ho. v. 8.

AVENGER OF BLOOD. See BLOOD, AVENGER OF.

AVIM, or AVITES, apparently an original Canaanitish tribe, who had their possessions on the Philistine coast. They are mentioned in De. ii. 23, as having "dwelt in Hazerim, unto Azzah," or Gaza, until they were dispossessed by the Caphtorim or Philistines. In Jos. xiii. 3, they are placed close beside the five Philistine cities, but are not reckoned of them. It would seem, therefore, that the Avim were only partially dispossessed by the Philistines, and that they continued to occupy, down to the time of Joshua, a tract of country near Gaza, and probably stretching southwards toward the desert of Shur.

AWL [Heb. אָוֶל; from a verb that signifies to bore] is simply a boring instrument; and occurs twice in connection with the boring of a slave's ear who chose to remain perpetually in the service of his master, Ex. xxi. 6; De. xv. 17. It was doubtless a sharp-pointed instrument of the simplest kind, and could not materially differ from such as are in familiar use at the present time.

AXE is the rendering in the English Bible of two or three different terms in the original, which probably designated instruments not altogether alike. The commonest, and possibly the earliest term is קָרְדֹם, kardom, found in Ju. ix. 48; 1 Sa. xlii. 20, 21; Ps. lxxiv. 5, &c. Its derivation is uncertain; but there can be no doubt, from the connection, that it denotes the axe or hatchet usually employed in felling trees and lopping off branches.

Another term, and which Gesenius supposes to have been merely the softer form of kardom, was garzen, גַּרְזֵן, from the root to cut, or cut off, De. xix. 5; xx. 19; Is. x. 15. Whether altogether the same instrument as the kardom or not, it seems to have been used in precisely the same manner, for felling trees and cutting wood. In two other places, Is. xlii. 12, and Je. x. 3, the term מַאֲזָד, maatzd, is also employed; in the one case for the operations of the smith when fashioning his heated iron into shape, and in the other, for the carpenter's workmanship on the wood of a forest tree. It is in respect to the production of an idol out of the wood and iron respectively that the word is used in both these cases; and the natural supposition is, that it was a lighter instrument than the proper axe or hatchet; something, perhaps, approaching nearer to a large knife or chisel. But we have no means for determining the exact nature of the instrument, or how far it might differ from those previously referred to.

AZARIAH [helped of Jehovah], one of the most common names among the Israelites; it occurs with such frequency in the genealogies of persons who are otherwise quite unknown, that it were only to consume time and space to individualize them. We shall notice only those of whom some specific actions are recorded.

1. AZARIAH, high-priest in the reign of Uzziah, king of Judah, 2 Ch. xxvi. 17, 20. The name of his immediate father is not given in the passages referred to; and it is doubtful whether any of the Azariahs in the genealogical table of 1 Ch. vi., or which of them, is to be identified with him. It is recorded to his honour, that when Uzziah, in his pride and elation of heart, insisted upon going into the house of God and offering incense, Azariah faithfully withstood him, and declared the action, if persevered in, should not be to the king's honour. The visitation of leprosy which presently befell the king attested the fidelity of the high-priest's procedure, and the soundness of his advice.

2. AZARIAH, a high-priest in the days of Hezekiah, son of Urijah, who went along with the king in his efforts after reform, and zealously co-operated in the restoration of the temple courts and services, 2 Ch. xxxi. 10-13.

3. AZARIAH, the son of Oded, 2 Ch. xv. 1, and himself also called Oded in ver. 8, in the reign of Asa, king of Judah. After Asa had accomplished certain reforms in his kingdom, and had smitten a great force under Zerah, king of the Ethiopians, who came against him, he was addressed by the son of Oded in very spirited and encouraging words, in which he told the king, that the prosperity which had hitherto attended him, was because of his fidelity to God, and assuring him that if he proceeded in the same course of integrity and zeal, the Lord would still be with him and his people; but if otherwise, they might expect a reverse. The address had the happiest effect on Asa, and his spirit was stirred up to do much more in the reformation of abuses.

4. AZARIAH. This name is in several places applied to King Uzziah, 2 Ki. xiv. 21; xv. 1, &c. It has been supposed by some, that as the high-priest during part of his reign was an Azariah, the name may on this account have been transferred to the king—a very unlikely supposition. The probability is, that as Uzziah signifies the might of Jehovah, and Azariah the helped of Jehovah, the names were occasionally interchanged, as importing substantially the same thing.

5. AZARIAH, the original name of a pious youth who was carried to Babylon; he became better known there under the new designation of Abednego, and became distinguished for his fidelity to the cause of God, and the wonderful tokens he received of the divine favour and protection, Da. i. 6-19. (See NEBUCHADNEZZAR.)

AZOTUS, the name by which Ashdod is designated in the New Testament. (See ASHDOD.)

AZZAH, another form of what is more commonly put GAZA, and indeed the more correct form. It is found only in a few passages, De. ii. 23; 1 Ki. iv. 24; Jo. xxx. 30. It would certainly have been better to retain throughout one mode of spelling. (See GAZA.)

B.

BA'AL [owner, possessor]. 1. The fundamental idea, both in the verb and in the noun, seems to be not so much "lord" or "master," though this is approved by Gesenius, but rather "occupant," hence "proprietor" or possessor [see the remarks of Hengstenberg, Christologie, on Je. iii. 14; and compare the prevalent use of this noun in Hebrew to qualify another, possessor, or occupant, of dreams, of wrath, of appetite, of devices, of horns, of wings, of hair, for which we should use an adjective, to express possession of the quality or attribute, wrathful, greedy, winged, &c.] This is confirmed by the prevalent meaning of Baal, occupant or owner, in geographical compound names (see BAAL-PERAZIM, BETH-SHALISHA, and BAAL-TAMAR.) It is thus distinguished from ADON, which is properly "Lord;" while it is more nearly allied to the term used by Melchisedec, Ge. xiv. 18, "the most high God, possessor of heaven and earth." At the same time, it is not improbable that Melchisedec intentionally varied the word, so as to avoid the use of Baal, which must already have had a definite idolatrous meaning, and even to express a more active or energetic possession and government of the universe than would be suggested, either by the etymology of Baal or by its usage in worship.

2. BAAL is the name of a heathen deity, very generally worshipped by the nations with whom the Israelites chiefly came in contact. We find the name among the Canaanites and the Phœnicians, and also in inscriptions which have been collected in the Phœnician colonies, in Cyprus, Malta, Carthage, &c. And we have the evidence of the prominence assigned to his worship in the multitude of names of men into the composition of which Baal enters, Ethbaal [with Baal], Hasdrubal [help of Baal], Hannibal [grace of Baal], Muthumballas [man of Baal], &c. This contracted form of the syllable, Bal, may be due to the extreme difficulty of representing the Heb. ain (y) in European writing; or it may be connected with the contracted form of the name Bēl (𐤁𐤋), which predominated in the Chaldean worship, and is used in Is. xlvi. 1; Je. i. 2; li. 44; and in the apocryphal additions to Daniel. An intermediate form, 𐤁𐤋𐤀, Bēl, is used in Aramaic; but within the Bible it is found only as a common noun, not as a proper name, Ex. iv. 8, 17. Instead of the singular, it is very often the plural which is used, Baalim, Ju. ii. 11; iii. 7; viii. 33; x. 10; 1Sa. vii. 4; xii. 10; 2Ch. xiv. 7; Ho. ii. 13, 17; a usage which Gesenius explains by saying that it means images of Baal; while others prefer to explain it as indicating or including the various modifications of Baal, such as Baal-Peor, Baal-Berith, Beelzebub. Possibly it is simply what used to be called by Hebrew grammarians the pluralis excellentiæ, like Elohim, the usual name for God. Certainly in both the singular and plural form, it is accustomed, like Elohim, to take the article, Habbaal, Habbaalim.

The Israelites were tainted by the worship of Baal-Peor, while still in the wilderness, Nu. xiv. &c. Among the Canaanites unquestionably this worship had been very common, probably predominant; and in every time of backsliding by the Israelites, during the period of the judges, this species of idolatry seems to have been readily learned from the remnants of these nations which ought to have been utterly destroyed. Gideon is honourably distinguished by the name of Jerubbaal, that is, "let Baal plead," Ju. vi. 32; vii. 1, &c., on account of his energy and success in extirpating this evil practice. From the time of Samuel we do not read of Baal in Israel until the reign of Ahab, 1 Ki. xvi. 31, &c., when the apostasy from Jehovah to Baal reached its height under the influence of two causes which acted together with tremendous potency: from within, the deep moral and spiritual corruption of the people; and from without, the king's marriage with Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal (meaning "with Baal," otherwise named Ithobal, "Baal with him"), the priest of Baal, and the king of the Zidonians. This princess seems to have been a zealot for the worship of her idol, prepared to persecute to the death those who refused to abandon the service of the God of their fathers, or at least to amalgamate it with that of Baal. We find that she introduced, or greatly increased, the means for maintaining and advancing the worship of Baal, so that there were gathered in one day four hundred and fifty prophets of Baal, and four hundred prophets of "the groves," or of Ashera, who ate at the queen's table, 1 Ki. xviii. 19; as again, some years later, we read of a multitude of "the prophets of Baal, and his servants, and his priests," 2 Ki. x. 19. And in connection with this religious establishment there was a house of Baal, which Ahab built and Jehu utterly destroyed, 1 Ki. xvi. 32; 2 Ki. x. 21, 27. A similar house of Baal seems to have been erected in Jerusalem at the time when Ahab's family were intermarried with the family of David; and there is a brief record of it also being broken down, and the idolatrous emblems and persons being destroyed, on occasion of the death of Athaliah, 2 Ki. xi. 18. This deep-seated corruption and apostasy was resisted, energetically and successfully, by the great restorer of the law of Moses in Israel, the prophet Elijah; and the outward overthrow of the worship of Baal which Jehu accomplished at the time that he extirpated the house of Ahab, and seated himself on the throne of the ten tribes, was the natural expression in the sphere of social and civil politics of the spiritual revolution which the prophet had undertaken single-handed. The poison, however, does not appear ever to have been expelled from the minds of the degenerate people of Jehovah, although the history of the times of the later kings is too brief to enable us to state the particulars in the working of this pollution. Probably it never rose to the height of avowed opposition to the worship of Jehovah, as it had done in the period preceding the violent but predominantly external revolution which Jehu effected. Yet the substantial mischief continued to operate in another and a subtler form. Either Baal and Jehovah were identified in name, or else, at least, the moral character of the God of Israel was overlooked, and, in correspondence with this, the moral character required in his worship and his worshippers. In this case it would make no practical difference that the name of Baal was not in use; to all intents and purposes it might have been; and the children of Israel might be regarded as one and the same with the heathen nations round about them. It is thus that they are regarded by the prophet Amos, ch. ii. 4-12. And Hosea even speaks of the nominal worship of Jehovah as a virtual worship of Baal, Ho. ii. 6-17. In a similar manner we find the worship of Baalim introduced or patronized in Judah by king Ahaz, 2 Ch. xxviii. 2, and put down by Hezekiah, 2 Ki. xviii. 4; again established by Manasseh, who appears to have aimed at restoring the state of feeling and opinion which prevailed under Ahab's dynasty, 2 Ki. xxi. 3, compare Mi. vi. 16, and finally abolished amid the efforts at reformation on the part of Josiah, 2 Ki. xxiii. 4-14; after which we read of only "the remnant of Baal," Zep. i. 4.

The offerings to Baal were probably in part of vegetable products, Ho. ii. 5, 8; but chiefly of animals, as a bullock is mentioned, 1 Ki. xviii. 23, and even of human beings, especially children, Je. xix. 6; xxxii. 35, and many other passages, if those writers be correct, who consider Moloch to be one particular representation of Baal, the generic name of the idol. Classical writers have made it well known that such human sacrifices were common in the Tyrian and Carthaginian worship. And the frantic worship, with self-inflicted wounds, 1 Ki. xviii. 28, agrees also with the classical notices of self-mutilations of the Galli. (See Lucian, De Dea Syria, and Apuleius, in his romance of the Golden Ass, for many references to the subject.) It has been suggested that the severities of self-mutilation were connected, by a natural reaction, with the horrible impurities attending the worship of Baal and Ashtaroth. And Baal's "servants," 2 Ki. x. 19, were in all probability the same as, or intimately connected with, the קִדְּשִׁים (kdëshim, persons "consecrated" to the vilest purposes in the worship of the idol), whose existence is often mentioned, and whose removal was always an important step in the way of reformation, 1 Ki. xiv. 24; xv. 12; xxi. 46; 2 Ki. xxiii. 7. The impure nature of the worship of Belus at Babylon is noticed by Herodotus (i. 181, 182); and at Carthage by others, though there is still obscurity hanging over this latter subject. Scripture also makes repeated mention of incense being burned to Baal, Je. vii. 9; xi. 13, 17; xxxi. 29; this last passage intimating that the flat roofs of houses in Jerusalem were made to serve the purpose of altars. No doubt other contrivances were in use, after the destruction and before the erection of those "houses of Baal," in the most gorgeous period of his worship among the Israelites. The earliest mention of his worship is in this respect very simple, Nu. xxi. 41, "Balak took Balaam and brought him up into the high places of Baal"—probably some mere hill-tops—"that thence he might see the utmost part of the people." One other act of worship is mentioned in Scripture, that of kissing Baal, 1 Ki. xix. 18. This, of course, implies an image which was kissed; and occasionally the image of Baal is expressly mentioned, as in connection with its destruction by Joram, the son of Ahab, and again by Jehu, 2 Ki. x. 26; x. 28. There cannot be reasonable doubt that it is the statues of Baal which are meant, though the name of Baal is not added, where statues are often mentioned in connection with the Asherim, "the groves" of our translators, 1 Ki. xiv. 23; 2 Ki. xviii. 4; xxiii. 14; 2 Ch. xiv. 3; xxxi. 1; Mi. v. 13; for it is the same peculiar word (mattscab) מַטְּסָבָה, rendered in our version "standing image," or "statue," more strictly perhaps "pillar." And there is much probability in another identification of these images of Baal with the "sun-images," as they are well translated in the margin, the hammanim (חַמָּנִים), Is. xvii. 8; xxvii. 9; Eze. vi. 4, 6, which are said to have been above the altars of Baal, 2 Ch. xxxiv. 4. Such pillars would be very suitable for the worship of the sun-god, and easily might be, and probably were employed for sun-dials. In Je. xliii. 13, we have accordingly "the pillars of the house of the sun" (in our version, "the images of Bethshemesh") in the land of Egypt threatened with destruction by the invading army of Nebuchadnezzar. There is evidence in classical writers that, in some of the temples in which Baal was worshipped, there was no image; and in the passage already referred to, Herod. i. 181, this is asserted of the temple of Belus at Babylon; but in another temple of Zeus, who is identified with Belus, he says (c. 183) there was an image of gold, in human shape, twelve cubits high, and again a great image of him, 800 talents of gold having been spent on it and its accompaniments. And he tells (ii. 44) that at Tyre he saw the temple of Hercules (the Tyrian Hercules again being identified with Baal), with two "pillars" in it, one of gold, and one of emerald. Diodorus Siculus speaks of the image at Carthage as having outstretched hands to receive the children that were offered to it. And Gesenius has preserved two representations of him in the Monumenta Phœnicia, one with grapes and pomegranates in his hands, and one with rays of light round his head.

It is now generally admitted that heathen worship was essentially a deification of nature; and the worship of the god Baal and the goddess Ashtoreth, or, in the plural, of Baalim and Ashtaroth, was an adoration of the productive powers of nature, including a reference to the two forms in which that power is manifested in animal life, the male form and the female. But considerable difficulty has been felt by those who have attempted to identify Baal with one or other of the gods of classical mythology. As the highest divinity, he has been pronounced the same as the Greek Zeus and Roman Jupiter; also as the more ancient Cronos, or Saturn, probably on account of the human sacrifices which were offered to him. Again, he has been assumed to be Ares, or Mars, as there are traces of his being considered the god of war. More especially the Greeks identified the Belus of Tyre and its colonies with Hercules; to whom the apostate high-priest Jason sent magnificent gifts, according to 2 Mac. iv. 18-20. At Tyre he had the name occasionally of Malqereth, (מַלְקֶרֶת), contracted from MALK-QERETH [king of the city]; and the same title has been published by Gesenius from a Maltese bilingual inscription. With this title, perhaps, is to be compared that in Ju. viii. 33; ix. 4, BAAL-BERITH [owner of the covenant], he with whom the city is in league. But more frequently the Greeks appear to have rendered Baal by "the sun," or "the sun-god," as at Heliopolis and Palmyra. A Palmyrene inscription denominates him BAAL-SHEMESH, בַּעַל שֶׁמֶשׁ [owner of the sun]. And in Philo of Byblos, we are told of his title among the Phœnicians, Beel-samen, or, as it is given at Carthage by Augustine, and much earlier by Plautus in his Pœnulus, Balsamen, which is manifestly BEËL-SHAMAIN, בַּעַל שָׁמַיִן [owner of heaven], with which compare and contrast the title of the true God in the mouth of Melchisedec. It is probable that all these representations of Baal may be traced up to one common source, the sun-god being his primary character; and any little difficulties or confusion will not startle those who consider how all mythological subjects are confused, and how this was noticed by Cicero (De Natura Deorum, iii. 16), where he alludes to several Jupiters, and reckons up six Hercules; of whom he says the fourth, the son of Jupiter, is chiefly honoured by the Tyrians; and the fifth, called Belus, is worshipped in India (question, in the remote East, Babylon and beyond). Yet the learned and acute Gesenius maintained, in opposition to the general opinion, that Jupiter Belus, whom the Babylonians worshipped, and with them probably the other Baal-worshippers, was not the sun, but the planet Jupiter, as he believed that Ashtoreth was the planet Venus, and not the moon; while he admits, in his article on Ashtoreth in his Thesaurus, that the representation may have varied at different times and places. If this be granted, as the likeliest solution of some perplexities in the investigation of the subject, it is natural to suppose that the worship of the sun and moon was the earlier form of idolatry; and that it was a later refinement which connected the names of Baal and Ashtoreth with the planets Jupiter and Venus, as the stars of ill and good luck respectively. A passage in the history of Josiah's reformation in Jerusalem, 2 KI. xxiii. 5, has been appealed to on both sides, but it does not decide which of these views was taken of Baal at that time and place; "and he put down the idolatrous priests whom the kings of Judah had ordained to burn incense in the high places, in the cities of Judah, and in the places round about Jerusalem; them also that burned incense unto Baal, to the sun, and to the moon, and to the planets (now generally translated, as in the margin, 'to the twelve signs of the zodiac'), and to all the host of heaven." More light, however, may yet be thrown upon the subject by Assyrian researches now in progress. In the meantime, Rawlinson, in his translation of Herodotus, Appendix to the first book, Essay x. Nos. (iii.) and (x.) speaks of two gods Bel; the second of whom is Bel-Merodach, the planet Jupiter, while the first and more important is the second god of the first triad, Bel Nipru, whose name is possibly connected with that of Nimrod. He thinks also that it is uncertain whether Bel and Baal are from the same root.

The standard books of reference on this subject, among older authorities, are Selden, De Diis Syris, and Perizonius, Origines Babylonicae; and among recent writers, two works of Münter, on the religion of the Carthaginians and on that of the Babylonians; Gesenius, in his Commentary on Isaiah, and his article "Bel," in the Encyclopædia of Ersch and Grüber; and Mövers, in his work on the Phœnicians, and his article on the same subject in Ersch and Grüber.

3. BAAL occurs twice as name of a man, 1 Ch. v. 6; viii. 30; repeated, 1x. 30, possibly, as has been suggested, a contracted form of some compound name. It also occurs as the name of a town, 1 Ch. iv. 33, which is reckoned the same as Baalath-Bear, Jos. xix. 8, and perhaps the same as Baalah. [O. C. M. D.]

BA'ALAH, or BAALE. See KIRJATH-JEARIM, for which it is another name.

BA'ALATHI, a town in tribe of Dan, and one of the frontier towns built by Solomon, Jos. xix. 44; 1 KI. ix. 10-18.

BA'AL-BERITH [Baal, or lord, of the covenant], a Vol. I.

name given to Baal by the Canaanites of Shechem and the backsliding Israelites after the death of Gideon, Ju. viii. 33; ix. 4. (See BAAL, also SHECHEM.)

BA'AL-GAD [Baal, or owner, of good luck]. This is repeatedly named as the furthest point, in a northerly direction, of Joshua's Canaanitish expeditions and conquests, Jos. xi. 17; xii. 7; xiii. 6. The manner in which it is mentioned implies that it was a well-known place; but nothing is mentioned to mark out its position, more than that it was in the valley of Lebanon, under Mount Hermon; the word for "valley" being that which suggests a wide valley, or a "plain," as it is often translated. Some writers have assumed it to be the famous Baalbek, or Heliopolis, whose ruins are to this day among the most remarkable in the lands of the Bible; but this conjecture would necessitate a somewhat unnatural interpretation, that Baal-gad was the exclusive limit of Joshua's conquests, the first city beyond what he subdued, or rather the first country and kingdom, as Dr. W. M. Thomson understands (The Land and the Book, p. 233, 234), for the city lay considerably beyond. Others identify it with the modern village of Hasbeiya, which lies almost exactly on the line connecting Damascus with the mouth of the river Leontes, but considerably nearer the latter point than the former. A more recent opinion still, which has the support of Mr. Porter (Murray's Handbook, p. 446, 447) and Dr. Robinson, is that it was Cæsarea Philippi, long known by the name of Paneas, at present corrupted into Banias. Baal, the great object of Canaanitish worship, is thus supposed to have had a sanctuary beside the beautiful fountain which is one of the sources of the Jordan, which sanctuary became sacred to the great god Pan, in the times of Greek supremacy.

BA'AL-HA'MON [Baal, or owner, of a multitude; or, as some conjecture, Baal-Ammon, equivalent to Jupiter-Ammon], a place where Solomon had a great vineyard, Ca. v. 11. The site is unknown, unless it be a place near Dothaim, Βελαμών or Βαλαμων, Balamo, named in Judith viii. 3.

BA'AL-HA'NAN [Baal is gracious]. 1. The name of one of the earliest race of kings in Edom, Ge. xxxv. 38, 39; 1 Ch. i. 49, 50. Nothing is recorded of him, but that he was son of Achbor. 2. An officer of David, overseer of the olive-trees and the sycamore-trees that were in the "low plains," or Shephelah, 1 Ch. xxvii. 28. He is called a Gederite.

BA'AL-HA'ZOR [Baal, or owner, of a village], a place "beside Ephraim," where Absalom had sheep-shearers, and where he took his bloody and treacherous revenge on his brother Amnon, 2 Sa. xiii. 23, 24. The place is otherwise unknown, unless, as Gesenius conjectures, it be the same as Hazor in the tribe of Benjamin, Ne. xi. 33, which may answer to Tel 'Azûr in Van de Velde's map, a little to the east of a line connecting Bethel and Shiloh, and equally distant from both.

BA'AL-HERMON [Baal, or owner, of Hermon], a place mentioned Ju. iii. 3, which, by comparison with Jos. xiii. 5, has been identified with Baal-gad (which see). As it is called mount Baal-hermon, and not the city, this may agree with what was there mentioned as to Baal-gad being an old Canaanitish sanctuary on the edge of Hermon. It is again mentioned as the northern limit of the eastern half tribe of Manasseh, 1 Ch. v. 23.

BA'AL-ME'ON [Baal, or owner, of a habitation], or BETH-BAAL-MEON [house of, &c.], a town of which the Reubenites took possession, and which along with Nebo they built (perhaps rebuilt or fortified), but with a change of name, Nu. xxxiii. 38; perhaps so as to avoid the idolatrous name, for it is called Beth-meon, Je. xlviii. 23. It was held by the Reubenites till the captivity, Jea. xlii. 17; 1 Ch. v. 8, when it passed into the hands of the Moabites, to whom it is said to belong by Jeremiah and by Ezekiel, Eze. xxv. 9, who seems to make it one of three most distinguished cities in that "glorious land." Probably it is the same city which is named Beon, Nu. xxxii. 3, by a common change of b and m. Since the time of Seetzen and Burckhardt, it has been identified with certain ruins on a hill, forty-five minutes' journey or two miles south of Heshbon (Murray's Hand-book, p. 298, 299), named Ma'in; though others prefer placing it farther south, near the Wady Zurkah Ma'in, because Jerome speaks of it as a large village in his days, nine Roman miles from Heshbon, which also agrees with what he says of the vicinity of hot springs.

BA'AL-PE'OR, the name of a Moabite deity—why so called is uncertain. Having failed through Balaam to bring a curse upon the Israelites, the people of Moab seem to have been instructed by that covetous and unfaithful prophet to effect their purpose indirectly, by seducing the people into idolatry, which was too successfully accomplished by means of the daughters of Moab. This defection drew down upon them the judgment of God, in which so many as 24,000 perished, Nu. xxv. 1-9; 1 xi. 1-18. It was under the name of Baal-peor that the false deity on this memorable occasion was worshipped; and it is highly probable, though not absolutely certain, that the form of worship associated with the name was of a licentious character. As practised by the Israelites it appears to have been accompanied with wantonness and profligacy. In one place it is spoken of as peculiarly connected with the dead, Pa. cvi. 28; the worshippers "ate the sacrifices of the dead."

BA'AL-PERAZIM [owner of breaches], a name given by David to a place in or near the valley of Rephaim, on the west side of Jerusalem, where he defeated the Philistines in a remarkable manner, and in accordance with an oracle of God previously given him, 2 Sa. v. 18-20; 1 Ch. xiv. 11. The circumstance is referred to by Isaiah, and the place is called Mount Perazim, ch. xxxviii. 21. The name was imposed by David on account of the breaches which, through his instrumentality, the Lord had made on the enemy. He, or the Lord through him, had proved himself to be master of the breaches, or the discomfiture made upon the Philistine host. So that the BAAL here has no respect to the idol-god, but is taken in its appellative sense—a sense which some, in particular Gesenius, would extend to all names of places in which Baal forms part of the compound designation.

BA'AL-SHA'LISHA [Baal, or owner, of Shalisha]. This place is mentioned only in 2 Ki. iv. 42, and is unknown, unless as probably connected with the land of Shalisha, 1 Sa. ix. 4. In the Septuagint, the name seems to have stood Beth-Shalisha [the house of Shalisha].

BA'AL-TA'MAR [owner of a palm-tree], unknown except as mentioned in Ju. xx. 33. Eusebius says that in his day the local name for it was BETH-TAMAR [place of a palm-tree], and that it lay in the neighbourhood of Gibeah. The palm-tree of Deborah was between Ramah and Bethel, Ju. iv. 5; and Mr. Stanley, in his Sinai and Palestine, p. 145, 146, suggests that this may be the palm-tree alluded to. But this is less likely, on account of the peculiar form of the word for her tree, tomar; and because she judged Israel at a time subsequent to the battle of Baal-tamar.

BA'AL-ZEBUB [the fly-god] may have been either the god who was relied on for driving flies away, or their lord and master in any reverence which was paid to them. We read of Ahaziah, king of Israel, that he sent to this god at Ekron to inquire whether he should recover from an accident, 2 Ki. i. 2-6, 10, for which act he was threatened with the severest displeasure of the Lord by Elijah. In the New Testament (according to the correct text) we find this name altered to Beelzebub, the "dung-god," as if in contempt; and the Jews in our Lord's day are supposed to have employed it as a contemptuous title for Satan, the author of idolatry and the proper lord of all the false gods which the blinded nations feared, Mat. x. 25; xii. 24. (See BEELZEBUL.)

BA'AL-ZE'PHON [place of Typhon, according to Gesenius, but very doubtful], a place at or near which the Israelites encamped before Pharaoh overtook them as he pursued them to the Red Sea, Ex. xiv. 2; Nu. xxxiii. 7 (See WILDERNESS SOJOURN.)

BA'ASHA [bad, according to Gesenius; very doubtful], the first king of the second dynasty which reigned over the ten tribes. He was the instrument of vengeance whom God raised up to cut off the house of Jeroboam "who made Israel to sin," 1 Ki. xv. 27, &c. But as he did this, not out of respect to the prediction of God's prophet, but in order to gratify his own cruelty and ambition, it was itself a grievous sin, for which he in turn was called to account, ch. xvi. 7. There it is written that he provoked the Lord "to anger with the work of his hands, in being like the house of Jeroboam, and because he killed him." But this last clause might be at least as well translated "because he smote it," namely the house of Jeroboam, for Jeroboam himself seems rather to have died in peace, ch. xiv. 20. Baasha adhered in his policy to all the sins of Jeroboam, and probably went further in the direction of compelling the people to worship the calves, and to break off all intercourse with the kingdom of Judah, and the worship at Jerusalem, ch. xv. 17.

BABEL, TOWER OF. If a proper verbal uniformity had been retained in our English Bible, what is there designated the Tower of Babel, would have been called the Tower of Babylon; or Babel would have been the designation alike of the tower and the city; for in the original Babel is the word used to express both. There can be no doubt as to the proper import of the name, and the occasion which gave rise to it. A derivative of the verb (בבל) to confound, it signifies confusion, "because the Lord did there (at the building of the tower so called) confound the language of all the earth," Ge. xi. 9. And the immediate reason of his doing so, it is also expressly said, was that the families of mankind, who had leagued themselves together for the erection of a gigantic tower, might fail to understand each other, and so might be scattered abroad upon the face of all the earth. We are further told, that the purpose of Heaven in the matter was accomplished, and that from the period in question dates the formation of distinct tribes, growing into separate nationalities, and going forth from a common centre to occupy the different climes and regions of the habitable globe.

Both the aim of men in setting about the building of such a tower, and the manner of the divine frustration of it, have been the occasion of fruitful conjecture, and of diverse opinions, among sacred critics and divines. The subject also became involved in early fable and tradition, which assumed a considerable diversity of forms, but usually spake to the effect, that the race of giants who had escaped the flood formed the daring project of scaling the heavens by means of a lofty tower; that their attempt provoked the anger of the Powers above, who disconcerted the project by introducing confusion among the builders themselves, or by smiting the work of their hands with lightning and the fury of tempests. (See the accounts in Stackhouse's Hist. of the Bible, b. ii. c. 3.) It is needless here to go into details of this description. The account in Scripture, which is our only authentic source of information, ascribes to the projectors of the undertaking two definite objects, and no more—first, that they might make to themselves a name, or acquire renown as men capable of grand things; and secondly, that they might prevent a scattering of their numbers over the face of the earth. How the erection of a lofty tower was expected to secure this latter object is not indicated; but there seems no reason to believe, as has often been supposed, that it was intended for purposes of idolatry, or as a place of refuge in case of any future deluge, or with a view to the general safety and protection of the people in the surrounding regions. So far as the Bible narrative goes, the tower was to have its chief attraction as a bond of unity and local attachment from being the wonderful achievement of a still undivided race; though they would doubtless strive to have it constructed so as to fit it for serving certain social or religious purposes. But of these nothing is recorded; and the vainglorious spirit displayed in the undertaking—as if their own renown were the highest thing they had to care for—and their desire through means of it to thwart God's declared design regarding the diffusion of mankind throughout the earth, Ge. ix., were of themselves sufficient to provoke the judicial interposition of Heaven. That there was something miraculous in this interposition seems plainly implied in the narrative; as, indeed, on simply natural principles, it were impossible to account for such a confusion of language among a comparatively small population, as would be sufficient to arrest the progress of a building project, and in a manner force entire troops of the builders into a separation from their cherished home. Yet, there is no need for conceiving the interposition to have proceeded so far as to lead to the invention of languages altogether new. That economy of means which has so commonly been remarked in the later manifestations of God's miraculous working, would doubtless be observed also here; and as certain superficial changes and modal variations might have served the purpose in view, the probability is, that such chiefly at least, if not alone, were resorted to. This supposition, in accordance as it is with the general principles of the divine government, is confirmed by the ascertained results of comparative philology, which have brought out points of radical agreement, even after the lapse of many ages, between the languages of the tribes and nations who peopled the countries that lay around the seat of ancient Babylon. The scattering of the postdiluvian race of mankind, when they had become sufficiently numerous to admit of such a measure, and diffusing them abroad as the seed-corn of future nationalities, was a wholesome proceeding, and every way worthy of the special intervention of Heaven. It was one of the best safeguards against the recurrence of such enormities as had brought on the judgment of the general deluge; and laid the foundation of a world-wide and ever-growing development, such as would naturally tend to keep in check local evils, and by the better agencies of one region stimulate into action similar agencies in another. History supplies innumerable instances of the wholesome influence of race upon race, and nation upon nation; and the successive attempts made by the great ancient monarchies to weld them in a modified form together again, required for the world's own well-being to be perpetually baffled and confounded anew. (See ANTE-DILUVIAN AGE.)

The Tower of Babel, as originally projected, having been arrested in its course of erection, cannot with the least certainty be identified with any buildings of a later kind, such as the magnificent and lofty temple of Belus, of which some account will be found in the next article. That many writers of classical and Christian times did so identify them, is only a proof of the influence of ancient fable and tradition. It cannot even be known whether the original building, intended to become a tower which should pierce the very heavens, attained to any considerable elevation at all. The probabilities are rather on the opposite side; and it is, therefore, entirely out of place to bring into comparison here the edifices of the Chaldean Babylon or the Birs Nimroud of modern times. The whole that can be said respecting a historical connection between them is, that the city of Babel, begun by Nimrod, and the tower of Babel, then also or not very long afterwards commenced, probably stood much upon the same site as that occupied by the later city and its wonderful structures. The materials also for brick and cement, which were used alike in the earlier and later erections, are known to have existed there as in their native home.

BABYLON [Heb. BABEL, confusion—see preceding article], the capital of Babylonia and of the Assyrian empire under the Chaldeo-Babylonian rule. (See ASSYRIA.)

Site and Description.—Babylon, long the largest and most powerful city of antiquity (Da. iv. 30; Herod. i. 178; Joseph. viii. 6, 1), was situated in a spacious plain on each shore of the river Euphrates, about 200 miles above the junction of the Tigris, and 300 above the Persian Gulf. The dimensions of the city and the height of the wall have been variously stated, the differences probably arising from the adoption of different standards of measurement. Herodotus informs us that by reason of the extent of the city those who occupied the centre knew not when the extremities were captured (i. 191; also Je. li. 31), and gives the circumference at 480 stadia, or about 60 miles (i. 178); Strabo (xvi. c. i. 5) at 385 stadia, the height of the wall 65 feet, and the width 32 feet; Diodorus Siculus, quoting Ctesias, 360 stadia, but 368 stadia on the authority of Clitarchus, who was at Babylon with Alexander (ii. 1); Quintus Curtius (v. 1) says 368 stadia, 65 feet high, and 32 broad; and Pliny (vi. 26) 60 Roman miles, 200 feet high, and 50 feet wide.

Adopting the measurement of Herodotus, that the city was a quadrangle of 15 miles on every side, we find that the area within the walls contained 225 square miles (Nineveh, Comparative Size of Cities), a magnitude strongly corroborated by a recent traveller, M.

Jules Oppert, who has pursued his investigations during a residence of two years upon the spot, and who states that the remains cover a space of more than 200 square miles (Athenæum, Sept. 22, 1855, p. 1098). Notwithstanding the extent of the ruins, there can be little doubt that the population, as compared with modern European towns, bore no commensurate proportion to the immense area inclosed. Indeed the numerous squares exceeding two miles in circuit into which the city is described to have been divided, covered more than two thirds of the entire area, while a considerable portion of the remaining space being occupied by wide streets, fortifications, and public buildings, but a comparatively small extent was left for the dwellings of the people. That the squares were under cultivation may unhesitatingly be assumed even without the testimony of Quintus Curtius, who relates (v. 1) that sufficient arable and pasture land was contained within the walls to supply the wants of all the inhabitants. The army derived its subsistence from the whole of Assyria, the Babylonian territory providing only a third part (Herod. i. 192), thus enabling the city to accumulate stores for periods of emergency, such as the siege by Cyrus, when, according to Xenophon (Cyrop. vii. 5), it had provisions for twenty years. In the subsequent siege by Darius, son of Hystaspes, which lasted one year and seven months, the city was subdued again by stratagem, and not by famine (Herod. iii. 152). The population has been variously estimated—the conjecture of 1,200,000 being supported by the fact that Seleucia, with a population of 600,000, is stated to have been about half the size of Babylon when in her glory (Pliny, vi. 30).

Herodotus, who visited Babylon after the conquest by Cyrus, and while it still preserved much of its previous glory, is the source whence the most detailed description can be derived; and his account is substantially corroborated by the testimony and researches of all subsequent writers, and by the discoveries resulting from the excavations of the present age (Rawlinson, Trans. Asiatic and Geog. Soc.) He describes the city as a perfect square, each side being 15 miles in length, and the whole circuit 60 miles. It was surrounded first by a deep wide moat filled with water, and next by a wall 87 feet in breadth, Ja. ii. 28, and 350 feet in height. The earth dug out of the moat was consumed in making the bricks that lined its sides, and of which the wall itself was likewise built, so that some estimate may be formed of the depth and width of the moat by the height and thickness of the walls. The thirty lower courses of bricks were wattled with reeds, and the whole was cemented by hot asphalt brought from Is (Hit), a city upon a tributary of the Euphrates, eight days' journey above Babylon. On each edge of the top of the wall, like a parapet, was a line of dwellings of one story fronting each other, the road between being of sufficient width to allow of turning a chariot with four horses. In the circumference of the wall there were 100 gates, 25 on each side, all of brass, Is. xiv. 2, as were also the posts and lintels. Jeremiah, ch. xxv. 26; ii. 41, calls Babylon Sheshach—a name conjectured by C. B. Michaelis to be derived from shikshach, "to overlay with iron or other plates," whence the city might be called "brazen-gated." Diodorus adds (lib. ii.) that between every two of these gates were three towers, 10 feet above the walls, at necessary intervals, the city being defended at other points by extensive marshes. Although the outer wall was the chief defence, a second ran round within, not much inferior in strength but narrower. The city was divided into two nearly equal parts by the river Euphrates running from north to south, and the wall with wide quays outside was carried along each bank, the sides of the river being lined with brick. In the middle of each division of the city were fortified buildings; in one, the royal palace, with a spacious and strong inclosure; and in the other, the precinct of Jupiter Belus, a square building of 2 furlongs on every side. The city was intersected by streets, running in straight lines from gate to gate, there being 50 streets in all, each 15 miles in length, and 151 feet broad, with small brazen gates leading down to the river. The houses were three and four stories high. Four other streets, each 200 feet wide, the houses being only on one side, and the walls on the other, encompassed the city. The intersections of the streets formed 676 squares, each $4\frac{1}{2}$ furlongs on every side, or $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles in circuit (Diod. Sic. ii.) A bridge, a furlong in length and 60 feet wide, admirably constructed of stones, bound together with plates of lead and iron, was built across the river about the middle of the city. At each extremity of the bridge was a palace, the old palace being on the eastern, and the new on the western side of the river (Diod. ii. 8). To prevent the city suffering from the overflowing of the river during the summer months, immense embankments were raised on either side, with canals to turn the flood waters into the Tigris. On the western side of the city an artificial lake, 40 miles square, or 160 in circumference, and 35 feet deep, or 75 according to Megasthenes, was excavated, into which the river was turned during the execution of the bridge and other great works. When the river was brought back to its ancient channel, on the completion of the works, the lake became a marsh, which served as a defence for the city.

Later writers (Diodorus Sic. ii. 7, 9, 10; Strabo, xvi. c. i. 2, 5; Q. Curtius, v. c. i.), describe yet more wonderful monuments than are mentioned by Herodotus. Among these are a tunnel under the Euphrates; subterranean banqueting rooms of brass; and the famous hanging gardens. Strabo says that among the seven wonders of the world are reckoned the outer wall of the city, and the hanging garden, the shape of which was a square of 400 feet on each side, rising terrace above terrace, to the height of 350 feet, and ascended by stairs 10 feet wide. The terraces were supported by large vaultings, resting upon cube-shaped pillars, which were hollow, and filled with earth to allow trees of the largest size to be planted—the whole being constructed of baked bricks and asphalt. The entire structure was strengthened and bound together by a wall, 22 feet in thickness. The level of each terrace was covered with large stones, over which were beds of rushes, then a thick layer of asphalt, next two courses of bricks likewise cemented with asphalt, and finally plates of lead to prevent leakage. The earth being heaped on the platform and terraces, and large trees planted, the whole had the appearance from a distance of "woods overhanging mountains" (Q. Curtius, v. 5). The garden was watered by means of engines for raising water from the Euphrates, which flowed close to the base. This great work is affirmed to have been effected by Nebuchadnezzar to gratify his wife Amytis, daughter of Astyages, who retained strong predilections for the hills and groves which abounded in her native Media. As the Bible and Herodotus are both silent respecting the hanging gardens of Babylon, the marvelous accounts above cited have been doubted by almost all writers. The Assyrian sculptures in the British Museum, however, throw a most important light on this interesting subject, the uncovered ruins at Nineveh revealing representations of gardens and groves, resembling those whose very existence at Babylon has been disputed. It is not a little singular that no historian should mention the hanging gardens of Nineveh, although the stone records taken out of the palace of Sennacherib so distinctly inform us that the mounds or tals on which the palaces stood were planted with rows of fir trees, Na. II. 3, the fig, the vine, and the pomegranate. They show us also the means of irrigation, and the description of machinery used in raising water, the system being precisely that employed at the present day in irrigating corn-fields in Egypt (51, 52 of Kouyadjik Gallery, B. M.) One scene exhibits in a valley, and connecting two hills, a line of arches either to support an aqueduct or a hanging garden, or for a road planted with trees, and leading to a temple or tower at the top of a hill; a tower seeming always to have been a necessary appendage to an eastern garden (Is. v. 2; Mat. xxi. 33; Lu. xiv. 28; Meason's Landscape Architecture, Lond. 1828; Maundrell's Travels).

On the other hand, while Herodotus gives us full details of the walls of Babylon, and the Bible dwells on her "broad walls" and "high gates," Je. II. 68, both, as has been observed, are silent regarding the hanging gardens, yet Diodorus and Strabo, at a considerably later period, speak of them with positive certainty. A reasonable inference, therefore, is that the gardens did exist at Babylon, as we see they had done previously at Nineveh, and that the adornment of the numerous mounds in Assyria may have been so usual in early times as to have escaped notice by the more ancient writers, in the same way that modern writers have passed over that species of hanging garden still extant at the east of the platform supported on arches where the temple of Jerusalem once stood, and where now stands the mosque El Aksa. The palace attached to the hanging gardens of Babylon was unequalled in size and splendour. Its outer wall had a circuit of six miles, while within it were two other embattled walls and a large tower. All the gates were of brass, Is. xiv. 1, 2. The interior of this palace was splendidly decorated with statues of men and animals, and it was besides furnished with vessels of gold and silver, and with every species of luxury accumulated in the course of the extended conquests of Nebuchadnezzar. (See also Megasthenes in Abydenus, in Cory's Fragments, p. 44-46.)

The temple of Belus is described as entirely occupying one of the squares into which the city was divided. Herodotus says (i. 181, 3), that "in the midst of this precinct is built a solid tower of one stade both in length and breadth, and on this tower rose another, and another upon that to the number of eight. An ascent to these is outside, running spirally round all the towers. About the middle of the ascent there is a landing-place and seats, on which those who go up sit down and rest themselves; and in the uppermost tower stands a spacious temple, and in this temple is placed, handsomely furnished, a large couch, and by its side a table of gold. No statue has been erected within it, nor does any mortal pass the night there, except only a native woman chosen by the god out of the whole nation, as the Chaldeans, who are priests of this deity, say." This temple did not attain its full splendour until the time of Nebuchadnezzar, who greatly enlarged and beautified it. Berosus, a Babylonian and a priest of [96.] Restoration of the Temple of Belus, according to Herodotus.

Belus of the time of Alexander, appears to have sketched his history of the earlier times from the delineations upon the walls of the temple.—(Cory's Frag. p. 22-24; Es. XIII. 14.) The summit of the temple was devoted to astronomical purposes. Herodotus states (ii. 109) that the Greeks learned from the Babylonians the pole and the sun-dial, and the division of the day into twelve parts; and Calisthenes the philosopher obtained for Aristotle Chaldean observations for 1903 years, from the origin of the Babylonian monarchy to the time of Alexander. (Prideaux, Connect. part i. b. ii.; Joseph. Cont. Ap. b. i.) The first eclipse on record was observed with accuracy at Babylon—it was lunar, and happened March 19th, 721 B.C., according to Ptolemy. Strabo informs us that Alexander intended to repair the tower, and actually employed 10,000 men two months in clearing away the rubbish, but he did not survive to accomplish his great undertaking.

With the exception of the stone bridge across the Euphrates, all the great works of Babylon were constructed of sun-dried and kiln-dried bricks, generally stamped with figures or letters. (See BRICKS.) Straw or reeds were laid between the courses, and the whole was cemented either with bitumen or with mortar and slime. Vitrified bricks were much employed in building, and it has been suggested by the late Capt. Newbold, that in order to render their edifices more durable, the Babylonians submitted them when erected to the heat of a furnace. (T. K. Loftus, Travels in Chaldaea, London, 1857, p. 31.)

The country around Babylon was intersected by numerous canals, "the rivers of Babylon," Pa. CXXXVII. 1, 2, serving the purposes of drainage and irrigation, and rendering the light soil peculiarly fertile, especially in corn. The largest of these, the royal canal, which connected the Euphrates with the Tigris, was navigable for merchant vessels (Herod. i. 193, 194). The origin of this canal is traditionally attributed to Nimrod and Cush, but according to Abydenus to Nebuchadnezzar. Strabo tells us (xvi. 11) that Alexander inspected the canals and ordered them to be cleared by his followers. In clearing one in the marshes near Arabia, he opened and minutely examined the sepulchres of the kings, most of which were situated among these lakes.

History.—The foundation of the city of Babylon has been referred to the impious attempt to build a city and a tower, which resulted in the dispersion of mankind, Ge. xi. 4-9. [See under BABEL.] According, however, to some authors the founder of Babylon was Belus the Assyrian, who began to reign in the time of Shamgar, judge of Israel. Belus left his empire to his son Ninus, who was succeeded by his wife Semiramis, Ninyas, and others, their rule extending over a period of 520 years (Herod. i. 95), during the whole of which interval the province and city of Babylon were under the administration of governors appointed by the king of Assyria. Although Semiramis would appear to have removed her court to Babylon, which she enlarged, embellished with magnificent buildings, and surrounded with walls, rendering it the mighty Babylon so renowned in history (Diod. Sic. ii. 1; Herod. i. 178, 180, 184; Q. Curt. v.), yet Nineveh continued to be the supreme city of the empire until the revolt of Arbaces the Mede, who was instigated by Belesis, governor of Babylon, to overthrow the Assyrian empire (Diod. Sic. ii. 2). From this time Babylon became the seat of imperial power (Herod. i. 178), Belesis being the first king. Belesis is identified by M. Oppert (Chron. Assyrians and Babylonians) with Nabonassar, the Shalmaneser of Scripture, according to the ecclesiastical and astronomical canons of Syncellus. Syncellus tells us (Chron. 207) that Nabonassar destroyed the monuments of the kings prior to himself, in order that the enumeration of the Chaldean kings might commence with him; and from his era, B.C. 747, we have regular lists of kings, and repeated mention of the Chaldeans or Babylonians (see CHALDEANS) in Scripture. Merodach Baladan, king of Babylon (the Mardocephadus of Ptolemy), the date of whose reign is fixed by a lunar eclipse, made a treaty with Hezekiah, king of Judah, Is. xx. 12. Sennacherib levied an army against his successor Elibus (Alex. Polyhistor, Ev. Ar. Chron. 42), whom he defeated. He then appointed his own son, Esarhadon, to be king of Babylon, thus terminating a line of kings who had reigned there sixty-seven years (Ptolemy's Canon, and that of Syncellus in Cory's Fragments). Babylon continued to advance in prosperity until the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, when the era of her proper greatness commences. It was under this monarch that the Chaldeans, an old but hitherto powerless race, appeared on the scene as a great and warlike nation. It was they who invaded Judea and carried away the people into captivity, Je. xxiv. 5; xxv. 12; Eze. xii. 13; Da. i. 1, 2; Diod. Sic. ii. 12; Ptol. v.; Joseph. i.; Euseb. ix. Under Nebuchadnezzar Babylon became the mistress of the East, and her vast power caused the jealousy of surrounding nations. Pharaoh-Necho was the first to take up arms against her, and marched as far as Carchemish, on the Euphrates, where he was wholly defeated by the Babylonian army. It was immediately after this great battle that the Chaldeans marched upon Jerusalem, and carried captive to Babylon the Jewish nobles, among whom were Daniel and his three friends, Hananiah, Michael, and Azariah, while Judea remained a province of the Babylonian monarchy. Jerusalem twice rebelled after this, but it was easily reduced to obedience, although at the second rebellion Hophra, king of Egypt, came up to help the Jews. Nebuchadnezzar defeated the Egyptians, and took away from them all their possessions in Palestine, Arabia, and Cyprus. The conquest of Egypt was the crowning work of Nebuchadnezzar's active life; and on his return to Babylon he seems to have devoted the remainder of his reign to improving and beautifying the city, most of the great works for which it became famous being due to him or to Nitocris his queen. Evil-Merodach succeeded Nebuchadnezzar, and Belshazzar succeeded Evil-Merodach (Berosus in Joseph. i. Cont. Apion. p. 1045). But the Median power was now rising. The Medes were in close alliance with the Persians, and the young Cyrus, at the head of the united armies, routed the Babylonians in several battles, and at last conquered Babylon and terminated the monarchy, Is. xlv. 1; Xenophon, Cyrop. vii. 5; Herod. i. 191; Da. v. Babylon now remained subject to the Persian power till the reign of Darius Hystaspes, when it revolted. The revolt was suppressed, but Darius punished the Babylonians by removing the brazen gates and destroying the walls (Herod. iii. 159). Xerxes is reported to have plundered and defaced the temple of Belus, (Strabo, xvi. 5). Notwithstanding its conquest by Persia, Babylon continued a large city, and the capital of the plain watered by the Tigris and Euphrates. Though no longer the seat of government, it was still the seat of trade, and of great importance when visited by Alexander, on his overthrow of the Persian monarchy, B.C. 324. Alexander died there, and on the division of his wide conquests among his generals, Babylon in a few years became the kingdom of Seleucus and his successors. Seleucus Nicator founded and fortified Seleucia on the Tigris, 300 stadia distant from Babylon, and transferred to it the seat of empire (Strabo, xvi. 5). From this time Babylon rapidly declined, but though in ruins, it was still a place of importance at the commencement of the Christian era, 1Pe. v. 13. It is said by Jerome to have been turned into a hunting park by the Parthian kings who overthrew the Seleucidian dynasty. In the early days of Arab power the great Babylon had dwindled to a mere name, and A.D. 1101, the present town of Hillah was founded on part of its site. (See also Josephus, Ant. i. 9; Q. Curtius, v. 1; Pliny, ii. 26; Pomp. Mela, i.; Ptol. v. 20; vi. 26; Sharpe's Hist. of Egypt, vol. i. 282; Is. xiii. 1-22; xiv. 4-27; xxi. 9; xlv. 27, 28; xlv. 1-3; xvi. 1, 2; xlvii. 1-15; Je. xxv. 2-14; l. 1-46; li. 1-64.)

Ruins and Remains.—The ruins of Babylon are indescribably grand, desolate, and suggestive, the extensive plain for miles around being studded with vast mounds of earth and brick, some imposing ruins, and heaps of sun-dried and kiln-burned bricks. Intermingled with the surrounding rubbish are highly vitrified bricks, fragments of glass, pottery, marble, inscribed bricks, and bitumen, while the soil itself is so impregnated with nitre as to destroy all vegetation, rendering the desolation of the scene yet more impressive. The first and most important of the mounds is the Birs Nimroud, supposed by Niebuhr, Rich, and others, to be the temple of Belus, which Herodotus tells us was separated from the palace by the river. It is situated rather more than six miles from Hillah, the rugged tower standing amidst and crowning extensive masses of ruin (Chesney, Survey of Euphrates). According to Rich, the mound rises to 198 feet high, having on its summit a compact mass of brick-work 37 feet high by 28 feet broad, the whole being thus 235 feet in perpendicular height. Rawlinson gives the entire height, exclusive of the tower on the top, as 155 feet. It is rent into two parts nearly the whole way down, and the base is surrounded by immense unshapen piles of brick-work bearing unmistakable evidence of fire. The excavations of Rawlinson in 1854 confirm the correctness of the observations made by Rich, Ker Porter, and Buckingham, of the existence of several stages noticed in the earlier part of this article. He found it laid out in the form of seven terraces, arranged in the order in which the Chaldeans or Sabeans supposed the planetary spheres to exist, each terrace being painted in different colours, in order to represent its respective planet (Rawlinson, Meeting of British Association, Glasgow, Sept. 18th, 1855; and Transactions of Royal Asiatic Society, Jan. 1855.) The angles face the cardinal points. The lowest stage, black (Saturn), consists of bricks covered with bitumen; the second stage (the Earth), of brownish bricks; the third stage (Mars), of red bricks; the fourth stage (the Sun), of yellow bricks gilt; the fifth stage (Mercury), yellow green bricks; the sixth stage (Venus), blue; the ruined tower on the summit, of gray bricks. The relative dimensions of each stage are as follows:—

	HEIGHT.	BREADTH.
The lowest	27 ft.	13 ft.	30 ft.	30 ft.	30ft.
The second	27	13	30	30	30
The third	27	13	28	30	28
The fourth	20	13	27	30	27
The fifth	27	13	28	30	28

155 feet.

A passage has been discovered in the second stage, and it is surmised that the stairs for ascending to the top were on the north-eastern side. Within the brick-work at the northern and eastern corners of the third stage were found two terra cotta cylinders (now in the British Museum) inscribed with the history of the building, and stating that having fallen into decay in the course of the 504 years since it was erected, it had been repaired by Nebuchadnezzar, &c. This would fix the date of the original structure at 1100 B.C. Diagrams are subjoined of the temple of Belus according to Herodotus, of the restoration which Rawlinson's excavations have brought to light, and of the great pyramid of Ghiza, as compared with the Birs Nimroud.

The first great ruin seen on approaching ancient

[97.] Birs Nimroud, from the North-west.—From a sketch by J. Baillie Fraser.

Babylon from the north, is the high pile of unbaked brick-work, the mound of Babel, called by Rich "Mujelebeh," but which is known to the Arabs as "Babel" (Ainsworth, Res. in Assyria, p. 169; Layard, Nin. and Bab. p. 491; Loftus, Chald. and Sus. p. 17). It lies four miles and a quarter north of Hillah, having a square superficies of 49,000 feet, and at its south-eastern corner attains an elevation of 64 feet. To the south of this is a great mound also called Mujelebeh, or Kasr, from the ruin upon it having a square superficies of 120,000 feet, and a height of only 28 feet. The great brick ruin, called the Kasr, or Palace, about 70 feet in height according to Rich, stands at the south-west corner of this central mound. To the south is the Amram Ibn Ali, having an area of 164,000 feet, and an elevation of 23 feet. The whole of these ruins lie within a compass of two and a half square miles (Ainsworth, op. cit.) I find an old corroboration of the central mound being the Mujelebeh in Beauchamp—"This heap (the Kasr, and the mount of Babel, are commonly called by the Arabs Makloubah, that is to say, turned topsy-turvy,"—quoted by Major Rennell in his Illustrations to the Geography of Herodotus.

This will explain how the mounds of Babel, and that with the Kasr and Atheleh in it have come to be confounded under the name of Mujelibeh. There is also the following passage in Fraser's Assyria, p. 130:—It (Babel) is called by the Arabs Mukalibé, or Mujelibé, the first of which words means the "overturned," a term which, Mr. Rich observes, is sometimes applied to the Kasr. The Mujelebeh has been read as if it were Mukalliba, from Kilba, the "overturned or overthrown;" whereas a much nearer affinity exists in Mujelebeh, plural of Jelib, "a slave or captive, the house of the captives," and not improbably the residence of the Israelites who remained in Babylon. This reading is favoured by the name Harút and Marút given to the mound by the natives, from a tradition, that near the foot of the ruin there is an invisible pit, where D'Herbelot relates that the rebellious people are hung with their heels upwards until the day of judgment (Ainsworth, Researches in Assyria, 169). The sides of the mound Babel, called by Rich Mujelebeh, face the cardinal points. Near the summit, on the western side, is a low wall of unburned bricks, mixed with chopped straw or reeds, and having between every course of bricks a layer of reeds. The whole is cemented with clay mortar. On the north side similar remains may be traced, and the south-west angle is surmounted by a species of turret. In the northern face is a recess, whence a passage branches off, sloping upwards in a westerly direction. Upon excavating here Mr. Rich arrived at a hollow pier 60 feet square, lined with brick cemented with bitumen, and filled with earth, the whole corresponding with Strabo's description of the hollow piers which supported the hanging gardens, and which received trees of the largest size (see ante). Rich also discovered, in a continuation of this passage, in an easterly direction, a wooden coffin containing a skeleton. A little farther on the skeleton of a child was found, whence it has been surmised that the Mujelebeh was a pyramidal tomb for the dead, but Ainsworth conjectures that it was an ancient temple of Belus.

The sculptures, inscribed bricks, and glazed and coloured tiles found at the Kasr, have caused it to be generally regarded as the site of the large palace celebrated for its hanging gardens. General Chesney says (Exp. to Euphr. and Tig. ii. 615), that in 1831 there was a passage under the Kasr formed with bricks in the manner of a modern vault; but in 1836 the bricks composing this part of the ruins were entirely removed. This he believed to be the remnant of the tunnel or subterraneous communication between the two palaces (Diod. Sic. book ii. c. ix.) From the portions of wall still standing, and from the surrounding detached masses, it would appear that all the bricks used were baked, and that the face of each was invariably placed downwards. It was in this mound that Rich found a rudely executed lion of colossal dimensions. Chesney observes that on a careful examination it appears to be an elephant crushing a man beneath his ponderous weight. A portion of the back may be distinguished; but the space cut out of the back for the howdah leaves no doubt that an elephant was represented (ii. 631). On the north side of the Kasr stands the solitary tree called by the Arabs Atheleh, and which, notwithstanding its great antiquity, still bears spreading green branches. According to tradition, it sheltered the caliph Ali when sinking with fatigue after the battle of Hillah. The Atheleh is the Tamarisk orientalis. Rich says, by mistake, lignum vite. It is very common in Egypt.

The mound called Amram Ibn Ali has been plausibly identified with the western palace. The foregoing three groups of mounds were all inclosed by ridges and mounds of ramparts forming two lines of defence in the shape of a triangle, of which the mound of Babel, called by Rich the Mujelebeh, was one solid angle; the other beyond Amram, and the third to the east. The fourth quarter is marked in its central space by the mound Al-Heimar, or Hamúr, an isolated eminence having a superficies of 16,000 feet, and an elevation of 44 feet, with a ruin on the summit 8 feet high (Ainsworth). Al-Heimar on the east, and Birs Nimroud on the south, form two corners of a vast square (Loftus). Within the date-groves of Hillah are mounds indicating the existence of older foundations, and which may eventually prove to be a portion of the lost western half of ancient Babylon (Loftus). It is said, that in the time of Alexander, antique monuments abounded in the Lamúm marshes, which are 76 miles south of Babylon; and Arrian says that the monuments or tombs of the Assyrian kings were reported to be placed in the marshes; a report nearly substantiated by the fact that Messrs. Fraser and Ross found glazed earthenware coffins on some of the existing mounds.

Beyond Sârdt, and below Kût Amarah, are the ruins of a bridge of masonry over the Tigris, which bridge was probably on the line of road attributed to Semiramis. At Teib the road joins a causeway of considerable length, and it possibly terminated at or near Tel Heimâr (Ainsworth). In the excavation of these mounds tens of thousands of bricks have been found, all stamped with the combination of characters which has been read as Nebuchadnezzar. Rawlinson says "that every ruin from some distance north of Bagdad, as far south as the Birs Nimroud, is of the age of Nebuchadnezzar. I have examined the bricks in situ, belonging perhaps to one hundred different towns and cities within this area of about 100 miles in length, and 30 or 40 in breadth, and I never found any other legend than that of Nebuchadnezzar, son of Nabopalsar, king of Babylon."

Since Darius destroyed the walls of Babylon, 2300 years ago, the ruins have been a never-failing brick-field, city after city being built from its materials. Seleucia by the Greeks, Ctesiphon by the Parthians, Al Meidan by the Persians, Kufa, Kerbella by the Caliphs, Hillah, Bagdad, besides innumerable towns, villages, &c., have all arisen in succession from the ruins of the mighty Babylon. The floods of the Euphrates have assisted in disintegrating and burying the remains, until no single locality recorded in history can as yet be identified with certainty.

The modern town of Hillah, on the right bank of the Euphrates, occupies nearly the centre of the southern part of the old inclosures. It is surrounded by mud walls and a deep ditch, and has four gates. The population now is from 9000 to 10,000, including a considerable number of Jews. In the time of Benjamin of Tudela, Hillah contained 10,000 Jews and four synagogues. Oppert says, "This town was built in the eleventh century, when the Euphrates, which, since the fifth century of our era, had taken another direction, re-entered its old Chaldæan bed. It is the custom of the oriental people to settle on ruins; so that most of their cities, and all kubbets and worship-places occupy the sites of more ancient buildings. The Mahometan city of Hillah was built from Babylonian materials, and I dare say, there is not a single room where a brick might not be seen stamped with the name of Nebuchadnezzar." The Euphrates at Hillah in its medium state is 450 feet wide, and 7½ feet deep. Its mean velocity is 2½ miles an hour. It annually overflows its banks, inundating the surrounding country for many miles, and filling the canals with which it is intersected. The soil is extremely fertile, and the air salubrious.

BABYLON, SYMBOLICAL, or MYSTICAL.

Babylon in this sense occurs only in the book of Revelation. Romish writers generally, and some also among Protestants, would understand the expression in 1 Pe. v. 13, "The church at Babylon, elected together with Vol. I.

you," of Babylon in a mystical sense, namely of pagan Rome. But this is against all probability. There is no conceivable reason why Peter should have disguised under such a figurative appellation the place from which he wrote his epistle; and in an epistle remarkable for its simplicity and directness of speech, it would have been a sort of anomaly to fall at its close upon a symbolical designation of his place of residence, for which the epistle itself could furnish no key, and which is also without parallel in any of the other epistles of the New Testament. The Apocalypse differs from these portions of Scripture, in being written throughout in symbolical language; and it was therefore perfectly natural that, among other appropriations of ancient names and relations to indicate things of a corresponding nature in Christian times, Babylon, which played so important a part in the history of the covenant-people, should have found a place. Even when introduced there it is accompanied with a note of explanation as to the sense in which it is to be taken, "Upon her (i.e. the whore's) forehead was a name written, MYSTERY, BABYLON THE GREAT, the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth," Re. xvii. 5. The name is thus avowedly employed as a mystical designation of a party, personified as a woman of loose character, of an arrogant and blasphemous spirit, persecuting the saints of God, and exercising a corrupt and dominant influence over the kingdoms of the earth (represented by her sitting upon the beast with seven heads and ten horns, the symbol of the worldly powers, ver. 3); and so employed, it is scarcely possible to avoid thinking of a degenerate and virtually apostate church, which, instead of continuing, what she had at first appeared to the apocalypticist, as a chaste woman, flying to a place of refuge in order to preserve her fidelity to God and freedom from worldly pollution, ch. xii. 1, 14, had gradually become changed in her position and character, so as, like Babylon of old, to contain indeed within her the true seed of God, but to act unfaithfully and oppressively towards them, the corrupter of their virtue, and while professing to be a friend, in reality the most dangerous and determined enemy of their true interest. This natural impression of the symbolical meaning is confirmed, and rendered in a manner certain, by the place where this corrupt personage, bearing the name of mystical Babylon, was described by St. John—namely, in the wilderness, ch. xvii. 3, the most unsuitable place to look for a reigning political power, or an earthly city viewed as the seat and centre of worldly dominion, but the exact and proper locality, if the party thus represented was a spiritual power, and a power historically connected with that which had been before seen flying into the wilderness—although meanwhile sadly transformed as regards its own state and its relation to the kingdoms of the world. Such characteristics cannot by any fair interpretation be considered as meeting in pagan Rome, but they do most palpably meet in papal Rome; not, however, the city so called, but the system of corrupt and heathenized Christianity of which the pope is the head and representative. The representation, undoubtedly, has its grandest historical embodiment there, yet not its only one; for wherever the professedly Christian church has fallen from its purity of faith and practice, has imbibed the spirit of the world, and opposed and persecuted the true people of God, there also is to be seen the sad and mournful spectacle of the woman having become an harlot, or Jerusalem transformed into a Babylon.

BACA [weeping? mulberry-tree?], THE VALLEY OF, Pa. lxxxiv. 6, is not known in any way except as mentioned in this passage. It may mean "the valley of weeping," and so would answer to such a place as Bochim, Ju. ii. 8. Whether it refers to any actually existing valley in particular, such as that valley with mulberry-trees (according to our version), 2 Sa. v. 23, in which David overthrew the Philistines, is altogether uncertain. It may be a mere personification of a moral state, and may describe the faith and patience of the pilgrims who travelled through any dreary or desert portion of the way with cheerfulness, as they journeyed onwards to appear before God in Zion. This is certainly the use which Christians most justifiably make of the passage in reference to their own pilgrimage to the Jerusalem which is above. In the version of the English Prayer Book, it is "the vale of misery."

BADGER; the English rendering of חַרְשֵׁת, (tachash), an animal whose skin was employed for the outer covering of the tabernacle in the wilderness, Ex. xxvi. &c., as well as for protecting the ark of testimony, the table, the candlestick, the golden altar, the instruments of ministry, and the altar of burnt-offering, Nu. iv., during the transport of these from place to place. That the same skin was used for making shoes, probably of delicate texture for ladies, appears from Eze. xvi. 10, where Jehovah, pathetically setting forth the ingratitude of Jerusalem under the figure of a delicate and beautiful woman whom he had brought up from infancy, says, "I shod thee with tachash skin."

That no animal corresponding to the badger is intended is universally admitted by competent judges. There is no such animal in Syria, Arabia, or Egypt; and if there were, it would be absurd to suppose that a sufficient number of the skins of so small and solitary an animal could have been found in the possession of the Israelites on their exodus from Egypt, to meet the requirements of the tabernacle and all its furniture. It becomes then a matter of interest to inquire what was the tachash.

Two identifications have been proposed, each of which has considerable plausibility, both on the ground of etymology and on that of local abundance. The first of these would make it a kind of whale common in the Red Sea. Thevenot speaks of a kind of sea-man, which is taken near the port of Tor. "It is a great strong fish, and hath two hands, which are like the hands of a man, saving that the fingers are joined together with a skin, like the foot of a goose; but the skin of the fish is like the skin of a wild goat or chamois. When they spy that fish, they strike him on the back with harping irons, as they do whales, and so kill him. They use the skin of it for making bucklers, which are musket-proof." Niebuhr adds the information that "a merchant of Abushahr called dahash that fish which the captains of English ships call porpoise." The same traveller reports that he saw prodigious schools of these animals swimming. Professor Ruppell ascertained by personal examination, that the creature in question was a sort of dugong, a genus of marine Pachydermata, to which he gave the name of Halicore tabernaculi, from a conviction that it was the tachash of Moses. It grows to eighteen feet in length.

Certainly many of the requisite conditions are satisfied by this identification: an animal bearing the same name—dahash = tachash—of large size, existing in prodigious numbers, in the immediate vicinity of the wilderness of Sinai, whose skin is habitually used in the arts. And yet there seems an insuperable objection to it. Of those creatures that were ceremonially unclean, it was ordained that any part of their carcass touching man, or any vessel, should render it unclean. Now, the Halicore must certainly have come into this category, for it was decreed—"All that have not fins nor scales in the seas, . . . they shall be an abomination unto you," Le. xi. 10. To suppose, therefore, that the tabernacle, and its most holy vessels, the ark of the covenant, the altars, &c., were habitually covered with the skin of an abomination, is utterly impossible.

Another suggestion is made by Colonel H. Smith, to which we are inclined to accede. He says, "Negroland and Central and Eastern Africa contain a number of ruminating animals of the great antelope family; they are known to the natives under various names, such as pacasse, empacasse, thacasse, facasse, and tachaitze, all more or less varieties of the word tachash: they are of considerable size, often of slaty and purple gray colours,¹ and might be termed stag-goats and ox-goats. Of these one or more occur in the hunting scenes on Egyptian monuments; and therefore we may conclude that the skins were accessible in abundance, and may have been dressed with the hair on for coverings of baggage, and for boots, such as we see worn by the human figures in the same processions. Thus we have the greater number of the conditions of the question sufficiently realized to enable us to draw the inference that tachash refers to a ruminant of the aigocerine or damaline groups, most likely of an iron-gray or slaty coloured species."² [P. H. G.]

BAGS. Scripture mentions a peculiar use of bags, which has prevailed down to this day in the East, for holding money. The currency being chiefly or wholly in silver, it has become of importance, both for payments to government, and for ordinary transactions between individuals, to have large sums ready counted, and sealed up in a bag; and as long as the known seal continues unbroken, these bags are passed from hand to hand with perfect confidence as containing the money which they are alleged to do. The practice has been traced back to that remote antiquity to which the monuments of Egypt belong, and we have no reason to think that it was unusual among the Jews. Naaman bound two talents of silver in two bags for Gehazi, 2KI. v. 23. The scribe of king Josiah and the high-priest bound up (in the margin of our version; well rendered "put up in bags" in the text itself), and told or counted the money that was found in the house of the Lord, 2KI. xii. 10. But as even these bags do not last for ever, our Lord bids us "provide bags which wax not old," Lu. xii. 33.

BAHURIM [youths]. Apparently this place was not far from Jerusalem in an easterly direction, as it is named in close connection with Enrogel and the Mount of Olives, and as Shimei, who belonged to it, was of the tribe of Benjamin. It is repeatedly mentioned in the history of David, 2Sa. iii. 16; xvi. 5; xvii. 18. One of his officers, Azmaveth, was a Baharumite, 1Ch. xi. 33, or Barhumite, as it is written, 2Sa. xiii. 31.

BALAAM [not a people, perhaps implying an alien, compare Lo-ammi, Ho. i. 9, so Gesenius; or destructive to a people, according to Simonis], a remarkable soothsayer, whose history is given in Nu. xxii.—xxiv. He belonged to Aram or Syria, the mountains of the east, was the son of Beor or Bosor, 2Pe. ii. 15, and dwelt at "Pethor, which is by the river of the land of the children of his people;" from which expressions it has been thought probable that he came from the countries watered by the Tigris or the Euphrates; as, indeed, his country is said to have been Mesopotamia, Da. xiii. 4, it may be from the very country of Abraham, Ur of the Chaldees, since the Chaldeans were always famous among ancient nations for their skill in divining. When the Moabites became alarmed at the appearance of the Israelites among them, on their way from Egypt to Canaan, Balak the king of Moab twice sent an urgent request by some of his chief nobles, and rendered it the more effective by the promise of gifts and honours, to induce Balaam to come and curse this people, that so he might prevail against them. The first time Balaam was expressly forbidden by the Lord to go, and accordingly he refused; the second time he received permission to go, either a permission given in anger on account of his importunity, or a permission resting upon some condition which he disregarded, ch. xxii. 20, 21. Since he went thus perversely, the angel of the Lord met him in the way, resisted him, rebuked him by making his ass speak, 2Pe. ii. 16, and finally permitted him to go forward only with a spirit thoroughly humbled and prepared to adhere most scrupulously to what the Lord should put into his mouth. Much needless ridicule has been directed by unbelievers against the account of Balaam and his ass; and apologists for the truth of the Bible have sometimes been led to explain the transaction as a vision. But the plain historical statement need give no trouble to those who believe that the serpent spoke with Eve: if one creature was made to speak as the instrument of Satan, another might well do the same as an instrument of the great Angel of the Covenant.

Balaam did go forward to Balak and built altars, certainly the first time, and probably on the subsequent occasions, at the high places of Baal, and offered sacrifices, and used enchantments. But four times he uttered prophecies, which are among the noblest and distinctest in Scripture, bearing testimony to the calling of Israel to be the chosen people of Jehovah, to the blessings which were in store for them, and which no enchantment, or curse, or force, could take from them, to the rise of the Star out of Jacob, and to the destruction of all his enemies. Balak seems to have parted from him in the utmost displeasure, and he went back to his own place, Nu. xxiv. 10-13, 25. But somehow he must have been induced to return to Balak, for it was with him that the contrivance originated by which the Israelites brought a curse upon themselves, Ba. ii. 14. (See BAAL-PEOR). And he met his death by the sword among the Midianites whom the children of Israel destroyed, when they had returned to the God of their fathers, and had been directed by him to take vengeance on their seducers, Nu. xxxi. 8, 16; Jos. xiii. 21, 22.

There are difficulties in Balaam's history which cannot now be fully removed: in particular, that so worthless a man should seem to be a prophet of Jehovah, and should actually be the mouth-piece of four prophecies which hold a remarkable place in the pages of Scripture. Perhaps we may say this much in partial explanation, that the knowledge of Jehovah in patriarchal times, as appears from the cases of Melchisedec, and Job, and Jethro, survived to some degree amidst general corruption and idolatry; that such also was the case in the native country of Abraham, which, in its moral and religious condition, was certainly superior to Canaan and the surrounding districts, Ge. xxiv. 3, 4; xxvii. 46; that Balaam may have had this head-knowledge to a large extent, and may have prided himself on it, while it had no proper influence on his heart, while, in fact, on the contrary, he was turning it to the purposes of those who think that gain is godliness, by trading with the name of the great God in his practice of divination, 2Pe. ii. 14-16; Jude 11; that God was pleased to use this ungodly man to bear witness to the cause of truth, and to the interests of his Chosen and Anointed, when the church was passing from its patriarchal to its Mosaic form, as again he was pleased to call in such witness from without in the case of Caiaphas, when the church was passing from its Mosaic to its Christian form, Jn. xi. 49-52; that the extorted blessing of this enemy was peculiarly encouraging to the Israelites in their difficult position; and that, finally, he set up this man as a beacon, to warn mankind in all time coming of the awful ruin which impends over the heads of those who handle the Word of God deceitfully, and speak in his name, while they take no personal interest in his covenant which they take into their mouth. [G. C. M. D.]

BALADAN. See MERODACH-BALADAN.

BALAK [empty]. He was the son of Zippor, and the king of Moab at the time that the Israelites were passing by his country to take possession of the land of Canaan. (For the particulars of his history, see the article BALAAM.) It appears from Ju. xi. 25, that he consented to let the Israelites alone, however unwillingly he may have done so, when he found that Balaam positively refused to curse them. This exactly agrees with the language of his invitation to the soothsayer, Nu. xxii. 6. In Jos. xxiv. 9 he is said to have arisen and warred against Israel; yet this is explained as consisting in his sending and calling for Balaam.

BALANCE. That a balance with scales was early known to the Hebrews, and in frequent use, is evident from the familiar references to it in Old Testament Scripture, Le. xix. 36; Job vi. 2; xxxi. 6; Ho. xii. 7, &c. No indication, however, is anywhere given of the kind of instrument employed; and, as in such matters the Hebrews were imitators rather than inventors, the natural supposition is, that the common balance of Egypt was that also commonly employed amongst them. Of this we are furnished by Lepsius with a representation from an Egyptian tomb, in which a person appears to be weighing rings of gold or silver, with weights in the form of a bull's head.

Another specimen has been given by Wilkinson from the monuments of Thebes; concerning which he says, "The principle of it was simple and ingenious; the beam passed through a ring suspended from a horizontal rod, immediately above and parallel to it, and, when equally balanced, the ring, which was large enough to allow the beam to play freely, showed when the scales were equally poised, and had the additional effect of preventing the beam tilting when the goods were taken out of one and the weights suffered to remain in the other. To the lower part of the ring a small plummet was fixed; and this being touched by the hand, and found to hang freely, indicated, without the necessity of looking at the beam, that the weight was just" (Anc. Egyptians, iii. 240). There are still other specimens, one in particular of a balance used for weighing gold or other metals, in which the cross beam turned upon a pin at the summit of the upright pole, and, instead of strings suspending the scales, there was an arm on either side terminating in a hook, to which the precious metal was attached in small bags. The Assyrian monuments furnish another example, which exhibits, however, nothing peculiar in structure, and seems to represent warriors bearing away in triumph the idols of the conquered nations, or breaking them in pieces, and dividing the fragments.

In a figurative respect, the balance is usually employed in Scripture as an emblem of justice and fair dealing, for example, Job xxxi. 6; Ps. lxxii. 9; Pr. xi. 1; but in one passage, a pair of balances or scales appears to be taken as an image of scarcity, betokening that provisions would need to be weighed out with scrupulous care and economy, Re. vi. 6. Other interpretations of the symbol have been given, but that now adverted to is so much the most natural, that it has received the support of all the better expositors.

BALD LOCUST [𐤁𐤏𐤍, solám], some insect of the orthopterous order, and probably of the family Gryllidæ, the use of which as food is permitted to Israel in Le. xi. 22. In cases like this, where only the bare appellation of some animal is given, occurring nowhere else in Scripture, the attempt to identify it is almost hopeless. The effort to elicit the meaning by seeking out the Hebrew root generally ends in disappointment; or if it satisfies the investigator, it usually satisfies no one else. The Septuagint translation sometimes affords help; but in the present case, much dependence cannot be placed on the traditional meaning of an obscure term some fourteen centuries old. It here renders the word by ἀτρακός, about which we have scarcely any more certainty than about the original. All we can conjecture is that, since it is included among "the flying creeping things that go upon all four, which have legs above their feet, to leap withal upon the earth"—a graphic definition of the locust tribe—it is no doubt some one of the very numerous species of this family, which abound during the dry season in Western Asia.

The field which we regard as most likely to yield fruit in this line of investigation is as yet almost untried. If an observant and careful naturalist were to collect the specimens of natural history in Palestine and the neighbouring countries, procuring the local names by which they are known in the Syriac, Arabic, Turkish, and other languages, and doing this, not by one or two inquiries, but by many, and in various localities, it might be found that appellations of three thousand years old, to which there have seemed no clue, are still extant. [P. H. G.]

BALDNESS is spoken of in Scripture as a defect which seriously interfered with comeliness or beauty; and the more naturally so, as the hair was permitted in many cases to grow with peculiar luxuriance by way of ornament. Hence, baldness was a common mark of mourning, Je. xvi. 6; Eze. vii. 18, &c., and was a punishment inflicted on captives, De. xxi. 12; Ia. iii. 24. It may have also been regarded with dislike, as affording a certain ground for suspicion of leprosy, Le. xiii. 40-42. But the address of the mocking young people at Bethel to Eliasha, "Go up, thou baldhead," 2 Ki. ii. 23, may denote nothing more than their opinion that he was old, and had been long enough in the world, so might now go up to heaven, as he alleged that his master had gone. Baldness of itself was expressly distinguished from the leprosy, but, at the same time, it had certain points of contact with it, Le. xiii. 40-44; as indeed almost all the directions for the priests who examined a suspected leper, included some reference to the state of the hair. Also, in the mysterious case of leprosy in a garment, one of the marks of disease was a bareness, or, as the marginal translation more literally presents the original, a baldness, Le. xiii. 56. The priests were forbidden to make baldness on their heads, as well as to shave off the corners of their beards, Le. xxi. 5; to which prohibition Ezekiel alludes, ch. xlv. 20, "Neither shall they shave their heads, nor suffer their locks to grow long: they shall only poll their heads." The Jewish interpretation of the statutes therefore excluded a bald priest from ministering at the altar; though this must be regarded as an inference merely, for baldness is not mentioned in the list of disqualifications, Le. xxi. 17-20, though it might be connected with a cutaneous disease which is named there. The army of Nebuchadnezzar is said to have grown bald in the course of the siege of Tyre, Esa. xlix. 18; but this was apparently in consequence of hardships, perhaps especially the carrying of heavy burdens on their shoulders. It therefore indicated nothing in the way of reproach, nor implied the existence of disease.

BALM OF GILEAD. Our English word balm, and its French equivalent baume, are the contracted form of balsam, a word (Βάλσαμον) which the Greeks have adopted from the Hebrew words בַּיַּת and רֶשֶׁת, lord or chief of oils. In ordinary language the word is used very loosely, but here we are only concerned with the substance to which the English translation of the Bible has given this name.

As early as the days of Jacob the district of Gilead yielded aromatic substances which were in great request. After casting Joseph into a pit, we are told that his brothers espied a caravan on its way from Gilead to Egypt, "with their camels bearing spicery, and balm and myrrh," Ge. xxxvii. 25. Afterwards, when Jacob despatched his embassy into Egypt, his present to the unknown ruler included "a little balm," Ge. xliii. 11; and at an interval of more than 1000 years later, we find that the same region was still celebrated for the same production, for we find Jeremiah asking, "Is there no balm in Gilead?" and from an expression in the prophet Ezekiel, we find still later that balm was one of the commodities which Hebrew merchants carried to the market of Tyre, Esa. xxvii. 17. In all these passages the original word is טַרְשִׁי, tsari.

During the interval, however, between Jacob and Jeremiah, we are told by Josephus that the queen of Sheba brought "the root of the balsam" as a present to Solomon (Antiq. book viii. 6, 6); and there can be no doubt that, in the later days of Jewish history, the neighbourhood of Jericho was believed to be the only spot where the true balsam grew, and even there its culture was confined to two gardens, the one twenty acres in extent, the other much smaller (Theophrastus).

In the region of Gilead the only production now which has any affinity to balm or balsam is a species of Elaagnus, from the kernels of which a balsamic oil is extracted (Journal of Deputation of Malta Protestant College, p. 406); and even the balsam gardens of Jericho have perished and left no trace. There is little reason, however, to doubt that the plants with which they were stocked were the Amyris Gileadensis, or A. opobalsamum, which was found by Bruce in Abyssinia, the fragrant resin of which is known in commerce as the "balsam of Mecca." Like most plants yielding gum or gum-resin, the Amyris requires a high temperature to elaborate its peculiar principle in perfection; and in the deeply depressed and sultry valleys of the Jordan it would find a climate almost as congenial as that of Yemen, where we find it now. Nor is it impossible that there may have existed in Gilead at an early period a plantation of the self-same Amyris; but, yielding to the superior qualities of the queen of Sheba's newly imported specimens, the growth of Gilead may have become obsolete, and bequeathed its name and honours to its more favoured rival.

The Amyris Gileadensis is an evergreen shrub or tree, belonging to the natural order Amyridacæ. Its height is about fourteen feet, with a trunk eight or ten inches in diameter. The wood is light and open, and the small and scanty leaves resemble rue. After the dog-days, when the circulation of the sap is most vigorous, incisions are made into the bark, and the balsam is received in small earthen bottles. The supply is very scanty. Three or four drops exude in a day through a single orifice, and the entire amount yielded by the gardens of Jericho did not exceed six or seven gallons a year. When first exuded the balsam is of a whitish tinge, inclining to yellow, and somewhat turbid, and its odour is almost as pungent as volatile salts; but, after standing some time, it becomes pellucid and deepens to an almost golden colour. With its gem-like appearance, its aromatic odour, and its great rarity—being worth twice its weight in silver—it has always been highly valued in the East as a remedy. It is considered very efficacious in the cure of wounds, and the Egyptians esteem it as a preventive of the plague. As a vulnerary it appears to have been valued in the days of Jeremiah, ch. viii. 22; and could it be procured as easily as the balsams of Peru and Tolu, it is likely that it would find a place in European pharmacy.

In describing Palestine, Tacitus says that in all its productions it equals Italy, besides possessing the palm and the balsam (Hist. v. 6); and the far-famed tree excited the cupidity of successive invaders. By Pompey it was exhibited in the streets of Rome as one of the spoils of the newly conquered province, B.C. 65; and one of the wonderful trees graced the triumph of Vespasian, A.D. 79. During the invasion of Titus two battles took place at the balsam groves of Jericho, the last being to prevent the Jews in their despairing frenzy from destroying the trees. They then became public property, and were placed under the protection of an imperial guard; but history does not record how long the two plantations survived. [J. H.]

BA'MAH [a high place], is so translated in the first part of the verse, Eze. xi. 29, though it is left untranslated in the second part, and is possibly to be taken as the name of some particular place, famous for unlawful worship. (See more under HIGH PLACES.)

BANNER. This in our English Bible is one of the terms employed for the Heb. nés (נֶס), which, however, is as frequently rendered by ensign, and occasionally also by standard. It properly means anything raised or lifted up as an object of special regard or a centre of attraction; and so might have fitly enough designated the military insignia under which particular armies or battalions of armies ranged themselves.

[105.] Egyptian Standards or Banners. From Champollion (1, 2, 3, 4). Wilkinson (5, 7, 8). Rosellini (6, 9).

In reality, however, it does not appear to have been so used. The distinctive badge of the four divisions of the congregation of Israel, as they marched through the wilderness, is called degel (דֵּגֶל), a word probably of much the same import; while the smaller distinction of the several families that composed the division, their respective mark or sign, was named oth (אוֹת), Nu. ii. 2. None of them, however, probably corresponded in appearance to our banner or ensign; for, not flags of distinctive colours or with written inscriptions, but rather figures in wood, or sail on the top of a pole, with some sacred object or emblematical device engraved upon them, seem to have been the kind of standards used in Egypt, and were probably also adopted by the Israelites. A considerable variety of these have been found among the Egyptian remains. Only two distinct specimens of Assyrian military standards have been discovered. They are those marked 1 and 2 in cut (No. 106), both in the form of circles, the one exhibiting two bulls running in opposite directions, the other having the figure of a person, probably a divinity, standing over two bulls and drawing a bow. The two figures standing in the middle are called also standards, but are more likely to have been connected with religious than with military purposes, as they were found standing in front of an altar. The military banner appears to have been usually fixed on a long staff, and supported by a rest in front of the chariot, to which they were attached by a long rod or rope (Layard's Nin. and Bab. ii. p. 347).

The Roman standards were characteristically different in form from those already exhibited, but call for no particular explanation here, as they can have no special bearing on the manners of the ancient Israelites. We give, however, a representation of some of them in cut No. 107. It is quite uncertain, however, whether the Israelites in their ordinary military operations were accustomed to use banners of any sort, or, if used, in what manner and to what extent. The references in Scripture are of too general a nature to enable us to found determinate conclusions upon them, although they may not unnaturally be understood as implying a common practice. But the nés of Scripture in the great majority, and nearly, indeed, the whole of its applications, whether rendered banner, ensign, or standard, bears respect, not to marks of distinction between one party and another, but to signals of observation, things really or figuratively raised aloft as rallying-points for awakening men's concern, and concentrating their energetic strivings and hopes. Hence elevated poles, or mountain-tops, are spoken of as the proper positions for displaying the banner, Nu. xxi. 8; 1a. xlii. 2; xxx. 17; and around it, as the symbol of divine faithfulness and strength, or the rallying-point of all that was true and steadfast in the divine cause, the people of God are represented as gathering, 1a. v. 26; xlii. 22; Ps. lx. 4. Hence, also, on one occasion we find it applied to an altar—the altar which Moses built on the defeat of Amalek, for the purpose, no doubt, of offering on it sacrifices of thanksgiving of praise to the Lord; “he called the name of it JEHOVAH-NISSI,” Jehovah my banner, Ex. xvii. 15, meaning that under the name of Jehovah, as his covenant God, he would fight against Amalek with the assured hope and confidence of a final victory. In short, it was not apparently as an arbitrary sign, or a mark of internal distinction between one band and another of the covenant-people, that such things are spoken of, but as a common object of regard, and an emblem of successful conflict.

