actually presented themselves. When the eye of man looked to the sword, with its burnished and fiery aspect, he could not but be struck with awe at the thought of God's severe and retributive justice. But when he saw at the same time, in near and friendly connection with that emblem of Jehovah's righteousness, living or life-like forms of being, cast pre-eminently in his own mould, but bearing along with his the likeness also of the choicest species of the animal creation around him, what could he think, but that still for creatures of earthly rank, for himself most of all, an interest was reserved by the mercy of God in the things that pertained to the blessed region of life? That region could not now, by reason of sin, be actually possessed by him; but it was provisionally held, by composite forms of creature-life, in which his nature appeared as the predominating element. And for what end, if not to teach, that when that nature of his should have nothing to fear from the avenging justice of God, when raised to its yet destined state of perfection, it should regain its place in the blissful haunts from which it had meanwhile been excluded? So that, standing before the eastern approach to Eden, and scanning with intelligence the appearances that there presented themselves to his view, the child of faith might say to himself, That region of life is not finally lost to me. It has neither been blotted from the face of creation, nor intrusted to beings of another sphere. Earthly forms still hold possession of it. Better things, then, are doubtless in reserve for them; and my nature, which stands out so conspicuously above them all, fallen though it be at present, is assuredly destined to rise again, and enjoy in the reality what is there ideally and representatively assigned to it" (Fairbairn's Typology, vol. I. p. 237).

The instruction was not materially different which was conveyed by the cherubim on the ark—only it belonged to a more advanced stage of the divine dispensations, and marked a progress in the relation of man to his proper end. Here also, as at Eden, there are awful manifestations of the justice of God; the divine presence shrouds itself in a pillar of cloud, from which emanations of wrath are ever ready to break forth on the profane, and not even can the holiest in standing venture to approach without the incense of prayer and the blood of atonement wherewith to sprinkle the mercy-seat. But still the secret place of the Most High can be so entered; the region of divine life and fellowship is no longer an utterly barred one; the way is at least partially opened, though but provisionally, and as through a veil darkly; and the cherubim of glory, imaging manhood in its ideal perfection, and, with their eye ever intent on the blood-sprinkled mercy-seat, encompass the dwelling-place of Jehovah, as much as to say, that if men did but come through this sanctified medium, and lay hold on the hope set before them, they should also in faith have their dwelling there; that even now they should be permitted to drink from the fountain life; and that, when the mystery of God was finished, they should in his immediate presence have experience of joys for evermore.

We conclude, then, that the cherubim were designed pre-eminently to be symbols of faith and hope to the fallen yet believing people of God. They were ideal representatives of humanity in the highest and holiest places—representatives, not of what it actually is, but of what it was destined to become, when the purpose of God in its behalf was accomplished, and other elements than those now belonging to it had gathered into its condition. They were made after an ideal form, not simply in the likeness of man, in order that the lofty privilege to which they pointed might not be supposed to be the heritage of man as fallen; and yet with so much of man's likeness in their general structure as to inspire the confidence, that for man they were designed to light the way of peace and hope. God manifested as dwelling between the cherubim is God appearing in a state of blessed nearness to men, and in covenant for their redemption from sin, that he may bring them to dwell in his presence and glory. And hence, when the vision is opened into the final issues of redemption, the redeemed themselves are there—God is seen dwelling with them, and they with God; but the cherubim, as no longer needed to point the way, when the end itself has been reached, have finally disappeared; they belonged to that which was in part, and when the perfect has come, for ever pass away.

Having thus at some length unfolded what we take to be the true meaning and place of the cherubim, it seems unnecessary to go over in detail the various and often fanciful theories which have been broached in earlier and later times on the subject. They may be seen briefly exhibited in the Typology, already referred to, vol. i. p. 242-248.

CHESTNUT. In Ge. xxx. 37, we are told that Jacob made speckled rods of arnon-twigs, אֲרֹנִים, and from Eze. xxxi. 8, we find that this arnon was a stately tree with magnificent branches, and each context favours the supposition that it grew in a rich soil and near water, like the poplar and willow. In common, therefore, with the great majority of interpreters, we accept the rendering of the Septuagint and Vulgate, and assume that the Platanus or plane is intended.

The Platanus orientalis, or plane of Palestine and of classical antiquity, must not be confounded with the plane-tree, commonly so called in Scotland and England. This last is a maple, Acer pseudo-platanus, and like the rest of its saccharine family, it contains a sweet sap in the liburnum or under bark, for the sake of which it is often tapped by school-boys in spring. Even by those least familiar with plants, the false plane or sycamore may be readily distinguished from the plane, oriental and occidental, by its seeds. In the former they are keys, or twin carpels, flattened into wing-like discs; in the latter, they are globular caskets or catkins—balls more or less rough, which hang on the branches throughout the winter in graceful strings or tassels, suggesting the name of button-wood, by which the P. occidentalis is usually known in the United States of America.

There is no tree with which a Londoner is more familiar, or for which he ought to be more grateful. We know not whether aught of its vigour in the midst of smoke and dust is to be ascribed to its faculty of shedding its bark, and so coming out in a new coat every year; but both the species thrive luxuriantly, and with their leafy canopy afford a shelter alike impene- trable by sun and shower.

A native of Syria, Asia Minor, and Greece, the plane was a special favourite with the ancients. The groves of Academus were groves of plane, and it was under avenues of plane that Aristotle and his Peripatetics promenaded, “ Whilst nourishing a youth sublime,

With the fairy fruits of knowledge, and the long result of time.”

Pliny tells us of some celebrated planes—one at Veliternum, in whose hollow trunk the emperor Caligula entertained fifteen guests; another in Lycia, which in the same way accommodated Licinius Mucianus, the consul, and a festive party of seventeen besides—“large ipsa toros præbente fronde, ab omni afflatu securum, optantem imbrium per folia crepitus, lætiorem, quam marmorum nitore, picturæ varietate, laquearium auro, cubuisse in eadem” (Plinii Nat. Hist. lib. xii. 5). If not the same tree, it was in the same neighbourhood that the famous plane-tree grew which arrested Xerxes on his march, and for which he showed such crazy fondness—according to Ælian, decorating it with scarfs, and necklaces, and costly jewels, and when at last obliged to tear himself away from it, causing a golden medal to be struck as a commemoration of it.

This plane is a native of Palestine, and, next to the cedar, no tree could supply Ezekiel with a worthier image of massive strength and stately grandeur.

CHILDREN. In the authorized version of Scripture, the term is often used in a general sense for offspring or descendants, and where sons would be the more exact synonym for the original: as children of Abraham, children of Israel. But taking the word with reference to children strictly so called, there are certain things deserving of notice respecting the position of such among the covenant-people, and the usages to which it gave rise: (1.) The most distinguishing peculiarity, perhaps, was the close identification of children with parents in their covenant-standing. The ordinance of circumcision, which formed the introduction to the covenant, and might be called its personal badge, was administered to infants of eight days old, for the express purpose of connecting parent and child together in the same bond of obligation and promise toward God. And it was impossible that this could be done in a right spirit, and with any suitable apprehension of the meaning involved in the transaction, without elevating the relation of the child in respect to its parent, rendering it in a manner sacred in his eyes. Among such a people children would naturally be regarded as God's gifts, in a more peculiar sense than they should otherwise have been, and only among them could the saying have arisen—“Lo, children are God's heritage.” (2.) In consequence of this covenant-relationship, there emerged another peculiarity—the solemn mutual responsibilities laid upon each. Parents in Israel were taken bound to have their children reared in their own faith, and fitted for occupying in due time the place of true members of the covenant; and hence the many injunctions imposed on them in the law to teach their children and to command them to walk in the way of the Lord, Ge. xviii. 19; De. vi. 7; xi. 19; hence also the kind of sacred honour which parents were entitled to expect, and children were bound to render, while still under the parental roof. This received its highest sanction in the fifth commandment of the law, which accorded to parents a certain measure of that honour which properly belongs to God, and suspended on its due observance the prolonged existence of the children of the covenant in the land given to them for an inheritance. It proceeded on the great principle, that the relation of children to their earthly parents was to be so recognized and acted on as to form a suitable preparation for the higher relationship which in mature years they were to hold toward God, and that where the one failed there was no reasonable prospect of the other being properly maintained. In regard to specific measures, however, we have no information. In later times, the child at five years old was placed more directly under the charge of the father, and at twelve he reached a new stage; he was then called ben-katorah, son of the law, and was initiated in a more advanced discipline and instruction. (3.) It necessarily followed from this connection between parent and child, as a third note of distinction, that very severe measures should be taken with such children as set at nought the honour and restraints of parental authority. Not only was the general law enacted, that every one should fear his father and his mother, and this placed in immediate connection with the call to keep the Sabbaths of the Lord and worship only him, Le. xix. 3, but there were such more specific enactments as the following:—“He that smiteth his father or his mother shall surely be put to death,” and even he that cursed them was to share the same fate, Ex. xxi. 15, 17; “cursed be he that setteth light by his father or his mother,” De. xvii. 16; and if any parent should openly accuse his son as stubborn and rebellious before the elders of the city, the people were to stone him with stones, till he died, De. xxi. 21. It may well be supposed, that enactments like these would very rarely be carried into effect, even when cases occurred fully warranting the infliction of the penalty; natural affection would commonly prevail over the demands of justice; but the very insertion of such laws in the statute-book of the nation was a strong testimony to the spirit that should pervade the relationship. (4.) We may regard it, perhaps, as only another natural sequence of the fundamental character of this relation, that children were politically, as well as socially and religiously, bound up in the closest manner with their parents. The inheritance of the parent fell by legal right to his offspring, divided among his sons into equal parts, excepting that the eldest obtained a double portion in honour of his birthright. And as the possessions of the Israelites were thus subject to a regular rule of succession, wills were not known amongst them. The connection was equally close on the other side; for in cases of extreme poverty the child might be sold for the debt of the parent. The law, indeed, did not expressly authorize this; but as the father himself might be reduced to the condition of a bondman for payment of his debt, it was but natural to infer that his children also were to be held liable to the same fate. Practically, there can be no doubt, this was the course taken, 2 Ki. iv. 1; La. i. 1, Na. v. 5; but in the case of children as well as parents, the merciful provision came into play, that the bondage could only last till the year of release, La. xiv. 29-32, and even while it lasted, was to be alleviated with proper marks of brotherly kindness. As a check also against the worst, and as a regulating principle in ordinary judicial transactions, it was enacted, that the children should not be put to death for the parents, any more than the parents for the children, De. xxiv. 16.