BANQUETS. The eastern nations are much given to hospitality; and in agreement with this character, we read continually in Scripture of the feasts given to friends. Many of them, indeed, bore a certain religious character; as when the Israelites went up to appear before the Lord, they were to feast in his presence, calling in the widows and fatherless, and other poor, and the Levites, to rejoice along with them, De. xii. 17, &c.; xiv. 22, &c. In these earlier notices, we find males and females mentioned as meeting together at the feasts. In the later times the separation of the sexes appears to have been common, as it is at the present day in Palestine and the surrounding countries: yet in the Gospels there are traces of the greater freedom which is preserved by pure morality, Jn. ii. 1; xii. 3.

From the parable of the marriage-feast, Mat. xxi., we may conclude that practices prevailed at formal magnificent banquets in our Lord's time, such as are reported by travellers to be still in occasional use. A general invitation was first given; and then those who had accepted it were summoned a second time by messengers at the very hour at which they were to come; compare with this Prov. ix. 1-3. Also, he who gave the entertainment may have often given presents of robes to the guests, to be worn in honour of the donor at the time, and to be preserved afterwards as a token of his regard.

In the early writings of the Old Testament, it appears distinctly enough that the guests sat at table, much as we do ourselves, Ge. xliii. 33; 1 Sa. xvi. 11. The passage from Samuel referred to, more strictly rendered, represents the guests as sitting round the feast, as we are wont to speak of sitting round the table. Before the time of our Lord, however, the Jews had adopted the luxurious practice, which was also in use among their masters the Persians, Es. vii. 8, and the Romans, of reclining upon couches, though this is not expressed by our translators. This explains how it should have happened that the women came behind the couch where Jesus lay, and anointed his outstretched feet, Lu. vii. 37, 38; Jn. xii. 2, 3; and also how John, who was next to him at table, when they ate the last passover, should be described as the disciple who leaned on Jesus' bosom, Jn. xiii. 23, 25. The introduction of this luxurious practice may be reprehended in Am. vi. 4. The use of fragrant odours at these festivities is often referred to in Scripture, Ps. xliii. 5; Ec. ix. 7, 8; Am. vi. 4-6. On occasion of very large entertainments, or where from any other cause it was desirable that some one besides the head of the house should have the charge, there was a special “governor of the feast” appointed, Jn. ii. 8, 9. And due order in taking their places at table, according to rank or peculiar favour, seems to have been much attended to; so that once and again our Lord rebuked those who pressed into the uppermost places, instead of taking a humbler position, Mat. xxiii. 6; Lu. xiv. 7-10. The principal meal appears to have been the supper, which was commonly taken about sunset. But we also read of strangers being invited to an earlier meal, called dinner, though perhaps it more nearly resembled our lunch, Lu. xi. 37, 38; xiv. 12. In early times we read of dining at noon, Ge. xliii. 16.

The food was no doubt eaten then, as it is at present in the same countries, without the use of any articles like our knives and forks and spoons. The hands were dipped together into the dish, Mar. xiv. 20. See also Pr. xix. 24; xxvi. 16, where “bosom” is a mistranslation; it ought to be “plate” or “dish.” Therefore after meals the hands were wiped with a cloth, when water had been poured over them, 2 Ki. iii. 11; or, according to a common Greek practice, they were rubbed clean with pieces of bread, which were then greedily devoured by the dogs under the table. At other times there were dishes prepared for the different persons invited; and the master of the feast might set apart a dish and send it to a particular person in the presence of the whole company, by way of doing him special honour, Ge. xliii. 34; 1 Sa. i. 4, 5; ix. 23, 24; with which compare 2 Sa. xi. 8.

Since the people were accustomed to feasting on the sacrifices of peace-offering when they appeared before the Lord, such a banquet is a common emblem of the happiness of heaven, Is. xxv. 6; Mat. viii. 11; Lu. xiv. 15, &c.

The occasions on which feasting was common among the Jews are such as might be expected. There were, of course, the great sacred feasts before the Lord, De. xvi. 10, 11, and other occasions of sacrificing, De. xii. 5, &c.; xiv. 22-29; 1 Sa. ix. 12-24; 1 Ki. iii. 15; including occasions of covenant-making, Ge. xxvi. 28-31; xxxi. 44, 54; with which may be reckoned acknowledgment of a great providential deliverance, Es. viii. 17. A sacred character might also mingle in feasts in connection with ordinary providential occurrences; as the idolatrous worship at the vintage-feast, Ju. ix. 27; and Job's sacrifice on his sons' feast-days, perhaps birth-days, Job i. 4, 5; other birth-day occasions, Pharaoh's, Ge. xl. 20, and Herod's, Mat. xiv. 6, perhaps also that mentioned in Ho. vii. 6, though this may be rather a feast on a king's accession to the throne, as at 1 Ki. i. 9; marriage-feasts, which sometimes lasted several days, Ge. xxix. 23; Ju. xiv. 10; Es. ii. 18; Mat. xxii. 2-4; Ju. ii. 1; weaning feast, Ge. xxi. 8; burial feast, 2 Sa. iii. 35; Je. xvi. 7; Ho. 9. 4; sheep-shearing, 1 Sa. xxv. 2, 8, 36; 2 Sa. xiii. 23-29. And of course there were also feasts in the way of ordinary hospitality, to a friend to whom honour was to be shown, Lu. v. 29, especially to a stranger, according to the laws of oriental hospitality, Ge. xviii. 6-8; xix. 3; 2 Sa. iii. 20; xii. 4; in most of which passages we see the simplicity and quickness with which such feasts were prepared, by sending to the herd or flock, killing an animal, preparing it immediately, and baking cakes, no doubt unleavened, on account of the urgent haste.

The commonest Hebrew expression for partaking of a meal is "to eat bread," a phrase which of course does not exclude the fact of drinking as well: just as eating and drinking in the sacred feast of the communion are frequently designated "the breaking of bread," and as the very existence of the cup in the passover supper, which our Lord took and appropriated to his own Supper, is not directly noticed in the Old Testament. However, we are not left to infer this drinking from the nature of the case. It is explicitly named by Isaiah, ch. xlv. 4, in his "feast of fat things, of wine on the lees;" and in De. xiv. 26, where "wine and strong drink" are specified among the articles which might be purchased by the people who went up to Jerusalem to feast before the Lord; a direction which was no doubt often grievously misunderstood or abused, else we should not read Eli's accusation of Hannah, as if she had become drunken in the Lord's presence, 1 Sa. i. 14, 15. Drinking wine is also mentioned in the history of Nabal's and Absalom's sheep-shearing feasts; though it is worthy of being noticed that Nabal, who grew "very drunken," and over whom there came such a fearful change when "the wine had gone out of him," made no mention of wine in his account of his preparations; he said merely "my bread, and my water, and my flesh that I have killed for my shearers." The prophets also solemnly denounce the wrath of God upon the excesses of drinking at feasts, Is. v. 11, 12; xxiv. 9-11; Ho. vii. 6; Am. iv. 1; vi. 6. In fact, one of the commonest names for a feast in Hebrew is mishteh, which equally with the Greek symposion, by its etymology, indicates how much drinking had to do with many of these festivities. Cut No. 109 gives a representation, from the Assyrian remains, of parties apparently at a feast, and pledging each other with their cups. (For information as to the drinks commonly in use, see under WINE. See also FEASTS OF LOVE.) [G. C. M. D.]

BAPTISM. As the name of a religious ordinance, baptism belongs to New Testament times. Under the old economy there was a varied use of water as a symbol of cleansing. Thus, the priests had to wash their hands and feet as they entered into the tabernacle of God to perform the daily service, Ex. xxx. 17-21; the high-priest, on the great day of atonement, had besides to wash his flesh in the holy place, Le. xvi. 3; and in cases of defilement from leprosy, or from the touch of a dead body, a whole series of washings and sprinklings was appointed to be gone through by the parties interested, Le. xiv. 8, 9. These, and a few other things of a like nature, are in He. ix. 10, called divers baptisms (διαφόροις βαπτισμοῖς). But they were all connected with special occasions—sometimes of more, sometimes of less frequent occurrence; and with the occasion, the mode also of administering the water differed considerably. In some it was washing, in others sprinkling; when washing was employed, sometimes the whole body, sometimes only a part of the body partook in the ablution; and sometimes again it was the clothes rather than the body itself, as having to some extent come into contact with the polluting element. So far, therefore, as regards the institutions of the old covenant, and the Scriptures of that covenant, a small approach only is made toward that state of things which meets us at the gospel era, when the forerunner of our Lord came forth with a specific ordinance of baptism, as an initiatory rite to be administered to all who listened to his word; and, at a later period, the apostles received through such an ordinance all believers into the church of Christ.

1. It has been attempted to fill up this gap by establishing the existence, at and prior to the gospel era, of a Jewish proselyte baptism. Many of the more learned inquirers into biblical antiquities, including Buxtorf, Lightfoot, Selden, Schöttgen, Wall, &c., have been of opinion that the Jews were in the habit of admitting proselytes to the Jewish faith by an ordinance of baptism accompanying the rite of circumcision. At the time that Wall wrote his history of infant baptism, this was so much the common belief among the learned, that he speaks of it as a kind of settled point. "It is evident," says he, "that the custom of the Jews before our Saviour's time (and, as they themselves affirm, from the beginning of their law), was to baptize as well as circumcise any proselyte that came over to them from the nations. . . . They reckoned all mankind beside themselves to be in an unclean state, and not capable of being entered into the covenant of Israelites without a washing or baptism, to denote their purification from their uncleanness. And this was called the baptizing of them into Moses" (vol. i. 4). Later and more discriminating investigations, however, have shown this view to be untenable. It may almost, indeed, be held fatal to it, that both Philo and Josephus, who on so many occasions refer to the religious opinions and practices of their countrymen, never once allude to any such initiatory baptismal rite; in Josephus the admission of strangers is expressly said to have been by circumcision and sacrifice (Ant. xiii. 9; xx. 2); and there is the like silence respecting baptism in the apocryphal writings, in the Targums of Onkelos and of Jonathan. It were impossible to account for such general silence, if the practice had really existed at the time. There is no evidence of a Jewish proselyte baptism till about the fourth century of the Christian era, when it does appear as a custom already in use, but one not probably introduced till the end of the third century; and the statements of rabbinical writers respecting its pre-Christian, and even Mosaic institution, are mere assertions without proof. It probably sprung up thus: the admission of proselytes was originally made by circumcision and sacrifice, but as usual, a lustration preceded the sacrifice, performed, like legal lustrations generally, by the persons themselves. By and by, however, when sacrifices had ceased, the lustration took the place of the discontinued sacrifice, and at last grew into a sort of initiatory rite, holding with those formally received from without into the Jewish faith (such as slaves and foundlings) relatively much the same place as with converts to Christianity. This view has been ably vindicated by Schneckenberger in a separate treatise on the subject, and is now generally acquiesced in. The Essenes, however, approached somewhat nearer than the other Jews of the apostolic age to this ultimate use of an initiatory rite by water. For, after a year's submission to their discipline, applicants were allowed to use their waters of purification (Joseph. Wars, ii. 8, 6). Yet even with them this was not such a use of water as properly constituted the subject a member of the sect (for he had still to be in training for two years), nor does it appear to have formed anything like a singular and distinguishing act; it was simply an admission of the person to those daily ablutions which they practised as a part of their regular discipline, and marked his entrance on a more complete and rigid ceremonialism.

2. In the state of things, therefore, which prevailed up to the gospel era, there appears nothing properly analogous to what meets us at the commencement of that era in John's baptism. This was evidently in the strictest sense an initiatory rite, dispensed by John to those who submitted themselves to his instructions, and entered into his design—dispensed once for all, and forming so characteristic a feature in his mission, that he is represented as coming into all the region about Jordan “preaching the baptism of repentance,” Lu. iii. 3. The singularity of this course was among the things which attracted notice and aroused the general expectation respecting him, as divinely commissioned or claiming to originate a new phase of things in the history of God's dealings with men. This came out very distinctly in the question put to John by the emissaries of the Pharisees, “Why baptizest thou then, if thou be not the Christ, nor Elias, nor the prophet?” Jn. i. 25, clearly implying, that if he had been any one of these, in the sense understood by them, they would have found in the circumstance an explanation of his baptismal institution, while nothing less in their view could properly account for it. His baptism, therefore, struck them as a novelty, yet a novelty not unlikely to appear in connection with such missions and movements as were then commonly anticipated. There had been such a prevailing use of water in the lustrations of the old covenant, and men's ideas had been so familiarized to it as indicative of a change to the better, that it seemed, in their apprehensions, perfectly natural for one whose mission might form the commencement of a new era in the church to inaugurate the change by a public baptism. They might the more readily judge thus, as the language of prophecy, in pointing to the brighter era of Messiah's times, had occasionally given prominence to the thought of a cleansing as by water; for example, in Eze. xxxvi. 25, “Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean; from all your filthiness and from all your idols will I cleanse you;” and Zec. xiii. 1, “In that day there shall be a fountain opened to the house of David, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for sin and for uncleanness.”

It is clear even from the brief record of John's ministry preserved in the Gospels, that he felt himself commissioned to baptize—not merely to preach the doctrine, but also to institute and dispense the baptism, of repentance. The constancy of his practice indicates this, and an expression that occurs in one of his addresses plainly declares it, “He that sent me to baptize with water, the same said unto me,” &c., Jn. i. 33. But this mission of John to baptize cannot, of course, be separated from his office of preaching; the latter properly went before the other, and found in the baptism its public seal and formal embodiment. The preaching of John was a loud and earnest call to repent, grounded upon the people's condition, on the one side, as far gone from righteousness, and, on the other, on the near prospect and expectation of the Lord's coming to take cognizance of their state, and remodel his kingdom. In what manner the Lord should appear, and what precise form He should give, when he appeared, to the order and constitution of his kingdom, John might very imperfectly comprehend; he had in that respect, like others, to be himself a learner, and to follow the footsteps of Providence as these might successively open the truth to his view. That things did not turn out exactly as he had anticipated, is evident from the message he sent at a subsequent stage to Jesus; but it is not the less clear, from the whole history of his career, that he looked for a manifestation of Godhead, and an organization of the divine kingdom, very different from any mere external display of power, or re-adjustment of political relations. The spirit of John could never have rested with satisfaction in such superficial modes and elements of reform. And, accordingly, his preaching was far from merely grazing the surface; it was full of moral power and energy, and dealt directly with the heart and conscience. His aim was to get men right with God—to get a people formed to genuine repentance on their own part, and, on the part of God, accepted and forgiven, so that they might be really prepared for his coming. Hence, his baptism, which embodied the aim and result of his preaching, is said to have been “unto repentance,” and “unto remission of sins,” Lu. iii. 3; Mat. iii. 11. Hence also, as the necessary consequence of such a high moral aim, coupled with his being divinely commissioned to prosecute it, his preaching could not be a mere call from man to repent, nor his baptism a mere administration of water. There was something of the power and authority of God in both—only less, greatly indeed less, than in the baptism to be brought in by Christ. On account of the vast difference between the two, John expresses it by way of contrast—his a baptism with water, Christ's a baptism with the Spirit; precisely as the Lord himself said of things under the old dispensation, “I desire mercy and not sacrifice,” and again under the new, "I am come, not to send peace on the earth, but a sword." Still, the difference is one only of degree, not of kind; as John's preaching and baptism were alike of God, they could not be altogether without either the stamp of his authority, or the grace of his Spirit.

If this be clear from the nature of the case, it is rendered still more clear by the relation in which Christ placed himself to the baptism of John. When coming to receive it, he declared submission to the ordinance to be a part of that righteousness which must all be fulfilled by him, Mat. iii. 15; not, therefore, a merely external rite, destitute of any proper virtue, but an ordinance of Heaven, that carried, when entered into aright, communion with the Spirit, as well as obedience to the will, of the Father. Accordingly, it was precisely at that moment of his history, that the Spirit descended in visible form and plenitude of grace upon the Saviour; and it is a principle pervading the whole economy of the divine kingdom, that there was nothing absolutely singular in the history of Jesus—that what he found in its fulness and perfection, others may also in measure obtain, and after the manner that he himself did. So that, by means of Christ's experience, John's baptism was proved to be to all who would properly receive it an ordinance of grace and blessing. And not only so, but Christ himself—as if purposely to show how it stood connected with the grace of God, and what benefits in its own time and place it was fitted to yield—for a season prosecuted the work of John's baptism, as well as of John's preaching. "When he heard that John was cast into prison, he departed into Galilee, and began to say, Repent: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand," Mat. iv. 12, 17—that is, he took up John's word, when John could no longer himself proclaim it, making his own agency, in the first instance, a continuation of John's. And so in regard to baptism; through his disciples he began also to baptize, even before John was cast into prison; and it is recorded that more came to him for baptism than were then coming to John, Jn. iii. 26. But as this appeared to be somewhat misunderstood by some of John's disciples, and proved the occasion of certain disputes, Jesus seems to have discontinued the practice. That he should, however, even for a time have identified his ministry with John's preaching and baptism, was a convincing proof of the close connection between John's agency and his, and also of John's baptism being more than a mere water-ordinance.

3. But all this, whether in connection with John or with Christ, was preliminary; it belonged to a transition state, in which the old was gradually passing into the new; and Christian baptism, or baptism as a standing ordinance in the Christian church, belongs to a later period. It did not commence till the personal work of Christ on earth was finished, and had its formal institution when he gave to his disciples the commission, "Go and teach all nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." These words, in themselves so simple, have given occasion, in a very remarkable manner, to that tendency to extremes, in which the human mind is ever manifesting its weakness. In one extreme we have the advocates of ritualism virtually ignoring the primary and fundamental element of teaching, of which baptism was here exhibited as the complement, regarding it, at least, as entirely subordinate, and laying the whole stress of a vital connection between the soul and Christ's kingdom on the due administration of an outward ordinance. In the other extreme, we have the advocates of spiritualism (as among the Quakers and various cognate sects) repudiating the external rite altogether, maintaining that the baptism meant by our Lord was to be nothing different from the internal endowments of the Spirit, and that to keep up water baptism, in any form, is to corrupt the dispensation of the Spirit, by improperly retaining a remnant of Judaism. Both extremes do palpable violence to the original appointment of Christ, and require forced and arbitrary constructions to be put upon it and the collateral passages of Scripture.

That our Lord meant to retain baptism as a formal institution in his kingdom, may be regarded as certain—first of all, from the relation already noticed between his work and John's. The difference here is not, strictly speaking, a contrast, but a progression—a relative superiority in the one as compared with the other; on which account, as all was not outward in John's baptism, so neither could all be inward in Christ's. Only, the two distinctive elements did, as it were, change places—the water, which had been the prominent thing in John's, giving way in that respect to the Spirit, though without ceasing to retain its proper place. Substantially, indeed, the same difference exists in regard to the revealed word. Under the old economy, and in the hands of John, this word was spoken, and spoken in suitable adaptation to the state and circumstances of the time; but, from the comparative defect of the Spirit's grace, it was attended with little power—it remained, to a large extent, but a word. In respect, however, to gospel times, the word is itself spoken of as spirit and life, Jn. vi. 63, a light that shines into the soul, and gives there the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ, 2 Co. iv. 6. But it were folly, on this account, to treat the external word as a thing no longer needed, and to be allowed to fall into disuse. 2. That our Lord should have thrown the baptizing into the form of a command, and charged it upon the working of a human agency, is another clear proof of its being designed to form an external institution. If it had stood simply in the bestowal of the Spirit directly imparting spiritual blessing, it could not have been so committed to men's instrumentality. They are never represented as having power to give the Spirit for saving purposes. When the baptism of the Spirit is spoken of, it is always Christ himself who appears as the administrator, or the Father through him. Even the miraculous gifts, such as speaking with tongues, the mere signs of the Spirit's presence for higher ends, were only communicated in certain cases through the hands of the apostles (but through theirs alone) in attestation of their divine commission to settle the foundations of the Christian church; it was not their obligation properly to do such things, but rather their distinctive privilege and honour that such things should be done by the Lord through them. And, accordingly, the distinction died with themselves (see APOSTLES). To enjoin the administration of baptism upon the Christian church at large, as a thing that was to go along through all time with the preaching of the gospel, if it were to have been entirely inward, could only have been fitted to mislead; and the sense in which the words have been all but universally understood is the manifest proof of their natural import. 3. The practice of the apostles is a further and conclusive proof of the same. If some of the passages which speak of their connection with the baptism of believers might admit of being explained without the supposition of an external baptism, there are others in which that supposition is impracticable, and in which, if there should have been no water baptism in the Christian church, it is necessary to hold that they erred—erred, not merely as private individuals occasionally falling before temptation, but even in their apostolic agency. It was undoubtedly in his capacity and work as an apostle that St. Peter visited the house of Cornelius; and if, when he said, "Can any one forbid water that these should not be baptized, which have received the Holy Ghost as well as we?" Ac. x. 47, he acted rashly, and "carried the practices of the law into the domain of the gospel," there is an end of the matter; the very foundations of the Christian church are shaken; the apostles, through whom we chiefly know the mind of Christ, did not in reality know it. This opens the door to rationalism, and how far it may be allowed to proceed can only be a question of degree. The rather so, as Peter did not stand alone in the matter. Paul also confesses to having baptized persons at Corinth, and only so far distinguishes between the work of baptizing and preaching, that he regarded the latter as that which he had more especially in mind, 1 Co. i. 14-17—doubtless because it was the one which lay at the foundation of the other, and in a manner carried it in its train. But he does not say a word either there, or anywhere else, against baptism by water as an ordinance in the church of Christ; nothing to indicate that he accounted it at variance with the genius of the gospel, and a remnant of Judaism. With the proper remains of Judaism, the beggarly elements of the old covenant, he dealt in a quite different manner, and strenuously resisted their introduction into the Gentile churches. But an initiatory ordinance of baptism, as we have already shown, was not Judaistic; it had its rise with the dawn of the gospel dispensation; and the grounds relied upon by the spiritualists for the opposite view are without foundation. So that, whether we look to the practice of the apostles, or to the native import of the words of Christ, or to the relation of Christian baptism to what immediately preceded it, we are shut up to the conclusion, that it was from the first meant to be an outward and standing ordinance in the church of Christ.

It is not out of place to urge these considerations here respecting the institution of baptism as a Christian ordinance; for though the view they oppose has never been widely embraced, yet it has its hereditary advocates, and individuals are ever and anon arising from other quarters to propound it afresh (see, for example, a treatise lately issued in Edinburgh, entitled Christian Baptism Spiritual, not Ritual, by R. Macnair, M.A., 1858). But, undoubtedly, the other extreme is both the more extensively held, and is also, in some respects, the more dangerous in its bearing on the spiritual interests of men. It falls in with the natural tendency of the human mind, in its existing state, to place undue dependence upon the outward in sacred things, and turn religion into a form. On this account, the Old Testament religion itself, with all its ceremonialism, was not ceremonial enough for the people placed under it; and throughout their history, there constantly appears a disposition to treat its ordinances as more outward than they really were, and to make up for what was wanting in the spirit it required, by adding to the number of its formal observances. One need not wonder, therefore, however much it may be regretted, that the predominantly spiritual character of the new dispensation, and the ascendancy it seeks to establish for the higher elements of working, should have been found more than many of its professed votaries have been willing to acquiesce in; and, in particular, that the simple ordinance of baptism into the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, should have been turned into a piece of rigid and mysterious ritualism. This view has no countenance any more than the other in New Testament scripture. The relation of baptism, in the original appointment, to the preaching and belief of the truth, is itself a sufficient testimony against it; for the baptizing is thereby made the accessory of the truth taught and received, not vice versa: "Go and teach, baptizing." "He that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved." Ordinarily, there should be both; yet not in the same rank, nor in the same order of necessity. The teaching and believing is a more fundamental thing than the baptizing; there might be salvation without baptism, as in the case of the penitent thief on the cross; but not salvation without believing among such as are capable of exercising it. Hence, while it is said, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved;" the converse is, "He that believeth not shall be condemned." Believing admits within the pale of salvation. For those really, or by profession within, baptism must ordinarily be taken as an accompaniment, being among the means provided to insure the proper result; but the not believing (whether baptism may have been administered or not) leaves those it adheres to still standing without; the living bond is wanting that connects the soul with Christ, and nothing can supply its place.

Such is the teaching of Scripture as connected with the original institution of baptism; and there is nothing in the statements subsequently made of a contrary nature, when the passages are carefully weighed, but much rather to confirm it. It is very explicitly confirmed by what the apostle Paul says of preaching the gospel, as being his special work rather than baptizing; for as an apostle it was his more peculiar calling to lay the foundation of the church in different places; to bring men into living acquaintance and fellowship with Christ; and the exhibition of the gospel is the grand instrument in the hand of the Spirit for effecting this. When it is accomplished, the administration of ordinances, and baptism among the rest, comes as a matter of course. So needful are these for carrying on and completing the work of grace in the soul—so much are they the regular channels of grace to the soul, that salvation is often expressly connected with them. Thus of baptism it is said that it saves, 1 Pe. iii. 21; he that is baptized into Christ has put on Christ, and those that have been buried with him in baptism have also risen with him through faith of the operation of God, Ga. iii. 27; Col. ii. 12. But in the same manner, it is said of the word that it quickens the dead; that sinners are begotten by it to God; that it sanctifies the soul unto obedience, Ja. i. 18; Ja. i. 13; xvii. 17, &c.; and of prayer, that he who asks in the name of Christ, believing, shall receive whatever he may seek, Ja. xvi. 23. In their own place, and in diverse ways, the ordinances are all available as means—efficient means, if rightly employed and believingly handled; but their place is still only instrumental and subordinate; while the direct act of the soul in resting, through the Spirit, upon Christ, and exercising the graces of faith and love, rank above all ordinances, and are themselves salvation in realized experience.

The Reformed churches generally concur in holding this doctrine of baptism. They regard it, when received in respect to its original institution and doctrinal character, not as the efficient cause of faith and spiritual life, but, like circumcision, Ro. iv., the sign and seal of these to the believing participant; and that both ways—both as from God to the baptized, pledging through an established ordinance in his church all the grace connected with faith and life; and on the part of the baptized, ratifying as by a solemn act of adhesion and surrender of himself to God his belief in the gospel, and obligation to comply with its precepts. But for these ends the virtue of the ordinance hangs, not on the ritual administration (as Romanists, and in part also Lutherans hold), but on the working of God's Spirit, and the exercise of faith in the subjects of the ordinance.

4. The conditions of baptism, or the amount of religious knowledge and state of spiritual attainment required of those who were recognized as proper subjects of the ordinance, are not fully and categorically exhibited in New Testament scripture; they are rather implied in the nature of the ordinance, and left to be inferred from attendant circumstances, than formally and distinctly enunciated. From the connection between John's baptism and that of Christ, and the manner in which the one merged into the other, they could not be quite uniform. But even in John's case—founded, as his baptism was, on the call to repent, and the necessity of having sin renounced and forgiven, in order to be prepared for the event immediately in prospect of the Lord's coming—it is clear that, from the first, all who honestly approached to the waters of baptism, must have come with a sincere confession of their own sinfulness, of their desire to obtain remission on account of it, and of their belief in the near advent of Messiah. By and by the indefiniteness which hung around the latter point gave way to more determinate convictions; and even before John quitted the field of his preparatory working, the hope of a coming, had begun to be supplanted by the belief of a present, Saviour. But as this Saviour did not appear in the character which men's anticipations had fashioned to themselves, and the faith even of those who attached themselves to his person ere long met with things fitted to make it stagger, the process of active proselytism was wisely suspended for a time, and only when the work of Christ on earth was finished, and the materials were before the world for arriving at a full and intelligent belief regarding him, were applicants for baptism required to make formal confession of their faith in Jesus as the Messiah. Accordingly, after the ascension, this became the more prominent point, both in the apostolic preaching, and in the terms of communion presented to those who through baptism might seek to enter into fellowship with the Christian community. While that, however, was the chief, it was by no means the only point; from the very nature of things it could not stand alone; and to say, as sometimes has been said, that nothing more was expected or required at baptism of entrants into the Christian church of apostolic times, than a simple acknowledgment of the Messiahship of Jesus, is palpably to understate the case, and to leave out elements that could not possibly be ignored by the founders of the church. What pains they took to instruct individual applicants, or into what forms they might require confessions of faith and avowals of Christian experience to be thrown, we have no proper means of ascertaining. But there can be no reasonable doubt that the repentance toward God and faith toward the Lord Jesus Christ, which formed the sum of apostolic preaching, was in some form implicitly or expressly demanded of the applicants for baptism. For, in owning the Messiahship of Jesus, they were necessarily understood to own it as taught by the apostles—owned, therefore, that this Jesus was the Son of the living God; that through his death and resurrection he had become the Redeemer of a lost world; that he had obtained for as many as believe upon his name remission of sin, the promise of the Holy Spirit to renew their souls after the image of God, the sure hope of eternal life; and that they as sinners accepted of the offer of this Saviour, and resolved to give themselves to his service. The whole tenor of the apostolic teaching, and the occasional notices furnished of their proceedings, seem plainly to indicate, that they looked for such a profession of doctrinal belief and Christian practice from those who sought admission into the church; and the cases first of Ananias and Sapphira, then of Simon the sorcerer, show that the repentance of sin, and adherence to Jesus for deliverance from its guilt and power, formed essential elements, in their view, of a right preparation for the initiatory ordinance. Such as failed in these respects were treated as unwarranted intruders within the Christian fold; and hence the sincere reception of baptism is regarded by the apostle Peter as necessarily carrying along with it "the answer of a good conscience"—a conscience purged through right views of sin, and faith in the person and work of the Saviour, 1 Pe. iii. 21.

Whether the conditions of Christian baptism in the apostolic age were of such a kind as to necessitate the re-baptizing of those who had submitted to John's baptism, may be left among the points respecting which our information is too partial and defective for an explicit deliverance. We read only of one occasion on which persons who had participated in John's baptism are expressly said to have had the Christian ordinance administered to them; namely, the case of the twelve disciples whom Paul fell in with at Ephesus, probably about the year 59, Ac. xix. 1-7. The case of those persons, however, can by no means be regarded as a fair specimen of the subjects of John's baptism. For full five and twenty years after the death of Christ they had yet come to no definite views of him, nor had even so much as heard whether there were any Holy Ghost—although John himself expressly made mention of the gift of the Holy Ghost, as what might surely be looked for by all who waited for the consolation of Israel. They seem to have been much in the condition of persons who had yet to learn the principles of the gospel—who had shied, indeed, at an earlier period in the excitement and the hopes raised by the Baptist, and professed themselves to be his disciples—but had afterwards sunk back, and given themselves little or no further concern about the matter. We ought not to judge by such a case of what might have been deemed proper in respect to those who lived amid the scenes of gospel history, and who, after submitting to the baptism of John, and accredited the prospect of an immediately approaching Saviour, had cordially embraced Jesus as that Saviour, and entered into the hope of his salvation. In that condition were the twelve apostles, the whole hundred and twenty in the upper chamber at Jerusalem, and doubtless many more in different parts of the country, who had passed through substantially the same experience and followed the same course. The faith of such persons had developed, their knowledge had ripened, their views in many respects had become more clear and enlightened; but there had been no radical change in their sentiments; they but acted out the profession they had already made, and entered on the heritage of blessing pledged to them in the baptism they had received; they needed only the internal baptism of the Spirit; and when this came, it is extremely unlikely that they should have been again baptized with water. But between the case of such persons and those mentioned in the Acts, ch. xix., there may have been many of a less marked description either way; and it is not improbable that the mode of treatment as to baptism correspondingly differed. (See also on what is implied in knowing only John's baptism, under APOLLUS.)

5. In regard to the mode of administering baptism in apostolic times, whether by immersion only, if by immersion, whether by immersion of the whole body, or more specially of the head, or whether again by acts that might more properly be denominated washing or sprinkling—these points, it is well known, have formed the subject of keen discussion, and are likely to do so still. It cannot be supposed that within the limits of a few sentences any fresh light can be shed upon the subject, or even the materials supplied of a comprehensive view of its merits, and a fully informed judgment. Our conviction is, that Christ and his disciples did not seek to bind the church to any precise form, and that the language employed is hence of a somewhat general and variable description. The expression used by the evangelist Matthew is "baptized in water," or "in the river Jordan," ch. iii. 6, 11; but St. Luke uses the dative, "baptized with water," ch. iii. 16; and neither form of expression is such as to denote, by any sort of necessity, corporeal immersion, unless the word baptize did of itself involve this idea. So it has often been attempted to be proved, but without success. The case of Judith in the Apocrypha, ch. xii. 7, who is represented as going out every night into the valley of Bethulia and baptizing herself in the camp at the fountain of water; the reference in Sirach xxxiv. 25 to the case of one being baptized from a dead body, and again defiling himself by a fresh touch of the corpse; the mention in He. ix. 10 of "divers baptisms" under the law, are all at variance with the notion of immersion being inseparable from the meaning of the word. For it is incredible that Judith could have been in the habit of practising proper immersion at a fountain in the open camp; it is certain that cleansing from the defilement contracted by touching a dead body consisted mainly in being sprinkled with water, having in it the ashes of the red heifer; and the purifications under the law, described as "divers baptisms," had chiefly to do with rinsings, sprinklings, and washings of parts of the body, or of the garments. (See BATHING.) In the gospel history, also, we have the word baptized used both of the Pharisees and of our Lord, in a manner that cannot stand with bodily immersion: the Pharisees when they came from the market did not eat except they baptized themselves, Mar. vii. 4, and a Pharisee wondered on one occasion that our Lord did not baptize himself before dinner, Lu. xi. 38. In such cases, it is out of the question to think of entire bodily immersions—such were not common among the Jews before meals, or even as a regular custom, except among the Essenes, and it is necessary to adhere to the sense of washing, with the accessory idea of purification or cleansing from legal defilement—washing with a view to a kind of sacred effect. There is, therefore, a certain vagueness and variable use in the principal word, and the manner of its application, as if for the purpose of leaving some room for diversity of mode in the Christian church. Hence the early versions do not translate the word, but simply adopt it. Nor, when one looks to the facts of the case in early times, and thinks of hundreds, or even thousands being baptized at a river side in open day, is it possible to understand how it could have consisted with the general good, not to say common decency, that the rite should have been administered by a total immersion. It would be strange indeed if in such a matter some liberty had not been allowed, especially in a religion wherein the ceremonial element holds so subordinate a place.

It confirms this view, that when reference is made to the symbolical import of the ordinance, respect is usually had to the cleansing property of water, and which is not ordinarily associated with dipping, but rather with washing or with sprinkling (if ritual usage is taken into account). Thus, the word addressed by Ananias to Paul was "Arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins;" and in Ep. v. 25, 26, it is said, "Christ loved the church, and gave himself for it, that he might sanctify and cleanse it, by the washing of water, by the word;" also in Tit. iii. 5, "He saved us by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost," &c. There can be no doubt that the allusion in these and some other passages is to the water in the ordinance, simply as an element of cleansing; and if pains be taken to keep that idea prominent, the great object of its employment would seem to be served. There are two passages, indeed, in which believers are represented as being buried with Christ in baptism, Ro. vi. 3, 4; Col. ii. 12; and it has often been alleged that this must point to the act of immersion in the water. But, even in a formal respect the resemblance is far from being close; for death is not naturally associated with a dipping in water; Christ's burial placed his body not in water, nor in earth, but in a rock, and not by an ordinary act of immersion, but by a horizontal elevation. And then, the image of burying used by the apostle is one only of a variety of figures connected with baptism. In the passage of Romans he introduces that also of planting—"planted in the likeness of his death, and of his resurrection"—and elsewhere of putting off the body of the sins of the flesh and putting on Christ, as of persons first undressing and then dressing anew. It is not, in any of the passages, to the mode of administering baptism that the apostle appears to refer, but to the spiritual reality involved in it—as the formal act of surrender to Christ, wherein, by virtue of our spiritual union to him, we have fellowship with him in his death to sin, and in his resurrection to life and glory.

It is scarcely necessary to state, that the symbolical accompaniments introduced into the administration of the ordinance by the ritualistic tendency of early times—such as three-fold immersion, putting on after baptism of white garments, receiving milk and honey, exorcism, &c.—and which, of course, have found their cherished resting-place in Rome, have no warrant in Scripture. Most of them are mentioned by Tertullian (De Cor. § 3) as having already obtained a footing in Africa, and are vindicated by him as proper to be observed, on the ground of traditional usage, though destitute of scriptural authority. Such things, when they came in, did not add to the instructive significance and real efficacy of baptism; they detracted from both by overlaying with ceremony its simple import, and in the minds of the people turning it into a kind of sacred magic.

6. The question of infant, as contradistinguished from adult baptism, is the only remaining point that falls to be noticed, but it is one that calls for too lengthened inquiry to be taken up here. Undoubtedly, in the great majority of cases it is of the baptism of adults that the records of the New Testament most directly and commonly treat. The command first to teach and then to baptize implies that such were the parties more immediately contemplated, and such the order of nature in the matter. Explicit statements of baptism being administered to the infants of believers are not to be found: but in such cases as those of Lydia—"she was baptized and her household"—and of the jailor at Philippi—"and he was baptized and all his straightway," Ac. xvi., do naturally seem to imply an admission of the family as such, and an admission, on the ground of its relationship to the head, to the church by baptism. The one follows so close upon the other, and seems to stand in such immediate dependence upon it, that there scarcely seems room for separate acts of conversion. Then, the long-established connection between parent and child in a covenant-relationship, and the essential agreement between baptism and circumcision in spiritual import and economical design, come most materially in support of the pædo-baptist argument. But those who wish to study the subject must have recourse to such works as Wall on Infant Baptism, with Dr. Gale's Reflections; Carson on Baptism; and on the opposite side, Wilson on Infant Baptism, Dr. Wardlaw on Infant Baptism, Halley on Infant Baptism, &c.

BAPTISM is occasionally used in a tropical manner in Scripture. It is so in the simplest manner, or with the nearest approach to its primary meaning, by St. Paul in 1 Co. x. 2, where he represents the Israelites who left Egypt as having been baptized into Moses in the Red Sea and in the cloud, which then overshadowed and protected them; meaning, that these transactions and events held much the same place, and served much the same design, in respect to their relation to Moses, that baptism now does with believers in their relation to Christ. In the one case as well as the other, there was a divinely appointed method of initiation, which mutually pledged the parties to all that followed. In a still more distinctly tropical manner our Lord uses the word, when he says, "I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened till it be accomplished?" Lu. xii. 50; and again to the sons of Zebedee, "Can ye drink of the cup that I drink of, and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with?" Mar. x. 38. In both cases, the baptism spoken of is plainly a synonym for the sufferings through which our Lord was to pass, and that not as a matter of necessity, but as a matter of choice—with the full consent and willing resignation of his soul. The reference, we conceive, is not (as it is very often put) to the primary sense of the word baptize, as if Christ meant to present the idea of his going to be plunged into or overwhelmed in a sea of sorrow and affliction; but rather to its secondary or acquired sense of a rite of solemn initiation, just as in the cup connected with it the reference is to the symbolical use made of a drinking cup by the prophets as a symbol of wrath. Through suffering even unto death Christ must consecrate himself to the Father, as the Redeemer of men, thereby at once drinking in their behalf a cup of wrath on account of sin, and sealing his purpose of perfect devotion to their eternal interests. Publicly and formally he did then what in spirit he had done before—thoroughly committed himself to their cause, and to the fulfilment of all the demands of righteousness involved in its successful management.

BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD, or more properly, "those baptized for the dead," is a peculiar expression used by the apostle Paul in 1 Co. xv. 29, in the course of his argumentation on the subject of the resurrection. The whole verse runs thus: "Else, what shall they do who are baptized for the dead? If the dead rise not at all, why are they also baptized for the dead?" A great variety of interpretations have been proposed in explanation of this peculiar reference (which may be seen in any of the more recent commentaries), but nothing altogether satisfactory can yet be said to have been produced. In several of the interpretations, respect is supposed to have been had to views and practices which were of much later growth than the apostolic age, and which could never, even if they had existed, been referred to in this argumentative manner by the apostle. This holds especially of the notion that the allusion is to the practice of receiving baptism vicariously for friends who had died before the rite had been administered to them—a practice which, as has been justly said, "was never adopted, except by some obscure sects of Gnostics, who seem to have founded their custom on this very passage" (Conybeare and Howson, ii. 59). The view rather to be adopted is that which was in substance proposed by Clericus and Doederlein, and which contemplates the baptized as ever coming forward to fill up the vacancies created by the deceased; so that the one rush in, as it were, to supply the place of the other. "The vacancies left in the ranks of the Christian army, when saints and martyrs fall asleep in Jesus, are supplied by fresh recruits, eager to be baptized as they were, and pledged by baptism to fall as they fell, at the post of duty and danger. It is a touching sight which the Lord's baptized host presents to view, especially in troublous times. Column after column advancing to the breach, as on a forlorn hope, in the storming of Satan's citadel of worldly pomp and power, is mowed down by the ruthless fire of persecution. But ever as one line disappears, a new band of volunteers starts up, candidates for the seal of baptism, even though in their case, as in the case of their predecessors in the deadly strife, the seal of baptism is to be the earnest of the bloody crown of martyrdom" (Candlish on 1 Co. xv.) This is well put—only, at the time the apostle wrote, persecution to the extent of martyrdom could hardly be said to have existed; it had as yet taken place in but a few isolated cases. And if the idea is extended, so as to take in the vacancies caused by the ordinary death of believers (as was done, indeed, by the original propounders of the view), then the baptisms referred to must be those also of an ordinary kind; they constituted the successive additions generally, which were being made to the Christian community; and one is at some loss to understand why the apostle should have sought a support to his argument in so common a connection between the living and the dead. Yet while the view is attended with such apparent embarrassments, it seems upon the whole the most worthy of acceptance; and our difficulty in entering into the peculiar aspect in which it presents the baptism of believers, may possibly arise from our inability to realize distinctly the circumstances in the eye of the apostle when he wrote.

BAR [son]. It is a common member of compound names, as is also Ben, which has the same meaning. Ben, however, prevails in the pure Hebrew names of the Old Testament, and Bar in those of the New, because it is much more in use in the Chaldee and Syriac languages, which greatly altered Hebrew expression in later times.

BARAB'BAS. A man engaged in sedition, and guilty of murder, whom Pilate released to the Jews at the time that he delivered Jesus to be crucified. It was his practice—perhaps it had been also the practice of governors before him, to please the populace who assembled every year at the feast of the passover, by giving a free pardon to any prisoner whom they chose to name, Mat. xxvii. 15-26; Mar. xv. 6-15; Lu. xxiii. 16-21; Jn. xviii. 39, 40.

BARAK [lightning]—probably the same as Barcas, the surname of the Carthaginian Hamilcar—one of the judges who was commissioned by the prophetess Deborah to deliver Israel from bondage to Jabin the Canaanitish king of Hazor, in the tribe of Naphtali, to which tribe Barak belonged. He utterly destroyed Jabin's army, and the king and his general Sisera perished. Yet the chief glory was snatched from Barak by a woman, because his weak faith would not let him go to the work unless Deborah would go along with him, Ju. iv. v.; Ps. lxxviii. 2, 10. For the chronology, see the article JUDGES. He is named as an example of faith, He. xi. 32.

BARBARIAN. A word often used by us to denote a man of cruelty. But like the word savage occasionally among ourselves, it meant, among the Greeks, nothing worse than uncultivated or uncivilized; and in their self-esteem they applied this term to all nations except themselves: and the Romans associated themselves with the Greeks, as they succeeded to their sovereignty and partook of their cultivation. This is its use in the New Testament. All men are either Jews or Gentiles. All Gentiles or heathen nations may sometimes be called Greeks, 1 Co. i. 22-24; but taking the term in its strict sense, all other nations are then Barbarians, Ro. i. 14. Barbarians in one place, Col. iii. 11, are distinguished from Scythians; the former, perhaps, being nations subject to the Roman emperor, and Scythians being then a general name for all the wild nations beyond the bounds of the Roman empire.

BARLEY. Of this well-known and widely diffused cereal it is impossible to assign the native country. On the top of turf-walls and on thin soils there grows a little grass extremely like it—the wall-barley or mouse-barley; but even Lamarck would have found it difficult to transmute this Hordeum murinum into any of the cultivated varieties. The same thing may be said of wheat. And joining the two facts together—firstly, that these all-important grains are never found truly wild or native; and, secondly, that it is a process roundabout, and far from obvious, by which they are converted into cakes and loaves, we cannot help feeling that it is in a sense peculiarly emphatic that “our Father who is in heaven” has given us our “daily bread.” In the world's infancy many things lay ready to the hand of the new-come tenant, and with unsophisticated senses, it would not need much instruction to guide him to the use of such fruits as the pine-apple or ripe orange. But who gave the hint to the first miller? Who taught the first baker? How did it occur to any one to rub down into a powder the grains of a coarse grass, and then work this powder with water into paste, and then kindle a fire to bake it into bread? Were not the worshippers of Ceres pointing towards a truth, through the darkness of their idolatry? May we not suppose that the use of corn is as ancient as the days when man still unfallen received his lesson direct from God? And when he fell from this blessedness, and was driven forth to “eat bread in the sweat of his face,” may not the exile have been in mercy allowed to carry with him into the house of his pilgrimage this “staff of life?”

Palestine was a “land of wheat and barley,” De. viii. 8. Barley was given to horses and dromedaries, 1 Ki. iv. 28; but it was also converted into bread for the food of man, Esa. iv. 12. In the multitude which surrounded the Saviour in the fields near Bethsaida, the only supplies forthcoming were “five barley-loaves and two small fishes,” Jn. vi. 9. But, if we may take as a criterion the expression, “A measure of wheat for a penny, and three measures of barley for a penny,” Ro. vi. 6, the relative value of wheat was threefold greater. There was the same preference for wheat in other lands. Amongst the Romans barley was the food of horses; and each cavalry-soldier was allowed a certain sum by way of barley-money—“æs hordearium.” It was a punishment to substitute barley for the usual rations of the men. Thus, when some of his cohorts had lost their standards, Claudius Marcellus ordered them to be reduced to barley (Livy, xxvii. 13). The same preference of wheaten bread manifests itself in almost every country which permits the choice, notwithstanding the superior sweetness of barley.

One great recommendation of barley is the rapidity with which it ripens. Even in Norway, with the help of the long midsummer sunshine, it is said that sometimes less than two months intervenes between reaping and seed-time. The consequence is that in some countries, such as Spain, they are able to procure two crops in one season. Some of their barley the Jews sowed or planted at the time of the autumnal rains, October or November, and some as soon as the depth of winter was past, so that the crop was ripe about the time of the passover, or, as we should now say, at Easter. Under date, June 5, in the south of Palestine, Messrs. Bonar and M'Cheyne found “all the operations of harvest going on at the same time. Some were cutting down the barley with a reaping-hook not unlike our own, but all of iron, and longer in the handle and smaller in the hook. Others were gathering what was cut down into sheaves. Many were gleaning, and some were employed in carrying home what had been cut down and gathered. We met four camels heavily laden with ripe sheaves, each camel having bells of a different note suspended from its neck, which sounded cheerfully as they moved slowly on. Perhaps these bells may be a remnant of the 'joy in harvest.' . . . The barley on the plain seemed good, but the crop amazingly thin, and the rank weeds so abundant, that asses and other cattle were feeding on the part of the field that had been newly cut."—(Narrative, ch. ii.) Amongst a rural population agricultural processes and the different stages of husbandry furnish a natural calendar, and "barley-harvest" was a great land-mark in the year of the Jewish farmer; and when such a man read in the sacred narrative that Saul's seven sons were put to death "in the beginning of barley-harvest," and that Rizpah watched over their bodies "from the beginning of harvest until water dropped upon them out of heaven," 2 Sa. xxi. 9, 10—that is, until the commencement of the autumnal rains, the same idea was suggested to him as would be to us were we told that the poor mother kept her weary post from May till September. [J. H.]

BARNABAS [son of prophecy or of consolation]. It was the surname given by the apostles to a Levite named Joses—or Joseph, as there is good authority for reading—whose family had settled in Cyprus. This surname might be naturally translated the "son of prophecy," and we know that he was a prophet or inspired teacher in the church, Ac. xiii. 1. But it is rendered by Luke the "son of consolation," Ac. iv. 36; for indeed this was the great object of the spirit of prophecy, to console and support believers with that sure word which is a light to them in this dark world, 2 Pe. i. 19. That passage in Acts gives evidence that he was a comfort to the church in his deeds as well as by his words; for in the difficulties of the infant church he was found among those who had land and sold it, and laid the price at the apostles' feet, leaving himself nothing to depend upon but the labour of his own hands, 1 Co. ix. 6. He was honoured by God to have such discerning of spirits and largeness of heart as to acknowledge the persecutor Saul of Tarsus for a brother in the Lord, at a time when no other believer in Jerusalem was willing to confide in the sincerity of his conversion, and he introduced him to the fellowship of the church in that city, Ac. ix. 27. He again was honoured to be sent forth from that mother church to Antioch, to superintend the work there, amid the difficult questions which were certain to arise at the time when the Gentiles were being first admitted on equal terms with the Jews to the privileges of the gospel; and there he laboured for a year with great success, assisted by his friend Saul, whom he had searched out on purpose, Ac. xi. 22-24. And it is in reference to his work on that occasion that the testimony is borne in the Word of God, in which there is little of panegyric pronounced over human instruments, "for he was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost and of faith." The ascertained facts of his subsequent history are almost inseparable from the life of Saul, who is best known to us by the name of Paul the Apostle. They were sent up from Antioch to Jerusalem with contributions for the poor saints there. They came back to Antioch bringing with them Barnabas' sister's son, John, who had the surname of Mark. They were set apart by the express appointment of the Holy Spirit to be missionaries, and they went together on the first of Paul's great journeys. Hence, probably, the name "apostles," namely, of the church, her special delegates, is applied to both of them, Ac. xiv. 14; and it is not to be understood as countenancing the idea that Barnabas was reckoned to be on a footing as to office with the twelve, who were the Lord's apostles, and with whom Paul was associated only by an immediate designation from Heaven, Ga. i. 1, 17. Yet Barnabas and Paul were together sent up from the church at Antioch to the church at Jerusalem, and were recognized as the leaders in evangelistic work among the heathen, by the three prominent apostles, at a time when they reckoned it their duty to concentrate their own labours upon the circumcision, Ga. ii. 9; Ac. xv.

When an unhappy difference, in connection with the case of his nephew Mark, separated Barnabas from Paul, as they were on the point of beginning a second journey together, he departed to Cyprus, where he had preached in the course of their earlier mission, Ac. xv. 39. It is an old tradition that he suffered martyrdom in this his native island; and it is not improbable that he was at least called to his rest at a comparatively early period. For while Paul afterwards wrote of him in such a way as to show that their "sharp contention" was soon forgotten, there is no further account of his labours, and but one allusion to them, 1 Co. ix. 6; while we find his nephew Mark attending upon Paul in such a way as he would have been less likely to do so long as Barnabas lived, and had a first claim to his services, Col. iv. 6. There is a writing extant which is called the Epistle of Barnabas, and which many have attributed to him. But its superficial handling of divine truth, and its mistakes about the Jewish history and worship, into which the Levite Barnabas could not have fallen, have led the best critics to reckon it a forgery. [G. C. M. D.]

BAR'SABAS. See JOSEPH and JUDAS.

BARTHOLOMEW [the son of Tholomew, or, as the word might equally be written, son of Talmai, a name which is found in the Old Testament]. Bartholomew was one of the twelve apostles, and is commonly reckoned the same as Nathanael, because Matthew, Mark, and Luke mention Bartholomew, but never Nathanael; while John mentions Nathanael, but never Bartholomew. In agreement with this, John represents Philip as the intimate friend of Nathanael; and in the lists of the other three evangelists Philip and Bartholomew are invariably placed together, Mat. x. 3; Mar. iii. 18; Ln. vi. 14; comp. Ac. i. 13. In this case we may therefore suppose that from his father the name Bartholomew was given to Nathanael, as Peter bore the name Bar-jonas, and Joses (or Joseph, as others read) that of Barnabas. We have nothing special recorded of him except that he was brought with difficulty by Philip to regard Jesus as the promised Saviour, while yet our Lord bore that high testimony to him, "Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile!" Jn. i. 45, &c. After the resurrection he was one of the seven to whom our Lord revealed himself at the Lake of Tiberias, Jn. xxi. 2; and he is there spoken of as belonging to Cana of Galilee. There are traditions of his going to India to preach the gospel, and carrying thither the Gospel of Matthew, written in Hebrew, as also of his suffering martyrdom by crucifixion in Armenia or in Cilicia. But these reports must be received with more or less of doubt; and in fact India is used by ancient writers in a loose way to represent some distant eastern region of which they were very ignorant. [G. C. M. D.]

BARTIMÆUS [son of Timæus], the blind beggar who was cured by our Lord as he went out of Jericho, Mar. x. 46. The narrative suggests that he was persevering and unwavering in his faith; and this becomes the more obvious if we connect it with the account in Luke, in such a way as to infer that he had made application first of all as Jesus was entering the city, Lu. xviii. 35, which must have been a day before, Lu. xix. 5. It is not wonderful that these evangelists should single out this remarkable character and pass another unnoticed who was healed along with him, Mat. xi. 30.

BARUCH [blessed], a scribe, and a trusty friend of the prophet Jeremiah. He was the son of Neriah, and grandson of Maaseiah, and therefore was probably a brother of the Jewish nobleman Seraiah, to whom Jeremiah intrusted the reading of his great prophecy against Babylon, Je. xxxiii. 1-8; II. 59, &c. Jeremiah employed Baruch as his secretary to write out his prophecies against the Jews and other nations, and (as he was himself shut up in prison) to read them in the hearing of the people, ch. xxxvi. 1-8; a task which Baruch again discharged, ver. 9, &c., in very difficult circumstances, for king Jehoiakim cut the roll of the writing to pieces with his penknife, and burned it in the fire; and he also searched for the prophet and his friend to put them to death, but the Lord hid them. Once more Baruch was honoured to use his pen at the dictation of the prophet, to write out a more complete set of predictions, to some considerable extent probably the same as the book of Jeremiah now found in the Bible. For his faithful services, Baruch received a promise from the Lord, that his life should be spared amid all the calamities which were coming on his nation, Ja. xiv. When Jeremiah bought the field which belonged to his uncle at Anathoth, in the year before Jerusalem was destroyed, Baruch was the person to whom he intrusted the papers connected with the transaction, Je. xxxiii. 12, 13. The latest matter recorded about him is, that he was still faithful to the prophet, and shared in the contempt and ill-usage heaped upon him by the remnant of Jews who fled into Egypt, Je. xliii. 3, 4. There is a small book in the Apocrypha ascribed to Baruch, but the evidence of its later composition, and its mistakes, are fatal to its reputation. [G. C. M. D.]

BARZIL/LAI [made of iron], an aged Gileadite, a man of great wealth, who took a principal part in supplying the wants of king David during all the time of the rebellion of Absalom. The king would gladly have taken him to Jerusalem on his own return, but Barzillai steadily refused, on account of age and frailty. His son Chimham however was taken instead, 2Sa. xvii. 27; xix. 31-40. And other sons seem to have afterwards been taken to court, and to have been all of them recommended particularly to the favour of Solomon by David in his dying instructions, 1Ki. ii. 7.

BASHAN [meaning uncertain, perhaps soft rich soil], is the name in Scripture for a singularly rich tract of country lying beyond the Jordan, between Mount Hermon and the land of Gilead. These two regions, Bashan and Gilead, attracted the attention of those tribes that desired to continue the pastoral life to which they and their fathers had been accustomed; Gilead being divided between Reuben and Gad, and Bashan being given to the half tribe of Manasseh, Nu. xxxiii. 1-33. Modern travellers speak with enthusiasm and delight of its forests, in which oaks abound, worthy to be set alongside of the cedars of Lebanon, Is. ii. 13; Eze. xxvii. 6; Zec. xi. 2; and of the herds of bulls of Bashan in noble pasture ground, Ps. xxii. 12; Am. iv. 1; Mi. vii. 14. Bashan had been the kingdom of the Canaanite giant

Og, whom Moses destroyed, Nu. xxi. 33; and one district of the country, Argob, had at that time sixty fenced cities, with walls, gates, and bars, besides unfenced towns a great many, De. iii. 4, 5. These were standing or restored in Solomon's days, 1Ki. iv. 13; and to this day there are many points from which the traveller can look and see the remains of more than half that number.

There are difficulties in regard to the geography of Bashan, owing to its situation in a wild and unexplored region, to this hour one of the most dangerous in or around Palestine, and pronounced to be the same in their day by Strabo and Josephus. In the present century a vast impulse was given to discovery by the enterprises of Burckhardt, who lived among the Arabs as if he were a native, and made his way to many places which had been inaccessible to his predecessors, and who penetrated in this direction as far as Salcah, the extreme eastern limit of Bashan, see De. iii. 10, now called Sulkhad, and to other places in the neighbourhood. In the year 1857 an adventurous and successful English traveller, Mr. Cyril C. Graham, passed even further to the east of the Jebel Haurán, across a desert plain, thickly covered with black volcanic stones, hence named El Hárrah, that is, "a region covered with black burning stones," and to the Safáh. "The Safáh is a great natural fortress, thickly covered with huge shattered masses of basalt, the paths through which are tortuous fissures, known only to the wild race who inhabit it. In the interior is a range of volcanic teles, on the east side of which are several ruined towns and villages. By whom were they built, and when were they inhabited? The desert tribes who have had undisputed possession for at least 1200 years are not given to architecture, and never were. . . . It is questionable whether the sway of the Greeks or Romans ever extended so far into the desert, or at least was ever so secure as to give encouragement to the planting of colonies and the building of towns. It would be interesting to know more of the character and style of these ruins, which appear to resemble those structures of a primitive age still found amid the mountains of Bashan." "The Safáh resembles an island rising up out of the flat plain, and the rock of which the whole surface is formed looks like molten metal. Huge fissures and seams run through it, rendering access to the interior almost impossible. . . . The whole western side is swept by the Harrah, and is uninhabitable; we therefore skirt the eastern side, and in about an hour come upon traces of an ancient road, with stones at regular intervals, inscribed with regular characters resembling the Sinaitic. These continue until we reach the ruins of a town, wholly built of white stones, and thus contrasting strangely with the black strata of the Safáh and the adjoining plain. . . . The style of architecture resembles that of the ancient cities in the Haurán, stone roofs, stone doors, and massive stone walls. No inscriptions have been found, but there are fragments of rude sculptures apparently of a very early age."—(Murray's Handbook, by Porter, p. lxii. lxiii., 519.) In another neighbouring place Mr. Graham found hundreds of inscriptions, again in a character resembling the Sinaitic, and accompanied, as in the Sinai peninsula, with rude figures of camels, deer, asses, tigers, and horsemen. All this is the province of Bathanyeh, the classical Batanæa, or BASHAN proper.

Between Damascus and this outermost region which is beside Jebel Haurán lies the country of the Lejah, answering to the ancient province of TRACHONITIS, a region remarkable for the ruins of great cities, described by Burckhardt and others, corresponding in their massive rocky strength, and their adjuncts of caverns, to the description which Josephus has given of them as excessively difficult of access, and affording commodious shelter to their lawless inhabitants (Antiq. xv. 10, 1). In this country lie the very ancient cities of Edrei and Kenath, now Edhrás and Kunawát; the country of ARGOB, De. iii. 13, 14, is almost certainly this very region. South of the Lejah, Trachonitis, or Argob, and west of Batanæa or Bashan proper, lies the rich plain of the HAURÁN, strictly so called, a name preserved unaltered from the times of Ezekiel, ch. xlvii. 16, but also named at present En-Nukrah, "the plain," the most fertile region in Syria according to competent judges, and said to be filled with deserted villages and towns, the most familiar of which to us, as being named in Scripture, are the northern BOZRAH, now Busrah, and BETHGAMUL, now Um-el-Jemal. West of Haurán, towards the Sea of Galilee, the Jordan, and the Lake of Merom, lies the better known province of Jaulán, the classical Gaulonitis, and the region in which the city of refuge GOLAN must have stood; northward of Jaulán and Haurán lies Jedár, the Ituræa of the New Testament, and of the classics, the country of JETUR the son of Ishmael.

These several provinces, Bashan proper, Haurán, Argob, and Golan, possibly Jetur in addition, seem to have composed the kingdom of Bashan, that of the giant Og. But the geographical term Bashan might be taken either in a wider sense, as the kingdom, in which sense it is spoken of as the country of the half tribe of Manasseh beyond Jordan; or in the narrower sense of the province of Bashan, the most distant and outlying part of the country, just as Haurán is used at this day both in a wider and in a stricter sense. From inattention to this distinction it is alleged that there has been much confusion in the descriptions and maps, from the time of Eusebius downward. In the New Testament, as might be expected, we do not meet with Bashan in the sense of the kingdom, which had passed away some fifteen hundred years before; and the province of Bashan lay out too far to the east to be mentioned in the life of our Lord: so that the name Bashan does not appear at all in this portion of Scripture.

[The fullest and most accurate account of all geographical matters connected with Bashan must at present be looked for in the Rev. J. L. Porter's Five Years in Damascus. A shorter statement is given by the author himself, in his Handbook for Travellers in Syria and Palestine. Mr. Graham has given some account of his own discoveries and observations, in the Cambridge Essays for 1858.]

BA'SHAN-HAVOTH-JAIR. See HAVOTH-JAIR.
BASH'EMATH, or BASMATH [sweet-smelling].

1. A daughter of Elon the Hittite, who became the wife of Esau, Ge. xxv. 34. 2. A daughter of Ishmael, who also became a wife of Esau, the third he is said to have taken, Ge. xxviii. 9; xxxvi. 3. It is only in the last of these two passages that she bears the name of Bashe-math; in the former she is called Mahalath. All Esau's wives appear to have received new names on being married, probably with the view of becoming more distinctly separated from their kindred; and it would seem that the daughter of Ishmael was permitted to choose, or obliged to accept of the maiden name of the daughter of Elon. (See under AHOLIBAMAH.) 3. A daughter of Solomon, who became married to one of his officers, 1 K1. iv. 16.

BASKETS are often mentioned in the Bible, no less than four or even six words in the Old Testament being so rendered, and three in the New Testament. The commonest word in the Old Testament is sall, a word derived from a root expressing flexibility, and referring no doubt to the materials of which a basket is usually constructed. This word is used of the baskets with bread on the head of Pharaoh's butler, Ge. xl. 16, &c., in our version "white baskets," and in the margin, "full of holes," renderings not destitute of authority, but now generally given up for "baskets of white bread;" of a basket with the flesh of Gideon's present or offering, Ju. vi. 19; and of a basket with the bread for the meat-offerings brought before the altar at the tabernacle, Ex. xxix. 3, &c.; Le. viii. 2, &c.; Nu. vi. 15, &c. A closely connected form is salsillah, a grape-gatherer's basket, Ju. vi. 9. A word which appears entirely different in form, but which Gesenius reckons to be distantly connected with sall, is šnē, occurring only in two chapters in Deuteronomy; in ch. xxvi. 2, 4, of the basket in which the first-fruits were brought before the Lord; and in ch. xxviii. 5, 17, of the basket in which the harvest or household stores may have been kept. Another word still, occurring under the two cognate forms of dād and dāda, is used of the two symbolical baskets of figs which Jeremiah saw before the temple of the Lord, ch. xxiv. 1, 2, probably with allusion to the first-fruits in De. xxvi. 2; so that the first three words have been all employed in reference to religious services. It is the same word dād which is used to describe the vessel which carried the heads of Ahab's sons to Jehu, 2 K1. x. 7; and also the vessel used by the Israelitish bondmen in Egypt, Ps. lxxxi. 6, translated "pots" in our version, though now commonly identified with the baskets in which clay was carried for bricks. But in both these instances "pots" is a legitimate translation, as this is the common meaning of the word. The last word for basket is šāb, "a basket of summer fruit," Am. viii. 1; used in the other passage where it occurs for a bird-cage or bird-trap. Gesenius conjectures that it might be a basket with a lid coming down and covering in what it contained.

There are two different words which are kept carefully distinct in the original, but are indiscriminately rendered "baskets" filled with the fragments of the loaves and fishes with which, on two occasions, Jesus fed the multitudes, Mat. xiv. 20; xv. 37; xvi. 9, 10; but it is difficult to identify them with particular kinds of baskets at the present day. The one used in the account of the four thousand being fed, is used also in describing the escape of Paul from Damascus, Ac. ix. 25, though he himself employs another word, 2 Co. xi. 33. The baskets in use now in eastern countries bear a strong resemblance to those which are found represented on the monuments of Egypt. In shape, and material, and workmanship, they are often the same as our own; or when different, are yet not at all inferior. [G. C. M. D.]

BASTARDS were forbidden to enter the congregation of the Lord to the tenth generation, as Ammonites and Moabites also were, De. xxiii. 2, 3. Jephthah, however, was the son of a strange woman, and had been driven out by the legitimate offspring; yet he was called by God to be the judge of his people Israel, Ju. xi. 1, 2. The Lord threatened that a bastard should dwell in Ashdod at the time that the pride of the Philistines should be cut off, Zec. ix. 6. But in Deuteronomy and Zechariah the word is peculiar, and is reckoned by some to mean the offspring of an incestuous union. The word itself is manzer (מנזר), and only occurs in the two passages referred to. It is of uncertain etymology, and both Jewish and Christian interpreters differ in regard to its precise meaning. It is certain, however, that the rabbinical authorities, in earlier as well as recent times, understand it not of persons simply born out of wedlock, but of the offspring of incestuous connections, or of matrimonial alliances that were forbidden as altogether improper. It does not appear that bastards, in the ordinary sense, were regarded as the proper subjects of the prohibition in De. xxiii. 3, as appears from the cases alone of Jephthah and Amasa (see under both); and the modern Jews are of opinion that they might be admitted even to the priesthood. They had, however, no claim to a share in the paternal inheritance, or to the proper filial standing and treatment of children of the family. And this is what is referred to in He. xii. 7, where a contrast is drawn between the treatment which God's true children might expect, as compared with that given to such as are not so related to him, by means of an allusion to the difference between bastards and sons. The meaning is, that as the rights, the privileges, the hopes of sons, so also the training and discipline proper to such, belong to the one class, but not to the other.

BAT (מנזר, atalaph), "the darkness-bird." Many species of this tribe (Cheiroptera) are found in Western Asia, as in all warm countries, but the forms do not differ from those of Europe. In the Mosaic law it was proscribed as unclean, and was ranked among birds, but closing up the series, Le. xi. 19; De. xiv. 18, in each passage introducing the winged insects. Zoologically, however, as is hardly necessary to observe, the bat is a true quadruped, distinguished from others of its class by an enormous elongation of the bones of the arm and fingers, and by a membrane stretched over them, and extending to the hind limbs; by which modification the animal is able to exert a power of proper and continued flight.

Col. H. Smith elaborately argues (Kitto's Bib. Cycl.) that some of the great frugivorous bats (Pteropus) must be alluded to in the prohibition; on the ground that the flesh of the insectivorous species would offer no temptation to be used as food, while "the fact [of the prohibition] evidently shows that there were at the time men or tribes who ate animals classed with bats." We do not think, however, that any such allusion is at all evident. The distinction of "clean" and "unclean" had reference not merely to food, but to sacrifice, and to ceremonial defilement from contact, &c.; and other creatures, as little tempting as the insectivorous bats, are certainly prohibited, as the mouse, the lizard, and the mole. It is however fatal to the suggestion of this learned zoologist, that none of the frugivorous bats are natives of Western Asia or North Africa, while the small insectivorous species are abundant in those countries.

The habit of this order of animals is to dwell in dark and desolate places by day. Caverns, old hollow trees, ruined towers, and similar places, are chiefly sought by them; the qualifications of their diurnal resort being that it should be dark, secluded, and quiet, sufficiently roomy to allow them to fly to and from their resting-places, and furnished with projections or roughnesses, from which they may freely suspend themselves. In such gloomy retreats they may almost with certainty be found associating in considerable numbers, hanging head downward, with folded wings, from some projection of the roof, to which they cling by means of the sharp curved claws of their hind feet.

Allusion to this habit is found in Is. ii. 20, where the terrible glory of the "day of the Lord," the period of the manifestation of the Lord Jesus, is described as producing, among other effects, the destruction of idols. The terrified idolaters shall cast away the idols in which they have trusted to the most obscene and obscure retreats (see MOLÉ), while they themselves seek a vain protection in the clefts of the rocks from the wrath of the Lamb, Re. vi. 16. The whole of these two passages may be usefully read, and compared together, as showing in what light much that is now highly valued as enhancing the glory of man—the high towers, and the fenced walls, the ships of Tarshish, and the pleasant pictures—will appear in that day when the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together, Is. xl. 5. [P. H. G.]

BATH, BATHING. It is certain that baths of the kind in use throughout Syria at present, as also among the Greeks and Romans in the West, and the Persians in the East, were common in Palestine at the time of the Herods, and afterwards; the testimony of Josephus, and the monumental evidence in ruined cities, are sufficient to prevent any doubts upon this subject. But there is certainly no proof in Scripture that these luxurious and costly indulgences existed among the ancient Israelites; neither has valid proof from other sources ever been produced. Manifestly, it ought not to be inferred from the existence of the practice among the Egyptians, most of whom lived within easy reach of the Nile; whereas, if we except the Jordan, there is scarcely a running stream in Palestine proper which would afford facilities for such bathing during summer, the season in which it was to be chiefly desired. Certainly the verb rahats (רָחַץ), which is in our version rendered "bathe," is equally rendered "wash;" and it would be difficult to show that immersion is an idea proper to the word. On the contrary, the only proper meaning which Gesenius assigns to it is that of washing, whether applied to the human body, both as a whole, and in reference to its principal parts for washing, the hands, feet, and face, or whether to the parts of a sacrifice; and he says, in Arabic the verb means to wash either the body or clothes, also to perspire violently, that is, according to him, to be bathed in perspiration. There are passages, too, in which the idea of immersion seems to be positively excluded, as at Ex. xxx. 19, of the laver with water put into it, "Aaron and his sons shall wash their hands and their feet thereat," literally "therefrom;" Ca. v. 12. "His eyes are washed with milk;" also 1 Ki. xxii. 38, when translated in the only way the original permits, "And [one] ran a stream of water on the chariot at the pool of Samaria, and the dogs licked up his blood, and the harlots bathed;" three contemporaneous actions strikingly evincing the degradation to which Providence subjected the remains of Ahab; but surely even the harlots would be prevented from immersing themselves there, both by their own feelings and by public authority. Moreover, the word rahats, to bathe or wash the body, and cabas (כַּבֵּס), to wash clothes, which are kept apart in their literal meaning, are used without distinction in the metaphorical application to sin; and this points to cleansing as the true force of both verbs.

It is important to bear in mind that bathing, in the ordinary sense, had no place in the religious ordinances of the old covenant. In certain cases of corporeal defilement, it is possible that the immersion of the body in a bath might have satisfied the demands of the law-giver; but it could not have done so in the great mass of cases: the more active form of washing was required, in order to symbolize with greater distinctness the idea of religious purification. The only other action with water sanctioned in the law for purifications was that of sprinkling.

BATH, a measure for liquids among the Hebrews, equal to about 7 gallons English. (See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.)

BATH'SHEBA [daughter of an oath, or daughter of seven], the wife of Uriah, one of David's officers, with whom the king committed adultery, and whom he married after he had treacherously procured her husband's death, 2 Sa. xi. Besides other children, she bore Solomon to David, and, according to the Jewish writers, her powers of mind had much to do with the development of her son's wisdom. Certainly we find instances of her vigorous understanding, her kindness of heart, and her influence over both David and Solomon, 1 Ki. i. 11-31; ii. 13-21. In Samuel she is named Bathsheba, the daughter of Eliam, perhaps that mighty man of David's army who was son of Ahithophel, 2 Sa. xxiii. 34; in 1 Ch. iii. 5, by a slight variety of pronunciation, she is called Bath-shua, the daughter of Ammiel; and she is there said to have borne three other sons to David.

BATTERING-RAM. This was a well-known instrument of ancient warfare, a long heavy mass of wood, often with a metal head, swung backward and forward, so as to make a breach in the wall of a besieged town. The name in Greek and Latin is the same as that of a living ram, obviously on account of the resemblance of its work to the butting of a ram; and this seems the simplest meaning of the Hebrew word for a ram, as it is used in Eze. iv. 2; xxi. 22. Yet some good authorities have hesitated; and in this latter verse, where the word occurs twice, the first time "battering-rams" is put only in the margin by our translators. Possibly, by what our translators have rendered "engines of war," Eze. xxi. 9, the same instrument is specially intended: the exact rendering might be given "the stroke of that which is right opposite."

BATTLEMENT. See HOUSE.

BAY-TREE. In Ps. xxxvii. 35, a prosperous worldling is compared to a flourishing ezrach (עֲזַרְחַת). The radical signification, "to rise," "to spring up," as a plant, might apply to almost any tree, more especially to one indigenous and growing vigorously in its native soil; which would be a very good emblem of a wealthy chief or freeholder, dwelling among his own people, and casting his shadow over his ancestral acres; and we doubt if we are justified in making it more definite. Accordingly, Horsley renders it "a tree flourishing in its native soil," Mason Good "a vigorous tree," and most of the Jewish commentators make it "a native tree," as opposed to one that has been transplanted. However, the Septuagint and Vulgate have translated it "cedar," and most of the modern European versions make it the "laurel" or "bay." Thus, too, Sir Philip Sidney:—

"Like lawrell fresh himself out-spreading."

And Arthur Jonston:—

"Ut viret in pingui laurus amena solo."

Bishop Mant combines the "cedar" of the Septuagint with the "native tree" of the rabbis:—

"Once I saw, in pomp of power, Wide his boughs the impious spread;
So I've seen the cedar tower
Proudly from its native bed."

Nor will the reader grudge the following quotation from Racine. It gives the sudden turn of the original very happily, and French poetry contains no better stanza:—

"J'ai vu l'impie adoré sur la terre;
Pareil au cèdre, il cachait dans les cieux
Son front audacieux;
Il semblaît à son gré gouverner le tonnerre,
Foulaît aux pieds ses ennemis vaincus:
Je n'ai fait que passer, il n'était déjà plus."

As the bay sufficiently answers the purpose of the text, some, like Sir Thomas Browne, notwithstanding the slightness of its claims, will be "unwilling to exclude that noble plant from the honour of having its name in Scripture." With the appearance of the common bay (Laurus nobilis) every one is familiar; and from the use of its evergreen branches in crowning Roman conquerors, it has acquired proud and heroic associations. These, however, it could hardly convey to Hebrew minds, as it was not used for the victor's garland in Palestine. There was nothing to prevent it from growing in Judea, as it is a native of both Northern Africa and Southern Europe, and it still flourishes at Antioch. [J. H.]

BDELLIUM (Gr. βδέλλιον), the term employed in the ancient Greek and Latin translations, and adopted generally in the modern, for the Heb. bedolach (בְּדוֹלַח).

It occurs only twice in Scripture; first, as a precious commodity of some sort furnished by the land of Havilah, Ge. ii. 14, and afterwards as an object with which, in respect to colour, to compare the manna of the desert, Nu. xi. 7. The ancients applied the name to the gum of a tree which grew in Arabia, as well as India and Babylonia, nearly the colour of frankincense, whitish and pellucid. The chief objection to this view is, that it is not such a precious natural production as that one might expect it to be noticed among the peculiar treasures of Havilah; where also its appearance among gold and precious stones looks somewhat strange. Bochart (Hieroz. ii. 674-683) held it to signify pearls, and has supported his view, as usual, by a great profusion of learning. Gesenius, and the best authorities of recent times, are disposed to concur in the same view.

BEAN. Amongst the supplies which Barzillai sent to David and his attendants in their flight from Absalom were "beans," and they were also an ingredient in the bread which Ezekiel was directed to prepare previous to his representative siege of Jerusalem, 2 Sa. xvii. 28; Eze. iv. 9. From the Hebrew בִּישָׁת, pol, or phol, we have our English pulse, as the Romans had their puls or bean-pottage. Beans were extensively cultivated in the East, as they still are; and although not so prized for food as some of the cereals, their nutritious qualities were well known to the ancients, and they were largely employed in feeding slaves and the poorer people, as well as horses. Nor was our common bean (Faba vulgaris) the only legume with which the Jews were acquainted. They had lentils, and vetches, and pease or "parched pulse," under which words the reader will find further information. [J. H.]

BEAR (בֵּר, and בֵּרָה, dor). No doubt exists about the identity of this animal, which still bears its ancient Hebrew name in the dialects of Western Asia. The genus is well known as containing the largest, strongest, and most formidable carnivorous quadruped of Europe; but the species mentioned in the sacred Scriptures is one peculiar to the mountainous parts of Palestine and Syria, and has only recently come under the recognition of naturalists. A specimen killed by Ehrenberg and Hemprich, in Lebanon, afforded the first opportunity of determining this anciently renowned animal, and they, finding it undescribed, named it Ursus Syriacus. It is about as large as the brown bear of Europe, but is lower on the legs, proportionately higher at the withers, furnished with a conspicuous tail, and a high mane of stiff hair between the shoulders. Its colour is a yellowish-white, sometimes deepening to buff, and occasionally clouded with light and dark tints.

Besides the notices that occur in Scripture, we have evidence of the existence of bears in Syria from early times. In an ancient Egyptian painting representing tribute brought to Thothmes III., the bearers, a fair-haired, bearded race, clad in long garments, and white gloves, bring among many other articles a living bear, which by its form and colour belongs to the present species. Many of the adjuncts of this scene indicate the people to be Phœnicians.

A procession much like this occurred in Egypt long after, in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, where "a single white bear" made a prominent figure.¹ And Prosper Alpinus speaks of white bears as existing in Arabia² and Egypt.

In the middle ages the crusaders occasionally fell in with the Syrian bear, and gave testimony to its ferocity. Godfrey of Bouillon, during the siege of Antioch, was riding in a neighbouring forest, when he saw a peasant carrying a load of wood, fleeing from an enraged bear. The king gallantly spurred to the rescue, and the animal turning upon him, he was unhorsed by its furious assault on his steed, and fought on foot. After a severe struggle, in which he was dangerously wounded, he buried his sword to the hilt in his savage foe, and killed him.³

The value of this story is the confirmation it affords of the ancient reputation of this beast for power and ferocity. The allusions to it in the sacred writers constantly represent it as little inferior to the lion in savage violence, with which animal it is frequently associated in historical narrative, 1 Sa. xvii. 34-37, and in poetical imagery, Pr. xxviii. 15; La. iii. 10; Ho. xlii. 7, 8; Am. v. 19. The ferocity of this powerful brute was the divine instrument in the punishment of forty-two youths, who blasphemously mocked the mission of Elisha, 2 Ki. ii. 24. This ferocity is manifested with peculiar intensity by the female, either in defence of her cubs, or in revenge for the loss of them, 2 Sa. xvii. 8; Pr. xvii. 12, &c.; a fact illustrated by many well-known modern narratives of other species, particularly the Polar bear, to which the Syrian species exhibits a close affinity. [P. H. G.]

BEARD. The Egyptians shaved very carefully, although they were accustomed to wear false beards: hence Joseph shaved before going into Pharaoh's presence, Ge. xli. 14. But the nations of Western Asia to this day wear the beard long, and reckon this not merely an ornament, but an essential to manly character. There is abundant evidence in Scripture that this was also the custom among the Israelites. Not to trim it carefully and often was a proof of deep distress, as in the instance of Mephibosheth during the rebellion of Absalom, 2 Sa. xix. 24. Still more severe grief, especially on occasion of the death of near relations, was expressed by cutting off the beard, which an Arab or Turk at the present day will not do without the constraint of the strongest motives, 1a. xv. 2; Jo. xlviii. 37; and this was also done by the worshippers of God in deep distress, Eze. ix. 3; Je. xli. 5. Ezekiel was commanded to shave off his hair and his beard, as a mark of the deep degradation to which Jerusalem was about to be exposed, Eze. v. 1, &c.; with which compare the metaphorical use of shaving in a prediction of the Assyrians coming against the people of God, 1a. vii. 20. And David's ambassadors to the king of the Ammonites had the half of their beards shaven off, which was reckoned an insult of so gross a kind that it kept them for a time from their master's presence, and gave occasion to a bloody war, 2 Sa. x. 4, 5, &c.; and the endurance of a similar indignity is attributed to Christ by the prophet, 1a. l. 6. Even to touch the beard was reckoned a liberty too great to be taken except by the nearest friends; hence we may estimate how abominable the treachery of Joab was, as we read that he took

Amasa his cousin by the beard, to kiss him (or, as others equally well translate, to kiss it), when immediately he struck him dead, 2Sa. xx. 9. In certain cases of suspected leprosy shaving was enjoined; also at the purification of the leper, Le. xiii. 33; xiv. 9. The people were forbidden to round the corners of their heads or mar the corners of their beards, Le. xix. 27; thus distinguishing themselves from the Egyptians, who shaved all the hair away; and from certain of their Arab neighbours, who are said to have trimmed their beards in the very manner that is here forbidden, so as to dedicate themselves to one of their idol deities. This custom is pointed at in Je. ix. 26, and other passages, where the marginal rendering, "all having the corners polled," is to be preferred to that of the text. [G. C. M. D.]

BEAST. There are two principal Hebrew words, of which this is the rendering—בְּהֵמָה, behémah, and חַי, hai. Of these the latter, with its Chaldee representative חַי, hêivah, is the more comprehensive, seemingly including everything that possesses animal life. It therefore corresponds to the Greek ζῷον, living creature, in its widest application. It is sometimes, however, used in a more restricted sense, as in Ge. i. 24, 25; vii. 14, 21, &c., as distinguishing certain kinds of animals from behémah, which is there rendered "cattle."

Perhaps we might say that this latter sense indicates a binary division of quadrupeds, corresponding to that of Linnaeus—the behémah representing the Ungulata or hoofed quadrupeds (of which בְּיָמִים, betr, occurring in only four passages, is a synonym), and the hai standing for the numerous clawed races—the Unguiculata. Linnaeus's third subdivision, the Mutica, including the whales and similar animals, were, as might have been expected, ranged with the fishes.

Taking into view the whole animate creation, exclusive of man, who is treated of in the Holy Scripture under a very different aspect from that of his zoological position, the first and most obvious distribution seems to have been founded on the localities frequented by animals, "the beast of the earth, the fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea;" separating, however, from the first, "the creeping thing;" this we find in the Mosaic account of the creation. In the sacred narrative of the deluge, the same arrangement is adopted as regards terrestrial and aerial animals; and beasts are further divided into clean and unclean. But indications of a much more elaborate division appear in the book of Leviticus, ch. xi., and in the parallel passage in Deuteronomy, ch. xiv.; which we notice the more readily, because it is by far the earliest attempt at that orderly arrangement which we usually designate system, and because it seems to have been generally neglected by those who have written the history of zoology. The principal orders of animals are very clearly distinguished. " whatsoever parteth the hoof, and is cloven-footed, and cheweth the cud among the beasts," Le. xi. 3, indicates, of course, the Ruminantia of modern science; "the coney" and "the hare," ver. 5, 6, may be considered as typical of the Rodentia,¹ and "the swine," ver. 7, of the Pachydermata; while " whatsoever goeth upon his paws, among all manner of beasts that go on all four," ver. 27, seems to point out clearly enough the Carnivora. Then, among aerial animals, we have somewhat less distinctly the Raptores, Insectores, Natatores, and Grallatores, associated, however, with the bat; all of which, being prohibited, leave the gallinaceous order separated as clean, ver. 13-19. The "fowls that creep, going upon all four," ver. 20, and the "flying creeping things," ver. 23, are not unaptly descriptive of winged insects, among which the saltatory Orthoptera are graphically noted as those creeping things "which have legs above their feet, to leap withal upon the earth," ver. 21. The aquatic tribes are distinguished into "such as have fins and scales in the waters," ver. 9, the true Fishes, and "all that have not fins and scales," ver. 10, perhaps meaning the Amphibia or the Cetacea. Besides these, there is a heterogeneous assemblage of creatures denominated "creeping things," ver. 28, of which small size seems to be the only common character, including (at least, in our translation) "the weasel, the mouse, and the tortoise after his kind, and the ferret, and the chameleon, and the lizard, and the snail, and the mole." In order to estimate the value of this arrangement, we must bear in mind that the object of the sacred writer was not at all a systematic distribution of the animal kingdom, which is only casually introduced for the purpose of instituting a ceremonial permission or prohibition of certain sorts of animal food; that the animals noticed are only those of a very limited district; and, out of these, none but such as might offer any temptation to be used as food; and that the incongruities and anomalies would probably be much diminished, could we with certainty know the species in every case intended by the sacred historian.

[P. H. G.]

BEAST, in a figurative or symbolical sense, is frequently employed in Scripture, and always (unless where there is a mistranslation) with reference to the sensual and grovelling, or ferocious and brutal natures which properly belong to the beast creation. Thus, the psalmist speaks of himself as being "like a beast before God," while giving way to merely outward and fleshly considerations, Ps. lxxiii. 22; and of the savage multitude at Ephesus, who stormed and raged for St. Paul's life, he says "he had fought with beasts at Ephesus," 1 Co. xv. 32. So, in many other passages, Job xviii. 3; Ps. xlix. 12; lxxviii. 30; 2 Pe. ii. 12, &c. In the Apocalypse there is what is called emphatically THE BEAST, by which is obviously meant a worldly power—or rather an ideal representation of the power of the world as a whole, in its sensual, lawless, God-opposing character, exhibiting itself in the treatment given by the several kingdoms of the world to the cause and people of Christ, Re. xiii. 1, &c.; xv. 2; xvii. 8; xix. 19. This image, like several others in the same book, is taken from the vision of Daniel, in which the successive worldly monarchies which were to arise, and were, one after another, to acquire a sort of world-wide dominion, are represented by so many wild beasts ascending out of a tempestuous sea—that is, so many selfish, fierce, tyrannical, godless existences tossed up by the tumultuous elements of a troubled world—while the properly divine kingdom, the only one which had a right to exist, and which should ultimately prove the one universal and everlasting kingdom, was imaged by one like a son of man—godlike, reasonable, humanizing, blessed, Da. vii. It is the same contrast between the beastly and the divine-human which, with certain modifications, and with much more of detail, is exhibited in the apocalyptic vision respecting the beast. But what in the earlier part of the same book are designated the four beasts—viz. the cherubic forms, ch. iv. 6, 8, &c., should have been the four living ones, or the four creatures. For the word in the original here is quite different from that used of the beast already referred to. In the latter case it is ἄγριον, beast in the strict sense, with reference to its untamed, savage nature, wild beast; whereas, in the other case, the term is ζῴα, creatures with life, applied to the cherubic forms as the peculiar representatives of the life-property that is in God. (See CHERUBIM.) One cannot but regret that objects so distinct, and in their qualities so diametrically opposed, should have been designated by the same appellation in our English Bibles.

BECHER [first-born, also young camel]. 1. The second son of Benjamin, according to the genealogy of Benjamin's house in Ge. xvi. 21 and in 1 Ch. vii. 6. In the former list, however, he appears as the second of ten sons, while in the latter he is one of only three. In a still further list, 1 Ch. viii. 1, 2, the sons of Benjamin are given as five in all, but Becher is not named as one of them; nor are the others the same as in the original list of Genesis, excepting Bela and Ashbel. It is singular also, as regards Becher, that in the enumeration of the families of Benjamin in the wilderness, that of Becher does not occur, Nu. xvi. 38. These strange diversities probably arose from the different objects with which the respective genealogies were drawn up—some having respect chiefly to the immediate offspring of Benjamin, others to the distinct families that grew out of these, which might again admit of certain modifications at successive stages in the history of the tribe, from the remarkable vicissitudes the tribe underwent. The dreadful calamity that befell the tribe, through its own perverseness, as recorded in the concluding chapters of Judges, must alone have produced a great disorganization in its family arrangements—some, perhaps, entirely losing their distinctive position, and others coming in their place.