CHILDREN, like SONS, is often used figuratively of persons who are distinguished, whether for good or evil, by some particular quality or power; they are called children of that quality or power, to mark more distinctly its predominance in them; they appear, in a manner, to be born of it. Thus the true recipients of the gospel are called "children of light," having the knowledge of God in Christ, the only knowledge that brings salvation, shining into their hearts, and fashioning their whole character and lives, Lu. xvi. 8; also "children of obedience," on account of the free and ready spirit of submission to the divine will which characterizes them, 1 Pe. i. 14; and the more immediate disciples of Christ, those who hailed him as the Bridegroom of his church, and rejoiced in the glad some light and liberty which it was his mission to bring to the world, are named "children of the bride-chamber," Mat. ix. 15. On the other side, we have such expressions as "children of hell," "sons of Belial," "children of this world," "children of the wicked one," Mat. xiii. 38; xiii. 15; Lu. xvi. 9, to denote the moral depravation and inevitable ruin of those who are opposed to the principles of righteousness and truth. Sometimes even the term is applied more specifically in reference to a particular element of life, or phase of character, as in Mat. xi. 19, where persons wisely fulfilling the work of God are called "children of wisdom;" Ac. iv. 36, where Barnabas, "son of consolation," is given as a surname to Joses; as also Mar. iii. 17, where John and James are styled "sons of thunder;" and many things of a similar description. The rationale of this form of speech has been excellently unfolded by Steiger in his remarks on 1 Pe. i. 14:—"In the oriental way of contemplating things, the general is not only recognized as a reality, but as something more real and earlier than the individual that holds of it, which is therefore viewed as its offspring. Hence so many expressions that appear to us strange and incongruous, but which we should not soften and explain away in translation. Thus a fruitful hill is named a son of fruitfulness, where in idea we find our poetical expression 'father of fruits.' But as the latter mode of considering things, which is customary with us, points onwards to the appearance and the consequences, so the other goes back to the nature and the ground. According to it, regard is had to the origin of the hill as touching its fruitfulness, and consequently the general fruitfulness appears quite correctly as in this respect its offspring. It proceeds out of itself, has become concrete in it, and only because the fruit-bearing power has thus entered into it, is the hill itself fruit-bearing. The same thing also is indicated in our mode of expression; for we name that, which naturally yields fruit, not merely fruit-bearing, but fruitful, which expresses the vis nativa, the inherent power. To such a principle of derivation must be referred, not only all similar expressions—such as 'sons of might,' 'daughters of song'—but also others, as in the construction with periods, when παις (son or child) signifies the product of the particular time—for example, a child of a troublous time; all those expressions, in short, which at first betoken merely a resemblance or a subordinate relation, but in which this signification is always grounded upon the notion in question Children of obedience, of faith, therefore, are those who through faith have become that which they now are, through its being implanted within them; who have been born again, and hence possess the character of faith, and are always ready for obedience. It was consequently a right feeling which led the older translators and expositors to retain the word child (viz. in 1 Pe. i. 14), although they sought, without clearness of view, to refer it immediately to God, or put on it the interpretation children of God, which makes the obedience as such to be easily known. But the proper way of rendering the connection is this—children of faith are children of grace, which is equivalent to children of God; i. e. God, through the faith which is wrought in them by his grace, makes them to yield obedience to himself, or to be his children." And so indeed of all such expressions; the particular quality or power is viewed as taking possession of the man, so as to give birth and being to him in the state and aspect under consideration: he virtually becomes its offspring.

CHILDREN OF GOD, AND CHILDREN BY ADOPTION. See ADOPTION.

CHIL'EAB [probable meaning, like his father], the name of David's son by Abigail, 2 Sa. iii. 3, but who is elsewhere called Daniel, 1 Ch. iii. 1. The reason of this twofold name is uncertain; but for the rabbinical notions concerning it, and some speculations of his own, see Bochart, Hieros. i. p. 663.

CHIM'HAM [languishing, longing], son of Barzillai the Gileadite, who, at the father's request, was taken by David to Jerusalem, after the quelling of Absalom's rebellion, for the purpose of being treated with royal favour and distinction, 2 Sa. xix. 37, 38. History has preserved no further notice of him.

CHIN'NERETH, CHINNEROTH, CINNE-RETH—for so many forms does the word assume—the name of an ancient town on the Lake of Galilee, from which the lake itself is supposed to have derived its name, Joa. xix. 35; xi. 2; De. iii. 17. The place seems after the conquest to have sunk into obscurity, as it is unknown in the history of the covenant people. But, as what was originally called the Sea of Chinnereth, Nu. xxxiv. 11, bore ultimately the name of the Sea of Tiberias, it has been very commonly supposed, that the modern Tiberias rose on the site of the ancient Chinnereth. (See TIBERIAS.)

CHIOS, an island in the Archipelago, near which St. Paul passed on his way from Mitylene to Samos, Ac. xx. 15. It lay very nearly in a straight line between Lesbos, in which Mitylene was, and Samos, and was about 8 miles distant from the mainland of Asia. It was about 30 miles long and 10 broad; fertile in the production of cotton, silk, and fruit. The modern name is Scio, or, as the Greeks spell and pronounce it, Khio. No record exists of its connection with Christianity in apostolic times; but after the lapse of ages, we read of a Bishop of Chios, showing that the gospel had obtained a footing on its shores. During the struggle of the war for independence, it became the scene of a terrible tragedy—the Turks having in 1822 fallen on it, and committed a dreadful massacre among the inhabitants.

CHISLEU, OR CHISLEV, the ninth month of the Jewish year, commencing with the new moon in December or the latter part of November. The term itself is understood to be of Persian origin. The chief observance connected with it was "the feast of the dedication," as it was called, kept in commemoration of the purification of the temple after it had been impiously profaned by Antiochus Epiphanes, 1 Mac. iv. 59; Ja. x. 22. The feast began on the twenty-fifth of the month, and lasted for eight days. The modern Jews fast on the sixth day of it, on account of the destruction of Jeremiah's roll by king Jehoiakim; and the seventh is said to be a feast of joy in commemoration of king Herod's death.