2. BECHER. A son of Ephraim, according to Nu. xxvi. 35, who, however, is called Bered in 1 Ch. vii. 20. It is possible that this is the same person as the preceding; for, as the family of Ephraim at an early period suffered grievously in a conflict with the men of Gath, 1 Ch. vii. 21, some have thought that Becher, the son of Benjamin, married into his family, and henceforth was reckoned as of the tribe of Ephraim. If this were so, it would explain the appearance of a family of Becherites or Bachrites among the descendants of Ephraim in the wilderness, Nu. xxvi. 35, and the non-appearance of such in Benjamin.

BEDAN is named among the judges who delivered Israel, in the speech of Samuel on retiring from his active labours, 1 Sa. xii. 11; no such name, however, is given in the book of Judges. It is by the Chaldee paraphrast translated "the son of Dan," having been by him applied to Samson, who belonged to that tribe. Some suppose him to be Jair, the Gileadite judge, thus distinguished from the elder Jair; for Bedan was a name in eastern Manasseh. Others take it to be a mistaken reading for Barak, as the letters r and d, k and n, may easily be mistaken in Hebrew: and this is the way in which the name has been read by the Greek and Syriac translators, the authors of two ancient and much esteemed versions. A much simpler conjecture of Ewald and Gesenius is, that Bedan may be a variety of pronunciation for Abdon, by dropping the first letter, as the interchange of the long vowels a and o is common, and presents no difficulty.

BEDS in Palestine, among the ancient Jews, were probably much as they are now, of two kinds, the fixed and the moveable. We read at times of a special bed-chamber, which was no doubt in the innermost part of the house, where the women slept: such might be Pharaoh's into which the frogs were to penetrate, Ex. viii. 3; and that of the king of Syria, in which nothing could be secret from Elisha, 2 Ki. vi. 12; compare Ec. i. 20. We read also of a bed-chamber in which the young king Joash was hidden from the usurper Athaliah, 2 Ki. xi. 2; but the correct translation there is, "the chamber of the beds," a store-room into which beds and bedding were carried during the day-time when they were not in use, as is now pretty generally understood. The chief sleeping place, however, was usually the large room of the house, with a raised platform at one end of the room, or on two or three sides of it, this being occasionally covered with a cushion, somewhat in the style of cut No. 112. In such a room the master of the house and his family might all sleep together, as in the parable, "my children are now with me in bed," Lu. xi. 7. The moveable bedstead, like our own to some extent, might be made of various materials. The giant Og had his bedstead of iron, De. iii. 11, perhaps to suggest the idea that nothing less strong would be sufficient to bear his weight, as would doubtless have been true of one made of palm-sticks, such as are common at the present day. At a later period, when luxury began to creep in, the prophet Amos mentions beds of ivory, Am. vi. 4. Both the fixed and the moveable beds may have been used for couches or sofas during the day, 1 Sa. xxviii. 23; Eze. xxiii. 41.

There are four or five common words in the Old Testament, which are all translated "bed." Two of these, mittah and mishkab, are most used, and are of quite general import, indicating simply, by their etymology, places for lying; and hence were applied to couches or seats at an entertainment, and also to the bier on which a dead body is carried to the grave, and to the lair in which it rests at last, 2Sa. iii. 31; 2Ch. xvi. 14. Another word, 'eres, used in Am. vi. 4; Song i. 16, &c., from the context and from the derivation, suggests the notion of a covered bed—a bedstead with hangings; as in the apocryphal book of Judith, xiii. 9, there is mention made of a bed with a net-work hung on pillars for excluding the flies. The same word is repeatedly used of a bed for a sick person, probably therefore constructed with more attention to comfort, Pa. vi. 6; xli. 3; Job vii. 13. Another word, huppah, which occurs twice (rendered “chamber” in Pr. xix. 6, and “closet,” Joel ii. 16), is now generally taken to be “a marriage bed;” and both from this circumstance, and from its etymology, it also seems to have possessed a cover or canopy. The remaining word, yatsua, is simply anything spread or laid down, and perhaps refers rather to the bed-clothes than to that on which they are laid.

The bed-clothes were very simple—a quilt or wrapper of any kind, thicker or thinner according to the weather, but generally such that a person might rise and roll it together, and so “carry his bed” away with him, Ju. v. 8-11, &c. Particularly in the case of the poor, there might be nothing more than the outer garment, which, in ordinary circumstances, was often not worn upon the body, and hence was likely enough to be offered as a pledge when the poor man had to borrow, but which the law of God required the creditor to return at night-fall, in order that its owner might sleep in it, Ex. xxii. 26, 27; De. xxi. 12, 13. We read of Jacob taking a stone for his pillow, Ge. xxviii. 11, which Dr. Thomson (The Land and the Book, p. 61) says is often to be seen at present; while he adds that he himself has tried it, but never with success. In 1 Sa. xix. 13, we read of a pillow of goats’ hair in David’s house; and in Eze. xiii. 18, 20, of luxurious pillows sewed by the women who laboured to turn the people from the living God: there is, however, some obscurity in both passages. In Pr. vii. 16, 17 we have an account of other luxurious arrangements not unknown about beds: but it is in the address of the adulteress, from which we are scarcely warranted to infer any general practice.

One word more, mlinah, a place for spending the night, is translated “cottage,” Is. i. 8; xli. 20; in the second of which passages, perhaps also in the first, it may be better translated “a hammock,” a hanging bed slung from the bough of a tree or some such support, still used for sleeping in with safety from wild beasts by those who have to watch in the fields.

[G. C. M. D.]

BEE (דבורה, deborah), the most celebrated of all insects, both on account of its wonderful instincts, and its ministering to human sustenance and convenience by the production of honey and wax. The direct mention of it in the Sacred Scripture rather refers to its power of inflicting injury with its poisonous sting. The bee belongs to the order Hymenoptera among insects, which is characterized by the possession of two pairs of transparent wings, which are neither clothed with scales nor netted; and a sheathed ovipositor, which in many cases (in the bee among others) is acutely pointed, and communicates with a bladder, into which is secreted a highly irritant poison.

The irascibility of these little insects, the boldness which prompts them to attack any enemy, however superior in size and power to themselves, and the pertinacity with which they pursue the object of their anger, are alluded to in Holy Scripture. Moses, reminding the Israelites of their powerlessness before their enemies, when faithless and disobedient, tells them, De. i. 44, that the Amorites had chased them as bees do. Again, in Ps. cxviii., the psalmist compares the numerous and virulent enemies that surrounded him to these angry insects—“they compassed me about like bees.” Once more, this insect, by its numerous swarms, its habit of rifling every flower, and its formidable weapon of offence, was no unworthy emblem of the threatened invasion of Assyria: “The Lord shall hiss . . . for the bee that is in the land of Assyria.” Is. vii. 18, 19.

These allusions are well borne out by profane writers and modern observers. Pliny tells us that in some parts of Crete, the bees were so annoying that the inhabitants were obliged to forsake their homes. And some parts of Scythia are described by Ælian as having been uninhabitable, on account of the numerous swarms of bees that infested them. Mungo Park, while travelling in Africa, proved the prowess of these minute but formidable foes. Some of his people having met with a populous hive, imprudently attempted to plunder it of its honey. The swarm rushed out in fury, and attacked the company so vigorously, that man and beast fled in all directions. The horses were never recovered, and several of the asses were so severely stung that they died the next day.—(Travels, ii. 37.)

Scriptural references to honey are much more numerous than those to the bee. In one remarkable passage, indeed, Ju. xiv., we find both. Samson having slain a young lion—a lion in the full vigour of youthful strength—found, on returning to the spot, a swarm of bees and a comb of honey in the cavity of the dried carcase, or perhaps in the skeleton—in either case, the sun and wind having so effectually dried up the organic matter as to deprive it of all smell—so that he obtained refreshment for himself and for his kindred out of the spoiled spoiler. Of this incident he made a riddle, which, blessed be God, we can read, though the Philistines could not. We know how the Mighty One, of whom Samson was a copious type, spoiled the “strong man armed,” met the “roaring lion” in his pride and power, “and destroyed him that had the power of death.” We well know how from that victory He obtained glory and joy for himself, and everlasting glory and joy for us also, whom, though we had no part in the peril of the conflict, He calls to share in the spoils of the conquest.

The abundance of honey in Palestine was prominently noticed in descriptions of the superior advantages of the land over those of Egypt. Its scarcity in the latter may be inferred from the fact that Jacob thought “a little honey” worth sending as an item in the present which was to conciliate the man that spake roughly, Ge. xliii. 11. On the other hand, Canaan is repeatedly spoken of as “a land flowing with milk and honey,” Ex. iii. 8, &c. It would seem that, in general at least, this honey was the produce of wild bees, Pr. xiv. 16; sometimes deposited in holes of the rocks, De. xxxii. 13; Ps. lxxxi. 16, sometimes in the cavities of hollow trees, 1 Sa. xiv., as is still common in warm countries, as the writer knows from experience. John the Baptist, in the wilderness of Judea, was sustained by the abundance of this supply—“His meat was locusts and wild honey,” Mat. iii. 4. Another substance, however, the produce of certain trees, has also been understood by the term there, for which see HONEY (WILD).

Honey formed an important part of the diet of the western Asiatics, probably being consumed quite as freely as sugar is with us. Repeated notices allude to this: it was included in the supplies afforded by Barzilai and others to David on his expulsion from Jerusalem in the revolt of Absalom, 2 Sa. xvii. 29; and in the present sent by Jeroboam to Ahijah, 2 Ki. xiv. 3; and in the provisions stored up by the men spared from the massacre of Ishmael, the son of Nethaniah, Je. xli. 8; and in the food which Jerusalem is described as habitually eating, in Jehovah's solemn upbraidings, Esa. xvi. 13, 19; and it was to form a prominent part of the sustenance of the virgin's Son, Is. vii. 16; as it did of every one left in Israel during the Babylonian captivity, ver. 22.

In several of these passages honey is associated with butter; by which latter we are to understand either cream, or butter newly churned in that mild and semi-fluid state in which (in hot climates at least) it can scarcely be distinguished from cream. Fluidity is a prominent idea in many of these allusions, which will better agree with our notions of cream than of butter: wild honey is frequently almost as liquid as water. That the mixture of honey and butter (or cream), which would be far too luscious for a western palate, is still eaten in Palestine, we have the testimony of modern travellers. D'Arvieux says of the Arabs that “one of their chief breakfasts is cream or fresh butter mixed in a mess of honey; these do not seem to suit very well together; but experience teaches that this is no bad mixture, nor disagreeable in its taste, if one is ever so little accustomed to it.”—(Memoirs, iii. 209.) More recently Captains Irby and Mangles speak of the same custom:—“They gave us some honey and butter together, with bread to dip in it; Narsah desiring one of his men to mix the two ingredients for us, as we were awkward at it. The Arab having stirred the mixture up well with his fingers, showed his dexterity at consuming as well as mixing, and recompensed himself for his trouble by eating half of it.”—(Travels in Egypt, &c., 263.) (For the relation of honey to the offerings at the tabernacle, see HONEY, and OFFERINGS.)

The other product of the bee—wax—is occasionally spoken of under a proper appellation (דֹּנָג, donag), distinct from that of the honey-comb (נֹפֶת, nopheth).

It was probably therefore used officinally (i.e. sold in shops), but the sacred allusions throw no light on this, being confined to its quality of melting under the application of heat, Ps. xlii. 14; lxviii. 2, &c.

That the industry, the fruitfulness, or some other quality of the bee, perhaps that of producing sweetness, had early excited admiration, appears from females being named after it. Deborah, the nurse of Rebekah, Ge. xxxv. 8, and Deborah, the prophetess who with Barak delivered Israel, Ju. iv., bore the humble name of “bee,” just as, in later days, the laborious friend of saints and widows was named after the elegant gazelle, Ac. ix. 36. [P. H. G.]

BEEL/ZEBUB. See BAALZEBUB.

BEEL/ZEBUL. This, as already indicated under BAALZEBUB, is the proper form of what appears in the authorized version of the New Testament as Beelzebub—a reading without support from the Greek. In regard to the precise import of Beelzebub, however, commentators are not quite agreed. Dung-lord is the sense adopted by Buxtorf and Lightfoot, and is the one still most commonly received, but several commentators of note (including Michaelis, Paulus, Meyer), have objected to it, on the ground that, as zebul not zebul is dung, the word should in that case have been Beelzebel. The proper meaning of zebul in Hebrew is domicile, habitation; and so the authorities referred to would understand the epithet as meaning lord of the domicile. But this seems by much too general a designation for the most distinctive and opprobrious title of the Prince of darkness. It is also, we are told by Lightfoot (Hor. Heb. at Mat. xii. 25), an undoubted fact, that zebul occurs in the rabbinical writings in the sense of dung and dunghill; and in that sense it is used as a familiar epithet of loathing and contempt for idolatry and idol worship. Hence, says he, “among all the devils they naturally esteemed that devil the worst, the foulest, and, as it were, the prince of the rest, who ruled over the idols, and by whom oracles and miracles were given forth among heathens and idolaters. And they were of this opinion, because they held idolatry above all other things chiefly wicked and abominable, and to be the prince and head of evil.”

BEYER, a dug well, though in our translation it has unfortunately been often confounded with Ain or En, a fountain or spring; both being frequently used, alone or compounded with other words, as names of places.

BEYER, a town which is not improbably the same as BEKROTH (which is the plural form), and has been identical with a large village of 700 or 800 Moslems, and three or four Christian families, now called Breh, a few miles to the north of Jerusalem, a little south-west of Bethel, in the tribe of Benjamin, 2 Sa. iv. 2. It was originally associated with Gibeon as one of the four cities of the Hivites which made peace with Joshua by a stratagem, Jos. ix. 17. The Beer to which Jotham fled from his brother Abimelech may have been this city for anything we know, but the language is too indefinite to enable us to speak with certainty, Ju. ix. 21. Neither can we offer with confidence any explanation of the flight of the inhabitants of Beeroth to Gittaim, 2Sa. iv. 3.

BEER-ELIM [the dug well of the heroes], Is. xv. 8, was a city in or near the land of Moab; and is taken usually to be the Beer where the nobles of Israel dug the well under the direction of Moses, Nu. xxi. 16-18. Its position has not been ascertained.

BEERI. See AHOLIBAMAH.

BEER-LAHAI-ROI [well of the living, seeing One], a name given by Hagar to a spring, to which she was divinely directed in the day of her extremity, when driven from the tent of Sarah, Ge. xvi. 14. Its situation is described as having been between Kadesh and Bered, on the edge of the wilderness, which lay towards Shur, on the way to Egypt. At a later period Isaac is found once and again dwelling beside it, Ge. xxiv. 62; xxv. 11.

BEEROTH. See BEER.

BEER-SHEBA [well of the oath, sheba being contracted for shebua], a city in the extreme south of the Promised Land—so that from Dan to Beer-sheba was a common form of expression for the entire length of the country; and a place, moreover, of very great antiquity. It was associated with the personal history both of Abraham and of Isaac, and first obtained the name of Beer-sheba, on account of the oath, or covenant of peace, which Abimelech entered into with Abraham in connection with it. This is expressly given as the origin of the name by the sacred historian, Ge. xxi. 31; and to connect it, as some would do, with the seven lambs presented by Abraham to Abimelech on the occasion (sheba being the name for seven), is quite fanciful. In Isaac's time also, we find the name imposed a second time, and on the same ground—because an oath of peace had passed between him and the king of Gerar, Ge. xxvi. 33. But the place, though situated on the edge of the desert, is remarkable for its plenitude of wells, there being altogether seven within a short distance of each other; and it is possible enough that the precise well designated Beer-sheba by Isaac was not the same which had previously received the name from Abraham. There still are two principal wells, at the distance of a hundred yards from each other, which pour their streams into the Wady es-Seba. The wells themselves are called Bir es-Seba. The larger of them is 12½ feet in diameter, and 44½ feet from the bottom to the surface of the water; the other is 5 feet in diameter, and 42 feet deep. The water, we are informed, of both these wells is in great abundance, and of good quality; the finest, Robinson states, he had tasted since he left Sinai (Researches, i. p. 301). They are also surrounded by drinking-troughs of stone for camels and flocks—such as they probably had from patriarchal times; while the curb-stones are deeply worn by the friction of the ropes in drawing up water by the hand. The five smaller wells lie at some distance from these two larger ones, and are often missed by travellers.

Beer-sheba is interesting from its associations, rather than from its intrinsic importance, as an inhabited place. Neither the notices connected with it, nor the straggling ruins still existing in the neighbourhood, give indication of extensive buildings or a dense population.

By Eusebius it was described as merely a large village with a Roman garrison; and it probably never was more. But it cannot be viewed without interest, when considered as one of the more peculiar places of patriarchal sojourn—the place where Abraham planted a grove, and worshipped “Jehovah, the everlasting God,” from whence also he set out to offer up Isaac as a sacrifice in the land of Moriah; the place where Isaac resided when he was bowing down under the infirmities of age, where Jacob stole from him the blessing that was meant by the misjudging father for the profane Esau, and that obliged Jacob to flee from his brother's presence to the land of Padan-aram, Ge. xxviii. 10,—the place, in all probability, where the two brothers met yet again to convey the remains of their aged father to the cave of Mamre, and where, at a later period, Jacob rested on his descent to Egypt, and called on the God of his father Isaac, Ge. xli. 1. Beer-sheba is further noted as the place in which Samuel's sons acted as judges, and at which Elijah halted on his way to Horeb, where also he left his servant, while all alone he himself advanced into the wilderness. In later times it became forsaken of its proper glory, and is noted as among the places which took a lead in the practice of idolatry. What was designated the “way” and “manner” of Beer-sheba, was pointed to as a beacon to be shunned, not a course to be followed, Am. v. 5; viii. 14. In Christian times, however, it was visited by the gospel, and became, in process of time, the seat of a bishop; but it appears to have sunk into a state of decay before the period of the crusades. Even its site was then mistaken, and it had probably ceased to be inhabited.

BEEBLE (בִּיבְלָה, hargol). This word, which occurs but once in Scripture, Le. xi. 22, may be with tolerable certainty concluded to mean, not what is properly a beetle, that is an insect whose wings are covered by leathery sheaths, meeting in a straight line, but rather a species of locust or grasshopper, whose wings are covered by sheaths that are only semi-coriaceous, and that overlap each other.

No direct clue to the identification of the hargol exists; but as the Septuagint render the word by ὄφιουδχης, “serpent-killer,” a term which designates the ichneumon, it has been ingeniously suggested by the Rev. J. F. Denham (Cycl. Bibl. Lit. art. Chargol) that a species of Truxalis is intended. For this is a genus of Orthoptera, agreeing generally with the locust in external characters, but distinguished by a remarkable elongation and projection of the forehead in a conical form, and of carnivorous propensities, hunting and feeding on other insects. The services it thus renders to man by keeping down the breeds of voracious and noisome insects seem to have obtained for it a common appellation with that of the little weasel (herpestes), which carries on its warfare against serpents and crocodiles. [P. H. G.]

BEHEMOTH (בְּהֵמָה). This word is commonly considered as the “plural of excellence,” of בְּהֵמָה, behemah (see BEAST); in which sense it certainly occurs in Ps. l. 10: “The cattle (behemah) upon a thousand hills.”

The magnificent description in Job xxxix. 15-24, however, is apparently the portrait of some particular species, and there can be no doubt that some mighty pachyderm is meant, but whether the elephant or the hippopotamus, critics and naturalists are not agreed. There are some particulars in the description which answer better to the former than the latter. "He moveth his tail like a cedar" can scarcely be said of the hippopotamus, whose tail is short and insignificant; that of the elephant is larger; but if the word rendered "tail" (צַיִת) could mean the proboscis, the comparison would be strikingly poetical. The latter part of ver. 19, generally rendered, "He that made him hath also furnished him with his weapon," would apply, if this rendering be accepted, better to the elephant, who carries conspicuous tusks, than to the hippopotamus, whose teeth, though large, can scarcely be called weapons. The account of the habitat of the creature, "the mountains . . . where all the beasts of the field play," "under the shady trees," agrees better with an animal which, though delighting to bathe and to lie in the morasses, is an inhabitant of the forests, than with one which ordinarily dwells immersed in lakes and rivers, and never wanders far from the water side. Finally, the feat mentioned in the closing sentence, "his nose pierceth through snares," does not seem so fitted to the broad, bluff, square muzzle of the hippopotamus, as to the long, sensitive, and muscular trunk of the elephant, which the animal in fact uses constantly to test doubtful objects, and to remove or destroy such as impede or annoy him.

Nor would it much militate against this interpretation that the elephant is not a native of the region in which the scene of the poem is laid. We are inclined to believe that the book of Job was written by Moses, probably during his seclusion in Midian, or by some other inspired author, of remote antiquity, familiar with life in Egypt and Arabia; and should therefore expect to find the scenery and adjuncts Egyptian, or Arabian, or both combined. But that the elephant was well known in Egypt is proved not only by the use of ivory in the arts, specimens of which are preserved in abundance, but also by the representation of the animal itself on early Egyptian monuments, as in a painting representing tribute brought to Thothmes III., who was probably the Pharaoh who patronized Joseph. This seems to have been the Indian elephant, but surely the African species must have been much more familiarly known. Even at the present day the forests of Tigré and Woyjerat in Abyssinia are full of wild elephants, the hunting of which forms an important occupation of the natives. But this very region was the centre of the ancient kingdom of Meroe, whose civilization was even of a higher antiquity than that of Egypt itself, according to tradition. That free intercourse must have taken place between the two countries from the earliest ages is evident: they were not unfrequently united under one monarch; and the pyramids and other monumental remains which are preserved in Ethiopia show that one religion was common to both.

On the other hand, if leviathan is to be understood of the crocodile, which there seems no sufficient reason to doubt (see LEVIATHAN), the association of this reptile with the behemoth would favour the identification of the latter with the hippopotamus. The two creatures were together considered as peculiarly Egyptian; they were the pride of the country; its most powerful samples of the brute creation; and likely to be selected by a poet as the most notable illustrations of creative power. Accordingly we find them so associated in ancient works of art, as at Herculaneum and in the Pre-nestine pavement.

In reply it might be urged that in Ethiopia the elephant is as much associated with the crocodile as is the hippopotamus; understanding the association with the limits of the sacred description, the one being an inhabitant of the forest, the other of the water. And as to probabilities, we must consider (regarding the book of Job as divinely inspired) not what an Egyptian poet would be likely to select, but what Jehovah himself would be likely to select in his appeal to an Arabian patriarch, which consideration very much diminishes the supposed force of Egyptian prestige in the selection of subjects.

The application of the description to the elephant receives some confirmation from the fact that the modern Arabs are in the habit of adding the epithet mehemoth to their name for this quadruped, when he is very large (Strahlenberg, p. 403, English translation). It appears to be the same appellation, dialectically altered, which the inhabitants of Siberia have given to the fossil elephant, the remains of which are so abundant on their frozen shores—viz. that of mammoth.

On the whole we incline to the old identification of behemoth with the elephant; unless it be supposed that the name is not that of an individual species at all, but rather that of an imaginary type of the order Pachydermata, in which the characters common to the more bulky races are brought together to give effect to the picture. This supposition, however, seems derogatory to the truthfulness of the Divine Author.

BE'KAH, half-shekel. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

BEL. See BAAL.

BEL AND THE DRAGON, an apocryphal addition to the book of Daniel, written probably in the time of the Ptolemies, and for the purpose of exposing the deceit and imposture connected with the Baal-worship of Babylon. But it is itself an incredible and foolish story. (See DANIEL.)

BELA [a swallowing up, or that which is swallowed up]. 1. This was the original name of the only one of the five wicked cities of the plain which escaped the vengeance of the Lord, and it was spared on account of the earnest pleading of Lot, that it might be granted to him as a place of refuge. He said "is it not a little one?" and in memory of his successful intercession, it received the name of Zoar, that is "little-ness," Ge. xix. 20-22. De Saulcy thought he recognized its name in Zuweirah, on the south-west of the Dead Sea: but in the original there is no such resemblance between the names as there appears to be in English. On the contrary, Dr. Robinson has followed Irby and Mangles' conjecture, and identified Zoar with a large ruin at the north side of El Lisân, that is, "the tongue," the peninsula which juts out into the Dead Sea towards the south-east, between the terminations of the Wady Beni Hamid and the Wady el Dera'ah or Wady Kerek; and his opinion seems now to be favourably received. Conjecture had placed Zoar further to the south, relying upon De. xxxiv. 3; but at the utmost this only supposes that there was no town further to the south which caught the eye of Moses in his dying prospect. It is mentioned as a Moabite city, Is. xv. 6; Je. xlviii. 34. It was a place of some importance and the seat of a Christian bishop in much later times, and is said to have been inhabited so late as the fourteenth century.

2. BĒLA. The name of several persons; (1) Ge. xxxvi. 32, 33 and 1 Ch. i. 43, 44, the son of Beor, the first king recorded to have reigned in Edom. Some Jewish writers have identified him with Balaam the son of Beor; but this is scarcely possible, and it is uncertain whether they were even of the same extraction. (2) The first-named son of Benjamin in Ge. xlv. 21, &c. (3) A prince in the tribe of Reuben, 1 Ch. v. 8.

BELIAL [worthlessness] is translated as if it were a proper name, and for this there is some countenance in the language of the apostle, 2 Co. vi. 16: "What concord hath Christ with Belial?" But this appears to be a later use of the word, just as Satan is called "the Wicked One," because all wickedness finds its perfection or quintessence in him. For the literal meaning of Belial is worthlessness, hence wickedness, as in this English word, and in the Latin nequam; and so it might have been perfectly well rendered in the passages of the Old Testament in which it occurs, De. xlii. 13; 1 Sa. x. 27; 1 Ki. xxi. 10, &c. One or two passages, Ju. xix. 22; 1 Sa. ii. 12, may have led to a notion which has been prevalent, that he was specially the patron of licentiousness: but the suggestion of any such idea is from the context alone, and it is excluded by the sense of other passages.

BELLOWS are expressly mentioned only in Je. vi. 29, though other passages, which speak of blowing the fire, Eze. xlii. 21; Is. liv. 16, may possibly refer to them as among the instruments wont to be employed for such a purpose. But as wood was the common fuel in ancient times, and kindles readily, a fan would generally be sufficient. The bellows, it is probable, would be called into requisition only for smelting and refining processes, or operations which demanded a more intense heat. Such, apparently, was the only use of them in Egypt, where, however, they seem to have been of great antiquity, and of familiar use in the age of Moses. The representation of bellows given below is assigned to the reign of Thothmes III., the supposed contemporary of Moses. The bellows, it will be observed, were worked by the foot of the operator pressing alternately upon two skins till they were exhausted, while by means of a cord in each hand he again pulled up the skin for the admission of a fresh supply of air. The fire blown upon is that of a worker in metal. And that the prophet Jeremiah had respect to a similar use of the instrument is clear from the connection, "The bellows are burned, the lead is consumed of the fire, the founder melteth in vain."

BELLS. Large bells, such as are now used in churches, were unknown in ancient times; nor are they used by the Mahometan inhabitants of the lands of the Bible at the present day. Small bells, however, were in use among the Greeks and Romans, and no doubt also among the Jews. The high-priest wore little bells of gold round the skirt of his intermediate dress, the robe of the ephod. Partly they may have been for ornament, like the ornaments in the shape of pomegranates which were placed alternately with them. But partly also they were of use, to ring as often as the high-priest moved, so as to announce his approach and his retirement, else he would have been exposed to death, on account of his trifling with the majesty of the Lord's presence, Ex. xxviii. 33-35. A time is foretold, Zec. xiv. 20, when God's truth shall so have spread, and God's fear have so pervaded the minds of men in even their commonest occupations, that the inscription, "Holiness to the Lord," which the high-priest wore upon the golden plate attached to his mitre, should be equally borne by the bells of the horses; that is, even the commonest things should bear a sacred character. Probably it was the practice then, as it is now, that horses and other beasts of burden carried such bells, to cheer them in their motions by the lively sound, and to keep any of the party from wandering, or to bring them together again, even though travelling by night and over trackless districts.

In Is. iii. 16-18, reference is made to little tinkling bells which are worn by women in the East to this day upon their wrists and ankles, and with which the gay and thoughtless attracted attention and expected to gain admiration.

[G. C. M. D.]

BELSHAZ'ZAR [perhaps prince of Bel] was the last king of Babylon, who reigned at least three years, Da. viii. 1, and of whom we have an account in the fifth chapter of Daniel, his impious feast, the writing on the wall by a mysterious hand, the reading and exposition of the inscription by the prophet, and the taking of the Chaldean kingdom that night by the Medes and Persians, while the king himself was slain. Unbelievers who have endeavoured to throw discredit upon the Bible in general, and on this book of Daniel in particular, have dwelt much upon the difference between this account and that of uninspired historians, according to which, although they tell that Babylon was taken by storm in the night during a drunken feast, comp. Is. xxi. 4, 5, yet the last king of Babylon met the armies of Cyrus in the open plain and was defeated; whereupon he shut himself up in a neighbouring city, Borsippa, and there soon after made a peaceable surrender, was kindly received by the conqueror, and ended his days in peace in a distant country. To this the reply of believing men has been twofold: first, that where we have two conflicting accounts, even a worldly man may have reason to reckon Daniel as good a voucher for the truth as Greek historians, who lived at a great distance and were ill acquainted with the language; and second, that the accounts might possibly be shown not to be conflicting, if we were only better acquainted with the circumstances. This second reply has actually proved to be the truth. For the inscriptions found of late in Borsippa and the Babylonian ruins, have informed us that the last king of Babylon did associate his son with him in the government, and left him in the city, where he was slain when it was taken, while the father fought the disastrous battle on the outside, which led to the saving of his life by a timely surrender. This son's name is at present read by Rawlinson Belshazzar. An ingenious view has been supported by Niebuhr, but there are serious difficulties connected with it, that Belshazzar was slain twenty-one years before Cyrus came to the throne of Babylon, comp. Da. x. 13, and that Darius the Mede ascended the throne as the rightful heir, through connection with Nebuchadnezzar by marriage. Of course this theory meets the difficulty above mentioned in a different manner. But, in truth, we have very few reliable accounts of Babylonian history, and especially at the period in question.

BELTESHAZZAR, the name given to Daniel at the time that Nebuchadnezzar changed the names of his three companions, Da. i. All of them seem to be names in honour of idols.

BEN [son]. This word is pure Hebrew: compare what has been said of the use of the Syriac or Chaldee word BAR, which has the same meaning. In some cases it is difficult to decide whether it is best to translate Ben, or to leave it untranslated, as part of the proper name. Our version has occasionally met this difficulty by taking the one course in the text and the other in the margin, 1 Ki. iv. 9, 10, &c.

BENA'IAH [he whom Jehovah has built up], the son of Jehoiada, of Kabzeel, a city in the extreme south of Judah, Jos. xv. 21, one of David's heroes, whose exploits and rank are mentioned in 2 Sa. xxiii. 20-23; 1 Ch. xi. 22-25. While Joab lived, he was commander of David's chosen troops, the Cherethites and Pelethites, 2 Sa. viii. 18. And when Joab entered into the conspiracy to set Adonijah on the throne, Solomon gave the injunction to Benaiah to put the traitor to death, and promoted him to the vacant office of captain of the host, 1 Ki. i. 35; ii. 23-35. He was commander also of one of David's monthly courses, 1 Ch. xvii. 5, 6, where he is called a chief-priest.

BEN-AMMI [son of my people], the son of Lot and his younger daughter, from whom sprang the Ammonites, Ge. xix. 38. (See AMMONITES.)

BENHADAD [son of Hadad, who is mentioned by uninspired writers as a god, indeed, is called by some the chief god of the Syrians]. It is the name of three kings of Syria:—

1. He who assisted Baasha against Asa, till presents from the latter induced him to become the enemy of the ten tribes, 1 Ki. xv. 18; in which policy we find his successors continuing with little change till almost the end of that kingdom. It is impossible to determine whether he stood in any relation to that Hadad the Edomite who became the enemy of Solomon, 1 Ki. xi. 14-24.

2. The king with whom Ahab carried on repeated wars, 1 Ki. xx. xiii., in which the Syrians would have annihilated Israel, in all human probability, but for the insolent boasting of Benhadad against the God of Israel. As Ahab, however, wanted faith to make any good use of the miraculous interferences on his behalf, and in punishment of this blasphemer, his own life went for that of the man whom he spared. Benhadad carried on wars with Ahab's son Jehoram, 2 Ki. vi. vii. For some time the plans of the Syrians were revealed to the king of Israel by the prophet Elisha. And though, on one occasion, the Israelites were brought to the brink of ruin, yet, according to this prophet's intimation, a panic took possession of the Syrian army, and Samaria was delivered at once from war and famine. Once more, we find him brought into contact with Elisha, when he sent to ask whether he should recover from an illness, and received the answer that he certainly might, that is to say, there was nothing to prevent this in the nature of the case; while yet the prophet informed the messenger, Hazael, that he was called by God to occupy the throne of Syria, and that his master should die. Thereupon Hazael returned, buoyed up Benhadad with hopes of certain recovery, murdered him the next day, and took possession of the throne, 2 Ki. viii. 7-15.

3. The son of Hazael, and his successor on the throne of Syria, was at first prosperous in his wars with Israel, but in the end lost all that he had gained, in three disastrous battles, according to the prediction of Elisha on his deathbed, 2 Ki. xiii. 3, 14-19, 25. [G. C. M. D.]

BENJAMIN [son of the right hand], the youngest son of Jacob, and the second whom Rachel bore to him, as indeed she died on giving birth to this child. She therefore named him Benoni, "the son of my pain;" but his father changed this to a more pleasing expression, signified by Benjamin, with which compare Ps. lxxx. 17, "the man of thy right hand," the title given to the Lord's chosen people, or rather to Christ their covenant-head. Benjamin was his father's favourite, after the disappearance of Joseph, Rachel's other son, Ge. xiv. 30; and Joseph paid him special honour, both before and after he had made himself known to his brethren, Ge. xliii. 34; xlv. 22. Benjamin appears to have had ten sons (see BECHER), Ge. xvi. 21; yet the tribe was one of the smallest in Israel, and is so spoken of often in Scripture, 1 Sa. ix. 21; Ps. lxxviii. 27. This was partly owing to the guilt of the tribe, in shielding the wicked men who committed a horrible outrage at Gibeah, on account of which all the other tribes united in making war with it, and brought it so near destruction that only six hundred men were left. The details of this melancholy tissue of sin and suffering are given in the last chapters of the book of Judges; as also the scheme by which these few men were provided with wives, after the other tribes had sworn that they would permit no intermarriage. There must, however, have been causes for the smallness of the tribe in operation from the first: for these ten sons of Benjamin produced only seven heads of families; and the number of the tribe at the first census in the wilderness of Sinai was only 35,400; and at the second, in the plains of Moab, 45,600, Nu. i. 36, 37; xxvi. 38-41. Afterwards it multiplied greatly: for in the time of David there were reckoned 59,434 mighty men of valour, and it is not clear that this was at all the entire strength of the tribe, 1 Ch. vi. 6-12. In the time of king Ass he had risen to 280,000,

2 Ch. xiv. 8, and in the time of Jehoshaphat apparently still higher, to 380,000, 2 Ch. xvii. 17, 18. Even when small in numbers the tribe of Benjamin was already distinguished by its character for bravery, and by the favour of the Lord, as is indicated in the blessings of Jacob and Moses, Ge. xlix. 27; De. xxxiii. 12. To the bravery we have testimony in the fact already noticed, that the Benjamites standing alone made war against all the other tribes united; and these "sons of the right hand" were famous for having among them men left-handed, probably such as could use either hand alike well, and with fatal dexterity, Ju. iii. 15; xx. 16; 1 Ch. xii. 2. The favour of being "a people near the Lord" was granted to them, as to the other children of Rachel, since they took their place immediately behind the tabernacle in the order of march through the wilderness, Nu. x. 21, 24; Ps. lxxx. 2. And when the Lord had refused the tabernacle of Joseph, and brought Shiloh to desolation, the new place in which he was pleased to put his name was Mount Zion, the city of Jerusalem, which belonged even more to Benjamin than to Judah, although Judah, as a tribe, was specially the object of his choice, Ps. lxxviii. 60, 67, 68. In the political relations of the tribes the tribe of Benjamin might naturally have held with that of Ephraim, to which it was most nearly connected by blood; observe also in the song of Deborah its position between Ephraim and Manasseh, Ju. v. 14. But it seems to have occupied a middle position in politics, as it did in situation, Jos. xviii., between the two great rival tribes of Ephraim and Judah. Saul, the first king of Israel, belonged to this tribe, and it is easy to see how natural affection would have an effect in retaining the Benjamites on Saul's side, and prejudicing them against David, when the Lord transferred the kingdom to him, 1 Ch. xii. 29; 2 Sa. ii. 8, 9, &c. But the choice of Jerusalem as David's capital, and the seat of the worship of the Lord, must have had a powerful influence in leading the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin to coalesce. This may be the explanation of the fact that the kingdom of the descendants of David is at times spoken of as being confined to the single tribe of Judah, 1 Ki. xi. 13; xii. 20; while from other passages it is clear that, as a whole, the tribe of Benjamin was also faithful to David's house, 1 Ki. xii. 23; 2 Ch. xi. Yet a part of the people, as well as a part of the territory, may have gone with the ten tribes: for Bethel was within the tribe of Benjamin, and yet was one of the two seats of the worship of the calves which was commenced by Jeroboam, and was kept up to the end of the kingdom of the ten tribes. After the exiles returned from Babylon, we read very little of the separate tribes; yet there is enough to show that Benjamin and Judah were the two tribes which kept closest together, and contributed most to the new colony in Judea, Ezr. i. 9; Ne. xi. In the New Testament we read that Saul of Tarsus, ere yet he was brought to receive the righteousness of Christ, and made an apostle, valued himself on his pure descent from the tribe of Benjamin, as a Hebrew of the Hebrews, Phi. iii. 5. The territory assigned to Benjamin was very small; but the soil was rich, and the position was important, both on account of its relation to the other tribes, and on account of its natural peculiarities, which made it the key of the land of Palestine. Much very interesting matter in reference to this point may be found in Stanley's Sinai and Palestine. [G. C. M. D.]

BENO'NI See BENJAMIN.

BERA'CHAH [blessing]. A valley received this name from Jehoshaphat and his people, in memory of the amazing deliverance granted to them from the inroad of the Moabites, Ammonites, and other invaders. After three days' spoiling the self-destroyed hosts of the enemy, on the fourth day the king and the people assembled at the spot and blessed the Lord; hence the name Berachah, or "blessing," 2 Ch. xx. 26. There is a wady with a few ruins in it known by the name of Bereikdt, between the two roads to Hebron from Tekoah and from Jerusalem, and rather nearer Hebron than Jerusalem. These are now identified with Berachah, both on account of the similarity of the name, and on account of the situation, which agrees well with the notice of its vicinity both to Tekoah and to Engedi, this wady being, according to Mr. Porter, in the very course still taken by the bands of Arabs who come from Moab round the south end of the Dead Sea to make incursions upon Southern Palestine.

BEREA, a city of Macedonia, in that part of it which is called Emathia, lying west and somewhat south of Thessalonica, in a fertile district of country which is watered by the river Axius or Astræus, a tributary of the Haliacmon, and at the foot of Mount Bermius. But there is some indistinctness in the accounts given of it, partly owing to a statement in Thucydides, i. 61, which is difficult to reconcile with other information, partly owing to the river changing its course, and partly owing to the imperfect state of our present text of Strabo. It is variously represented as being from 50 to 60 Roman miles from Thessalonica, and 30 from Pella. It is said to have been called Boor by the Turks; but certainly the name by which it is now generally known is Kara Fera or Verria. The remains of the ancient city are considerable, and it is reckoned one of the most agreeable towns of that country at present, and a place of importance, with a population of 2000 families, or, as others say, of 20,000 inhabitants.

In the experience of Paul the Bereans were well disposed towards the gospel: the Jews of Berea have received from the inspired historian the testimony that they were more noble-minded than those in Thessalonica, and that they searched the Scriptures daily and candidly, so as to compare these with the preaching of the apostle. One of his companions in labour and travel was Sopater of Berea, Ac. xvii. 10-13; xx. 4.

BERED [hai]. The well Beer-lahai-roi is described as lying between Kadesh and Bered; but this latter place is entirely unknown. There is some variety in the name as given by ancient versions; but whether these are guesses at an explanation or not, we have no means of determining.

BEREN'CE. See BERNICE.

BERIAH [in evil, but it has also been rendered a gift]. 1. A son of Ephraim, born after a great calamity had befallen the family, in which several of the elder sons appear to have been cut off; on which account the father called the name of this younger son Beriah, "because it went ill with his house," 1 Ch. vii. 23. This explanation determines so plainly the origin of the name, that there can be no reasonable doubt how it should be understood. Gesenius adheres to this sense and rejects the other. 2. A son of Asher, from whom sprang the family of the Berites, Ge. xlv. 17; Nu. xx. i. 44. 3. A Benjamite, who along with his brother Shema expelled the Gathites from the neighbourhood of Ajalon, where they had their residence, 1 Ch. viii. 13. 4. A Levite of the house of Shimei, 1 Ch. xliii. 10.

BERITES, OR BERIM, apparently a tribe or family of people, who are mentioned in connection with Joab's pursuit after Sheba, and along with those of Abel and Beth-maachah, 2 Sa. xx. 14. They must either have been Israelites, or, at least, favourably disposed toward the house of David; for they took part with Joab on the occasion referred to. No further notice is taken of them.

BERNICE. The eldest daughter of that king Herod who was eaten up of worms, and sister of Agrippa before whom Paul pled his cause in the hearing of Festus, Ac. xxi. There were horrible suspicions of incestuous connection between her and her brother, in consequence of which she married a second time, having been previously married to her uncle Herod, king of Chalcis; but her second husband, Polemon, the king of Cilicia, soon divorced her. She latterly became the mistress of Titus, the emperor of Rome; but he broke off his connection with her when he attained to the imperial dignity.

BERODACH BAL'ADAN. See MERODACH BAL-ADAN.

BERYL, a precious stone, and in the English Bible the synonym of the Heb. tarschish (תַּרְשִׁישׁ), or tartessus stone. It is, however, by no means certain what gem is meant by this stone. The Septuagint uses no fewer than three words to render, in different places, the original Hebrew; but at Ex. xxviii. 20, where the gem occurs as the first in the fourth row on the high-priest's breastplate, chrysolite, not beryl, is the term employed. Our translators have given chrysolite as the marginal reading at Eze. xxviii. 13, where the gem is mentioned among the treasures of the king of Tyre, but they still retain beryl in the text. The more common opinion of modern times would identify the tartessus stone with the chrysolite or topaz. But if this be the more correct view, it is still quite probable that the beryl had a place in the sacred breastplate, as it certainly had in the figurative delineation of the walls of the New Jerusalem, Re. xxi. 20. Beryl is a variety of the emerald, but is of inferior value, and differs from it chiefly in colour. Instead of the deep green, which distinguishes the emerald proper, the beryl presents the diverse shades of sea-green, pale-blue, yellowish, and sometimes is almost without colour, nearly white.

BERYTUS (Beyroot), a town on the coast of Syria, 19 miles N.N.W. of Sidon. It is the Berytus of the Greeks, and by some supposed to be the Berothai or Berothah of Scripture, 2 Sa. viii. 8; Eze. xlvii. 16 (Smith's Greek and Roman Geography). Although the notices in Scripture may admit of doubt from seeming to rest too much on identity of name, yet the place is deemed admissible here from the importance of its position near to Sidon and Lebanon, and from the tablets set up in the neighbourhood by an Assyrian king, conjectured to be the Shalmaneser who overran Phœnicia (Inscribed Tablets, Nehr-el-Kab). Berytus was a very ancient town of the Phœnicians (Saccoanatho, Euseb. Præp. Evan. i. 10), and is said to have derived its name from the Phœnician god Baal-Beerith, "lord of wells;" or else from the number of wells around, beer signifying a well in the language of the country (Stephen of Byzantium). The Greek and Latin geographers all call it Berytus, and Strabo relates that it was taken by the Romans after having been destroyed by Tryphon, surnamed Diodotus, about B.C. 150 (Strabo, xvi. cap. ii. 18, 19, 22; Ptol. xv. 4; Pliny, v. 20). Under Augustus it became a great military colony, by the name of Felix Julia, and was afterwards endowed with the jus italicum (Pliny; Joseph. Bel. Jud. vii. 3, 1). It was at Berytus that Herod the Great procured the mock trial to be held over his two sons (Joseph. Antiq. xvi. c. 11. 1-6). The elder Agrippa adorned the city with a splendid theatre and amphitheatre, besides baths and porticoes. After the destruction of Jerusalem, Titus celebrated here the birthday of his father Vespasian by games and shows of gladiators, in which many of the captive Jews perished (Josephus). In the succeeding centuries Berytus became renowned as a school of Greek learning, particularly law, until the town was laid in ruins by an earthquake, A.D. 511 (Gibbon, cap. 17). Eusebius relates that the martyr Appian resided here for a time to pursue Greek secular learning; and Gregory Thaumaturgus also came here to perfect himself in civil law (Euseb. de Martyr. Palæst. c. 4). It was made a Christian bishopric under the jurisdiction of the patriarch of Antioch, and is mentioned by Jerome as one of the places visited by Paula (Reland, Palæst. 210). It is also famous in Christian legends as the region where the combat took place between St. George and the Dragon, and his reputed tomb and the Dragon's well are still shown (Maundrell; Pococke; Turner's Tour). During the crusades it was frequently captured and recaptured. The city remained in the hands of the Christians till A.D. 1291, when the troops of the sultan took the city, and laid it in ruins. During the seventeenth century it was for a time the capital of the Druse emir Fakr-ed-din. Within the present century Beyroot has received a new impulse, from having been made the centre of European trade; but in September, 1840, it was laid in partial ruin by a bombardment from the combined English and Austrian fleet. At the present time it is again rising to prosperity (Volney, ii. 166-169; Robinson, ii. 491-497, edit. 1856; Addison's Damascus and Palmyra, ii. 4-12, 30-41).

The modern town is built upon the site of the ancient city, but there are few remains of antiquity to be met with, the principal being a thick wall, supposed to be of the time of Herod, and along the shore, and partly under water, some mosaic pavements and fragments of walls and columns. Three granite columns, and the base of a fourth, still stand within the city near the south-western wall; and outside the same wall are other columns some of granite, and some of limestone. Numerous ancient columns lie as a foundation beneath the quay. Beyond the south-western wall is an ancient road cut in the rock, and outside the south-western gate is a deep fountain with a flight of steps covered with solid masonry; the fountain is said to be fed by an ancient subterranean aqueduct, discovered a few years ago. The arches and remains of another large aqueduct by which the city was supplied with water from Lebanon are still to be seen (Robinson, iii. 7-12). A curious ancient inscription, discovered in the neighbourhood, was found by M. Letronne to relate to an aqueduct. [J. B.]

BESOR [good news, or perhaps cool]; a brook which rises in the hills of the south country of Judah, and falls into the Mediterranean Sea about five miles, or as some say, ten, south of Gaza; but its situation is not certain. At this brook David left a third part of his men, who were too much exhausted to follow the Amalekites into the desert, to which they had retired after burning Ziklag, 1 Sa. xxx. 9, 21.

BETH [house], is a common element in the names of places.

BETHABARA [house of a ferry], a town on the farther, or eastern side of Jordan, where John the Baptist laboured for a time, Jn. i. 28. This name is written differently in the best copies of the original, Bethany—a name, however, which may be translated “boat-house,” and which would come to substantially the same meaning as Bethabara. Many have conjectured that it lay opposite to the place where the valley from Jericho runs down to the river, and for this reason, it has been identified with the place where Joshua and the people of Israel crossed into Canaan. With somewhat stronger probability, we may believe that it is the same as Beth-barah, the fords of Jordan which the men of Israel seized by direction of Gideon, so as to destroy their Midianite oppressors, Ju. vii. 24.

BETH'ANY [perhaps the house or place of unripe dates; but see another meaning under BETHABARA] is at the present day an insignificant village; but it is associated imperishably in the minds of all who read the Bible, with the last days of our Lord Jesus, as we have the record of these in all the four Gospels. It lies upon the south-eastern slope of the Mount of Olives, and the names of the mount and of the village alike indicate the fertile and carefully-cultivated nature of the district. It is considerably less than two miles from Jerusalem (fifteen stadia, Jn. xi. 18), and was thus within an easy distance for our Lord to go out and in, night and morning, while during the entire day he taught in the city. All the more he was attracted to the place, by his affection for Lazarus, whom he raised from the dead, and for his two sisters, at whose house he is thought to have resided. The present name of Bethany, El 'Aziriyeh, is formed from the name of Lazarus. That house, and also the grave of Lazarus, a cave or vault in the limestone rock of the district, are shown to travellers, but all these exhibitions must be looked at with extreme suspicion. After our Lord rose from the dead, the last time that he was with his disciples, he led them out as far as Bethany, and there he was parted from them, and taken up into heaven, Lu. xxiv. 50; though a different and altogether improbable account, furnished by tradition, represents him as ascending from one of the highest points of the Mount of Olives, and in full view of the city.

BETHAR'BEL [house of the snare of God] is mentioned only once, Ho. x. 14, and might almost as well be passed unnoticed, since we know nothing certainly about it. There is an account, however, given repeatedly by Josephus, of a place named Arbela, which may very naturally be taken for Betharbel, and which is recognized in Irbid, a mass of ruins on the south-west of the Sea of Galilee, a little to the north of the town of Tiberias. It was remarkable for the number and size of its caves, which were difficult to approach, and still more to take by storm. Hence they became the favourite resort of robbers, who were conquered by the soldiers of king Herod, only by means of the contrivance of letting them down in boxes, well supported by chains from the rocks above. They were also the resort of many Jews at the time of the last war with the Romans. We may at least conjecture, with probability, that Hosea speaks of something of the same kind in the time of the Assyrian invasion, and of the horrible excesses of the barbarous soldiers.

BETH'AVEN [the house of vanity or of iniquity], a town to the east of Bethel, Jos. vii. 2, but apparently so close to it as to come to be reckoned all one with it, and for certain reasons to have the names used indiscriminately. (See BETHEL.)

BETH-DA'GON [house of Dagon], the name of two ancient towns, the one in the low country of Judah, Jos. xv. 41; and the other on the border line of Asher, Jos. xix. 27. They never occur in the subsequent history of the Israelites; and are no further of interest, than as showing how the worship of Dagon had in different directions extended itself along the Philistine coast at the time of the Israelitish conquest.

BETH-DIB'LATHA'IM [house of the two cakes], a city of Moab, mentioned only in Je. xlviii. 22. The kind of cakes, from which the place derived its name, were made of figs, and of a round shape, dry and hard. The place is supposed to have been the same with Almon-diblathaim.

BETH'EL [the house of God] is mentioned in the history of Abraham as a place near which he spread his tent, Ge. xii. 8; xiii. 3, and the district is pronounced by travellers to be eminently suitable for pasturage. But the town was called Luz in his days, and probably for a long time after, by the Canaanites. It received the name of Bethel, “the house of God,” from its nearness to that place (perhaps the very spot where Abraham pitched his tent and built his altar) in which Jacob lay down and dreamed his dream, and was brought distinctly into covenant with Jehovah the God of his fathers, whom he now took to be his God, Ge. xxviii. 10-22. Even at that time, as he was going away to Padan-Aram, he gave this name to the place, and set up his pillar, and did solemn service to the Lord: but all this was repeated by him more publicly, along with his whole family as a sanctified family, on his return home, after an interval of considerably more than twenty years at least, at which time also his change of name from Jacob to Israel was solemnly confirmed, Ge. xxxv. The town of Bethel was assigned by Joshua to the Benjamites, but they appear to have been either unable to take it or careless about doing so; and it was actually taken, through the treachery of one of its inhabitants, by the children of Joseph, Ju. i. 23-24. In fact, it lies on the extreme north border of Benjamin, about twelve Roman miles (somewhat less than ours) north of Jerusalem, and very close to the tribe of Ephraim. We are the less surprised, then, to find that it belonged to the kingdom of the Ten Tribes, when the nation came to be torn asunder. As the distinguished place of Abraham's and Jacob's worship, we may believe that much veneration was shown to it. It seems to have been the place to which the ark was brought by the assembled congregation, to be near them for worship and advice, during the civil war with Benjamin, as recorded in the end of the book of Judges; though this is made somewhat obscure by our version rendering Bethel “the house of God,” which had better have been left untranslated. See especially ch. xx. 26-28, also perhaps 1 Sa. x. 3. It was one of the three places which Samuel selected for judgment in his circuits, when there was no proper centre for Israel. When therefore Jeroboam strengthened the political feelings of his adherents, by giving way to the loose views about religious observance which were palatable to multitudes, he chose Bethel as one of the two religious centres at which he established the worship of the golden calves, 1 Ki. xii. xiii. In this latter chapter there is the account of the solemn threatenings of God against the place, which were repeated by later prophets, Am. vii., and which were at length fulfilled by the good Josiah, who broke down the altar and the high place, and burned dead men's bones upon the altar to pollute it, and took away all traces of the old idolatry, 2 Ki. xxiii. 15-20. The possession of it by the kingdom of Judah in the time of Abijah, 2 Ch. xiii. 19, must have been very brief. During the time that the unlawful services there continued, the old glory of Bethel was eclipsed; and instead of the house of God, which it professed to be, his true worshippers reckoned it to be "the house of vanity," or "house of iniquity," as Bethaven means, with which they identified it. (See BETHAVEN, and compare the language of Hosea iv. 15; v. 8; x. 5, 8.) Yet, for part of that melancholy time, there was a school of the prophets there, 2 Ki. ii. 2, 3. In its purified state, Bethel was re-occupied by the people who returned from Babylon, comp. Est. ii. 28 with No. xi. 31; but no further notice is taken of it in Scripture.

The position of Bethel being, as laid down by Eusebius and Jerome, 12 Roman miles from Jerusalem, and on the right hand of the road to Shechem, corresponds precisely with the ruins which bear the name of Beitin; a name not so greatly altered from the original as to cause any serious difficulty, for the liquids l and n very often interchange. It stands upon the point of a low rocky ridge, between two shallow wadies, which unite and fall into the Wady Suweint toward the south-east. There are ruins which spread over the entire surface of the ridge; particularly there are the remains of one of the largest reservoirs in the country, 314 feet long by 217 broad. And there are other indications that it must, in later times, have been more important than the large village that it was in Jerome's day. There are, however, grounds of an ingenious kind, and not destitute of probability, on which Thenius (see his views briefly in his Commentary, 2 Kl. ii. 1) and Keil (in his Commentary on Joshua) rest their opinion that our geography of this part of Benjamin has been erroneous, as it is confessedly one of the least explored districts of the Holy Land. With some unimportant differences as to detail about Gilgal, they make the city of Gilgal the modern Jiljilia, as distinguished from the place Gilgal, where the Israelites first encamped in Canaan; then they identify Bethel with Sinjil, a little to the north-east of Jiljilia, and Ai with Turmus 'Aya, still a little to the north-east of Sinjil; while again, a little further on, and almost due north, lies Seilan, which confessedly is the ancient Shiloh. It will be necessary, however, to have this theory more thoroughly tested.

[G. C. M. D.]

BETHER [dissection or cutting-up], is only once mentioned in the Bible, Ca. ii. 17, and nowhere in any other book. There are great doubts whether it be the name of a place at all; and a very probable opinion is, that the mountains of Bether are simply any rugged mountains, cut up by gorges and water-courses, of which there are many examples in Palestine. In the history of David's wars with Abner, we read of the latter marching home through all Bithron, 2 Sa. ii. 28, which, from the context, must plainly have been the country beyond Jordan, a region precisely of this sort. Bithron is a derivative form in Hebrew from the simple stem Bether, and might imply abounding in the Bether characteristics, that is to say, a rugged district. It is best, then, to connect these two names together, and to look on them as entirely descriptive, and not as the appellations of any particular spots whatever.

BETHESDA [house of mercy], the name of a sort of reservoir, or, as St. John calls it, a swimming-pool (κολυμβήθρα), which was in ancient times beside the sheep-gate (for so it should be, not sheep-market) of Jerusalem, Ja. v. 2. The site is no further defined, and the only additional particular given of it as a natural object is, that it had "five porches," or colonnades, for the protection and comfort of those who came to make use of the waters. Modern research has failed to determine with certainty where the remains of this pool are to be found, or even to be sought for. The sheep-gate itself, by which the evangelist would make known to us its immediate locality, is assigned by some to the north-east, by others to the south-east, quarter of the city; and, accordingly, two different localities have been fixed on, as the probable site of the Bethesda pool. On the north-east a reservoir or tank, called Birket Israil, beside the modern gate of St. Stephen, has by ancient tradition been identified with it, and is very commonly still held to be the modern representative of Bethesda: having chiefly in its favour the twofold circumstance, that the remains appear to be those of an ancient reservoir, and that the north-east quarter of the city, within which it lies, is known to have borne the somewhat similar name of Bezetha in the gospel age. Others, however, including Dr. Robinson, would connect it with the south-east and the fountain of the Virgin, placing it in the valley of the Kedron, and a little above the pool of Siloam. Certainty seems to be unattainable; and where the landmarks are so few and imperfect, it is as well to adhere to the old tradition. But the exact site is of comparatively little moment.

The most peculiar, and, in a religious point of view, the most important notice respecting Bethesda, is that which relates to the work of healing, of which it was for a time the theatre and the medium. From the account of the evangelist, as connected with the poor paralytic, who had come to obtain an interest in its healing virtue, it appears that at certain times a troubling or agitation took place in the waters of the pool, and that whoever first could then avail himself of them, by plunging in, found deliverance from his malady. This comes out in the paralytic's statement at ver. 7, as given with perfect unanimity by all the copies. But in the more specific statement at ver. 4, as from the evangelist himself—that not only was it the first person alone that stepped in at the troubling of the waters who was healed of whatever disease he had, but that the troubling which imparted the healing efficacy was caused by the descent of an angel—there is not the same general agreement. It is omitted in MSS. B C D, but is found with certain slight variations, not materially affecting the sense, in as many as twelve uncial MSS. (A E F G H I K L M U V Δ), in the ancient Syriac and Vulgate versions, the Ethiopic and Arabic; was commented on by Tertullian, without any suspicion expressed of its genuineness, and was acknowledged by Ambrose, Augustine, Chrysostom, Cyril, Theophylact, and Euthymius. The external evidence thus appears to be very strong in its favour; and as the chief point in the passage omitted in a few of the authorities has respect, not so properly to the facts of the case, as to a doctrine respecting those facts, and a doctrine not unlikely to occasion offence to certain minds, it is fully as probable that doctrinal prejudice led to its omission in the few, as to its insertion in the many. We are therefore scarcely disposed to go along with Tischendorf and Griesbach in rejecting it; the rather so, since from the facts of the case, as given in other parts of the narrative, some supernatural agency was plainly at work in the periodical troubling and energizing of the waters, and the kind of agency in question perfectly accords in nature with what is elsewhere written of the ministry of angels. If an angel was sent to loose the chains of Peter and release him from the grasp of a persecutor; and if an angel was again sent to smite that persecutor himself, and cause him to be suddenly eaten up of worms, why might not an angel be also employed at particular seasons to impart a healing virtue to the waters of this public bath, or swimming-pool, such as they could not have naturally possessed, but such as the higher interests of God's kingdom might require? There is nothing improbable in this, on the supposition of angelic agency, for purposes of special interposition being at times called into play; and at such a time as that now under consideration, there were ends—one can readily understand—that might be served by certain smaller and more fitful acts of supernatural working, as well as by those which constituted the peculiar distinction of the gospel age. They were signs that God was then in a special manner visiting his people; while the limitation and restraint thrown around them, showed that greater things than these were needed to restore the lapsed and fallen condition of Israel. They were witnesses of the far greater might and glory of Him, who with a single word could heal, not one merely at a time, but all who might come to him, of whatever disease they had. And if the Jews were ready to acknowledge an angel's hand in the few and fitful acts of healing connected with Bethesda, what but inveterate blindness and obstinacy could prevent them from perceiving in Jesus of Nazareth the Son of the Highest!

The rationalistic explanations of a former age, which ascribed the healing virtue of the pool of Bethesda, sometimes to certain qualities derived from the flowing of the blood or the washing of the intestines of slain victims, sometimes to the natural efficacy of the waters as possibly flowing from hot springs, deserve no consideration. They are palpably at variance with the gospel narrative, even in that part which underlies no suspicion of interpolation, and carry improbability on their front. If we admit the truthfulness of the narrative, we must hold the work of healing to have been special and supernatural.

BETH-GAMUL [house of a weaned one, perhaps house of a camel]. This place is only once named, Je. xlviii. 23, among the cities of Moab "far and near," on which he threatens judgment. There is no apparent reason for refusing to identify it with Um-el-Jemal, one of the recently discovered deserted cities of the Haurân (see BASHAN), although this extends "the plain country of Moab," ver. 21, further than we might have been inclined to do according to preconceived opinions; for it is some five hours nearer the ordinary "land of Moab" than Bozrah, which is named along with it. Um-el-Jemal means in Arabic "mother of a camel," and is connected with the ancient name, whether that has been rightly or wrongly understood.

BETH-HACCEREM [house of the vineyard]. This is mentioned in Je. vi. 1, "O ye children of Benjamin, gather yourselves together to flee out of the midst of Jerusalem, and blow the trumpet in Tekoa, and set up a sign of fire in Beth-haccerem; for evil appeareth out of the north, and great destruction." From these words we may infer (1) that it was south of Jerusalem; (2) that it was near Tekoa; (3) that it was on such an eminence as to be suitable for a fire-signal. Hence the conjecture that it might be on a remarkable conical hill south-east of Bethlehem, and north-east of Tekoa, known as "the Frank Mountain," owing to an apocryphal story of the crusaders having kept possession of it forty years after the fall of Jerusalem. The native name for it is Jebel Fureidis. It commands a noble view of all the surrounding country, and has ruins on its summit, not Saracenic, but Roman, which bear witness to its having once been used as a place for watching and commanding the neighbourhood. Stronger reason can be given for identifying it with Herodium, a castle erected by Herod the Great. The ruler of part of Beth-haccerem (or, of the region round it, as Genesius and others translate) assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem, Ne. iii. 14.

BETH-HOGLAH [house of a partridge]. This place is named three times, Joe. xv. 6; xviii. 19, 21, as on the boundary line between the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, but, according to the last text, belonging to Benjamin. Its site is identified by means of a large fountain, bearing the ancient name, with the usual change of g into j, 'Ain Hajla, very near the Jordan, on the road from Jericho, which sends out a stream that waters abundantly the plain, and nearer Jericho, a ruined convent, Kur Hajla. Jerome mentions the place under a slightly altered name, Bethagla; but he gives a different meaning to the name, and brings it into a whimsical connection with the mourning at Jacob's funeral.

BETH-HORON [house or place of caverns], the name of two towns, the Upper and the Nether, half an hour's journey apart, still subsisting as villages under the slightly altered name of Beit Ur. They were in the border country of Benjamin and Ephraim, but apparently were assigned to the latter, Joe. xvi. 3, 5; xviii. 13; 1 Ch. vii. 24, in which last passage a female Ephraimite is named as the builder of them. The Upper was reckoned to be twelve Roman miles (somewhat less by our measurement), or one hundred Greek stadia from Jerusalem. They stand in a steep narrow valley, called the Ascent and the Descent of Beth-horon, along which has always been the great road of communication, at least where heavy baggage had to be transported, between Jerusalem and the sea-coast. Therefore, it has been a key to the possession of a large part of the country, and has been distinguished for many sanguinary struggles since that earliest one on record, when the sun and moon stood still, in order that Joshua might complete the ruin of the allied kings of the south of Canaan, Jos. x. 10, 11. Therefore also we read of Solomon building and fortifying both villages, 1 Kt. viii. 5 (the nether, 1 Kt. ix. 17), and at both there are great foundation stones visible to this day. Beth-horon was given to the Levites, to the family of Kohath, Joe. xxi. 22.

BETH-JESHIMOTH [house or place of desolate wildernesses]. This is the last but one of the stations in the journeyings of the Israelites recorded in Nu. xxxiii., see ver. 49. It belonged to the kingdom of Sihon, and was afterwards assigned to the tribe of Reuben, Jos. xii. 3; xiii. 20. In Eze. xxv. 9 we have it coupled with Bealmeon and Kiriathaim, which cities occur along with it in Joshua's list of Reubenite cities. It has not yet been discovered by modern geographers; but Eusebius has spoken of it as being ten Roman miles south from opposite Jericho, on the Dead Sea.

BETHLEHEM [house or dwelling of bread]. 1. A city of Judah, Jn. xvii. 7; perhaps metaphorically house of plenty, in allusion to the fertility of the circumjacent country. It is distant from Jerusalem, by the Jaffa gate, about two hours' journey, the road over the valley of Rephaim, a wild uncultivated tract, being very beautiful and full of interest. On either side are well-known hills and monuments: on the plain near Bethlehem is the tomb of Rachel (a modern building), in a wild and solitary spot without palm, cypress, or any single tree to spread its shade.

In the distance is Mount Hebron. The place is generally called Bethlehem Judah, Mat. ii. 6, and Bethlehem of Judea, also Bethlehem Ephratah (the fruitful), Ge. xlviii. 7; Mi. v. 2; and likewise the City of David, Jn. vii. 42. The inhabitants are styled indiscriminately Bethlehemites, 1 Sa. xvi. 1, 18; xvii. 58, and Ephrathites, Ru. i. 2; 1 Sa. xvii. 12. It is at present called Beit Lahm, house of flesh. Bethlehem is rendered memorable and holy as the birthplace of David and of Jesus Christ. Boaz, Obed, and Jesse were likewise born there, Ru. iv. 21, 22. Solomon's pools lay to the south of Bethlehem; and to the south-east stood the ancient Thekoa built by Rehoboam, and the native place of the prophet Amos, Am. i. 1; vii. 14, 15; although some suppose he merely retired there when driven from Bethel by Amaziah, ch. vii. 10-12. The ruins of a church at Tekoah are pointed out as the place of his sepulture (Schubert, Reise in das Morgenland, B. iii. p. 26). Farther to the south-west is the valley rendered memorable by the destruction of the host of Sennacherib, 2 Ki. xix. 35; Is. xxxvii. 36. On the north-east of the town is the deep valley where the angels are reported to have appeared to the shepherds, Lu. ii. 8; and where Dr. Clarke found a well of pure and delicious water, which he identifies with that so longed for by David, 2 Sa. xxiii. 15-18.

The site of Bethlehem has never been disputed, as it has always been an inhabited place, and the resort of pilgrims. Although the town does not appear ever to have been of very great size, yet its situation on the brow of a high hill commanding an extensive view of the surrounding country rendered it of considerable importance, as may be inferred from the fact that it was fortified by Rehoboam, 2 Ch. xi. 8, 9. At the present day it is a large straggling village with one principal street. The roofs of the houses are flat, and upon every housetop is an apiary constructed of a series of earthen pots. The sides of the hill and the slopes without the town abound in vines, figs, almonds, olives, and aromatic plants. The population is about 3000, and consists entirely of Christians. They were foremost in the struggle of 1834, and suffered greatly in consequence when Ibrahim Pasha triumphed.

A little beyond the northern extremity of the town is the magnificent Church of the Nativity, said to have been built by the empress Helena over the very birthplace of the Saviour, but subsequently demolished by the emperor Justinian to make way for a more sumptuous edifice, which is believed to have survived all the storms of the middle ages (Le Pere Naud, Voyage Nouveau, liv. iv. p. 400; also Karl von Raumer, Palästina, p. 309). The roof of the church is supported by numerous Corinthian columns, of a stone found in the neighbourhood, a gray limestone nearly approaching to marble. The lofty roof of the nave is formed of cedar-wood, of most admirable carpentry, and is still in good preservation. Between the columns lamps are hung, and a chandelier is also suspended from the roof, the whole of which are always lighted during Easter. The interior of the church is otherwise but little decorated. Two spiral staircases, each of fifteen steps, lead down to the Grotto of the Nativity, which is some twenty feet below the level of the church. This crypt, which is 39 feet long, 11 feet broad, and 9 feet high, is hewn out of the rock, and the sides and floor are lined with marbles. A rich altar, where lamps continually burn, is erected over the place where the Redeemer is said to have been born, the spot being marked by a silver star inlaid in white marble, and an inscription, HIC DE VIRGINE MARIA IESUS CHRISTUS NATVS EST. In a small recess in one of the sides of the crypt, and a little below the level of the floor, is a block of white marble hollowed out in the form of a manger, Lu. ii. 12. Some paintings adorn the crypt, and the church likewise contains remains of mosaics, paintings on wood, and various decrees of synods and councils of early ages. Notwithstanding the force of tradition, the authenticity of the Grotto of the Nativity has been much disputed, and will continue to be a subject of controversy. (See CAVE.) Near the grotto are the Chapel and Sepulchre of the Innocents; the chapels of St. Joseph and other saints, the sepulchres of the female saints Paula and Eustochia, of Eusebius; and of St. Jerome, the most interesting of all, because here he is known to have passed the greater portion of his life, in acts of devotion, in studying the Hebrew Scriptures, and in composing works whose influence has reached even to present times. The church of St. Helena is within the walls of an Armenian monastery, the inmates of which make beads and crosses for the devout, and mark emblems by means of gunpowder upon the persons of pilgrims. They also carve in mother-of-pearl, and make inkstands of a hard black wood like ebony. [J. B.]

[The passages of Scripture having respect to Bethlehem which chiefly need explanation, are Mi. v. 2 and Mat. ii. 6—the one containing the prediction of Christ's birth at Bethlehem, the other quoting it with reference to the fulfilment. But there are certain noticeable differences between the two. The prophet calls it "Bethlehem Ephratah;" in the evangelist it is put "Bethlehem, in the land of Judah" (lit. Judah-land). This change, however, makes no difference in the meaning, and was done merely for the purpose of rendering the identification more easy and certain. Between the time of the prophet and the evangelist Ephratah had gone into desuetude as a designation of the place, and so the evangelist substitutes "land of Judah" as the virtual equivalent, distinguishing it from any other Bethlehem. But there is a more marked difference. The prophet says of Bethlehem, "Thou art little to be among the thousands of Judah" (so the exact reading is—too small to be reckoned among them). But the evangelist quotes the words as if they stood "art by no means least among the princes of Judah"—apparently the very opposite meaning—having not the lowest place among the princes (or leaders of thousands), instead of, as in the other, too little to be reckoned among them. Formally, indeed, the representations differ, yet their substantial import is alike, and the evangelist merely adapts the language to the altered circumstances of the time. The prophet evidently meant to lay stress upon two things—the littleness of Bethlehem in one respect (namely, as compared with the population of other cities or cantonal divisions in Judea), and its greatness, notwithstanding, in another (as the destined birth-place of the everlasting Head of the divine kingdom). In the evangelist's time the relations had in a manner changed; the predicted event had taken place which was to ennoble Bethlehem, and so he renders prominent the attribute of greatness thence arising, and throws into the background the natural, antecedent littleness. Still this littleness is here also implied: Thou art not the least; it might seem as if thou wert, but thou art otherwise in reality, for out of thee proceeds the long-expected Ruler of Israel. In substance, therefore, the two forms of the representation coincide; and the slight changes introduced, under the guidance of the Spirit, by the pen of the evangelist, only serve as a living bond to connect the word with the historical circumstances of his time.—Ed.]

2. BETHLEHEM; a city of Zebulun, Jos. xix. 15, 16; Ju. xii. 10; Ezr. ii. 21. It is recognized in a wretched village of a few hovels, called Beit Lahm, about six miles west of Nazareth, half way towards the Kishon.

BETH-NIMRAH, or NIMRAH [place of clear water], a town of the kingdom of Sihon, assigned to the tribe of Gad, Nu. xxxii. 3, 36; Jos. xiii. 27; but near the borders of the tribe of Reuben. As the eastern tribes sank into powerlessness, and went into captivity, their territory fell into the hands of their neighbours, the Ammonites and Moabites. Issiah threatened as a punishment of the latter, that the torrent which flows past it into the Jordan, or whatever else might be the waters of Nimrim (which is the plural form of Nimrah) should be dried up, Is. xv. 6. It is identified with Nimrin, which stands about two miles to the east of the Jordan, very close to the road from Jericho to Es-Salt, the ancient Ramoth-Gilead.

BETHPHA'GE [house of figs], a village on the declivity of the Mount of Olives, and near to Jerusalem and Bethany, Mat. xxi. 1; Mar. xi. 1; Lu. xix. 29. The marginal note that it was somewhat nearer to Jerusalem than Bethany, seems certainly more in accordance with the text, than the generally adopted site beyond that place. The situation on the descent of Olivet must have been highly romantic, and in all probability it was fruitful, as its name imports—but at the present day there are no remains of its former celebrity. It was at Bethphage that the ass and the colt, "whereon yet never man sat," were found, Mat. xxi. 2-7; Mar. xi. 4-8; Lu. xix. 32-35.

The Talmudists say that Bethphage was within the walls of Jerusalem, but at the utmost circuit of them. It is also said that the victims intended for sacrifice were kept there; and hence, it has been surmised, the reason why the Saviour proceeded from that village to offer himself as a sacrifice for the sins of the world. It was formerly a custom to make a solemn procession on Palm Sunday from Bethphage to the Holy City; but the Mussulmans compelled the monks to abolish the ceremony. [J. B.]

BETH-REHOB. See REHOB.

BETHSAIDA [house of fish]. 1. A city in Galilee, Jn. i. 44; xii. 21, on the western coast of the Sea of Tiberias. (See GALILEE.) The apostles Peter, Andrew, and Philip were of this city, which was frequently visited by our Lord, who upbraided the inhabitants for not receiving his instructions, Lu. x. 13. Although the neighbourhood of Bethsaida is approximately ascertained, the precise site is still unknown, and has afforded travellers abundant matter for speculation. The latest historical notice of it is by Jerome, who says that "Capernaum, Tiberias, Bethsaida, and Chorazin, were situated on the shore of the lake" (Hieron. in Esa. ix. 1). Le Père Naud fixes it at Mejdal (Voyage, p. 678), between Khan Minyeh and Mejdal; Seetzen at Khan Minyeh (Zaehs. Monatl. Corr. xviii. 348); and Pococke at Irbid (ii. 99); but Dr. Robinson remarks that no Muslim knows of any such name, though they would infallibly answer a leading question in the affirmative, while the native Christians have learned the names from the New Testament according to the opinions of the monks (Bib. Res. iii. 295).

Dr. Robinson infers that Bethsaida was on the shore of Tiberias, and not far from Capernaum; because, when our Lord sent away the five thousand on the north-eastern quarter of the lake, Mark, ch. vi. 45, relates that they entered into a boat in order to cross the lake to Bethsaida; while John, ch. vi. 17, says they "went over the sea toward Capernaum." Being driven out of their course Jesus came to them walking on the sea, after which they landed in Gennesaret, and repaired to Capernaum, Mar. vi. 53-56; Mat. xiv. 34; Jn. vi. 24, 25. The apparent discrepancy disappears if Bethsaida lay near to Capernaum; and it is supposed that the disciples intended first to touch at the former place before landing at the latter. As they were driven out of their course towards the south, and came to Capernaum from that quarter, it would seem most probable that Bethsaida lay north of Capernaum—a view strengthened by the foregoing passage in Jerome. To all this may be added the direct testimony of St. Willibald, who visited the Holy Land in the eighth century. He proceeded along the lake by Magdala to Capernaum, where were a house and a great wall. Thence to Bethsaida, where was a church—thence to Chorazin, where also was a church—and then to the sources of the Jordan, thus giving the order of the towns, and confirming the accounts of Jerome, Antoninus, and Arculfus (Life of St. Willibald; Wright's Early Travels in Palestine).

Bethsaida was a place of importance, being expressly called a city, Jn. i. 44. Robinson identifies as its probable site 'Ain et Tabighah, a small village in a little plain or wady, with a very copious stream bursting from an immense fountain, slightly warm, but so brackish as not to be drinkable. East of the mills, on the right of the path, is a brackish fountain, inclosed by a circular wall of stone, or a reservoir like those at 'Ain el Barideh; it is called 'Ain Eyûb, or Tannûr Eyûb—Fountain or Oven of Job. Et Tabighah is mentioned by Cotovicus, A.D. 1598 (Taboga Cotov. p. 356); but the name does not appear again until the time of Burckhardt (Travels, 318); though Seetzen notices the brackish stream (Seetzen in Zachs, p. 348; Reilsen. i. 344; Biblical Res. ii. 405, 406; iii. 359, 360).

2. BETHSAIDA of Gaulonitis, afterwards called Julias. That there were two Bethsaidas has been satisfactorily established by the elaborate analysis of Reland (Palæstina, i. 181; ii. 653, 669)—that in Galilee, on the west of the Sea of Tiberias, being unquestionably the "city of Andrew and Peter;" whilst there is every presumptive evidence that the city in Gaulonitis, on the east of the sea, is that "in the desert place" where Christ fed the five thousand, Lu. ix. 10-17, and "healed them that had need of healing." It was probably also at this Bethsaida that the blind man was restored to sight, Mar. viii. 22-26, as it would be on the road to the towns of Cæsarea Philippi, next visited by our Lord, Mar. viii. 27.

The mention of Gaulonitis marks the situation of Bethsaida on the east of the Jordan, as decidedly as that of Galilee does the Bethsaida on the west, and to this day the adjacent district on the east bears the name of Jaulan. Pliny so places it (Nat. Hist. xv.); and Josephus says it was in lower Gaulonitis, just above the entrance of the Jordan into the lake (Wars, ii. 9, 1; iii. 10, 7). It was originally a small town, bearing the name of Bethsaida; but Philip the Tetrarch, having raised it to the honour of a city, both in respect to the number of its inhabitants and other means of strength, called it Julias, after Julia, the daughter of the emperor Augustus (Antiq. xviii. 2, 1). Philip himself died here, and was buried in a costly tomb (Antiq. xviii. 4, 6). The mountains on the east of the valley of the Jordan throw out a spur, called by the Arabs Et Tel (the hill), and upon it are some ruins, which the Rev. Eli Smith found to be the most extensive of any in the plain, and which probably mark the site of Julias. The ruins consist entirely of unhewn volcanic stones, without any indications of the order of architecture.

Pococke calls the Tel in question Telony, and also makes it the site of Julias, vol. ii. 72. Seetzen places Julias at his Tallanijhe (Zachs Monatl. Corr. xviii. 346). The neighbouring plain is described as well cultivated and fertile, producing corn, maize, and rice. Burckhardt speaks of honey of the finest quality being found there (Travels, 318), and of gourds and cucumbers of early growth. Herds of buffaloes and other horned cattle roam this plain.

It may be added that the preceding view of the two Bethsaidas, which is the one generally accredited in modern times, has been disputed by Dr. Thomson, in his work The Land and the Book, but on grounds that can scarcely yet be accepted as quite satisfactory. He thinks the apparent difference in the accounts of the evangelists, seeming to necessitate the existence of two cities of the same name on the lake, may be explained by placing Bethsaida partly on the one side of the river Jordan, where it flows into the lake, and partly on the other—also by placing Capernaum farther towards the northern extremity of the lake than is usually done; and, finally, by supposing that the boat containing the disciples, afterwards joined by our Lord, was driven out of its course by the violence of the storm which they encountered on the night after the miracle of the loaves and fishes, and carried past Capernaum to about the middle of the lake (part ii. c. 25). There is nothing, perhaps, absolutely impossible in the account, and, if established, it would relieve us of the seeming strangeness of a double Bethsaida within a very few miles of each other. But it does not explain the notices in the evangelical narratives and Josephus in a way that appears natural, and the generally received account is still likely to be regarded as the more probable one. [J. B.]

BETH-SHAN, or BETH-SHE'AN [the house of quiet]. This town is little mentioned in Scripture, and was probably not much in the possession of the Israelites; as we are also told that the rabbins did not reckon it a Jewish town, but one of an unholy people. It is still known by the rabbinical corruption of its name in the Bible, Beisân. It lay in a richly watered situation, about 14 miles to the south of the Sea of Galilee, and 4 miles west of the Jordan, on the brow of whose deep valley it stands, and in the district connected with the great plain of Jezreel. This plain was occupied by a wealthy, warlike, yet commercial people, who maintained intimate relations with the Phœnicians on the north, and the Philistines on the south, and who seem in general to have resisted the yoke of Israel. For this city, and several others, which lay naturally into the country of Issachar and Asher, were assigned to the half tribe of Manasseh, but were never actually conquered by it, Jos. xvii. 11; Ju. i. 27. And as soon as Saul was defeated and slain by the Philistines, in the valley of Jezreel, we find the conquerors on friendly terms with the inhabitants of Beth-shan, putting his armour in the house of Ashtaroth, and fastening his body to the wall of the city, 1 Sa. xxxi. 10; 1 Ch. x. 8-10. In later times the Jews called it Scythopolis, "the city of the Scythians," a powerful nation who poured down from Northern Asia into Syria, Media, and Palestine, as far as Ashkelon, spreading terror everywhere, even to the borders of Egypt (Herod. i. 105). This irruption happened in the early part of the reign of king Josiah. And though it is not expressly mentioned in Scripture, yet these Scythians have been reckoned by some distinguished expositors to be the terrible scourge out of the north which is referred to by the prophets of that time, especially by Jeremiah; and according to this theory, Beth-shan became one of their chief strongholds in Palestine, in memory of which it was called Scythopolis. On the other hand, eminent scholars deny that there is any reference to the Scythians in this name, which they connect with Succoth. If it was thus reckoned a heathen city in the midst of the Jewish people, we shall not wonder at so important a town remaining unvisited by our Lord, so far as we are aware, since his personal ministry was confined to the house of Israel, although he may have visited it when he came into the "coasts of Decapolis," to which this city belonged. It was, however, at one time under the power of the Israelites, for in the flourishing days of Solomon, who reduced all the Canaanites left in the land to a state of subjection, and even servitude, it had to bear its part in contributing to the heavy expenses of the royal table, 1 KI. ix. 20, 21; iv. 12. There are at the present day extensive ruins, more than 3 miles in circumference, but altogether of a heathen, and not of a Jewish, character. At this day, Porter says (p. 366), "the village is poor, but populous, containing a colony of some 500 Egyptians, brought here by Ibrahim Pasha, and now sadly oppressed by the wild nomads of the Ghôr, and the still wilder Bedawin, from beyond Jordan."

[G. C. M. D.]

BETH-SHEMESH [house of the sun]. 1. An Egyptian city, Je. xliii. 13, so designated from the worship of the sun for which it was celebrated. It is more commonly known by the name of On (which see). 2. The name is also appropriated to at least two, or perhaps three, cities in Canaan, which had no doubt been remarkable for sun-worship. Only one of these, however, is known to us any further than by the occurrence of the name in the geographical lists of the book of Joshua; and this one is supposed by some to be mentioned there under the name of Ir-shemesh, or "the city of the sun," Jos. xix. 41, where it is named among the cities of Dan. But rather it belonged to the tribe of Judah, though on the very borders of the two tribes. We can identify its site from the description of Eusebius, who places it 10 miles from Eleutheropolis, on the road to Nicopolis; and here there are now ruins to be found, named, 'Ain esh-Shems, or "fountain of the sun." It was a city given to the priests, Jos. xxi. 16; but being on the frontier, we read of it in the disastrous reign of Ahaz as being taken by the Philistines. No doubt, owing to its nearness to them, it was the city to which the milk-kine naturally first came with the ark of God, when the Ekronites refused to keep it, 1Sa. v. vi. And so the wisdom of God arranged it that on that occasion there should be priests and Levites on the spot to receive the ark with all honour, and to offer sacrifice before it. The people of Israel, however, seem to have crowded in from all quarters, and ventured to gaze into the ark, on account of which the Lord smote them with a fearful slaughter. In later history Beth-shemesh is again distinguished in a melancholy manner, as the scene of a battle between Joash, king of Israel, and Amaziah, king of Judah, in which the latter was defeated, and lost his independence, 2KI. xiv. 8-14. Beth-shemesh and its vicinity formed one of the twelve districts which made monthly provision for Solomon's table, 1KI. iv. 9.

[G. C. M. D.]

BETH-TAPPUAH [house of the citron or apple], a town or village in the mountainous part of the territory of Judah, Jos. xv. 63, not subsequently mentioned in history, but deserving notice as among the ancient places recently identified. Robinson discovered it in the name Teffûh, an old village on a mountainous ridge, not far from Hebron, and "lying in the midst of olive-groves and vineyards." Robinson adds, "Many of the former terraces along the hill-sides are still in use, and the land looks somewhat as it may have done in ancient times" (Researches, ii. p. 428).

BETHUËL [man of God, according to Gesenius], the father of Laban and Rebekah, Ge. xxii. 22, 23; xxiv. 50. It is strange that in this latter passage he should be introduced as taking a very subordinate part in the marriage of his daughter to Isaac; but in the silence of Scripture, there is no advantage to be gained by conjecture.

BETH-ZUR [the house of a rock] is described by the Jewish historian Josephus as the strongest fortress in Judea; and it is often mentioned in the history of the Maccabees. In Scripture, however, it is only named as one of the cities of Judah, Jos. xv. 68, which Rehoboam fortified, after the ten tribes had broken off from him, 2Ch. xi. 7; and again, as a place whose ruler took part in building the wall of Jerusalem, Ne. iii. 16. We are told by Eusebius and Jerome that it lay 20 Roman miles from Jerusalem, on the road to Hebron, so that there is undoubtedly some error in the passage, 2Mac. xi. 5, which calls it a strong place, distant from Jerusalem 15 stadia. About that position, which Eusebius assigns to it, there stands a half-ruined tower, and near it "a fountain surrounded by massive foundations and excavated tombs. The place is sometimes called Dirweh, but the name of the tower is Beit Sûr, which suggests at once the Beth-zur of Joshua, mentioned in connection with Halhul" (Porter, p. 72), which corresponds to the neighbouring village of Hulhul. A very ancient tradition, reported by Eusebius and Jerome, fixes on this as the scene of the baptism of the Ethiopian eunuch, Ac. viii. 26-40, which Robinson rejects on account of a different geographical theory which he supports. Of course it is a subject on which certainty is scarcely attainable.

BETROTHING. See MARRIAGE.

BEU'LAH [a married woman], a mystical name given to Zion by the prophet Isaiah, ch. lxi. 4, according to a common use of the marriage relationship to set forth the covenant of grace.

BEYOND is frequently used in the geographical descriptions of Canaan, in connection with the river Jordan, which divided the country into two parts. Occasionally there seems to be some confusion in the use of the word, which is removed as soon as we remember that beyond takes its meaning from the place in which the writer, or speaker, or hearer is supposed to be. Moses died on the east side of Jordan, and in his writings, which went far to mould the habits of expression in all time coming, "beyond Jordan" would naturally mean to the west of the river. But Joshua, and those others who spoke and wrote in that western part of Canaan, which was strictly the Promised Land, would commonly mean by the same words the country to the east of Jordan. Sometimes our translators have removed the difficulty out of sight by a loose translation—"on this side," instead of "beyond," as in Nu. xxxii. 19, where the double meaning of the expression, according to the point from which we reckon, is very distinctly seen by a literal translation: "For we will not inherit with them beyond Jordan, and forward; because our inheritance is fallen to us beyond Jordan eastward."

BEYROUT. See BERYTUS.

BEZAL'EEL [in the shadow of God, that is, under God's protection], the son of Uri, of the tribe of Judah, who was filled with the Holy Spirit so as to be fitted for the chief direction in building and preparing the tabernacle, Ex. xxxi. 2, &c. (For his genealogy, see 1 Ch. ii. 19, 20.)

BE'ZEK [a flash of lightning], a city over which there reigned a cruel king, whose destruction is recorded in Ju. i. 4, &c. That passage might lead us to suppose that Bezek lay within the tribe of Judah, or that of Simeon; but the only place of this name of which the ancient geographers speak (strictly, indeed, two places close together) was 17 miles from Shechem, on the road to Beth-shan, and therefore in Ephraim or Manasseh. This situation agrees well with what we should expect as the scene of the numbering of king Saul's first army, 1Sa xi. 8. Modern travellers have not identified it.