CHITTIM, OR KITTIM, the Kittians, descendants of Japheth by Javan, Ge. x. 4, and generally believed to be the same with the Cyprians. In Scripture it occurs only as a plural, with reference to the people, rather than the place; but the singular has been found in a bilingual inscription discovered at Athens, in which the name of a Cyprian buried at Athens is written both in Greek and in Phœnician letters: he is designated Νουμήσιος Κιτιεύς, Numenius the Kitian, a native of Citium in Cyprus. Cicero speaks of the inhabitants of Citium as a Phœnician colony (De Finibus, iv. 20); and Dr. Pococke, when there, copied as many as thirty-three inscriptions in Phœnician characters. But the word Chittim was also used by the Hebrews as a general name for the isles of the sea, probably because in their earlier history Cyprus was the chief island with which they were acquainted. Josephus testifies as to the fact, though his mode of accounting for it may be disputed—"Chethimus possessed the island of Chethima, which is now called Cyprus, and from this all islands and the most part of maritime places are called Chethim by the Hebrews (Ant. i. 6, 1). In this more extended sense the word is used in Nu. xxiv. 24; Je. ii. 10; Eze. xxvii. 6; Da. xi. 30. A special respect is, no doubt, had to the islands in the Ægean, and towns along the coast of Greece, because these were the insular and maritime places, beyond which the knowledge of the ancient Hebrews could scarcely be said to extend. Bochart has laboured to support the rendering of the Vulgate, which has identified Chittim with the Romans; but the prevailing opinion now is what has just been stated—that the term primarily denoted Cyprus, and then was extended so as to comprehend the islands in the Ægean, and people generally across the seas. (See Gesenius's Thesaurus; Hengstenberg's Balaam, at Nu. xxiv. 24; Pococke's Description of the East, vol. ii. p. 213.)

CHIUN, a word of disputed import, and occurring only once in Scripture. The prophet Amos, when charging the Israelites with a hereditary proneness to idolatry, points back to the state of matters in the wilderness, and asks—"Have ye offered unto me sacrifices and offerings in the wilderness forty years, O house of Israel! But [i.e. no, not unto me did ye present sacrifices and offerings, but] ye love the tabernacle of your Moloch, and Chiun your images, the star of your god, which ye made to yourselves" ch. v. 25, 26. The Septuagint changed the latter part of the statement thus—"Ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch, and the star of your god Remphan, figures which ye made to worship them." And this version of the words is adopted by Stephen in the Acts, and brought forward as a proof that the people in the wilderness had been "given up to worship the host of heaven." It has been long matter of controversy, what form or aspect of heathen-worship might be meant in the original passage by Chiun; and also how the Septuagint could have turned "Chiun your images, the star of your god," into "the star of your god Remphan, images." The words of the original have evidently to some extent been transposed in the Septuagint; but in regard to the chief point, the opinion most generally entertained by the learned has been, that the Kiun or Kevan of Amos was read by the Greek translator Revan or Raiphan, which last appears to be the correct reading, and that this was understood to be an Egyptian name for Saturn. Hence also the Syrian version, at a later period, gave Saturn as the proper rendering, with special reference doubtless to the planet Saturn, which was worshipped by some eastern nations among the host of heaven as a kind of evil genius. The authorities, however, upon which this view chiefly rested, have rather fallen into disrepute of late; and Gesenius, who had previously espoused and vindicated the view, in his last and most matured opinions abandoned it. He came to the conviction, which is acquiesced in by Hengstenberg and many others, that the Chiun of the prophet is no deity at all, but ought to be translated statue or image, as, indeed, it was long ago rendered by the Latin Vulgate, imaginem idolorum vestrorum. The rendering then becomes—"Ye bore the tabernacle (strictly, booth) of your Moloch, and the figure (or image) of your idols, the star of your god, which ye made for yourselves." This view is the rather to be acquiesced in, as it is against all probability to suppose that a deity so little known as Chiun, Raiphan, or Remphan (whichever form may be preferred), if such an one ever really existed as an object of worship, should have been introduced in so familiar and incidental a manner by the prophet. He must, we naturally think, have alluded to forms of worship which were generally known to have existed, and were familiar to the minds of all. But the use made of the passage by Stephen is perfectly justifiable; since the prophet undoubtedly identifies the worship referred to with an idolatrous regard to the host of heaven, employing, as he does, the expression "the star of your god," or "your star-god." Indeed, throughout the world of ancient heathendom, idolatry and star-worship always stood in close affinity with each other. The worship of the Syrian Baal or Moloch was quite commonly identified with the sun, as Ashtaroth or Astarte was with the moon; the one was the king of heaven, the other the queen; and star-worship (making this include the heavenly bodies generally) might be regarded as in ancient times inseparable from false worship.

Viewed in a doctrinal respect, the chief peculiarity of the passage in Amos arises from the measure of guilt it seems to charge upon Israel in the wilderness, as if

during the whole period of sojourn there the people had continued in the open practice of heathen worship, and had carried about with them idolatrous tents and images! It is difficult to understand how this could be the case, considering both the searching oversight under which they were placed, and the occasional testimonies that are given of their progressive advancement in the wilderness toward a sound spiritual condition. These testimonies, indeed, never pronounce an unqualified approval of their state; nay, they leave us in no doubt, that to the last a considerable intermixture survived of the stubborn and carnal spirit of idolatry, De. x 16; xxix. 2-4; xxxi. 16, seq.; Eze. xx. 7-17; while still, as a whole, the people toward the close of the wilderness-sojourn are represented as in a state of greater purity and devotedness than either when they left Egypt, or than they afterwards continued for any length of time to maintain, Jos. xxiii. xxiv.; Ja. ii. 2, 3, &c. There is no real contrariety, however, in the representations, when they are properly balanced and compared. Relatively, Israel in the wilderness became a holy people; the effect of the discipline and judgments through which they passed was to make them such—otherwise God could never, at the close of the period, have conducted them into the land of Canaan, from which at an earlier date, and when they were in a worse condition, he had kept them back. But the purity was still only comparative, not absolute, as was but too clearly evinced by the occasional murmurings of the people, and the falling away of so many of them, near the termination of the wilderness-period, to the worship of Baal-peor, Nu. xiv. It is to this continuous, never wholly eradicated, existence and operation of the old leaven that the prophet Amos points. He does not mean to say—as seems often to be imagined—that this was the preponderating element in their condition, or that in consequence of it the people never ceased to bear about with them the instruments and to engage in the services of idolatry. The meaning rather is, that their natural tendency lay in this direction; and that, looking to the strong bent of their disposition, or their general characteristics as a people, it might be said that they performed their sacrifices to others than Jehovah, and turned his tabernacle into a sort of idol-tent. In a word, while he gave them the true religion, they failed even in the earlier and comparatively purer part of their history to keep it entire, and were ever intermingling and defiling it with the corruptions of heathenism. Such appears to be the real purport of the charge of the prophet.