BEZER [probably gold-ore; perhaps fortification], one of the cities of refuge, in the tribe of Reuben, De. iv. 43; Jos. xx. 8, &c. Its site has not been determined.

BIBLE [Book]—THE BOOK, by way of eminence. Under this general term we propose to indicate some of the leading characteristics which distinguish the Bible in its entirety, as the book of God's revelation to men; other points, having respect to the text, versions, &c., of the Bible, being reserved for the more appropriate term SCRIPTURES.

1. The first thing, perhaps, that in such a relation most naturally suggests itself, is the air of truthfulness and probity which breathes throughout the writings of the Bible—such as eminently befits a work bearing on it the stamp of God's authority, and such also as not only places it on a level with the best of human productions, but even raises it above them. Every one knows that there is usually a marked difference in this respect between genuine and spurious productions, or between productions written in a sincere and earnest spirit, and those which owe their existence to some sinister aim. A writer with such a serious flaw in his mental composition, or such an obliquity in his purpose, as to admit of his becoming the author of writings false in their pretensions, or improper in their design, can scarcely fail to discover this, if not in a wrong moral bias, at least in a depressed moral tone. Freshness, elevation of spirit, the warmth and energy of a soul beating under the impulse of the highest considerations of truth and duty, are not to be expected from such a quarter.

Now, the Bible is beyond any other book remarkable for the possession of these higher qualities. Though consisting of a great variety of productions—histories, didactic compositions, epistolary communications, odes, and songs—touching also, with the greatest freedom, on an immense variety of topics, and written by persons in all conditions of life, from the herdsman to the king, it yet preserves throughout the same character, and stands unrivalled for its genuine simplicity and its high moral aim. It is hardly possible to conceive how any one could peruse it with any degree of care, without being penetrated by the conviction that the writers were elevated far above anything selfish or ambitious—that, on the contrary, their grand object was to make known the truth of Heaven in every form in which they had to deal with it, whether men might bear or whether they might forbear. Indeed, in a very large proportion of what is written, the writing bears the aspect of a testimony delivered in the face of the most strenuous opposition, and with the inevitable sacrifice of comfort, or peril of life, to him who delivered it. Considered merely as a book, the volume of inspiration is pervaded by the spirit of martyrdom, and the men who were employed in inditing it stand for the most part superior alike to the threats and the allurements of the world.

2. We note, again, the singular adaptation that appears in the Bible to the mingled and diversified character of man's present state and condition.

There are varieties in this respect, both in man considered individually, and in one man as compared with another. Every man is a compound being, not only as having a body and a soul united together into one frame, but also as having a combination of powers and properties, widely differing from each other, yet together making up his intellectual and moral being. And not one merely, but the whole of these must be suitably wrought upon and stimulated, if he is to be addressed in the manner which is best calculated to interest and improve him. There is in every rational man a power of thought, and a susceptibility of feeling—a reason, a memory, a fancy—a heart and conscience. And while each individual possesses these several faculties in a greater or less degree, different individuals have them in measures infinitely diversified; in one the power of thought is predominant, in another the susceptibility of feeling; then the power of thought is seen to take the form, here more peculiarly of strength of reason, there of an exercise of memory, there again of flights of fancy; while in the state of the heart and conscience there is every shade, from the most soft and tender, to the most hardened and corrupt—in all, still the same natural elements of thought and feeling, yet these elements endlessly varied in their distribution and exercise.

Now, we can conceive a revelation from God addressed more especially to one of these parts of human nature, and consequently better adapted to the state of those in whom that particular part was predominant than to others. It might be notwithstanding a veritable communication from God, and though a partial, yet still an important boon to the human family. But since the Bible purports to be a revelation to the world at large, a revelation that has been accumulating through successive ages, till it has assumed the form of a completed record of the divine will for mankind in their more advanced condition and universal aspect, it surely must be no mean evidence of its really being from God, if its own varied materials have a suitable correspondence with the varied characteristics it has to meet with among men. So far, it carries in its very structure the sign of His superintending and directing agency, who alone thoroughly knows what is in man, and fitly represents the wide relationship in which he stands to men generally as his offspring.

This stamp of divinity is very clearly impressed on the Bible. Infidels, looking at it superficially, and judging each from his own point of view, have often found fault with the form in which it appears, in one respect or another. And we may justly admit, that the very wisest of men that ever lived, if left to himself to devise in what precise shape, or with what actual materials, a revelation from Heaven should be best constructed, would never have fallen upon such a plan as has been pursued by the sacred writers; for his intellectual vision could only have comprehended a part—a comparatively small part of the conditions that required to be met. God in this, as in other things, has proved himself to be wiser than men. His eye surveyed the whole field; and by the "divers manners," as well of the persons employed to write, as of the things written by them, he has provided the proper seed for it all.

(1.) Even the inferior part of man's nature—his body—is not overlooked in the structure of the revelation provided for him. Its powerful influence over his thoughts and feelings is fully taken into account. And as it is through his senses that he gets his most lively impressions of things, so sensible images, and the objects with which he is most habitually conversant in material nature, are employed in great variety to aid his conceptions of what is spiritual and divine. The language of the Bible has not the attenuated and impalpable form which philosophy would have given to it. It deals with men as men—seeking to reach in the most effectual way both their understandings and their hearts; and so, all nature in a manner is laid under contribution to furnish a vivid diction and appropriate imagery—the firmament above, and the earth beneath, with their manifold aspects and scenery; the products of nature, the handiworks of art, the manners and customs of life; all, in short, that is familiar to the eye, and falls within the observation of men as connected with the world around them, comes into play in Scripture, as materials for the many emblems, similitudes, and parables, by which it makes known the truth of God. In this respect alone, there is an amplitude, a richness, a kind of universality in the book of God's revelation, which is nowhere else to be found.

(2.) Then, there is its wonderful adaptation to mankind, in regard to the large share that memory has in their mental constitution. It is this which disposes them so much to delight in history, and makes the lives of men and the records of former times one of the most engaging modes of communicating instruction. In proportion to its size, the narratives of Scripture, which fall in with this aptitude of nature, occupy a large space; and they exist in the greatest variety—not merely the general, as in the history of nations, but the particular also, in family portraits and the memoirs of private life. Whether it be the mind of the peasant or the philosopher, the unlettered youth or the man of cultivated intellect, there are no characters that take such a deep hold of the memory as those of the saints and patriarchs of the Bible; no stories so interesting, and so lasting in the impressions they produce, as those of Adam and Eve, Abraham, Jacob, Joseph, Samuel, Elijah, Daniel, above all, the narratives of the life, sufferings, and death of Jesus. Why does modern literature of all descriptions abound so much with allusions to these? Why do painting, and sculpture, and music employ themselves so much in endeavouring to reproduce them in new and ever-varying forms of art? Why, but because their touching simplicity and profound meaning have awakened a sympathy and created an interest peculiarly their own. They have, in a manner, taken possession of humanity.

(3.) Higher still, the Bible addresses itself to the more exalted faculties of man, and nowhere is such food and exercise provided for these as in the book of God's revelation. For the spirit of contemplation, there are the solemnest themes on which the mind can expatiate, thoughts that strike into the lowest depths, or lift the soul up as on angelic wings to wander through eternity. For the discerning and reasoning faculty, there are the weightiest sentences of wisdom, the most searching truths, the most stirring appeals and conclusive ratiocinations that were ever penned. Fancy, nay imagination, can here find its highest gratification; and the very same book, which has a charm for babes and sucklings, which by its strains of familiar imagery and heart-affecting truth, is the cherished companion of cottage patriarchs, is the living fountain at which Shakspeare and Milton, and other men of kindred genius, drew "the elements of that copious flood of rich and varied poetry, which rolled, and still rolls, in golden splendour in the high places of our literature." The world knows nothing besides to be compared with this. And were it only for its wondrous adaptation to all ranks and classes of men—its power to touch the deepest springs of thought and feeling, and the magic sway which it wields alike over the humblest and the loftiest of human intellects, we might well say of this book, as the magicians of Egypt said of the miracle of Moses, "It is the finger of God;" for it combines individualism and universalism, the simple and the profound, the tender and the majestic, as the agency of His Spirit alone could have done.

What has been said of the Bible as a whole, in regard to its manner of instruction, of course applies peculiarly to the method of instruction adopted by Jesus Christ. No teaching was like his for its richness in what may be called seminal truths, and the communication of these in forms fitted to take hold of so many bosoms. Of one part of this alone, it has been justly said, "Let any man attempt to speak in parables; nay, to produce one single parable; nay, to find one out of the Bible in the whole compass of human literature; nay, to compare what are so called in other parts of the Bible, few as they are even there, with those uttered habitually, incessantly by Christ. Those great, simple, luminous, and yet wholly inimitable expositions, not of duties merely, or wholly mainly, but of fundamental, and most generally of before unknown or unregarded truths, constituted the distinctive peculiarity of Christ's manner, and was felt by those around him to impart to it a character and a power altogether divine. Well and truly might they say, Never man spake like this man" (Virginia Lectures, p. 342).

3. It may justly be noted, as another leading characteristic of the Bible, the practical tendency, as it is sometimes called, but, as we would rather express it, the high moral tone, that pervades it, since it ever keeps in view, for its chief end, right views of God's moral character, then the right moral relation of men to God, and of men to each other. It is true that exceptions have been taken by adversaries against the Bible on this very point, and that it has sometimes been charged with having an immoral or licentious tendency. But this can only be affirmed with the slightest degree of plausibility, when certain portions are isolated, and considered out of their proper bearing and connection, or when the statements it contains are represented in a false and distorted light. And the fact is beyond all dispute, that the pervading tendency and object of all its histories, the aim of all its legislation, the direct bearing of all its doctrines, precepts, expostulations, warnings, institutions, and ordinances, is what we have represented—to bring men under right apprehensions and the felt influence of what is morally good in God, that it may be reflected and copied in themselves. The fact is beyond dispute, that the persons who have themselves attained to the highest moral tone, and the greatest purity of heart and behaviour, are those who are most familiar with this book of God's revelation, and who make no hesitation in ascribing to their acquaintance with it whatever in this respect distinguishes them from others. Nor is there any one who does not feel a marked difference in the kind of impression produced by it and by even the best of human productions—as if here only they got spiritual and moral truth at the fountain-head—direct from the source of light and holiness; while elsewhere it is to be found only at second hand. There is a bearing aloft, as it were, above, not only the corruptions, but the weaknesses and infirmities of nature—a depth and power of penetration, as of spirit dealing with spirit, stripping off outward disguises, and laying open the real essence of things as to right and wrong;—a gravity and earnestness, a yearning solicitude about the one great object of a right state of heart and behaviour, and, with the view of reaching that, a propriety, a force, and a significance in the things unfolded; such as is not to be equally found elsewhere, and cannot but leave on candid spirits an impression of the most sacred and wholesome character.

Such is the case even now. With all the experience the world has had, and the advancement that has been made, through the progress of centuries, in knowledge and civilization, the Bible still holds, in the respect now mentioned, a pre-eminent place. But, we must remember, this is not a fair comparison, or one that does proper justice to it; since a large proportion of its contents dates from the comparative infancy of the world, and nearly the whole of what is healthy and spiritual in the tone of other productions is but a fruit and a reflection of its own. If we throw ourselves back on the earlier ages of the world, and look to the writings that were associated with the other religions of antiquity—or even look to the writings of a later date, which have assumed, though falsely assumed, to be of like origin and character with the Word of God, we then perceive what an immense gulf separates between what is of God, and what is merely of man.

Compare the earlier portions of the Bible, for example, with the cosmogonies, the fables of religious adventure or transformation, the personal lives and public operations, to be found in the religious records of the Hindoos or Egyptians, or even in the more sober, yet in reality most absurd and extravagant mythologies of Greece and Rome; and what a contrast do we behold! It is a contrast, not merely in this or that particular, but in the whole tone and tendency of the two classes of productions. Those heathen records do not seem to have even aimed at the same point, which always keeps the ascendancy in the Word of God—being, for the most part, dreaming reveries or idle tales, fitted at best to gratify a vain curiosity, or, as too often happened, to excite a prurient imagination. Had we nothing but the two tables of the ten commandments—as a revelation of God's character and of man's duty—in the earlier portions of the Bible, we might set it with triumphant confidence against the whole that ancient heathenism has delivered to us; not only as better than its best, but we might rather say, as light to its darkness. But when did such a revelation of moral truth and duty appear among the Hebrews? At the very time when they had escaped from the closest contact, and all but national conjunction, with a land and people most profoundly immersed in the grossest idolatry and pollution. For there can be no doubt that the Egypt of the Pharaohs was the great seat of ancient superstition, as well as of ancient learning and civilization. As far back as our information carries us—a period certainly more remote than that at which Israel sojourned within its borders—the Egyptians were wholly given to idolatry and its kindred abominations; and on them, in an especial sense, was chargeable the guilt and folly of "having changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things." Such was the atmosphere in which the Israelites had lived during their abode in Egypt; and not without having received some taint of evil from it, as the history of their subsequent backslidings, and especially their speedy relapse into the mirthful and libidinous worship of the golden calf, too clearly indicated. But it was when fresh from such a region, that the law of the ten commandments was proclaimed in their hearing, and laid as the foundation of their entire polity;—a law which unfolds the clearest views of God's character and service—which denounces every form and species of idolatry, as inconsistent with the spirituality of the divine nature—which enjoins the purest worship and the highest morality; and in its very form is a model of perfection and completeness. Wisdom of this kind Moses could least of all have learned from the Egyptians; nor could it have become his except by descending from above.

But what is true of this portion, may substantially be applied to the whole of the writings of the Old Testament. They were—viewed in respect to their human authorship—the productions of men belonging to a comparatively small people, surrounded on every side, and through a long track of ages, by many and powerful nations, in every one of which, as to religion and morality, it might be justly said "the foundations were out of course." Among these nations there were no true notions of God; and hence there could be no right views interwoven with their religions of the moral attributes of Deity, and of man's relation to these. A pantheistic element lay at the bottom of all the forms they assumed. Hence, as Bähr has justly remarked, contrasting the spirit of these ancient religions with that of the Old Testament: "The ultimate foundation of all heathenism is pantheism. Hence the idea of the oneness of the Divine Being was not absolutely lost, but this oneness was not at all that of a personal existence, possessing self-consciousness and self-determination, but an impersonal One, the great It, a neuter-abstract, the product of mere speculation, which is at once everything and nothing. Wherever the Deity appeared as a person, it ceased to be one, and resolved itself into an infinite multiplicity. But all these gods were mere personifications of the different powers of nature. From a religion which was so physical in its fundamental character, there could only be developed an ethics, which should bear the hue and form of the physical. Above all that is moral rose natural necessity, fate, to which gods and men were alike subject; the highest moral aim for man was to yield an absolute submission to this necessity, and generally to transfuse himself into nature as being identified with Deity; to represent in himself its life, and especially that characteristic of it, perfect harmony, conformity to law and rule. The Mosaic religion, on the other hand, has for its first principle the oneness and absolute spirituality of God. The Godhead is no neuter-abstract, no It, but I; Jehovah is altogether a personal God. The whole world, with everything it contains, is his work, the offspring of his own free act, his creation. He is in the world, indeed, but not as properly one with it; he is infinitely above it, and can clothe himself with it, as with a garment, or fold it up, and lay it aside as he pleases. Now, this God, who reveals and manifests himself through all creation, in carrying into execution his purpose to save and bless all the families of the earth, revealed and manifested himself in an especial manner to one race and people. The centre of this revelation is the word which he spoke to Israel; but this word is his law, the expression of his holy perfect will. The essential character, therefore, of the special revelation of God is holiness. Its substance is, 'Be ye holy, for I am holy.' So that the religion of the Old Testament is throughout ethical; it always addresses itself to the will of man, and deals with him as a moral being. Everything that God did for Israel, in the manifestations he gave of himself, aims at this as its final end, that Israel should sanctify the name of Jehovah, and thereby himself be sanctified" (Symbolk, 1. 35-37).

Now that such a revelation, so distinctively moral, and in its morality so eminently pure and elevated, should have originated among a people so small and unimportant in other respects, should have received additions from age to age, in the form of histories, laws, psalmodic poems, didactic pieces, prophetic revelations, and yet never diverged—flowing on in its crystal clearness, though the turbid elements of pantheistic and idolatrous corruptions were working all around and seeking to press in at every avenue—receiving new contributions, whereby it acquired additional volume, but still maintaining its freedom from surrounding error, still holding up the spiritually pure and good, till it grew into the full and perfect form of the Christian religion—such a phenomenon can have but one valid solution, the solution of Scripture itself—that the men by whom the writings were indited wrote as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.

And then it is not only as contrasted with the ancient heathen writings, and the spirit of heathen religions, but with assumed revelations of a merely human kind, in more modern and civilized times, that the revelation of God in the Bible holds its high superiority of tone and bearing. The writings of which it consists assume to be a revelation from heaven; but if we look to other writings professing to possess this character—even with the Bible before them as a model—we perceive at once how immensely they differ for the worse. Look, for example, to the Koran, made up of pretended communications from God, and doubtless the production of a man of no ordinary powers—yet not only is its moral tone incomparably lower than that of the Bible, but it is continually travelling into a region that has no moral bearing at all, giving accounts which, if real, could only be fitted to gratify an impertinent curiosity respecting divine things, and lift men out of their proper sphere. The speculative has quite another place there than it has in the Bible—and so has it also in the fabulous legends of Jews and Catholics—in the revelations of visionaries, such as those whom Rome has canonized as saints, or Swedenborg, or Naylor, which are full of minute descriptions of what, did it actually exist, would be of no practical value, and so realize the apostle's anticipation of the visionary, "intruding into those things he has not seen, vainly puffed up with his fleshly mind." The sacred writers avoid such tempting heights; for, like men taught of God, they have a one thing in view throughout—a grand moral aim and purpose, to which even their loftiest discoveries are subordinate.

4. Coming now more closely to the contents of Scripture, as bearing on this moral or practical object, we notice, further, the view there exhibited of man's natural condition and prospects. This is in perfect accordance with the lessons of experience, and the workings of conscience, and hence furnishes another characteristic mark of Scripture, and an evidence of its divine character and origin.

The lessons of experience, and the workings of conscience, no doubt, lie within the province of man's own research and observation. And it may be objected, that if the exhibitions of human nature given in Scripture do indeed accord with these, the human discernment and insight of the sacred writers was sufficient to account for it. It might certainly have been so, if in each of these writers there had been a kind of concentrated humanity, whereby he should have been rendered capable of reading aright the records of all experience, and giving forth a fair and impartial reflection of the workings of conscience generally. But what merely human writer could have adequately performed such a task? Man's individualism, when left to itself, continually leads him astray in one direction or another from the right path; and in nothing more has it done so than in respect to this very point, which seems to be so level to the capacities of all—the view taken of man's natural state and prospects. Listen to one class of writers, and you would believe there is nothing radically bad in human nature—a certain weakness, no doubt, a proneness to err, when exposed to temptation, or placed in unfavourable circumstances—but no inherent tendency in the wrong direction, or native incapacity to ascertain or perform the right. Listen, again, to others, and everything appears vicious and polluted—not a ray of light, or an element of good—there is room only for contempt or despair. And between these two extremes, infinite varieties, and we may add manifold inconsistencies; for very often in these merely human writers, what is affirmed in the general is denied in detail; and some of the worst things said of particular men, or classes of men, are to be found in those writers who are the loudest in extolling human nature at large. Now, we may say of the representation given of man's natural state in the Word of God, there is nothing partial or exclusive—there is a mirror true to nature—true on both sides, the darker as well as the brighter, and the brighter as well as the darker. On the dark side it does certainly speak in very strong terms, representing man as naturally fallen—polluted at his very birth—and when left to himself incapable of doing anything that can properly deserve God's favour, or recover himself from ruin. But, at the same time, it represents this, not as the original state of mankind—not in the strict and proper sense their natural state, but a secondary and derived one—and one that their own hearts and consciences, when fairly tested, reclaim against as evil, yet confess to as true. As the Bible declares, so men feel, that their condition by nature is of an anomalous character, that it contains a bitter root, ever yielding the most corrupt and noxious fruit; while still, as if this were a superinduced, and not the primary and normal state, there is a relish and a desire for better things—a condemnation of the bad even when it is followed, and an approbation of the good even when it is neglected.

The history of the world in every age, and in every country under heaven, has but too sadly confirmed the scriptural representation in its darker side:—everywhere, and at all times, as the well-spring of life has flowed on, it has sent forth troubled and noisome waters. When placed under the freest and mildest form of the divine administration the world has ever seen, as it existed before the flood, the result of that grand experiment was, that the wickedness of man became great, and violence overspread the earth, so that nothing remained for divine wisdom, but to sweep away the mass of pollution, and bring in a new state of things, under more stringent and powerful checks. Under this state, different races sprang up, and nations formed themselves, with manifold diversities of tongue, and government, and civil as well as sacred institutions; but with one melancholy result in all as to the great point now under consideration—the result, namely, described by the psalmist, of the Lord looking down from heaven, and seeing none righteous, no not one; and by the apostle, in the dreadful picture he draws of the ignorance, corruption, and profligacy of the heathen world, in the first chapter of his epistle to the Romans. Every count in these indictments can be verified from heathen sources. And even among those more favourably circumstanced—the Jews, for example—what a record does their history present of depravity? It is precisely in the history of that people, and in the writings of those sacred penmen, who were raised up from time to time to strive against their ungodliness, and lay bare all the deceitful workings of their hearts and the tortuous policy of their lives, that we have the most full and searching delineations of human corruption anywhere to be found. Yet so just are they, that whenever a man's eyes are really opened to the truth of things—whenever he takes a calm and thoughtful review of his own heart and conduct, he finds no language so precisely suited to his state as the solemn charges and penitential confessions of the Old Testament.

Yet with all this, there is never a denial of the better element in human nature, nor an abandonment of hope concerning it, as if it were incapable of recovery, and must be given over to irrecoverable ruin. The very doctrine of the fall, when rightly understood, implies the existence of that better element, and a ground of hope for the future; for it teaches that the evil in man's condition was not an original and necessary thing—that, on the contrary, he came at first pure and good from the hand of his Creator, and that the misery and emptiness with which he is now associated, are not emblems of his Father, or the legitimate results of that Father's work in him, but of its disorder and corruption. So that he may look to the rock whence he was hewn with a measure of humble expectation or trust, that the hand which originally made may again apply its power, and cast out the evil that has disfigured its own workmanship. Then, the whole character and design of God's scheme of redemptive grace proceeds on the assumption of an element of good still in man. For it is of the nature of a restoration—or, as it is called in Scripture, a regeneration—a working upon what still remains of God's workmanship in the soul, so as through grace to raise and bring it to a state of relative perfection and blessedness. The purpose of God, as revealed throughout the whole Bible, is not to destroy, and then reconstruct something entirely new out of the materials, but to found the new and better order of things on the basis of the old, by giving it the right direction, and elevating it to the proper tone. It takes for granted, that there is in the soul still a capacity for discerning the truth, so far at least as to be able to distinguish between this and its opposite, and to perceive it to be good that the truth should prevail. It recognizes certain moral capabilities and desires in the soul, which it plies with all manner of considerations and motives, fitted to stimulate them into activity, and engage them on the side of God and holiness. It treats men as lost, and yet capable of recovery—as depraved in their whole natures, and yet susceptible of purity—as labouring under a moral paralysis, and yet the subjects of a moral treatment which may raise them to the highest place, and fit them for the noblest employment in the kingdom of God. Such is the mixture of light and shade, of good and evil in man's condition by nature, as represented in Scripture; and in both respects it finds an echo in every man's conscience, who listens with patience to its statements, and tests them by a reference to the reports of his own experience. It is in respect to the evil that usually there is the greatest disposition to resist its testimony; especially in regard to the completeness of the disorder that has entered into men's relation to God. But whenever a thoughtful and earnest spirit takes possession of their minds, they never fail to concur also in this. They then feel that a loving and dutiful allegiance to God is the great law of their being; that when they break loose from this, all of necessity must be out of course with them—as it would be with a planet were it to forsake its appointed orbit—or as it is in the mind, which has ceased to obey the law of reason, where every thought is a wanderer, because it no longer pertains to the province of the rational. It is this, they then perceive, which makes the whole head sick, and the whole heart faint. And there needs only in any case the opening of the eyes to a right apprehension of one's relation to God, to insure a full assent to the humiliating representations of Scripture, and a heartfelt acquiescence in them as applicable to one's own spiritual condition.

5. We shall only point further to the views unfolded in Scripture on the part of God for the purpose of meeting and remedying man's natural condition and prospects. These, we again find, are such as to bespeak their divine origin—for they are in perfect accordance with the heart's deepest convictions of what is good and right, and present such a complication of means and motives as is every way worthy of the lofty source from which they come, and the necessities of the occasion which called them forth. For surely, "when we read a history, which authoritatively claims to be an exhibition of the character of God in his dealings with men—if in that history we find what fills and overflows our most enlarged conceptions of moral worth and loveliness in the Supreme Being—if our reason discovers in it a system, which gives peace to the conscience by the very exhibition [of truth and goodness] which quickens its sensibility—that it dispels the terrors of guilt by the very fact which associates sin with the full loathing of the heart—that it combines, in one wondrous and consistent whole, our most fearful forebodings and our most splendid anticipations for futurity—that the object of all its tendencies is the perfection of moral happiness, and that these tendencies are naturally connected with the belief of its facts—if we see all this in the gospel, we may then say that our own eyes have seen its truth, and that we need no other testimony. We may, then, well believe that God has been pleased in pity to our wretchedness, and in condescension to our feebleness, to clothe the eternal laws which regulate his spiritual government, in such a form as may be palpable to our conceptions, and adapted to the urgency of our necessities" (Erskine's Int. Evid. p. 18).

This is a general representation, in a hypothetical form, of the character of God's revelation of himself in Scripture, to meet the great wants and necessities of our condition. But to realize distinctly its bearing in an argumentative respect, we must view the subject in some detail. There are three aspects more particularly in which it may be contemplated, or three great lines of accordance between the revelation of God's character and purposes, and the things belonging to men's state and experience.

(1.) In the first place, they accord with the testimony of conscience as to what is morally right. This is a kind of accordance that could by no possibility be dispensed with. For the actings of conscience are the great natural evidence we possess of the character of God, and of the nature of the obligations arising out of our relation to him. It is upon the basis of conscience that natural religion more especially raises itself; and the views we naturally entertain of God's moral attributes are simply derived from a kind of infinite expansion of the good that conscience approves and owns. We have no other ultimate test, to which we can bring all pretensions of a religious kind, as to their moral tendency and bearing; and any religious system which might present a view of the divine character and administration at variance with our innate moral convictions, must be rejected by us as false.

Now, the good which approves itself in the eye of conscience comprehends the sterner as well as the gentler graces, and the one as even prior to and more fundamental than the other—truth, integrity, justice, faithfulness first; and then mercy, loving-kindness, beneficence. All are perfectly agreed upon these elements of goodness, and upon this being the order of their relative importance, in so far as regards the character of a fellow-creature. We may admire and love the softer graces of humanity, when we see them displayed in another; but we demand the more severe: we can on no account dispense with what is just and right, nor, where these are wanting, can any amount of the other compensate in our esteem for the defect. If such is the nature of our moral convictions in respect to men, it stands to reason that they should be the same in respect to God; and that there also the sterner elements of rectitude should be conceived of as not less, but rather of more absolute and primary importance than those of kindness and mercy. It is certainly otherwise often in point of fact. There is a disposition on the part of many, especially of those who view the matter superficially, or who think under the glow of an imaginative or sentimental temperament, to lose sight comparatively of the things that are true and just in the character of Deity, and to make account only of the gracious and benignant. A God all mercy, or rich only in kindness, is the God they picture to themselves. But such a God is as much an idol—a nonentity, as the false gods of heathenism. And it is felt to be so, whenever the sense of guilt is really awakened in the conscience. The thought of God, as a moral governor, essentially and faultlessly just in his administration, and, as the natural result of this, the fear of his displeasure on account of sin—these are what take resistless hold of the mind, and haunt it continually. So Aurungzebe, for example, when conscience-stricken and drawing near to death, gave vent to his feelings in the memorable words, "Wherever I turn my eyes I see nothing but the Divinity"—viz. as a just and righteous Being, flaming indignation against the wicked deeds which he was conscious of having committed against law and justice. But is it not a weakness or a misapprehension to think thus of God? Is it not to imagine the existence of feelings in Him which are never regarded as an excellence, but a blemish among men? For who does not shrink from the resentful and implacable, when such characters are seen on earth? Mercy, compassion, forgiveness, placability, are virtues, when the objects of them are the penitent and humble; and the reverse is universally felt to be vicious. So it is often alleged, for the purpose of disparaging or modifying the statements of the Bible. But the cases are by no means parallel;—for the objection takes into account simply the relation, common alike to both cases, of an offender and an offended party; but loses sight of what is peculiar to one of them—the all-important fact of a moral government in God, to which the sinner stands related as a transgressor and a rebel. The question in this case comes to be whether there really is a moral government with God. As Chalmers has justly said, "There can be no government without law, and every law must have its sanctions. What becomes of the truth or the dignity of heaven's government, if man is to rebel, and God, stripped of every attribute but tenderness, can give no demonstration of his incensed and violated majesty? There is no positively no law, if there be not a force and a certainty in its sanctions. Take away from jurisprudence its penalties, or, what were still worse, let the penalties only be denounced, but never be exacted, and we reduce the whole to an unsubstantial mockery. The fabric of moral government falls to pieces; and, instead of a great presiding authority in the universe, we have a subverted throne, and a degraded sovereign." Yes; and with the honour and authority of God, we should lose all security for the peace and well-being of his creatures. Nothing short of absolute rectitude on his part can secure this; and any exhibition of a slack jurisprudence, or an indulgent weakness, would bring the most fearful danger and uncertainty into their prospects of final bliss.

There are multitudes who cannot reason thus, yet feel the truth contained in the representation; who are, as it were, instinctively and irresistibly impressed with it, by the workings of their conscience. And it is indeed well that the power of conscience proves too mighty in the long-run, for all the false reasoning and the flimsy sentimentalism that is often thrown around the subject. But by nothing conceivable could the enlightened and the awakened conscience be more thoroughly met and satisfied, than by the representations of God's character given in the gospel, and embodied in its scheme of grace for sinners. The essential righteousness of the Deity forms the groundwork of the whole: it is that which calls for the condemnation of man as sinful, and constitutes the need of a plan of salvation to recover him from its ruin. And conscience re-echoes the justice of the condemnation, and confesses to the need of a plan for salvation. Conscience itself, however, could go no farther; nor could the powers of nature give it any effectual aid in seeking for what might satisfy the need. But when we listen to what God has provided and done, as unfolded in the gospel—when we consider the revelation of his righteousness in the personal obedience unto death of his own Son, establishing in every particular the demands and sanctions of the divine law—and this for the very purpose of opening a way of escape for the guilty; that while righteousness was maintained as the fundamental principle of his government, mercy and loving-kindness might go forth in free and bountiful exercise toward those who have rendered themselves obnoxious to its penalties;—there is the presence of all that is fitted to allay the terrors of conscience, and give peace to it, without weakening in the least its regard to righteousness, but, on the contrary, strengthening and confirming it. And thus there arises from the felt correspondence between the overtures of the gospel and the profoundest convictions of the soul, an evidence of the divine origin of the revelation which is disclosed in the Bible. Shall we discern the operation of a designing hand, and a fatherly care, in the accordance that prevails between the constitution of man, and the external world in which he is placed—between the eye that sees, and the ear that hears, and the appetite that desires and tastes, and the infinite variety of objects fitted to please, and satisfy, and regale these bodily senses—and not much rather discern the presence of the same designing hand and fatherly care, in such a marvellous exhibition of heaven's highest attributes to quell the greatest anxieties that can agitate a sinner's bosom, and settle the mightiest controversy that affects his well-being? The argument in both cases is the same in kind; but in this last case, the harmonies are of a much profounder kind, and carry us nearer to the bosom of Godhead. (See ATONEMENT.)

(2.) Another line of harmonies is to be found in the accordance of the revelation of God in Christ with the emotional part of our natures; which is so admirably adapted to these as to furnish them with the highest stimulants to right exertion, and in the manner most fitted to tell on them with the proper effect. We write now, it will be observed, of the bearing and tendency of the plan of God—not objectively, in respect to the great question of an adjustment between God's righteousness and the pardon of man's guilt—but subjectively, in respect to the effect upon man's heart and conduct, which the plan, when embraced, is fitted to produce. A religion suited to fallen man, must not only provide what is necessary to secure a return to God's favour and blessing, but also what is adapted to work beneficially upon his feelings, and draw these forth into all becoming exercises toward God and man, or to reproduce, in its various features, the moral image of God on the soul. Were there no fitness in the gospel to accomplish this end, we should unhesitatingly say, it wanted an essential element of a divine revelation. The facts and doctrines it unfolds would then possess no natural connection with the moral obligations it imposes, and the character it requires;—in other words, its revelations of supernatural objects would have no definite bearing on men's duties and well-being. This defect is one of the most prominent blemishes in the false religions that have prevailed in the world. "The very states which have chiefly excelled in arts, and literature, and civil government, have failed here most lamentably. Their moral precepts might (sometimes) be very good; but then these precepts had as much connection with the history of astronomy as with the doctrines of their religion. Which of the adventures of Jupiter, or Brahma, or Osiris, could be urged as a powerful motive to excite to a high moral feeling, or to produce a high moral action? The force of the moral precepts was rather lessened than increased by the facts of their mythology. In the religion of Mahomet there are many excellent precepts; but it contains no illustration of the character of God, which has any particular tendency beyond, or even equal to, that of natural religion, to enforce these precepts. Indeed, one of the most important doctrines which he taught, viz. a future life beyond the grave, from the shape he gave to it, tended to counteract his moral precepts. He described it as a state of indulgence in sensual gratifications, which never cloyed the appetite; and yet he preached temperance and self-denial. The philosophical systems of theology are no less liable to the charge of absurdity than the popular superstitions. No one can read Cicero's work on the nature of the gods, without acknowledging the justice of the apostle's sentence upon that class of reasoners, 'professing themselves to be wise, they became fools'" (Erskine's Evid. p. 60).

Now, where in these false religions we have a marked deficiency and blemish, in the scheme of grace revealed in the gospel we have the highest style of excellence. In the first instance, its doctrines are, to a large extent, embodied in facts, which removes them from the shadowy form of abstract principles, and gives them the palpability and impressive character of realities. Then the facts and doctrines alike are of a profoundly moral nature—testifying at every point against sin and for holiness; and thus they are fitted to arouse and quicken the moral feelings of every mind that is impressed by them. Not only so, but they are calculated in the most peculiar manner, by the most telling and persuasive considerations, to engage the heart on the side of goodness. The fundamental and vital principle of all goodness is love to God. But this higher principle of love cannot, any more than love of a natural kind, spring up in the bosom apart from the contemplation of a loveable object. It will not come and go at a bidding; but, like other emotions, must be drawn forth by the realized existence of qualities fitted to attract and win. And this is pre-eminently the glory and triumph of the gospel, that, without lowering in any respect the moral character of God, without abating one iota of his righteous claims, it at the same time exhibits such wondrous manifestations of his pity and yearning tenderness toward sinners, as leaves nothing to be desired further in the way of moral suasion to move and influence the heart to give its affections to him. Never at least did love disclose itself with such freeness, or come near to human bosoms with such a gift; and it is of all conceivable things most fitted to overcome the waywardness of the sinner's will, and engage him to love God with somewhat of the same love with which he has been loved of him.

Nor, finally, is this manifestation of God's character of love in Christ less fitted to tell upon the gracious and kindly affections generally. For it is in the nature of things impossible, that any one should embrace the truth of a redeeming God, and have his conscience touched by the high considerations it presents to his regard, without feeling constrained to love others, as he has himself been loved; to show mercy, and do good to them, as it has been done to him; to copy after, in short, and reflect God's character, as that appears in the face of Jesus Christ;—so that a full and perfect realization of the truth would of necessity carry along with it the perfection of the Christian life. Thus thoroughly in the Christian scheme do the doctrines tally with the precepts, and the reception of the one disposes the heart to the observance of the other.

(3.) We have still to mark another line of accordance in the revelations of the Bible with our state and experience; and in that an additional evidence of its strictly divine character, viz. its accordance with our circumstances in life. We can only glance at the leading characteristics of these, which differ immensely with different individuals, and yet have in all some common points of agreement. They are always, for example, more or less fraught with temptation, and as such, fitted to force on Christian minds a sense of their own weakness, and their need of a higher power to guide and sustain them. We say especially Christian minds—for as it is these alone which have become properly alive to the evil and the good in the world, so it is they alone that are fully conscious of the strength of temptation, and their own inability to meet it aright. But no one, who does become alive to this, can fail to perceive how thoroughly the revelation of God in the gospel contemplates and provides for it—more especially in the encouragement it holds out to believing prayer, and the assurances it gives of the aid of the Holy Spirit. Without disparaging human means, or throwing the least discouragement in the way of personal exertion—but on the contrary demanding these—it yet presents God to us in the aspect of a gracious Father, knowing the difficulties with which his children have in this respect to contend with, and stooping in infinite mercy to listen to their petitions for help, and to give to them such supplies of his Spirit as they may require. In this, the revelation of God proves itself to be from one who knows our frame, and adapts himself to our circumstances. Again, these circumstances are always in some degree, and often to a very great degree, connected with trouble and distress. A religion which did not take this into account, and provide peculiar grounds of consolation for it, could not be thoroughly adapted to the present state of the believer. But so much is it provided for in Scripture, that it is impossible for any one to take even a cursory glance into its contents, without perceiving that it has especial respect to this feature in our condition. It is never known, however, how very much there is of a tender and consolatory character in the Word of God, till circumstances of distress actually come into men's experience. Then alone does the infinite fulness and variety of consolation that is treasured up there open out to their minds—and there is no sentiment in it that is more frequently and more thoroughly responded to by tried believers, than that of the psalmist, when he says, "This word of thine is my comfort in my affliction."

We shall notice only another feature in the circumstances of believers on earth, to which the revelation of God in New Testament scripture particularly is adapted—and that is, their manifold and ever-changing variety, which requires to be met by the enforcement of great principles, rather than by the multiplication of specific rules of action and duty. Religions that take the latter direction, can be fitted only for a limited range and a contracted interest—as was the case to some extent even with the religion of the Old Testament, in which, from the constraint of circumstances, it was found necessary, till the predicted time of reformation, to hedge round the church with a multitude of specific bonds and regulations. This peculiarity rendered the form of religion prescribed in the books of the Old Testament unfit for the observance of men in all times and places; and yet there were great principles also there, underlying all that was merely outward and ceremonial, which gave it an immense superiority over the ritual, caste-religions in other parts of Asia; nay, which enabled a devout Jew, wherever his lot might be cast, to rise in spiritual thought and moral excellence far beyond all the religionists of ancient times. But when the period arrived for the "dispensation of the fulness of times," and the necessity no longer existed for the trammels and limitations which the old covenant had imposed, then all took a higher direction; the religion of the Bible became distinguished for its comparative freedom from the special and the external, and for the predominance it gives to vital truths and principles of action. It undoubtedly exhibits, even in regard to outward behaviour, the great landmarks of duty; so that no sincere inquirer need be at loss as to the kind of actions in which his faith should discover its sincerity; but it rarely descends into details, and is no more in this respect the book of the Asiatic than of the European, of the prince than of the peasant, of the philosopher than of the ploughman. Its field is the world. "Other codes and other constitutions have been framed for the separate countries of the world, and they tell the wisdom of their respective but earthly legislators; but this in its characters alike of goodness and of greatness, and withal of boundless application, obviously announces itself as the code of humanity; and bespeaks the comprehensive wisdom of Him who, devising for all times and for all people, is the legislator of the species. It is not the workmanship of a few peasants in Judea. The perfection of its moral characteristics speaks to us of a different fountain-head, and decisively points us to the celestial origin whence it must have sprung" (Chalmers' Evidences, ii. p. 50).

Such are some of the leading characteristics of the Bible, as a revelation from God, which are, at the same time, evidences of its divine character and its heavenly origin. They could not have belonged to it in any form, without telling powerfully upon the hearts and consciences of those to whom it came. But they have all become mightily enhanced and incalculably heightened in their moral influence by being associated, as they are, in the later portions of the Bible, with the person and the work of the Lord Jesus Christ, in whom every attribute of excellence found its perfect development, and through whom men have at once the call and the possibility placed before them of being made like him in whatever is great and good. From the time of his appearance in the world, it is no longer the simple teaching of the Bible that we have to mark, as to the higher elements of truth and duty, but the wonderful attractions of a person, who combines in his mysterious being heaven and earth, the sympathies of a man with the infinite resources of Godhead; and who by what he has done for those that receive him, and what he has promised to do, has imparted a charm and a power, hitherto unknown, to all that is great and good in the Bible. Ideas in this respect have now become facts; the way into the holiest has been laid open for as many as are willing to enter it; and an infinitely powerful and loving Friend, who has already attained, beckons them to come, and assures them of everything needful to make good the object of their desire. It is on this account pre-eminently, that the Christianity unfolded in the Bible has formed a new era for the world; not merely, as having by the superiority of its teaching purified the moral atmosphere of the soul, and brought life and immortality to light, but also, and still more, as bringing men into fellowship, through Christ, with a living personality, that unspeakably ennobles their position, and creates in them at once the will and the power to be good. This is what above all besides makes it quick and powerful, in its moral effects upon the soul, and has rendered it in time past, and must ever render it still, the peculiar instrument of the world's regeneration. (See also INSPIRATION).

BIER. See BURIAL.

BIL/DAD [son of contention—disputant], one of the three friends mentioned in Job ii. 11, as coming to comfort him, but who in fact added to his grief. Three chapters, viii. xviii. and xxv., are filled with his addresses, which occupy a middle place in violence of attack between those of Eliphaz and those of Zophar. Bildad is called the Shuhite, which is commonly interpreted to mean the descendant of Shuah, one of the sons of Abraham and Keturah, Ge. xxv. 2.

BILEAM, a town in Western Manasseh, 1 Ch. vi. 70; apparently the same as IBLEAM.

BIL/HAH, the handmaid whom Laban gave to Rachel on occasion of her marriage to Jacob. When Rachel had no children she persuaded Jacob to take Bilhah as his concubine, and she bore him two sons, Dan and Naphtali, Ge. xxx. 3-8. Her misconduct afterwards was a source of terrible grief to Jacob, Ge. xxxv. 23; xlix. 4.

BIRD. The most comprehensive Hebrew term for a bird is oph, which means "one that flies." It is used in the narrative of creation, Ge. i. 11. for the feathered race generally, as also in the account of the stocking of the ark of Noah, Ge. vi. viii. In Ge. xl. 19, De. xxviii. 26, 1 Sa. xvii. 44, 46, Je. vii. 33, and other places, the word is used for birds of prey. In Ge. viii. 20, Le. i. 14, De. xiv. 20, Ps. lxxviii. 27, &c., the connexion shows that species ceremonially clean are meant. In Le. xi. 20-23, and De. xiv. 19, the same term is used to indicate winged insects. It is manifest, therefore, that the governing idea etymologically indicated in the word was maintained in its use; and that, though principally applied to birds, because these are the most conspicuous "fliers," yet the term was comprehensive enough to embrace everything that hath a wing.

The ravenous birds seem to have appropriated to them the generic appellation ay, ait, which is perhaps the origin of the Greek deròs, eagle. The use of this term is very limited in Scripture, but it is scattered from Genesis and Job to Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Its radical idea is that of pouncing on prey.

The word tz'phar (with its Chaldee form tz'phar), is commonly used for small birds, considered clean by the law; such as were caught for the beauty of their plumage, for their song, or for the table. It has also a more restricted sense, indicating a species which is rendered (and doubtless correctly) sparrow. (See SPARROW.) The word is evidently an imitation of the note "taip" of the house sparrow, which, being the most abundant bird in Palestine, as it is with us, would be likely to become the representative of a race, and thus the specific term gradually became generic.

The numerous allusions to the capture of birds show that fowling was pursued among the Israelites with avidity, as it was among the ancient Egyptians. The numerous paintings preserved in the tombs of the latter people, illustrating almost every state of society and every occupation pursued by the people, afford [117.] Circular Bird-trap.—Rosellini.

In this as well as the next illustration the traps appear as if in a vertical position, although doubtless they are intended to represent traps lying on the ground.

copious representations of fowling, which will doubtless serve just as truly to portray Hebrew as Egyptian modes and implements.

The net, gin, and snare, worked by means of cords, are repeatedly spoken of, as apt images both of the temptations of Satan to which men in general are subject, and of the insidious designs of evil men, by which they endeavour to bring mischief on their innocent neighbours. See Ps. xci. 3; xxxiv. 7; cxi. 5; Je. v. 28; Am. iii. 5, &c. For the capture of birds, "the trap was generally made of net-work strained over a frame. It consisted of two semicircular sides or flaps, of equal sizes, one or both moving on the common bar, or axis, upon which they rested. When the trap was set, the two flaps were kept open by means of strings, probably of catgut, which, the moment the bait that stood in the centre of the bar was touched, slipped aside, and allowed the two flaps to collapse, and thus secured the bird.

"Another kind, which was square, appears to have closed in the same manner; but its construction was different, the framework running across the centre, and not, as in the others, round the edges of the trap" (Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt. iii. 36).

A clap-net is frequently represented, not very dissimilar to those in use among bird-catchers at present, but larger. "It consisted of two sides, or frames, over which the net-work was strained; at one end was a short rope, which they fastened to a bush, or a cluster of reeds; and at the other was one of considerable length, which, as soon as the birds were seen feeding in the area within the net, was pulled by the fowlers, causing the instantaneous collapse of the two sides" (Ibid. iii. 45).

This larger net is often depicted as spread on the surface of a reedy pool, probably in a space cleared for the purpose; the men who worked it being concealed from view among the tall water-plants, while a man was stationed at another place, whence he could watch the net; and when the wild fowl were assembled, he gave the signal to pull the collapsing rope, and secure the booty. The watchman is occasionally represented making a sign of silence, while the birds are approaching.

The sudden and unexpected arrest of a bird by means of a "snare," is used by the Lord Jesus to set forth with vivid power the awful suddenness with which his second coming shall overtake the world sleeping in its carnal security, Luk. xxi. 35. As the thoughtless bird runs pecking hither and thither, unsuspecting of the spring that lies among the grass, in a moment the fatal noose is round its throat, and all is over with it. "So shall it be when the Son of man is revealed!"

In Egypt fowl of larger bulk and higher sapidity than the small birds of the field were much sought after; we refer to the numerous kinds of water-fowl that abounded on the Nile. The banks of the Jordan were, it is true, less suitable as a resort for the natorial birds than the reedy margins of the Egyptian river; but the expanse of the lakes of Galilee were of old, as now, frequented by many kinds, whose juicy and well-flavoured flesh would present too strong a temptation to human appetite to be overlooked; especially as the law enforced no prohibition against them, while in Egypt they constituted (the geese in particular) a very large and important part of the food of the people.

Elliot describes the Lake of Tiberias as "covered with wild-ducks" when he was there. And Kitto, who quotes this expression (Pict. Hist. of Palest. ii. ccciv.) enumerates many kinds of duck, wigeon, and teal, beside the swan and goose, as abundant in the waters of Syria and the Holy Land.

The capture of such birds as these is a favourite subject of the Egyptian paintings. One of these specimens of very ancient art, now in the British Museum, affords the original of the accompanying engraving.

The fowler was usually attended by some female members of his family, who do not, however, appear to have aided his operations. Embarking on board a boat, with a few decoy-birds, and a trained cat, they proceeded to such parts of the river as were fringed with dense masses of the tall papyrus reed. Water-fowl of various species swarmed in these rushy covers; and, by the number of nests with eggs and young usually represented, we are doubtless to infer that the possession of this sort of stock was no less desired than that of the birds themselves. The cat, strange as it appears, was certainly taught to seize upon the birds; in the picture before us, she has just caught one in her mouth, while (with a skill somewhat incredible) she holds another with her two fore paws, and a third between her hind paws. It is probable, also, that the repugnance of this animal to wet her feet having been overcome by training, she was accustomed to fetch such birds as fell into the water.

But the sportsman depended for his chief success on a short staff of heavy wood, having a double curve, which he threw at the birds. From some of the paintings it appears that he discharged several of these missiles in rapid succession, as the flocks arose, and from the action of a youth in one, who holds a stick to the principal, it may have been the office of his attendants to keep him supplied with weapons as he discharged them, without loss of time.

The infatuation of a young man who is seduced into sin by the fair speech of a strange woman, is compared by the royal preacher to the folly of a bird that "hasteth to the snare, and knoweth not that it is for his life," Pr. vii. 23. And the fatal result of such folly is represented by the "dart striking through the liver" of the hunted victim, a figure which brings before us another mode of obtaining the game, viz. by shooting.

Here the Assyrian monuments supply the illustration which is lacking in those of Egypt; for in the palace of Khorsabad there is a series of slabs, to which further reference may be made (see HUNTING), representing the Assyrian monarch taking his pastime in a paradise or great hunting-ground. Some of the attendants are shooting with arrows the birds which are depicted numerous enough in the forest. Many of these are shown in flight, some on trees, others running on the ground. We can recognize some of the kinds intended. One, from its curved beak, and from its action—running up the perpendicular trunk of a tree—is probably some large species of cuckoo; another still larger, several times repeated, with the two central feathers of the tail much longer than the rest, appears to be the pheasant, as it is evidently an object of desire to the sportsmen; and we know that the mountain forests of Armenia were the native region of this fine bird. Partridges and quails may also be identified in this interesting picture.

The injunction by the Mosaic law, in the case of finding a bird's nest, that the dam was to be let go, when the eggs or young were taken, De. xxii. 6, was a striking proof of God's care for sparrows, Mat. x. 29, and was well calculated to teach the people mercy and tenderness, and regard for other than their own selfish gratifications.

[P. H. G.]

BIRD-CAGES are twice mentioned in Scripture, Je. v. 27; Ro. xviii. 2; but there is no other reference to birds being kept for pleasure in the house, unless "playing with a bird" be understood of this, Job xii. 5. Perhaps the explanation of this silence, which could scarcely be looked for if birds were as commonly kept in cages as they are with us, may be found in the much greater abundance of singing-birds with us. And the passage in Jeremiah ought probably to be understood of a cage or loop with birds in it, for the purpose of enticing and entrapping other birds.

BIRTH. God adjudged a special penalty to woman at the fall, namely, the pains and dangers of child-birth, Ge. iii. 16, to which frequent reference is made in Scripture, as an emblem of the sharpest or most sudden suffering. The apostle Paul appears to refer to this, in connection with other marks of inferiority which God has been pleased to lay upon woman in memory of Eve's part in the ruin of our world; while at the same time he adds, that in respect of spiritual privileges and hopes of salvation, she is in no way behind her partner man according to the blessed offers of the gospel, but rather is in the direct way towards enjoying them, when she meekly bears what has been assigned to her, 1 Ti. ii. 11-15. These pains and dangers, however, vary under the influence of different climates and different states of society. They suffer considerable mitigation among the half-civilized and the hard-working; and God brought this law of nature into operation, though probably he aided it by a special and miraculous blessing, during the persecution of his people in the land of Egypt, Ex. i. 15-19. By the Mosaic law a woman was declared to be unclean for forty days in the case of the birth of a male child, and twice as long if it were a female; after which the mother must bring for her cleansing a sin-offering and a burnt-offering, Le. xii.; as is reported to have been done by the mother of our Lord, Lu. ii. 24. As soon as a child was born, it was washed, rubbed with salt, and wrapped in swaddling-bands, Eze. xvi. 4, which last custom was long widely spread through the world, as it still is in the East; and it is said not to have been abandoned in our own country until the last century.

Vol. I.

Birth is the commencement of life in the world: and hence the "new birth," and being "born again," are common expressions in Scripture for that great change which is wrought by the Spirit of God when men become partakers of life eternal in Christ Jesus.

BIRTH-DAYS have been celebrated as times of rejoicing and feasting in most countries, Ge. xl. 20; Job i. 4, &c.; Mat. xiv. 6. This last, the case of Herod, is the only one which could be called an instance among the Jews, and even it (if the expression is to be understood literally, and not as the day of his accession to the throne, which is the explanation of some writers) may be regarded, like many other things which the Herods did, as a copy of the customs of their Roman masters and other heathen neighbours. Certainly we are told that the later Hebrews looked on the celebration of birth-days as a part of idolatrous worship, a view which would be abundantly confirmed by what they saw of the common observances associated with these days. Yet the language of Jeremiah, taken in connection with that of Job, does furnish some ground for thinking that birth-days in general were joyfully remembered, Job iii. 3, &c.; Je. xx. 14, &c.

BIRTHRIGHT is anything to which one is entitled in virtue of his birth. The word, however, came to be applied specially to the rights of the first-born. In a patriarchal state of society, this would give him authority over the tribe to which he belonged, as in later times we read of the kingdom naturally descending in this way, 1 Ki. ii. 15; 2 Ch. xxi. 3. There is no clear evidence of the eldest son being the priest of the family, but not a little against it, except in so far as prince and priest might be one and the same person, as it would frequently be till the law of Moses instituted a special priesthood for Israel in the family of Aaron. The first-born enjoyed a double portion of his father's property, of which the law of Moses forbade the father to deprive him by mere caprice, De. xxi. 16-17. But it is not clear that this law would have prevented the first-born from losing it by his own criminal conduct, as happened under the patriarchs, 1 Ch. v. 1, 2. Still less, of course, could it prevent a first-born son from renouncing his right, as Esau sold his, Ge. xxv. 31-34. Since this birthright in the family of Abraham brought the highest spiritual blessings along with it, Esau's sale of his for a mess of pottage was an act of reckless sensuality which stamped him as a profane person, He. xii. 16. The first-born being the first-fruits of the harvest of men, so to speak, God repeatedly dealt with them as representatives of the entire number. In this way we read of the destruction of the first-born of Egypt and the saving of the first-born of Israel, owing to which the first-born were taken to be holy to the Lord, Ex. xiii. 29, though afterwards he directed that they should be redeemed, while he took the tribe of Levi instead of them, Nu. iii. 12, &c.; viii. 14, &c. But in the same way the whole people of Israel were God's first-born among the nations, Ex. iv. 22, as the spiritual Israel or church of God at all times must be, He. xii. 23; Ja. i. 18. The ground or reason of this is to be sought for in the fact that the real Israel, with all the privileges and consecration of the first-born, is the man Christ Jesus, who is at the same time the only-begotten Son of God, the Heir of all things, and the first-born among many brethren, Jn. i. 18; He. i. 4; Ro. viii. 29.

BISHOP. The opinions of the theologians have differed from very remote times as to the proper organization and government of the Christian church: and one of the leading questions which has ever and anon come up for discussion relates to the office of a bishop. Does Scripture teach that there ought to be an official order in the church, distinct from and superior to the ordinary ministers of the Word, having the right to ordain and preside over the pastors of congregations? This question is answered in the affirmative by a large proportion of Episcopalians, those who uphold as divine the office of bishop in its modern sense as including the superintendence of a diocese: and by some of them it is urged so strenuously, that they believe there is no church-state, no rightful ministry, no authoritative preaching of the Word or administration of the sacraments, where such bishops do not exist. Presbyterians and Congregationalists or Independents, together with not a few who belong to the Episcopal Protestant churches, answer the question in the negative. This is not the place to discuss such a question; but it may be permitted to mention the form which the controversy has now in general assumed. After the very thorough examination which has been made of all the materials in existence for forming a decided opinion, the advocates of the divine right of Episcopacy, in the sense here explained, do now in general agree with its impugnors so far, that the scriptural use of the word bishop is not that use which is contended for. One class of Episcopalians rest very much on the general consent of the church after the age of the apostles; and the other class, who find evidence in favour of diocesan bishops within Scripture itself, for the most part do so on account of what is said in the commencement of the book of Revelation as to the angels of the churches, or they identify Timothy and Titus with modern bishops, or they look on bishops now as the successors of the apostles. But the bishops mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles and in the Epistles are not distinguishable from the elders. A bishop means an overseer, as it is translated Acts xx. 28; and this title is given to those who in ver. 17 were called the elders of the church, elder being the translation of the Greek title presbyter. ["The English Bible has hardly dealt fairly in this case with the sacred text, in rendering ἐπισκόπους overseers; whereas it ought there, as in all other places, to have been bishops, that the fact of bishops and elders having been originally and apostolically synonymous might be apparent to the ordinary English reader, which now it is not."—Alford.] And by these names the office-bearers who taught and ruled the congregations are called; overseers, on account of the work they had to do, He. xiii. 7, 17, 24; 1 Th. v. 12, 13; 1 Pe. v. 1, 2; and elders, on account of their age, or the gravity and fully formed, consistent character to which they had attained. They are also called pastors or shepherds, on account of their charge of the flock of God, as declared in many of these passages, Ep. iv. 11. Bishops and elders are not mentioned together, but only the one or the other, Ac. xiv. 23; Phi. i. 1. And in stating the qualifications for office in the church, Paul passes at once from bishops to deacons, 1 Ti. iii.; Tit. i. In these passages, besides the personal qualifications, there are some mentioned which relate to the family; such as ruling their own households rightly; being the husband of one wife, that is, probably, not stained with an evil reputation in consequence of polygamy and divorce; and having faithful or believing children. As the bishop was the marked man in the church, and the church was marked in the eye of the world, and had, especially at that time when the gospel was first preached, the work assigned to it of restoring the foundations of society which had been destroyed by false religion, such requirements were justly held as essential as those on which, in modern times, attention is more especially directed. (See ELDER.) [G. C. M. D.]

BITHRON. See BETHER.

BITHYN'IA, a province of Asia Minor, the nearest part to Europe, being directly opposite to Constantinople, and stretching thence eastward along the shore of the Black Sea. There is considerable difficulty in fixing the boundaries of Bithynia, and fortunately it is of no importance for the illustration of the New Testament, especially as it does not name even one of the towns of this province in which churches must have been gathered, and in which we learn from church history that they became famous. Probably these boundaries varied considerably at different times. Strabo (xii. p. 668), makes them to be, on the east the Paphlagonians, Mariandyni, and some tribes of the Epicteti; on the north, the line of coast of the Euxine, extending from the mouth of the Sangarius to the straits at Byzantium and Chalcedon; on the west, the Propontis; and on the south, Mysia and Phrygia Epictetus, otherwise called Hellespontiaca Phrygia. A pretty full and easily accessible discussion of the subject may be found in Smith's Dictionary of Greek and Roman Geography, where it is affirmed that our maps usually make the country too limited: at the same time it is said, that to fix precisely a southern boundary seems impossible. In like manner, Bithynia is often used as including at least a considerable portion of the country of Pontus on the east, which had been an entirely distinct kingdom, but which came only by degrees into the power of the Romans, the last king resigning his dominion to Nero, A.D. 63, from which time Pontus appears by name in the list of Roman provinces. But, earlier than Nero's time, it is probable that local usage at least had assigned an independent place to Pontus, which is named in the list of countries from which people had come up on the day of Pentecost, Ac. ii. 9, while Bithynia is passed over in silence. In the inscription of the first epistle of Peter, Pontus is placed at the beginning, and Bithynia at the end of the list of countries.

The people were reckoned uncivilized by some of their polished neighbours. The Word of God, however, appears to have struck root early and deep among them; for, though Paul was once forbidden by the Spirit to preach among them, Ac. xvi. 7, yet the first epistle of Peter is addressed to the strangers, that is, God's pilgrims, 1 Pe. i. 1, in Bithynia and the neighbouring countries. And we know that, within a generation after the death of most of the apostles, the heathen governor of the country, Pliny the younger, wrote a letter, which is still preserved, to his master the emperor Trajan, announcing how wonderfully Christianity had spread there, so that the idolatrous temples were deserted, and the sacrifices were abandoned by multitudes; in consequence of which, countenance was given to a cruel persecution, with the view of forcing them back to heathenism.

BITTER is used in Scripture as an emblem of sorrow or suffering in any way, Ru. i. 20, &c. We read in Am. viii. 10, of a bitter day; in Hab. i. 6, of the Chaldeans as a bitter and hasty nation; in Ac. viii. 23, of Simon at Samaria being still in the gall of bitterness,

&c. The Israelites were required to eat the passover with bitter herbs, Ex. xii. 8; a very natural appointment, as they remembered the bitterness of their bondage, Ex. i. 14, and connected this bondage and their escape from it with sin, which was its source, and the free grace of God who had delivered them, by which they were called to deep humiliation and earnest repentance. What these bitter herbs in particular were, it is now impossible to say; if, indeed, the truth be not that none in particular were intended, but that any might be taken according to convenience.

BITTERN (קַפּוֹד) kippod. Whether this word signifies a beast or a bird has been much disputed. It occurs but three times, and in all under circumstances closely similar, viz. as an accompaniment of utter desolation. Thus in Is. xiv. 23, in the magnificent dirge upon the king of Babylon, the Lord declares that he will make that proud and populous city "a possession for the kippod, and pools of water." Again, in Is. xxxiv. 11, where in connection with the names of Idumea and Bozrah, a state of terrible judgment and desolation is described, as introductory to the restoration and blessing of ransomed Israel, ch. xxxv., the picture of the desolation is heightened by the presence of the kippod:—"the cormorant and the kippod shall possess it." And once more, in Zep. ii. 14, the destruction of Nineveh, then in the height of her glory, is predicted in the following terms: "Jehovah will make Nineveh a desolation and dry like a wilderness. And flocks shall lie down in the midst of her, all the beasts of the nations; both the cormorant and the kippod shall lodge in the upper lintels [among the fallen cornices] of it: their voice shall sing [cry] through the windows; desolation shall be in the thresholds, when he hath uncovered the cedar-work.

The general meaning of this imagery is clear, whether we can identify the particular species or not; which point is therefore interesting chiefly in a critical view. Col. Hamilton Smith labours to establish the common English rendering, identifying the kippod with the common bittern (Botaurus stellaris), which is doubtless an inhabitant of the regions indicated, and is a shy and lonely bird, with a solemn startling voice. But the proper haunt of these Ardeæ is water; reedy, rushy pools and shallow streams are indispensable to them, both as affording them food, and a convenient shelter for their nests. The ruins of Babylon do indeed stand in a plain, which is studded with pools and marshes, and here the bittern doubtless finds a congenial home. But even here its presence can scarcely be considered as indicative of desolation, while the ruins of Nineveh have no water but the Tigris; and though the Ardeæ may certainly be looked for there, they cannot be considered as characteristic of one part of the river's course more than another; they were probably as common along the rushy margin of the river when the queenly city stood as now. The arid precincts of Bozrah and other Idumean cities, however, totally destitute of water, absolutely preclude the resort of the bittern thither, and therefore compel us to look for some other identification of the kippod.

The philologists have almost unanimously referred the word to a hedgehog or porcupine. The Septuagint render it in all the passages by ἐχίνος; and the common name of the porcupine throughout Syria is kau-phod, which is etymologically the same as קַפּוֹד.

The porcupine (Hystrix cristata) answers every requirement of the appellation. It is abundant throughout Palestine, Syria, and the Euphrates valley. It is a nocturnal animal, and therefore fit to associate with the "doleful creatures" which are the companions of the kippod. It habitually conceals itself in dark and lonely places, and, as a matter of fact, is found in the ruins of Idumea and of Babylon. Mr. Rich expressly says in his attempts to explore the burned mounds of ancient Babylon, which are full of passages and galleries, "I found quantities of porcupine quills." And in the visit of the Scottish deputation to Palestine, it is recorded that "Dr. Keith tried to ascertain from [the Bedouin chief] the fact of porcupines being found in Petra; he asked him what the kangfud was, when the Bedouin immediately imitated the cry it uttered; and on being shown a porcupine quill, at once recognized it as belonging to the kangfud." This wild and sudden cry of the porcupine forms another feature in the identification with the doleful creature whose voice was to sound from the sculptured windows. [P. H. O.]

BLACK is often used in Scripture to denote mourning, though there is no evidence that the Jews actually wore mourning clothes of a black colour, as we are accustomed to do. In Mal. iii. 14, we read the question of the hypocrites, "What profit is it that we have walked mournfully (literally, as in the margin, in black) before the Lord?" There seems to have been an impression among the people that excessive hunger and thirst changed the colour to blackness. See especially La. iv. 8; v. 10. But the words in these two passages refer more distinctly to the colour of black, than does the indeterminate word in Malachi.

BLAINS is a word used in the description of the sixth plague which was sent on the Egyptians, when Moses scattered the furnace ashes in the air, and thus produced a boil breaking forth with blains upon man and upon beast, Ex. ix. 9, 10. It is impossible to identify it with any of our diseases by this general description. But it must have been some sort of eruption on the skin, perhaps so severe as to become an ulcerated sore.

BLASPHEMY is a term derived from the Greek language, in which it means evil-speaking, reviling, and the like; and it is accordingly so rendered in our version, as in Jude 9, "a railing accusation," literally "an accusation of blasphemy," or "a blasphemous accusation." Sometimes, perhaps, the word blasphemy has been retained by our translators, when the general meaning, "evil-speaking," or "calumny," might have been preferable, as in Col. iii. 8, "Put off all these; anger, wrath, malice, blasphemy, filthy communication, out of your mouth." For in the special sense imposed on the word in the Bible, and in which alone we use it in English, blasphemy is confined to calumny or wilful evil-speaking against God, in his being, personal attributes, word, or works. And there are two great forms which blasphemy assumes. Either, first, we may attribute some evil to God, or (which is the same in substance) take away some good which we ought to attribute to him, as in grossly profane use of his name, Le. xxiv. 11, &c.; Ro. ii. 24. Or else, secondly, we may give the attributes of God to a creature, robbing God of that which we know we are wrongfully giving to another; and this is the form of blasphemy which the Jews pretended to charge upon our Lord Jesus Christ, Lu. v. 21; Mat. xxvi. 65; Jn. x. 36. The Jewish punishment of blasphemy was stoning to death, Le. xxiv. 14, 23; compare Ac. vi. 11-13; and vii. 57-60.

Blasphemy against the Holy Ghost was a sin of which our Lord pronounced those Jews guilty, who saw his blessed miracles of love and mercy, as he cast out the unclean spirits by whom men were possessed, and yet shut their minds against all conviction, and endeavoured to ruin his character among those whom they could influence, by alleging that he cast out devils by the prince of the devils. There was to be noticed, in those who committed this sin, a resolute opposition, in the most obnoxious form, to the convincing work of the Holy Spirit; since they not only resisted the amazing evidence with which he pressed on their attention the divine claims of the Redeemer, but also maliciously and senselessly attributed to Satan the working of the good and gracious Spirit of God; and there was not only the deliberate searing of their own consciences, so that no impression could henceforth be made on them, but there was the desperate determination to involve others in their own intentional perversion of the truth of God in a matter which directly and immediately related to salvation. Hence our Lord declared their sin to be unpardonable, Mat. xii. 31, &c.; Mar. iii. 28, &c. It is plain enough that no one now can commit the precise sin which these eye-witnesses of his miracles committed—the same formal act can no longer be repeated, as the actual circumstances that occasioned it no longer occur. Yet it were rash to assert, with some, that men are incapable of committing this sin now; for this were to assume that change of outward circumstances made an essential difference. Rather we may believe that the awful warning has been set down at length with the view of furnishing a necessary caution to the end of time. There may be manifestations of the Spirit in which he testifies to the Lord Jesus as strikingly as by these miracles; and surely there may be the same malicious resistance to the Spirit in one's own heart, coupled with the same profligate attempt to involve others in that guilt. There is much plausibility, therefore, in the view of those who reckon that this sin is spoken of in He. vi. 4-6; x. 29; and in 1 Jn. v. 16. But granting that this is so, we need not wonder that a mystery overhangs the whole of this fearful subject. No one, perhaps, is in circumstances to know exactly what this sin is, who has not committed it; while he who has committed it is given over to a reprobate mind, so as never to have any qualms of conscience on account of it, nor any desire to bestow consideration upon it. [G. C. M. D.]

BLASTUS, the chamberlain of King Herod Agrippa. The people of Tyre and Sidon secured his good offices, when they aimed at a reconciliation with the king; for it was natural that such officers should have great influence with their masters, Ac. xii. 20.

BLEMISHES, spots, or stains, were personal defects which marked out certain members of the priestly family as unfit for drawing near to minister at the altar of God, though he kindly reserved to them all their worldly immunities and privileges; and again, similar defects which marked out individuals among the animals usually offered in sacrifice as being unfit to be offered, Le. xxi. 18-24; xxii. 20-25. According to the nature of the institutions of worship in the Old Testament, these bodily defects were symbols of spiritual blemishes, from which Christ, our great High-priest and atoning sacrifice, and all his people as priests and sacrifices in a subordinate sense, are free, 1 Pe. i. 19; Ep. v. 27; Ro. xii. 1.

BLESSING is used in Scripture, as in common language, in various senses. Most strictly and properly, perhaps, God is said to bless men, Ge. i. 28, xxii. 17; in the one case unfallen man, in the other case men fallen, but to be recovered by the covenant of grace. Answering to this, men are said to bless God, when they acknowledge his having blessed them, and praise him for it, Ps. ciii. Further, men bless their fellowmen, when they pray God to bestow his blessing. When this is done with authority, according to God's known will, "the less is blessed of the better," He. vii. 7; and that blessing which God instructs his servants in any case to pronounce, he will charge himself actually to bestow. Thus it was the standing duty and privilege of the priests of the family of Aaron to bless the people of Israel in the name of the Lord, De. x. 8, the special form of blessing being set down at length in Nu. vi. 22-27. Partly following the example of Noah, Ge. ix. 26, 27, the aged or dying patriarchs Isaac and Jacob were also directed by the Spirit of prophecy to pronounce very remarkable blessings upon their children, Ge. xxvii. xlviii. xlix. This last passage, the parting words of Jacob to his sons, marking out their character and their history in their persons and in their descendants, not simply as men, but as the heads of God's covenant-people, and with reference to his promises of the coming Saviour and his salvation for which they were to wait, may be compared with the blessing which Moses, ere he died, was guided to pronounce upon the people, as they were on the point of entering the Land of Promise, De. xxxiii.

BLESSING, THE CUP OF, a name applied to the cup in the Lord's supper, 1 Co. x. 16, as it would seem, on account of the same name having been given by the Jews to the cup of wine used in the supper of the passover.

BLESSING, VALLEY OF. See BERACHAH.

BLINDING. See PUNISHMENTS.

BLINDNESS is a defect painfully known to mankind in all quarters of the globe. It is however awfully common in Egypt at the present day, and probably may have been so for ages. In the Bible we read of it as not merely a common failing in extreme old age, as seems to have happened in the instances of Isaac, Jacob, and the prophet Ahijah, but also as a somewhat prevalent disease, if we may conjecture from the prominent place which cures of blindness occupy in the miracles of Jesus. To some extent this may have been arranged on account of the striking spiritual instruction which such cures were calculated to convey, see Jn. ix. For blindness is a natural and common emblem of spiritual darkness; and, in fact, bodily blindness was sometimes inflicted by miracle as a punishment in itself, and a means of bringing home to a sinner the conviction of his helpless and miserable condition when he should fall into the hands of the God with whom we have to do, Ge. xix. 11; 2KI. vi. 18; Ac. ix. 8, 9; xiii. 11. As in other similar cases, the law of God to Israel required them to deal tenderly with those on whom his hand was laid in the way of such a heavy infliction as this, Le. xix. 14; De. xxvii. 18. Blindness was also inflicted as a punishment, Ju. xvi. 21; 2KI. xxv. 7; comp. 1Sa. xi. 2.

BLOOD was forbidden to be eaten by the people of God during the dispensation of the Old Testament, this rule having been given to Noah at the time when animal food was first permitted to man, Ge. ix. 4, and the prohibition being very often repeated in the laws of Moses. There can be no reasonable doubt that this was on account of the blood being specially offered to God in sacrifice. The same reason in some measure applied to the fat; so that in one passage the fat and the blood are forbidden together, Le. xiii. 17. But the meaning of this is more fully to be explained under the article SACRIFICE. It is enough to say that the life is in the blood, as is often declared by Moses, and that the life of the sacrifice was taken and the blood offered to God, as a representative of the offerer, and a substitute for him, Le. xvii. 11; in which verse the last clause literally translated makes this truth plainer, "The life of the flesh is in the blood; and I have given it to you upon the altar to make an atonement for your souls; for it is the blood that maketh an atonement by means of the soul." Now that animal sacrifices have been abolished by the one sacrifice of Christ, it is the prevalent opinion of Christians that blood may be eaten as well as any other article of diet. In holding this view, it is of course necessary to hold also that the decree of the council at Jerusalem which forbade the eating of blood, Ac. xv. was a temporary arrangement, rendered expedient by the then existing relations of Jewish and Gentile Christians.

BLOOD, AVENGER OF. In the countries around Palestine the practice prevails, and always has prevailed, so far as we know, of leaving the punishment of manslaughter or murder (for the two are not clearly distinguished) to the nearest relation of the deceased, who is called in Scripture the avenger of blood. Traces of its existence occur in the remotest times of the patriarchs, Ge. ix. 5, 6; xxvii. 41, 45; comp. 2Sa. xiv. 7. A better system of jurisprudence takes this, as well as lighter punishments, out of the hands of private parties altogether, and places it in the hands of the magistrate. As a mitigation of the evil, the feuds, and passionateness, and loss of precious life, in many cases a money-payment has been more or less recommended or enforced; and it was allowed to the Arabs by their false prophet Mahomet. Something of the same practice of blood-revenge, and the same permission of compensation, is found in the ancient Icelandic sagas; and resemblances, more or less close, appear in the laws of very many primitive nations. In the political law of Israel, God permitted the practice of punishment by the nearest relative to continue, while rules were laid down to prevent the chief abuses incident to it. The distinction was sharply drawn between murder and manslaughter. For the former no ransom or satisfaction was permitted. In the case of the latter, however, there were six cities set apart out of the number which the Levites occupied, placed at suitable distances over the extent of the land, three on each side of Jordan, with roads leading to them which were well kept up, and these were cities of refuge to which the man-slayer might flee, and within which he should dwell safely without fear of the avenger. But he was not permitted to return to his own place; in fact, he had no safety if he left his place of refuge, until the death of the high-priest during whose term of office his misfortune had occurred, Nu. xxxv. 10, &c.; De. xix. 1-13.

Some readers of the Bible have expressed amazement at the incorporation of this law of blood-revenge into the law of God to Israel, no matter under what restrictions. But the manner in which a punishment is inflicted, is one of those arrangements of subordinate importance which may vary greatly with the varying circumstances of those among whom the law is established. There is an extremely favourable testimony borne to the working of even the Arab law by two most competent witnesses, Burckhardt and Layard. The latter writes (Discoveries in the Ruins of Nineveh and Babylon, p. 305, 306):—"Although a law, rendering a man responsible for blood shed by any one related to him within the fifth degree, may appear to members of a civilized community one of extraordinary rigour, and involving almost manifest injustice, it must nevertheless be admitted, that no power vested in any one individual, and no punishment however severe, could tend more to the maintenance of order and the prevention of bloodshed amongst the wild tribes of the desert. As Burckhardt has justly remarked, 'This salutary institution has contributed, in a greater degree than any other circumstance, to prevent the warlike tribes of Arabia from exterminating one another.'" If the effects of this social arrangement have been so happy, we cannot doubt that the wisdom of God was fully justified in imposing it, in a modified and amended form (and not, perhaps, without a typical import in the connection between the death of the high-priest and the return of the man-slayer from the city of refuge), on a people of the same race, feelings, and habits as the Arabs, and living in close proximity to the great Arabian desert, into which the murderer might generally have escaped before the magistrate could apprehend him, after the delays which are inseparable from forms of justice.

BLOODY SWEAT. See AGONY.

BOANERGES [sons of thunder, but not pure Hebrew, some vernacular Aramaic form], a name which our Lord applied to James and John, the sons of Zebedee, whom he chose to be apostles; the meaning of the title being added by the evangelist, Mar. iii. 17. There is no explanation of the reason of this surname. Perhaps it referred to a fiery impetuosity in their natural dispositions, Le. ix. 49, 54. This may seem very unlike what we should have anticipated in the disciple whom Jesus loved. But the tenderness which marked his later character may have been the effect of special grace, as he and his brother had ventured, in a peculiar manner, to offer themselves to be baptized with the baptism with which their Lord was baptized, Mar. x. 38, 39.

BOAR, SOW, SWINE (חזיר, chazir; ūs, hys, χοίρος, choiros). The scriptural allusions to this well-known animal are far less numerous than might have been expected, from its common occurrence in Palestine and the neighbouring countries, as well as from its having become to Jewish minds the impersonation of that which is unclean and abominable. Its flesh was indeed forbidden to be eaten by the law of Moses, Le. xi. 7; De. xiv. 8; but so was the flesh of the camel, and of other animals, which never appear to have been regarded with such abhorrence as the swine. In the horrible cruelties perpetrated by Antiochus upon the Jews, 2 Mac. vi. vii., the eating of swine's flesh was the test of apostasy; and in accordance with this odious eminence, some of the closing denunciations of the prophet Isaiah, Ia. lxx. 4; lxxi. 17, are levelled at those profane Israelites "who ate swine's flesh, and broth of abominable things was in their vessels." Among the modern Jews the habit of considering this kind of meat as polluted, has induced a revulsion which is in nowise subject to the will; so that individuals converted to Christianity, and perfectly aware that the divine prohibition had ceased, have struggled earnestly but vainly to overcome their antipathy to it, though sincerely desirous of conforming to the customs of their Christian brethren.

In the time of the Lord Jesus, covetousness had so far effected a compromise with duty, that Israelites could keep large herds of the abominable animal whose flesh they dared not touch. A herd of above two thousand is mentioned in the sacred narrative as fed on the eastern borders of the Sea of Galilee. It is supposed that the Gadarenes might salve their consciences by the remembrance that, though they could not eat pork, the Gentiles could and did, and Gentile money would not defile their pockets. The Lord marked his abhorrence of the custom, however, both by his judicial destruction of the whole herd in this instance, Mat. viii. 32; and by introducing, into his beautiful parable of the prodigal son, the image of the young man being sent into the fields to feed swine, Lu. xv. 15, as the lowest point of degradation and misery to a Jew, though the scene was laid in "a far country."

The whole story of the Gergesenes is significant; as in so many other of the incidents which the Holy Ghost has seen good to record, there is solemn spiritual instruction hidden beneath the surface. The lord of the vineyard, the heir of the inheritance, comes to visit his portion, and he finds it occupied by demons and swine; the brute and the devil are rioting in what he had set apart for himself as "a delightful land." The unclean beasts rush from his presence into the sea; the unclean spirits are driven into the abyss; but Israel have no heart for the deliverance: they prefer their devils and their swine to the Holy One of God; they intreat him to depart out of their coasts; and as he does not go quickly enough, they kill him, and cast him out. What a picture of man—man under the most favourable circumstances—man under the immediate government of God!

The sordid habits of the swine, at least in a state of domestication, its filthy and indiscriminate feeding, and its irreclaimable fondness for wallowing in the mire, 2 Pe. ii. 22, are fit emblems of that proclivity to sin which marks the corrupt nature of man; and perhaps contributed, by association of ideas, to beget that feeling of abhorrence to the animal, to which we have above alluded. No jewellery could make a swine's face comely, as the absence of virtue makes female beauty itself hateful, Pr. xi. 22.

The brutish insensibility of the swine to everything but their own foul appetites, is employed by the Lord Jesus, Mat. vii. 6, to represent gross and sensual persons on whom the kindly offices of brotherly reproof would be thrown away; and the presentation of the more refined and deeper enjoyments of heavenly and divine things, might subject the speaker to vile abuse and spiteful persecution.

The predatory habits of the wild swine are alluded to in that beautiful allegory, Pa. lxxx. 13, in which Israel is depicted under the symbol of a choice vine, transplanted and tended by Jehovah's care, but now exposed to the brutal assaults of the heathen, who, like a wild boar in a vineyard, trampled it under foot and laid it waste.

That such are the habits of the wild boar, we have abundant testimonies from travellers. The wooded region that surrounds the sources of the Jordan, the shaggy slopes of Tabor and Carmel, and the bushy thickets that border the persistent river-courses, still shelter numerous wild swine, which continually make their predatory forays into the cultivated fields and vineyards, to the great loss of the agriculturists. Mr. Hartley has recorded an incident strikingly in unison with the above allusion. His friend, the Rev. Mr. Leeves, was proceeding in the dusk of the evening from Constantinople to Therapia. Passing a vineyard, he observed an animal of large size rushing forth from among the vines, crossing the road, and taking to flight with great precipitation. "The Greek syrogee, who was riding first, exclaimed, 'Γοπόμ! Γοπόμ!'—'Wild boar! Wild boar!'—and really it proved a wild boar, who was retreating from the vineyards to the wood. 'What has the wild boar to do in the vineyard?' inquired Mr. Leeves. 'Oh!' said the syrogee, 'tis the custom of wild boars to frequent the vineyards, and to devour the grapes.' And it is astonishing what havoc a wild boar is capable of effecting during a single night. What with eating, and what with trampling under foot, he will destroy a vast quantity of grapes" (Researches in Greece, p. 234). [P. H. G.]

BOAZ, OR BO'OZ [lively or agile]. 1. The name of a man who occupies a prominent position in the book of Ruth. He married Ruth, in virtue of his being the nearest relative of her deceased husband who was willing to take on himself the responsibilities and duties imposed on such by the law of Moses, De. xxv. 6. There are circumstances in his conduct which appear somewhat strange to us; but they are easily explained from the simplicity of early manners, and also from customs still prevalent in the East. Yet no one can read the book in an unprejudiced spirit, without the impression that this was a pure and high-minded man, one that feared the Lord, and aimed at fulfilling his obligations to his fellowmen in the kindest spirit. Boaz and Ruth were ancestors of David, and so of Jesus Christ.

2. BOAZ was also the name of one of the two pillars erected at the porch of Solomon's temple, 1 Ki. vii. 21. The meaning of this name is often stated to be, as in the margin of the Bible, "In it is strength," but this explanation is at the best extremely doubtful.

BOCHIM [weepers] was the name given to a place which is otherwise unknown to us, where the children of Israel wept before the Lord and sacrificed to him, when they had been rebuked for their sinful conformity to the heathen, Ju. ii. 1-5. The first verse cannot be translated correctly otherwise than thus, "And the Angel of the Lord (not an angel, as in our version) came up from Gilgal to Bochim, and said, I have made you to go up out of Egypt," &c. We must, therefore, understand it of a miraculous and easily observable movement of the uncreated Angel of the Covenant, the same who had gone before the people in the pillar of cloud, and who now moved up to this place of solemn repentance from Gilgal, where the congregation may have met in memory of the early days of God's presence, while Joshua lived, and when the covenant was first publicly ratified in the Land of Promise, De. xi. 29, 30; Jos. v. 9, 10.

BOHAN [the Thumb], a son of Reuben, in honour of whom a stone was named, that is twice mentioned as a land-mark in tracing the boundary between the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, Jos. xv. 6; xviii. 17. Nothing is known either of the person or of the place.

BOOK. The substances used for books and for writing upon are treated of under WRITING. There are, however, some expressions in Scripture which may suitably be noticed at present.

To eat a book, as some of the prophets were commanded to do, Eze. ii. 8; iii. 2; Re. x. 9, can only mean, as a symbol, to master the contents of the book; as it is explained, Ja. xv. 16.

A sealed book is one closed up from view; for seals were often put on articles to keep them secret, in cases in which it would have been our custom to make them safe under lock and key, Ia. xlii. 11. If such a book were written within and on the backside, Re. v. 1 (which is easily intelligible, if we remember that ancient books were generally rolls of paper), a writing of this sort would not be legible till the seals were broken; and yet portions, at least fragments of it, might be read, so as to awaken curiosity. And such is pre-eminently the case with God's book of history, stretching forward into all time.

THE BOOK OF THE LIVING, Pa. lxi. 23, or THE BOOK OF LIFE, Phi. iv. 3, which two expressions are the same in Hebrew, appears at first sight to represent all living men as written down in a book before God, out of which they are struck or blotted when they die, Ex. xxxii. 32. But the more that men considered what it was to be "written among the living in Jerusalem," and for "the Lord to count, when he writeth up the people, that this man was born there," Ia. iv. 3; Pa. lxxvii. 6, the more they would understand that his book, in the strict sense, the list of his own people, is one in which no blotting out is possible, so that all who are written in it shall never be touched by the second death. This is "the Lamb's book of life," Re. iii. 3; xx. 15; xxi. 27. The figure of speech is reckoned by some to refer immediately to a roll of citizens, by others to the muster-roll of an army.

BOOTHES are huts made of branches of trees, or such other very perishable materials. In places of this sort Jacob and his family seem to have dwelt as they came from Padan-aram into Canaan; for "booths" is the translation of the Hebrew word Sucoth, Ge. xxiiv. 17. In a place of the same sort, the people, or at least their leaders, may have dwelt when they came out of Egypt, Ex. xiii. 22. In memory of this, their dwelling in booths (including, no doubt, their dwelling in tents in the wilderness, since both were habitations of the same slight and easily moveable kind), the children of Israel were required to dwell in booths every year during the feast of tabernacles, or of booths, as the word might have been rendered, with greater attention to uniformity, Le. xxiii. 39-43; comp. Ne. viii. 14-18.

BOOTY. See SPOIL.

BORROW. It is extremely unfortunate that this word should have been used by our translators in the account of the Israelites receiving the riches of Egypt, when they were on the point of leaving the country for ever, Ex. iii. 22; xii. 35, 36. In this mistranslation they have certainly followed the example of many who went before them, as they have been defended by eminent scholars down to the present day; but there is no ground whatever for thinking that the verb in the original has in itself any meaning besides that of simple asking. The latter of these two passages should therefore run us: "And the children of Israel did according to the word of Moses, and they asked of the Egyptians jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment. And the Lord gave the people favour in the sight of the Egyptians, so that they made them ask" such things as they required, or perhaps, "urged them to ask: and they spoiled the Egyptians." The Egyptians had lost their power of oppressing the Israelites; in fact, were afraid that they were changing places with them: they were anxious therefore that the Israelites should be gone, and to hasten their departure, they pressed them to ask, and to take anything, however precious, which they might desire. This agrees with the prophetic description of Moses, Ex. xl. 8, and with the language of Pa. cv. 37, 38. All the more the Israelites might make heavy demands when they remembered their past sufferings, and when they proposed to adorn themselves for going out to hold their feast to the Lord. But it is an unfounded and unreasonable assumption that the Egyptians could possibly imagine that the transaction was a borrowing; and the defences which have been offered for the conduct of the Israelites, on the supposition that it was so, are not satisfactory.

BOSOM. The intimacy and love which we also express by this word, as when we speak of bosom friends, was well known to the ancients, and is found in the language of Scripture. In fact, the expression was literally a description of the nearest friend, who at a feast, when they reclined on couches, actually lay in the bosom of another, Ja. xiii. 23. Thus the beggar Lazarus, in our Lord's discourse, was carried at his death, by angels, into Abraham's bosom, that is, to a high place at the feast with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of God. Thus, too, the only-begotten Son is said to be in the bosom of the Father, Ja. i. 18. Again, as the Good Shepherd, he is himself represented carrying the lambs in his bosom, Ia. xl. 11.

BOSSES. The out-standing parts of a shield, and thus the thickest and strongest. Yet against these do the enemies of God rush, madly and powerlessly, Job xv. 26.

BOTTLES. The most common words in the Old and New Testaments, which we render "bottles," are literally nothing else than "skins." The skins of animals, oxen, sheep, and goats, the last most frequently among the Arabs, are still in common use in Asia for carrying water, wine, and other liquids; the openings at the feet and at the neck being closed up entirely, or so as to be used for pouring out the contents. Such skin bottles have many advantages, and especially for carriage on the backs of both men and animals when travelling through districts where water is scarce.

They would wear done, however, immeasurably sooner than glass bottles—as in the case of the bottles of the Gibeonites, which had grown old, and rent, and had been bound up during their journey, as they pretended, bottle hung up in the smoke would, of course, become black and shrivelled, Ps. cxix. 83. It is a mistake, however, to suppose that the Jews had nothing else than these skin-bottles. Bottles of glass, and porcelain, and earthen-ware, of all shapes, from the simplest to the most ornamental, many of them beautiful in form, are found in abundance in the monuments of Egypt, and of a date probably as far back as the time of Moses: and we have no reason to doubt that the art of making these was carried with them by the Israelites. There are frequent indications of their having such bottles, and at a very early period of their history. Jeremiah expressly mentions the potters' earthen bottles, and the dashing of them to pieces, Je. xix. 1-10; xiii. 12-14.

BOW, BOWING, as an attitude indicative of reverence or respect, appears to have been in use from the earliest times. We read of Abraham, when transacting with the Canaanite chiefs for the purchase of a burying-ground, rising up, and "bowing himself to the people of the land," Ge. xxiii. 7. Reference is made to the custom once and again in the history of Abraham's immediate descendants; and when Jacob, on the occasion of meeting with his brother Esau, wished to show peculiar deference and regard, he is even said to have bowed himself to the ground seven times, Ge. xxxiii. 3. Bowing of this sort—bowing to the ground—is such a bending of the body as brings the upper part into nearly right angles with the lower, and is to this day very frequently practised in the East. There, indeed, both in earlier and later times, such marks of obeisance have often been carried much further—not to profound bowing merely, but to absolute prostration, or falling on one's face to the ground. This practice also is noticed in Scripture, though most commonly in connection with strictly religious homage, Ge. xvii. 3; 1. 18; Le. ix. 24, &c. The more common attitude, even for the expression of such homage, was bowing; and hence to "bow the knee to Jehovah," or to Baal, became a familiar mode of expressing the doing of worship and service to them, Joa. xxiii. 7, 16; 1 Ki. xix. 18; Is. xiv. 23, &c.

BOW. The BOW IN THE CLOUD, or Rainbow, is an object so striking to even the most careless and unimaginative, that we cannot wonder at the fables of poets, and the use which has been made of it in heathen mythology. In Scripture itself this bow is introduced as the sign of the covenant which God made with Noah, on occasion of accepting the sacrifice which the patriarch offered after he came out in safety from the ark, Ge. ix. 13-17. As often as it appeared, it was to be a pledge that God would no more send a universal deluge to destroy the race of man: as, in fact, the very nature of the rainbow implies that the rain is only partial, that there is sunshine as well as shower. It has been sometimes alleged that this passage assumes that a rainbow had never been seen before. But such an allegation is not warranted by parallel passages in Scripture, from which we learn that objects in nature, or practices in use among men already, were taken out of the sphere of ordinary natural life, and elevated to a higher platform, when God set them apart to his own service as tokens of one or other of his covenants: and this is all that is asserted in regard to the rainbow. This "appearance of the bow that is in the cloud in the day of rain" was witnessed by Ezekiel, ch. i. 28, in his vision of the glory which surrounded the Lord when sitting on his throne of glory; and again, it appears in the visions of the book of Revelations, ch. iv. 3; x. 1. In all these cases, there need be no question that the rainbow is the sign or seal of the covenant of grace, the token of that covenant in which God remembers mercy in the midst of wrath, and spares his chosen remnant at the very time of taking vengeance on his enemies. In this way Peter has connected the salvation of Noah by the flood with another token of the covenant of grace, 1 Pe. iii. 20, 21. [G. C. M. D.]

BOWELS. These are spoken of in the Bible as the seat of the feelings, especially mercy and compassion, Ge. xliii. 30; Phi. ii. 1; much as the heart is reckoned among us.

BOWL. Several words in Hebrew are rendered by this term in the English Bible, and no doubt with substantial correctness; though minor differences in the structure of the respective vessels indicated are necessarily lost sight of. But no means exist for obtaining any direct information respecting these; and as the Hebrews were not a manufacturing people, the probability is, that the vessels commonly in use of that description would exhibit no great variety, and would be much of the same sort as existed among the nations around them. Specimens of these are given in the annexed cut (No. 126) from the remains of Egypt and Assyria. It will be observed, not only that they are nearly all ornamented with sculpture, but that two of them (nos. 3, 4) have also inscriptions written on the inner surface. This appears to have been a practice peculiar to Assyria; and what is curious (though no reference is made to it in Scripture) the inscriptions on some of the bowls discovered are written in characters not unlike the Hebrew, and supposed to express certain amulets or charms in the Chaldean language. The difficulty connected with the deciphering of the characters is aggravated by the extreme faintness in many places of the ink in which they have been written. But an attempt has, notwithstanding, been made by Mr. Ellis of the British Museum to render them into English. He admits it to be in great part conjectural; but both he and Mr. Layard are of opinion, that there can be little doubt of the Jewish origin of the inscribed bowls, and that they may reasonably be supposed to have belonged to the descendants of those Jews who were carried captive by Nebuchadnezzar to Babylon (Layard's Nineveh and Babylon, p. 509-526). As matters stand at present, it is the form only of the bowls, and the fact that they sometimes contained inscriptions inside, of which any certain account can be made.

VOL. I.

BOX TREE. Describing the Tyrian navy Ezekiel says:—"Of oaks of Bashan they made thy oars, thy plank-work (deck) they made ivory (i.e. they inlaid with ivory), with boxes from the isle of Cyprus," ch. xvii. 6—Fairbairn's translation. And in predicting the church's final prosperity, Isaiah says:—"The glory of Lebanon shall come unto thee, the fir tree, the pine tree, and the box together, to beautify the place of my sanctuary," ch. lx. 13. The original word (בֹּשֶׂת, teashur) has usually been rendered "box tree," and there is no good reason against it; although some have fancied that the passage, Is. xli. 19, requires a loftier and more imposing tree. Any one, however, who has seen the beauty imparted to a chalky ridge, like Boxhill in Surrey, by a profusion of this pretty evergreen, will allow that it might be an appropriate and welcome ornament to the desert.

The box tree (Buxus sempervirens), belonging to the order Euphorbiaceæ, occurs throughout Europe and Asia, from 37° to 52° N. lat., usually on mountains, and as an undergrowth amongst other trees. In Britain we are most familiar with it as a lowly but compact edging around garden paths; but when allowed to grow untrimmed, it will attain a height of five and twenty feet. Its tolerance of the knife has made it the favourite material for "verdant sculpture;" and that fashion of carving trees into fantastic shapes, which we usually ascribe to the early Dutch gardeners, is as old as the days of Pliny, for his Tusculan villa was adorned with animals cut out of box in rows answering to one another. The yellow wood is remarkably hard and solid, being the only European timber which will sink in water.—(Loudon's Trees and Shrubs.) It takes a very fine polish, and was formerly much used in cabinet-making. In the town of St. Claude, in France, they still manufacture, both from the roots and branches of the box, vast quantities of snuff-boxes, buttons, rosary-beads, and spoons; but the great modern demand is for wood-engraving. To the wood-engraver box is what ivory is to the miniature painter. For this purpose the specimens occurring in northern latitudes are usually too small; but large supplies are yearly imported from Turkey and the shores of the Black Sea.

No wood could be more suitable for in-laying, the purpose to which it is ascribed by Ezekiel. It cuts beautifully, and, when properly seasoned, is not ready to warp. Hence it is the material most commonly used for carpenters' rules, the scales of thermometers, and mathematical instruments, where precision and fineness of notation are indispensable. [J. H.]

BOZRAH [inclosure, sheepfold], one of the principal towns in the territory of Edom. It appears in the earliest list we have of the Edomite race and their local settlements, Ge. xxxvi. 33, where Jobab, the successor of Bela as king of Edom, is styled "Jobab of Bozrah." From the connection, there can be no reasonable doubt that this place lay somewhere in the proper Edomite territory, between the south of Canaan and the Red Sea. The references to it in the prophecies of Isaiah and Amos, Is. xxxiv. 8; lxiii. 1; Am. i. 12, convey the same impression; they point to it as a chief city of Edom, at a time when the possessions of that tribe are known to have been usually confined to the well-known mountain range of Idumæa. An allusion in Micah, ch. ii. 12, simply by way of comparison, "as the flocks of Bozrah," indicates nothing as to the locality; and it is even doubtful whether the word should be taken as a proper name, whether we should not render, "as flocks of the fold." The only other passage in Scripture in which the name occurs is Je. xviii. 24; and there it is classed with Kerioth, Bethmeon, and other cities of Moab, far or near, on which the judgment of Heaven was going to fall. It is supposed by some (among others, by Robinson, Researches, ii. p. 671) that this was the same city with that referred to in the other passages, as in those turbulent and warring times, particular districts and towns often passed from one hand to another. This may certainly be regarded as possible, though one can scarcely say altogether probable; and it is, upon the whole, more natural to imagine, that, within the proper territory of Moab, there was some place of the name of Bozrah, though in itself of little note, and hence not elsewhere mentioned. This is by no means unlikely, as the word is one that, in pastoral countries, would naturally be deemed an appropriate designation for several places.

That the Bozrah, in all the other passages of Scripture, was a strictly Edomitic town both in locality and population, and not (as Porter, Kitto, and some others, have held) the Bostra of the Greeks and Romans, far off in the Hadran, at the distance of 80 or 100 miles from the proper country of Edom, is the opinion of by much the greatest number of biblical interpreters and geographers. A city so closely identified with Edom as Bozrah is in Scripture, and manifestly regarded as one of its centres of power and influence, could never have been a place remote from the ordinary possessions of the tribe, and at the most held in some occasional periods of military conquest. History knows nothing even of such; nor is there any evidence that the Bostra in question was ever noticed in Scripture. The Edomite Bozrah, with which alone we have to do, was identified by Burckhardt with Busseirah, or Busairch, a village about 2½ hours south of Tüfileh, situated on a hill, with a small castle on the top, and containing nearly fifty houses. This is most probably the representative of the old city and fortress, though nothing remains of the ancient strength and greatness. It lies about half way between Petra and the Dead Sea, and in its present state is a place of no interest. Centuries of desolation have passed over it, as over most other towns in the region.

BRACELETS. In all countries of the world there prevails the practice of wearing ornaments on the wrist, to which we familiarly give the name of bracelets. But owing to the lavish use of these in the lands of the Bible, as testified by travellers to this day in Syria, Egypt, and Persia, it has become usual to employ an additional name, armlet; partly because these are worn in such numbers that they run up the arm, so as to occupy the greater part of the space between the wrist and the elbow, and partly because it has been suggested that armlet might be restricted to designate the ornament worn by men, and especially by princes or other men of rank, as one of the marks of their high position. There are five Hebrew words, which are all occasionally translated bracelet in our version. Two of these may be at once set aside, ḥethil, Ge. xxviii. 18, 28, which is elsewhere rendered lace, thread, ribband, and here means the guard of Judah's signet or other ornaments; and ḥahh, Ex. xxv. 22, commonly rendered a hook, and here probably a brooch or ornamental pin. Of the other three, ḥerak, sherak, is used only once, in the plural, Is. iii. 19; etymologically it means a chain, or something wreathed; and bracelets of this kind of work are common in the East, though it is unsafe to press such an argument. The other two words are ḥerak.

tsamid, and ḥerak, ets'adah, which are more difficult to distinguish. The former, signifying by its etymology anything that is bound together, and closely connected with the word for "a yoke," is used in Nu. xxxi. 50 with nothing to identify it, but elsewhere always in the plural, and with the addition "upon the hands," Ge. xxiv. 22, 30, 47; Ex. xvi. 11; xxiii. 42; we have therefore enough to satisfy us that it is a bracelet. The remaining word, ets'adah, occurring in 2 Sa. i. 10: "I took . . . the bracelet that was on his arm," is obviously one of the insignia of royalty found on the body of Saul, and is what we have already called an armlet. In the only other passage in which it occurs, Nu. xxxi. 50, and where it is rendered "chain," on account of tsamid, "bracelet," which immediately follows, it is still rendered armlet by Kitto, and he takes it to be the ornament of the men, as the following word he takes to be that of the women.

But the etymology of ets'adah connects it immediately with the verb to step, and therefore it might with great propriety be rendered by another word, which acquaintance with eastern habits has brought into use among us, an anklet. Were it not that the above-mentioned text relating to king Saul makes it manifest that it sometimes meant an armlet, there would be no reason to hesitate about calling it an anklet. For in addition to the argument from etymology, there is another from the existence of an additional word, differing from it only in the pronunciation of a helping vowel, ta'adah, Is. iii. 20, rightly translated in English, with the authority of ancient versions and tradition, "ornaments of the legs." And this is confirmed by the use of yet one word more, 'ekes, Is. iii. 18, properly a fetter, but there quite correctly rendered "tinkling ornaments about their feet." An anklet is certainly an ornament of which we do not readily think much: but it is commonly worn, and much admired in Syria and Egypt, and more or less in India. It is shown on the Egyptian sculptures as worn by both men and women; and it was reckoned of so much importance by Mahomet, that in the Koran he forbade women to use it. [G. C. M. D.]

BRAMBLE. To English readers the word bramble at once suggests the trailing bush so plentiful in almost every hedge, whose "black-berries" have stained so many "little lips" besides those of the babes in the old ballad, and whose curved prickles inflict on rapacious fingers so severe a penalty. But the common bramble (Rubus fruticosus) is a northern plant. The atad (אֲתָד) of the Bible is more probably a species of the rhamnaceous order—a plant of which Dioscorides gives as a synonym dradmu (Harris's Natural History of the Bible), and which greatly surpasses its British ally, the Rhamnus catharticus, or buckthorn, in the profusion of its stiff and trenchant thorns projecting from its flexible and drooping branches. The plant in question, the Paliurus aculeatus of Lamouroux, or Rhamnus paliurus of Linnæus, is a deciduous bush or lowly tree, abundant in Palestine. It also grows freely in Italy, where it is used for making fences; but for this, owing to its propensity to spread and encroach, it is not so well adapted as our own beautiful hawthorn or May. However, with its jagged branches and its stunted stature, no tree could be more fitting for the preposterous and consequential speaker in Jotham's parable, Ju. ix. 8-15. This is the oldest fable in existence, and it is interesting to note that the dramatis personæ belong to the vegetable kingdom.

The "bramble-bush" of Lu. vi. 44 (Sáros), is evidently some lowly thorny shrub, by its habit or stature suggesting the vine. Very possibly it is the same plant which has acquired a solemn interest from the circumstance that it is generally recognized as that which furnished the materials for the crown of thorns, Mat. xxvii. 29. The plant to which we allude is closely allied to the paliurus above described—viz. the Zizyphus spina Christi of Willdenow, named Rhamnus spina Christi by Linnæus, and Rhamnus Nabêca by Forskal. This shrubby plant grows to the height of six feet or more, and yields a slightly acid fruit, about the size of the sloe, which is eaten by the Egyptians and Arabs. Like its cognate, paliurus, it abounds in flexible twigs, which are armed with a profusion of sharp, strong prickles, growing in pairs, the one straight, the other somewhat recurved. [J. H.]

BRANCH. Since it is common to speak of a family as a tree, the members of that family are its branches; a manner of speaking which is found in our own language as well as in that of the Bible. Naturally we find it used especially of distinguished families, who are compared to lofty trees, as the royal family of David is to the cedar of Lebanon, Eze. xvii. So Christ, the Son of David, is named a Branch and a Rod from the stem and root of David, and of David's obscure father Jesse, as he grew up out of the dry ground when the royal family was reduced to a very low condition, Is. xl. 1; lili. 2. And this name, the Branch, came to be a special title of the promised Saviour, Je. xxiii. 5; Zec. iii. 8; vi. 12. An abominable branch, again, Is. xiv. 19, has been explained to be a branch on which a malefactor had been hanged, and which is alleged to have been buried along with him. Putting the branch to the nose, Eze. viii. 17, must be some idolatrous ceremony, but it is not certainly known what.

BRASS. This word is used by us to denote a mixed metal, composed of copper and zinc, which does not seem to have been known till the thirteenth century. At any rate nehosheth, which is translated in the Bible "brass," must have been a natural metal, dug out of the earth, De. viii. 8; and generally it is supposed to have been copper. However, it is scarcely necessary to alter the common rendering, especially when we consider that it has been usual in all ages to mix up copper with other metals, for greater convenience in working, and for superior qualities which it thus acquires. One of these mixed metals connected with copper is bronze, and this was extensively employed in ancient times, and it may be strictly the metal intended in many parts of Scripture. Brass is a common emblem of strength, Ps. cvii. 10; Je. i. 18; Mi. iv. 13, as indeed arms and armour were often made of this metal, as we make them of steel. By a new application of the figure, brass is used for stubbornness, and perhaps impudence, Is. xlviii. 4; Je. vi. 28. (See further under COPPER.)

BRAZEN SERPENT. (See SERPENT, BRAZEN.)

BREAD. In the Bible bread is taken in a pretty wide sense, as including all that supports life; as in the petition, "Give us this day our daily bread." But in strictness it denotes baked food, and especially loaves. In general these must have been thinner and crisper than our loaves, more like many cakes or biscuits, as indeed frequent mention is made of wafers, which are the thinnest cakes that can be baked: and owing to this peculiarity, we read habitually, not of cutting bread, but of breaking bread. The material used might be any kind of meal or flour; but practically we may reckon that it was chiefly wheat flour or barley meal, this purpose by the wandering Arabs: others believe that they were bowls of wood, but not large, intended only to hold the bread which one family used during a single day. From the account of the meat-offerings, that is, offerings not of animals, given in the second chapter of Leviticus, Dr. Kitto thinks that he traces three different styles of baking in use among the Israelites, which are in use among the Arabs to this day. According to ver. 4, there was the meat-offering baked in the oven, of stone, or metal, or earthenware; this includes both cakes of an ordinary thickness, baked inside, and also wafers of dough, dropped in thin layers on the outside. According to ver. 5, there was the meat-offering baked in a pan, or as the margin renders it, on a flat plate or slice, and then broken in pieces; this pan or plate being a sheet of metal laid over the fire, on which their cakes might be baked, as oat cakes still are baked among the peasantry of Scotland. And according to ver. 7, there was the meat-offering baked in the frying-pan, which might naturally be understood to be not a kind of bread at all, rather something of the nature of a pudding, but which Kitto supposes to be bread baked upon the hearth-stone, or on a plate

BRICKS. The earliest bricks on record, those used in building the city and tower of Babel, were of clay burned in the fire. "Let us make brick, and burn them thoroughly. And they had brick for stone, and slime had they for mortar," Ge. xi. 3. Brick kilns are mentioned, 2 Sa. xii. 31; Je. xliii. 9; Na. iii. 14. Inscribed or painted bricks or tiles are also mentioned in Eze. iv. 1.

In ancient Egypt the bricks were invariably crude or unbaked; and Wilkinson observes, that when kiln-burned bricks are found, they are known to be of the Roman time. The crude bricks were made of a black loamy earth, which possessed little tenacity until mixed with straw, Ex. v. 7-18. They varied in forms and dimensions, some having been found of a wedge shape, to be used in the construction of arches. The most usual sizes are 16 inches long, 7 or 8 inches wide, and 5 or 6 inches thick. When used in the construction of walls they were laid on the flat side, but when in building arches they were laid edgewise. They are frequently found stamped on one side with hieroglyphics, some having an oval with the prenomen of the Pharaoh either in whose reign they were made, or perhaps signifying that they were to be used in the construction of some edifice belonging to that Pharaoh named in the oval. More bricks bearing the name of Thothmes III. (the Pharaoh who reigned a short time before the exodus) have been discovered than of any other period (Wilkinson). A large depôt of the bricks of Thothmes III. was found under the sand close to the river in a desert place, near the town of E'siut; and some thirty years ago several boat-loads were conveyed to the opposite shore and there burned, by order of Ibrahim Pasha, to be used in the construction of a dyke. There are bricks in the British Museum stamped with the names of Pharaohs Thothmes II. and IV; of Amunophth II. and III.; of Rameses II.; and of a priest of Amun Parenmfer; but none have been discovered bearing the name of any of the Ptolemies or of the Roman emperors. In the British Museum is an ancient stamp of wood, engraven with the name of Amunophth, that was used for the purpose of marking the bricks.

It is to be presumed that in Egypt bricks were used in the construction of the ordinary dwelling-houses, all of which have entirely disappeared. The only remaining examples of their use are in three pyramids, in the walls surrounding temples, in tombs, in certain arches in the vicinity of the Memnonium, and in some other constructions at Thebes. Among the most remarkable of these are the remains of a wall called Giar el Agôes, "the Old Man's Dyke," which extended from the sea to E'souan; some tombs at Dayr el Medeeneh, behind Goornet Murraee, of the time of Amunophth I., the vaulted roofs being lined with crude brick, where the friable nature of the rock urged the necessity of some such protection, proving the existence of the arch so early as 1540 B.C.; and some small brick pyramids, the central chambers of which have likewise vaulted roofs (Wilkinson's Thebes, p. 80, 128, 128, 356; also Ancient Egyptians, ii. p. 67, 98).

Brickmaking being esteemed by the ancient Egyptians an unhealthy and laborious occupation, Na. iii. 13, 14, was imposed upon captives and slaves. In a tomb at Goornet, or Gournon, that of the chief architect Rek- share, is a representation of some light-coloured people (bondsmen) employed in bringing water, digging clay with implements resembling hoes, kneading the clay, and pressing it into the brick mould, carrying the bricks, and piling them up for use. The labourers are urged on by taskmasters with their whips and goads, and the whole work is superintended by an officer seated apart. According to Dr. Lepsius and Mr. Osburn, this picture is of the time of Thothmes III., and there can hardly be a doubt that it represents a company of the oppressed Hebrews engaged as described in Exodus, ch. i. 11-14; v. 6-15, presenting the scenes most vividly before us.

In modern Egypt the art of brickmaking is almost forgotten, but the women are employed in working the clay and forming it into bricks (Yates' Egypt, i. 106, 215.) The word ibb, now used in Egypt for brick, is the same as the Coptic TCOBB, and the combination of hieroglyphics.

Among the Babylonians and Assyrians, both kiln-burned and sun-dried bricks were common. The burned bricks used in the great edifices of Babylon (see BABYLON) are generally about 12 inches square by $3\frac{1}{4}$ inches in thickness. They are usually stamped with cuneiform characters; some have rude figures of animals upon them; and tens of thousands, according to Sir H. Rawlinson, bear the name of Nebuchadnezzar. Vitrified bricks of different colours were common, and it has been conjectured that many of the principal structures were subjected to fire after they were built, so as to vitrify the entire surface. In building walls wattled reeds appear to have been laid between the courses of bricks, and the whole cemented together with hot asphalt (Herod. i. 179), or with clay mortar (Babylon Kaar.)

In Assyria, baked bricks being rarely used, no such masses of them exist as are found at Babylon, the chief portion of the ruins of Assyrian cities being composed of crude bricks reduced by age into a state only distinguishable from the soil by the regular and often different coloured lines perceptible on the sides of newly opened trenches. A tenacious clay, moistened and mixed with chopped straw, united the sun-dried bricks, reed and bitumen not being employed in Assyrian edifices as at Babylon to cement the layers of bricks, although bitumen was occasionally used to unite stones and even burned bricks (Layard's Discoveries at Nineveh.)

The bricks used in the buildings of Nineveh are of various dimensions, from 1 foot square and 4 or 5 inches thick, to 18 inches square and 3 inches thick. Radiated bricks have been discovered 9 inches deep, 13 inches outward width, and 10 inches inner or narrowest width (Ainsworth). When baked in the sun only, they were employed in the construction of the tels or mounds and walls; and when burned in the kiln, they were applied to the flooring of rooms and the paving of courts of the palaces. The crude bricks were frequently painted, and some have been found at Nimroud with remains of gilding (Layard). The Ninevites also made use of bricks painted with various colours and devices, and then vitrified. These covered that part of the walls of the royal residences above the alabaster slabs, as high as the ceiling of the chamber; but whether the bricks were made for the purpose, or whether the colouring and vitreous surface were added after the construction of the wall, may be a matter of conjecture. The crude bricks were not inscribed, but the burned bricks bore cuneiform characters. The inscriptions on the bricks of both Nineveh and Babylon are written sometimes with the instrument used for making the cuneiform character while the clay was yet soft, sometimes engraved after it was baked, but more generally the stamp was inserted in the mould of the brick, and not applied after the brick was made, as in the example of Egyptian bricks of the time of the Pharaohs.

It may not be inappropriate here to describe the leading features which distinguish the royal and sacred edifices of Assyria, and to offer a few conjectures respecting the mode of construction employed. The researches of Botta and Rich have proved that the great Assyrian palaces were invariably built upon artificial mounds, by which they were raised 30 or 40 feet above the level of the plain on which they stood; and that this pedestal or sub-basement was not a mere accumulation of loose earth incrustated with stone or bricks, but was a regularly constructed elevation, built of layers of sun-dried bricks solidly united with the same clay of which the bricks themselves were made. It further appears that this substructure was solid throughout, excepting where drains or water-pipes were inserted, or where subterranean channels, like the aqueducts found by Sir Robert Porter at Persepolis, existed (Travels, i. ii.): and that the mass of bricks forming the mound was incased round the sides with well-squared blocks of limestone. The whole of the upper surface of the mound, not occupied with buildings, was likewise protected by two layers of kiln-burned bricks or tiles, from 11 to $13\frac{1}{4}$ inches square by 5 inches deep, all inscribed on the under side, and cemented together with a coating of bitumen. The upper layer was separated from the lower by a stratum of sand 6 inches in thickness, so that if any moisture chanced to penetrate, it would most likely be dissipated in the sandy stratum, and thence be drained off before it could touch the second layer of tiles. The mode of ascending to the entrance was doubtless by inclined planes or stairs, resembling the existing example at Persepolis. The accompanying section (No. 137) will explain the structure of the walls, as well as our own notion of the construction of the roof or ceiling of the chambers. It would seem from an examination of the existing ruins, that the walls of crude bricks having been raised to the required height, they were cased with slabs of gypsum to the height of 10 feet, A; that from the top of the slabs to the top of the wall the crude bricks were cased with kiln-burned bricks or tiles B, the lowest course C, which rested immediately upon the slab, being provided with a kind of projecting brick moulding or ornament, which curved over and beyond the slabs, so as to form a continuous lock, to prevent their falling forward, the moulding being retained in its position by the weight of the courses above; and finally, that the baked tiles or bricks B were painted on the surface presented to the interior of the rooms, in various colours and patterns, including figures of men and animals. Thus far there is unequivocal evidence of the structure of the walls of the chambers, but beyond this we are dependent entirely upon speculation and analogies. Our own conjecture is, that the solid wall having been raised, the top was covered in with a course of burned bricks cemented with bitumen, upon which, as in the instance of the courts, there was a stratum of sand, and then another layer of kiln-burned bricks D, also cemented with bitumen. Upon this thick wall we suppose the surface bricks of the chamber B B to have been continued for some feet, occasional intervals being left for the admission of light and air, as exhibited in the centre part of the roof of the hall of columns at Karnak, and in other Egyptian temples. It is surmised that the beams of the roof E rested upon these dwarf walls, reaching across the entire width of the chambers, which at Khorsabad never exceeded 33 feet. The forests north of Nineveh would furnish abundance of large timber, even cedar, the approved wood for the purpose, 1 Kl. vi. 9, 10; vii. 2, 3. In the larger apartments there cannot be any difficulty in adopting a wooden column, for there are representations of columns on the sculptures, and Strabo tells us (xvi. 1. 6) that the Babylonians supported the roofs of their houses by pillars of wood. M. Place discovered at Khorsabad a roll of thin copper, which may have incased a wooden pillar, and close to it were some thin pieces of gold, which exactly fitted the ornament on the copper. The inference is, that the wooden columns were first incased in copper, and then plated with gold. "He overlaid the posts with fine gold," 2 Ch. iii. 7. "The gold fitted upon the carved work," 1 Kl. vi. 35. The beams having been placed upon the dwarf walls, the rafters were next laid over them in the contrary direction, and upon these again the planks of cedar, which, as well as the beams, might be ornamented with vermilion, Jc. xiii. 14, still a common combination with green, for the ornamentation of the ceilings in the best chambers of the houses in Cairo. Above the planks there was probably a course of burned bricks, cemented with bitumen, and then a layer of clay and earth, in the way the roofs of houses in Syria are now made, for Botta found among the rubbish in the interior of some of the chambers at Khorsabad the stone rollers resembling our garden rollers, and like those called mahadalel, used to this day to roll and harden the roofs of the Syrian houses after the winter rains. This implement being always kept on the roof then as now, it is supposed fell into the chamber with the rafters at the time of the conflagration which reduced the palace to a ruinous heap.

The top of the solid walls, between the dwarf piers, afforded ample space for shady passages and sleeping apartments during the hot months of the year, and at the same time gave every facility for regulating the shutters and other obvious contrivances for excluding the rays of the sun, and for preventing the snow or rain from drifting into the chambers below. No staircases or means of gaining the upper apartments have been discovered; but so much of the buildings have disappeared, that the absence of all indication of those important parts of the edifices is in no way remarkable, especially as we know from the Egyptian temples that the staircase up to the roof was frequently contained in the thickness of the wall. The proportion of the voids to the solid of the walls would remarkably favour the same mode of construction. As regard the courts, it is not improbable that wooden columns were used to support an awning, which was held down and fastened to marble rings inserted in the pavement, and to the rings on the backs of bronze lions, Ea. l. 5, 6. We are in ignorance as to the contrivance for the upper pivots for hanging the doors, whether they were inserted into a slab which stretched across the opening from jamb to jamb, or whether certain copper rings in the British Museum were not fixed into the walls above the slabs for the purpose of receiving the pivots. It will be seen that the foregoing restoration of the roof is in many respects analogous to ancient Egyptian temples, and to modern modes of construction in the East, and that it is assumed that the roofs were generally flat. There is, however, evidence in the illustrations upon the walls, that pitched roofs were likewise used in Assyrian buildings. In one the building is raised upon a sub-basement; and the roof is pitched, the pediment or gable end being presented to the spectator. The same illustration affords examples of flat roofs and of numerous windows.

BRIDE, BRIDEGROOM, BRIDE-CHAMBER.
See MARRIAGE.

BRIDLE. In the Bible this word is frequently used both in its proper, Pa. xxxii. 9; Pr. xvi. 3, and in its figurative sense, 2 Kl. xix. 28; 1a. xxx. 28; xxxvii. 29; Job xxx. 11; xli. 13; Pa. xxxix. 1; Ja. i. 28; iii. 2. The Assyrian sculptures, which throw so important a light on many passages of Scripture, contain representations of captives with bridles in the lips, presenting a common metaphor literally before us. In one subject (Botta, Plate 118) may be recognized the fate which befell Zedekiah king of Judah, as recorded in 2 Kings, and which would appear to have been no uncommon punishment for the crime of rebellion. In the centre stands the Assyrian king, before him are three persons, the foremost of whom is on his knees imploring mercy, and the two others are standing in a humble posture. The king is represented thrusting the point of his spear into one of the eyes of the supplicant, while he holds in his left hand the end of a cord which proceeds from rings that have been inserted into the lower lip of all three of the captives, who are likewise both manacled and fettered. In another scene three people clothed in sheepskins are kneeling in supplication before the king. The prisoners are all fettered, and have in the lower lip a ring, to which is attached a thin cord held by the king. In other examples of prisoners with rings in their lips, are some of short stature wearing short beards, tasselled caps, long tunics, and boots or hosen (Botta, Plate 83). These we conceive to be natives of Palestine, Jews, probably Samaritans. It is not a little remarkable that when Sennacherib, a successor of the founder of the palace of Khorsabad, invaded Judea, the prophetic message sent by Isaiah in reply to the prayer of Hezekiah, should contain the metaphor here embodied. (Is. xxxvii. 20; also 2 Ki. xix. 27; Bonomi, Nineveh and its Palaces, p. 194-8, 3d edit.) Herodotus relates that when Memphis was taken by Cambyses, he made the son of Psammenitus, the king of the Egyptians, with 2000 noble youths, march to execution "with halters about their necks and a bridle in their mouths" (iii. 14). [J. B.]

BRIER. See THORN.

BRIMSTONE. This well-known natural substance, known also by the name of sulphur, found in many places in large quantities, burns with a suffocating smell. It was a storm of fire and brimstone which destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah, Ge. xix. 24; and though plainly this was a miraculous judgment from the hand of the Lord, there is every reason to suppose that the judgment took this particular form in connection with the brimstone and bitumen which abound in the district. This judgment is constantly referred to as an example, pledge, and foretaste of the final and universal judgment of the ungodly. Hence the frequent mention of brimstone, chiefly if not entirely in a metaphorical sense, when reference is made to the punishment of the wicked, Job xviii. 15; Pa. xi. 6; Is. xxxiv. 9; Re. xix. 20, &c.

BROOK. A small river is the common meaning of this word. In our version of the Scriptures it answers chiefly to what we call a torrent (in Hebrew, nahal), which runs with strength in some seasons of the year, but during the summer months is often entirely dried up. Thus the word has come to express the torrent-bed, even though it be destitute of water. Unfortunately the same word in the original is at times rendered a river. So it has been in the case of the brook of Egypt, a small torrent to the south of Gaza, which was the border of the land of Canaan in the direction of Egypt, but which has been confounded with the river of Egypt, namely, the Nile, in consequence of this inexact translation in Nu. xxxiv. 5; Jos. xv. 4, 47

BROTHER. Besides the strict meaning of this word, the male child of the same parent or parents as another, it is used in looser senses, to which we have become accustomed from reading the Bible, if not from the natural variations of meaning in every language. Thus it takes in more distant relations, though pre-eminently cousins, or others nearly related, Ge. xiii. 8; Da. xxv. 5, 6. At other times it may be any of the same clan, tribe, or nation, Ex. xxxii. 27; Je. xxxiv. 9. It seems to be extended to all mankind, as being made of one blood, Ge. i. 26. In the New Testament, the plural especially is most frequently in use as a name for the disciples of Christ, who are all in Him the children of God and household of faith. Whether the brethren of Jesus, who are repeatedly mentioned in the gospels, were the children of His mother Mary, or more distant relatives, is a question presenting difficulties which have deterred many careful inquirers from pronouncing a decided opinion either way.

BUCKLER. See ARMS AND ARMOUR.

BUL [rain], the name of one of the Hebrew months, so called from the rains which usually fell at the period of the year to which it belonged. It was the eighth month, and usually included a part of our November and December. (See MONTH.)

BULL, BULLOCK. The Hebrew language, like our own and most others, had several terms by which the sexes, ages, and other conditions of domestic animals were distinguished. Neat cattle occupied a very prominent place among a people so eminently pastoral and agricultural as the Hebrews; and the selection of the species as one of the regular victims of the sacrificial altar, give it additional importance. The terms in most frequent use are בָּקָר, bakâr, and אֵילָן, shor (Chald. אֵילָן, tohr); the former of which appears in the Arabic al-bakar, and the latter, by a common change of s to t, in the tor, taur, taurus, &c., of the Indo-Germanic languages. These two words seem to have been used indiscriminately and interchangeably (see Ge. xxxii. 5, 7; Ex. xxii. 1; 1 Ki. i. 9, 10, &c.) for domestic cattle in a generic sense. The word אֵילָן (with a slight variation) par, is also extensively employed, especially in the directions for sacrifices; it appears specifically to mean a young bull, or one in the prime of his vigour, a "bullock," but not emasculated. אֵילָן, egel, is precisely correspondent to our term "calf," by which it is almost invariably rendered.

Besides these, the word אֵילָן, al-looph (with variations), was occasionally used, with a loose generic meaning; while אֶבֶר, ab-êr (literally mighty), was applied at first as a descriptive epithet, and then conventionally as an appellation to the ferocious, semi-wild, bovine races, which roamed through the forest pastures of Western Asia.

The use of the ox as a domestic animal among the Hebrews and the surrounding nations presented no peculiarity that calls for lengthened remark. No mention of it occurs before the time of Abraham, but we cannot doubt that it was included in the "cattle" which Jabal reared, and that it accompanied Adam out of paradise. (See observations on domestication, under Ass.) Abram, in his migration from Mesopotamia, may be reasonably supposed to have included herds as well as flocks in his substance; more were added to him in Egypt; and soon after the multiplication of the cattle of Abram and Lot was so great, that contention among the herdmen and separation ensued. Job, whom we suppose to have lived about the same time, had five hundred yoke of oxen, ch. i. 3, before, and a thousand yoke, ch. xiii. 12, after, his affliction. Forty kine and ten bulls, Ge. xxxii. 15, formed a portion of the present wherewith Jacob deprecated the jealousy of his brother Esau. And many other less definite phrases

The milk of the cow was habitually drunk fresh and sour as now, and it was used for the making of butter and cheese, as we learn from the mention of "butter of kine," De. xxxii. 14, and "cheese of kine," 2Sa. xvii. 29. That of the sheep and of the goat was however used also, and perhaps more extensively. (See BUTTER.)

In agricultural operations oxen were largely employed, as for ploughing, for treading out corn, and for drawing carts, 2Sa. vi. 3-6. As there is every reason to believe that these were unmutated bulls, the temper and docility of the breed must have been remarkable to fit them for such service. In the case of the restoration of the ark by the Philistines, 1Sa. vi. 7, milch kine were indeed employed for purposes of draught; but the substitution of these for bullocks was exceptional, and subserved a special purpose: it was an express test of the power of Jehovah to overcome the instinct of maternal affection.

[P. H. G.]

BULL, WILD. (אֵיִל, toh, and wild ox, אֵיִל, t'oh.)

Each of these words occurs but once in the sacred Scriptures; the latter in the list of clean animals, De. xiv. 6, and the former as the name of a creature of great power taken in a net, Is. ii. 20. There is a large species of antelope known to the Arabs by the name of wild ox (beker el wash), the Antelope bubalis of Pallas, which is common in the Syrian desert, as well as throughout scattered over the sacred narratives help to show us how extensive were the possessions of herds, which swelled the substance of the early patriarchs. We know nothing of the specific breed of cattle possessed by those patriarchs; but, coming as they did from the distant east, it is by no means improbable that their cattle were not unlike those of the Indian type. A bull of this breed is represented in the annexed wood-cut (No. 139.)

The first mention of the actual use of animal food (though the grant of it was much earlier, Ge. ix. 3), is on the occasion of Abraham's hospitality to the three divine strangers that stood at his tent door, when he took "a calf, tender and good," and dressed it with butter and milk, Ge. xviii. 7, 8. There is no reason to suppose that the patriarch as yet suspected his guests to be superhuman; and the feast was merely an exhibition of ordinary hospitality offered to dignified travellers. Yet the slaughter of the herds for food was by no means a common occurrence among the pastoral tribes, if we may judge from the permanence of oriental customs; and the partaking of flesh was rather an occasional dainty than a daily necessity as with us.

Vol. I.

[140.] Wild Bull—Antelope bubalis.

every part of Northern Africa. Shaw says that it is of a familiar disposition, and that the young calves frequently mix with domestic cattle, and soon learn to attach themselves to the herd without attempting to escape afterwards. They fight like the common bull by lowering the head, and striking suddenly upwards with the horns, which are formidable weapons, either for attack or defence. The animal is larger than a stag, and is particularly remarkable for the great length of its head, and its narrow, flat, and straight forehead and face, which are very ox-like.

This creature is frequently represented in the paintings of the Egyptian tombs as an object of chase. It is worthy of note, that the modes of pursuing are always such as aim not at killing the animal, but taking it alive, which is quite accordant with what is stated above of the aptitude of the beker el wash for domestication. Thus the hunter, accompanied by his dogs, sometimes shoots the wild ox with arrows, but they are blunted arrows or knobbed at the extremity, and are calculated to stun but not to kill the prey. This effect indeed is evidently depicted, for the animal is arrested without falling, and the arrows are always directed so as to strike the head. In other scenes, the hunter captures the wild bull by means of a noose or lasso, as wild horses are taken on the pampas of South America.

[141.] Capturing the Wild Bull or Antelope with Lasso.

It is therefore interesting, and at the same time confirmatory of the identity of the species, that the wild bull, Is. II. 20, is represented as captured in a net, vainly enraged at being deprived of liberty, but not injured.

Besides the toh, occasional allusions occur in Scripture to a race of bovine animals, which if not existing in the pristine wildness of nature, yet roamed the forest glades in uncontrolled liberty, and manifested all the power and ferocity of these creatures in a state of self-dependence. Bashan, with its rich pastures, varied by forests of oak and poplar, was celebrated for its herds of semi-wild cattle, if they were no more. The Lord Jesus on the cross, Pa. xxii. 12, complains of the virulence of his surrounding enemies under the emblem of these furious beasts—"Many bulls have compassed me: strong bulls of Bashan have beset me round." And many passages occur in which the image is used to express brute power and savage ferocity.

The sculptures recently exhumed from the Ninevite palaces abound in representations of this savage of the forest; for the conquest of the wild bull by the prowess of the Assyrian king was an exploit deemed worthy, no less than that of the lion, of representation on the sculptured walls of his palace. And let us not think lightly of this herbivorous animal, as if it were a timid or a powerless foe. The figures on the bas-reliefs show that the species was the Urus of ancient Europe (Bos urus, Smith), not the bison or aurochs; and a comparison of the representations of the Assyrian artists with a fine figure of the wild urus in Griffith's Animal Kingdom (v. 411), shows how carefully the former attended to minute characters of specific identity. Of this species were the wild bulls of the Hercynian forest, which Cæsar describes (lib. vi.) as little inferior to elephants in size, of great strength and swiftness, sparing neither man nor beast, when they had caught sight of him. The race seems to have spread over the whole of Europe and Western Asia, reaching even to Britain: the huge forest that surrounded ancient London was infested with these boves sylvestres, among other wild beasts; and the race is supposed still to exist in a semi-domesticated state, in the white oxen of Chillingham and some others of our northern parks. The ferocity of the urus distinguished it from the bison, even among the Latin poets, and it was esteemed inferior to no animal in savage power. Hence the destruction of one was a great exploit, worthy of heroic fame. Philip of Macedon killed a wild bull in Mount Orbeli, which had made vast havoc and produced great terror among the inhabitants; its spoils he hung up in commemoration of his feat in the vestibule of the temple of Hercules. The legendary exploit of Guy, Earl of Warwick, in freeing the neighbourhood from a terrible dun cow, whether historically true or not, implied a traditional terror of the animal; and the family of Turnbull in Scotland are said to owe their patronymic to a hero who turned a wild bull from Robert Bruce when it had attacked him in hunting.

Whether or not the beautiful white cattle preserved with great care in some of our northern parks, are descended from the uri which lorded it in the forests of ancient Europe and Western Asia, their manners may illustrate the scriptural allusions already quoted. "The bulls, at the first appearance of any person, set off in full gallop, and at the distance of two or three hundred yards make a wheel round, and come boldly up again, tossing their heads in a menacing manner on a sudden they make a full stop, at the distance of forty or fifty yards, looking wildly at the object of their surprise; but upon the least motion being made, they all again turn round and fly off with equal speed, but not to the same distance: forming a shorter circle, and again returning with a bolder and more threatening aspect than before, they approach much nearer, probably within thirty yards, when they make another stand, and again fly off; this they do several times, shortening their distance, and advancing nearer, till they come within ten yards; when most people think it prudent to leave them, not choosing to provoke them further; for there is little doubt but, in two or three turns more, they would make an attack" (McCulley in Bewick).

BURDEN. This often occurs in the prophets, as the title of their announcements, chiefly in Is. xiii.—xxiii. "The burden of the desert of the sea," and "the burden of the valley of vision," Is. xxi. 1; xxiii. 1, are prophecies against Babylon and Jerusalem. Once it is perhaps applied to an entire book, "the burden of the word of the Lord to Israel by Malachi." The expression seems to imply that it is a prophecy of evil, as it is singularly suitable in 2 Ki. ix. 25; but yet there are passages where there is more or less difficulty in upholding this meaning, and where our translators have therefore given up their own rendering "burden," for the more general word "prophecy," Pr. xxx. 1; xxxi. 1; and many modern Hebrew scholars have attempted to defend this rendering universally, but not by valid reasons. This name, "the burden of the Lord," appears somehow to have provoked the scorn of the unbelieving people in the days of Jeremiah, to whom the command was therefore given to discontinue it, though a threatening was added that the Lord would bring desolation and ruin upon them and their false prophets, Je. xxiii. 33-40. Yet it was used anew by Zechariah and Malachi.

BURNT-OFFERING. See OFFERINGS.

BURY, BURIAL. The practice of burying the dead seems to commend itself to mankind in general, unless in those savage states of society in which even such a feeling as respect for the remains of departed friends has become wholly blunted. It is the practice which has obtained in all Christian countries, partly no doubt owing to the influence of example in the case of our Saviour; but, besides, we trace it in the Old Testament as the uniform practice of the Jews. For, all who have been made acquainted with God as in covenant with them, have known him as "the God not of the dead, but of the living," and have preserved the body with what care they could, committing it to the earth in hope of a blessed resurrection. It is true that there are traces of two heathenish practices, embalming and burning; but they are mere traces, and afford no reason for supposing the practices to have been adopted among the people of God to any appreciable extent. The Egyptians had early betaken themselves to the singular custom of embalming their dead, as if, for want of any better hope, they would bid defiance to the ravages of the last enemy, and delay the process of corruption to the very latest possible moment. Yet even Jacob and Joseph, who were embalmed, as persons of their exalted rank in Egypt were wont to be, were buried in the same place, probably in the same manner, as others who had been committed to the grave without undergoing this process, Ge. xlix. 29; 1. 28. And the wish expressed so strongly by them to be buried in the Land of Promise, and where their forefathers Abraham and Isaac lay, when taken in connection with Abraham's refusal to be buried among the idolatrous Canaanites, and his earnestness to acquire a burial-place which should be exclusively his own, Ge. xxiii. 6-9, are marks of the same truth having hold of their minds, namely, a conviction that their very bodies belonged to the Lord their God, and were in faith to be committed to the dust to which they must return. So with the other heathenish practice of burning the dead, it seems to have been altogether exceptional; in time of a plague, for instance, when this burning might check infection, Am. vi. 9, 10; or in such a case as King Saul's, whose body was so mangled that a decent ordinary burial could with difficulty be given, though in this case also the bones received the rites of burial, 1 Sa. xxxi. 12, 13. However, we read of a large use of spices which were laid alongside of the body, perhaps wrapped up in the clothes which were wound about it, or burned upon the spot to cause a sweet odour; and an amount of costly spices was sometimes lavished in this manner which strikes a careful reader with amazement, 2 Ch. xvi. 14; Jn. xix. 39, 40.

The heat of the climate in Palestine makes it desirable to hasten the funeral as much as possible, sometimes within an hour or two of death, seldom so long as a whole day after; and in the cases of Ananias and Sapphira, Ac. v. 1, &c., interment seems to have taken place without delay. Another reason would urge this among the Jews—the law which made any one unclean for seven days who touched a dead body, or was in a dwelling along with one, Nu. xix. 11, 14. As soon as the breath was gone, the nearest relatives closed the eyes and gave a parting kiss, Ge. xlv. 4; 1. 1. Then the body was washed with water and dressed, and laid out for burial, Ac. ix. 37, rolled in a sheet, Mat. xxvii. 59, or bound in grave-clothes, Jn. xi. 44. Whenever the news of the decease spread abroad, friends and neighbours came crowding in and filled the house with loud, wild lamentations; and these were frequently the more remarkable for apparent violence of emotion when hired mourners were called in, who even made use of instrumental music to add to the piercing wailing sounds, Mat. ix. 23, with Mar. v. 38; Jn. ix. 17; 2 Ch. xxxv. 25. These mourners accompanied the body to the grave, with every gesticulation that could express ungovernable grief—tearing their hair, beating their breasts, rending their garments, and uttering lamentable cries, all which have been often described by modern travellers in the East. The body was seldom put in a coffin, though a special reason might require this, as when Joseph's body was to be carried up to Canaan; but the present custom of these countries seems to have also prevailed of old, to carry the body simply on a bed or bier, borne by the friends, while some nearest relations or others most deeply interested walked immediately behind, Ge. xxv. 8, 9; 2 Sa. iii. 31, &c.; Lu. vii. 12. The body, dressed in its grave-clothes, which might be very much the same as those that were worn during life, and with a napkin wrapped round the face, Jn. xi. 44; xix. 40, was then laid in the grave, and the funeral party returned home to eat the mourning for these mourners to go to the grave and weep there, Jn. xi. 19, 31.

The time during which these gatherings of sympathizers continued, and the extent to which money was laid out upon the funeral itself, and the feasting connected with it, are not determinable from Scripture, though there is mention of seven days, Ge. 1.10; 1 Sa. xxxi. 13; and a month, Nu. xi. 29; De. xxxiv. 8. But if an approximate estimate is permissible from practices in Syria at present, everything was arranged on an excessive and extravagant scale. Dr. Thomson furnishes some good evidence of this (The Land and the Book, p. 101-106). He speaks of the enormous gatherings being repeated at stated times for forty days; and he mentions a case that occurred as he was writing, of a young friend who had lost his father, and from whom the ecclesiastics were demanding 20,000 piastres for their subsequent services. And he believes that as families are now often reduced to poverty by funerals, it was so also in ancient times. And on this principle he explains the protestation which an Israelite made in the year of tithing, as to his having completed his givings for religious and charitable purposes, De. xxi. 14. "I have not eaten thereof in my mourning, neither have I taken away aught thereof for any unclean use, nor given aught thereof for the dead;" that is, he had not been tempted in any such emergency, and amidst its expensive and oppressive demands, to alienate from the service of God and the wants of the poor that which ought rightfully to be devoted to them. On the other hand, it has been alleged that there is danger of error in connecting such extravagances with the older and better period of the Israelitish history.

Burial-places are in the East still kept with great neatness, often fenced in and planted with trees, as Abraham's appears to have been. Often there is a title telling who has been buried on the spot, a practice also of the Israelites, 2 Ki. xxiii. 17. These burial-places, being unclean by the law of Moses, were on the outside of the cities, except in the case of Jerusalem, as is reported, where the sepulchres of the kings were in the city of David, 2 Ch. xvi. 14, the like being done in Samaria with the kings of the ten tribes, if we may judge from 2 Ki. x. 35; xiii. 9, &c. An exception appears also to have been made in favour of Samuel, 1 Sa. xxx. 1; xxviii. 3. Perhaps the half-heathenish worship feast, Je. xvi. 6, 7; Eze. xxiv. 17; Ho. ix. 4. From the first of these texts it may be inferred that certain heathen practices of cutting the hair and tearing the flesh in mourning, had crept into use in spite of the law of God against them, Le. xix. 28. From the history of Lazarus and his sisters, we see that it was usual for friends to continue for days coming in order to console the bereaved relatives, and that it was also usual of the ten tribes led the people, however, to bury beside their altars, as at Bethel, in the same manner in which churchyards came to be burial-places among Christians in times of superstition, 2 Ki. xxiii. 16, 16. Graves may sometimes have been quite like our own; but the prevailing taste was to build houses for the dead, which men might do for themselves during their lifetime, and often these were cut out of the living rock, 1Sa. xxv. 1; 1 Ki. ii. 34; 1a. xxii. 16; Lu. xxiii. 53. To a cave there was a door, or sometimes a stone was rolled to the mouth of it, as at the graves of Lazarus and our Lord. At other times they seem to have stood very open, and to have afforded a shelter to outcasts from society, 1a. lxx. 4; Mar. v. 5. But in order that those who wished to live in obedience to the law might not contract impurity unintentionally, the multitudes of sepulchres about Jerusalem are said to have been whitewashed every year about the time of the passover, so that all might easily avoid them. This has been understood to give point to our Saviour's denunciation of the hypocrites of his day, whom he compared to the newly whitened sepulchres, Mat. xxiii. 27.

There was no greater dishonour possible than the violation of the sepulchres of the dead, which God threatened and brought to pass on daring introducers and supporters of idolatry among his professed people, 2 Ki. xxiii. 15, &c.; Je. viii. 1, 2. To others it was threatened, as a punishment of similar severity, that they should be deprived of burial altogether, 2 Ki. ix. 10; Je. xlii. 18, 19. The same indignity was threatened to the blasphemous king of Assyria, 1a. xiv. 19, 20. Public criminals, who had been put to death, were buried, De. xxi. 22, 23, but of course with as little of respect as was consistent with common decency. This would naturally have been the fate of our Lord's body, from which, however, it was preserved by the special providence of God, according to what had been foretold, 1a. liii. 9; Ju. xix. 31-42.

There are magnificent ranges of tombs, named those of the kings, of the judges, and of the prophets, still standing at Jerusalem. Scripture also speaks of the graves of the common people, 2 Ki. xxiii. 6; Je. xxvi. 23, of which it is less reasonable to expect distinct traces.

BUSHEL is used in our version to express the Greek (or rather Roman) modius, which was almost equal to our peck. (See MEASURES.)

BUTTER. There are comparatively but few passages of Scripture in which this word occurs, and they are all in the Old Testament. Nor are Hebrew scholars by any means agreed that butter is the proper rendering of the corresponding term in the original (חֵמֶת). Derived from a root still existing in the Arabic, which signifies thick or coagulated, it is understood to denote the thicker portion or produce of milk, but whether cream, or butter, or curdled sour milk, is doubted. It is in favour of butter that all the more ancient translations, Greek and Latin, adopt it. But as this in the East does not differ very greatly from cream, and has nothing like the consolidated form of butter in European countries, the word might quite naturally be applied also to cream—the flower or fatness of milk, as Jarchi and some of the rabbins take it. The mode of churning, which travellers describe as prevalent in the regions about Palestine, is probably the same that was practised in remote times. The milk is put into a skin-bag (a whole goat skin sewed up so as to form a bag) and suspended in a slight frame, or between two sticks leaning against the tent or house; then it is moved to and fro with a jerk till the butter is obtained (Robinson's Researches, ii. p. 180; Thomson's Land and Book, p. li. c. 18; Harmer's Observations, i. 441). But the article so obtained is usually in a semifluid state, and only once in his travels does Robinson speak of meeting with what could be called good butter (ii. 137). Thomson says, that "in winter it resembles curdled honey, in summer it is mere oil." "Some of the farmers," he adds, "have learned to make our kind of butter, but it soon becomes rancid, and indeed it is never good." One may therefore easily understand the expression in Job xxix. 6, "When I washed my steps with butter, and the rock poured me out rivers of oil"—butter and oil being almost equally fluid, and both alike symbols of richness and plenty; he also speaks of brooks of butter, ch. xx. 17. Arab cookery indulges very freely in the use of butter, though in the better days of Palestine oil from the olive-tree was probably more used for such purposes. "Butter and honey" are occasionally employed instead of the more common expression "milk and honey," to denote a land full of natural richness, and, it may be (as in Is. vii. 15, 22), in contrast to the sparseness and poverty of the inhabitants.

BUZ [contempt.] A tribe against whom Jeremiah prophesied, ch. xxv. 23, who probably dwelt in Desert Arabia, not far from Dedan and Tema, who are joined with Buz. Elihu may have belonged to this tribe, as he is named the Buzite, Job xxxii. 1. And as he is also said to have been of the kindred of Ram, or Aram, the father of the Syrians, the tribe may have sprung from Buz, the nephew of Abraham, whose brother Kemuel also is called the father of Aram, Ge. xxii. 20, 21.

CAB. A small Hebrew measure, which, according to rabbinical authority, was the 180th part of an homer, or the 18th of an ephah; equal to $2\frac{1}{4}$ pints imperial measure. It is mentioned in 2 Ki. vi. 25, in connection with the terrible scarcity which then prevailed, and which is said to have reached such a height, that the fourth part of a cab of dove's dung was sold for five pieces of silver.

CABUL. 1. A place on the border of the tribe of Asher, Jos. xix. 27; probably the same as the village Chabolo of Josephus, on the confines of Ptolemais, forty stadia distant from Jotapata (Life, sect. 43, 45). Robinson found in this neighbourhood a village, Kabûl, which he regards as the representative of the ancient Cabul (Researches, iii. 88, edit. 1856). In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries Kabûl was a place of Jewish pilgrimage.

2. A district comprising twenty cities in the north of Palestine presented by Solomon to Hiram, king of Tyre, in acknowledgment of his services in the erection of the temple and the royal palace, 1 Ki. ix. 13. Hiram on visiting the cities was dissatisfied with the gift: "he called them the land of Cabul;" and appears to have restored the district to Solomon then or shortly after, 2 Ch. viii. 2. The appellation evidently expresses contempt (Gesenius, Thesaurus, p. 656); but what may be its precise meaning, or what may have been the cause of Hiram's dissatisfaction, it is difficult to determine. According to Josephus (Antiq. viii. 5. sect. 3), the term denotes in the Phœnician language "what does not please;" but there is nothing in the cognate dialects confirmatory of this opinion. Various other etymologies have been proposed, but so doubtful that they need not be adverted to. It was a question with the older commentators how Solomon, contrary to the Mosaic law, could alienate any portion of the land which Jehovah had given to his people Israel; but an explanation may be found in the circumstance, that the district was probably of recent conquest and not yet inhabited by Israelites. Galilee, within which it lay, comprised at the time only the northern part of the province which latterly bore that name, and was designated "Galilee of the Gentiles," Is. ix. 1, showing that down to a much later period it was inhabited chiefly by heathen. It was only after the cities were restored to Solomon, 2 Ch. viii. 2, that he caused the children of Israel to inhabit them; and whence they were carried captive by Tiglath-pileser, 2 Ki. xv. 29. (See Keil, Die Bücher der Könige, p. 139).

CÆSAR. A name assumed as a title of honour by the Roman emperors after Augustus, who took it himself as the adopted son of Julius Cæsar. It thus became, like the Pharaoh of Egypt, or the Abimelech of the Philistines, a general designation for the head of the Roman state. In this manner it is applied in the New Testament writings to four successive emperors—Augustus, Lu. ii. 1; Tiberius, Lu. iii. 1; Claudius, Lu. xi. 22; Nero, Ac. xv. 8. (See the several names.)

CÆSARE'A. There were two cities bearing this general name, mentioned in gospel history, the one, as the more noted and larger place, called simply Cæsarea, the other by way of distinction denominated Cæsarea Philippi; the one also within the bounds of Palestine proper, the other on its extreme limits, if not a little beyond them.

1. CÆSAREA PALESTINA. This city, originally called Strato's Tower, lay upon the Syrian coast, about half way between Joppa on the south, and Cape Carmel on the north. It stood in the plain of Sharon, an extensive, open, somewhat undulating pastoral district, and on the highway between Tyre and Egypt. It was about thirty-five Roman miles distant from Joppa, and fifty-five from Jerusalem by the nearest route; but the common road was from sixty-five to seventy. Hence the company of soldiers who conveyed Paul from Jerusalem to Cæsarea took nearly two days to the journey. Ac. xxiii. 31, 32, while the messengers of Cornelius from Cæsarea to Peter at Joppa appear to have travelled the distance in one day, ch. x. 2. Being one of the most considerable places in Palestine at the period of the gospel age, and the usual seat of the Roman procurator, as it had previously been of Herod, frequent mention is made of it in connection with apostolic agency and the history of the early church. There first, through the family of Cornelius, the door of faith was opened to the Gentiles by the special direction of Heaven, and the ministry of the apostle Peter. There also, and probably about the same period, Paul found a temporary refuge, when he was obliged to quit Jerusalem on his first visit after conversion, and before he returned to his native city, Tarsus, Ac. ix. 30. At a later period he was carried to the place as a prisoner and detained in bonds for two whole years, Ac. xxiii. 32; xxiv. 27. Peter, in like manner, when persecuted by Herod in Jerusalem, sought and found a temporary asylum in Cæsarea, Ac. xii. 19. It was the residence for many years of Philip the evangelist, Ac. viii. 40; xxi. 8, 16; and occasional visits, beside those already noticed, were made to it by Paul in the course of his missionary tours, Ac. xviii. 22; xxi. 8.

The erection of the city is by Josephus ascribed wholly to Herod the Great (Antiq. xv. 2, 8), and there seems no reason to doubt the general accuracy of his account. Dr. Thomson treats it as enormously exaggerated in some of its statements, and also infers from the extent of quarryings which appear to have been carried on in the neighbourhood, that there must have been an earlier city on the same spot, long before Herod's operations commenced (The Land and the Book, p. 11. c. 32). But he adduces no sufficient grounds for disparaging the Jewish historian's narrative of things, with which both himself and the greater part of his readers must have been perfectly familiar; and Dr. Thomson seems to forget, that as Cæsarea was a sea-port, many of the stones quarried there may have been carried to other places along the coast. The site, we are expressly told, was chosen by Herod with a view to its forming a convenient harbour for ships. The nearest harbours were Joppa on the south, and Dora on the north, at a still greater distance than Joppa; and neither of these places had good havens or roadsteads, and were therefore, as Josephus states, but lesser maritime cities. Even in the site selected for remedying the defect in question there were no great advantages; the bay was not very capacious or deep, and it was exposed to winds and waves from the south. But there were some ledges of rock which ran out a certain way into the sea; and Herod took advantage of these, so as to construct large moles to serve as breakwaters, and inclose for a harbour a space that is said to have been equal to the Pnyseum at Athens. The stones employed in constructing these moles are described by Josephus as fifty feet in length, eighteen in breadth, and nine in depth—that is, the larger stones for the principal places, for he expressly mentions others of smaller dimensions—and they were let down into twenty fathoms water. The principal mole was 200 feet wide, the one half of it serving simply as a breakwater, and the entrance for ships was on the north side. Beside the works connected with the haven, Herod built many large structures, and what Josephus calls sumptuous palaces. Among these was a theatre, an amphitheatre of vast dimensions, and a lofty temple upon the haven, seen at a considerable distance from the sea, having in it the two statues of Rome and of Augustus Cæsar. It was in a theatre, most likely in the fine building of that description made of polished stone erected by the first Herod, that his grandson Herod Agrippa was seized with the illness which speedily terminated in his death, Ac. xii. 21-23. Dedicated as the place was to Cæsar, with a temple to Augustus as one of its most prominent objects, inaugurated also, as we are told, by quite heathenish games and spectacles, the place must have been eyed with jealousy rather than with favour or pride by the Jews; and there is reason to believe that the population was more Greek than Jewish. A fierce contest is reported to have arisen in the reign of Nero between the two parties, as to which of them the city properly belonged; the Jewish portion contended it was theirs, because a Jew had built it, while the others, not disputing this, alleged it still was a Grecian city, on account of the temples and statues with which it had been from the first adorned. Bloody conflicts ensued from time to time, but with no decided advantage on either side, and the disturbances growing out of the dispute were not finally quelled till they merged in the more general struggle of the great Jewish war (Jos. Wars, ii. 13, 7).

That the population of the city was at one time large (according to some accounts 200,000), and that it was the seat of much wealth and grandeur, there can be no doubt. The designs of Herod in its erection were by no means disappointed. But the prosperity of the place was not of very long continuance. It was made a Roman colony by Vespasian; by and by it became the seat of a Christian bishop, which in the fourth century was occupied by the eminent divine and church historian Eusebius; and so late as the period of the crusades it is still mentioned as a place of some importance. But now and for many generations all is simply matter of history. "It is now the most desolate site in Palestine. Its ruins run out into the waves of the Mediterranean Sea, which dashes over the prostrate columns and huge masses of masonry; but no human habitation is to be found within the circuit of its deserted walls, no village or even hovel remains on the site of what was once the capital of Palestine" (Stanley's Sinai and Palestine, p. 261). The plain in the immediate neighbourhood is a vast bog, occasioned by the want of a proper outlet (since the ancient aqueducts fell into disrepair) for the streams issuing from the fountains that exist in the plain. The arches still remain of a double aqueduct, but they no longer serve the purpose for which they were constructed. As a matter of course, reeds and rank grass grow plentifully in the marshy ground, and snakes, lizards, and jackals find among them a congenial habitation. These are now the chief tenants of the district. But it still goes by the name of Kaisariyeh.

2. CÆSAREA-PHILIPPI. The more ancient name of this place was Paneum or Paneas, which is still preserved in the modern Baniás. It was situated on the most easterly source of the Jordan—that which has been commonly regarded as the chief source—and which flows out from the base of a high limestone rock in several rivulets that presently coalesce into a united stream. Its position was on the very outskirts of Palestine, on the north, a short way to the east of Laish or Dan, which is so often named as the most northerly city of Palestine; also about a day's journey from Tyre, which lay right west, and about the same from Sidon on the north-west. It was on the great road to Damascus, from which it was distant about a day and a half's journey. It is probably the same with Beth-rehob, Ju. xviii. 28, which lay near Dan, but some would rather identify it with Baal-gad (which see). The perpetual freshness and beautiful verdure of the situation, its plentiful supply of water, its groves of olive, and the romantic richly-clad slopes of Hermon, which stretched away northward, rendered it peculiarly attractive as a place of summer residence and sylvan retreat. It is supposed, that this is probably the reason why it got the name of Paneas, having been thought by the Greek inhabitants to be an appropriate place for the worship of their sylvan deity Pan, whose temple or grove would naturally be called Paneum, whence the neighbouring village took the name of Paneas. There is also a great cavity in the earth beside it, full of deep and still water, which would yet more peculiarly adapt it to the Pan-worship. If in earlier times it belonged, as it seems to have done, to Syria, in the gospel age it formed part of the territory of Philip, tetrarch of Trachonitis, and was by him greatly enlarged and embellished. His father Herod had already done something in the same direction, and, in particular, had built a beautiful marble temple, which he dedicated to his great patron Augustus Cæsar; but the son added immensely to the size and splendour of the place. It thenceforth became known by the name of Cæsarea Philippi, but the natives appear still to have retained the more ancient designation. In history it is often called Cæsarea Paneas.

At a memorable period in our Lord's history he retreated for a season to this remote city, and in its immediate neighbourhood, there is every reason to believe, occurred the remarkable scene of the transfiguration on the mount, Mat. xvi. 13; xvii. 1. Jesus was then seeking retirement, for the purpose of being more alone with his disciples, and preparing their minds for the trying events that were before them. It was accordingly when in that region that he began to give them more distinct intimations of his approaching sufferings, death, and resurrection, and disclosed to them, in the most striking and emphatic manner, the spiritual nature of the kingdom he was going to establish. The discourses and transactions of that period formed a marked era in the history of his earthly ministry, though the disciples at the time could very imperfectly apprehend their import and design; only when the Spirit came, and brought all things in their true light and proper bearing to remembrance, could they reap the full benefit of the instruction. Cæsarea Philippi, however, with its coasts, appears to have been chosen for these more select communications merely on account of its remoteness and privacy; nor is anything said of the place itself—how it treated Jesus, or how he conducted himself toward it. The report of Eusebius, that the woman who was cured of the issue of blood resided there, cannot be regarded as of any authority. As a town, the place continued to have a certain degree of importance for many ages. Frequent mention is made of it in the history of the crusades, and, after a variety of changes, it was finally lost to the Christians in the year 1165. The most remarkable thing about it now is an old and majestic castle (Shubeibeh) standing on a height above the site of the city, supposed to have been in part built by the Herodian princes, though chiefly of later erection, and the scene of many a conflict in the days of the crusades.

CAIAPHAS [supposed to be a derivative of the Aramaic word kēphas, rock], the name of the person who was in the position of high-priest during the period of our Lord's ministry and death. He is said by Josephus to have had Joseph for his proper name, having Caiaphas for his surname (Antiq. xviii. 2, 3, 4, 5). He held the office of high-priest for a considerable time, having been appointed by Valerius Gratus in A.D. 25 or 26, and retaining it till A.D. 37, when he was removed by Marcellus. As this was, at the time, a very unusual tenure of office, no fewer than four high-priests having been deposed by the Gratus to whom he owed his elevation, it may not unnaturally be regarded as a sign of that vigorous, but withal crafty and unscrupulous character, which plainly discovers itself in his proceedings toward Christ and the apostles. He was married to the daughter of Annas, or Ananus, who had been himself high-priest for several years, and five of whose sons had successively, though for comparatively brief periods, held the same office, (Josephus, Antiq. xviii. 9, 1). This sufficiently explains the high sacerdotal rank and influence which Annas continued to enjoy, and how he should be coupled with Caiaphas, as substantially on a footing with him, in the management of ecclesiastical affairs. In Lu. iii. 2, Annas and Caiaphas are together named high-priests; in Jn. xviii. 13-24, the band that seized Jesus are represented as first leading him to Annas, and, while Caiaphas is called by way of eminence the high-priest for that year, yet both have that term applied to them; and again in Ac. iv. 6, Annas is associated with Caiaphas, and designated the high-priest, either from presiding at the council, or from taking the more active part in the proceedings against the apostles. (See, for the reason of this extension of the term high-priest, under the article ABIATHAR.)

It was before Caiaphas, as presiding high-priest at the time, that Jesus confessed himself to be the Son of God, and by him that the judgment of blasphemy was pronounced against the Holy One of Israel. This was, undoubtedly, the most awful fact in his history, and the crowning point of his guilt. But, perhaps, the most peculiar thing recorded of him is the circumstance of his having uttered a word respecting Christ which, from its being the utterance of the high-priest, is declared by the evangelist to have been, in a sense different from that intended by the speaker, a prophecy. The word itself was, "Ye know nothing at all; nor consider that it is expedient for us that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not. And this," says the evangelist, "spoke he, not of himself, but being high-priest that year, he prophesied that Jesus should die for that nation; and not for that nation only, but that he should gather together in one the children of God that are scattered abroad," Jn. xi. 49-52. The case was altogether extraordinary and peculiar. God's ordinary method in making prophetic announcements to his people, was through the agency of holy men, speaking as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. These alone could be the properly qualified and willing instruments of such a work. But occasionally instruments of another kind were (though only in an incidental and subordinate manner) pressed into the service. The most remarkable instance of that description was Balaam; and to the same class must be assigned Caiaphas, who, in a very singular and momentous crisis of affairs, was led to utter a sentiment, "in which thoughtful and reflective minds could not fail to perceive the overruling hand of God. It was, we may say, the guiding of the last official representative of the priestly order enigmatically to disclose the event, which was at once to antiquate its existence and to fulfil the end of its appointment. And this might the more fitly be done by one who knew not what he said, as the priesthood generally at the time had ceased to know the mystery of its own vocation." (Prophecy viewed in respect to its Distinctive Nature, &c. p. 464.)

CAIN [what is gotten, acquisition], the name given by Eve to her first-born son, as one whom she had gotten from, or rather with the Lord. Her words at the birth are somewhat peculiar, "I have gotten a man, אִישׁ אֲחִי, with (namely, with the help of) Jehovah." Such we take to be the correct meaning of the original, and not, as some would render it, "I have gotten a man, Jehovah." Dr. Pye Smith, in his Scripture Testimony, even goes so far as to say, that "there seems no option to an interpreter, who is resolved to follow the fair and grammatical signification of the words before him, but to translate the words thus." But even he, and most others who adopt the same rendering, are obliged to explain away the sense which such a rendering yields; as it is against all probability to suppose that Eve now imagined she had actually given birth to the incarnate Jehovah. This idea, which the words on the view in question must have expressed, is softened into "something connected with the Divine Being"—a meaning which is not materially different from that obtained by the other and, as we conceive, more natural rendering. We find the same form of expression in the following passages, Ge. v. 24; vi. 9; xliii. 16; Ju. i. 16, signifying with, in the sense of in fellowship with God, or some other person spoken of; and in Ju. viii. 7, it bears the cognate sense of with the help of ("with the help of thorns of the wilderness," &c.) Eve simply meant, as we conceive, to indicate that the child she had now given birth to had come to her in connection with Jehovah's gracious presence or helping hand—referring, no doubt, more immediately to the manner in which she had been borne through the troubles of her first parturition, and how, notwithstanding the sorrows and dangers connected with it, God had been pleased to give her the commencement of a seed. This particular seed, however, proved in process of time of a very different kind from what the maternal feelings of Eve would naturally prompt her at the moment of his birth to anticipate; and the event which first awoke in her bosom the consciousness of a mother's joy was destined to be associated in her future experience with the pangs of parental bereavement.

The records of primeval times are too brief to dispel the mystery that hangs around this melancholy catastrophe. How the first-born of parents, who had themselves trodden the blissful haunts of paradise, and who could scarcely fail to strive, by pious affection toward their immediate offspring, to have the distance narrowed as much as possible between what originally had been the condition of man, and what through sin it had now become; how, in spite of all this, and of the many reasons and inducements which the infancy of the world presented for drawing closer together the bands of human concord, the root of evil in Cain should have sprung so wildly, and reached such a fearful height, as to issue in the unnatural crime of fratricide, it is difficult even to conjecture. As, however, it was evidently a feeling of wounded pride which at last precipitated in Cain the commission of the fatal act, we can scarcely doubt that the growth, however it may have come about, of a proud rebellious spirit of opposition to the will of Heaven in the matter of religious worship, was the form which the evil in him more especially assumed, and the direct cause of the direful consequences that followed. From the existence of such a spirit in Cain, manifesting itself in the kind of worship he presented, the Lord refused to show that respect to his offering which he showed to Abel's; and this favour exhibited toward the younger brother, in preference to the elder, so stung the haughty spirit of Cain, that the sullen scowl of wrath settled upon his countenance—settled so fixedly, that even the expostulation of Heaven proved unavailing to remove it, and no satisfaction could be found for the affront he had sustained, till the brother, who had been the innocent occasion of it, had been violently made away with. (See ABEL.)

Cain, however, soon found that such a mode of getting relief from one source of annoyance entailed upon him another and a greater. He was presently made to know that he had here to do with more than a fellow-creature; and that, however he might have succeeded in getting rid of Abel's presence, and concealing (as it would seem) the place and mode of his decease, he had to answer for it to a higher tribunal. The proud, heaven-daring spirit, even in this showed itself, at least at the first call to a reckoning with Heaven; for when the Lord demanded of him, "Where is Abel thy brother?" the stout-hearted reply was, "I know not; am I my brother's keeper?" But God was not so to be mocked; and the charge was instantly laid against him, "What hast thou done! the voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground:"—not concealed and buried in the earth, as Cain in the frenzy of his impetuous rage had fondly imagined, but in the ear of Heaven lifting up a cry for vengeance upon him who had shed it. "And now," it was added in respect to the judgment to be inflicted, "thou art cursed from the earth, which hath opened her mouth to receive thy brother's blood from thy hand: when thou tillest the ground, it shall not henceforth yield unto thee its strength; a fugitive and a vagabond (wanderer) shalt thou be in the earth." It is rather the mildness than the severity of this punishment which might now strike us, considering the atrocity of the crime which provoked it; since nothing more seemed to be indicated as to physical evil in what was threatened, than banishment to some distance from the original seat of the human family, and the consequent necessity of occupying a less fertile region, where the means of procuring subsistence should be more difficult of acquisition. It appeared otherwise, however, to the offender himself; his pride, evidently still unsoftened, writhed under the stroke; and he exclaimed, "My punishment is greater than I can bear." What led him to speak thus appears to have been not so much the physical as the social evils of his position—the alienation alike from God and man into which he was now thrown, and the savage horrors of the state of isolation and outlawry to which he was consigned. "Behold," said he, "thou hast driven me out this day from the face of the earth; and from thy face shall I be hid (rather, must I hide myself); and I shall be a fugitive and a vagabond in the earth; and it shall come to pass that whosoever findeth me shall slay me." Not an expression of regret escapes him; the sense of injury inflicted, or likely to be inflicted upon himself, is all that he is concerned about; and he seems utterly unconscious of any moral necessity for his appointment to such a lot, as the consequence of the unbrotherly and inhuman spirit he had displayed. There was just one indication of a softened mood in what he said—in his feeling it to be an intolerable burden to be treated as an exile from human society, and exposed to the calamities of an outlaw from heaven: and, as a token of mercy still mingling with the judgment, the Lord was graciously pleased to set bounds to the evil by assuring him of protection to his life—"Whosoever slayeth Cain, vengeance shall be taken of him sevenfold." In short, the punishment was limited to the moral effects that justly flowed from his crime—in accordance with the general clemency which characterized the divine administration during the antediluvian age, and which was peculiarly marked by the absence of law and penalty. (See ANTEDILUVIAN AGE.) He was simply to be placed at an outside by Adam and the other members of the human family, as one morally unfit to enjoy the benefits of free and social intercommunion. And the Lord, we are told, even "set a mark upon Cain," or, as it should rather be, "appointed a sign for Cain," lest any finding him should kill him. What the sign was we have no means of ascertaining, and all conjectures upon the subject have proved of no avail. From the circumstances of the case, however, and from the use elsewhere made of the expression, for example, Ju. vi. 17; 1a. vii. 10, 14, we are naturally led to think of some visible token, which the Lord gave to Cain, such as might serve the purpose of a confirmation of the word spoken, and a pledge of its fulfilment.

The sacred history tells us little more of the personal history of Cain; but it leaves no room for doubt as to the godless spirit which continued to characterize him, and which from him descended to his posterity. "He went out from the presence of the Lord," that is, from the place probably at the eastern approach of Eden, where the Lord manifested his presence to those who sought him in the appointed channels of worship; and "dwelt in the land of Nod on the east of Eden." As Nod simply means exile, the land which Cain chose for his future habitation evidently got its name from the condition of its original occupant: it was stamped as the Botany Bay of the primitive earth. He, we may be sure, did not wish it to be so designated; and the city, which, we are told, he afterwards built, he called by the name of his son Enoch. Nothing more is recorded of him personally, except that he took a wife with him to the place of his sojourn, and had a family by her. That this wife was one of the daughters of Adam and Eve, we are simply left to infer from the fact of their being the parents of all living. But it is not the practice of the sacred historian, in those brief notices of the earliest times, to record the birth of daughters individually; Adam, and those who followed him, are said generally to have begotten sons and daughters; but even of the sons only the more prominent links of the chain are given. It is absurd, therefore, to raise any question as to the quarter whence Cain derived his wife, or to regard the notice respecting his wife as an evidence of other tribes being in existence at the time, beside the offspring of Adam. The sacred narrative lends no countenance to such an idea; but it presents Cain himself as a kind of second head of the primitive population of the world—the head of that seed which virtually espoused the cause of the adversary, and became at length involved in his doom. Driven, as Cain and his immediate offspring were, to the occupancy of a less favoured position, and determined, possibly, in the spirit of rivalry and pride, to work up against the difficulties of their lot, they were not disappointed in finding such a reward as usually attends the efforts of those who ply to the utmost their worldly resources. The colonists of the land of Nod soon became a vigorous settlement, which in numbers, in inventive skill, in articles of refinement, and instruments of war, gave them a decided advantage over the better line of Adam's posterity; so that those who commenced life as exiles and outlaws rose by degrees to the ascendancy in the world that had exiled them, and ruled it with a rod of iron. But while they could thus prevail over their fellowmen, the righteousness of God proved greatly too strong for them, and in the desolation of the flood destroyed and destroyers alike found a common grave.

CAINAN [possessor, Fürst; weapon maker, Ges.] 1. An antediluvian patriarch, the son of Enos, and the father of Mahalaleel, Ge. v. 9, 12; 1 Ch. i. 2; Lu. iii. 37.

2. A postdiluvian patriarch, introduced in our Lord's genealogy in Lu. iii. 36, as the son of Arphaxad and father of Sala. The name occurs in the Septuagint version of Ge. x. 22 after Aram; and in ver. 24 with the addition, "and Arphaxad begat Cainan, and Cainan begat Sala;" while chap. xi. 12, 13 assigns to him a generation of 130 years. Of all this there is no trace whatever in the Hebrew text; a circumstance which has given rise to much discussion among biblical critics. The matter may be of little importance in itself; but it has a considerable bearing on questions relative to the state of the Hebrew text. It is chiefly, however, from its connection with the controversy respecting the chronology of the Septuagint, that it demands special examination. Dismissing the various attempts at reconciling, in this instance, the Original with the LXX., as incapable of leading to any satisfactory result, the only alternative is, either the corruption of our present Hebrew text in these genealogical passages, or the incorrectness of the Septuagint, whence in that case it must have been taken by Luke, or a transcriber of his gospel.

The latter alternative is supported by the following evidence: first, the reading of the LXX. is not corroborated by any independent well-authenticated testimony apart from Luke iii. 36. The Samaritan Pentateuch, the Targums of Jonathan and Onkelos, the Syriac, Vulgate, Arabic, and other ancient versions, contain no trace of this second Cainan. No mention is made of him by Philo or Josephus: the latter, in particular, not only omits him in his list of the patriarchs after the flood, but by implication in the testimonies he deduces from Berosus (Antiq. i. 7, sect. 2), and others who make Abraham to be the tenth from Noah. The same is the case with such of the fathers as adverted to this matter; as Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch, and Origen, the latter, on the testimony of Procopius of Gaza, marking the passage with an obelisk (†) in his copy of the LXX. to denote its spuriousness. Eusebius also and Jerome omitted the second Cainan. Irenæus (Contra Hæreses, l. iii. 33) reckons seventy-two generations from Adam to Christ; whereas, including Cainan, the number would have been seventy-three.

Secondly, the testimony of the Septuagint itself is not uniform and consistent. It is true all the MSS. contain the important addition in Ge. xi. 12, differing, however, greatly as to the years assigned to his generation (see Landschreiber, Quellen zu Text der LXX. Bielefeld, 1856, p. 2), but three MSS. in Holmes's collation omit the name in Ge. x. 22, 24. But of more importance is the fact, that it is altogether wanting in the genealogical table in 1 Ch. i. 24.

On the other hand, the strongest argument for the genuineness of the reading of the Septuagint is Lu. iii. 36; but even here the Codex Bezae, one of the oldest MSS. known, omits the name; and according to Scaliger (Proleg. ad Chronicon Eusebii, Leyd. 1606), other ancient MSS. likewise omitted it. Another argument relied on by the defenders of the Septuagint, is the testimony of Demetrius, said by Hales to be a heathen chronologer of Alexandria (B.C. 220), who made the period from the creation to the descent of Jacob into Egypt the same as that given in the Septuagint; thus including the generation of Cainan. Admitting, however, that Demetrius followed the Greek version of the Scriptures, this only proves that, at that early period, it contained the present reading, but it decides nothing as to the state of the Hebrew text. Objection is also taken to the view given above of the evidence of Berossus, Irenæus, and others, who reckon up the number of generations, and their testimony is declared, on the contrary, to be favourable to the genuineness of the Septuagint. It must, indeed, be admitted that such statements are ambiguous, and may be differently viewed according as the first member may or may not be included in the series; and it is therefore better to attach no weight to them. Irrespective, however, of such arguments, so strongly does the testimony in favour of the Hebrew text preponderate, that even strenuous advocates of the chronology of the Septuagint, as Hales, for example (New Anal. of Chron. i. p. 299), feel in this instance constrained to abandon their guide. Of course the reading in Luke iii. 36 has no higher authority than the source whence it was taken; and there can be no hesitation in pronouncing it to be the addition of some transcriber, first, perhaps, in the form of a marginal note, afterwards embodied in the text. (See Usher, De Cainane Arphaxadi Filio, Critici Sacri, vol. vi.; Baillet, Opus Histor. et Chronologicum, Amst. 1663, p. 26-30.) [D. M.]

CALAH [old age], one of four cities in Assyria founded by Nimrod as a new centre of his extended empire, which at first embraced only Shinar; for so the somewhat ambiguous statement in Ge. x. 10, 11 (see mary. x. v.), is understood by the most eminent modern Hebraists, as Tuch, Knobel, and Delitzsch. All that is stated regarding the situation of Calah is, that the city Resen, described as "a great city" (Ge. x. 12), lay between it and Nineveh. It was held by Bochart and others, that the name was preserved in that of an Assyrian province called by Strabo Calachené, between the sources of the Lycus and the Tigris; but this is uncertain. The name frequently occurs in the inscriptions of Nimroud, and from these it appears that Calah lay on the east of the Tigris (Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, p. 264). Rawlinson would identify it with the present Nimroud, but Layard objects that this site is too near to Nineveh to admit the city Resen between it and Calah (ibid. p. 269). Dr. Lodbell finds it at Kala Sherghat, which he takes to be the Caenae of Xenophon (Anab. ii. 4, sect. 26), four days south of Mosul (Biblioth. Sacra, April, 1867, p. 236), but this is on the west of the Tigris, and so cannot be Calah, if the reading of the monuments is correct. The name does not occur again in the Bible, unless as maintained by Bochart (Phaleg. iv. 22), Gesenius (Thesaur. p. 668), and others, it be the same as Halah, 2KI. xvii. 6; xviii. 9-11, whither Salmanser carried the Israelites captive. CALAMUS. See CANE.

CALEB [dog], the name of a person, who occupies a distinguished and honourable place in early Israelitish history—the only one, except Joshua, of those who left the land of Egypt that were permitted to enter the land of Canaan. In the books of Moses he is designated the son of Jephunneh, Nu. xiii. 6; xiv. 6, 24, but of Jephunneh himself there is no further notice. And it would appear, by comparing other notices concerning Caleb, that Jephunneh was not of the seed of Israel at all, and that this family, which rose to so honourable a place among the covenant-people, belonged by descent to a foreign race. For in Jos. xiv. 14, Caleb is called "Caleb the son of Jephunneh the Kenizite," a native of that tribe; and in ch. xv. 13, after describing the boundaries of the portion of Judah, it is said of Caleb the son of Jephunneh, that Joshua "gave him a part among the children of Judah, according to the commandment of the Lord to Joshua, the city of Arba, the father of Anak, which is Hebron." This clearly bespeaks a peculiarity in the case of Caleb; for if he had belonged by birth to the tribe of Judah, his inheritance in that tribe must have fallen to him as a matter of course; and there should have been no need for any special commandment from the Lord upon the subject. But on the supposition of his having been by birth a stranger, an Israelite only by adoption, we can easily understand the reason of such an explicit direction; and the mention of the Kenizite in the preceding chapter in connection with the ancestral origin of the family explains the peculiarity. Then, when we turn to the genealogical table in 1 Ch. ii. 18-20, where we doubtless have the public and strictly Israelitish form of the matter, the paternity of Caleb is attached to the head of the family in the tribe of Judah, with which he came to be associated; he is there called "Caleb the son of Hezron;" for there is good reason to believe, that the Caleb there mentioned is the same that is so favourably known in earlier history, notwithstanding that in 1 Ch. iv. 15 he is again mentioned as "Caleb the son of Jephunneh," and as the father of a different offspring from what had been previously given. The different sons are, in all probability, the sons by different wives, having their lots in different localities, determined by the family and place of their respective mothers or wives; for in ch. ii. 42, we have still another list of the offspring of undoubtedly the same Caleb that is mentioned in ver. 18-20; whence it is likely that the three names indicate but one person, only viewed as the head, through several wives, of so many distinct families in Israel. Apart from this, however, and looking simply to the original notices in the Pentateuch, there seems good ground for concluding that Caleb was not by birth of the stock of Israel, but that by submitting to the bond of God's covenant with Israel, and by marriage allying himself to particular families within its pale, he attained to a place of power and influence among them, and in steadfastness to the faith of God's covenant rose high above most of those who were in the strictest sense "of the stock of Israel, Hebrews of the Hebrews."