CHLOE, the name of a Christian female at Corinth, from the members of whose family Paul received his information respecting the unhappy divisions that had sprung up there after he returned to Asia, 1 Co. i. 11. She is never again mentioned.

CHORAZIN, a town in Galilee, on the Sea of Tiberias, and evidently not far from Capernaum and Bethsaida, along with which it is mentioned by our Lord, and left with a woe upon its head, on account of its neglect of gospel privileges, Mat. xi. 21. It is rather singular, that while it is thus in a parting word of Christ raised to a bad pre-eminence, as one of the cities "wherein most of his mighty works were done, and still repented not," the narratives of the evangelists never notice any visit of our Lord to the place, or any work done in it—an incidental proof how much is left unrecorded of the things that filled up our Lord's active ministry. No trace has yet been found of its site.

CHRIST JESUS. It is of no practical moment whether we couple the personality of our Redeemer with the name CHRIST, or with that of JESUS. Very commonly the latter is preferred, as being historically and properly the personal designation. But if respect be had to the whole course of revelation on the subject—if the divine testimonies before the incarnation be taken into account, as well as those posterior to it, it may seem fully as natural to give the preference to the name of Christ or Messiah; for before the volume of Old Testament scripture had closed, this had come to receive a strictly personal application, and was employed much as a proper name. On this account, therefore, and because it is the name from which has flowed the more distinctive epithets both of the people and of the cause of Jesus, we adopt it as presenting the fittest place for the little that can be said directly, in a work like the present, on the wonderful and glorious Being to whom it relates.

The name Christ in Greek, Messiah in Hebrew, bearing, as it does, the participial or adjective sense of anointed, was capable of being applied, and actually was applied, in the earlier parts of Scripture, to a variety of persons. Because the high-priest was emphatically the anointed one at the first institution of the tabernacle worship, he is therefore called "the priest, the Christ" (Heb. hamaschiach, Gr. ὁ λεγόμενος χριστός, Le. iv. 3). After the institution of the kingly office, and the setting apart of him who bore it by an act of consecration with oil, he became, in a peculiar sense, the Lord's anointed, or the Christ of the Lord, as Saul is once and again designated by David, 1 Sa. xxi. 3, 4, &c. Hannah, however, at the close of her song of praise, had already given the word a loftier direction—not without respect, it may be, to the more immediate bearers of the royal dignity, but still more especially pointing to one who should gather into his person the highest powers and prerogatives associated with the chosen people, and give them a world-wide development; for she speaks of the Lord "exalting the horn of his Messiah" (anointed), so as, at the same time, to "judge the ends of the earth." In Ps. ii., the Lord's Christ is He who is God's Son by way of eminence, and who receives the heritage of earth to its utmost bounds as his sure possession. And, to say nothing of other passages, in Daniel, ch. ix., we find the term applied to the expected deliverer, without the article or any accompanying epithet, precisely as a proper name: "Know, therefore, and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment unto Messiah (Christ) Prince;" and again, "And after threescore and two weeks shall Messiah (Christ) be cut off," ver. 25, 26.

It need not surprise us, therefore, when we open the New Testament, to find, in the very first announcement of the actual birth of the Saviour, this name applied to Him as a personal designation: "Fear not," said the angels to the shepherds, "for unto you is born this day in the city of David, a Saviour, who is Christ, Lord" (ὅς ἐστιν Χριστὸς κύριος, Lu. ii. 11). But before his birth, the name, in its Greek form, Jesus (Hebrew Yeshua) had been divinely appointed for his more strictly personal designation. "Thou shalt call his name Jesus," said the angel to Joseph, "for he shall save his people from their sins." Unfortunately, by the translation, the ground of the connection is lost between the name and the reason assigned for its imposition; there being no formal resemblance between Jesus and he shall save. As originally spoken, it would be otherwise; it would run thus, Yeshua ki Yoshiya — יֵשׁוּעַ כִּי יוֹשִׁיעַ — Saviour, for he shall save. And when sins are mentioned as the specific evil from which the bearer of this name was to save his people, it was intimated from the outset that he was to appear pre-eminently as a spiritual Redeemer—one who had higher ends in view, and a nobler mission to accomplish, than the political regeneration of his country, or the promotion of the merely secular interests of the world. If these should anyhow come within the scope of his benevolent working, it could only be as results following in the train of his more direct and proper undertaking.