CALF-WORSHIP, a form of false worship to which the ancient Israelites appear to have been peculiarly prone. The first species of idolatry into which they fell after their deliverance from the land of Egypt, was that of the golden calf, formed out of the ear-rings of the people, Ex. xxxi. 2. And when, again, at a later period, not the worship strictly speaking of false gods, but the false or corrupt worship of the true God, was introduced by Jeroboam, it took precisely the same type of the adoration of golden calves set up for the convenience of the people, one at Bethel in the south, and another at Dan in the north, 1KI. xii. 28. Nor is it unimportant to notice, that the author of this idolatrous innovation, though a native Israelite, had been for a considerable time a resident in the land of Egypt, having fled thither to escape the jealousy of Solomon, and only returned when he heard of Solomon's death, ch. xi. 40. This species of worship having thus originally appeared when the entire people were fresh from the land of Egypt, and having, on its second and more formal introduction, been set up by a man who had some time previously dwelt as a sojourner in the same land, seems plainly to point to Egypt as the source of the corruption. Not only might this be inferred from the passages referred to, but it is expressly affirmed by Stephen, in Ac. vii. 39, 40—"Whom our fathers would not obey, but thrust him from them, and in their hearts turned back again into Egypt, saying unto Aaron, Make us gods to go before us," &c. And Philo gives the same account of the matter (De Vita Mosæ, iii. p. 677)—"Forgetful of the homage due to the Supreme, they became zealots in the fabrication of Egyptian idols; and having constructed a golden bull, an imitation of the animal that was esteemed most sacred in that country, they presented unhalloved sacrifices." Indeed, the nature of the worship itself is conclusive evidence of the quarter whence it was derived; for the distinctive characteristic of Egyptian idolatry was the tendency it displayed to worship the deities under the symbolical representation of animal forms. In other countries it was the human form—predominantly, at least, though in a few peculiar cases this was combined with one of the inferior creation—under which the heathen mind imaged to itself the divine; and accordingly the Baal and Aahoreth worship which, in various shapes and modifications, flowed in upon Israel from the lands in the immediate neighbourhood of Canaan, always associated itself with the fabrication of images in the likeness of men or women. In Egypt it was otherwise. There certain live animals were kept in some of the temples, and held in especial veneration—above all, the bull Apis, which, in the temple of Memphis, was treated with the most sacred regard. But while such living animal forms were preserved in some of the temples, the representations of these animals, as stated by Jablonski (Pan. Prol. p. 86), "were exhibited in most of the other temples throughout the whole of Egypt, and are still to be seen in their ruins." In like manner Strabo says of the Egyptian temples, "They have no carved work, at least not of any human likeness, but of some kind of irrational creature" (xvii. 806). So strong was the bent of the Egyptian mind in this direction, that when king Mycerinus, as related by Herodotus (ii. 129), devised religious honours for his daughter, instead of erecting for her a statue of costly materials or beautiful proportions, he is reported to have made a hollow wooden cow, which he gilded, and in that deposited her corpse. Whether there was any truth in the story or not, the account shows how the idea of deification in that country naturally shaped itself. The gilded cow was undoubtedly conceived of as a female deity (with which, if the daughter of Mycerinus was deposited within it, she must have been supposed to be in some sort identified), and every day, as Herodotus testifies, aromatics of all sorts were burned before it, and a lamp kept perpetually lighted in the apartment (see further Bochart, Hieroz. ii. ch. 63, and Hengstenberg, Pent. i. Dias. 1).

There can, therefore, be no reasonable doubt whence the Israelites, either in the earlier or the later periods of their history, derived the bovine form of their idolatrous worship. By the adoption of such a form, they gave proof of turning back in their hearts toward Egypt. The choosing of any symbolical form was wrong, because it is fitted to dishonour and falsify, rather than represent the Godhead; and such especially must have been the case, when the form was that of an irrational animal. From the use of cattle in husbandry, the bovine form was probably in Egypt raised to this dignity beyond any others, because, being pre-eminently an agricultural country, that form might be supposed the most perfect natural symbol of the productive and genial powers of deity. And as Canaan bore in that respect a considerable resemblance to Egypt, it would doubtless be maintained by Jeroboam and his abettors, that the figures he set up were an innocent and appropriate symbolizing of the true God. They had also the example of Aaron to appeal to, and of this they evidently took advantage, as they are reported to have invited the people to worship in the very words originally used in the wilderness, "These be thy gods (thy Elohim), O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt," 1 KI. xii. 28; Ex. xxxiii. 4. We can easily conceive, too, that plausible arguments might not be wanting to justify them what had been condemned in the wilderness; especially, how it might be said, that the people had now been so long removed from Egypt, that they might with safety employ some of the forms, without associating with them the gross and debasing notions of the Egyptians—that they might with advantage make use of a symbol of God, without sinking the spiritual in the material. Such plausible sophisms as these would, undoubtedly, be employed to reconcile the covenant-people to the calf-worship recommended to their observance. But the prophets treated them as flimsy pretexts. They stigmatized the golden calves as strange gods, and the worship of them as spiritual whoredom, 1 KI. xiv. 9; He. iv. 14, &c.

Why that which in Egypt assumed the form of a bull or a cow worship—worship under the symbol of the full-grown bovine form—should in Israel have been represented as that of a calf, cannot be determined with perfect certainty. It probably arose in part from the comparatively small size which, in accordance with the furniture of the tabernacle, was given to the images; and, indeed, in Egypt itself, many of the sacred shrines which contained representations of the objects of worship were evidently, as appears from the pictures of them that have survived, of a diminutive size. But the stronger reason, in all probability, is, that, as it is from the pen of inspired men that the accounts have been transmitted to us, so they have in this sought to give an aspect of puerility and insignificance to the corruption; they would present the contrast between what was and should have been in the most striking form. Men having the knowledge of the eternal Jehovah, and yet bowing down to a senseless calf! There is, therefore, a kind of ironical turn in such expressions as, "Thy calf, O Samaria!" "Let them kiss the calves!" as if degrading ignorance and brutality had therein reached their climax!

The calf or bovine form of worship in Egypt was of a bacchanalian character, being accompanied with boisterous demonstrations of feasting and revelry. Speaking of the feast of Apis, Herodotus says, that "as soon as he appeared, straightway all the Egyptians arrayed themselves in their gayest attire, and fell to feasting and jollity" (iii. 27). Indeed this seems to have been characteristic of Egyptian worship generally; for, at the great annual feast at Bubastis, or Bi-Pasht, in honour of the goddess Pasht, the Egyptian Diana, who was worshipped under the form of a human figure with the head of a lioness or a cat, there were also bacchanalian processions, in the course of which women played on the castanets, and men on the flute, while others clapped their hands; and more grape-wine is said to have been consumed at the festival than during all the rest of the year (Her. ii. 60). Processions formed a very prominent part of the religion of Egypt; and there can be no doubt that, as remarked by Drumann, a German writer, and fully established by Creuzer, in his Symbolik, vol. i.—“The processions were like orgies, in which even the women appeared, amidst indecent songs and dances, noisy music, and bacchanalian feasts; that there were also mummeries, in which they painted their faces, and struck or ridiculed the bystanders.” We can thus easily understand how, on setting up the worship of the golden calf in the wilderness, it should have been said of the people, that “they sat down to eat and drink, and rose up to play,” and that Moses, on approaching, heard the noise of persons singing and dancing, Ex. xxxii. 4, 17-19. They were, in fact, celebrating the orgies of an Egyptian festival, although it was professedly in honour of Jehovah that the worship was performed; so readily did the heathenish in form degenerate into the heathenish in practice. In later times also, the same tendency soon discovered itself, notwithstanding the pains that would naturally be taken by Jeroboam and his party to prevent it; for, in adopting the symbol of the calf, they corrupted the religion of the old covenant at its centre, and altogether obscured the essential glory of the divine character. Even if the worshippers looked through the symbol to the Being it represented, it could tell them of nothing but of his natural attributes—his productive power in the sphere of physical life; leaving entirely in the shade the moral elements which peculiarly distinguish the God of the Bible. When once Jehovah was contemplated simply as the author of nature, the door was open for heathenism of every form, which is but the varied deification of nature. And so it happened in Israel; the worship of Jeroboam’s calves was found to draw after it, as an inseparable result, all sorts of will-worship and idolatry.

We simply add, in regard to the historical ground of the Israelitish calf-worship, that, while Apis was the highest object of this kind of worship among the Egyptians, there was, at least in later Egyptian history, another had in great reverence. Plutarch says (De Is. p. 33); “Mnevis, the sacred ox of Heliopolis, was honoured by the Egyptians with a reverence next to the Apis, whose sire some have pretended him to be.” Sir G. Wilkinson states that “the bull of Heliopolis appears to have been called in the hieroglyphic legends, Mne. It had a globe and feathers on its head; but though on the monuments of Upper Egypt, it is evident that it did not enjoy the same honours as Apis, beyond the precincts of its own city” (vol. v. p. 197). He adds, however, that “it was from this, and not from Apis, that the Israelites borrowed their notions of the golden calf; and the offerings, dancing, and rejoicings practised on the occasion, were doubtless in imitation of a ceremony they had witnessed in honour of Mnevis, during their sojourn in Egypt.” This proceeds, of course, on the supposition that the worship of Mnevis had been established prior to the exodus—which, however, is doubted by some of the learned, in particular by Hengstenberg, in the portion of his work on the Pentateuch above referred to. But it is a matter of no practical moment; as it is understood that the worship of the two bulls was perfectly similar in kind; and the reason of supposing Mnevis rather than Apis to have been more immediately in view at the erection of the golden calf, arises simply from the greater proximity of the seat of his worship to the settlements of Israel in Egypt.

CAL'NEH, OR CAL'NO, one of the cities which constituted Nimrod's first seat of empire—“the beginning of his kingdom,” Ge. x. 10. It was situated “in the land of Shinar,” the Scripture designation of Babylonia proper, or the southern plain which reaches to the Persian Gulf, Ge. xi. 2; Da. i. 2; comp. with Je. xxviii. 3. In Isaiah xi. 11, Shinar is distinguished from Asshur (Assyria), which formed its northern boundary. The older writers, following the Targums of Jerusalem and of Jonathan, and the fathers Eusebius and Jerome, and relying also on the fact that Pliny (vi. 30) states that Ctesiphon was in Chalontis, identified Calneh with Ctesiphon, a city on the eastern bank of the Tigris, opposite to Seleucia (Josephus, Antiq. xviii. 9, sect. 9); but this does not correspond to its designation in the land of Shinar, or in the plain between the Euphrates and the Tigris, and probably near the former. Rawlinson has suggested that its site is to be looked for at Niffer, where there are extensive ruins, a view adopted by Loftus (Researches in Chaldaea and Susiana, Lond. 1857, p. 100). There is nothing improbable in this supposition, but it waits confirmation. The name, though with a slight difference in the Masoretic punctuation, occurs in Amos vi. 2, and probably the same place is meant by Calno, Is. x. 9, for it is mentioned along with Hamath, as in Amos vi. 2. The reference in Amos is to some calamity which had overtaken this city, and to its then prostrate state, serving as a warning to Israel. This was probably its subjugation by the Assyrians (Baur, Der Prophet Amos, Glessen, 1847, p. 364), as intimated in the boastful language ascribed to their monarch, Is. x. 9, “Is not Calno as Carchemish? is not Hamath as Arpad? is not Samaria as Damascus?”—the meaning of which evidently is, that none of the cities against which he had directed his arms had been able to resist him; one and all fell before his indomitable might. [D. M.]

CALVARY, the name given to the spot where our Lord was crucified. It is properly the Latin name of the place, the Vulgate translating Calvaria; but the original or Hebrew designation was Golgotha, and the Greek synonym given in the Gospels is κρανίον. The import of each alike is skull; Christ was crucified on a place, which had its name from a skull, doubtless because it was a place for executions, and had already received an infamous character from its connection with the heads of dead men. For the place itself, see under JERUSALEM and its environs.

CAMEL, a well-known ruminant quadruped, whose native regions are Central and Western Asia. "The problem being proposed to construct an animated machine that should be best calculated to meet the exigencies of the animal, where could we find a better solution of it than in the construction of the camel? The pads or sole-cushions of the spreading feet are divided into two toes without being externally separated, which buoy up, as it were, the whole bulk with their expansive elasticity from sinking in the sand, on which it advances with silent step; the nostrils so formed that the animal can close them at will to exclude the drift sand of the parching simoom; the powerful upper incisor teeth for assisting in the division of the tough prickly shrubs and dry stunted herbage of the desert; and, above all, the cellular structure of the stomach, which is capable of being converted into an assemblage of water-tanks—bear ample testimony to the care manifested in the structure of this extraordinary quadruped"

(Penny Cyclopaedia). It is true the remarkable peculiarity last mentioned has been discredited by Burckhardt and others; but the positive testimony of Bruce (iv. 606) and other travellers has been confirmed by the anatomical dissections of Sir Everard Home.

The scriptural allusions must all be considered as referring to the same species, that with a single hump, known to naturalists as the Arabian camel (Camelus dromedarius). Notwithstanding this scientific appellation, the term dromedary is not, as often supposed, a distinction of species, but of breed. The word is of Greek origin, from δρομῆς, a runner (δρέμω, to run), and indicates merely a swift breed, bearing about the same relation to "camel," as our word "racer" does to "horse." Every dromedary is a camel, but every camel is not a dromedary.

There is another species, the Bactrian camel (C. bactrianus), distinguished by having two humps on the back; but the native regions of this kind are the steppes of Tartary and Central Asia. This species is bred in the north of Turkey, but in Syria and Palestine is scarcely known.

The unsightly excrescence on the back, known as the hump, is another express provision to adapt the animal for its geographical position. It is a fatty secretion, stored up under favourable circumstances as a reservoir of nutriment against scarcity; being absorbed into the system when the animal is pinched for food, a casualty that is continually occurring in the long caravan marches across barren deserts. The Arabs say that "the camel feeds on its own hump;" and hence, on setting out on a journey, they are solicitous about the condition of these excrescences; since, if they are plump, the animals can bear long-continued fatigue and short commons with impunity.

All these peculiarities pre-eminently adapt the camel for the desert: no other animal would replace it. From very early times it has been the great medium of commerce across the desert. It was to a caravan of "Ishmaelites with their camels bearing spicery, and balm, and myrrh," that Joseph was sold by his wicked brethren. And at a still more remote era, the pastoral wealth of Job included, before his calamity, three thousand camels, and afterwards six thousand; an enormous stock, probably unapproached in modern times. Aristotle, however, mentions Arabians who possessed the first-named number.

From the context of Gen. xii. 16, it seems implied that the animal wealth enumerated as possessed by Abram in Egypt, was conferred on him by the Pharaoh, as an amende for the abduction of Sarai: it is strange, therefore, that the camel nowhere occurs, we believe, in the multitudinous representations of Egyptian manners depicted in the tombs; though these include many pictures of agricultural occupations, of cattle, and other animals, wild and tame.

In the present made by Jacob to Esau, Ge. xxxii. 15, thirty milch camels were included, which indicates the use of camels' milk. At present it is much used by the Arabs; "it is the milk for drink; that of the goats and sheep being generally made into butter. Even the young horse colts, after being weaned, are fed exclusively on camels' milk for a considerable time, and in some tribes the adult horses partake of it largely. Flour made into a paste with sour camels' milk is a standing dish among the Bedouins. Rice or flour, boiled with sweet camels' milk, is another" (Kitto, Hist. of Palestine, II. 390).

The swiftness of the dromedary, or running camel, is alluded to several times in Scripture. It is named בֶּכֶר, becher, רַמְצָה, rammach, and רֶכֶשׁ, rechesh; this last agreeing with rechesh, which Col. H. Smith gives as one of the modern Arabic names of the swift camel. The term אַחַשְׁתְּרִימִי, achashterdim, Es. viii. 10, 14, appears to be the Hebrew plural form of a Persian word having the same meaning.

Purchas (v. 1, sect. 9) speaks of a sort of dromedary called raguahil, which are accustomed to perform journeys of nine hundred miles in eight days at furthest. And this is confirmed by other authorities. Lyon says that the makerry (el heirie) of the North African Arabs will continue at a long trot of nine miles an hour for many hours together. The "sabayee," said to be the fleetest breed of running camel, will, it is asserted, perform a journey of six hundred and thirty miles in five days. The Arabs thus express the proverbial swiftness of the heirie: "When thou shalt meet el heirie, and say to the rider 'Salem aleik!' (Peace be to you!), ere he shall have answered thee 'Aleik salem!' he will be afar off, and nearly out of sight, for his swiftness is like the wind." On such steeds was the Persian monarch's decree whirled to the extremities of his vast empire, that authorized the Jews to withstand the murderous intentions of the cruel Haman, Es. viii. 14.

The camel was included, Le. xi. 4, among the beasts which were interdicted from food and sacrifice as ceremonially unclean. (See CLEAN BEASTS.) Though a ruminant, it is an aberrant form, deviating from the typical character of its order in the form of its foot. "Instead of having short and abruptly truncated toes, completely enveloped in large hoofs, flattened internally, and forming the sole basis on which the animal rests in progression, the camels have their toes elongated forwards, and terminating in small horny appendages, surrounding the last phalanx alone, rounded above, and on either side, and somewhat curved, while the under surface of the foot, on which they tread, is covered only by a thickened callous skin" (Gard. and Menag. of Zool. Soc. t. 74). In its dentition also, as well as in some other particulars, the camel approaches the Pachydermata.

The long hair of the camel, which is somewhat woolly in texture, becomes, towards the close of spring, loose, and is easily pulled away in locks from the skin. This material is applied by the modern Arabs to various purposes, the principal of which is the weaving it into a coarse sort of cloth, chiefly used for tent-coverings. Garments of this rough and sordid material were worn by the Baptist in his severe course of isolation in the wilderness, Mat. iii. 4. It was an outward mark of that deadness to carnal enjoyment and mortification which marked John's mission as God's prophet in the apostasy of Israel—the position they ought to have taken, if they had known their true condition before Jehovah. In this, too, he imitated his great predecessor and type, Elijah, 2 Kl. i. 8, in a time of similar degeneracy (see also Zec. xiii. 4).

CAMPHIRE. In the Song of Solomon, i. 14; iv. 13, occurs the word כֹּפֶר (kopher), evidently denoting some fragrant plant. Our translators have rendered it camphire, or camphor; but there can be no doubt that the conjecture of Sir Thomas Browne is correct, and that the kopher of the Hebrews is the same as the κύπρος of the Greeks, and the well-known henna of the East.

The henna of the Arabs is a species of privet (Lawsonia inermis). Throughout the summer, in the gardens of Egypt and Palestine, it yields its delicate little clusters of blossom, lilac-coloured. On account of their exquisite perfume they are highly prized, and one of the street-cries of Cairo is, "O odours of paradise! O flowers of the henna!" These flowers grow in light open tufts, and are compared by Mariti to "an up-turned cluster of grapes;" and when we remember that they are still worn in their bosom by the ladies of the East, nothing can be more descriptive of a heart felt affection than the language of the Canticle:

"My beloved is unto me as a cluster of henna
From the vineyards (or gardens) of Engedi."

CANA, a town in Galilee, at no great distance from Capernaum, and remarkable chiefly as having been the scene of our Lord's first miracle. It was there he turned the water into wine, Jn. ii. 1. It was also the city of Nathanael; and the place where Jesus was applied to by the courtier or nobleman from Capernaum in behalf of his dying son, and with a word effected the cure. We have no further notice of it in New Testament history, and it is never mentioned in the Old. A long-established tradition has identified it with a village bearing the name of Kefr Kenna, which lies about four miles north-east from Nazareth, on the road to Tiberias, and about fifteen miles from the latter place. Dr. Robinson, however, disputes the correctness of this tradition, and decides in favour of a place called Kana-el-Jellil, somewhat farther off, and in a more northerly direction. "As far," he says, "as the prevalence of an ancient name among the common people is any evidence for the identity of an ancient site—and I hold it to be the strongest of all testimony, when, as here, not subject to extraneous influences, but rather in opposition to them—so far is the weight of evidence in favour of this northern Kana-el-Jelil, as the true site of the ancient Cana of Galilee. The name is identical, and stands the same in the Arabic version of the New Testament; while the form Kefr Kenna can only be twisted by force into a like shape. On this single ground, therefore, we should be authorized to reject the present monastic position of Cana, and fix the site at Cana-el-Jelil; which likewise is sufficiently near to Nazareth to accord with all the circumstances of the history."

A place bearing substantially the same name, but written Kanah, is mentioned in Jos. xix. 28, situated within the tribe of Asher, and apparently not far from Sidon.

CANAAN [merchant], Ho. xii. 7, where it is used in this sense of degenerate Israel: "Canaan! (merchant) the balances of deceit are in his hand." The word is found also in other passages in the sense of merchant, Is. xliii. 9; Eze. xvii. 4, &c.; but this possibly, as is held by some, may be a secondary meaning, flowing from its use as a proper name. As a proper name, it occurs first of one of the sons of Ham—and, as there seems good reason to believe, the youngest son. For he is mentioned last in the genealogy of Ham's family, Ge. x. 6; and, when there was no special reason for departing from the order of nature (such as arose from the mention of the chosen line), the names would naturally hold the place in the genealogical table which belonged to them as children in the family. Canaan, however, though seemingly the youngest son of Ham, is brought into singular prominence in connection with his father's unbecoming behaviour toward Noah, and represented as somehow bound up with the father in respect to the guilt and the punishment. It is said that "Ham, the father of Canaan, saw the nakedness of his father, and told his two brethren without." And when Noah recovered himself, and pronounced the remarkable prophecy that indicated the general destiny of his offspring, not only is Canaan individually mentioned, but in the mention of him the father appears to be forgotten, and three successive times is his name uttered with a curse. "And he said, Cursed be Canaan; a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren. Blessed be the Lord God of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant. God shall enlarge Japheth, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant," Ge. ix. 22-27. To account for this very striking peculiarity, various conjectures have been made—such as suggesting an alteration in the text, reading, Cursed be Ham, the father of Canaan—for which there is no authority; and supposing that Canaan may have actively participated in his father's guilt on the occasion, which also is without any countenance from the narrative, and, even if warranted, would not sufficiently explain the singular prominence given to the name of Canaan. The most natural explanation is that which proceeds on the ground of a correspondence between the relation of Ham to Noah on the one side, and of Canaan to Ham on the other. Ham, the youngest son of Noah, had acted with indecent levity toward his father, becoming a shame and reproach to him in his old age; and so, in the retributive providence of God, Ham should be punished in his youngest son; indecent levity in that branch of his family, growing into shameful profligacy and insufferable abominations, should contaminate the line, and hang as a cloud of doom over its future destinies. (See HAM.)

CANAAN, PEOPLE OF, CANAANITES, the descendants of the Canaan just mentioned. In the original genealogical table, the family tree is given thus: "And Canaan begat Sidon his first-born, and Heth, and the Jebusite, and the Amorite, and the Girgashite, and the Hivite, and the Arkite, and the Sinite, and the Arvadite, and the Zemarite, and the Hamathite; and afterwards were the families of the Canaanites spread abroad. And the border of the Canaanites was from Sidon, as thou comest to Gerar, unto Gaza; as thou goest unto Sodom and Gomorrah, and Admah and Zeboim, even unto Lasha," Ge. x. 15-19. Here two points naturally suggest themselves for separate consideration: the Canaanite progeny viewed as a race among the tribal divisions of the human family, and the character and destiny which more peculiarly distinguished them.

(1.) In regard to the first point, there can be no doubt as to the larger proportion of the tribes into which the stem of Canaan branched forth; we meet with them too frequently in sacred history to be in any difficulty, either as to who they were or where they were to be met with. If we know next to nothing about the Zemarite and the Sinite, this can only arise from their being among the smaller sections of the race; for the connection in which the names occur renders it manifest that they had their place among the families which stretched along the Mediterranean coast from Lebanon on the north, to the Dead Sea and the country of the Philistines on the south. The race was unquestionably a very prolific, active, and enterprising one. They rapidly grew into a numerous progeny, having been already extensively spread abroad at the comparatively early period when Abraham came as a sojourner into the region they occupied: "the Canaanite was then in the land" as a settled inhabitant, though still evidently forming but a sparse population. Their situation proved favourable both for agriculture and commerce; and in neither respect did they neglect the advantages placed within their reach. At the time of the conquest under Joshua, about B.C. 1450, it is evident that the land was already in a state of general cultivation; since, in the books of Moses we have the most glowing descriptions of its fertility and resources, and the greatest difficulties of the invaders arose from the number of its inhabitants, and the height to which they had risen in the arts of civilized life. The commercial cities of Tyre and Sidon are also mentioned as in existence, Jos. xix. 28, 29, and as even then enjoying an honourable distinction; for they are singled out in the list of neighbouring cities for special notice—the one as "great Sidon," the other as "the strong city of Tyre." This perfectly accords with the traditions of Phœnician history in profane writers, which represent these Canaanite cities on the Phœnician coast as, in the very dawn of civilization, taking the lead in commercial enterprise, and, while enriching themselves, benefiting others by their busy trade and maritime intercourse. As the first merchants of the world, they must also have been, if not actually the inventors of writing (for it probably had an antediluvian origin), at least its earliest cultivators; since their commercial necessities would naturally call it into requisition; and we can thus easily account for the tradition which ascribes both the invention of letters and their introduction among the Ionians to the Phœnicians. Commerce then, as so often since, proved the pioneer of learning and civilization. And there must undoubtedly have been superior natural qualities in the mental and physical constitution, as well as advantages in the local position, of a race which could so distinguish itself for active energy, and take so prominent a part in the civil and commercial history of nations.

It is not, however, what the progeny of Canaan became and did in the region of their proper home, that is here to be made account of; for they took an important place among the earlier colonists, as well as the enterprising traders of the world. In the original record already quoted from Genesis, it is said, after enumerating the different Palestinian tribes that sprang from Canaan, that "afterwards the families of the Canaanites were spread abroad." We have here an indication of the emigrating spirit that distinguished especially the Phœnician section of the race, and the foreign settlements that were planted by them. Of these we have no account in Old Testament scripture; but the defect is to some extent supplied by notices that have been transmitted through other channels, or have been gathered from extant inscriptions and monuments. Cyprus, it has been ascertained, was at an early period possessed and colonized by them, and a great many Phœnician inscriptions have been found on it. Their progress westward can be distinctly traced at intervals along the coast of Asia Minor, and among the islands of the Archipelago; they had possessions in Crete; the greater part of the Cyclades were colonized by them (Thucyd. i. 8); they left traces of their operations in Chios and Samos, Cilicia, Caria, and Lydia; Herodotus makes mention of the remains of their gigantic mining operations in the island of Thasos (vi. 47); along the coast of Thrace also they had mining settlements (Plin. vii. 57); and the promontories and adjacent isles of Sicily, and Tartessus (the Tarshish of Scripture), and other places in the south of Spain, were long held by them for purposes of mining and commercial enterprise (Thucyd. vi. 2; Velleius, i. 2). But their largest colonies, and those which kept longest possession of the field, were their settlements in the north of Africa: Utica, their earliest settlement, founded, it is supposed, more than a thousand years B.C. (Plin. xvi. 79; Arist. Mirab. Auscult. c. 146); Hippo, Adrumetum, above all, Carthage. Traces existed in these latter places, so late as the time of Augustine, of the Phœnician origin of the people; for he says, in connection with a very fanciful allusion to the case of the Canaanitish woman, whose daughter was healed by our Lord (Epi. ad Rom. Expositio, c. 13), that if the rustics about Hippo were asked what they were, as to their origin, they were wont to answer Chanani, that is, he adds, "by the mere change of a letter Canaanites" (Chanani, i.e. Chananzœe esse). Procopius, also, makes mention of a monument found in Tigitina, with this inscription, Ἡμεῖς ἐσμεν οἱ φυγάδες ἀπὸ προσώπων Ἰησοῦ τοῦ Ἀἰσίου. We are those who fled from the presence of Joshua the plunderer (Vandall ii 10); and it is said that traditions exist among the Arabians, to the effect that the people of Barbary were the descendants of these refugees. There is nothing improbable in the circumstance. While for commercial purposes merely, the Phœnicians were led to establish colonies at a very remote period on the African coast, it is by no means unlikely that these colonies might receive very considerable accessions from those who sought refuge by flight at the conquest of Canaan by Joshua. Multitudes undoubtedly did seek refuge in that way; and the African colonies of the Phœnicians would very naturally present themselves as a reasonable outlet for them. This opinion was maintained and, with his usual profusion of learning, advocated by Bochart (Phaleg. i. c. 24); and later researches have found no reason to call it in question.

"Thus, then," we may conclude in the words of Heeren, who, in his second chapter on the Phœnicians, gives a clear and succinct account of the enterprising and expansive energies of the Canaanite race, "this remarkable people spread themselves, not by fire and sword, and sanguinary conquests, but by peaceable and slower efforts, yet equally certain. No overthrown cities and desolated countries, such as marked the military expeditions of the Medes and Assyrians, marked their progress; but a long series of flourishing colonies, agriculture, and the arts of peace among the previously rude barbarians, pointed out the victorious career of the Tyrian Hercules." Would that the moral in their history had in any measure corresponded with the physical and mental! The issue should then have been very different. But all was marred by the incorrigible and wide-spread corruption of manners, in which they attained so bad a pre-eminence, that they became the peculiar subjects of divine wrath.

(2.) This has respect to the second point that was to be noticed—their character and destiny. As represented in the books of Moses, the abominations of heathenism reached, among the Canaanites, a depth and aggravation of foulness considerably beyond that of the surrounding nations, such as to deserve and draw down the more severe inflictions of Heaven's judgment. These, for a warning to the rest, fell first upon Sodom and the other cities of the plain, which outran all their neighbours in the race of impurity. But as the work of evil still proceeded, and the people, as a whole, became at length a reproach to humanity, the Lord laid their land under his solemn ban, by which it was withdrawn from its original occupancy, and, after being purged of its shameful abominations, was set apart to a strictly sacred purpose: it was constituted, in a peculiar sense, the Lord's own land, and, as such, was given for the inheritance of his covenant-people. (See ANATHEMA.) Such is the scriptural account of the matter; and it is the only one that will stand a close examination. Other and milder representations have sometimes been set forth, with the view of meeting the objections of unbelievers to the apparent harshness of the scriptural account—such as the old Jewish tradition, that in the original distribution of the earth among the descendants of Noah, the land of Canaan was assigned to the children of Israel; and the view of Michaelis, that the forefathers of Israel, by dwelling for a time as herdsmen in the land, had acquired a right to the soil, which it was competent for them to make good whenever they pleased at the edge of the sword. Such explanations are palpably insufficient: they rest on no proper historical basis, and are too manifestly of the nature of shifts for the occasion to serve the purpose for which they are invented. If the extirpation of the Canaanites, and the occupation of their territory, by the Israelites, cannot be vindicated on the great principles of righteousness, no considerations of a more reconditæ or simply political kind can ever succeed in reconciling it to men's convictions of right.

It is true we are possessed of no such minute or detailed account of the moral condition of the Canaanites, as might enable us to institute a close comparison between them in that respect and the other nations of ancient heathendom. But we know for certain, that a dreadful depravation of manners became generally prevalent among them at an early period, and grew till it reached a shameful height. It is chiefly of the Phœnician branch of the inhabitants, and their colonial establishments, that we have notices in the classical remains of antiquity; but these are such as to convey a very distinct impression of more than ordinary dissoluteness, and, in general, of a low moral tone. Phœnician faith appears to have been held in much the same repute as Punic faith; a "Phœnician lie," Strabo tells us, was a common saying (iii. p. 170); and the general tradition respecting the Astarte or Venus worship, which always carried along with it scandalous excesses, points to Syria, and often specially to Phœnicia, as its original seat. When we turn to the earlier records of the Bible, we find evident symptoms of this demoralization as a thing already at work, though by no means advanced to its final stages. The iniquity of the Amorites had become palpable, only it was not yet full, Ge. xv. 16; but in the cities of the plain, where circumstances favoured its development, it had reached such a height, even in the time of Abraham, as to draw down the consuming fire of Heaven. The case of these was like a mirror, in which the whole future of the Canaanite race reflected itself: first, the scandalous practices toward which nature in them seemed to have a peculiar tendency, and following on these the righteous judgment of Heaven, laying its terrible arrest on the evil by sweeping the evil-doers into the pit of destruction! Had the people of Canaan not been already far gone in the way of perdition, the fearful outbreak of sin and judgment in the vale of Sodom would have sounded (as it was no doubt designed to do) like a solemn warning-note in their ears, and led them to turn back in their course of degeneracy. For this, however, it proved quite ineffectual; and when we open the page of sacred history a few generations later, the most appalling representations meet us of the moral condition of the Canaanites. Thus, after mentioning and forbidding the foulest abominations, in respect to carnal indulgence, and going after "strange flesh," it is added in Le. xviii. 24: "Defile not yourselves in any of these things; for in all these the nations are defiled that I cast out before you; and the land is defiled; therefore I do visit the iniquity thereof upon it, and the land itself vomiteth out its inhabitants." So also in regard to its idolatrous worship, with the horrid rites and superstitious practices attending it, it is said, "All that do these things are an abomination to the Lord; and because of these abominations the Lord thy God doth drive them out from before thee," De. xviii. 12.

Now, it is possible enough, that there may have been particular places, or even whole countries, as much addicted to these gross and polluting practices as the Canaanites, which yet were not made the subjects of so special and overwhelming a judgment; but this, if it were so—and we cannot be quite sure that it actually has been—would not essentially alter the case in regard to the Canaanites. It is clear, from the statements given on the authority of God himself, that by the time the sentence of extermination was issued against them, they had fallen into a state of profound and hopeless depravity; their sins were of that kind, which may be emphatically said to cry to Heaven for vengeance; and so the ban of extermination under which they were placed involves no other difficulty than has to be encountered in the judgment executed upon the antediluvian world by the flood; or the destruction that overthrew the cities of the plain; or the desolations that ultimately swept like a torrent over Israel itself; or, indeed, any of the general calamities which God has from time to time sent upon the world to chastise men for their corruptions. The ultimate ground and rationale of them all, is the fact of a moral Governor of the world, who must vindicate his authority, and often, by fearful things in righteousness, recall the wayward hearts of men to soberness and truth. Let this great fact be but granted and allowed its due weight, and the mystery that hangs over such cases of retribution to a large extent disappears. Nor should it be forgotten in regard to the Canaanites, how much to them of mercy was mingled with the judgment; that to give space for repentance, the stroke of vengeance was for centuries delayed; that various means of reformation were employed, especially in the exhibition of judgment upon the cities of the plain, and the living testimony of such eminent witnesses for the truth as Melchizedec, Abraham, and his immediate descendants; that plain intimations also were given, from time to time, of the coming doom—all tending, when duly considered, to show how loath God was to execute the work of doom, and rendering more manifest the incurable corruption and heedless profligacy of those on whom it was to alight.

Such being the real state of the case as regards the Canaanites themselves, it is obviously a secondary consideration, by what sort of instrumentality the sentence of doom might be put in execution. But if respect be had—as it manifestly, and even pre-eminently, ought in such a case to be—to the moral aspect and bearing of the transaction, then decidedly the fittest instrumentality was the agency of the people who were to succeed to the possession of the land. For, entering thus on their new destiny as the select instruments of Heaven for putting in force its decree against transgressors, and consecrating the land for a peculiar possession of God, the most effectual means that could be devised were taken, to impress upon their minds the holy nature of their calling, and commit them irrevocably to the cause of righteousness. They could no longer think of the foundations of their national existence without being reminded of their obligation to keep themselves from the pollutions of the world. The very position they occupied was a perpetual call to holiness of heart and conduct; nor could they turn back to the corruptions, on account of which they had been commissioned to drive out their predecessors from before them, without turning their own glory into shame, and practically disannulling their title to the inheritance.

And there is a still further consideration not to be overlooked in the vindication of this part of the divine procedure—namely, its typical bearing on the interests of God's kingdom. Nothing in Old Testament times can be fully understood, unless it is brought into connection with the grander things that were to happen in the ends of the world, and of which all that went before was, in one respect or another, but the foreshadow and preparation. In that scheme of provisional arrangements which was interwoven with the history of ancient Israel, Canaan was the land of rest, the inheritance, and, as such, the type and pledge of that everlasting inheritance which is laid up for the saints in glory. But this inheritance can only be entered by those for whom it is destined as conquerors; it is to be won from the hand of the adversary; and if they cannot overmaster the powers of evil, judge Satan, and cast him out, with all his lies and abominations, neither can they sit down and possess the kingdom. Now, in all this the earthly inheritance must be the image of the heavenly. The work given to Joshua and the host of Israel must anticipate what, in the higher sphere of the spiritual life, was to be done by Jesus and his redeemed people. And if the history of Israel as to its entrance on the land of Canaan had been materially different from what it actually was, one does not see how the things that then happened could have adequately forecast the future, and served properly to exhibit, on the theatre of the outward and visible, the pattern of what is spiritual and eternal.

Thus, when viewed in its proper light, and its various relations, the remarkable fate of the Canaanites, though so often assailed by infidels, is capable of a satisfactory explanation; and the Bible account, which brings clearly and broadly out the great moral principles connected with it, is that which most approves itself to our intelligent apprehensions and spiritual convictions.

CANAAN, LAND OF, viewed as the inheritance of Israel. The language employed respecting the land of the Canaanites is somewhat variable, according to the point of view from which it was contemplated; and occasionally terms are employed which it is not quite easy to reconcile with what is elsewhere stated. But there can be little doubt that the boundaries given in the genealogical table of Ge. x. 15-19, comprise all that strictly belonged to the land, which received its denomination from them. What they held elsewhere, after they had begun to "spread themselves abroad," belonged to them merely as isolated points, mercantile emporiums, or colonial settlements. Looking, therefore, to that original geographical statement, we find that "the border of the Canaanites was from Sidon, as thou comest from Gerar, unto Gaza"—that is, from the southern side of Lebanon along the Mediterranean coast to the country of the Philistines. Then it turned right east to the Dead Sea, "as thou goest unto Sodom and Gomorrah, and Admah and Zebaim, even unto Lasha." The city of Lasha is not again referred to; but it was manifestly in the immediate neighbourhood of the cities of the plain. So that, as thus defined, the country of the Canaanites was simply the tract lying within the Jordan and the Mediterranean, and stretching from Mount Lebanon on the north to the Dead Sea and the wilderness of Judah on the south. It is chiefly on the northern line that uncertainty hangs, though, as the conquests appear to have gone no farther than Mount Hermon, and Sidon is the most northerly town expressly mentioned in the tribe of Asher, the probability is that the real boundary line lay not far beyond Sidon. (See HAMATH.)

The terms of the promise given to the Israelites perfectly accord with this, when they are properly read. In the first local description, indeed, made to Abraham, Ge. xv. 18-21, a wider compass seems to be embraced: "Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt to the great river, the river Euphrates." But the specification that follows shows what was the portion more particularly meant, "the Kenites, and the Kenizzites, and the Kadmonites, and the Hittites, and the Perizzites, and the Rephaims, and the Amorites, and the Canaanites, and the Girgasites, and the Jebusites"—all tribes that lay within the region designated above. Either, therefore, in the general outline "from the river of Egypt to the river Euphrates," there was meant to be held out to the covenant-people such a place and position as would secure their ascendancy over the whole of that district (which proved to be the case in the better periods of their history); or the promise was made to Abraham, not merely as the head of the covenant-people, but as the common father of the Ishmaelite as well as Israelite tribes, with various other families that ultimately merged in these, and which unquestionably did spread themselves by degrees over the entire region in question. The former supposition, however, seems the more natural; as, by the distinct tribes mentioned, we appear to be told what was to be the proper possession of Abraham's seed, while it is at the same time indicated that, as the owners of such a territory, they should wield a much more extensive sway. If we look from the promise to the historical record of the fulfilment, we find the same conclusion forced on us as to the proper boundaries of the land of Canaan: "The Lord gave unto Israel," it is said in Jos. xxi. 43, "all the land which he swore to give unto their fathers; and they possessed it, and dwelt therein. . . . There failed not ought of any good thing, which the Lord had spoken unto the house of Israel; all came to pass." This refers, of course, only to the extent and compass of territory brought under the power of Israel, which reached to the utmost bounds of the Promised Land, and even on the farther side of Jordan included a considerable tract of country, that formed no part of what was strictly Canaanitish soil. Within the territory actually won, there were, as the sacred history elsewhere informs us, various strongholds and cities belonging to the original inhabitants which still held their ground, and some of which were never wholly dispossessed. But these were only a few isolated spots, which would have been of little moment if Israel had remained steadfast to the covenant of God, and which, even as it was, were gradually reduced within narrower bounds, till they well-nigh disappeared. During the struggles that ensued with these remnants of the ancient stock, the Canaanites are sometimes mentioned as distinct from the particular tribes, and a Jabin, king of Canaan, is even represented as for a time lording it over Israel, Ju. iv. 2; also iii. 5, &c. But the connection renders it plain that these were but portions of the original race in certain localities, retaining for some reason or another the general name of the race, without being recognized as a distinct tribe.

The country thus defined and bounded was comparatively limited extent. In breadth, from Jordan to the Mediterranean, it rarely exceeds fifty miles; and from Dan to Beersheba, its two extreme cities in a longitudinal direction, the distance does not exceed 180 miles. Allowing a little margin for territory not conquered by the Israelites, the whole region of Canaan proper could scarcely have formed more than a square of 200 miles in one direction by 50 in another, or an area of 10,000 square miles. But, as if to compensate for this smallness of range, it was extremely varied in its natural features, and in its characteristics of soil and climate distinguished by manifold diversities. These it derived in a very great degree from the ridges of hills that intersect the country, and which now form, as they must ever have done, one of its most striking peculiarities. Standing in what is not far from the middle of the whole region, in the vast and fertile plain of Esdraelon, one perceives on looking northwards a vast amphitheatre of mountains, commencing with a variety of smaller eminences near at hand, and rising by degrees into the loftier ridges that look down upon the Sea of Galilee, till they reach their culmination in the snowy summit of Mount Hermon, 10,000 feet above the level of the sea. On the other side there is also to be seen a succession of eminences, with a general rise toward the south—in the immediate foreground the ridge of Carmel, stretching almost right across the country, but even at its greatest height near the western coast not rising above 1500 feet; then the hills of Samaria and the northern parts of Judah, which sometimes attain an elevation of 2000 feet, and these swelling onwards like a vast sea of rock, till in the region about Hebron they rise about 3000 feet, whence they begin to take for a time a downward inclination. "As a general rule," therefore, to use the words of Stanley, "Palestine is not merely a mountainous country, but a mass of mountains, rising from a level sea-coast on the west, and from a level desert on the east, only cut asunder by the valley of the Jordan from north to south, and by the valley of Jezreel from east to west. The result of this peculiarity is, that not merely the hill-tops, but the valleys and plains of the interior of Palestine, both east and west, are themselves so high above the level of the sea, as to partake of all the main characteristics of mountainous history and scenery. Jerusalem is of nearly the same elevation as the highest ground in England, and most of the chief cities of Palestine are several hundred feet above the Mediterranean Sea" (Sinai and Palestine, p. 128).

The prevailing character of the rock of which these mountain ridges are composed is limestone, and that belonging for the most part to the Jura and chalk formation. There are no volcanic formations, except in the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea; but in the northern parts basalt occasionally interchanges with the limestone, and on that as its basis rests the great plain of Esdraelon. The limestone of the higher elevations in Samaria and Judah is firm and compact; but in other places it becomes soft and marly, producing, when properly supplied with moisture, a luxuriant vegetation. As this, however, often comparatively fails, especially in summer, and amid the general stagnation that prevails, little is done by artificial means to stimulate the vegetation, the hills too often present to the traveller a bare, whitish, or gray and parched aspect, fitted rather to fatigue than to please the eye, and to awaken feelings of disappointment. But the capabilities both of the soil and of the climate are great; they are favourable, in particular, to the cultivation of the vine, the fig, the olive, and the mulberry; and when the land was filled with a thriving and active population—as it was under the original inhabitants before the conquest, and for ages afterwards under the covenant-people—its appearance must have been very different from what it now presents. It was then, no doubt, most truthfully described by Moses, as emphatically "a good land; a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths that spring out of valleys and hills; a land of wheat, and barley, and vines, and fig-trees, and pomegranates; a land of oil-olive, and honey; a land wherein thou shalt eat bread without scarceness, thou shalt not lack anything in it; a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass," De. viii. 7-9. Even to this day many of these hills bear evidence, in their scarped rocks and ruined terrace-walls, to the pains that in ancient times had been taken to collect the mould on their slopes, and raise on it a fruitful cultivation. That it is not only capable of bearing, but actually has borne, a clothed and fertile appearance, and sustained in comfort a numerous population, admits now of no manner of doubt. Taking all, therefore, into account—what the land of Canaan was by nature, and what it had been made by industry and art—its pleasant varieties of hill and dale, its crystal streams and flowing brooks, its fertile plains, terraced hills, and wild romantic uplands—the land might well (to use again the language of Stanley) "be considered the prize of the eastern world, the possession of which was the mark of God's peculiar favour; the spot for which the nations would contend, as on a smaller scale the Bedouin tribes for some 'diamond of the desert'—some 'palm-grove islanded amid the waste.' And a land, of which the blessings were so evidently the gift of God, not as in Egypt, of man's labour; which also, by reason of its narrow extent, was so constantly within reach and sight of the neighbouring desert, was eminently calculated to raise the thoughts of the nation to the Supreme Giver of all these blessings, and to bind it by the dearest ties to the land which he had so manifestly favoured" (Sinai and Palestine, p. 123).

This last consideration touches on the reasons which may have led to the selection of Canaan as the possession of God's peculiar people. In that respect some weight may justly be assigned to it. But beside the natural properties of the land itself, which in extent, appearance, and resources, singularly fitted it for the home of such a people as Israel, the relative position of Canaan in respect to the surrounding countries must be regarded as what chiefly exercised a determining influence. The advantages which the land of Canaan afforded to its original inhabitants for developing their energies, and rising to civil and commercial rank in the world, were emblematic of similar advantages which, in a moral respect, it presented to the chosen people for fulfilling their high calling, and operating with effect upon the ignorance and corruption of the world. Israel was to be God's light among the nations of ancient time; and the land of Canaan was the most appropriate eminence on which it could be placed. "I have set it," said God, "in the midst of the nations and the countries round about," Ess. v. 5. "Viewing the world as it existed at the time of Israel's settlement in Canaan, and for a thousand years afterwards, we believe it would be impossible to fix upon a single region so admirably fitted, at once to serve as a suitable dwelling-place for such a people, and to enable them, as from a central and well-chosen vantage-ground, to act with success upon the heathenism of the world. It lay nearly mid-way between the oldest and most influential states of antiquity—on the one side Egypt and Ethiopia, with their dependencies; on the other Babylon, Nineveh, India—the seats of art and civilization, when the rest of the world still lay in comparative barbarism, and to which the much later, but ultimately more powerful commonwealths of Europe were primarily indebted for their skill, and even their philosophy and religion. Then, in the immediate neighbourhood were the Phœnician mariners, whose sails frequented every harbour of the civilized world; and all around, the Ishmaelite tribes, the great inland traders, who kept up a perpetual and most extensive intercourse among the different communities of Southern Asia and Northern Africa. So that isolated as the land of Canaan in some respects was, it was the very reverse of being withdrawn to a corner; and no region in the whole ancient world could have been selected, that afforded more obvious and varied facilities for exerting a beneficial and commanding influence on the mind of ancient heathendom" (Fairbairn's Ezekiel, p. 68). Unfortunately, the advantages thus placed within the reach of Israel were but rarely used as they should have been; and it ultimately fared with them, the conquerors of Canaan, much as it had previously fared with the original occupants. (For the present state of the country, see under PALESTINE.)

CANDACE, the English form of Κανδάκη, and the designation of that queen of the Ethiopians, whose eunuch or treasurer was converted to the faith of the gospel through the instrumentality of Philip, when on the way back from Jerusalem to Ethiopia, Ac. viii. 27, seq. The Ethiopia here referred to, it is now on all hands agreed, was that region in Upper Nubia, which anciently went by the name of Meroë, sometimes called "the Island of Meroë," from its situation between the Nile on the one side, and the Atbara on the other. The term CANDACE appears to have been rather an official title than a proper name, somewhat like the Pharaoh of Egypt. This is expressly testified by Pliny (vi. 35), who, speaking of centurions sent by Nero to explore the country, gives it as their report, that "a woman reigned in Meroë, Candace (regnare in Meroë Candacen), which name had now for a long time been transmitted to its queens." We have notices in Strabo (xvii. 820) and Dio Cassius (liv. 6) of a queen of Meroë called Candace in the time of Augustus, who was of warlike disposition, and betwixt whom and the governor of Egypt, Caius Petronius, there was some skirmishing—not to her advantage, for she was first defeated in battle, and then had her capital, Napata, taken. Eusebius also mentions that so late even as his day the queens of Ethiopia continued to bear the name of Candace.

This singular prominence given to females in the governing power of Ethiopia, is confirmed by the monuments of the country. Comparing these with the remains of ancient Egypt, Heeren says, "The most remarkable difference appears in the persons offering: the queens appear with the kings; and not merely as presenting offerings, but as heroines and conquerors. Nothing of this kind has yet been discovered in the Egyptian reliefs, either in Egypt or Nubia" (Ancient Egypt, ch. 11.) Referring to the representations in one of the pyramids, as given by Caillaud, Heeren states, that "in one compartment a female warrior, with the royal ensigns on her head, and richly attired, drags forward a number of captives as offerings to the gods; upon the other she is in a warlike habit, about to destroy the same group, whose heads are fastened together by the top hair. On a third relief in the sanctuary she is making an offering of frankincense to the goddess." The same peculiarity was marked by Rüppel of Frankfort in the land of Kurgos, somewhat beyond Meroë. At one pyramid he found, among other things, two female figures at the entrance, holding lances in their hands, and in the act of piercing with them a band of prisoners; also in various others "the reliefs represent apotheoses of female figures only, while in all others they represent heroes, to whom offerings are brought." "If we look into history," Heeren adds, "we shall there find some little help towards a general explanation. 'Among the Ethiopians,' says Strabo, speaking of Meroë, the women are also armed.' We know, too, that they sometimes mounted the throne. Herodotus mentions a Nitocris among the ancient queens of Ethiopia, who ruled over Egypt (ii. 100). Upon the relief which represents the conquest of Ethiopia by Sesostris there is a queen with her sons, who appears before him as a captive. A long succession of queens under the title of Candace must have reigned there; and when at last the seat of empire was removed from Meroë to Napata, near Mount Berkal, there was also there a queen who ruled under the title of Candace. It is not, therefore, strange, but quite agreeable to Ethiopian usages, to see a queen in a warlike habit near her consort; although history has preserved nothing particular on the subject."

It may justly be inferred from the Ethiopian eunuch under Candace having gone to Jerusalem to worship, that Judaism had obtained considerable prevalence in the country, to which their practice, from remote times, of the rite of circumcision may have not a little contributed. Tradition ascribes to the converted eunuch the conversion also of Candace, and of many of her subjects, to the faith. This is quite probable, but no certain accounts have reached us on the subject.

CANDLE is frequently used in the English version of the Bible, where lamp, or the more general term light, would have been the more literal rendering. Usually, however, candle gives the substantial import, since at the time the translation was made candles had relatively the same place in domestic use that lamps had in ancient Israel. Symbolically, the expression is used (1) with reference to the clearness and accuracy of view, which is obtained by means of a candle in searching through an apartment, as when the Lord speaks of searching Jerusalem with candles, Zep. i. 13; or when the spirit of man itself, the light of conscience within, is called the Lord's candle to search the inward parts, Pr. xx. 27; (2) with reference to the knowledge or discernment generally, which is inseparable from it simply as a light, as when our Lord calls his people the light of the world, Mat. v. 14; (3) with reference to the cheering and gladdening influence, which when properly supplied a candle sheds through the house, as when it is said of David, that he was the lamp or candle of Israel, 2Sa. xxi. 17; or of the wicked, that the lamp of the wicked shall be put out, Pr. xiii. 9.

CANDLESTICK [מְנוֹרָה, menorah, lamp-stand, light-bearer], the distinctive name for the candelabrum of the sanctuary, and used only for it, and of those made after its pattern for the temple, 1Ki. vii. 49. According to the directions given for making it in Ex. xxv. 31-39, it was formed of a talent of pure gold. The description given of it is perfectly intelligible and plain as regards its general structure and appearance, but is not sufficiently explicit to enable us to determine with accuracy the subordinate parts. There can be no doubt that it had in the centre an upright stem, and that from this stem branched out six arms, three on each side, so as to present atop, along with the central column, a seven-fold light. It is not, however, distinctly said, that the six lateral and the one central supports were all to rise to the same height, and the lamps standing on them were to be on a level. This might very naturally present itself as the most appropriate form, and, if we may judge from the figure of the candlestick inscribed on the triumphal arch of Titus, among the furniture of the second temple, it would seem also to have been the form actually adopted.

There is a certain indistinctness also about the ornaments with which it was to be covered. In Ex. xxv. 33, 34, there are required to be made "three bowls like unto almonds, with a knop and a flower in one branch; and three bowls made like almonds in the other branch, with a knop and a flower: so in the six branches that come out of the candlestick. And in the candlestick (viz. in the main stem, as contradistinguished from the branches) shall be four bowls made like unto almonds, with their knops and their flowers." Almond-shaped bowls or cups evidently form the first part of these ornaments; and as flowers are mentioned separately, the natural inference is, that the fruit not the flower of the almond is what is here referred to—a cup-like ornament shaped after the form of an almond. The next ornament is more uncertain; in the English Bible it is called knop, in the Hebrew it is kaphtor, and the Septuagint and Vulgate translations render it by words (σφαιρωτήρες, spherulæ) which merely indicate a round or spherical shape. Josephus and some of the ancients understood by it apples, or rather pomegranates. But the term is not that which is elsewhere applied to either apples or pomegranates; and it is impossible to go further than to say, that it seems to denote something of a rounded form; and knops may serve as well as anything else for a rendering. This particular ornament was to be succeeded by a flower; and the whole three—almond-shaped cup, knop, and flower—were to be three times repeated on each branch, and four times on the main stem: so that the same ornamental series occurred in all twenty-two times upon the candlestick.

In regard to the base, no particular directions are given; but for the lamps, it is clear that they merely rested upon the top of the different branches and the stem, and were not an integral part of the main piece. Indeed, it could not well be otherwise, as it had been very difficult to get them properly cleaned and trimmed if they had been attached to the stand on which they rested.

From the description thus given, there will obviously appear no ground for the opinion which would regard the candlestick as intended to represent a fruit-bearing tree, consisting of a main stem and of six branches. This would anyhow have been unnatural, seeing that not fruit but lights formed the end or consummation to which all was manifestly designed to contribute. But even in the relative position of the ornaments themselves there is nothing to countenance the idea; since, while these comprised representations of both fruit and flowers, the fruit took precedence of the flowers, and not the flowers of the fruit, as in the field of nature. There is no reason for supposing the ornaments to have had any other design than to add to the elegance and ornateness of the structure, precisely as the more elaborate parts of the high-priest's dress were said to be for ornament and for beauty. The solid gold, in like manner, of which the whole was composed, was intended to give an impression of the costly and precious nature of the article, as serving an important and valuable purpose in the Old Testament economy.

In this purpose we are, doubtless, to include its more immediate or natural use, simply as a provision for diffusing material light. There being no windows in the tabernacle, the light could only enter by the outer curtain, which was drawn up by day; and, if there was not to be total darkness during the night, there must have been some means for artificially supplying it. This was done through the golden candlestick, which Aaron was commanded to "light in the evening," so as to cause them to burn "from evening to morning before the Lord," Ex. xxvii. 21; xxx. 7, 8; Le. xxiv. 3. Hence, we read of the Lord having appeared to Samuel "before the lamp of God went out in the temple of the Lord," 1Sa. iii. 3; namely, before the time when the dawn of day rendered the artificial light in the sanctuary no longer necessary. Josephus, indeed, states that the custom was to keep the lamps burning night and day; but this, if correct, only proves the later usage to have been so far different from the earlier, and perhaps arose from the same feeling which led the people to multiply rites and fasts beyond what were prescribed in the law of Moses. The candlestick, in its natural use, as represented in Scripture, was a substitute for the natural light of day; hence, to be brought into requisition only when this failed; so that the dwelling of God might never appear to be enveloped in gloom, or without the apparatus necessary for conducting holy ministrations. And had the tabernacle, or temple, to which the candlestick belonged, been erected simply for the purpose of presenting suitable and appropriate services to God, in connection with the religious economy then existing, there might possibly have been no further design contemplated in its structure and use than the one now mentioned, of giving light in the sanctuary to those who might be ministering in holy things. But as everything in the earthly tabernacle was made to image what pertained to a higher—framed so as to symbolize the spiritual truths of God's kingdom, both as then unfolded, and as destined hereafter to receive a fuller development, the natural use of the candlestick could by no means exhaust its meaning, but must only have formed the ground of a spiritual and typical use. But as this cannot be exhibited properly excepting in connection with the tabernacle itself, and its other articles of furniture, we postpone the consideration of it till we reach the subject of the tabernacle.

The original candlestick of course perished at the time of the Chaldean conquest, along with the other articles necessary for the daily service of the sanctuary, which had remained in it to the last. In the second temple, it would seem, that a return was made to the simplicity of the first arrangement; at least in the book of Maccabees mention is made only of one candlestick, while the temple of Solomon was furnished with ten (compare 1 Ki. vii. 49; 1 Mac. i. 21; iv. 49, 50). Josephus, too, speaks as if there was only one in the second temple (Wars, vii. 8); and the representation on the arch of Titus leaves no room to doubt that it was carried to Rome along with other sacred spoils. It is reported to have been included in the plunder taken by Genseric to Africa in A.D. 455; to have been re-captured from the Vandals by Belisarius in A.D. 533, and carried to Constantinople; finally, to have been sent to Jerusalem, where it was lost sight of. But the correctness of these reports cannot be confidently relied on.

CANE. The English word cane is almost identical with the Hebrew kaneh (קנה), and its Greek and Latin equivalents kanna and canna; and like the corresponding words reed, grass, &c., it is very loosely used. The cane from which sugar is extracted (Saccharum officinarum) is a grass; whilst the canes made into walking-sticks, into the floating cables of ships in the Eastern Archipelago, and into the bottoms of chairs and other kinds of wicker-work, are more nearly allied to the palms. It is a convenient popular name for any plant of a tubular structure rising above the dignity of a reed, but falling short of a palm.

In our own country there are grasses which yield a pleasant perfume, the most frequent and familiar being the Anthoxanthum odoratum, or sweet-scented vernal-grass, which mainly contributes the delightful fragrance to new-made hay. In India such grasses are still more abundant. There is one genus especially distinguished for its odoriferous virtues, the Andropogon. The roots of the A. muricatum, called "khus-khus" in Hindee, are worked into screens or "tatties," which in hot weather are placed before the doors and windows of houses. During the heat of the day these tatties are constantly drenched with water, and as the dry hot wind from without flows through, causing a rapid evaporation, it comes into the apartments 20° or 30° reduced in temperature, and charmingly fragrant. Another Andropogon, the species schœnanthus, is well known as the lemon-grass, and a third, A. calamus aromaticus, is propounded by Dr. Royle with much probability as the καλαμος αρωματικός of Dioscorides, and the "sweet-cane" or "calamus" of Scripture. The circumstance of its coming from a "far country" is all in favour of Dr. Royle's supposition. It occurs in Central India, being found as far north as Delhi, and south to between the Godavery and Nagpore. It is a tall plant, and yields the fragrant grass-oil of Central

The query has been often propounded, whether the "sweet-cane" of Scripture may not be the sugar-cane of commerce? To this it may be sufficient to reply, that the kaneh of the Hebrews seems to have been valued not for the sweetness of its taste but of its smell, Is. xliii. 24; Ca. Iv. 14.

It is not impossible that the Jews may have become acquainted with sugar within the biblical period, although we have no evidence that it was known so far westward till the conquests of Alexander opened the way to its discovery. (See Falconer's History of Sugar, in the Memoirs of the Philosophical Society of Manchester, vol. iv. p. 291.) At a comparatively early period the sugar-cane was freely cultivated in Syria, and the naif author of the "Gesta Dei per Francos," tells how kindly the crusaders took to it: "Calamellos ibidem mellitos, quos vocant zucra, suxit populus illorum salubri succo letatus." "At the time of harvest the inhabitants bruise it when ripe in mortars, and set aside the strained juice in vessels, till it solidifies in the semblance of snow or white salt. Mixed with bread, or treated with water, they use it as pottage, and prefer it to honey. The besiegers of Albaria Marra and Aochas, having suffered fearfully from hunger, were greatly refreshed thereby." [J. H.]

CANKERWORM (כַּלְבָּה, yelek), a voracious, gregarious insect, very destructive to vegetation. Some have supposed the Egyptian chafer (Scarabæus sacer) to be the insect intended, but it by no means meets the requirements of the sacred text. Only in the larva state does this beetle feed, and in that condition it is stationary, solitary, and concealed beneath the earth. In Ps. cv. 34, the term caterpillars (English version) seems equivalent to locusts, which composed one of the plagues of Egypt. "The locusts came, and [even?] caterpillars, and that without number." Jeremiah, ii. 14, 27, and Nahum, iii. 15-17, allude also to the immense numbers of these insects, as well as to the suddenness with which they appear and depart after having performed their work of devastation. In the latter prophet, as well as in Joel, i. 4; ii. 25, the term seems to be nearly identical with that rendered locust, or at least to differ from it only as one species differs from another closely allied to it in form and manners. In Je. li. 27, the epithet rough (רָעָה, that which stands out) is applied to the yelek, which may help to identify it with some of the tropical Gryllidæ, which are formidably spinous. (See LOCUST.) [P. H. G.]

CAN'NEH is mentioned in connection with Haran and Eden as trading with Tyre, Eze. xxvii. 23, but nothing further is known regarding it. After Bochart it is usually identified with Calneh, but the conjecture is destitute of evidence; while the fact of Calneh's destruction by the Assyrians long before the time of Ezekiel is utterly unfavourable to it. Michaelis takes it to be the Kane of Ptolemy (i. 7, sect. 10), a place of trade, and a promontory on the south coast of Arabia, and according to Arrian the king's chief place of export for the incense country. This seems countenanced by the fact of its being mentioned along with other Arabian localities, particularly Eden, by many taken to be the modern Aden in Arabia. (See Knobel, Die Völker-tafel der Genesis, Gtossen, 1850, p. 299.) [D. M.]

CANON, is simply the Greek word κανών, which has been adopted as a convenient term for expressing what is of binding authority, especially and pre-eminently the collected books of sacred Scripture. In its original meaning, however, the word denoted a cane or reed, whether as a natural production or as a straight rod for purposes of measurement. It came, however, to be used tropically for a standard or rule, by which anything was to be compared or adjusted; in which sense it is of frequent use among classical writers, and also occurs in the New Testament, as in Ga. vi. 16, "as many as walk by this rule" (τῷ κανόνι τοῦτο); 2 Co. x. 13. The rule meant in these cases is to be understood quite generally of any prescribed order, or line of procedure which it is proper to observe, and has no special reference to the collected volume of Scripture. By a still further extension of the original import, it came too, among the early ecclesiastical writers, to signify rule or measure in a more restricted sense—an accredited and authoritative account, first of that doctrine which from apostolic teaching was generally received among the churches of Christ, then, of persons and things—for example, a list of clergy in any particular place, of psalms and hymns for public use, of decrees of councils, of books fitted for employment in the services of the sanctuary. This latter use is not a scriptural one, and did not prevail till some time in the third century.

The term in its application to sacred Scripture being thus of ecclesiastical, not of biblical usage, it does not properly come into consideration here. But to complete the history of the word, and to indicate more distinctly its relation to the Bible, we must note, that even when it began to be applied to the sacred writings, it was not confined to writings in the strictest sense authoritative and divine, but included such as were deemed proper to be read in churches. In this way some books not claiming inspired authority were reckoned canonical, and some again actually forming part of Scripture—in particular, Canticles in the Old Testament, and the book of Revelation in the New—were omitted from the list, because they were considered unsuitable for public use. There is extant a book of Philastrius, a friend of Ambrose (De Hæresibus), in which he gives a catalogue of what he calls canonical books, but which wants both the Epistle to the Hebrews and the Apocalypse; while yet, in another part of the treatise, he calls those heretics who refuse to include the Apocalypse in Scripture—plainly showing that with him the canonical was by no means synonymous with inspired or authoritative. In like manner, Gregory Nazianzen at once calls the Apocalypse the last work of grace, and at the same time places it among the apocryphal; that is, the private or non-canonical, as contradistinguished from those which were familiarly employed in the public assemblies (Stuart on the Canon, p. 27, 28).

This laxity in regard to the use of the term canonical was fraught with serious consequences, as has already been pointed out under the article ΑΠΟΚΡΥΦΑ; but the term itself became gradually more definite in its application. It was at length regarded as the proper designation only of such writings as are strictly authoritative and divine, the ultimate standards of faith and practice to the church of Christ, although parties differed, and still differ, in regard to what writings should be so reckoned. Such in later times is the sense universally ascribed to it; so that the sacred canon is all one with holy Scripture; and the question which respects the Old and New Testament canon is simply that which respects the genuineness and the authority of the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament. (See therefore, for the discussion of the subject, under SCRIPTURES.)

CANTICLES (שִׁיר הַשְּׁמִירָה: ἄσμα σοφῶν: Syriac: חִסְדָּא דְּחִסְדָּא, wisdom of wisdoms: Targum—Songs and Hymns which Solomon the Prophet and the King of Israel spake before the Lord of the whole world.) Our remarks upon this most interesting and difficult portion of the Old Testament scriptures we shall arrange under the following heads:—

I. Unity of the Composition.

II. Subject-matter.

III. Form and Arrangement of the several Parts.

IV. Age and Authorship.

V. Canonical Authority.

I. That the Song of Songs is not a collection of separate lyrics, but, as the title indicates, forms one continuous composition, ought not to be disputed. The title is not "The Songs of Solomon" (as in the book of Proverbs, "The Proverbs of Solomon"), but "The Song of Songs, which is Solomon's,"¹ i.e. the most beautiful and precious of songs, just as the Messiah's title of King of kings describes him as the most powerful and glorious of kings. It is entitled a Song, not a collection of songs; and no one who reads it, even in our English version, with any degree of attention can fail to remark that the title gives a true account of its character; the parts into which the composition is distributed being so related, both in matter and in form, as to constitute a single poem. Not only does one spirit breathe through the whole; but all the parts and members of the poem are fitly framed together, each being evidently intended not to be complete in itself, but to enter into harmonious union with the others. The characters (if we may so call them) are the same throughout. Solomon or Shelomo, the beloved (רַבִּי) of Shulamith (or the Shulammitte, as in Eng. vers., vi. 13); Shulamith, the love (so our version renders רַבִּיָּהּ perhaps somewhat too strongly) of Solomon, and the daughters of Jerusalem or Sion, ch. i. 6; ii. 7; iii. 10, 11; v. 8, &c. The brethren of Shulamith are also introduced at the commencement, ch. i. 6, and at the close, ch. viii. 8. Throughout the whole poem characteristic expressions recur again and again, as, "Thou fairest among women," the form of address with which Shulamith is approached by the daughters of Jerusalem, ch. i. 8; v. 9; vi. 1; "Whom my soul loveth," the fond epithet used by Shulamith in speaking of her absent Beloved, ch. i. 7; iii. 1-4; "My Beloved is mine, and I am his. He feedeth among the lilies," ch. ii. 16; vi. 3; "I adjure you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, by the roes and hinds of the field," &c., ch. ii. 7; iii. 5; v. 8; viii. 4; "When the evening breeze blows (וְיָרֵחַ הַלַּיְלָה) and the shadows flee away," &c., ch. ii. 17; iv. 6; comp. also ch. iv. 1, 2, with i. 16 and vi. 6; and in the Hebrew, ii. 13, 16, with vii. 13;

i. 14 with iv. 13; ii. 9 with viii. 14; in all of which passages we meet with rare Hebrew words, found nowhere else in the Old Testament scriptures, which, recurring again and again as they do in this Song, stamp upon all its parts a markedly distinctive character, and render the unity of the whole composition evident and striking. It may also be remarked that, notwithstanding the obscurity of the poem, there may be discovered throughout an onward advance towards a contemplated result; and that the close throws us back again upon the commencement (comp. ch. viii. 11, 12, with i. 6, especially the Aramean form שְׁלֹמֹה), thus making it evident that we have before us not a collection of songs which may be separately interpreted, but a single poem, the various parts of which can be rightly understood and interpreted only when viewed as parts of a harmonious and self-consistent unity.

II. The question of the unity of the poem thus introduces us to a much more difficult and important one: viz. What is its subject? What was the design of the author in its composition? What is the peculiar character of the thoughts and feelings to which he gives utterance in the beautiful and glowing language of this Song? A first answer to these questions is at hand. It needs but one glance at the Song to discover that its theme is love. The poet sings the loves of Shelomo and Shulamith. The Song begins:

"May he kiss me with kisses of his mouth,
For sweeter are thy loves than wine."

And the expressions already mentioned as occurring in all parts of the song, and thus manifesting its unity, indicate likewise its character. Like the forty-fifth psalm, it is a Song of Loves: it is indeed the Song of Loves, the choicest of all such songs.

So far all are agreed. But when we take the next step and inquire, What is the character of the love which pours itself forth in this Hebrew Song? we are overwhelmed by the multitude of conflicting answers which our question summons forth from the expository tomes of critics, ancient and modern, Jewish and Christian, living and dead. Strange that a song of loves should have been the occasion of so many critical conflicts!

The various expositions, however, may all be ranged under two heads, the literal and the allegorical, though some expositors take a middle position, and endeavour to present a view of the poem in which the literal and the allegorical are combined and harmonized. So far as numbers are concerned, the allegorical interpreters have greatly the advantage of their opponents. The allegorical may indeed claim to be the traditional exposition of the Song. The venerable fathers of the Christian church concur with the great Jewish teachers in recognizing its allegorical character. The Targum on the Song, which may be regarded as embodying the authorized exposition of the Jewish synagogue, is allegorical throughout. From an early period, indeed, we read occasionally of a few, both among Jews and Christians, who ventured to question the decision of the synagogue and of the church, but these were never able to gain for the views they propounded even a temporary influence. It is only in recent times that the two parties have become more equally balanced; the literalist view having been adopted, as we might have anticipated, by the great majority of modern German critics, and so elaborated and illustrated by these writers as to commend it to the acceptance of not a few among the critics and theologians of other countries.

The fact that the allegorical exposition has, so far as can be ascertained, been till quite recently the recognized exposition alike of the Christian church and of the Jewish synagogue, is an important fact, which cannot be overlooked by any fair and candid inquirer. Still this fact is by no means decisive of the question at issue: for numbers have not always truth and reason on their side. We proceed, therefore, to a review of the argument in support of either hypothesis.

Those who interpret the Song literally agree in holding that it is an outpouring of merely human loves. But when we inquire a little more closely, we discover among these interpreters a great and wide diversity of sentiment, and that not on lesser matters of detail, on which diversity of sentiment is only what might be expected when we have to deal with a poem of such high excellence and of so great antiquity, but with regard to its main scope, design, and argument. So decided is this difference, that while some expositors hold that Shulamith is the wife of Solomon, who dotes on him with the fondest conjugal affection, and in this poem gives warmest expression to her love, others (and this is a favourite view with the Moderns) maintain that she is a simple maiden whom Solomon, overcome by love, seeks to allure into his already well-filled harem, but who, having previously pledged her faith to a village youth of her own rank, resists with success the solicitations of royalty, and maintains fidelity to her humble lover.

We cannot but think that so great a diversity of sentiment furnishes a strong argument in favour of the allegorical interpretation. Surely if this were a common love song, the author would never have left it open to dispute whether he intended to represent his heroine as doting upon his hero, or as resisting his advances and giving her love to another.

It is no sufficient reply to this statement to allege that there is a not less decided difference of sentiment among allegorical interpreters. For allegorical composition is necessarily obscure, and in interpreting it, it is easy to run into various and erroneous views. Moreover, it is to be remarked that of two diverse interpretations of an allegorical composition, it is not necessary that one or other be set down as erroneous, inasmuch as the principles or sentiments which the allegory embodies, may have a great variety of manifestations, each of which may be regarded as so far a legitimate interpretation of it.

We are not aware that in the whole range of human literature any love song can be pointed out, so obscurely expressed as to leave it open to dispute whether the two principal parties stand to one another in the relation of friendship or of aversion. And we therefore conclude some deeper meaning lies in the obscure utterances of a poem which has been so grievously misunderstood either by one section or by another of the literalist interpreters.

But let us turn to the Song itself. No name of God, it has often been remarked, appears in it, except in one passage (viii. 6, שְׁלֹמֹה) to which no importance is to be attached. Some of the descriptive passages are certainly expressed in language which jars somewhat with our ideas of taste and propriety. The veil of allegory, it has moreover been urged, is never even for an instant removed, so as to betray the true character of the poem, if it be an allegory. We may read the whole—multitudes have read the whole—from beginning to end, without having awakened within them one spiritual aspiration; but rather the reverse. It is added that there are no references to it in the other Scriptures, to show that it was regarded and made use of as an expression of spiritual emotion, either by the prophets of the Old Testament, or by our Lord and his apostles under the New.

To these and similar arguments employed by the literalist interpreters we have given all due consideration; yet, without having any conscious bias towards either side, we feel bound to adhere to the allegorical interpretation, as not only the most ancient, but on other grounds the most probable.

First of all, with regard to those parts of the Song which are objected to on the ground of taste and propriety, they will be found to be wonderfully few and far between, and most of them may be paralleled by other passages of Scripture, which are allowed to have a spiritual import. For example the very first words, "May he kiss me with kisses of his lips," have a parallel in Pr. xxiv. 26, "He giveth lip-kisses who returneth a proper answer;" from which we gather that the lip-kiss was a proverbial expression for high satisfaction and delight. Again, the description in ch. iv. 5, which is repeated in other parts of the Song, has been objected to by some fastidious critics: yet Lowth, the bishop and the man of fine taste, is quite enraptured with it, and asks, "Quid delicatius, quid exquisitius, quid etiam aptius et expressius, cogitari potest?" It is allowed, indeed, that some of the expressions employed are not such as any religious poet of our age and country would use. But every one knows that the standard of propriety in such matters is continually undergoing change. Language which not very long ago the most staid and modest matron might have employed with perfect propriety, would now be regarded as unbecoming. And why then should we wonder if in an old song of love, brought to us from the far East, we stumble upon some utterances which do not quite accord with our standard? Of course these remarks apply only to matters of taste and propriety. They do not touch the morality of the poem. The standard of morals is nothing change. And if it were possible to point out anything approaching to the immoral or impure in the Song of Solomon, that would at once destroy its claim to a place among the sacred Scriptures, and to the character of a sacred allegory. But it need scarcely be said that there is not the slightest ground for such an allegation. Those who have found anything unholy in this Song have themselves put it there.

It has been much insisted on that no name of God appears in any part of the Song. On first thoughts this is certainly matter of surprise. A divine song in which is no mention of God! But on more mature consideration this fact, instead of throwing doubt upon, really furnishes an argument in favour of the allegorical interpretation. According to that interpretation in its received form, Shelomo stands for Jehovah, or for the Messiah, Jehovah manifest in the flesh. What then though the name Jehovah, or Elohim, or Adonai is not found in the poem? Jehovah himself is there, in his representative Shelomo. To have introduced Jehovah, as a being distinct from Shelomo, might have marred and obscured the allegory.

At any rate, supposing Shelomo to be the representative of Jehovah, the absence of all the divine names from the poem is easily explained. For in truth Shelomo becomes for the time a divine name; and Jehovah, so far from being absent from the poem, is found to be its leading character from beginning to end.

While, however, the omission of the usual names of God is thus easily accounted for on the allegorical hypothesis, we cannot see how it can be rendered consistent with another hypothesis, which may be called the moral, which has been proposed with the view of reconciling the literal interpretation of the Song with its inspiration and canonicity. According to one form of this hypothesis the Song is a poetical embodiment of the idea of marriage, Shulamith being the model wife. According to another, Shulamith is the model maiden, steadfast in her purity and in faithfulness to her humble lover, even when pressed by the solicitations of royalty. Yet how can it be explained, consistently with the uniform teaching of Scripture, that this model wife, or model maiden, whichever she may be, amid her rejoicings, amid her struggles, never once makes mention of God's name—seems to have no thoughts of God—is good without being godly, virtuous without being pious! Surely the Scripture does not elsewhere countenance this apparent independency of virtue on piety and the fear of God.

We pass now to the objection which has perhaps been most largely insisted upon by the literalist interpreters; viz. that in the poem itself there is no intimation whatever of its allegorical character, no hint which may serve to betray the deeper meaning supposed to lie under what seems to be nothing more than love scenes between a human pair. It is allowed that there are allegories in Scripture which resemble in not a few particulars the poem before us: but it is alleged that into all of these expressions are introduced which betray their real character and spiritual significance, and it is maintained that, seeing there are no such intimations of its allegorical character in the Song of Solomon, we have no reason to regard it as other than what it seems to be—a poetical representation of scenes from real life.

The objection is not without weight. We admit that, were the Song of Solomon brought to us for the first time, not as an integral part of the Jewish Scriptures, but by itself, a few leaves of ancient poetry dug up from the ruins of the old world, we would very probably glance over the whole from beginning to end without any thought of its being designed to give expression to the deep religious feelings and sympathies. But closer study of the Song could not fail to alter our estimate of its character and value. And the following considerations seem quite sufficient to obviate the force of the objection.

It is not alleged that every allegory must contain within it—in its composition, in its phraseology—some decisive evidence that it is an allegory. On the contrary, that is regarded as the most perfect, in which the veil of allegory most completely overspreads the entire composition. The proof of the allegorical character of a composition may be not in itself but in its adjuncts—such as its authorship and the circumstances of its first appearance. Several of our Lord's parables contain no internal evidence that they are parables; as, for example, the parable of the prodigal son, one of the most beautiful of them all, which, moreover, has not a few points of resemblance to the Song of Songs: yet no one questions their parabolic character. That is decisively established, not by anything in them, but by their adjuncts—the character of Him who spoke them, and the circumstances in which they were spoken. Now, though we cannot trace back the Song of Songs to its author and origin with such decisive evidence as we happily possess in the case of our Lord's parables; still it is of great moment that this Song has come down to us among the holy writings of the Jews, and from an age and dispensation under which it was usual to represent and portray the spiritual and heavenly by means of carnal and earthly symbols.

Further, we seem to be justified in taking a distinction between the poetic allegory and the prophetic allegory. In the latter, the instruction of others by means of an allegorical representation is the object directly aimed at; and, this being the case, it is very necessary that the veil of allegory should not be too closely drawn, lest the true character and ends of the composition should be missed or lost sight of. But in the poetic allegory, instruction is not the first and direct object of the author: his first object is to give utterance to the wide ranging thoughts and overflowing emotions of his own breast; in this case, therefore, the partial withdrawal of the allegorical veil with which he has chosen to clothe his thoughts is not so necessary.

Hitherto we have conducted our argument on the supposition that the Song contains within itself no decisive evidence of its allegorical character; and we have admitted that this supposition seems to be warranted by a first cursory perusal. But more careful examination and more mature thought lead to a very different conclusion. This at least has been our own experience. The longer we have studied the Song, the stronger has become our impression, derived entirely from internal evidence, of its allegorical character. The grounds of this persuasion cannot be fully displayed without taking a minute survey of the whole poem, which our limits and present object forbid: but the following remarks may be sufficient to explain their nature.

They are of two sorts, negative and positive: negative, inasmuch as it seems impossible—at least it has hitherto proved so—to give a satisfying explanation of the various phenomena without having recourse to the allegorical hypothesis; positive, inasmuch as the structure of the poem in various parts seems to furnish direct evidence of its allegorical character.

None of the literalist interpreters have ever been able satisfactorily to lay bare the group of facts which must, according to their hypothesis, form the centre of the poem. We have already remarked that the most diverse and contradictory views have been propounded upon this point. There is no concurrence of sentiment among these interpreters upon any one hypothesis. One of the more recent, propounded by an evangelical theologian of Germany, is as follows:—He supposes that an annalist of the reign of Solomon, had he put on record the circumstances which form the ground-work of the poem, which unfortunately no annalist has done, would have employed some such language as this: "In such and such a year king Solomon took to wife a young woman of Sunem, and she was very fair, and he preferred her before all his other wives, and advanced her brothers who were vine-dressers to great honour"

(Deltzsch, p. 168). Fortunate young lady! Fortunate yet unfortunate! Fortunate to have been so loved and so sung! Yet how unfortunate to have been consigned for so many ages to utter oblivion, not because she wanted a sacred bard, but because the bard wanted a critical and clear-sighted interpreter!

Now contrast with the hypothesis just mentioned, another, which in various forms has met, as has been already noticed, with very general acceptance among German expositors, and which even in this country is not without its advocates. In one of the most recent commentaries on the Song of Solomon, the narrative of facts supposed to form the historical basis of the Song is given as follows:—"There was a family living at Shulem consisting of a widowed mother, several sons, and one daughter, who maintained themselves by farming and pasturage. . . . In course of time, the sister, while tending the flock, met with a graceful shepherd youth to whom she afterwards became espoused. . . . On one occasion while entering a garden, she accidentally came into the presence of king Solomon, who happened to be on a summer visit to that neighbourhood. Struck with the beauty of the damsel, the king conducted her into the royal tent, and there, assisted by his court-ladies, endeavoured with alluring flatteries and promises to gain her affections, but without effect. . . . The king, however, took her with him to his capital in great pomp, in the hope of dazzling her with his splendour; but neither did this prevail. . . . The king convinced at last that he could not possibly prevail was obliged to dismiss her; and the shepherdess in company with her beloved shepherd returned to her native place. . . ." (The Song of Songs: Translated, &c., by Christian D. Ginsburg.)

We do not propose to enter minutely into an examination of these hypotheses. What we would meanwhile call attention to is the support which the allegorical hypothesis derives from the conflicting and mutually destructive views of those who reject it.

With regard to the positive evidence which the poem itself furnishes of its allegorical character, we have already remarked that it cannot be fully exhibited without entering more at large on expository ground than can be done in a work like the present. All we can do is to point out its more marked and prominent features.

What are the names of the leading characters in the poem? They are Shelomo, or Solomon, and Shulam-mith, or the Shulammitte, names which come from the same root, and correspond in signification. This resemblance cannot be accidental; it must be designed: the names, therefore, must be regarded as significant. This conclusion is confirmed by two passages, one at the commencement and the other at the close of the poem. In the former, ch. i. 3, "As ointment poured out is thy name," there appears to be a special reference to the meaning of the name Shelomo, viz. peaceful, peace-giver, the spreading abroad of peace being compared to the pouring out of the sweet ointment which "maketh the face to shine," and diffuses a mellowing and soothing influence. Compare Ps. cxxxiii., "Behold how good and pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity: it is like the precious ointment on the head, that ran down to the beard, even Aaron's beard," &c. In the other passage, ch. viii. 10, Shulam-mith seems to explain her own name, when she describes herself as one who has found peace, shalom (שָׁלוֹם); and it is remarkable that the name Shulam-mith is not found in the earlier parts of the Song, but only towards the close, ch. vii. 1, after her union with Shelomo has been perfected, and she has found peace in his love. Comp. Jn. xvi. 33. From all which it appears to be a legitimate conclusion that the names Shelomo and Shulam-mith are employed in the poem significantly as the peace-giver and the peace-receiver; and if so, it will be allowed that this conclusion gives very considerable support to the allegorical exposition.

We are aware that, by a considerable number of recent expositors, the name Shulam-mith has been regarded as equivalent to Shunammith, or Shunammite, i.e. inhabitant of Shunem, 1 Ki. i. 3, &c. This view is favoured by the LXX.: yet there can be no question that Shulam-mith is the right reading, and we have no evidence that Shunem was also called Shulem by the ancient Hebrews. Wherever the town is mentioned in Scripture, it is written Shunem, and the derivative adjective Shunammith. More probable is the connection pointed out by some of the older expositors between Shulam-mith and Salem, the old name of Jerusalem, which certainly comes from the same root. According to this etymology, the Shulamite might represent one admitted to the citizenship of Salem, which would give a true and excellent sense. But it is better to adhere to the common explanation of the name which has been given above. It is well, however, to remark that the name given to the bride is not Shelomith, the feminine form of Shelomo, and which is found among the female names of the Hebrews, Le. xxiv. 11, but Shulam-mith, which does not appear to be a proper noun at all, but a common noun formed from the pual conjugation שָׁלוּם, and having the passive signification of a reconciled one—one restored to amity and happiness (qui in fidem ac tutelam Dei traditus et receptus est, Ges. Thea.), from which we gain a clear view of the spiritual relation of Shelomo and Shulam-mith.

We might now enter upon a particular examination of the various passages in which the names Shelomo and Shulam-mith are introduced into the poem, with the view of showing that the former always signifies the peace-giver, the protector, the guardian; and the latter, peace-enjoying, secure, happy. Comp. ch. i. 5, the curtains of Solomon; ch. iii. 7, the palanquin of Solomon surrounded by sixty heroes of the heroes of Israel; ch. viii. 8, the vineyard of Solomon, well fenced, on Beal Hamon, i.e. a place of repose and calm delight amid the noise and contentions of the world; and also ch. vii. 1, the only passage in which the name or rather title, the Shulam-mite, is found, and where it is evidently employed to represent the bride in the state of security and happiness and honour to which she has attained, being immediately followed by the title of Prince's Daughter, ch. vii. 2, and preceded, ch. vi. 10, by the remarkable description, which is of itself a very strong confirmation of the truth of the allegorical exposition, "Fair as the moon, clear as the sun, terrible as an army with banners."

If we pass now from the names Shelomo and Shulam-mith to the body of the poem, we find that the ideas contained in these names are carried through the whole. Shelomo is the king in whose presence there is perfect peace and fulness of joy, as is beautifully represented in ch. i. 12: he is the shepherd, feeding among the lilies: he is the owner of a vineyard, filled with the choicest vines, comp. ch. viii. 11 with Is. vii. 23, under which his servants repose securely, undisturbed by the tumults of the outer world, Ja. xvi. 33, and of the pleasant fruit of which they eat delightedly, ch. ii. 3; v. 1. And as Shelomo is the peace-giver, so his bride is represented first as a peace-seeker, and at length as a peace-finder. She has been hardly used even by her nearest of kin, ch. i. 6; comp. Ps. lxxix. 9, driven forth from her own vineyard, where alone she found peace, to labour in other vineyards in which she could take no delight, and where there was no covert to protect her from the scorching summer's sun. Her countenance, though still beautiful, is black with exposure, and toil, and anguish of heart. The contrast between the countenances of the bride and bridegroom, as described by the former, ought to be carefully marked even in the terms employed. She is black (שׁוֹמֵרֵי), ch. i. 5: he is bright and ruddy (רֹדֵף וְרֹדֵף), ch. v. 10. Now that the blackness is to be understood in a figurative sense, as descriptive of the church's affliction, or the depression and desolation of the believer, is rendered very probable by a comparison of the only other passage in which we find the same terms contrasted, viz. La. iv. 7, 8. Her Nazarites were purer than snow, they were whiter (שֵׁנִי) than milk, they were more ruddy (שׁוֹמֵרֵי) than rubies . . . ; their visage is blacker than a coal (שׁוֹמֵרֵי). The comparison "black as the tents of Kedar," ch. i. 5, is also to be marked, and viewed in the light of the only other passage in which the tents of Kedar are mentioned: "Woe is me that I sojourn in Mesech, that I dwell in the tents of Kedar! my soul hath long dwelt with him that hateth peace," Ps. cxx. 5, 6. Further, Shulammoth is described by the poet as dwelling in the wilderness, and brought up from thence by her beloved, ch. vii. 6; viii. 5. Every one familiar with the Scriptures must be aware that this is one of the most common figures employed by the sacred writers to describe a state of affliction. Comp. especially Re. xii. 6 and Ho. ii. 16, in which last passage there is a contrast between the wilderness and the vineyard which strikingly illustrates the descriptions of this Song: "I will allure her, and bring her into the wilderness, and speak comfortably to her, and I will give her her vineyards from thence, . . . and she shall sing there as in the days of her youth." This passage may, indeed, be regarded as throwing very great light upon the Song of Solomon: it is in fact a summary of it. In the commencement of the Song, Shulammoth is represented as driven out of her vineyard into the wilderness. And what is the picture opened up to us in the close of it? She is seen coming up from the wilderness leaning upon her beloved, ch. viii. 5: she takes possession of the vineyard she had lost, ch. viii. 12: and sitting in her gardens, in the full joy of her heart, she sings to her beloved, ch. viii. 13, 14.

We shall not extend our remarks on this part of our subject further. We shall only add that, in addition to the internal evidence for the allegorical interpretation, a specimen of which has just been adduced, that interpretation receives strong support from other parts of the Hebrew Scriptures. [*Comp. Ps. xlv. throughout, especially ver. 16-18, with Ca. i. 4; Pr. i. ix.; Is. v. 1, &c.; xxvii. 2-6; ltv. 5; lxi. 10; lxii. 4; Ho. i. iii., and xiv.; Zep. iii. 14-20; Ja. ii. 3; III. 1; Esa. xvi. and xxiii. Compare also in the Apocrypha, Wisdom of Solomon, vii. viii., and Ecc. xxiv. In "the voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride," so frequently introduced by Jeremiah, ch. vii. 34; xvi. 9; xxv. 10; xxxiii. 11, there is perhaps a reference to the Song of Solomon,* especially as in the last passage it is followed by "the voice of them that shall say, Praise the Lord of hosts, for the Lord is good; for his mercy endureth for ever: and of them that shall bring the sacrifice of praise into the house of the Lord." Those who wish to see a much more full collection of the probable or possible scriptural references or allusions to the Song of Solomon, may consult Mr. Moody Stuart's Commentary. See also Hengstenberg, Das Hohelied, p. 234, 252, 253.] It has all along from the earliest times, so far as can be ascertained, been the received exposition of the Jewish and Christian churches. By the former, indeed, the book was regarded as specially sacred; and we know with what devout earnestness and sympathy it has been studied by some of the noblest and purest spirits that have adorned the latter. It is true there is no direct quotation from it in the New Testament; for the very obvious reason that the appeals of our Lord and his apostles to the Old Testament were intended chiefly to illustrate the growth of the Christian out of the Jewish dispensation; and this is not the subject of the Song of Solomon: but, though there may be no formal quotation, we cannot but think that an attentive reader will find many allusions to it, much that brings its glowing scenes to mind, especially in the writings of John, and in some of the parables and discourses of our Lord, Mat. xxi. 33, 34, 43; xxi. 2; xxv. 1; Jn. iii. 29; Eph. v. 27; Re. iii. 20; xix. 7; xxii. 17, 20.

With regard to the different forms which the allegorical exposition has assumed in the hands of different commentators, we must reject that one which makes Shulammoth the incarnation, so to speak, of Wisdom; for this, among other reasons, that it is Shulammoth who seeks and finds rest in the love of Shelomo, rather than Shelomo in that of Shulammoth. But between the other leading expositions it is not necessary that we should pronounce any discriminating judgment, at least in so far as regards their prominent features. Shelomo is the peace-bestower. It is in his love that Shulammoth finds peace. He may be regarded, therefore, either as the representative of Jehovah, the Covenant-God and King of Israel, or as a type of the Messiah, the Prince of peace. There is no reason that we should give an exclusive preference to one or other of these expositions. For an allegorical representation, like a prophetic word, may have more than one form of realization or fulfilment. And so, too, of Shulammoth. She may be regarded as the representative of the Church, or of the individual soul which seeks and finds rest in Christ. If we have any preference for the former view, it is only because it seems to be more in harmony with the national character of the dispensation under which the Song of Songs was written, and by the principles of which we must to a certain extent be guided in its interpretation.

To what may be called the historico-allegorical and prophetic-allegorical interpretations of the Song, the former of which discovers in it a veiled history of the past, the latter a veiled prophecy of the future, we have space only to make this passing allusion. One of the most ancient examples of the former, with which, however, the prophetic is combined, will be found in the Jewish Targum on the Song: among the most recent examples of the latter is a Commentary, by Mr. Moody Stuart of Edinburgh.

III. We pass now to the consideration of the form, under which the subject just described is presented to us in the Song of Songs. It is evidently that of a nuptial song distributed into various parts. We shall not discuss the question which has been so much agitated, whether it is to be classed among dramatic compositions, for the answer to that question must depend entirely upon the meaning which is assigned to the word dramatic. If, under the head of dramatic composition, we include every poem into which dialogue enters, then of course the Song of Songs must be regarded as a drama. But as this term is usually understood to mean an artificial and highly-wrought composition into which action largely enters, to which character the Song of Songs has no claim, and as terms ought always to be employed in the sense in which they are commonly understood, we must regard the use of the term dramatic in the present case as calculated to give an erroneous idea of the character of the poem. In our view of the formal arrangement of the poem, we take a middle position between those who represent it as a regular drama, distributing it into acts and scenes, which we cannot but think displays a great want of taste and judgment in the handling of so ancient and simple a composition, and those who hold the view mentioned at the commencement of this paper that it is not a continuous composition at all, but a collection of separate lyrics. We hold the Song of Songs to be simply a descriptive nuptial song or poem, distributed into parts; these parts being distinguished from one another both by matter and by form.

After examining very carefully the Song itself, and the various plans which have been proposed for its distribution into parts, we have come to the following conclusion. The parts of which it consists are five, perhaps with some reference to the fivefold distribution of the Pentateuch and the book of Psalms, and are as follows, viz. :—

- A. i. 1—ii. 7.
- B. ii. 8—iii. 5.
- C. iii. 6—vi. 9.
- D. vi. 10—viii. 4.
- E. viii. 4—14

These parts, we have said, are separated from one another, both formally by artificial marks of separation, and by their contents.

With regard to the artificial distribution of the poem, it is sufficient to remark, that the first two of the five divisions just mentioned have the same ending ("I adore you, O daughters of Jerusalem, &c.") and the last three the same beginning ("Who is this," &c.) The middle division (C) is much longer than the others, but that arises from the nature of its subject: it is the principal division of the song.

Proceeding to examine these parts, we find that they are distinguished from one another not only by the artificial contrivance above noted, but by a real difference of subject-matter. What this difference is, however, is not equally clear in all the divisions. The second, third, and fourth divisions present no great difficulty; and they evidently form the body of the poem. The other two divisions, the introductory and concluding, are more obscure. We shall therefore commence with the former.

The third division (C) first invites attention. It is the central division, much longer than any of the others, and evidently contains the principal matter. Its subject is the marriage. It begins with a description of Solomon's palanquin, as it is seen in the distance approaching from the wilderness, borne on high, clouds of incense rising and covering it, and all around a body-guard of the heroes of Israel. Who is this? It is the bride conducted towards his royal mansion by her royal lover. 'Tis "the day of Solomon's marriage, the day of the gladness of his heart," ch. iii. 11. The daughters of Jerusalem (like the ten virgins of our Lord's parable) are called upon to go forth and meet the royal bridegroom. Then follows the bridegroom's praise of his bride. He dwells chiefly on the beauty of her veiled countenance, ch. iv. 1-5. This passage has been appealed to by the literalist interpreters as a ground of opposition to the allegorical scheme. "The following language," says Dr. Davidson, quoting the passage, in his Introduction to the Old Testament, "supposed by the allegorical interpreters to be spoken by Jehovah to Israel, or by Christ to his church, appears to us indecorous and irreverent on that hypothesis." But surely this statement proceeds on a mistaken view of the nature and interpretation of an allegory. No judicious interpreter ever supposed the language in question to be "spoken by Jehovah to Israel, or by Christ to his church." All that is meant is that Jehovah does love his church, and think her most beautiful and precious. The language quoted is to be regarded not as the expression which Jehovah gives to these feelings, for if it were, the poem would not be an allegory at all; but as the expression of corresponding feelings, glowing in the breast of a human lover.

The stanza, if it may be so called, which follows, is very remarkable, and is distinguished from the other parts of the poem by the frequent repetition of the appellations Bride and Sister-Bride, which are found nowhere else, ch. iv. 8-v. 1. With regard to the latter of these appellations, Hengstenberg rightly remarks that it is "a holy riddle;" but its meaning is sufficiently unfolded by such passages as Mar. iii. 35: "Whoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother." In reply to the bridegroom's ardent utterance of love, in which he compares her to a garden full of all odoriferous plants, the perfume of which fills and intoxicates the soul, the bride no longer draws back, but gives herself up to his love: still not without lowly wondering thoughts and fears, lest she should prove unworthy of such a spouse:

"Awake, O north wind!
Draw near, O south wind!
Blow upon my garden,
Let its perfumes flow forth;
That my beloved, coming to his garden,
May eat its choicest fruits."

The reply of the bridegroom, ch. v. 1, "I have come to my garden," &c., forms the centre-point of the whole poem. The bridegroom and the bride are now one. The marriage union is complete. Comp. Ia. lxi. 5, "As the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so will thy God rejoice over thee." But we need not go to other passages of Scripture to prove the spiritual import of the passage before us. That is very evident from the passage itself, not only from the sister-bride of the first clause, but also from the closing words in which the bridegroom calls upon his friends to come and share the fulness of his joy—

"Eat, O friends!
Drink, yea, drink abundantly, O beloved!"
(Compare Ia. iv. 1.)

This concludes the first half of the third or C division of the poem. The second half, which is of about equal length, ch. v. 2-v. 9, is the counterpart of the first.

It contains the shady side of the picture. The rapturous joys of love cannot last always. There is a reaction; and the reaction is the greater, the more intense the joy and the deeper the love. This is beautifully represented by the poet. The bride slumbers; but her slumbers are disturbed. "I slept, but my heart waked," ch. v. 2. She dreams. Her beloved comes to the door of her chamber. He calls to her; he knocks; but she does not open to him, ch. v. 3. He puts his hand in at the hole of the door: then she rises and opens to her beloved; but it is too late—he is gone. Her soul is now filled with the anguish of love, as it was but a little ago enraptured with its joys. This is finely described by the poet. She wanders forth, just as she had risen from her couch, in search of her beloved. She encounters the rude watchmen. She appeals to the daughters of Jerusalem, and gives a glowing description of her beloved. At last she awakes, and it is a dream. She finds her beloved where she had left him—in his garden, ch. vi. 2, compared with v. 1. And her joy again finds utterance in the words, "I am my beloved's, and my beloved is mine; he feedeth among the lilies." Yes! He is not gone, as I had thought. It was but a dream created by my foolish fears. He will never leave me, never forsake me. I am ever his, and he is ever mine.

The third division of the poem closes with the response of the bridegroom. He praises the beauty of her countenance. As he is to her, so she is to him, the chiefest among ten thousand, and altogether lovely. Queens, concubines, virgins without number—she alone is more precious than all. Nay, so surpassing is her beauty, that even those who might have looked upon her with the jealous eyes of rivals are overpowered by it, and join in praising her, and wishing her all joy in her beloved, ch. vi. 9.¹

We shall only indicate our views of the second and fourth divisions of the poem (B and D). They describe, as their position indicates, the former the loves of the period before marriage, the latter the loves of the period after marriage. The second part bears a close resemblance to the third. There is the same alternation of light and shade; but, as we might anticipate, the light is not so brilliant nor the shade so deep. Compare the encounter with the watchman in ch. iii. 3 with ch. v. 7. As in the third division, it is in a dream that her fears manifest their presence, ch. iii. 1:

"Upon my bed by night
I sought him whom my soul loveth:
I sought, but found him not."

This part, the second, contains several passages of great poetic beauty. It describes the spring-time of love, ch. ii. 10-12. The fourth division (D) describes the bride after marriage, in all the glory of the royal station to which the love of Shelomo has elevated her. It begins:—

"Who is this that looketh forth as the morning, Fair as the moon,
Clear as the sun,
Terrible as an army with banners?"

Such is the wondering inquiry of the onlookers. She is ashamed to be thus gazed upon. She thinks of her humble origin and sudden elevation, and turns away from their gaze. They call to her to return, and allow them to admire her beauty. Her reply is modestly humble as before. Why do ye make a spectacle of me? What is there in me to draw the wondering eye? Then follows a description of the queen in all the majesty of her form, and the beauty of her royal apparel, ch. vii. 2-6. The words are not those of the king, as is commonly thought, but of the people, as is very clear both from the manner in which they are introduced and from the title by which she is addressed—Prince's daughter. Their praise seems to end with the sixth verse, "A king is enchained by thy flowing locks," which words naturally introduce the king himself as speaker. He echoes all the praises of the people, dwelling not on the beauty of her countenance as before, but on the stateliness and majesty of her queenly form, which he compares to the palm-tree ch. vii. 8. She hangs upon his words delightedly. With all her humble thoughts of herself, she cannot conceal from herself that she is the beloved of the king; and, emboldened by this conviction, she gives passionate utterance to her love in return. She exults in his love:

"His left hand is under my head,
And his right hand embraces me.
I adjure you, daughters of Jerusalem,
That ye wake not up,
Waken not up Love
Till she please" (ch. viii. 3, 4).

The verses just quoted lead us back to the consideration of the first division of the Song, ch. i. 1-11. 7, at the close of which also they are found with a very slight variation. This division, like the second and third, has its alternation of light and shade. The bride gives expression to her lowly thoughts of herself, and tells in few words the story of her grief. "My mother's sons (Pa. lxxix. 9) were angry with me (Is. xli. 11; xlv. 24), they made me keeper of vineyards—mine own vineyard I kept not," ch. i. 6. She is separated from her beloved. "Tell me, thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest [thy flock]." The daughters of Jerusalem comfort in vain, ver. 8.² But now the scene is suddenly changed, ver. 9. Her beloved is restored; and in his presence she indulges in sweet anticipation of coming joys. "My nard giveth forth its perfume," ver. 11. Her anticipations shape themselves in the form of an imagined dialogue between her beloved and herself, in which free and glowing expression is given to their mutual love, ch. i. 13-11. 3. She sinks, overcome with love and joy, ch. ii. 4.

In the last division of the Song, ch. viii. 5-14, we find the joyous anticipations of the first division fully realized. The bride is seen coming up from the wilderness, leaning upon her beloved. In his unchanging love she has found peace, ver. 10. The lost vineyard, ch. i. 6, is regained, but only to be laid as an offering at the feet of her beloved, ch. viii. 12. Her mother's sons, by whom she had been hardly treated, ch. i. 6, are forgiven, ch. viii. 12, last clause.³ The wilderness is forgotten; her

² It is worthy of notice that the epithet "Daughters of Jerusalem" is found nowhere else in the Old Testament except in this Song; which, therefore, it is probable our Lord had in mind when he said, "Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me," &c., Lu. xxiii. 28.

Eden is restored; and in the shade of its pleasant trees she sings forth the joy of her heart, *ver. 13.*¹

IV. Authorship of the Song, and Place and Time of its Composition.—This head embraces a variety of questions, the difficulty of which is not compensated by their importance. In regard to some other books of the Old Testament—the prophetic, for example—questions of date and authorship are of vital moment. But the subject-matter of the Song of Solomon is of such a character that its value does not depend on any circumstances of time and place. It will continue equally edifying to the church whether it is found to belong to the age of Solomon or to that of the captivity.

The title ascribes it to Solomon; and this accordingly must be received as the most ancient tradition with regard to the authorship, and must have all the weight attached to it which is due to such a tradition. But we have no decisive evidence that the present title proceeded from Solomon himself. On the contrary its form seems to intimate a different and later origin. And there are other considerations which serve to throw considerable doubt on the tradition embodied in the title.

1. From the subject-matter of the Song, it seems to have proceeded from one of those periods, when the experience of the church was of a more mixed description than accords with the historical accounts of the reign of Solomon. The bride describes herself as hardly treated by her brethren, driven forth from the parental roof, dwelling in the wilderness, and black with exposure to the scorching summer's sun. This description does not find its counterpart, so far as we are informed, in any part of the reign of Solomon: nor can it be applied to the reign of David his predecessor. It is true that the name and reign of Solomon correspond with the bright side of the picture presented to us in the Song: but still we are disposed to believe that the feelings of rapturous joy in the Lord to which the Song gives expression must have proceeded not from a period of settled tranquillity, like the age of Solomon, but from a period of conflict and darkness issuing in the joy of a glorious deliverance.

2. If we have rightly decided that the name Solomon has in this song a symbolical or typical import, it

But, comparing them with ch. i. 6, they seem to represent the brothers, who ought to have been the guardians of their sister's virtue and happiness, as considering how they might best enrich themselves by means of her. She is as yet young, and her character is not fully developed; but, whether she prove a wall or a door, i. e. firm and constant, or giddy and easily accessible to temptation, they will endeavour not to be losers by her. The silver tower and the planks of cedar, represent the anticipated accession of wealth through the judicious bestowment of their sister.

is evident that such a use of the name was much more fitting after the death of King Solomon than during his life. We can well understand how, amid the troubles which followed close upon the death of that monarch, and which continued with but few intervals of repose to disturb and divide the church for many centuries, his reign, to the glories of which the people of Israel looked back with pride and fond longing, should have become the recognized type of that glorious future period of peace and unbroken prosperity, in which every true Israelite believed all present troubles and distresses would issue at last. But during the actual life of Solomon, especially when we consider the confusions and sins by which in its latter part it was deformed, such a typical use of his name was not so fitting. Certainly it is difficult to believe that such a use would have been made of it by himself.

3. So far as regards the place of composition, the Song appears to have been the production of one who had his usual residence among the northern or eastern tribes, and not in Judah. If we except the names Jerusalem and Zion, which are introduced as the centre and head-quarters of divine worship, almost all the local references are to the northern and eastern divisions of the land of Israel. General references to Lebanon, Carmel, Sharon, Gilead, and Damascus, we might expect in compositions coming from any division of Palestine. But the author of the Song speaks, as if from familiar acquaintance, of the tower of Lebanon looking toward Damascus, ch. vi. 5, of the flocks of goats reposing on Mount Gilead, ch. iv. 1, a comparison which he repeats in ch. vi. 5; of Tirzah, of the dance of Mahanaim, ch. vii. 1, and of the pools of Heshbon by the gate of Bath-rabbim, ch. vii. 4. From which it would appear that these were the localities with which the author of the Song was most familiar, as they are the first to present themselves to his mind, while in search of some suitable comparison or illustration.

And this conclusion is confirmed by the language of the Song. It is natural to suppose that the Hebrew language, as spoken by the northern tribes, and still more as spoken by the tribes east of Jordan, had a closer affinity to the Syriac and Arabic than the Hebrew spoken in Jerusalem and the neighbourhood. Between the northern tribes of Israel and the Syrians of Hamath and Damascus, and between the eastern tribes and the Arabians of the great desert, from whom they were separated by no well-defined boundary, there was the closest connection and constant intercourse: a connection and intercourse which must have largely affected the character of the language spoken by these northern and eastern tribes. Now, in the language of the Song of Solomon, as in that of other compositions, such as the song of Deborah, unquestionably emanating from those tribes, we seem to discover traces of this influence. Words belonging to the Syriac or Arabic language, or to both, but found nowhere else in the Hebrew writings, we frequently meet with in the Song of Solomon, ch. ii. 13; iv. 1, 14; v. 3; vii. 5. Occasionally we find roots common in the other Hebrew books here under a Syriac form, ch. i. 17, בָּרִית = בְּרִית, and vii. 3, כֶּסֶף = כֶּסֶף. In the syntax also a Syriac influence is observable, ch. i. 6; iii. 7. Yet these Syriacisms and Arabisms do not at all connect this Song with the later Hebrew writings; they are very clearly distinguished from the Chaldeisms of the books of Chronicles, Ezra, to. Their presence is to be accounted for not by lateness but by locality of composition.

Now, if the foregoing remarks render it probable that the Song of Solomon is a production of the northern or eastern division of the land of Israel, and not of Judah, they of course throw great doubt on the ancient tradition which assigns the authorship to Solomon.

At the same time we cannot concur with those who throw the composition of the Song forward on the age of the Babylonian captivity. The historical references point to a much earlier date. The tribes beyond Jordan, it is evident, had not been carried captive when the Song was written: otherwise it would scarcely have contained allusions to the flocks reposing on Gilead, to the dance of Mahanaim, and the pools of Heahbon by the gate of Bath-rabbim. The mention of Tirzah in immediate connection with Jerusalem, ch. vi. 4, seems to carry us a step farther back still, and to point to the conclusion that the Song was written some time in that half century (975-925 B.C.), during which Tirzah and Jerusalem were the two capital cities of Israel, the one of the northern, the other of the southern kingdom. To this period also point the freshness and minuteness of the allusions to the transactions of the reign of Solomon which are scattered over the poem. During that period, when the separation between Israel and Judah was still recent, there must have been a large party in the former kingdom who longed for reunion with their national sanctuary and with the divinely chosen family of David, and who lived in the firm faith that the period they so anxiously longed for would speedily arrive, when Israel would again be one—one in Jehovah their God and Solomon their king. It is not improbable that the Song of Songs proceeded from some one belonging to this party. But this is a matter on which certainty cannot be attained.

V. Finally, with regard to the Canonical Authority of the Song, it has always been recognized both by the Jewish and by the Christian church. It is true that, both in ancient and modern times, doubts have been entertained and expressed on this subject by individual members of both churches. But these doubts have always been met and overpowered by the general voice of the church teachers—sometimes by their solemn ecclesiastical decision. From the treatise Yadain, יָדַי, towards the close of the Mishna, we find that a decision of this kind was pronounced by the Jewish doctors early in our era: but this decision was intended not to define for the first time the belief of the church, but to give expression to what already was, and had all along been, the established belief, and to meet the doubts of a few.¹ There can be no doubt, therefore, that the Song of Songs formed a recognized portion of the sacred Scriptures in the days of our Lord and his apostles (as is indeed otherwise evident from the allusions they make to it), and has received the sanction of his authority. Indeed the title is of itself sufficient to prove that from the most ancient period the Song has been accounted sacred. For why was it called the Song of Songs? Several of the psalms have the title "Song," but this is called "Song of Songs." Why? Whence this preference? In what consists the superiority of this song? Surely, had it not been regarded as an inspired composition, it would not have been dignified by a title which gave it a higher place than even the inspired songs of David. No doubt it is a song of surpassing beauty, but we cannot imagine that that alone would have induced the ancient Jewish fathers to bestow upon it so exalted a title, had they not recognized its sacred and sublimely mysterious character. Finally, the references to the Song in the other books of Old Testament scripture is the crowning proof of its having been recognized, even from the time of its composition, as the production of one who spake as he was moved by the Holy Ghost.

[Expositions of the Song of Songs are numberless. Among modern German commentators, Ewald, Delitzsch, and Hengstenberg may be mentioned, each as representing a class. The two most recent commentaries in English are those of Mr. Ginsburg and Mr. Moody Stuart, to both of which, though differing very widely from one another, and also from the view of the Song given in the foregoing pages, we would refer the student for ample information, with regard to the principal authors who have written on the Song of Songs, and the views they have taken of it.] [D. H. W.]

CAPERNAUM, a city on the western side of the Sea of Tiberias, and on its upper or northern division. It comes into notice at the commencement of the gospel history, as a place which our Lord visited at an early period, but without remaining in it more than a few days, Jn. ii. 12; and at which he afterwards fixed his residence so continuously, that it became for a considerable portion of his active ministry the centre of his operations. The occasion of our Lord's thus repairing to Capernaum is most distinctly marked by the evangelist Matthew, who says, "Now when Jesus had heard that John was cast into prison, he departed (or withdrew) into Galilee, and leaving Nazareth, he came and dwelt in Capernaum, which is upon the sea-coast, in the borders of Zabulon and Nephthalim," Mat. iv. 12, 13. The language implies, that it was a sort of withdrawal from a more conspicuous or accessible place, to one more convenient for the work of a quiet and laborious ministry, which our Lord made at the time: and the language is explained, in connection with the historical event which occasioned the withdrawal in question, by the circumstance that Diocæsarea or Sepphoris, which was a common residence of Herod Antipas, lay in the immediate neighbourhood of Nazareth, at the distance of only five or six miles. After Herod, therefore, had so far committed himself against the cause of God as to throw the Baptist into prison, there was no reasonable prospect of Jesus being allowed to prosecute in quietness and freedom his peaceful but reforming agency, from a position so near the palace of the royal persecutor. Prudence required that he should retire to a region that the Canticles make the hands unclean; as the whole history of the world does not offer an epoch equal to the day on which the Canticles were given to Israel; for all the Kethubim are holy, but the Canticles are holy of holies."—Yadain, chap. iii. sect. 5.

¹ The passage is as follows, according to the rendering of De Sola and Baphall: "All sacred scriptures make the hands unclean (a doctrine of the Pharisees, arising out of their superstitious reverence for the sacred volume. See farther on in the same treatise, ch. iv. sect. 6). The Canticles and Ecclesiastes make the hands unclean. [The separate mention of these two books shows that some doubts had been expressed with regard to their canonicity, as we find in what follows.] R. Jehudah saith, Canticles make the hands unclean, but Ecclesiastes is subject to a dispute. R. José saith, Ecclesiastes does not make the hands unclean [i.e. it is not canonical], but Canticles are subject to a dispute. . . . R. Siméon ben Asai said, I have it as a tradition from the mouths of seventy-two elders, on the day they inducted R. Eleazar ben Asariah into the president's seat, that Canticles and Ecclesiastes make the hands unclean. R. Akibah said, Mercy forbid! No man in Israel ever disputed where he was less likely to be disturbed in his operations; and as he had no prospect of finding this in the south, where the priestly and traditional influence of Jerusalem was sure to impede him at every step, he naturally directed his course northwards, and fixed upon Capernaum, which lay in the fertile tract of Gennesaret, as on all accounts the most suitable for his purpose. It was also within that Galilean district to which ancient prophecy had pointed, as in itself one of the most spiritually depressed, yet the first that was destined to be shone upon by the clear light of the new dispensation: hence the evangelist marks in our Lord's going to reside and labour in Capernaum the fulfilment of the prophecy in Is. ix. 1, 2. But the more immediate reason was the relative position of the places, as at a considerable distance from Herod and the more active enemies of the truth.

The precise period during which Jesus continued to make Capernaum his more settled place of abode cannot be accurately determined. It must have been somewhere between one and two years; long enough to admit of its being designated "his own city," Mat. ix. 1, and also to admit of its being characterized as the chief of those cities around the northern shore of the Galilean lake, in which most of his mighty works had been done, but which still repented not, nor believed the gospel, Mat. xi. 20-23. The address to Capernaum was the most solemn and severe delivered on the occasion, "And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven (raised, that is, to the highest elevation in point of privilege and honour by my habitual presence and superhuman works) shalt be brought down to hell; for, if the mighty works which have been done in thee had been done in Sodom, it would have remained until this day." The words cannot be understood as denoting less than an entire downfall, or a sweeping desolation, such as if the place were to be swallowed up in the all-devouring gulf of Hades. That they have been literally fulfilled is so little a matter of doubt, that the only difficulty with modern inquirers has been to ascertain precisely where it stood. Dr. Robinson tells us, that the very name of Capernaum, as well as those of Bethsaida and Chorazin, have perished; after making the most minute and persevering inquiry among the Arab population along the western shore of the lake, and around its northern extremity, he indicates the result by saying, "No Muslim knew of any such names, nor of anything that could be so moulded as to resemble them" (Researches, iii. p. 295). He adds, that the Christians of Nazareth, who are acquainted with the names from the New Testament, apply them to different places, according to the opinions of their monastic teachers, or as may best suit their own convenience in answering the inquiries of travellers. The actual site has with good reason been sought near the fountain which Josephus calls Capharnaum, and which, in all probability, derived its name from the village. This fountain was situated in a very fertile tract, lying along the shores of the lake, and bearing in Josephus the name of "the land of Gennesaret." But there is a diversity of opinion as to what may have been the particular fountain which was meant by Josephus; and two places in particular have been fixed upon and respectively contended for as the proper one—one at Khan Miniyeh, and another more to the north at Tell Hûm. The subject has been very carefully considered by Dr. Robinson, especially in his supplementary volume of Researches, and everything said that can well be urged in favour of Khan Miniyeh. Dr. Robinson's view is thus summed up: "That Gennesaret was a known and limited tract; that, according to the evangelists, Capernaum was situated in or near that tract; that the circumstances mentioned by Josephus go to fix it near Ain et Tin [adjoining Khan Miniyeh]; that down to the seventeenth century it was recognized there by all the more intelligent travellers; and it was, apparently, during the seventeenth century that the tradition began to waver, and transfer the site of Capernaum to Tell Hûm. The latter is first mentioned by Nau, about A.D. 1674." (Researches, p. 368.)

Not a few recent writers, including Stanley, concur with Robinson in this view of the matter, but high authorities (Wilson, V. de Velde, Thomson) adhere still to the more common opinion of Tell Hûm being the proper site. V. de Velde says, "The position of Tell Hûm seems to us to agree in every respect with the gospel narrative, being near, not in, the land of Gennesaret, and not far from the east side of the lake, to allow people to follow Jesus on foot, whilst he was crossing the water with his disciples, Ja. vi. 2. That position would also make Kepharnome a near and convenient resting-place for Josephus, when he was ill; and its name, although it may be a borrowed one, may also be the remains of its ancient appellation." Dr. Thomson says, too, that he "attaches great weight to the name. Hûm is the last syllable of Kefr na hûm, as it was anciently spelled, and it is a very common mode of curtailing old names to retain only the final syllable. Thus we have Zib for Achzib, and Fik for Aphcah," &c. He adds, "so far as I can discover, after spending many weeks in this neighbourhood off and on for a quarter of a century, the invariable tradition of the Arabs and the Jews fixes Capernaum at Tell Hûm, and I believe correctly" (The Land and the Book, p. ii. c. 24). The absolute determination between the two proposed sites is fortunately not of great moment. If we take Tell Hûm (which, undoubtedly, has the greatest number of authorities on its side), the site of Capernaum comes to be fixed very near the top of the lake, on the west side; while if Khan Mintyeh is preferred, it must be assigned about three or four miles farther south. That is the whole difference. The place itself was of no great note, either in a commercial or a political respect; its title to a place in history arises simply from its connection with the life and ministry of Jesus; and this, unfortunately, served but to tell with disastrous effect on itself.

CAPHTOR, the original seat of the Philistines, Am. ix. 7, who are therefore called Caphtorim, De. ii. 23, and "the remnant of the country (or rather, is/and) of Caphtor," Je. xlvii. 4. Before determining the country here meant, notice must be taken of an apparent contradiction between these statements regarding the origin of the Philistines and the relation intimated in Ge. x. 14. Mizraim begat "Pathrusim, and Caaluhim, out of whom (rather, whence) came Philistim and Caphtorim." Vater and Tuch suppose a transposition of the text of this passage, taking Caphtorim to have followed Caaluhim, before the relative clause; but of a corruption of the text there is no evidence: the Samaritan, all the ancient versions, as also 1 Ch. i. 12, agree with the present reading in Genesis. The passage however, it is to be remarked, has no reference as usually taken to descent, but only intimates that the Philistines once dwelt by the Casluhim, and from them proceeded to other settlements; the expression יָצָא מִשְׁלָמָה (yatza mishlam) has merely a local reference, as departure from a place or land (Knobel, vökertafel, p. 215). Still the fact remains that the Caphthorim and Philistim are here introduced as distinct people, or perhaps as two portions of the same people. The latter supposition is confirmed by several passages which intimate a distinction, and yet a very close connection between the Philistim and another people called the Kerethim, Esa. xxv. 16; Zep. ii. 6; indeed the names are interchangeable, compare 1 Sa. xxx. 14 with var. 16. The reference in Genesis may be to some migration of the Philistim, either prior to their settlement in Caphthor, or intermediate between their departure from it and their final settlement on the western coast of Palestine, and to a sojourn with their brethren the Casluhim, who are supposed to have inhabited the district between Pelusium and Gaza. The whole subject, however, is involved in obscurity; for even with regard to the determination of Caphthor itself nothing can with certainty be affirmed. That it is not Cappadocia, as the older writers following the Septuagint and the Targums held, is now generally admitted. That Caphthor was an island plainly appears from Je. xlvii. 4, for although the term sometimes means "a maritime land," "a coast," c. g. Is. xx. 6, yet as Hitzig has shown, in the present instance it can only be "an island" (Urgeschichte der Philistiner, Leip. 1845, p. 16); and if so, various considerations show that it must be looked for in the Mediterranean. The islands Cyprus and Crete divide the suffrages of modern writers on this subject, but as the former is invariably in the Old Testament named Chittim, its claim to be regarded as Caphthor is obviously excluded. Crete, on the other hand, if not Caphthor, has no Hebrew name—a conclusion not easily reconciled with its importance. The designation of the Philistines as Kerethim may probably have some relation to their Cretan origin. The testimony of classic authors is in favour of Crete, particularly that of Tacitus (Hist. v. 9), who evidently confounding the Jews with the Philistines, after whom Palestine was named, says, "Judæos, Creta insula profugos, novissima Libyæ insediisse." (See Baar, Der Prophet Amos, p. 76-80; Daltzsch, Genesia, p. 290, 291.) [D. M.]

CAPPADOCIA, an extensive district of Asia Minor, the boundaries and divisions of which are differently described by ancient writers, and appear indeed to have varied considerably from time to time. But as a Roman province, to which state it was reduced by Tiberius in A.D. 17, it was bounded on the north by Pontus, on the east by the Euphrates and Armenia Minor, on the south by Mount Taurus and Cilicia, and by Phrygia and Galatia on the west. The region is for the most part of a mountainous nature, and on this account was colder than Pontus, which lay to the north of it. It abounded with fine pasture lands, and was distinguished for its good breed of horses. In various parts, however, it was capable of cultivation, and yielded wheat of fine quality, with other kinds of grain, grapes, and the more delicate fruits. It is rarely mentioned in the gospel history; but on the day of Pentecost sojourners at Jerusalem from Cappadocia are mentioned among those who heard in their own tongues the apostles speaking of the wonderful things of God; and the apostle Peter includes the Jewish Christians in Cappadocia among the strangers scattered abroad, to whom his first epistle was addressed, Ac. ii. 9; 1 Pe. i. 1. It thus appears, that Cappadocia, like other provinces in Asia Minor, had become to a certain extent the residence of dispersed Jews before the Christian era; but we know nothing of the proportion as to numbers in which they may have dwelt there, nor as to the particular localities and occupations with which they more especially connected themselves.

CAPTIVITY is a word which may be taken so strictly as to mean imprisonment. But a body of captives, men taken in war and in the first instance placed in confinement, might often or even generally be set at liberty, and left with comparatively few restrictions pressing on them, so long as they conducted themselves peaceably and submissively in the foreign country to which they had been carried. And thus, by an easy modification of meaning, captives and captivity are used in Scripture very much in the common sense of exile; yet with the notion that this state of exile was compulsory, and that the persons so exiled were in a dependent or oppressed condition in the land of their sojourn, not at all as refugees may be and often are in our own country. In this sense we have learned from Scripture to speak of the Babylonian captivity, which is explained to be "the carrying away into Babylon," Mat. i. 17.

But the removal of the tribes of Israel, though we often speak of it as a single event, was really a very complex process. The larger number of the people were carried away, not to Babylon, but to Assyria, that earlier empire which was afterwards swallowed up by Babylon. And the period during which their removal was gradually effected was not less than 150 years. There were, however, three great captivities. First, in the reign of Pekah king of Israel, who was murdered about B.C. 789, the king of Assyria, Tiglath-pileser, came up and smote the north-eastern part of the land, "Gilead, Galilee, all the land of Naphtali, and carried them captive to Assyria," 2 Ki. xv. 29, probably in this carrying out the policy of his predecessor Pul, who had come up against the land but had been bribed away by king Menahem, 2 Ki. xv. 19, 20. Certainly these two kings, Pul and Tiglath-pileser, are expressly named together as those who carried away the Reubenites, and the Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh who dwelt beside them on the eastern bank of the Jordan, and brought them unto Halah, and Habor, and Hara, and to the river Gozan, 1 Ch. v. 26, 28. Secondly, in the reign of Hoshea king of Israel, Shalmanezar king of Assyria came up against the land, and after leaving him for a time upon the throne as a tributary, he imprisoned him on account of treachery and revolt, and at the end of a three years' siege, took Samaria and carried the remainder of the ten tribes away, about B.C. 721 or 719, to a district apparently the same as that to which their countrymen had already been brought—he "placed them in Halah, and Habor, by the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes," 2 Ki. xvii. 6. Thirdly, the two tribes, that constituted the kingdom of Judah, were carried captive by Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, 2 Ki. xxiv. xxv.

Even this last captivity, the carrying away of the people of Judah to Babylon, was not accomplished at once. Three distinct captivities are mentioned, Je. iii.

28-30. The first, of 3320 persons, in the seventh year of Nebuchadnezzar, is no doubt the same as that placed in the eighth year of his reign (for such differences occur frequently in the histories of kings in the Bible, and are to be traced to the practice of counting the beginning of the year from different months, or reckoning the months of a broken year sometimes to the reign which ended in it, sometimes to the reign which began in it), when he carried off the weak young prince Jehoiachin, three months after the death of Jehoiakim his father, 2 KL. xxiv. 10-16. But the number mentioned by Jeremiah seems to apply only to some more distinguished portion of the captives, for in this passage princes, officers of state, mighty men of valour, craftsmen, and smiths are included, apparently to the number of 18,000, while only the poorest sort of the people are said to have been left. The second removal was eleven years later, in the eighteenth of Nebuchadnezzar, B.C. 588, or 586 according to others, when he destroyed Jerusalem and carried off Zedekiah the last king; at this time 832 persons were taken away. The third removal was in the twenty-third of Nebuchadnezzar, when 745 were taken to Babylon by Nebuzar-adan, the captain of the guard; by which act of gleaming it would seem that the land was left utterly empty of inhabitants. It can scarcely be doubted that this is only a partial enumeration of the people who were carried to Babylon from the land of Judah, not improbably a very large number more may have been taken from the country districts, and even from Jerusalem itself at an earlier time. Of this we have a trace in Da. i. 1, 2, "In the third year of Jehoiakim king of Judah came Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon unto Jerusalem and besieged it. And the Lord gave Jehoiakim king of Judah into his hand, with part of the vessels of the house of God, which he carried into the land of Shinar, to the house of his god." We should not have known distinctly about this event but for the circumstance that Daniel was carried away among the number. And in dealing with a history of whose details we are so ignorant, it is miserable criticism which endeavours to injure the credibility of the books of Scripture because one of them mentions circumstances which we do not know how to adjust with details narrated by another. Certainly there is a general reference to some event of this sort, when Jehoiakim was conquered by Nebuchadnezzar, and was on the point of being taken to Babylon, yet was left behind, 2 Ch. xxxvi. 6. And just as certainly there is nothing in what the Lord said, Je. xxv. 1, &c., to contradict this statement, in spite of what some have alleged to the contrary.

This prophecy by Jeremiah contains the remarkable statement that the captivity should last for seventy years, after which the king of Babylon's yoke was to be broken, and himself and his people punished. And again, he prophesied the restoration of the people and the renewal of the Lord's goodness to them in their own land, Je. xxix. 10, &c. The fulfilment of these prophecies is found by the inspired writers themselves, Esr. i. 1; Da. ix. 2, in the edict of Cyrus, which gave the people liberty and encouragement to return to their own land. The edict was issued on his taking Babylon, B.C. 536; or, as some think, after a two years' reign of Darius; and so the commencement of the period is to be dated from B.C. 606, the fourth year of Jehoiakim, in which Jeremiah delivered his message to the prostrated people, whose political independence was gone, and a large number of whose fellow-countrymen seem to have been just newly led into exile, or to have been on the point of being so led, according to the different views which expositors have taken. But that carrying to Babylon was not completed ecclesiastically till the temple was destroyed, about B.C. 586; and perhaps we should say that the ecclesiastical restoration was not complete for seventy years from that date, when the rebuilding of the temple was accomplished in the sixth year of king Darius, Esr. vi. 16.

The history of the return of "the children of the captivity," or "the children of the province," as they named themselves, is given chiefly in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, though information is also to be found in the prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah. In general the course of events was this:—the decree of Cyrus encouraged the people to return, with such money and goods as they could gather, and indeed they were aided by the contributions of many who did not return along with them; all being placed under the care of Sheahbazzar prince of Judah, who seems to have been the same as Zerubbabel, or else to have soon died and been succeeded by him. But after settling themselves down in Jerusalem and around it, and erecting the altar for sacrifices, and laying the foundation of the temple, they had offers of assistance from the heathens who had come to inhabit Samaria and the vacant country round about them: on declining which help they were exposed to the bitterest hostility of these pretended allies. In fact, after the death of Cyrus the building of the temple was forcibly stopped by them until the second year of king Darius. Then, under the vigorous urgent ministry of the prophets, the prince and people were encouraged to resume; and an appeal from their enemies to the king produced a royal decree eminently favourable to them, so that the temple was completed about the year B.C. 516. The next event of importance was the arrival of new colonists under Ezra the scribe, in the seventh year of king Artaxerxes, and with new privileges bestowed by him. Some writers date this B.C. 478, because they identify the king with him whom the Greeks called Xerxes: but in general he has been identified with the Greek Artaxerxes I., and in this case the date is B.C. 457, as in our English Bibles. Next came Nehemiah, the cup-bearer of Artaxerxes, in the twentieth year of his reign, B.C. 445, and by his liberality, self-denial, and persevering wisdom, the walls of the city were built, its fortifications completed, its worship restored to full vigour and original purity, and the whole colony established on as firm and satisfactory a basis as seems to have been possible in these days when the outward glory of the theocracy was waning. These two last dates are thrown ten years earlier by a few writers, who believe that a miscalculation in the common chronology has given that number of years too much to the reign of Xerxes, and in consequence has thrown the accession of Artaxerxes proportionally too late.

The two tribes, or people of the kingdom of Judah, had been nearly all carried away; and the returning people seem to have been chiefly of these two tribes, so much so that the prevalent name for the nation henceforward was Jews. The ten tribes perhaps were not so completely carried away, at least it has long been a prevailing opinion that a number of them amalgamated with the heathen nations who were brought into the land of Israel, and so formed the mongrel race of Samaritans described in 2 Ki. xvii. There are those, however, who deny that there was old Israelitish blood in the Samaritans; the most distinguished of these in our day is Hengstenberg. At any rate, the ten tribes were carried farther off, were left longer in captivity, and were more heathenish in their tendencies: on all which accounts they were likely to return to their own land in much smaller numbers than the tribes of Judah and Benjamin. Yet we find the sacrifices at the return offered expressly for all the twelve tribes, Est. viii. 35. We have dwellers in Jerusalem mentioned from among the ten tribes, 1 Ch. ix. 1-3. The whole number who came up in the time of Cyrus is declared both by Ezra and Nehemiah to have been 42,360, and yet the particular families as enumerated by Ezra amount to only 29,818, by Nehemiah to 30,990: from which the inference is not unreasonable, that these belonged to the two tribes and the Levites, whose genealogies had been perfectly preserved at Babylon, so that any deficiencies for seventy years were not difficult to supply; whereas the remaining 12,000 belonged to the ten tribes, who were more widely and longer scattered, so as to be unable to trace the particulars of their lineage satisfactorily. The language of Isaiah, ch. xl. 12, 13, of Jeremiah, ch. iii. 18, xvi. 15; xxxi. 7-20, of Ezekiel, ch. xxxvii. 16, of Hosea, ch. i. 10, 11, may be to a large extent symbolical, yet seems to pre-suppose a literal return of the two great divisions of the children of Israel. The language of Zechariah also, ch. ix. 13; x. 6, 10, appears to speak of this as having actually happened. In the New Testament we read of the entire body of the twelve tribes as still subsisting and waiting on the service of God, Ac. xvi. 7; Ja. i. 1. And though search has been made for the lost ten tribes, from age to age, in all quarters of the globe, there is no trace of them anywhere. That many mingled among the heathen is very probable: and the rest appear to have fallen into the ranks of their countrymen, after the captivity of the whole twelve tribes had removed the cause of their melancholy schism. Of course among the returned Jews, as well as among the much larger number who did not return, the distinction of tribes came to be more and more lost sight of; and this result was reached the more readily and the sooner, because the tribes did not dwell separately and have their distinct portions, administrations, and interests, as they had during their earlier settlement in the land of Canaan.

It is not necessary to speak particularly here of that which falls beyond the time of Scripture history, the second and more awful captivity of the Jews by the Roman power. As our Lord had foretold, the very generation who rejected him and put him to death lived to see their national existence utterly ruined, their city and their temple finally destroyed. Josephus, a contemporary and eye-witness, and a man with excellent opportunities for obtaining information, speaks of 1,100,000 as having perished in the siege of Jerusalem, which was taken by Titus A.D. 70, and the wretched remnant were sold for slaves till the market was glutted, and the words of Moses seemed literally verified, "The Lord shall bring thee into Egypt again with ships, by the way whereof I spake unto thee, thou shalt see it no more again: and there ye shall be sold unto your enemies for bondmen and bondwomen, and no man shall buy you," De. xxviii. 68. Gradually the severity of their Roman masters relaxed, and the Jews of Palestine were encouraged to revolt, under the guidance of a false Christ who named himself Bar-Cochaba, "the Son of the Star," alluding to Balaam's prophecy, Nu. xxiv. 17. But the emperor Adrian destroyed them miserably, forbade them to come near Jerusalem, and rebuilt it as a heathen city, calling it Ælia, after one of his own names, A.D. 135.

The cause of these great captivities must be sought for in the purpose of God, which he had made known to the children of Israel when he called them to be his people. He promised the land of Canaan to Abraham and to those who succeeded him, as a possession for them and their seed, whose God he engaged to be. But as he swore in his wrath that the generation who came out of Egypt should not see that good land which he had promised to their fathers, Nu. xiv., because they were in truth not his people, whatever profession they might make of being his: so he warned two successive generations who were on the point of entering and taking possession, that the land was his, and that they could hold it by no other tenure than the covenant which he had graciously made known to them, while the breach of the covenant must be followed by exile, Le. xxvi.; De. xxviii. The prophets Hosea, Amos, Micah, Isaiah, as well as those who lived nearer the final catastrophe, reminded the people of these warnings, and denounced the approach of unavoidable ruin to the inhabitants of what ought to have been the Lord's land. And the facts of the history are the filling up of that prophetic sketch which Moses had given to the people from the beginning.

Politically, however, there were other causes at work, and we trace the use of these as instruments in the hand of God, though his overruling providence was unsuspected by the great actors in these worldly changes, Is. i. 5-7. It was not an uncommon practice among ancient conquerors to remove those whom they had subdued to new seats of colonization: for the despots of those ages and countries were reckless of human life and happiness, and they were not likely to be deterred by scruples and difficulties about concerns of inferior importance. Sometimes they carried off the picked men of war to recruit their armies in distant regions, and by this contrivance they at the same time broke the military power of the nation which they had conquered. Sometimes they carried off skilled artisans to fill the magnificent capitals which they had built, but for which they had not found inhabitants; or, they carried off multitudes of unskilled labourers, whose lives were prodigally spent in the execution of great public works. Sometimes they depopulated entire provinces, transferring the original inhabitants of the one to the other, thus punishing them by exile from their home, and making them feel that revolt was hopeless, yet offering them the means of earning a livelihood in the new country and new circumstances in which they found themselves. This last seems to have been the case with the ten tribes, 2 Ki. xvii.; and also with the two tribes, from the first proposal under Sennacherib onwards till its accomplishment after the murder of Gedaliah the Jewish governor of the remnant left in their own land, 2 Ki. xviii. 31, 32; xxv. 11, 12, 25, 26. Only by a special providence the land of Judah was left empty through these seventy years of captivity, ready to be re-occupied when Israel returned to favour with God.

Once more, there are moral purposes which we cannot fail to trace in the captivity. God at first appointed Israel to dwell alone among the nations, as a little reclaimed territory, while the great world on every side of them was a moral waste. As often as they forgot their high calling and mingled themselves among the heathen and learned their works, they also were subjected to sufferings which taught them to return to God. And one of the severest of these, just before the kingly government was established in Israel, when the judges were proved to be insufficient for ruling the people, and when the worship at Shiloh became polluted and was violently terminated, is called the "captivity of the land," Ju. xviii. 30, although we have no reason to think that any considerable number of people were exiled. But the captivity in Babylon was the result that justly befell the covenant people from their becoming assimilated to heathen states, whence God no longer protected them, but broke them up and left them to be sucked into the movements of the great political whirlpools of Egypt, and Assyria, and Babylon, which destroyed the independence of the minor states in the civilized world. The land of Israel became involved in the fortunes of the surrounding lands, when it was no longer a focus of light, in some respects rather a focus of corruption. But afflictions were sanctified to many of the scattered people, and they became a leaven to work upon the masses of heathenism. It is impossible to say with any certainty how they were treated by their Assyrian and Babylonian conquerors. The mere mention of elders of the people among the captives to whom Ezekiel ministered is no proof that the outward organization of Jewish law and government was permitted to subsist, though this is the tradition handed down to us. Psalm cxxxvii. might rather favour the opinion that they were generally ill-treated. Yet the books of Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther prove that individual Jews did rise to high distinction, and exercised a powerful influence over the heathen. Probably we may infer that their condition as a whole was improving, and was more than tolerable, when Cyrus established the Persian empire on the ruins of the Babylonian, from the fact that the great majority of the people remained in the countries of their adoption instead of returning to Judea. It was the policy of Alexander the Great, and of his successors both in Syria and in Egypt, to treat the Jews kindly and to give them many privileges. This permanent dispersion of so large a part of the Jewish people through Asia and Europe, spread some knowledge of the true God very widely among the heathen, and paved the way for the preaching of the gospel of Christ to all nations, as we observe in the New Testament throughout, but especially in the Acts of the Apostles. It was thus that the course of events made the territorial arrangements of the Mosaic dispensation pass gradually into those very different arrangements of the Christian dispensation, which are free from any artificial limitations as to either time or space. [G. C. M. D.]

CARBUNCLE, the name of a precious gem, which is now more commonly called garnet, and twice found in the English Bible as the translation of בִּרְקָה, Ex. xxviii. 17; Eze. xxviii. 13. It is doubtful, however, if such be the proper rendering of the original. The word is obviously derived from בִּרְקָה, to glitter, to lighten, and must have been applied to some gem which shed the appearance of a fiery or lightning brightness. Carbuncle, which means literally a little coal, undoubtedly has somewhat of this appearance, being of a bright red, and when held to the sun resembles a piece of burning charcoal. It may be regarded, therefore, as perfectly probable that this was the gem referred to; but it is impossible to speak with certainty on the subject. In Ex. xxviii. 17, the Septuagint, Vulgate, and Josephus all have smaragdus, or emerald, where carbuncle is in the English Bible; but this seems to be not so properly a different translation of the original term, as a transposition of the two terms which follow each other—emerald and carbuncle, instead of carbuncle and emerald. For at Eze. xxviii. 13, where the two terms again occur in succession, the Septuagint follows the reverse order and corresponds with the English version. There is, at all events, no need for altering the common rendering in either case; but we may add Braun has endeavoured to prove that the emerald is the gem meant (De Vest. Sacredott.); and Winer and Gesenius both lean to his opinion.

CARCHEMISH, a place of considerable importance on the Euphrates, Je. xli. 3; 2 Ch. xxxv. 20. The earliest mention of it is in Is. x. 9, in an enumeration of the cities conquered by the Assyrians. It next appears as the scene of a battle between Pharaoh Necho king of Egypt, and the Babylonians, when the latter were defeated; Josiah king of Judah, who attempted to oppose Necho's march, having also been slain, 2 Ch. xxxv. 20-24. Four years afterwards, however, Pharaoh Necho was here discomfited by Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, Je. xli. 2. The site of Carchemish is generally placed near the junction of the Chaboras of the Greek geographers, the Chebar of the Israelitish captivity, 2 K. xviii. 11; Eze. i. 1, with the Euphrates. Here was the Circusium of the classical writers. The place is still known to the Bedouins by the name of Carkeoseca (Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, p. 234). This locality, although once of so much importance, is now utterly waste. "From its mouth to its source, from Carchemiah to Ras-al-sin, there is now no single permanent habitation on the Khabour. Its rich meadows and its deserted ruins are alike become the encamping places of the wandering Arab" (Layard, ibid. p. 234). Dr. Hinks however maintains from his reading of the Assyrian inscriptions that the true site of Carchemish is at or near Bir, on the opposite bank of the Euphrates, and about 200 miles higher up than it is generally thought to be (Journal of Soc. Lit. July, 1864, p. 406). It would be premature to pronounce a judgment on the arguments adduced in support of this view while any doubts remain as to the correctness of the readings from the monuments. [D. M.]

CARMEL (the park, or vineyard-like garden). The word frequently occurs as an appellative, not as a proper name, and is usually rendered by "fruitful field," or something of like import, Is. xxxix. 17; xxiii. 15; Je. ii. 7, &c. But as a proper name it is applied first and chiefly to a mountain and promontory in the tribe of Asher, and also to a town in the tribe of Judah.

1. MOUNT CARMEL, more properly an elevated ridge than a mountain in the ordinary sense, forms one of the more striking and attractive features in central Palestine. It is altogether fully twelve miles long, is sometimes called eighteen, and on the side toward the sea juts out into a bluff promontory or headland, the only thing that deserves the name on the sea coast of Palestine. This headland lies a few miles to the south of Ptolemais or Acre. It is in various parts of quite easy ascent from the sea, and on that side is only about 600 feet above the level of the sea; as it stretches toward the south-east it rises higher, and toward the eastern extremity it reaches an elevation of about 1600 feet. Of its general aspect Stanley says (Sinai and Palestine, p. 362), "Its name is certainly taken from its garden-like appearance, and which, as it has no peculiarity of shape, is its chief distinction. By this, its protracted range, bounding the whole of the southern corner of the great plain [viz. of Esdraelon], is marked out from the surrounding scenery. Rocky dalls, with deep jungles of copse, are found there alone in Palestine. And though to European eyes it presents a forest beauty only of an inferior order, there is no wonder that to an Israelite it seemed, 'the park' of his country; that the tresses of the brides' head should be compared to its woods; that its ornaments should be regarded as the type of natural beauty; that the withering of its fruits should be considered as the type of natural desolation." Ca. vii. 5; Is. xxxv. 2; Am. i. 2.

Toward the south Carmel slopes gradually down into the hills of Samaria and the plain of Sharon, in which stood the ancient Cæsarea. In some parts there are pretty deep ravines; but the more rugged, as well as the loftier part of the range is toward the north-east; and it is with that part that tradition associates the memorable scene of conflict between Elijah and the prophets of Baal, beside a spring which is said to be perennial, and might therefore have been still flowing even in a season of peculiar drought. It is the extreme eastern point of the range, where the last view of the sea is obtained; and there, it is said, the Druses who reside in the neighbouring villages assemble once a year to offer sacrifice. (For the character of the scene itself, see ELIJAH.) The forests of Carmel, spoken of in ancient prophecy, have disappeared; so also its vineyards, if it ever had any; and the mountain can only be characterized now as a fine pasture field. It could never have been very thickly inhabited, as it must always have been a pastoral district. There are to be seen the ruins of several villages on it, none of them apparently indicative of large or numerous buildings, and ten or twelve villages are still found within its precincts. The most remarkable thing now, and for many generations connected with it, is the convent, the original seat of the barefooted monks, whose establishments from the thirteenth century began to spread over Europe. The traditions of the Latin church connect this order with Elijah, but without the slightest foundation in history. The real founder of the convent was Bertholdt, a Calabrian, who went to the Holy Land as a crusader in the twelfth century, and at the traditional abode of Elijah founded a community of hermits. In 1259 St. Louis erected a convent for the order in Paris, which tended considerably to increase its popularity in France and Germany; but he was not, as is sometimes stated, its proper founder. The convent on Carmel is still kept up, and occupied by about twenty Latin monks. At the siege of Acre Napoleon used it as an hospital.

How far Elijah might be wont to resort to Mount Carmel, or whether he might ever have had a place of residence there, is altogether doubtful. It is probable that, beside the sacrificial conflict with the priests of Baal, the severe action of the prophet in calling down fire from heaven to consume successive companies of troops sent by the king of Israel to apprehend him, took place on Carmel. For the first company is said to have found him sitting on the top—not "of a hill," as in the English Bible, but of "the mount," meaning probably that mount with which he had been previously associated as a man of God, to which he might be known at least occasionally to resort, 2 KI. i. 2. That Elisha was in the habit of sojourning on Carmel is plain from the affecting narrative of the Shunammite, coupled with other notices in his history. Immediately after the ascent of Elijah he went to Mount Carmel, and when the Shunammite required his presence for the recovery of her child, it was to Carmel that she repaired, 2 KI. ii. 26; iv. 25. But even in his case these were apparently but occasional visits, though it is by no means improbable (considering the wonderful and stirring events to which Carmel had borne witness in the days of Elijah) that one of the schools of the prophets may in Elisha's time have had its settlement there. But ancient history knows nothing of an order of religious recluses connected with Carmel as their proper home.

2. CARMEL, as a city, was situated in the mountain district of Judah, and was the residence of the churlish Nabal, whose wife Abigail was afterwards espoused by David, Jos. xv. 66; 1 Sa. xxv. 2, 40; xxvii. 3. It is in all probability the same Carmel at which Saul set up a place after his victory over Amalek, 1 Sa. xv. 12. The ruins of the place still exist, and have been found about ten miles south-east from Hebron, bearing the name of Kurmul. They are of considerable extent, and among them are the remains of a castle of great strength. In the time of Eusebius and Jerome it was the seat of a Roman garrison, but it makes no figure in Bible history.

CARMI [vine-dresser]. 1. The father of the unhappy Achan who troubled Israel, Jos. vii. 1, 18. It is probably the same person who is meant in 1 Ch. iv. 1, and named among the sons of Judah—intending his remoter as well as more immediate offspring. 2. A son of Reuben, and the head of the Reubenite family called Carmites, Ge. xlii. 9; Ex. vi. 14; 1 Ch. v. 3.

CARPUS, an early believer at Troas, with whom St. Paul appears to have been on terms of intimate fellowship, since he left with him a cloak and parchments; but of whom nothing else is known, 2 TL. iv. 13.

CASLU'HIM (Sept. Χασμυριμ), mentioned in Ge. x. 14, among the descendants of Mizraim; in other words, as a branch of the Egyptian race. Bochart has endeavoured to identify them with the Colchians, who, according to Herodotus, were of Egyptian origin (Phaleg. iv. 31). Bochart has brought all the available learning to bear upon the subject, and has rendered the opinion he advocates probable; but the materials are too few to enable us to arrive at certainty; and as the Casluhim take no place in sacred history, nothing depends on the precise opinion that may be entertained regarding them. Gesenius concurs in Bochart's view.

CASSIA (קָסְיָה, kiddah). One of the commodities in which the Tyrian merchants traded, and one of the ingredients used in the preparation of "the holy anointing oil," Ex. xxx. 24; Eze. xxvii. 19. There can be little doubt the word is rightly translated cassia, as well as the ketsioth (קִטְיוֹת) of Ps. xlv. 8, and we may add of Job xlii. 14.

The cassia known to the Hebrews was one of the productions now familiar to commerce as cassia lignea, which, according to Dr. Wight, is obtained from various species of the genus Cinnamomum. (See under CINNAMON.) Like the cinnamon of the shops, it is the inner bark of the tree which yields it, stripped off and dried. It may be as well to mention that cassia bark and cassia buds are not obtainable from the botanical genus Cassia. The leaves and pods of this last, or at least of its two species Cassia lanceolata and C. obovata, yield the less popular drug known as senna.

Both as an unguent for the person, and as one of the perfumes thrown on the funeral pile, cassia as well as cinnamon was largely used by the Romans. Says Martial to the top—

“Quod semper casiaque, cinnamoque, Fragras—
Rides nos, Coracine, nil olentes;
Malo, quam bene olere.”

Epigr. vi. 55.

And in the following enumeration of funereal perfumes, the myrrh, the incense, the cassia, and the cinnamon remind us of scriptural combinations:—

Thuraque de medio semicremata rogo,
Et que de Stygio rapuisti cinnama lecto, Improbe de turpi, Zoile, redde sinu.”

Epigr. xi. 54.

CASTOR AND POLLUX, the Dioscuri of heathen mythology, the fabled twin sons of Jupiter and Leda. They were regarded as the kind of protecting genii of mariners, and their figures were in consequence frequently affixed to vessels as a propitious sign. It is simply in this use and application that they occur in Scripture; the ship in which Paul sailed from Malta had for its sign Castor and Pollux, Ac. xxviii. 11; compare also Hor. Car. i. 3, 2; iv. 8. 31; Xen. Symb. viii. 29.

CATERPILLAR (חַסִּיל, chasil; זֵלֶק, zelek). The former term is derived from חָסַל, chasal, to consume, see De. xxviii. 28, and doubtless signifies some insect remarkable for its ravages on vegetation. The English term “caterpillar” is used for the larval stage of butterflies, moths, and sawflies; and though some of these are sufficiently gregarious in their habits to strip shrubs in gardens of their leaves, yet their devastations, especially in a sub-tropical climate, where vegetation is vigorous and rapid, are rarely of much importance. The locust tribe, on the other hand, have always been regarded with dread and dismay in the East; generally appearing in countless hosts, and denuding the districts on which they alight of every green thing.

The Sept. usually render chasil by βροῦχος, a word of like etymological significance, which all antiquity concurs in representing as the name of some species or stage of gryllus; perhaps the wingless larva stage of the common locust, but not confined to this sense. We must always bear in mind that the precision of modern science was unknown in early times, and it would be absurd to look for greater exactitude than even now prevails among men in general. How many even among well-educated persons can now distinguish one species of insect from another? How many can tell the leading difference between a bee and a syrphus, between a humble-bee and a blue-bottle?

The word occurs only in a few, viz. 1 Ki. viii. 37; 2 Ch. vi. 28; Ps. lxxviii. 46; Is. xxxiii. 4; Joel i. 4; ii. 25. The attributes and associations of the animal intended, confirm its identification with some sort of locust.

For זֵלֶק, zelek, see CANKERWORM. [P. H. G.]

CATTLE. See BULL.

CAUL occurs in two senses in the English Bible. In Is. iii. 18, it is used of a female head-dress, a sort of net-work worn by way of ornament. But in Ho. xiii. 8, where the Lord represents himself as going to meet Ephraim like a bear robbed of her whelps, and says “I will rend the caul of their heart,” it means the præcordium, or membranous vessel that contains the heart. In the original the words are quite different in the two cases.

CAVES. It is one of the distinguishing features of the earlier historical records of Scripture, the frequent mention that occurs in them of caves, and the important ends that were sometimes served by them in the history of God’s people. When Lot was obliged to escape for his life from the vengeance that fell upon Sodom, it was in a cave that he and his daughters found a temporary refuge, Ge. xix. 30. The cave of Machpelah became through Abraham’s choice and purchase the common sepulchre of himself and his immediate relatives—whence also the practice of burying in caves naturally acquired a kind of sacred sanction among the covenant-people, and appears to have been preferred to other places when circumstances were not unfavourable to its adoption. So commonly was this the case, that the imagery of certain parts of Scripture can be properly explained only by a reference to the practice of turning the caves of the earth into burying vaults. In particular, the graphic and sublime delineation of the prophet Isaiah respecting the descent of the king of Babylon into the chambers of the dead, ch. xiv., is of this description. Babylon herself is there personified in her monarch, who is represented as cast down by the mighty power of God from his towering elevation, and sent as a humbled captive into the midst of the slain, who raise over him the shout of exultation as at last brought down among themselves. It is, of course, an ideal scene, but the drapery in which it is clothed was evidently suggested by the practice of burying in caves, where the dead were laid in rows along the ledges of the rock—or, as it was afterwards improved upon by the richer and more princely classes of the people, who hewed out for themselves sepulchres in the rock, adorning them with fretted roofs and stately pillars, and furnishing them with cells on either side for the remains of the departed. (See Louth, De Sac. Poss. Heb. Prælec. vii.) In the glowing description of Isaiah, it is as if all these tenants of the sepulchral vaults had at once started from their slumber, and sent forth out of their stony casements the chorus of a common rejoicing!

But the services for which caves were often made available to the living were of greater interest and importance than those which they rendered to the dead. In times of oppression and cruel bondage the Israelites frequently sought refuge in the caves of the earth, Ja. vi. 2; 1 Sa. xiii. 6; 1 Ki. xviii. 4; and during the most memorable period of domestic persecution, when for many tedious years the son of Jesse was obliged to seek for places of retreat and safety from the relentless jealousy and hatred of Saul, it was often to the dark and capacious recesses of the caves in the southern territory of Judah that he owed the means of his preservation. He went and hid himself in the cave of Adullam, 1 Sa. xiii. 1; and most probably there, as that was emphatically the cave to which he betook, though others also were occasionally resorted to, he indited the pathetic and instructive lyric which forms Psalm cxlii., in which, among other deep-toned utterances of soul, he says, "I looked on my right hand and beheld, but there was no man that would know me; refuge failed me; no man cared for my soul. I cried unto thee, O Lord; I said, Thou art my refuge, and my portion in the land of the living." In a cave somewhat farther off, in the wilderness of Engedi, near the shores of the Dead Sea, David escaped the pursuit of Saul only by remaining hid with his men in the sides of the cave, while Saul came into its mouth without perceiving them, 1 Sa. xxiv. 1. Dr. Robinson says of the whole of that region, that "the country is full of caverns, which might then serve as lurking places for David and his men, as they do for outlaws in the present day" (Researches, ii. p. 203). And of one of these caverns in the district of Engedi, Captain Lynch of the American expedition remarks, that it was "large enough to contain thirty men," and that "it has a long, low, narrow gallery, running from one side, which would be invisible when the sun does not shine through the entrance" (p. 209)—possibly the very gallery on which David and his little band lay concealed when Saul presented himself in the mouth of the cavern. But far larger caves exist at no great distance from the same region; for near the south-west extremity of the Dead Sea, in the salt mountain of Khasm Usdum, Dr. Robinson gives the following account of a remarkable cavern, of which, he says, the Arabs had frequently spoken:—"It is on a level with the ground, beneath a precipice of salt. The mouth is of an irregular form, ten or twelve feet high, and about the same in breadth. Here we stopped forty minutes in order to examine the interior of the cavern. This soon becomes merely a small irregular gallery or fissure in the rock, with a water-course in the bottom, in which water was still in some places trickling. We followed this gallery with lights, and with some difficulty, for 300 or 400 feet, into the heart of the mountain, to a point where it branches off into two smaller fissures, and then returned" (ii. p. 486). But these are only specimens of what is to be found in many parts of Palestine and its immediate neighbourhood. In various places, particularly in the neighbourhood of Hebron and other pastoral places, the peasants often live for a considerable part of the year in caves; and in times of war—such as those of which a detailed account is given by Josephus—the caves in different parts of the country were often occupied by parties of soldiers, and fortified.

The ascetic tendency which in the Essenes had obtained a footing in the southern parts of Palestine before the gospel age, and which after the second century began to develop itself powerfully throughout the East in connection with Christianity, naturally disposed many to take up their abode in caves, as one of the most approved modes of forsaking the world, and giving themselves up to a retired and contemplative life. Then grottoes, or caves, partly of a natural and partly of an artificial description, came to be in peculiar vogue, and were looked upon as deriving a certain degree of sanctity from their subterranean position. The passion in this line even grew to such a height, that it led to a general traditional disfigurement of the facts of gospel history, as was long ago remarked by Maundrell, in his Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem in 1697. He says, when speaking of the transfiguration, "I cannot forbear to mention in this place an observation, which is very obvious to all that visit the Holy Land, viz. that almost all passages and histories related in the gospel, are represented by them that undertake to show where everything was done as having been done most of them in grottoes; and that even in such cases where the condition and the circumstances of the actions themselves seem to require places of another nature. Thus, if you would see the place where St. Ann was delivered of the blessed Virgin, you are carried to a grotto; if the place of the annunciation, it is also a grotto; if the place where the blessed Virgin saluted Elizabeth; if that of the Baptist's or of our blessed Lord's nativity; if that of the agony, or that of St. Peter's repentance, or that where the apostles made the creed, or this of the transfiguration, all these places are also grottoes; and, in a word, wherever you go, you find almost everything is represented as done under ground. Certainly grottoes were anciently held in great esteem, or else they could never have been assigned, in spite of all probability, as the places in which were done so many various actions."

CEDAR. The cedar (צֶדֶר, erez) belongs to the natural order Coniferae. To that noble division must be assigned some of the most imperial forms in the vegetable kingdom—the Araucaria, or Norfolk Island pine, attaining an altitude of 200 feet, and the Wellingtontia, on the mountains of California, of which specimens are still standing 360 feet in height and 50 in circumference. The habits of the order are generally hardy; from their pine forests our Scandinavian kindred derive a large proportion of such wealth as commerce brings them, and both the imported larch and the indigenous Scotch fir redeem from sterility many thousands of acres in the less genial regions of our own British isles.

most of its kindred, and consequently the bole is usually straight and erect. But when it has reached maturity "the leading shoot becomes greatly diminished, or entirely ceases to grow; at the same time the lateral branches increase in size and length, so as at last to cover a space whose diameter is often much greater than the height of the tree itself." It is then a wide-spreading tree with a flattened pyramidal summit, and with horizontal branches, usually disposed in so many tiers or stages (Selby's Forest Trees, p. 522). As its leaves remain two years on the branches, and as every spring contributes a fresh supply, it is an evergreen—in this resembling other members of the fir family, which, the larches excepted, retain the same suit for a year or upwards, and drop the old foliage so gradually as to render the "fall of the leaf" in their case imperceptible.

Cedars still grow on the range of Lebanon, as well as on the Taurus chain in Asia Minor. There is one group on the Lebanon, not far from Tripoli, to which almost every tourist pays a pilgrimage. In 1832 Lamartine thus describes them:—"We alighted, and sat down under a rock to contemplate them. These trees are the most renowned natural monuments in the universe; religion, poetry, and history have all equally celebrated them. The Arabs of all sects retain a traditional veneration for these trees. They attribute to them not only a vegetative power which enables them to live eternally, but also an intelligence which causes them to manifest signs of wisdom and foresight, similar to those of reason and instinct in man. They are said to understand the changes of seasons; they stir their vast branches as if they were limbs; they spread out or contract their boughs, inclining them towards heaven or towards earth, according as the snow prepares to fall or to melt! . . . Every year, in the month of June, the inhabitants of Beschierai, of Eden, of Kanobin, and the other neighbouring valleys and villages, climb up to these cedars, and celebrate mass at their feet. How many prayers have resounded under these branches, and what more beautiful canopy for worship can exist!" At this spot there are some hundreds of smaller cedars, but the ten or twelve patriarchs are pre-eminent. It has been remarked that they are all much furrowed by lightning, which seems to strike them frequently; and this will at once remind the reader of Ps. xxix. 5, where it is expressly said, "The voice of the Lord breaketh the cedars; yea, the Lord breaketh the cedars of Lebanon." To Dr. Graham, now of Bonn, we are indebted for the following measurements of the twelve largest cedars on Lebanon: The circumferences of the trunk at the base he found to be respectively 40 feet, 38, 47, 18½, 30, 22½, 28, 25½, 33½, 29½, 22, 29½: the largest having thus a circumference of 47 feet, or a diameter of nearly 16 feet (Graham's Jordan and the Rhine p. 26). They grow at an elevation of about 6000 feet above the sea, and where for a long period of every year they are surrounded by snow. This lofty elevation enables them to be thoroughly at home on the ordinary level of higher latitudes.

For nearly 200 years the cedar has been naturalized in Great Britain, and thrives as well in English parks as on its native mountain. At Chelsea there are still standing two cedars which were planted in the Botanic Garden there in 1683, but which being then three feet high must already have been some years old. They were anxiously watched by Sir Hans Sloane, who in a letter to his friend, the excellent John Ray, March, 1685, says, "One thing I much wonder to see, that the Cedrus Montis Libani, the inhabitant of a very different climate, should thrive here so well as, without pot or greenhouse, to be able to propagate itself by layers this spring. Seeds sown last autumn have, as yet, thriven very well, and are likely to hold out." In the library of the British Museum there is "An Account of the Cedar of Libanus now growing in the garden of Queen Elizabeth's palace at Hendon, 1788" [by R. Gough]; with some valuable MS. notes apparently by Sir Joseph Banks. This paper, on the authority of "well-established tradition," claims for a cedar at Hendon, which was blown over on New-Year's day, 1779, the honour of having been planted by Queen Elizabeth's own hand. For this there is nothing but tradition, and the silence of Gerard, Parkinson, Evelyn, and Ray renders it extremely improbable. (See the Gentleman's Magazine, March, 1779.) Of historical cedars we have seen none more interesting than a group of four at Caen Wood, Hampstead, planted by the great Lord Mansfield in 1756, and which, springing to a height of nearly 50 feet before they break into branches, are each of them upwards of 100 feet high, with a trunk averaging nearly 15 feet in circumference. In Scotland the first cedars were planted at Hopetoun House in 1740, and, as tradition says, were brought thither by Archibald, Duke of Argyle.

Its frequent occurrence will render most of our readers familiar with the general appearance of the cedar. In the statelier specimens the mighty bole and the massive ramification convey a powerful impression of strength and majesty; whilst the "shadowing abroad" of others, extending their branches so as to measure from side to side more than the height of the tree, coupled with the foliage so dense and impenetrable, recalls the magnificent description of Ezekiel:—

"Behold, the Assyrian was a cedar in Lebanon,
With a shadowing abroad, of a high stature;

And his top was among thick boughs.
 The waters made him great, . . .
 Therefore his height was exalted above all the trees of the field, and his boughs were multiplied;
 And his branches became long, because of the multitude of the waters where he shot forth.
 All the fowls of heaven made their nests in his boughs,
 And under his branches did all the beasts of the field
 bring forth their young,
 And under his shadow dwelt all great nations."

Eze. xxxi. 1-9; comp. Ps. lxxx. 10; xlii. 12.

On the sublime description of the poet we can offer no better commentary than the remarks of Gilpin, the accomplished author of Forest Scenery:—"Two of the principal characteristics of the cedar are marked: the first is the multiplicity and length of its branches. Few trees divide so many fair branches from the main stem, or spread over so large a compass of ground. 'His boughs are multiplied,' as Ezekiel says, 'and his branches become long;' which David calls spreading abroad. His very boughs are equal to the stem of a fir or a chestnut. The second characteristic is what Ezekiel, with great beauty and aptness, calls his 'shadowing shroud.' No tree in the forest is more remarkable for its close-woven leafy canopy. Ezekiel's cedar is marked as a tree of full and perfect growth, from the circumstance of its top being among the thick boughs. Every young tree has a leading branch or two, which continue springing above the rest till the tree has attained its full size. Then it becomes, in the language of the nurseryman, clump-headed, but in the language of eastern sublimity, 'its top is among the thick boughs;' that is, no distinction of any spiry head or leading branch appears; the head and the branches are all mixed together." Dr. W. M. Thomson calls attention to a peculiarity which we have often marked in the home-grown specimens—the flat and stratified ramification. "The branches are thrown out horizontally from the parent trunk. These, again, part into limbs which preserve the same horizontal direction, and so on down to the minutest twigs; and even the arrangement of the clustered leaves has the same general tendency. Climb into one, and you are delighted with a succession of verdant floors spread around the trunk, and gradually narrowing as you ascend. The beautiful cones seem to stand upon, or rise out of this green flooring" (The Land and the Book, p. 300, pt. 2, ch. xiv.) So emblematic of imperial grandeur and permanence, both the painter and the poet have largely employed it in their lays and their landscapes; and the admirer of Martin's elaborate creations will recall the flat-topped cedars which he sets on high in his Garden of Eden, and in his Babylon. Alluding to the sensitive quality ascribed to the tree by the Maronites, Southey says—

"It was a cedar tree
 That woke him from the deadly drowsiness;
 Its broad round spreading branches, when they felt
 The snow, rose upward in a point to heaven,
 And, standing in their strength erect,
 Defied the baffled storm."

And Thomson:—

"On some fair brow
 Let us behold, by breezy summers cool'd,
 Broad o'er our heads the verdant cedar wave."

And Shakspeare, on the fall of Warwick:—

"Thus yields the cedar to the axe's edge,
 Whose arms gave shelter to the princely eagle,
 Under whose shade the ramping lion slept,
 Whose top-branch overpeer'd Jove's spreading tree,
 And kept low shrubs from winter's powerful wind."

The wood of the cedar contains a considerable amount of resin. This causes it to burn with a lively and brilliant flame, and when the red heifer was sacrificed, the priest was commanded to take "cedar-wood, and hyssop, and scarlet, and cast it into the midst of the burning heifer," Nu. xix. 6. But whatever might be its effect on the flame of the altar, the cedar had a deeper significance; for in the instructions for cleansing the leper, and the house of the leper, Le. xiv. 6, 48, and where there is no mention of incremation, cedar-wood is one of the ingredients prescribed. The allusion is probably to its incorruptible qualities. These were well known to the ancients. A gum which exuded from the stem, called by the Romans cedria, was used for embalming the dead, and the leaves of papyrus when rubbed with it were secure from the attacks of worms. It is said that the books of Numa were found in his tomb uninjured, being indebted for their preservation to the cedria in which they had been steeped. So distasteful to insects is this principle that there are few better means of protecting furs and woollen fabrics from the attacks of moths than intrusting them to a wardrobe lined with cedar, or even placing beside them chips or shavings of cedar-wood. The proverb, "cedro digna," is thus as well founded as it is classical; and in the language of symbols the Hebrew worshipper hailed the employment of this amaranthine and antiseptic agent as an assurance that the cure was complete, and that the plague should return no more.

The wood of the cedar grown in this country is too soft and spongy, and warps too easily, to be well adapted for cabinet work. Doubtless it would be different with the slow-grown trunks which had consolidated their fibre for a thousand years amidst the snows of the mountain; and no carpenter need desire a more compact or close-grained plank than an authentic specimen from Lebanon at this moment before us. Pliny tells us that after 1200 years the cedar timber of a temple at Utica was perfectly sound, and at Saguntum in Spain, he says that a cedar image of Diana, older than the Trojan war, was found and spared by Hannibal.

How long the 80,000 hewers mentioned in 1 Ki. v. 15, were employed in the mountains we are not told, but the consumption of cedar for the temple, for "the house of the forest of Lebanon," and for the other undertakings of the sumptuous monarch, must have been enormously great. It is not at all unlikely that the cedar forest never recovered the inroad, and the only extensive tract of cedar now existing in those regions is that which M. Bové discovered between Sakhléhé and Der-el-Khamer, in a locality so remote that its existence was probably unknown to Hiram, and so inaccessible that the timber could only be removed on the backs of animals. It is right to add, however, that we think it by no means unlikely that under the generic name "cedar" were included, besides the true C. Libani, the several varieties of pine, cypress, and juniper which the same region yielded, and some of which, like "the tall fragrant juniper of the Lebanon, with its fine red heart-wood," were admirably adapted for architectural purposes.

From 2 Ki. xix. 23 it appears to have been one object of Sennacherib's ambition to "go up to the sides of Lebanon, and cut down the tall cedars thereof." In this attempt he was at that time baffled by the direct interposition of the Most High, and the miraculous destruction of his army. But what he then failed to effect was accomplished by another Assyrian monarch, and the prophecies regarding the decline of Lebanon have been exactly fulfilled: "The rest of the trees of his forest have grown so few, that a little child may write them," Je. xxii. 5-7; Is. x. 19. An inscription has been found at Nimroud recording the conquests of an Assyrian king in Northern Syria, and his spoliation of the much-coveted mountain (Layard's Nineveh and Babylon, p. 365-357).

Closely allied to the "glory of Lebanon" is that other cedar, which may well be called "the glory of the [159.] Cedar—Cedrus Deodara.

Himalayas." The deodara (deodera, or "tree of God," see Ps. civ. 16), the Cedrus Deodara, with a stature of 150 feet, with the "shadowing shroud" of its beautifully drooping branches, with the glaucous bloom of its dark-green leaves, and with its delightfully fragrant timber, is the sacred tree of the Hindoos, and is almost uniformly employed in the construction of their temples. Indeed, the recent researches of Dr. J. D. Hooker leave little room to doubt that the three grand monarchs of the mountain, the cedars of Lebanon, of the Himalaya (C. Deodara), and of the Atlas range in Northern Africa (C. atlantica), are all varieties of the same species, which, in localities widely sundered and in climates of greater or less humidity, have acquired a style and habit of marked and enduring diversity. CEN'CHREÆ, OR CENCHREA, the port of Corinth on the eastern side, and at the distance of between eight and nine miles from the city. It was itself a considerable place, and shared in St. Paul's labours while he resided at Corinth. A church was in existence there when the epistle to the Romans was written; for in ch. xvi. 1, Phœbe, a member of that church, is commended to their favourable notice; and in Ac. xviii. 18, Paul is spoken of as having shorn his head in Cenchreae, in connection with a vow, implying that he sometimes resided there. (See CORINTH.) There is now only a small village on the site, and comparatively few traces are to be seen of the ancient buildings.

CENSER, the vessel employed for presenting incense to the Lord in the sanctuary, and which was appointed to be set every morning on the altar of incense when the priest went in to dress the lamps, and again at even on his going to light them. Live coals from the altar of burnt-offering were put into it, and then a quantity of incense was thrown on them, causing a cloud of sweet perfume to ascend, and to fill the sanctuary. No description, however, is given of this part of the sacred furniture. It is not even mentioned by name in the original instructions respecting the erection of the tabernacle; in connection with the altar of incense, it is merely said, that Aaron was to burn incense thereon every morning when he went in to dress the lamps, and when he lighted them at even, Ex. xxv. 7, 8. How he was to do so, or what sort of vessel was to be employed on the occasion, is left altogether unnoticed. But at Nu. iv. 14, censers are mentioned among the vessels of the tabernacle, which were to be wrapped up in proper coverings when the order was given to march. And from various passages, Le. x. 1; Nu. xvi. 8, 17, in which each ministering priest is spoken of as having his censer, it would appear that they existed in considerable numbers—too much so to be of very costly material. Indeed, as the censers of Korah and his company are expressly said to have been of brass, Nu. xvi. 39, and had been in use for priestly ministrations before the rebellion, the natural supposition is, that they were all made of the same material; and hence, that the golden censers made by Solomon for the temple, 1KI. vii. 50, were, like many other things, of a costlier fabric, and possibly also of a more ornate form, than those used in the tabernacle.

Neither, however, in connection with the erection of the tabernacle, nor with that of the temple, is the least idea conveyed of the form and appearance of the censers employed; nor is it known whether any diversity in this respect might be allowed. It has been supposed (for example by Kitto) that they were of different constructions; at least, that the censer used by the high-priest on the day of atonement, which he was to carry in his hand into the most holy place, Le. xvi. 12, 13, must have differed from that placed in the daily service on the altar of incense. But there is no necessity for this. If the one used by the high-priest on the day of atonement required a handle, that he might carry and hold it for a time, so also did the others; for as no fire was allowed to be put into a censor but that taken from the brazen altar, Le. x. 1, all other being accounted strange fire, it was necessary that every censor should have a handle in order that it might be conveniently carried from the altar to the sanctuary and set in its proper place. The probability is, that the original censers bore the resemblance of some sort of pan or small pot, with a handle at one or at both of the sides for lifting by, rather than the vase-like forms with perforated lids used in the religions of classical antiquity, and now in the Church of Rome. The Egyptian censers, so far as one can judge from the figures preserved of them, appear to have been chiefly designed for holding in the hand, and could scarcely be of the same form with those used in the tabernacle.

CENTURION, the captain of a century or hundred, in ancient armies. Frequent mention is made of this officer in gospel history, though seldom with reference to the exact number of men under his authority. There is such a reference, however, in Ac. xxiii. 23, where Claudius Lysias orders two centurions to get ready with their two hundred men to convey Paul safely on his way to Caesarea. Special mention is made of two centurions on account of the benefit they derived from their religious opportunities in Palestine, and the high attainments to which they rose in divine knowledge and faith. The first of these is the one who, at a comparatively early period of our Lord's public ministry, sent to him a request that he would recover his dying servant, and expressed his belief that if Jesus but gave the word at a distance the desired effect would assuredly follow, Mat. viii. 6-10—which drew from our Lord the striking declaration, "Verily, I have not found so great faith, no not in Israel." This person was not necessarily (as is often loosely affirmed) or even probably, a Roman. Residing, as he appears to have done, at Capernaum, which lay within the jurisdiction of Herod Antipas, the natural inference is that he belonged to the army of Herod, which we know to have been modelled after the Roman pattern; and so, while certainly a heathen by birth, was much more likely to have been of Syrian or Greek parentage than of Roman. Italian citizens were not wont to enter the armies of petty sovereigns. The other centurion is Cornelius, who was in all probability a Roman, and who even before his reception into the Christian church is characterized as a devout man, and one that feared God with all his house, Ac. x. 1; so that though a Gentile by birth, he had undergone the preparation of the law before he was called to receive the gospel. It may be right to add to these two, the centurion who, after having heard and seen all that took place at the crucifixion of Jesus, uttered the memorable words, "Verily this man was the Son of God"—the more memorable (whether he understood their full import or not), that Jesus had been condemned by the Jewish leaders expressly on the ground of his having claimed to be the Son of God. It was ordered that an intelligent heathen confessed the very faith which the Jewish rulers repudiated, and by so doing became a sign of the transference of the kingdom from Jewish to Gentile hands. All the three, indeed, might be regarded as signs of a like description; for as the faith in each one of them was remarkable, so there is in the application made of it a distinct pointing, in one form or another, to the gathering of the heathen into the fold of Christ.

CEPHAS, the Aramaic word for rock or stone, corresponding to the Greek Πέτρος—the surname given by our Lord to Simon Barjonas. (See PETER.)

CHAFF, the refuse of thrashed and winnowed corn, the ἀχυρὸν of the Greeks, comprehending, as used in Scripture, not merely the outer covering of the grain, but also the chopped straw, which, according to the ancient process of thrashing and winnowing, became mingled with what is now more commonly designated chaff. Forming the lighter, and the comparatively worthless part of the produce, chaff in Scripture is frequently used as a symbol of what is doctrinally or morally of a similar description—of false teaching, Ja. xliii. 25; of vain counsels that are destined to come to nought, Is. xxiii. 11; of fruitless professors and evil-doers, who must be driven away by the tempest or consumed by the fire of God's wrath, Ps. i. 4; xxxv. 6; Mat. iii. 12.

CHAIN. From a very remote antiquity chains appear to have been in use, both as ornaments and as instruments of punishment and bondage; in the one case being made of light fabric and costly material, chiefly gold, in the other usually of iron, and of greatly coarser and stronger workmanship. It is the ornamental use of them that is first mentioned in Scripture, in the case of Joseph, who on his elevation by Pharaoh had a chain of gold put about his neck, Ge. xli. 42. But as he had already been bound in prison, it is more than probable that he had previously had some experience of chains of another description. Chains also and bracelets are mentioned among the spoil which the Israelites obtained from the Midianitish and Iahmaelite tribes whom they overcame, Nu. xxxi. 50; Ju. viii. 26. And the breastplate of the high-priest was fastened to ouches with chains of wreathen work—much probably as the judges of Egypt were accustomed to wear little images of the goddesses Thmei or truth suspended by gold chains from their neck. Indeed, as ornaments, chains seem to have been in constant use among the Israelites and other nations of antiquity from the earliest times, and were worn alike by men and by women, Pr. i. 9; Eze. xvi. 11; Ca. i. 10; iv. 9.

The iron chain of bondage and confinement is also of early occurrence, and no doubt in the despotic countries of the East was in frequent demand. In various passages of Scripture it is taken as the natural symbol of oppression or punishment, La. iii. 7; Eze. vii. 23; Ps. cxlix. 8, &c. In the later times of biblical history, when we come upon Roman usage, the custom of attaching a prisoner by a chain to a soldier, for the purpose of closer custody, meets us in the narratives of apostolic suffering. Paul's chain—that, namely, which bound his right hand to the left of the soldier who had charge of him—is once and again referred to; and when Herod was determined to make sure of Peter's safe custody, he even caused both hands to be thus fastened to the hand of a soldier at either side of him, Ac. xii. 6.

CHALCEDONY (Gr. χαλκιδών), occurs only once in Scripture as the name of a precious stone—one of those figuratively employed as the foundations of the new Jerusalem, Re. xxi. 19. It is a species of quartz, and does not materially differ from the agate. It occurs in irregular masses, forming grotesque cavities in the trap rocks, and occasionally also in the granite.