When viewed in respect to their ultimate meaning, the two names of Jesus and Christ differ only by pointing to diverse aspects of his high calling: the one (Jesus) gave indication of the nature of the work he had to do, the other (Christ) bespoke his consecration and special endowment for the service it required at his hands. Each implied the other: He could not have been the Jesus, if he had not been destined to receive the unction which constituted him the Christ; nor, on the other hand, should He have been constituted the Christ, unless the infinitely great and important work, implied in his being the Jesus, had been committed to his charge. There had been persons who preceded him in the divine administration bearing the names, and to some extent also possessing the reality of what he was to be and do among men; but it was only as the faint and imperfect image, the mere shadow of what was to be found in him. Consequently, those of them who might be said to be Christed or anointed, the priests, the kings, and occasionally also the prophets of the olden time, had no such consecration as he had; they had the external anointing, and in part also the Spirit's grace which it symbolized (for God never mocks his true servants with a mere shell that has no kernel); but it was a grace that could be measured; and the very stress laid upon the outward rite bespoke the comparative deficiency of the internal gift. In Him, however, who came as the great antitype of all those provisional instruments of grace and salvation, the outward altogether disappears, because the inward in its perfection has come. His anointing consists of the indwelling of the Spirit, formally bestowed at his baptism, bestowed not by measure; and having, in the plenitude of this grace, finished the work given him to do for his people, he obtains the same in measure also for them; so that they become Christed in him, 2 Co. i. 21, and receive out of his fulness grace for grace. As it was the unction of the Holy One that made him the Christ, so it is their receiving from him the same unction, in proportion to their capacity and their need, which gives them a participation in his work, and a standing in his kingdom, 1 Jn. ii. 20; Ro. viii. 9. (Compare what is said under ANOINTING.)

In the historical manifestation of the person and work of our Lord, the question which had to find a practical solution bore respect to the significance of both names; for it was in reality all one to ask, whether he was entitled to bear the name of Jesus? or whether he ought to be recognized as the Christ? But it was otherwise, as matters actually evolved themselves. The deep import of the name Jesus was concealed from the men of his generation, on account of its being borne from childhood as a personal designation; in their view it merely served to distinguish him as an individual from other individuals around him. But from the time that he began to manifest himself to Israel, the question which naturally arose in men's minds was, whether this Jesus was the Christ? Was he indeed the person predetermined in the counsels of Heaven to hold the office, and fulfil the destiny, of the Lord's Anointed? Hence, throughout the gospels, whenever the discourse turns upon the claims of Jesus, it has respect in some form to his being or not being the Christ (the article being always prefixed, at least in the original); and the substance, first of apostolic belief, and then of apostolic preaching, was that Jesus of Nazareth was indeed the Christ, Mat. xvi. 16; Jn. vi. 69; Ac. ii. 36; ix. 22; x. 38; xvii. 3. But when we reach a more advanced stage of gospel history, when the Messiahship of Jesus was fully established in the convictions of believers, and Christian communities were everywhere founded on the conviction as a fully authenticated fact, the term Christ also passed into a personal designation; and instead of "Jesus the Christ," the common form of expression came to be "Jesus Christ," or "Christ Jesus," as we find it indifferently used in the epistles of the New Testament.

Another question, however—though one that might be said to be involved in the application of these names—called for an intelligent decision at the hands of those who were brought into contact with the personal ministry of our Lord, and one which for a time staggered some who were ready to give a believing response to the other: namely, Who or what was this Christ as to the constitution of his person? There would have been no difficulty in answering such a question, if men had understood what was implied in the anointing which constituted him the Christ. If they had known that this consisted in his receiving the Spirit without measure, so as to be empowered for the execution of all divine operations, they would have perceived that He must himself be possessed of the power and prerogatives of God-head; for, otherwise, he could not have been the recipient and bearer of such a gift. He who can hold all the Spirit's fulness, must already be a partaker of the Spirit's infinitude. Nor was less involved in his being the Jesus, the world's Saviour from sin, though the conclusion in this respect was not one that might be so directly reached. For whether sin were viewed as a debt to the justice of God, or a moral plague infecting the very heart and soul of humanity, who could prevail to remove it? What must he be, who should be found competent to pay such a debt, or to apply an efficient remedy to that all-pervading disease? In neither of its aspects was this a work for man to accomplish—not even though he should himself be free from any actual participation in the evil. It is the spoiling of God's workmanship that has here to be grappled with—the moral and physical ruin of a world; and every effort must prove insufficient to the task, which cannot bring to its aid the infinite resources of God-head. No one, therefore, could rightly apprehend the work which Jesus had to do as the Saviour, without having the conviction forced on him, that energies altogether supernatural, powers essentially and properly divine, must needs be lodged in his person; and whether contemplated as the Jesus or the Christ, there must be about him all that ages before was indicated by the prophet, when he announced him as "Immanuel, God with us," Is. vii. 14.

But even the better part of our Lord's countrymen, his disciples themselves, were slow in yielding to this conviction; and long after they had ceased to doubt that Jesus of Nazareth was the Christ, they shrunk from the thought of his either possessing a divine nature, or having to perform a strictly divine work. The great mass of his countrymen would not entertain the thought at all. Some kind of reformation from the evils of sin they were willing enough to expect at his hands; but not such a work as should provide for its utter extirpation from the kingdom of heaven, and in its accomplishment should bring into play the infinite perfections of Godhead. This was an idea of Messiah's person and mission which had never entered their mind to conceive; and as often as Jesus tried to urge it on their notice, or commend it to their belief, they repelled the attempt, and raised the charge of blasphemy. When he claimed divine powers and prerogatives in connection with his work, as having to deal directly with sin, or as supernaturally manifesting itself in the effects it produced, Mat. 12. 3-6; Lu. vii. 48, 49; and when once and again he vindicated for himself a personal relationship to the Father, such as was indispensable to his office, but such as no created being might dare to appropriate, Jn. v. 17, 18; vi. 30-35; x. 23-38; the result was uniformly the same—an indignant repudiation of the thought, followed sometimes by an attempt to overbear him with violence. Even when the question was put to the Jewish leaders in a kind of hypothetical form, raised on an announcement of ancient prophecy—when they were demanded, how David could call Messiah Lord, whom yet he delighted to anticipate as his son, they were entirely gravelled—so completely did the idea of a properly divine person and work in the Messiah transcend what they had ever imagined as possible, Mat. xxiii. 43-44. And when, by the overruling providence of God, all other devices failed for laying an accusation against Jesus, which might warrant the judicial extinction of his earthly career, their strong repugnance to any claim of divinity found vent to itself in the solemn condemnation they pronounced upon him for confessing that he was the Son of God; so that the formal ground of his crucifixion, on the part of man, was his claiming to be what the nature of his office and mission, whether as announced beforehand by Old Testament prophets, or as more distinctly exhibited by himself, imperatively required that he should be, Mat. xxvi. 63.

The disciples of our Lord were not so impregably sealed against the truth. It made way upon their convictions, though somewhat slowly and fitfully. They seemed to have an impression of it at one time, while they had lost it, or had all but lost it, at another. Near the commencement of his ministry, and after an unexpected manifestation of supernatural insight, he was greeted by Nathanael as the Son of God, Jn. 1. 49. Peter, too, at an early period, and after witnessing a like display of the supernatural, exclaimed as one penetrated and overwhelmed with a sense of the presence of Deity, "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord," Lu. v. 8. But in process of time the minds of the disciples began to shake; their confidence in the divinity of their Master gave way; so that many, it is said, on hearing certain strong declarations of Jesus respecting his all-sufficiency to his people, went back and walked no more with him, Jn. vi. 66; and at a later period still, Peter received his special blessing for simply confessing what apparently had been held long before, that Jesus was the Christ, the Son of the living God, Mat. xvi. 16. The difficulty, it would seem, was not so much in getting some apprehension or belief of the truth respecting Christ's divine character—manifestations of this were ever and anon bursting forth which flashed conviction at the time on the minds of the disciples; but then these were succeeded by other things, so different from what they expected, and so hard to reconcile with the notion of omnipotence, that darkness and doubt again took possession of their hearts. Hence, the chief difficulty lay in getting an intelligent and settled belief of the truth, such as should abide, like an anchor, sure and steadfast; and it was faith of this stamp, divinely wrought in the soul, which Peter was the first to attain, but which they all came by degrees to possess, not excepting the incredulous Thomas, who at last exclaimed, "My Lord, and my God."

The whole history, indeed, of Christ's appearance and work on earth was strange and mysterious to those about him. So far from anticipating everything (as German theorists have dreamed), and out of their anticipations weaving a history that was never acted, they could not understand it when they saw it occurring before their eyes. Every winding in the course was a riddle till the light of the Spirit shone upon it; even the prophecies, which so often pointed the way to the events in progress, were not thought of, at least not perceived in their proper bearing, till the events themselves recalled their existence; and most commonly the immediate agents in their accomplishment were those who were the most anxious to defeat the claims of Jesus. With this striking originality in the matter of Christ's history, the form it assumes in the evangelical narratives perfectly corresponds. The finger of God may be everywhere traced in the one as well as in the other. It is the most wonderful of all stories that is there narrated; and yet what a divine simplicity pervades the narration! as if it were but a series of ordinary occurrences, on which not a mark of admiration need be raised, or a word of personal feeling expressed. And amid so many things fitted to create surprise, and stir the deepest emotions of the soul, what a singular reserve in withholding what might have been fitted to gratify human curiosity! Over how many parts of our Lord's life, especially of its early stages, is the veil allowed to hang, where a merely human hand would so readily have uplifted it! And in regard to what forms the most wonderful, what, spiritually considered, is the most important section of the entire history, namely, the closing scenes of his earthly career, one of the most inveterate infidels could not refuse, in a moment of salutary thought, to give his testimony to the inimitable character of the narrative. "In spite of all we have said," exclaimed Diderot, in a meeting of unbelievers at the Baron d'Holbach's, "and no doubt with much reason, against that cursed book, I will defy you, with all your abilities, to compose a narrative which shall be as simple, and at the same time as sublime, as touching, as the account of the last sufferings and death of Jesus Christ—which shall produce the same effect, make so deep an impression, one so generally felt, and the influence of which shall be as fresh as ever after the lapse of so many centuries." (Reported by Hess, and quoted by Stier, at Lu. xxiii. 34; Reden Jesu, vi. p. 496.)

It is constantly assumed in the gospels and epistles of the New Testament, that the office of Jesus as the

Christ had a threefold aspect, and comprised kinds of administration, which in earlier times were usually discharged by distinct persons—prophets, priests, and kings. Occasionally these were to some extent combined even in Old Testament times; as in the case of David, who was at once a king and a prophet, and in the cases of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, who were alike prophets and priests. Viewed as offices, however, the three orders were separate, and the consecration which qualified for one, neither involved a call nor conferred a title to the others. But in Christ they all met; his anointing of the Spirit qualified alike for each; and, indeed, from the moment of his entering on the work given him to do, the discharge of every one of them began simultaneously to proceed. In all he did, there was at once a prophetic, a priestly, and a kingly element—although what was done might formally belong to one office rather than to another. For example, his miraculous healing of diseases may naturally be assigned to his kingly office, as being, in its most obvious character, a manifestation of that royal authority and divine power, by which he can subdue all things to himself for the good of his people: but the prophetic element was also there; for all the acts of that description which proceeded from his hand were indicative of his mission and work, in their higher and more properly redemptive character: and a priestly element besides, since they showed him actually charging himself with the evils of humanity, and vicariously bearing the heavy burden, Mat. viii. 17. In like manner, the death of Jesus on the cross, from the more immediate and ostensible ends that had to be accomplished by it, is most appropriately associated with his priestly office, seeing it was thereby he made reconciliation for the sins of the world; but in that death, too, there was kingly might, spoiling principalities and powers, and the rulers of darkness; and prophetic teaching in its highest exercise, for nothing, not even in the history of Christ's undertaking, is comparable to his death, for the light it sheds over the purposes of God, and the insight it affords into his character as connected with the work of man's salvation. When Christ's agency, therefore, is distributed into the threefold office of prophet, priest, and king, the division, it must be remembered, is made, not so properly for the purpose of drawing a line of separation between the different parts of his work, as for assisting our apprehensions in regard to the more prominent character and the manifold bearing of each; and in apportioning any particular act to one office, we are not to be understood as denying its subordinate relation to another. It was, doubtless, to prevent any such impression from arising in the mind, that no formal distribution of Christ's work is made in Scripture.