The most beautiful specimens known were found in one of the mines of Cornwall, bearing the name of Trevascus. It is of fine and compact texture, semi-transparent, in hardness somewhat inferior to rock-crystal; and has been much used in the manufacture of cups, plates (especially in India, where this species of manufacture has been carried to a wonderful perfection), knife-handles, snuff-boxes, &c. The common colour of chalcedony is a light brown, approaching often to white; but various other colours also occasionally enter into it.

CHALDEANS, CASDIM, strictly the people of Chaldea, the most southerly region of Babylonia (Mesopotamia), but applied in Scripture to the people generally of the Babylonian kingdom, 2 Ki. xxv.; Is. xlii. 10. The term Chaldeans likewise signifies learned men, philosophers, possibly the priesthood, Da. ii. 2-10; iii. 8; iv. 7; v. 7, 11. The earliest recorded notice of the Chaldeans as a people is in Ge. xi. 28-31, where "Ur (Edessa) of the Chaldees" is mentioned as the land of the nativity of the family of Abraham, and whence Terah, his son Abram, and his grandson Lot, with their families, "went forth to go into the land of Canaan."

The Chaldeans are thought to owe their origin to Chesed, son of Nahor, Ge. xxii. 22; Cellarius, lib. iii. 16. Jerome says, "Chased, son of Nahor, from whom Chasdim, afterwards Chaldæi." Chesed, however, only united the scattered tribes into a nation of the land of Ur, but there is little doubt that they were a distinct tribe or people (Jerom. in Quest. on Ge. xxii.; Diod. i. 28; Strabo, xvi. c. lii. 1; Ainsworth's Researches in Aas.) It has been supposed by some that the Chaldeans were descended from the Kurds, a hardy race, who still inhabit the mountains of Kurdistan between Nineveh and Media, and that they founded Ur prior to the time of Abraham. Jeremiah speaks of it as "an ancient nation, a nation whose language thou knowest not," ch. v. 15. From Isaiah, ch. xxiii. 13, it may be inferred that they were not united as a nation until "the Assyrians founded it for them that dwell in the wilderness." In the time of Job, they are mentioned as making warlike and predatory excursions into Arabia, Job i. 17. The Bible makes no further mention of the Chaldeans till the time of Nebuchadnezzar, 2 Ki. xxiv. 2, when Habakkuk calls them a "bitter and hasty nation, which shall march through the breadth of the land to possess the dwelling places that are not theirs," ch. i. 6-10. From Berosus, Abydenus, and other fragments in Eusebius, and from the canon of Ptolemy, some useful information may be obtained; but it is so impossible to connect their accounts with the sacred text, that they are recommended for separate study and investigation (see Cory's Fragments, 1832, p. 21, 30, 32, 38, 44, 64; for dynasties, 67-84). According to Syncellus, the Chaldeans were the first who assumed the title of kings, the first being Euechius, or Nimrod, who reigned at Babylon, and was succeeded by a dynasty, the whole term of which was 225 years. To these Chaldean kings succeeded an Arabian dynasty which lasted 215 years, when the people would appear to have come under the rule of the Assyrians, the seat of government of this portion of the empire being at Babylon. After the revolt of Babylon, and the conquest of the Assyrian empire by the Medes (Diod. Sic. iii. 1, after Ctesias, ii.), the Chaldeo-Babylonians acquired a temporary independence. The ecclesiastical and astronomical canons preserved by Syncellus, and the canon of Ptolemæus, enumerate from the time of Nabonassar,

B.C. 747, "who is the same as Salmanassar, king of the Chaldeans, to Nirigolosassar, who is Belshazzar," nineteen Chaldean or Babylonian kings, whose united reigns, including two periods of interregnum, amount to 192 years. Fifth on these lists is Mardo-campadus, the Merodach Baladan, who made a treaty with Hezekiah king of Judah, 2 Ki. xx. 12; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 31; Is. xxxix. 1, in the time of Sennacherib. Sennacherib appears to have levied an army against the successors of Merodach, and to have appointed his son Esarhaddon (13th on the canons) king of Babylon, B.C. 680. (Alex. Polyhistor, Eu. Ar. Chron. 42.) Sardocheus, the next king, reigned over Babylon, Nineveh, and Israel, for twenty years. Sardocheus was succeeded by Chyniladan, during whose reign of twenty-two years Babylon revolted, and Nabopolassar (16th king of the canons) became king of the city and of the lower half of the valley of the Tigris and Euphrates. Nabopolassar formed a league with Cyaxares, king of Media, and conquered Assyria, consolidated the empire under the Chaldean rule, and from this time the Chaldeans and Babylonians appear to be identical, 2 Ki. xxv.; Is. xlii. 19; xxlii. 13; Je. xxiv. 6; xxv. 12; 1. 1; Esa. i. 3, 11, 24; xli. 13; Da. ix. 1. (See BABYLON.) Under Nebuchadnezzar, the son and successor of Nabopolassar, the Chaldeo-Babylonian empire attained its greatest power and extent, comprehending all Western Asia as far as the Mediterranean. Nebuchadnezzar was succeeded by his son Evil-Merodach, 2 Ki. xxv. 27, who released Jehoiachin, king of Judah, from his prison, and set "his throne above the throne of the kings that were with him in Babylon," ver. 28. Evil-Merodach was succeeded by Nergalsarassar (Nirigolosassar of Ptolemy), of whom there is a cylinder at Trinity College, Cambridge. After him Labonardochus reigned a few months, and the last king of the Chaldean dynasty was Nabonidas (Nabonadius of Ptolemy, and the Laby-netus of Herodotus (i. 188; see also Berosus in Josephus, i. 20), of whom there are four cylinders in the British Museum. No cylinders have been found of a later date than Nabonidas, who is supposed to be the Belshazzar of the Bible, Da. v. The Medo-Persian army conquered Babylon about B.C. 538; Belshazzar was slain, and "Darius the Median (the same with Cyaxares II., according to Mr. S. Sharpe) took the kingdom, being about three score and two years old," Da. v. 30, 31; ix. 1. Refer also to Da. vi. 28; x. 1.

The form of the Chaldean government was entirely despotic; the monarch was styled "king of kings," Da. ii. 37, and his will was as supreme as his decrees were cruel and merciless, Da. ii. 6; iii. 19; vi. 8; Je. xlii. 22. The kingdom was divided into provinces, governed by satraps or viceroys, Da. vi. 1; Is. x. 8. (See GOVERNORS OF PROVINCES.) The king was inaccessible to his subjects, and lived in great state, retired within his palace like the Persians, Es. ii. 19, 21; iii. 1; iv. 2; Da. ii. 49; King's House, Nineveh and its Palaces, 3d edition, p. 237, 238. The king's counsellors, Da. iii. 24-27, and officers of the household (which see), were various, and are specially described in Daniel, ch. i. 3; ii. 14, 49; iii. 2, 3; vi. 2. The Chaldeans of Babylon were Sabeans, and worshipped the heavenly bodies, the planets Jupiter, Mercury, Venus, Saturn, and Mars being honoured, as Bel, Nebo, Memi, &c. (Gesenius on Isaiah; also Belus in art. Babylon). Rawlinson reads a passage in one inscription found at Nimroud, to the effect that Phulukh, the Pul of Scripture, Phalock of the LXX., and Bolochos of the Greeks, received the homage of the Chaldeans, and sacrificed in the cities of Babylon, Borsippo, and Cutha, to the respective tutelary divinities Bel, Nebo, and Nergal, 2 KI. vii. 30. The Chaldeans boasted of having astronomical observations for a period of 470,000 years (Cicero; Epigenes quoted in Pliny; and art. Babylon); but there are no authenticated reports prior to the era of Nabonassar, and to the eclipses observed at Babylon during the reigns of the Mardocempadus (Merodach Baladan) of Ptolemy, of Nabopalassar, Cambyses, and Darius.

The language spoken in Babylon in the time of Nebuchadnezzar, and with which the Jews would be familiar, was probably Chaldee, identical with that of part of the book of Daniel, and distinct from the "tongue of the Chaldeans," Da. i. 4, specially taught to the Hebrew children. Both Deuteronomy, ch. xxviii. 49, and Jeremiah, ch. v. 15, make mention of the Chaldees as a "nation whose language" the Jews knew not, a circumstance that would favour the assumption that the Chaldees were Kurds, whose language would probably be a very distinct dialect from the Chaldee of the book of Daniel, or the Syriac (Aramaic).

Layard, speaking of the modern Chaldeans, says that the language is a Shemitic dialect allied to the Hebrew, Arabic, and Syriac, and still called Chaldani or Chaldee. "In its written form it bears a close resemblance to the Chaldee of the book of Daniel. It is an interesting fact that the Chaldee spoken in Assyria is almost identical with the language of the Sabeans, or Christians of St. John, as they are vulgarly called—a remarkable tribe who reside in the province of Khusistan, or Susiana, and in the districts near the mouth of the Euphrates, and who are probably the descendants of the ancient inhabitants of Babylonia and Chaldea" (Popular Account of Discoveries at Nineveh, vii. p. 142, 1851).

In Da. ii. 2 four kinds of magicians are named—"the magicians, and the astrologers, and the sorcerers, and the Chaldeans;" these last being a sort of philosophers, who were exempt from all public offices and employments, their studies being physic, astrology, the foretelling of future events, interpretation of dreams by augury, worship of the gods, &c. Among the wise men of Babylon they seem to take the lead, and be the spokesmen, Da. ii. 10; iv. 6-9; v. 7, 8, 11. The Greeks and Romans applied the term Chaldee to the whole order of learned men of Babylon (Strabo, xvi. c. 1. 6; Diod. Sic. ii. 29; Cicero, De Div. l. 1, 2). At the time of the Arab invasion, the learning of the East was still chiefly to be found with the Chaldeans. We are indebted to them for the preservation of numerous precious fragments of Greek learning, as the Greeks were many centuries before to their ancestors, the Chaldees of Babylon, for the records of astronomy and the elements of eastern science. The caliph Al Mamoun sent learned Nestorians into Syria, Armenia, and Egypt, to collect manuscripts, and confided for translation to his Chaldee subjects, amongst other treatises, those of Aristotle and Galen (Layard's Pop. Acc. Nineveh, c. vii. p. 131, 1851; Humboldt's Cosmos, ii. c. 6). In later times, professed diviners, astrologers, and expounders of dreams, were known by the name of Chaldeans in the western world (Joseph. Wars, ii. 7, 3), in the same way as the modern professional divines of Egypt are called Moghrabin, thereby intimating that they originally came from Tunis, Tripoli, or Morocco, countries to the west of Egypt.

Upon the walls of the Assyrian palaces are representations of various magi, all distinguished by a peculiarity of dress. It may be difficult to determine the class to which they respectively belong, but there is one (Botta, pl. xliii.) who may be particularized as a diviner, and probably of the Chaldee race; for his person is much thinner, and his features are more delicate than are those of the other attendants of the court, indicating a different order of occupations, and an exemption from the ruder and more active employments of life. CHALDEE LANGUAGE. The Chaldee being a form of the Aramean language, one of the three principal varieties of the ancient Semitic (see articles on ARABIC LANGUAGE, HEBREW LANGUAGE), we shall point out, in the first place, the general characteristics of the Aramean, as distinguished from the Hebrew and Arabic languages, and, in the second place, the special characteristics of the Chaldee, as a dialect of the Aramean.

I. Of the Aramean Language.—The region called in the Hebrew Scriptures Aram, may be described generally as occupying the northern and north-eastern divisions of that corner of Asia which was the home of the Semitic languages. It was bounded on the north by the Taurus range and the river Tigris, which latter also formed its eastern boundary; on the west, by the Mediterranean and Mount Lebanon; and on the south, by Palestine and the Arabian desert (Winer, RWB). Its principal divisions are frequently mentioned in Scripture, viz.: Aram-naharaim, or Padan-aram (Mesopotamia), and, west of the Euphrates, Damascus, Hamath, Zobah, &c. The inhabitants were chiefly of Semitic descent, and spoke a Semitic language, which in Scripture is called Aramith, אַרַמִּית, 2 KI. xviii. 26; Da. ii. 4; Ezr. iv. 7. From the passages just quoted, it appears that this Aramean language was very extensively known, not only within the limits above mentioned, but beyond them. The princes of Assyria and Judea were familiar with it; it was spoken in the palace of Nebuchadnezzar; and even formed the medium of correspondence between the Persian court and its subjects in Judea and Samaria. It may also lay claim to a high antiquity, having probably been the language of Abraham previous to his migration into Palestine, De. xvi. 5, and certainly of his grand-nephew Laban, Ge. xxxi. 47. But unfortunately the older monuments of the language have perished; the Chaldee portions of Daniel and Ezra being the earliest specimens we possess of a language which had probably existed and flourished at least two thousand years before.

The question as to the relative antiquity of the Hebrew and Aramean has been frequently discussed by the learned; and the conclusion in which most competent inquirers seem now to acquiesce is, that the two languages do not stand to one another in the relation of mother and daughter, but are sister-languages, the offspring of a common parent. The Aramean certainly occupied the region to which all tradition points as the primeval abode of mankind, and from which, according to Scripture, the nations were spread abroad over the earth. It is, moreover, in several respects, less developed and cultivated than either the Hebrew or the Arabic. But poverty of forms is by no means a proof of superior antiquity; and our ignorance of the exact nature and results of the transaction at Babel hinders us from attaching so much importance to the circumstance of geographical locality as it might otherwise deserve.

Of the Aramean language there are two forms or dialects, viz. the Chaldee and the Syriac—the former, as the name indicates, prevailing in the eastern, the latter in the western parts of Aramea. In both of these dialects numerous writings are still extant, from the examination of which, notwithstanding their comparative recency, we may obtain a pretty accurate idea of what the old language really was, and of the points in which it differed from the Hebrew. The results are as follows:—

1. With respect to sounds, letters of the T class usually supplant the Hebrew sibilant; as tab, he returned, the Hebrew of which is shab; d'hab, gold, the Hebrew of which is zahab. The strong Hebrew letter z is in many words weakened into y, which latter, moreover, seems to have lost in Aramean the rough guttural sound which it sometimes had in Hebrew, and still frequently retains in Arabic: as, e.g. זָרַח = Heb. זָרַח ; זָרַח = Heb. זָרַח . And, lastly, the vowels are much more sparingly employed in Aramean than in either of the sister-languages; and this peculiarity is of the greater consequence, as the vowel sounds have very important functions assigned to them in the structure and inflexion of all the languages of the Semitic class.

2. With regard to words and forms, the Aramean language is defective in the following particulars: (1.) It has no definite article, or rather, to express the article, it employs not a prefix, like the Hebrew and Arabic, but an affix (ה); which affix, however, having in course of time lost much of its original definite force, came to be regarded and employed as a constituent part of words, of which it had at first been but an occasional appendage; and hence the language, as we find it in the extant writings, can scarcely be said to possess a definite article at all. (2.) The dual number is almost entirely wanting, not only in verbs and adjectives, as in Hebrew, but also in nouns, even such nouns as hand, eye, &c., which denote objects double by nature. (3.) In the verb, the purely passive conjugations, distinguished in Hebrew and Arabic by the U sound, are altogether wanting, if we except a few traces met with in biblical Chaldee, which have usually been regarded rather as hebraizing than as genuine Aramean forms. The niphal conjugation is also wanting. (4.) An important defect is the absence of the distinction between the strong and weak forms, employed in Hebrew to represent respectively the concrete and the abstract, and to describe the verbal action as perfect or imperfect, realized or not yet realized. (5.) Of the tense, commonly called future, there is only one form; the other forms which appear in Hebrew, and still more prominently in Arabic, being almost unknown.

To compensate in some measure for these defects, we find in Aramean, (1.) A more regular, though less extensive, conjugation system, consisting of three active and three reflexive or passive conjugations, the latter all formed on the same model by the prefix ש . The schafel conjugation, also, of which only some traces are found in Hebrew, is in more common use in Aramean. (2.) Separate forms or combinations to express present, imperfect, and pluperfect time, which in Hebrew are either altogether wanting, or are met with much less frequently. The expression for pluperfect time, however, is rather a Syriac than an Aramean form, not being found in the earlier Chaldee writings (Schaf. Opus Aramæum, p. 361). It may also be observed (3.) that adjectives are more numerous than in Hebrew, and separate forms for the ordinal numbers are not limited to the units.

3. With regard to syntax, the three principal peculiarities are: (1.) The expression of the genitive relation by means of the relative, the former of the two related nouns being put in the emphatic state, or having a suffix attached to it. This is a much less imaginative, and more cumbrous method than the Hebrew. (2.) The absence of the vau consecutive or relative, which meets us so frequently in the Hebrew writings, and gives them so peculiar a character. (3.) The frequent use of the participle, where in Hebrew a finite tense would appear. The effect of these peculiarities is to take away very much from the life and poetical character of the language, and to render it dull, prosaic, and commonplace, though, it may be, more exact and full in the expression of thought.

II. The Chaldee Dialect.—The points of difference between the Syriac and Chaldee are not sufficiently numerous and marked to constitute them separate languages. They are merely dialectic. The principal of them are as follows:—(1.) The Chaldee ā sound becomes in Syriac ō. The Hebrew occupies a middle position, agreeing sometimes with the Syriac, sometimes with the Chaldee. It is somewhat curious that, in this point, the language which is called the modern Syriac agrees with the ancient Chaldee (Stoddart's Grammar of Modern Syriac). Perhaps this is explained by the geographical position of the Christian tribes by whom this language is spoken. (2.) The Chaldee, according to the traditional pronunciation, is without diphthongs, differing in this from the Syriac. (3.) The doubling of a letter, admissible in Chaldee, seems to have been avoided in Syriac, in the punctuation of which there is, consequently, no sign equivalent to dagesh forte of the Hebrew, or teschdid of the Arabian grammarians. (4.) In Syriac, the 3d masc. sing. and 3d masc. and fem. pl. of the future tense are formed by prefixing n, instead of y of the Chaldee and of the other Semitic languages. The reason perhaps is, that in Syriac initial yod was too feeble to maintain its consonantal power in such a position. The Talmudists frequently make a similar change of a feeble letter at the beginning of a word into y. Compare also the forms יָהוּוָה of the biblical Chaldee. (5.) The Chaldee infinitive wants the Syriac prefix m, except in the peal conjugation. (6.) The form of the demonstrative pronoun is likewise different.

Historical Notice of the Chaldee Language.—As has been already mentioned, the most ancient specimens of Chaldee which have come down to us are contained in the sacred Scriptures. It is not improbable that the exploration of the monumental remains of the great eastern empires, which has of late years been carried on with so much zeal and success, may bring to light some Chaldee monuments and inscriptions of a more ancient date, and enable us to trace the progress of the language through some of its earlier stages. Already various inscriptions in Semitic characters have been detected on the weights, cylinders, &c., found in the ruins of the Chaldean cities (Layard's Nineveh and Babylon, p. 601, 606; Zeitschrift der Deutsch. Morg. Gesell. vol. ix. p. 476, note). A discovery, specially interesting, has been made by Mr. Layard of several cups or bowls of earthenware, containing inscriptions which have been very successfully deciphered by Mr. Ellis of the British Museum. They are found to contain amulets or charms against evil spirits (Nineveh and Babylon, p. 608, &c., Zeitsch. der D. M. G. vol. ix. p. 466-489). The date of these inscriptions is not accurately ascertained, but it can scarcely be carried higher than twelve or fourteen centuries. It has been remarked that they contain the final letters $\eta\eta$, &c., which were of later introduction; and a writer in the Journal of the German Oriental Society thinks he has detected evidence that they must be later than the era of Mohammed. Besides these recent discoveries, the student of Chaldee may examine with advantage the Palmyrene inscriptions, long since made known to the world (Phil. Trans. for year 1754), and the Egyptio-Aramean monuments and papyri, described by Gesenius in his great work on Phœnician Antiquities (Mon. Phœn. p. 228-246. See also for another Egypt.-Aram. Inscription, Z. der D. M. G. vol. xi. p. 65).

Still it is not probable that any of these monuments belongs to a period so remote as the age of Daniel or Ezra; and most of them are of much more recent date. And, besides, it must be allowed that monumental inscriptions, from their very nature, can convey to us but a very imperfect idea of the character of a language, especially when these inscriptions are without any marks to indicate the vowel sounds. The principal source of our knowledge of the Chaldee, as of other languages, must be found in the literature which has come down to us in that language.

This literature has usually been arranged in two divisions, viz.: the Biblical Chaldee, or those portions of the Old Testament scriptures which are written in Chaldee, Da. ii. 4-vii. 28; Est. iv. 9-vi. 18; and vii. 12-26; and Je. x. 11; and the Chaldee of the Targums and other later Jewish writings. The former is distinguished by a closer approach to the Hebrew idiom, and is therefore considered less pure than the Chaldee of the Targum of Onkelos, the oldest and most valuable of the Targums. The following peculiarities of the biblical Chaldee may be marked: (1.) The more frequent use of the future tense in describing past action, Da. iv. 30-33; vi. 20; vii. 16, and also in describing continued and habitual action, Da. iv. 2, 16; vii. 28. (2.) The frequent use of η for \aleph both as a feeble letter, and as a formative prefix of the aphel and passive conjugations. (3.) The suffixes $\eta\eta$ $\eta\eta$ frequently take the forms $\eta\eta$ $\eta\eta$ in Ezra. These forms also appear in the later Targums. (4.) The use of the Hebrew hiphal and hophal conjugations, Da. v. 13; vii. 11, 22; Est. iv. 16. (5.) The occasional use of the dual number, Da. ii. 46. (6.) The occasional use of the negative particle η . But compare Onkelos on Ge. xix. 7. (8.) The use of the passive participle with the affixes of the preterite tense. Most of these peculiarities have been set down as Hebraisms; but the correctness of this view is not established. Some of them probably belong to an older form of the language than that which appears in the Targums. It is certain that the Egyptio-Aramean monuments, even the stone of Carpentras, which, according to Gesenius, is not of Jewish origin, exhibit forms not less decidedly Hebraistic than those above mentioned; e.g. η for \aleph , η for η (= Heb. η) and $\eta\eta$ for $\aleph\eta$, or $\eta\eta$ (Gesenius, Mon. Phœn. p. 228).

And in the Babylonish cuneiform, according to Dr. Hincks, the future is constantly used to denote past action.

With regard to the second division of the Chaldee literature, consisting of the Targums and other later Jewish works, it is characterized by great diversity of idiom and style, arising in part from the influence of time and social changes, and in some measure also from the fact that the same degree of attention was not paid to the accurate transcription of these works as to that of the sacred writings. Already, even in the Targum of Onkelos, we find the quiescent letters more largely introduced as vowel marks than in the biblical Chaldee, e.g. the suffix η of the letter becomes $\eta\eta$ in the former, and the termination η takes the form $\eta\eta$. Contracted forms also become more numerous, as $\eta\eta$ for $\eta\eta\eta$, and the change of η into the prefix η .

In the Targum of Jonathan on the Prophets, these divergencies from the biblical Chaldee become more decided. Occasionally, indeed, even in Onkelos, forms appear which we should expect to find only in the latest Chaldee writings; but in characterizing a document, we must not attach too great importance to forms which are of rare occurrence, as it is not uncommon for an ancient document to be somewhat modernized in process of transcription. In the later Targums we meet with many new and strange words and forms, not a few of them traceable to foreign influence. But into the minute detail of these peculiarities our space does not permit us to enter.

CHAMBERING is used only once in our Scriptures, and in a bad sense—of lewd and licentious behaviour, Ro. xiii. 13. The word in the original, $\kappa\omicron\lambda\eta\eta$, is by no means confined to that sense, not even in New Testament scripture, but such is undoubtedly the meaning it bears in the passage just referred to.

CHAMBERS OF IMAGERY is a peculiar expression of the prophet Ezekiel, and by him used only on one occasion, ea. viii. 12, when he is portraying in vivid and striking colours the idolatrous corruptions which had obtained a footing in the kingdom of Judah during the later stages of its history. It has respect, indeed, only to one form of those corruptions—the imitation of the manners of Egypt, by painting on the wall of a chamber representations of the irrational creatures, and various idols, which were the immediate objects of veneration and worship. When carried by the Spirit of God from the banks of the Chebar to the temple courts of Jerusalem, the prophet hears, among other things, the voice of the Lord saying to him, "Son of man, dig now in the wall; and I dug in the wall, and behold a door. And he said to me, Come and see the evil abominations which they are practising here. And I came and looked, and behold every form of creeping things, and abominable beasts, and all the idols of the house of Israel, portrayed everywhere on the wall round about. And there stood before them seventy men, elders of the house of Israel, and Jaazaniah the son of Shaphan stood in the midst of them, each man with his censer in his hand, and the prayer (or worship) of the cloud of incense ascending. And he said to me, Hast thou seen, son of man, what the elders of the house of Israel are doing in the dark, every man in the chambers of his imagery; for they say, Jehovah does not see us, Jehovah has forsaken the earth" (ver. 8-12; Fairbairn's Translation). The practice of painting on chamber-walls objects of worship, and even giving elaborate and detailed representations of the religious services performed in honour of them, was apparently of Egyptian origin; it was at least carried to its chief perfection there; and there alone did the downward tendency of idolatry go so far as to consecrate to religious honours "creeping things and abominable beasts." Of this, ample proof has been given by late writers on Egyptian antiquities, as may be seen, for example, in Wilkinson's Manners and Customs of the Ancient Egyptians, ch. xiv. Such a description, therefore, as that of the prophet Ezekiel very fitly served the purpose of representing the degenerate inhabitants of Judah and Jerusalem as giving way to an egyptizing spirit in religion; instead of adhering to the prescribed worship of Jehovah, they went a whoring after the idolatrous practices of the heathen—each one taking up with what in these most peculiarly struck his fancy, or seemed best adapted to allay his superstitious fears, and giving to that a place in his chambers of imagery. The prophet lays stress on the diversity—every man having, as it were, his own chamber, replenished with his own darling objects of idolatrous regard (for such ever is the divergent, self-willed tendency of idolatry); and also points to the conscious shame connected with it: what they did in this lower phase of idol-worship they did "in the dark," and as in chambers which were closed up and required to be dug into that they might be surveyed. We have no reason to think, as has sometimes been imagined, that this hole-and-corner secrecy was itself an imitation of heathen usage, as if such also were the usual practice in Egypt. No doubt, inner chambers, difficult of access, in tombs and other monuments of Egypt, have been found exhibiting such pictorial representations as those described by Ezekiel; but these were not the places where worship was performed; they but preserved the entablatures on which were portrayed the objects of worship, or the worship itself, for a memorial to future generations. The spiritually-degraded Egyptians, like the heathen generally, knowing nothing better, were not ashamed of their idolatry; they rather gloried in their shame, and connected their beast-worship with public processions and boisterous demonstrations. But the Israelites could not sink quite so low; and while their superstitious fears and depraved hearts led them to lust, in this respect, after the abominations of Egypt, their better knowledge made them conscious of a certain degree of shame in what they did, and caused them to practise their foul rites in the darkness of secrecy.

It is a mistake, therefore, to suppose, that the representation of the prophet respecting the withdrawn and studiously hidden nature of the worship referred to had its parallel in the province of heathenism. It is a mistake also (however commonly fallen into) to suppose that the prophetic delineation was intended to exhibit an actual scene taking place in the temple chambers; this is partly guarded against by the statement, that what the prophet saw was a representation of what every man was doing in his chambers of imagery; it was but giving a kind of rehearsal of what was daily proceeding in the land. And the same might be inferred still more from the ideal character of the whole description; the prophet throughout the chapter describes what he saw "in the visions of God," and in which, as elsewhere so doubtless also here, he was presented with no literal details or matter-of-fact transactions, but with a condensed and life-like exhibition of the truth of things, such as, though in itself an ideal picture, would still convey a faithful impression of the reality. The scene, therefore, which passed before his spiritual eye was laid in the temple buildings, because the temple was at once the centre and the image of the whole kingdom. "As the heart of the nation had its seat there, so there also, in the mongrel and polluted character of the worship celebrated, the guilt of the people found its representation; and, hence, when the object was to present a clear and palpable exhibition of the crying abominations that existed in the land, the scene was most fitly laid in the temple, and assumed the form of things seen and transacted in its courts. But we are no more to regard the things themselves in the precise form and combination here given to them, as all actually meeting together at any particular moment in the temple-worship, and simply transcribed by the prophet from the occurrences of real life, than to regard the instructions that immediately follow—viz. to set a mark for preservation on the foreheads of some, and to destroy the rest with weapons of slaughter—as actually put in force at the time, and in the manner there described" (Fairbairn's Ezekiel, p. 86).

CHAMELEON (כַּמֶּלֶעוֹן, koach). It is difficult to determine, with any approach to certainty, obscure animals which are but once or twice alluded to in Scripture; and especially when their names are simply mentioned, with no glance at their attributes or their habits. The Hebrew word rendered chameleon occurs as the name of an animal but once, Le. xi. 30; and the only clue that we have to its meaning, besides its sound, is its association with certain other unclean and forbidden creatures, which are termed "creeping things," and which may reasonably be presumed to be the smaller quadruped Reptilia. Our English version follows the LXX. in rendering כַּמֶּלֶעוֹן, chameleon, χαμαιλέον. The chameleon is an oriental animal, and was doubtless familiar enough to the Alexandrian Jews; but these were probably no naturalists, and are therefore no more sure authority on a question like this, than a dozen Oxford divines would be in deciding what bird is the woodwale of our early ballads.

The word koach occurs frequently in the Scriptures, but with the single exception of Le. xi. 30, it invariably means strength. We do not think that the term as signifying a reptile has the slightest affinity with the word so spelled, in its normal signification, any more than our English word Humble-bee has with the moral adjective humble. Each is an example of an imitation word; the reptile is doubtless named koach from its croak.

Now we have never heard or read any allusion to the voice of the chameleon. There is, however, a tribe of small lizards common in the warmer regions of the earth, several species of which are abundant in Western Asia and Egypt, whose remarkably harsh croaking, pertinaciously uttered in dwellings and out-houses during the silence of night, has forced them on general attention, and secured for them names imitative of their voices in various languages, as tockai, geitje, gecko, croaking lizard, &c. We refer to the family Geckotidae, and to one or other of the commoner species of this family, perhaps the Ptyodactylus hasselquistii, or the Platydactylus aegyptianus of modern zoologists.

The geckos are small lizards, usually somewhat clumsy in form, stealthy and cat-like in their actions, secreting themselves in holes and crevices by day, and at night coming forth to prey upon nocturnal insects. The form of the eye indicates their season of activity; for the pupil, which is capable of great expansion and contraction, closes to a vertical line. The animals crawl with ease and confidence on perpendicular walls, and even on the under sides of ceilings, beams, and the like, provided these have a somewhat roughened surface. This curious power, the rapidity with which they disappear in some crevice when alarmed, and their sombre and lurid hues, their association with night, their loud and harsh croak, their slow and stealthy pace, and especially a certain sinister expression of countenance, produced by the large globular eye, unprotected by an eyelid and divided by its linear pupil, have combined to give to these reptiles in all countries a popular reputation for malignity and venom, and they are generally much dreaded. This reputation, however, appears to be wholly groundless; and the story told by Hasselquist, of a man who would lay hold of the reptile, and whose hand instantly became covered with red pustules, inflamed and itching, must be received with suspicion. Still more incredible is another account by the same naturalist, to the effect that he saw at Cairo two women and a girl, at the point of death, from having eaten some cheese over which a gecko had crawled!

The most interesting point in the economy of these curious lizards is the structure of their feet, by which they are enabled to defy the laws of gravity. The feet are nearly equal, short, stout, and terminated by five toes, differing little in length, which radiate as if from a centre, so as to form two thirds of a circle. The under surface of the toes is, in most of the genera, much widened, and furnished with small plates or laminae, overlapping each other in a regular manner, which varies in different genera and species. The toes are frequently united by a membrane at their base. The claws are pointed, hooked, and kept constantly sharp, by an apparatus by which they are capable of retraction, like those of the cat.

It is by means of the singular lamellated structure of the under surface of the toes, that these reptiles, or at least many of them, are enabled to cling to vertical or even inverted surfaces, as house-flies do. The mode in which this is effected we do not thoroughly understand; but we may conjecture that it is by the raising of these imbricated plates by muscular action, so as to form a vacuum beneath the sole, when the pressure of the external air causes the toe to adhere firmly to the surface. The similarity of the structure to that of the coronal sucker in the remora suggests this explanation. A familiar illustration of the principle is seen in the leathern suckers which children make, which adhere so firmly that large stones are lifted by them.

[P. H. G.]

CHAMOIS (چمر, zemer). It may with safety be assumed that the antelope which we understand by the term chamois, an animal which is never seen except among the loftiest and most inaccessible peaks of such mountain chains as the Alps and Pyrenees, the Taurus and the Caucasus, would not have been mentioned among the creatures whose flesh was permitted to Israel; but what the zemer was is uncertain.

The word occurs but once, De. xiv. 5, where it is associated with other wild ruminants, in an order which, so far as we can identify them, appears to begin with the smaller kinds, and to go on to the larger. If anything can be adduced from this, the zemer ought to be the largest of all, since it is the last enumerated. The LXX., followed by the Vulgate, render the term by καμηλοπάρδαλις, camelopardalis; and as this is an animal which it was impossible to confound with any other, and which once known by name could never have been forgotten, much weight must attach to their identification; especially as the Arabic version gives the same rendering, ziraſſe.

At this day the giraffe (Camelopardalis girafa), now so familiar to us from the numerous specimens which ornament our menageries, and which breed freely in captivity, is found commonly in Nubia, and many other parts of East and South Africa. It frequents vast plains, feeding mainly on the foliage of the arborescent Mimoseæ, in company with the ostrich, many antelopes, and wild Equidæ. Now, many of the geological and botanical characteristics of such regions exist in Arabia and Southern Syria; and it is by no means improbable that, at the time of the exodus, the giraffe (whose name is Arabic) was found scattered over the peninsula. If so, it would be likely to fall in the way of the Israelites during their forty years' wanderings, and, when seen, would be an object of desire for the wholesomeness and quantity of its flesh. It was certainly familiar to the early Egyptians, who have represented it on their monuments, though it does not occur in their hunting scenes. And in later times the Romans were able to procure considerable numbers of this magnificent creature from Alexandria for their shows and pomps. The third Gordian, for example, exhibited ten giraffes at once.

Cognate words to zemer are used to signify a branch or twig, and music or singing. The latter sense seems to be peculiarly inapplicable to the giraffe; for under no circumstances is it known ever to utter a sound. But its habit of feeding, by gathering with its tongue and with great irregular spots, which are chestnut in the female, and nearly black in the male: these angular spots are so arranged as to leave narrow winding interstices of the ground colour. Its head is adorned with two short permanent horns, tipped with hair, and there is a rudimentary third horn, placed medially upon the forehead. [P. H. G.]

cropping the twigs of trees, may bear a relation to the former sense. On the whole, we think it likely that this beautiful and stately ruminant is the "chamois" of the English version.

The giraffe is the largest of ruminants, attaining a height of 18 feet, a considerable part of which is, however, due to the long and swan-like neck, the grace and elegance of which add much to the charm of this beautiful animal. The legs, too, are long; but still the body is far more bulky than that of the largest ox. The withers are considerably higher than the rump, a disproportion which does not reside in the legs—for the hind legs have a slight advantage in this respect—but in the elongation of the shoulder-blades, and the height of the spinous processes of the first dorsal vertebrae. The countenance is antelope-like, with a most gentle expression, and the eye has all the dark lustrous fulness of that of the gazelle. The physiognomy is, in fact, a correct index of the character; for it is a most gentle and harmless creature, notwithstanding its vast size and immense muscular power. Its means of defence are, first, its swiftness of foot; and here its length of limb stands it in good stead, for it strides over the ground with a loose shambling gait, which a good horse has difficulty in overtaking. Secondly, it can and does throw round its hind leg with great force, if its pursuer approaches too close. Le Vaillant says from his personal knowledge that, by its kicking, it often tires out, discourages, and even beats off the lion. And Dr. Livingstone considers that there would be little to choose between a blow from this sledge-hammer of a hoof, and one from the arm of a windmill. The males in the Zoological Gardens at London are said to fight occasionally in a singular but very effective manner, by swinging the head round, with the long neck as a radius, and striking the head of the adversary with immense force.

The skin of the giraffe is of a light bay hue, studded

with great irregular spots, which are chestnut in the female, and nearly black in the male: these angular spots are so arranged as to leave narrow winding interstices of the ground colour. Its head is adorned with two short permanent horns, tipped with hair, and there is a rudimentary third horn, placed medially upon the forehead. [P. H. G.]

CHANGERS OF MONEY were a class of traders who sprang up in the later times of the Jewish commonwealth, chiefly for the accommodation of the dispersed Jews who came to the annual feasts at Jerusalem. These occasional visitants required to have the coin of the different countries from which they came exchanged for that which was current in the land of their fathers; and as they all required the didrachma, or half-shekel, which was imposed at the erection of the tabernacle upon every full-grown male, Ex. xxxviii. 26, and continued to be recognized as binding in future generations when they presented themselves at the temple courts, so, for their greater convenience, the money-changers planted their tables in that part of the temple buildings which was called the court of the Gentiles. It was there our Lord found them, and manifested his righteous indignation at the profanation which they had brought into the house of God, by driving them out of its sacred precincts, Mat. xxi. 12; Jn. ii. 14. Even lawful merchandise ceased to be lawful when carried on there; and it is not doubtfully intimated by our Lord, on the second occasion that he resorted to this severity, that the mode of conducting the merchandise itself was unjust; for he charges them with having made God's house "a den of thieves."

CHAOS. This, although not a scriptural term, is yet frequently used to designate the state of the earth at the period of its history set forth in Ge. i. 2. Derived from the Greek and Roman cosmogonies, it had been early introduced by Christian commentators into this biblical connection. According to Hesiod (Theog. 116) chaos was the vacant and infinite space which existed previous to the creation of the world, and out of which the gods, men, and all things sprang into being. Ovid's account of chaos is considerably different. He describes it as a confused mass, which contained the elements of all things which were formed out of it (Metam. i. 6). Notions somewhat similar, though differently expressed, prevailed throughout almost all the ancient world, showing that they must have been derived from some common source, being in all probability primeval traditions of the creation, which in their uncorrupted purity have been preserved only in the sacred Scriptures. Some cosmogonies, indeed, as the Phœnician, retain the biblical terms descriptive of chaos, but changed into personal existences; for instance, the Hebrew term בוהו (bohu), emptiness, being transformed into BAAU, the name of the producing principle. But while a few cosmogonies admit that it was through the agency of a god that chaos was reduced into order, which resulted in the present mundane system, the great majority are entirely atheistic, ascribing the action either to the properties and dispositions of matter, or to a blind necessity; while they all differ from the scriptural account of creation by making chaos a primarily independent existence, contrary to the biblical doctrine which makes it the creation of God, or at least limits its duration by a prior act of creation.

As this, however, is a subject greatly misapprehended, owing to the misapplication of the term chaos to the Mosaic account of the creation, with which it has little in common, and to the supposed collision between the language of Scripture and modern geological discoveries, it will be necessary to consider the import of Ge. i. 2, and its connection both with the initial announcement respecting the creation and with the narrative which follows.

First, this account of the earth's condition follows an announcement—the first in the sacred record, “In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth.” It will be shown in the article CREATION that this announcement, while giving no intimation as to the question of time, or in any way limiting the antiquity of the universe or the earth, distinctly teaches that the original act of creation had respect to the origination of matter, and the disposition of the matter so created into distinct masses throughout space to form the nucleus of worlds and systems; but it will be necessary to consider here the relation of this original creating act to the chaotic state of the earth. The first verse is frequently regarded as a general title and summary of the chapter, on the ground chiefly that the creation of the heavens and of the earth is subsequently mentioned, ver. 5, 10. But as “the heavens” and “the earth” in the latter case are evidently used in a different sense from what they are in the first verse, and as this supposition, beside destroying the continuity of the discourse, gives a commencement of the narrative grammatically unprecedented in the Bible, and further presents the earth in such a state as would readily induce belief in an eternal chaos, a doctrine altogether foreign to Scripture, there is no alternative but to regard the passage as announcing the first creating act of the series. The state of the earth at this stage is described as “without form and void;” but a closer rendering would be “emptiness and vacuity,” a combination of synonymous terms according to a Hebrew idiom to express complete desolation; while the scene is further deepened by the intimation that “darkness was upon the face of the deep,” the universal ocean with which, as stated in Ps. civ. 6, the earth was at that time enveloped.

But a question arises whether this description applies to the earth's original state, and before the process of creation issued in order and life, or to an after period in its history, when, through some convulsion, darkness and death succeeded a former creation. The latter supposition is adopted by many, who maintain that the terms descriptive of the desolation are elsewhere used of devastations of previously fertile and populous regions, Is. lxxiv. 11; Jer. iv. 23. This may, indeed, be conceded without any disadvantage to our argument, for there is no similar passage with which the present can be compared. Another argument in support of this view is that such a rude chaotic state ill accords with a production of God, and his expressed end in creation, Is. xlv. 18; but this is confounding the end with the beginning, and demanding that the work only commenced should resemble the completed structure. It is unnecessary to reply to such arguments, for the original will not, according to the best authorities, admit of this construction; for the rendering, “the earth became,” on this supposition, instead of “the earth was,” would require to have been differently expressed in Hebrew (Kurtz, Bibel und Astronomie, Berlin, 1853, p. 104). But not only is this view philologically inadmissible—the very science in favour of which it is maintained sternly refuses the benefit proffered; geology will not admit, any more than the narrative in Genesis, of any break in the great creative process, or any convulsion which cuts off the present orders of life on the earth from those which preceded. “From the origin of organic life,” remarks Professor Phillips, “there is no break in the vast chain of organic development till we reach the existing order of things; no one geological period, long or short, no one series of stratified rocks, is ever devoid of traces of life. The world, once inhabited, has apparently never, for any ascertainable period, been totally despoiled of its living wonders.” The same is the testimony of all geologists. It is necessary to advert to this, from the circumstance that when the discoveries of geology relative to the age of the earth began to trouble the interpreter of Scripture, an escape from the difficulty was sought in the assumption that Genesis describes only a renovation of the earth's surface after some desolating convulsion, at first thought to be universal; but as the progress of the science rendered this untenable, the chaos was next taken to be of limited extent, and confined to some portion of Western Asia (Pye Smith, Script. and Geology, 5th edit. p. 280), and that it makes no reference to the creations the evidences of which are preserved in the rocks, but only to the vegetable and animal productions at present in existence, and introduced in the course of six natural days. But this assumption, even in its latest and most limited form, of a chaos immediately preceding the creation of man, is distinctly repudiated by geology, while it is equally at variance, as already remarked, both with the letter and the spirit of the Mosaic narrative; so that a reconciliation between Genesis and geology must be sought on other principles than the supposition that Ge. i. 2 describes the wreck of an older world; and not, as it should manifestly be taken, as descriptive of the primeval state of the earth before any arrangement of its surface began.

Secondly, it is necessary to examine the biblical description of chaos, and consider its relation to modern discoveries and theories of creation. From such it stands altogether apart, neither impeding investigation, nor countenancing in particular any of the theories in support of which scientific men are divided. Of any stages through which the earth may have passed, down to the period when it was surrounded by the dark chaotic waters, Scripture is silent. For any expression to the contrary, it may, according to modern hypotheses, have existed as diffused nebulous matter, afterwards condensed into a molten mass, gradually cooling down so as to admit of a watery envelope, or its formation may have proceeded in accordance with the Neptunian principles, or, indeed, in any other way which science may ultimately determine; for all that Scripture affirms is (and so far there is no antagonism between its testimony and that of science), that at the period in question, some early stage in the earth's history, life, and the first conditions of life, were wanting. Nor can the duration of this chaotic period be determined from anything in the narrative, which is equally reserved regarding any physical processes which may have been going on in the interval; but that it was a short period, or one of inactivity, there is no reason to conclude from anything known from nature or revelation of the operations of the omnipotent Creator. There was a pledge however in the character of the Creator and his initial act, as announced in the first sentence of the Bible, that the state of matters next described should not always be;

or according to the declaration of the prophet—"For thus saith the Lord that created the heavens; God himself that formed the earth and made it; he hath established it not in vain" (תֹּהוּ, tohu, emptiness)—the condition described in Ge. i. 2 was not to be a terminal result—"he formed it to be inhabited," Is. xiv. 18. Moreover, it is declared that "the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters," another important point in which the cosmogony of the Bible, and in particular its chaos, differs from all the atheistic notions current in ancient or modern times, which attribute the results either to the "fortuitous concourse of atoms," or to "laws of nature" acting, strange to say, independent of or without a law-giver. It strikingly accords too with the latest discoveries of science that light should be the first product of the creating Spirit, who brooded over this dark chaotic deep—light in its universality throughout space, and not as a satellite to the earth in the absence of the sun. [D. M.]

CHARGER, an old, but now antiquated term for a kind of hollow plate or trencher, for serving up anything on—such as flour or oil—used also for the presentation of John Baptist's head to Herodias, Nu. vii. 79; Mat. xiv. 8. The word was properly a general term, indicating what bore or was loaded with any weight, and hence had various applications, among others to a horse as ridden upon, which is still in use.

CHARIOTS. The Hebrew words merkabah and rekeb appear to be used indiscriminately to denote state chariots, Ge. xii. 43; xlv. 29; 1 Sa. viii. 11; 2 Sa. xv. 1, and war-chariots, Ex. xv. 4; Joel ii. 6; 2 Kl. ix. 20, 21, 24. The words merkab, rekeb, and agaloth, are all rendered chariots of any or every nation, Ex. xiv. 9; Jos. xvii. 18; Ju. i. 10; iv. 3; 2 Kl. v. 9; ix. 21, 24; x. 16; Is. xxi. 7, 9. Agaloth, in Pa. xlv. 9, is assumed to indicate war-chariots, but it more frequently applies to waggons or carts, Ge. xiv. 19, 21, 27; Nu. vii. 3, 6-9; 1 Sa. vi. 6-14.

The earliest notice of chariots upon record is in Ge. xii. 43, where Joseph is made to ride in the second chariot which Pharaoh had, and although we have iron of Sisera, Ju. i. 19, as a terrible advantage on the side of the enemy. The Philistines in their war against Saul had 30,000 chariots, 1 Sa. xiii. 5. David took 1000 war-chariots from Hadadezer king of Assyria, but burned 900, reserving only 100 for himself, 2 Sa. viii. 4. The mountainous nature of the country of Judea rendered chariots comparatively useless, nevertheless Solomon made himself a chariot of the wood of Lebanon, Song iii. 9; and he also brought chariots from Egypt, 1 Kl. x. 29; but there is no mention of their being employed in battle. The king of Syria, Antiochus Eupator, led 300 chariots armed with scythes against Judæa, 1 Mac. xiii. 1, 2. Nahum alludes constantly to chariots, ch. ii. 3, 4.

If we examine the sculptures of Egypt we find that the strength of the armies of the Pharaohs was in their chariots, an Egyptian army being composed exclusively of infantry and bigas, or two-horsed chariots, which carry the driver and the warrior. The sculptures sometimes show three persons in each chariot—the skilled warrior, his shield-bearer, and the charioteer, a circumstance that throws a very important light on a passage in Exodus, xiv. 7, that has given rise to much speculation. (See Gesenius or Parkhurst under פָּרָשׁ.)

The word which in our text is translated captain means literally a third man, who was a chosen warrior, an expert bowman in each chariot, and the Egyptian representation proves that some chariots did contain this third man. This fact is further illustrated by a reference to the Assyrian sculptures, where the war-chariots almost invariably contain three men, the warrior, the shield-bearer, and the charioteer. In no instance is an Egyptian ever represented on horseback. Such palpable evidence that the Egyptians did not employ cavalry is difficult to reconcile with the Scripture account of the pursuit of the Israelites, which expressly speaks of "the horses and chariots of Pharaoh, and his horsemen," Ex. xiv. 9. Hengstenberg, after a critical examination of the text, says, in his Egypt and the Books of Moses (p. 126), that "Moses does not mention cavalry at all; that, according to him, the Egyptian army is composed only of chariots of war, and that he, therefore, agrees in a wonderful manner with the native Egyptian monuments." It is demonstrated that the word rekeb, rendered "horsemen," does not mean "cavalry," but merely riders in the chariots, in other words, chariot-warriors. Ex. xiv. 7, which gives the first account of the Egyptian army, says, "that he took six hundred chosen chariots, and all the chariots of Egypt, and captains over every one of them" (or in each)—that taken in connection with this, the "horsemen" in verse 9 and the subsequent verses, means literally "riders," not upon the horses, but in the chariots; and that, though Moses' song of triumph mentions the "horse and his rider," Ex. xv. 1, yet, that ver. 4 clearly indicates that by rider chariot-rider is understood. "Pharaoh's chariots and his host hath he cast into the sea; his chosen captains also (chariot-warriors) are drowned in the Red Sea."

The Egyptian monuments exhibit various descriptions of chariots, all similar in form, having but two wheels (excepting in one obscure instance), and differing only in the richness of detail, all being furnished alike with the bow and arrow-case conveniently attached to the sides. The frame-work, wheels, pole, and yoke were of wood, and the fittings of the inside, the bindings of the frame-work, as well as the harness, were

Egyptian monuments of the period, there is no representation of a chariot of any kind until the reign of Rhamsees I., about 1300 B.C., and the subsequent reign of his son Rhamsees II., when they appear in great abundance, and from which time they are of constant recurrence.

In ancient warfare chariots must have been of the greatest importance, and accordingly we read of the chariots of the Egyptians, and of the 900 chariots of chiefly of raw hide or of tanned leather, by which the parts were bound together. The currier and tanner were such numerous trades that in Thebes a district of the city was assigned expressly to them (Wilkinson's Egyptians in the Time of the Pharaohs, 1857, p. 114). The occupants of the chariot always stood.

The king's chariot was in no respect different from those of his subjects, excepting in the superior richness of its fittings, and that he usually stands alone, without charioteer or shield-bearer, the reins of the two horses being fastened about his waist, leaving his hands free to discharge his arrows, or to deal death with his spear or falchion. The being alone in his chariot may be a symbol that to him belonged the entire glory of the victory. The chariot of Joseph was doubtless a state chariot such as we are familiar with from the paintings.

in the Egyptian example the termination is a ball. The spear is inserted behind the chariot in a place appointed for it, decorated with a human head. The harness and trappings of the horses are precisely like the Egyptian. Pendant at the side of the horse is a circular ornament, terminating in tassels, analogous to that divided into thongs at the side of the Egyptian horse, which may be intended to accelerate the pace of the animal, as in the case of the spiked balls fastened to the trappings of the race horses of the Corso in Rome. In both examples several bands pass over the chest, and lapping over the shoulders of the horses, join the ligaments attached to the pole or yoke. A remarkable band and thong, through the upper end of which passes a single rein, is the same in both harnesses. The tails of the Assyrian horses are fancifully compressed in the centre, while the Egyptian horses have a band round the upper part or root. Around the neck of the Assyrian horses is a string of alternately large and small beads, which appear to have cuneiform characters cut upon them—possibly a chaplet of amulets, according to the custom of the oriental nations of the present day" (Nin. and

They were often accompanied by numerous attendants and running footmen (Wilkinson's Egyptians, 1857, p. 8). "He will take your sons, and appoint them for himself, for his chariots, and to be his horsemen, and some shall its Pal. 1857, p. 256, 257, 357). The wheels of the war-chariots are usually heavy, with broad felloes, and have sometimes six and sometimes eight spokes. The chariots are drawn by two and frequently by three horses abreast; and on the sculptures found at Khorsabad is a representation of a quadriga carried on the shoulders of some men of giant stature. The war-chariots usually carry three—the charioteer, the warrior, and the shield-bearer. One illustration shows the warrior and his shield-bearer fighting on foot, in front of the chariot, which contains the driver, while a groom holds the horses' heads. The state chariots are highly decorated, and contain three—the king, his umbrella-bearer, and the charioteer. (See illustration, ASSYRIA.) The hunting-chariots at Khorsabad and Kouyunjik are generally lighter than those at Nimroud, have not the quivers of arrows at the sides, but merely one quiver towards the front. They are usually drawn by two horses; in these the king is sometimes accompanied by two spearmen and the charioteer. Carts and waggons, drawn by oxen, are frequently shown both on the Egyptian and Assyrian monuments.

The Persepolitan sculptures in the British Museum furnish examples of the Persian chariots, which appear to have been larger in the body than those of either Egypt or Assyria. [J. B.]

CHARITY comes to us, through the medium of the French charité, from the Latin carietas, in its secondary sense of love accompanied with esteem, loving affection, warm regard. This appears to have been the common meaning of the word in the earlier stages of the English language, while alms was appropriated to express the outward benefaction in which charity manifested itself toward its objects. By and by, however, the latter expression fell into disuse, and charity came to signify the external gift of kindly affection, even more than the affection itself. Love, in this latter respect, took very much the place of charity. The changes through which the language has thus passed cannot be affirmed to be altogether for the better; and they certainly give rise to a considerable indefiniteness, and occasional confusion of terms. Love is made to comprehend both mere natural liking, a simple instinct of the animal nature, and the highest principle of the moral nature—the very perfection of all spiritual excellence: two things immensely different. Charity too still retains its double meaning, and vacillates between the kindly affection, which it always should comprise as its chief element, and the extension of material relief to the needy, which may or may not carry along with it any exercise of genuine kindness. In a considerable number of passages charity has been adopted by our translators as the proper synonym for ἀγάπη, love; it had been so by Wycliffe, and his example was followed by subsequent translators. Very commonly the connection renders it manifest that the word has respect to inward affection or principle, not to any outward benefaction; it does so especially in the remarkable passage, 1 Co. xiii., where the apostle draws a sharp distinction between the charity spoken of and the largest acts of beneficence—even the giving of all one's goods to the poor. In such cases no reader of any intelligence can imagine that it is the mere act of almsgiving which draws forth the eulogium of the apostle. But it certainly had been better, if, where the word ἀγάπη is used in Scripture, it had been translated uniformly either by charity or by love; and in the present state of the English language, if a fresh translation were made, we could not hesitate to prefer the rendering of love.

CHASMAL, or more properly CHASH'MAL, the name of some sort of metal of extraordinary brightness, in respect to this quality referred to by Ezekiel, ch. i. 4, "like the bright glitter of Chasmal in the midst of the fire;" also ch. i. 27; viii. 2. Our translators have rendered it amber; but this undoubtedly is wrong. The Septuagint probably gave the right meaning by ἡλεκτρον, which, as is now agreed, was not amber, but a compound metal made up of gold and silver, and remarkable for its shining brightness. Gesenius, however, prefers understanding it of polished brass, or brass made smooth, furnished. He thinks this strengthened by the expression "smooth brass," ch. viii. 17, conveyed by different words, but used in a similar connection. The term χαλκολίβαρον, in Re. i. 15, is also thought to favour the idea of brass, this being, if not the only metal, yet the chief ingredient in the composition; but the word rather appears to be a synonym for another compound expression of Ezekiel—כֶּלֶס נְשֹׁהֶת (nehoseth kalal), ch. i. 7, brass in a glow or white heat. Respecting chasmal, the opinion now commonly entertained is that mentioned above, a composite of gold and silver, and, from its remarkable brightness, fitly imaging the clear and dazzling splendour of the divine Majesty. In this symbolical sense it is used by Ezekiel, so far differing from fire, as this is always connected with the severity or punitive righteousness of God.

CHEBAR, more properly KĒBĀR, Sept. Χοβάρ, a river on which a considerable portion of the Jewish captives was located by Nebuchadnezzar, including that to which the prophet Ezekiel belonged, 2 KI. xxiv. 15; Eze. i. 1, 3, &c. There can be no doubt that it is the same river as that called by the Greeks Chaboras; it is a river of Mesopotamia, the only large river that flows into the Euphrates, which it does at Circesium. It is fed by several smaller streams. The present name is Khabar. In the mode of exhibiting the ancient name there is considerable variation; beside those already given, we meet with Chabura, Aborrhias, and Aburas (Smith's Dict. of Greek and Rom. Geography).

CHE'DORLA'OMER, the name of a king, of whom we know nothing more than what is recorded in Ge. xiv., where he is described as king of Elam—a district afterwards associated with Persia and Media—and the leader of four kings, who seemed to have formed a league for the purpose of subjugating and spoiling the tribes in the land of Canaan and its neighbourhood. In this they met with considerable success; but after taking Sodom and carrying off Lot, the kinsman of Abraham, among the captives, they were pursued by the father of the faithful, and defeated with great loss in the northern parts of Palestine.

CHEESE. It would seem that the Hebrews had no fixed or appropriate name for what we designate cheese. In the English Bible the word cheese is found altogether thrice; but on one of the occasions, the term in the original is the one commonly employed for milk. Thus in 1 Sa. xvii. 18, Jesse, on sending David to his brothers at the camp, says to him, "Carry these ten cheeses"—literally, "these ten cuttings of milk:" milk, of course, in the fluid state cannot be understood, because in that case one could not speak of cuttings; and we are therefore obliged to think of milk in the compressed form of cheese, and most likely done up, as it still commonly is in the East, in small cakes, strongly salted, soft when new, but presently becoming very dry and hard. So made, it necessarily is of an inferior description, and, by travellers from this country, is usually spoken of with diarrhah. Job, ch. x. 10, asks, "Hast thou not poured me out as milk, and curdled (coagulated) me like cheese?" The word here (חֶמֶשׁ), nowhere else used, is from a root that signifies to contract or draw up, and hence is quite naturally applied to the curdling up or contracting of milk into cheese. The adjective occurs in Lev. xxi. 20, of gibbous or humpbacked persons. In the third and only remaining passage, 2 Sa. xvii. 28, the word is again different, a plural word חֶמֶשִׁים, and is rendered cheeses, only from the connection apparently requiring that sense ("honey, and butter, and sheep, and cheese of kine"), and from the ancient interpreters having so understood it. But how it should have come to be so used is not certainly known, the verb-root from which the word seems to be derived commonly signifying to make bare or naked. The want alone of any fixed term for cheese, and the rareness of the allusions that appear to be made to the subject in Scripture, are clear signs of the very inferior place which it had as an article of food among the ancient Hebrews. And if the cheese now used in Palestine is found to be of poor quality, we may certainly infer, from what has been stated, that it is not the loss of a domestic art that once flourished which we are called to mark, but rather the failure in former as well as present times properly to acquire it.

CHEMOSH, the national god of the Moabites, 1 Kl. xi. 7; 2 Kl. xiii. 13; Ja. xiv. 7, 13, who were on that account called "the people of Chemosh," Nu. xxi. 29; Ja. xviii. 46. At an early period the same deity appears, too, as the national god of the Ammonites, Ju. xi. 24, though his worship seems afterwards to have given place to that of Moloch, Ja. xix. 1, 3; 1 Kl. xi. 4, 7; just as in the case of the Moabites themselves the worship of Baal-peor preceded or accompanied that of Chemosh, Nu. xxv. 3, 5; Joa. xxii. 17. With regard to the Ammonites there is nothing improbable in the supposition of their national god being designated by the two names Moloch and Chemosh; for the former is only a sort of general designation of the deity as king, just as Baal, or lord, may have been in the other case, if we are to assume with Jerome that the Chemoah of the Moabites was identical with their Baal-peor. Nor is it strange to find the same object of worship among people so closely related as the Moabites and the Ammonites, particularly when mentioned in connection with matters of common concern, Joa. xiii. 23; Ju. xi. 15. From the Moabites the worship of Chemoah passed over to other countries; for traces of it are found at Tyre, Babylon, and among various Arab tribes (Beyer, addit. ad Selden. de Dis Syria, Lp. 1672, p. 323). It was even introduced among the Hebrews by Solomon, who "built a high place for Chemoah, the abomination of Moab, in the hill that is before Jerusalem," 1 Kl. xi. 7.

From various notices in Arab writers, and from an old Jewish tradition (Winer, Realwörterbuch, i. p. 223), the Arabs would appear to have worshipped Chemosh under the figure of a black stone (not star, as frequently repeated in English books, as Kitto, Cyc. Bib. Lit. i. p. 421; Henderson, Jeremiah, p. 232, from a slip in Winer). Persiktah, as quoted by Hackmann (Diast. de Chemoaha, p. 48), says, "Chemoah lapis erat niger." But as to the attributes of this god, his mode of worship, or his relation to the other and better known gods of heathenism, there is nothing better than conjecture. Le Clerc (Common. in Nu. xxi. 28) supposes that Chemoah represented the sun; others, as Beyer (loc. cit.) take him for the planet Saturn; while Hackmann, who has devoted a dissertation to the subject (reprinted in Oelrich's Collectio Opusculorum, Bremæ, 1768, vol. i. p. 17-60), regards him as "the war-god" of the Moabites. Even the etymology of the name is a matter of dispute. The probability however is, that Chemoah, if not identical with, as Jerome holds, yet was closely related to Baal-peor. [D. M.]

CHENANTAH [goodness or favour of Jah], one of the presidents of the temple music, and the one who had charge of the choral services which accompanied the ark of the Lord when it was conducted from the house of Obed-edom to the hill of Zion, 1 Ch. xv. 22.

CHERETHITES AND PELETHITES (חֶרֶתִּים וּפְלִיתִים). The body-guard of king David, and of king David alone, not of Saul his predecessor, nor of any of his successors, either on the throne of Judah or of Israel. For it is only in narrating the history of David that the Cherethites and Pelethites are mentioned by the sacred writers. Before his reign, and also after his decease, the troops specially attached to the royal person appear to have gone by the name חֶרֶתִּים, or "the runners." It was his "runners" or guard whom Saul ordered to slay Ahimelech and the priests of Nob, 1 Sa. xxi. 17. Under Rehoboam we find "runners" acting as gate-keepers of the royal palace, as well as attendants on the king when he went abroad, 1 Kl. xiv. 27, 28. And they are afterwards mentioned several times in the subsequent history of Judah and Israel, 2 Kl. x. 26; xi. 4, &c. In the latest books of the Old Testament, the name "runner" is used in the more restricted sense of "courier," 2 Ch. xxx. 6; Es. iii. 13, 15; viii. 14. But in the history of David we never read of the runners (חֶרֶתִּים), but always of the Cherethites and Pelethites, who seem, therefore, under that monarch to have discharged the same duties as were discharged by the חֶרֶתִּים under his predecessor and his successors.¹

The captaincy of this body of troops was, as we might anticipate, a post of distinguished honour, and was bestowed by David on one of his bravest officers, Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, 2 Sa. viii. 18; xx. 23; 1 Ch. xviii. 17. Under the command of Benaiah we find them in attendance upon David when he fled from his son Absalom, and afterwards forming part of the army which Joab hurriedly assembled and led against Sheba the son of Bichri, who after the death of Absalom, headed the rebels in the north. It is evident, however, that this latter was an extraordinary duty imposed upon the Cherethites and Pelethites, 2 Sa. xx. 6, 7, and that had not Amasa delayed to assemble the men of Judah, they would not have been hurried away from their proper position and function of attendance upon the king's person. The proclamation of Solomon as king, just before his father's death, is the last occasion on which they are mentioned in the history of Israel, 1 Kl. i. 38, 44. Their captain, however, Benaiah, took an active and prominent part in the settlement of the kingdom under Solomon, by whom he was advanced to the highest military position as general of the whole army in the room of Joab, 1 Kl. ii. 34, 35.

But what mean the names Cherethites and Pelethites, and why was the body-guard of David so called? This is a difficult question, which has been variously answered. Some explain the names as common nouns, meaning cutters and runners (carnifices et cursores), from the roots כָּרַת and פָּלַת , and appeal to the analogy of הַרְצִי הַרְצִי , which we find in 2 Ki. xi. 4, 19. So Gesenius. But this view is very improbable. For (1), if Pelethites has the signification of runners, why introduce a new word and a foreign word instead of the pure Hebrew word הַרְצִי , which had previously been in use to designate the royal body-guard? (2.) It is very questionable whether this signification can be derived from the Arabic root which is appealed to, and which means rather to flee, to escape, like the Hebrew פָּלַת .

(3.) The form כָּרַתִּי does not easily yield the sense "slayer," the participle being כָּרַת and not כָּרַתִּי , and its signification "cutter," rarely "slayer," except when it is followed by the noun רֹאשׁ , head. (4.) The combination הַרְצִי הַרְצִי , appealed to as analogous to הַרְצִי הַרְצִי , is found only in one section of the Scripture history, 2 Ki. xi. 4, 19, and there is no evidence that the two words of which it is composed have the same close connection with one another as the words כָּרַתִּי and פָּלַתִּי , which are never found separate. Besides, the signification of הַרְצִי is doubtful (compare the Lexicons of Gesenius and Fürst).

We do not hesitate, therefore, to adopt the other view which has been taken of the words כָּרַתִּי and פָּלַתִּי , viz. that they are national or tribal names. With regard to the former, Cherethite, there can be little doubt that this is the correct explanation of it, (1) because we find from other passages of Scripture that Cherethite was a name of the Philistine tribes, or of one division of them, and was so used in the time of David, 1 Sa. xxx. 14; compare also Eze. xiv. 16, and Zep. ii. 5. Some connect these Cherethites of Philistia with the island of Crete, and not improbably, though the evidence, it must be allowed, is defective (compare Vitringa in Jesalam, vol. i. p. 460). (2.) Along with the Cherethites and Pelethites are mentioned in 2 Sa. xv. 18 "the Gittites, six hundred men which followed David from Gath;" and this seems to favour the conclusion that the two former names are of the same description as the latter, viz. local or tribal names.

Assuming this explanation of Cherethite to be correct, a further question remains—Were the Cherethites of king David a body of foreign troops? or were they Israelites who, from a lengthened residence in foreign parts, had attached to them a foreign name? The former is the common opinion, but we are by no means sure that it is the correct one. We cannot think it probable that David alone of all the kings of Israel should have surrounded himself with a foreign body-guard. Besides they were under the command of one of the heroes of Israel. Rather would we believe that they were for the most part Israelites, who being partizans of David, or for some other cause, had been compelled during the reign of Saul to take refuge among the Cherethites of Philistia, and who, having shared David's adversity, were naturally regarded by him, on his accession to the throne, as the men in whose fidelity he could place the most perfect confidence. At the same time it is quite possible that with these were mingled some native Cherethites, whom the presence and fame of David had attracted to his standard, and attached to his person and to his religion.

This view, we think, is confirmed by the addition of Pelethite to the tribal name Cherethite. This term has occasioned a great deal of difficulty to critics. The opinion of Ewald that it is just another form of Philistine ($\text{פְּלִשְׁתִּי} = \text{פְּלִיזְתִּי}$) cannot easily be assented to. More probable is its connection with פָּלַתִּי , "escaped," Je. i. 28; Nu. xxi. 20; Ia. lxvi. 19, פָּלַת being changed into פָּלַתִּי , with the view of forming a more harmonious combination with כָּרַתִּי . [D. H. W.]

CHERTH [separation], the name of a brook, to the streams and lurking-places of which Elijah was sent during a portion of the years of famine, 1 KI. xvii. 2-7; but the locality of which is no further designated than that it was before, or upon the face of Jordan. Eusebius, Jerome, and many others, have thought that this expression pointed to a brook and valley on the east of Jordan; and there can be no doubt that such frequently is the local import of the phrase. But it is also often used in the more general sense of over against, towards, Ge. i. 20; xviii. 16; xix. 28, &c. Robinson has mentioned Wady Kelt, near Jericho, as probably the brook and valley meant, influenced partly by the name, which differs from the ancient Hebrew in little more than the substitution of a k for an l, letters which are frequently interchanged; and partly by the nature of the wady itself, which is a deep and narrow gien, looking as if it had been cut out of the rocks that overhang it with their tremendous precipices. This appearance might have suggested the name, which indicates something "cut off," "separated." Van de Velde suggests Ain Fassel, a little to the north, which certainly, as he describes it, might well, in a season of drought, accord with the nature of the retreat to which we may suppose Elijah to have been sent. "A steep and rocky track," says he, "of more than a thousand feet led us onward. The further we came down the warm and fiery wind from the Ghor met us right in the face. . . All was burned. Thistles, grass, flowers, and shrubs, grew here with rare luxuriance, but now everything was burned white, like hay or straw, and this standing perhaps five or six feet high. My guides, as well as myself, thought we should die while in this gigantic furnace. At last we see living green. A thicket of wild fig-trees and oak-shrubs mixed, and intermixed with oleanders and thorny plants, seems as it were to hide itself at the base of the glowing rocks, keeping full vigour of life, notwithstanding the extraordinary heat. What may be the cause of this? It is a fountain of living waters which keeps the leaves of these trees green, whilst everything round about is consumed by drought and heat. 'This is Ain Fassel,' said my guide. There is a distance of three quarters of an hour between the fountain and the end of the valley in the plain of the Jordan. The rocks on both sides of the valley contain a great many natural caves." Whether this might really be the temporary hiding-place of Elijah or not, it were difficult to conceive anything more suited to the purpose, or that seems more entirely to meet the conditions required for the occasion.

CHER'UB, and plural CHER'UBIM, (כְּרֻבִים), the name of certain mystic appearances, or composite figures, which are first mentioned in connection with the expulsion of our first parents from the tree of life and the garden of Eden. "And the Lord God placed at the east of the garden of Eden the cherubim, and a flaming sword, which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life." The silence that is here observed on the first mention of the cherubim respecting their precise nature, or their actual structure, is striking; and the more so, that they are introduced as certain definite and familiar objects—"placed the cherubim"—as if they were so well known to those for whom the sacred narrative was more immediately designed, that no particular description was needed. Nor is it much otherwise when, centuries later, at the erection of the tabernacle in the wilderness, the cherubim again appear in connection with the more peculiar dwelling-place of God. For while Moses was instructed to place a cherub at each end of the ark of the covenant, nothing whatever is said of their form and structure, excepting what is implied in their having faces that were made to look toward the mercy-seat, and outstretched wings that spread themselves like a covering over it, Ex. xxv. 19, 20. However, therefore, it may have happened, there can be no doubt of the fact, that the ancient Hebrews are supposed to have been so far acquainted with the cherubic forms as to render any description of them on the part of the sacred historian unnecessary; and we are left to gather from the later, and somewhat incidental representations of Scripture, coupled with those brief historical notices of an earlier kind, all that can now be known respecting them.

1. In endeavouring to obtain some definite notions respecting the cherubim, we must, at the outset, abandon all hope of deriving any help from the import or derivation of the word. This has been twisted into various forms, and has been subjected to certain changes or transpositions in the letters, in order to make it throw light upon the nature of the subject, but with no convincing or satisfactory result. Thus, by taking the g at the beginning as the particle of similitude, Parkhurst and the Hutchinsonians arrive at the import "like the mighty," or "the great one;" by transposing the two first letters, and viewing kerub as all one with rekeb, Hyde, and latterly Hofmann and others, would take it in the sense of chariot, the distinctive name of the chariot of Deity; by a still different alteration, and a reference to the Sanscrit, Delitzsch finds its root in a verb to lay hold of, to grasp, and understands it of the cherubim as the holders up or bearers of the throne of God, &c. But everything of this sort is conjecture; and conjecture, for the most part, resorted to at second hand, to lend support to the idea that on other grounds has already been formed of the design and use of the cherubim. The Hutchinsonians, with their usual arbitrariness, conceived the cherubim to be symbols of the Triune Jehovah in union with man, hence their ridiculous explanation of the term. In like manner, the other persons referred to, giving undue prominence to certain passages of Scripture, chiefly of a poetical cast, have sought to connect the cherubim in such a way with the manifested presence of Deity, that to make the word expressive of his throne or chariot, was to obtain a subsidiary aid to their theory. But the notions themselves are untenable; and the word so pressed into the service can be of no avail in securing for them an intelligent support.

2. To look, then, at what is said of the form and appearance of the cherubim, it must be admitted that they are not presented to our view as always entirely alike. And possibly it was on that account that Josephus declared no one in his day knew, or could even conjecture, what was the shape of the cherubim which Solomon made for the most holy place of the temple (Ant. viii. 3, 3). But on such a subject we cannot place much dependence on the authority of Josephus; for we can easily conceive how he might think it expedient to feign ignorance on a point of this nature, when writing more especially with a view to Gentile readers; and the rather so, as we find him committing two mistakes here, on points concerning which he could easily have obtained correct information. He affirms the cherubim for the temple to have been made of solid gold, and to have been 5 cubits high; while in the sacred history they are declared to have been made of wood, overlaid with gold, and to have been 10 cubits in height, 1 Ki. vi. 23, 26. In such a case one cannot lay much stress on any statement of Josephus, as to the entire ignorance that prevailed regarding their form. There can, however, be no doubt that the representations given of them at one place do not always entirely correspond with those given at another; and we may so far accord with the opinion indicated by the Jewish historian, that as regards certain variable elements, no one could know whether the cherubim, either of the tabernacle or of Solomon's temple, possessed them or not. For example, the cherubim seen by Ezekiel beneath the throne of God are represented as having each four faces and four wings, while in the cherubim carved upon the walls of his figurative temple two faces only are ascribed to each; indeed, there was strictly but one face to each, for he speaks of the representation as one whole, and says that on the walls there was a perpetual repetition of the same figures—a palm-tree in the middle, with a cherub, having a man's face on the one side, looking toward it, and a cherub on the other with a lion's face, ch. xii. 18, 19: each, therefore, exhibited but one distinct face, though this possibly arose from its being but a side view. Again, Re. iv. 7, 8, the "living creatures," as the cherubim are there designated, are represented, not as existing in one corporeity with four faces, but as a fourfold creaturehood, each having a face diverse from the other—altogether four faces, but six wings. And in the Apocalypse the bodies of the creatures appear full of eyes, as they do also in Eze. x. 12, where, with his usual particularism, the prophet represents "their whole flesh, and their backs, and their hands, and their wings," as full of eyes; while in his first vision the eyes are connected only with the wheel-work, to which the cherubim were attached, ch. i. 18. It seems plain, therefore, that certain circumstantial differences were deemed allowable in the ideal representations of the cherubim, and we may justly infer also in the actual forms given to them.

But with these circumstantial differences, there are certain marked characteristics, that seem always to belong to the cherubim, wherever they distinctly appear. One is that they are composite animal forms; and when these animal forms are specified, they always consist of the likeness of man, the lion, the ox, and the eagle. This fourfold composition is brought so prominently out in the visions of Ezekiel, and these visions themselves stand in such close relation to the temple, that we cannot doubt, the figures set up there in the most holy place, over the ark of the covenant, partook of the same compound elements. It is perfectly possible, however, that the composition may have been differently moulded; that the fourfold likeness may not have been all exhibited in the face, but partly in the face and partly in the members of the body. Such seems to have been the case in the wall-cherubim in Ezekiel's vision already referred to: the features alone of a man and of a lion appeared in the face; but from each being still designated a cherub, we are led to conclude that the figure was not that simply of a man and of a lion respectively, but possessed the usual composite structure—the existences not represented in the face appearing in other and subordinate parts of the body. So may it have been, for anything we know, in the cherubic figures on the ark of the covenant, and on the east of the garden of Eden. But we are not the less to believe, that in the figures as a whole, in one mode or another, the four animal existences of man, lion, ox, and eagle, had their representation. It is essential to the cherub that it be a composite figure; and that, however precisely moulded, the composition should partake of the four different elements in question.

Another point that comes distinctly out in the cherubic representations is the prominence of the human form. Kurtz thinks that their predominantly human aspect may be inferred alone from the absence of definite descriptions of them in the earlier records of Scripture (Herzog's Encycl. art. Cherubim). That, perhaps, may be questioned, at least as a general statement; though ground may be found for it, if the historical position from the first assigned to the cherubim is duly taken into account. For one cannot conceive that the way to the tree of life, after man's expulsion from the garden of Eden, or the place of immediate proximity to the divine presence in the holy of holies, could have been surrendered to any ideal occupants that bore the aspect and conveyed the impression of a lower terrene existence than of him who was made in the image of God. But other representations bring the point in question clearly into view; as when it is said, Eze. i. 8, that "they had the appearance of a man." So also, Ra. iv. 7, it is said of the third cherubic form, that "it had a face as a man"—meaning, apparently, that the face in this case corresponded to the body; that the countenance, like the general form, was human, while, in the others, the face differed from the human structure it surmounted. The same thing further appears from the possession and active employment of a hand, which is once and again ascribed to the cherubim; and, finally, from the part they are represented as taking, along with the elders and the redeemed generally, in the Apocalypse, in celebrating the praise of God, and rehearsing the wonders of redemption, ch. iv. 8; v. 11, 12. The only passage that seems to convey a different impression, and one that is often appealed to in opposition to the view we maintain, is Eze. x. 14, where, in respect to the cherubic vision before him, the prophet says, "And every one had four faces: the first face the face of a cherub, and the second face the face of a man, and the third the face of a lion, and the fourth the face of an eagle." Here, since in the three last faces, the likeness of a man, a lion, and an eagle, respectively, was described, while, in that of the first, the prophet speaks of seeing simply the face of a cherub, it has been very commonly supposed that the ox-aspect must have been meant, and that, consequently, the cherubic form must have been predominantly bovine—otherwise the ox-aspect could not thus have been left in abeyance, and that of a cherub substituted in its stead. But this would be to place the representation here at variance with other representations of the same prophet, and even of this chapter, where he speaks so distinctly of the man's hand being under the wings, and the doing by the cherubim of a man's part. The proper explanation of the passage appears to be, that the prophet, who simply describes what passed in vision before him, was standing at the time right in front of one of the cherubim, the one who gave the live coals to the angel; that, accordingly, he could not say, in regard to this particular cherub, which form was most prominent in the face—for the whole cherubic features presented themselves to his eye; what he saw was just the complete face of a cherub; while, having only a side view of the others, which stood at different angles to his position, they severally exhibited the different forms he ascribes to them. (See Fairbairn's Ezekiel in loco.)

3. Now, these marked peculiarities in the structure of the cherubim—their being always presented to our view as composite forms, made up of four animal existences, but with the shape and lineaments of humanity for the ground and body of the whole—draw a broad line of demarcation between them and the winged forms which have come to light among the remains of Egyptian and Assyrian antiquities. Some sort of affinity may, indeed, be allowed to have existed between the latter and the cherubim, as both alike were composite forms of animal existence, not representations of creatures that have any actual place in the realms of animated being. But the comparison does not carry us beyond this general idea of resemblance. The heathen figures consist almost exclusively of some bestial form with a man's head—wings, perhaps, superadded, as in the case of the two huge bulls obtained at Nineveh—or of a single form with wings appended to it.

Monstrous combinations of a like kind have also been found in Egypt, of which those exhibited in the cuts, Nos. 167—171, from the paintings of Beni-Hassan and Thebes, may be taken as specimens.

Besides such representations as these, it seems to have been quite common to attach wings to any particular animal form—such as that of a serpent, of a lion, of a man, or even of an inanimate object; whether for ornament, or with some symbolical aim, cannot be certainly known. But all such representations differ so widely from the cherubim, especially, come so far short of that complex structure, with its remarkable prominence of the human figure, that very little account can be made of it, in explaining the design of the cherubim, or even in determining their specific form. And it cannot have been from any loose or general resemblance of this sort, that the sacred historian refrained from giving, at the first mention of the cherubim, a more particular description of their structure and appearance.

4. Leaving this line of inquiry, therefore, as one that can yield no available results, we return to look at the wonderful scriptural compound itself; and ask, What may have been the object of combining with the human form those other creaturely existences, which in the cherubic figures were, in a manner, grafted upon it? If the human was, as we have reason to believe, the prominent and pervading part of the composite structure, then the subsidiary animal forms must have been intended somehow to contribute to its ideal perfection—to throw around the common attributes of humanity others, which are more strikingly represented in certain of the inferior creation, than in him who is its proper lord and its head. Nor can there be any doubt that, of the animal creation, those actually selected for the purpose are each the highest (namely, if viewed from the stand-point of antiquity) in their respective provinces:—of wild animals, the lion, king of the forest—the representative of royal majesty and fearful strength; of tame animals, the ox, from his common employment among the ancients in the labours of husbandry, the natural image of patient and productive industry; and of birds, from his velocity and strength of wing, capable alike of the most rapid movements and the most aerial flight, the eagle, the highest embodiment of soaring energy and angelic nimbleness of action. These different qualities are so well known to belong to the several creatures mentioned, and are so often brought into notice in Scripture itself, that no one can doubt the fitness of each to represent and image the particular qualities connected with them. And to present the human form as invested and conjoined with the creaturely personifications of such diverse qualities, was to exhibit a concrete ideal of excellence, human, indeed, in its groundwork, having man's intellectual and moral powers for its most fundamental characteristic, yet higher in its collective attributes and attainments than can be claimed for humanity in the existing state of things. It was to show man, not only as possessed of his own superior physical and spiritual nature, but that as also endowed with lion-like majesty and strength, bovine patience of toil and productiveness, avian elevation of aim and velocity of movement—properties which, if it does not entirely want, yet it so imperfectly possesses, and can so partially exercise, that one can easily apprehend how much they would add to its completeness. But in respect to the further question, why the nature of man should have been so exhibited in ideal combination with these animal existences, and the properties they symbolized, the answer must be sought in the collateral information that is given concerning the cherubim, especially as regards the positions they were appointed to occupy, and the kind of services they are represented as performing.

5. It is impossible to do more here than briefly glance at, and bring together, the several points of information which may be gathered from the different notices of Scripture respecting the cherubim. One thing—and what may fitly be mentioned in the first place—is common to all the representations, viz. their ministering, and, consequently, creaturely character. No one who considers what is said of them could mistake them for emblems of Deity; so far from being objects of adoration, they themselves worship and serve. In their very first employment, as connected with the garden of Eden, they have a work to do—indeed, man's proper work—to keep the way to the tree of life. When placed in the innermost sanctuary, at each end of the ark of the covenant, the attitude in which they stood was that of adoring contemplation, looking toward the mercy-seat, where reconciliation for iniquity was made, and the throne of grace established for men. Passing from their objective representation to the use made of them in prophetic vision, we find them, in more than one place, supplying the ministers of vengeance with the materials of divine wrath upon human guilt, Eze. x. 7; Rev. xv. 7; and again, they appear in the highest and foremost rank of those heavenly attendants of the King of Zion, who perpetually show forth his praise and extol the wonders of his grace, Ra. iv. 8; v. 11. Creaturely position and ministerial service are what evidently belong to them—but these of the most exalted and honourable kind. For, think, secondly, of the positions assigned them—always in the nearest relationship to God, where God's holiness, and the life connected with it, most peculiarly dwell. They first make their appearance in the blissful haunts of paradise, the provisional occupants of man's lost inheritance; and, as such, the witnesses of a moral glory, which man was no longer capable of sustaining. In the most holy place, they form, with their composite forms and outstretched wings, the immediate attendants of the Great King; his dwelling there is above the mercy-seat and between the cherubim, Ex. xxv. 22; not upon them, as the bearers of his majesty or the pillars of his throne, but between them, as having them for the familiars of his presence, and his selectest instruments of working. Hence also, in the passages above referred to from Ezekiel and the Apocalypse, it is they who furnish angels with the materials of action, as standing nearer to the throne of Godhead even than they; and while angels and elders were seen round about the throne by the Apocalypticist, the cherubic forms appeared in the midst of the throne, as well as round about it, Re. iv. 4-6. Closest proximity to God, therefore, and, by necessary consequence, fitness for the loftiest sphere of holy and blessed life, are what we are taught to associate with the cherubim in Scripture. And then, lastly, there is the property of life itself, most remarkably associated with them. They are emphatically the living creatures—so called in Ezekiel and Revelation about thirty times; and because all life, therefore are they also sometimes represented as all eyes—which are the most peculiar organ and index of life—and all motion, never resting in their ministrations of service, as if life were theirs in undecaying freshness and immortal vigour. But life, so closely linked to the presence of God, and so ceaselessly employed in doing service to Him, must be pre-eminently holy life—life at once enjoyed and exercised in connection with the righteous purposes of the divine government toward men; and so they must be regarded as standing at the farthest possible remove from both sin and death.

If the points now noticed, which include the more fundamental and important representations concerning the cherubim, are allowed their due weight, the description in Ps. xviii. 10 of God's manifestation for the deliverance of the psalmist, in which it is said, "He rode upon a cherub, and did fly; yea, he did fly upon the wings of the wind," cannot occasion any difficulty. It must be understood simply as a poetical allusion, and no more in the one part than in the other should it be pressed closely. The winds are God's instruments of working—his messengers, or angels, as they are called in Ps. civ. 4; and so, poetically, he may be represented as flying upon these, when the object is to exhibit him as moving swiftly onwards to the execution of his purpose. In like manner, and with a similar play of imagination, he might be represented as riding upon a cherub; not that this was ever meant to be understood as the proper throne or chariot of Deity (which were at variance with the spirit of all the leading representations), but merely as the creaturely form with which he had most peculiarly associated his presence and his glory; so that he was naturally thought of by the psalmist in connection with that form—serving himself of its ministry—when coming as the covenant-God to avenge the cause of his servant. It is but a passing and poetical allusion, and cannot, with any propriety, be turned into a principal passage.

6. If now we bring to a practical bearing the information that has been evolved respecting the cherubim, and keep prominently in view, as we ought, the historical use made of them, we shall perceive it to be greatly too indefinite a description of their nature and design to say of them that "they were symbols of the presence of God" (Kalisch), or "the created witnesses and bearers of the divine glory" (Kurtz). Doubtless, they were both the one and the other; but so was the flaming sword at the gate of Eden, which yet was different from the cherubim; so afterwards was the ark of the covenant and the shekinah on the top of it; and so, in a greater or less degree, is every institution and ordinance of God. We must look for something more specific; especially since, if viewed in so general a light, the bearing actually exercised by them on the faith of God's people would, from the positions assigned the cherubim, be of the most diverse and heterogeneous kind. So Kalisch, indeed, unfolds the matter, interpreting the significance of the cherubim in their different positions by way of a formal contrast: "The cherubim are types of the providence and proximity of God; but the cherubim of paradise are the effects of the alienation of men from God; those on the mercy-seat symbolize their conciliation. The former guard a treasure, which is for ever denied to man; the latter, one which was proclaimed to all nations as their common inheritance. The former are, therefore, armed with a fearful weapon, resembling the terrific flashes of lightning; the others look lovingly down upon the ark, overshadowing it with their protecting wings. The one typify a covenant destroyed, the others a covenant concluded; and, instead of the tree of life, of which the one deprives the human families, the others point to a treasure, which is also a tree of life to those who cling to it" (Comm. on Gen. iii. 22-24). Such a mode of interpretation is altogether arbitrary, and, while affecting precision and certainty, it really exhibits the greatest looseness and caprice. Divine symbols were not capable, after this fashion, of speaking for and against, giving intimations of death or life according to the mere circumstances of their position; and God as little intended, by the symbolical apparatus at the east of Eden, to shut out all hope of life from fallen man, as afterwards, by means of the sacred furniture in his sanctuary, to proclaim it as the common inheritance of all nations. In both cases alike, as God himself changes not, and no essential change had taken place in the circumstances of mankind, we cannot doubt that there also was presented the same hope to the fallen, guarded by the like safeguards and limitations, and that as God was not all mercy in the tabernacle, neither was he all terror at the gate of Eden. Indeed, it was precisely through the cherubim of glory, that his mercy found symbolical expression to those who came to worship before him on the east of Eden, as it did also, with some variation, and somewhat fuller accompaniments, in the most holy place of the tabernacle.

For we have no reason to associate the flaming, ever-revolving sword with the cherubim, so as to form the two into one compound symbol, and regard the sword as waved by the hands of a cherub. The sacred text gives no countenance to that idea; it rather presents them to our view as separate, though related objects, necessary, when taken together, to convey that complex instruction which the circumstances of men required, and awaken in their bosom the feelings which it became them to entertain. For this, however, an image of terror and repulsion could not have sufficed. "There was needed along with it an image of mercy and hope; and both were given in the appearances that