We are not the less plainly, however, given to understand, that he was the prophet, priest, and king of his church; and in each respect rose incomparably above all who at any previous period were called to discharge the functions implied in these titles. As PROPHET, his appearance in the world constitutes a new era, in respect to which it is said by the apostle John, "the darkness is now past, and the clear light shineth." Not that Christ taught, or professed to teach, anything absolutely new; preceding teachers of the church had been his own messengers, endowed with a portion of his own Spirit; and he could not appear in a relation of absolute independence toward them, far less assume a position of antagonism, as if coming to destroy what they had established. The germ already existed, in the divine institutions and prophetic teachings of the old covenant, of all that was to develop itself in him; but in the development of that germ, there was such a reach of discernment, such a breadth of view, such a loftiness of aim, such a many-sided fulness of instruction, and all cast into forms so admirably fitted to take a deep and lasting hold of the hearts of mankind, as has left even the greatest of those who went before at an immeasurable distance from Him. Now, for the first time, was the veil properly uplifted from the upper sanctuary, and the Lord of glory openly disclosed to men's view, as full of grace and truth, according to the word of Christ himself, "No one hath seen God at any time, the only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him," Jn. i. 18. In the strictly moral sphere also, we perceive the same relative superiority, the same realized perfection; for Christ, to use the words of Mr. Taylor, "as founder of a system of mundane ethics, revises and overrules all bygone moralities, issuing anew whatever is of unchangeable obligation, and consigning to non-observance or oblivion whatever had a temporary force or a local reason. With a touch—with a word—a word of far-reaching inferences, he rules the ages to come; and he so sends morality forward—he so launches it into the boundless futurity of the human system on earth, as that it shall need no re-dressing, no complementing, no retrenchment, even in the most distant era" (Restoration of Belief, p. 370). It was the more remarkable that he should appear a prophet of this lofty stamp, when we reflect how many others had been working at the same problem, and failed in the attempt—Jewish theosophists at Alexandria, who combined the advantage of an acquaintance with God's earlier revelations with the highest culture of heathendom; Scribes and Pharisees in Judea, who could think of nothing higher or better for the future of the world than the diffusion of unmodified Judaism; and Essenes, the ascetic reformers of Judaism, who only succeeded in compounding out of pharisaic and mystic elements, a system which was repulsive to the common sentiments of mankind, and died in the deserts that gave it birth. How should one who, humanly considered, was but a Jewish peasant in an obscure Galilean village, have so readily done what all besides had failed to accomplish—should, in a few short years, have laid the foundations of a universal religion and a perfect morality—were it not that the human in Him was informed and elevated by the divine!

The PRIESTHOOD of Jesus was of a kind that bespoke, if possible, a still higher elevation above those around him, and a yet deeper insight into the mysteries of Godhead. The priestly element had entered largely into the religion of Judaism; its sacrifices and oblations had all to be offered by a mediating priesthood; and by them alone, as having immediate access to God, could the more peculiar intercessions for the blessing of Heaven be made with acceptance. But could it with all these prevail to satisfy the conscience! Did it adequately meet the moral wrong occasioned by sin in the government of God, and provide on grounds of righteousness for its final extirpation! So the men of our Lord's generation seemed universally to think. Not a thought apparently had ever crossed their imaginations respecting the merely provisional nature of the ritual institutions of Moses; they held it blasphemy to breathe a sentiment in that direction, Mat. xxvii. 61; Ac. vi. 14. Yet their own prophets had given no doubtful indications of something higher being needed—of a covenant and a priesthood, founded upon better promises, and destined to secure more satisfactory results. David had looked forward in joyful hope to his great Successor—Him who was to be at once his son and Lord—being a priest upon the throne, a priest after the order of Melchizedek, Ps. cx. 4. And the later prophets, when pointing to the time of his appearing, spoke in ominous terms of sufferings that were to precede, as well as of a glory that was to follow; of a fearful struggle with sin, in which his very soul was to be poured out, and a ransom of priceless value paid, whereby the guilt of iniquity was to be for ever atoned, sacrifice and oblation to cease, a new and higher temple consecrated, Is. lxxx. 9, 10; Da. ix. 26, 27; Zec. vi. 12; xiii. 1. It was the mighty burden of these prophetic bodings which Jesus undertook to bear, when he assumed the high-priesthood of our profession, as well as of that implied in the handwriting of ordinances going before, which with manifold iteration pressed the claims of a debt that was never paid; and with perfect consciousness of all that it called him to do and to suffer, he said, as he entered on the work—"Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not, but a body has thou prepared me: Lo, I come (in the volume of the book it is written of me) to do thy will, O God," He. x. 5, 7. So completely in this did Jesus stand alone, that the work was already done before he could get men distinctly to apprehend the necessity of its accomplishment. But then at length the light broke upon their minds; the conviction forced itself upon them, that here also the true idea was realized in its perfection; since the priest and the offering, the person to intercede and the ground of the intercession being one and the same, and that one of spotless purity and infinite worth, there could be nothing wanting to insure full and perpetual acceptance with the Father. So, "by one offering he has for ever perfected them that are sanctified," and on the ground of that all-sufficient offering, "he is able to save to the uttermost them that come unto God by him."

The KINGLY office of Christ so far differed from the priestly, that it formed the matter of universal expectation—all looked for him as the King of Zion. This had been so prominently announced in the ancient prophecies, and was also associated in so palpable a manner with the circumstances of his appearance in the world, that a certain unanimity could scarcely be avoided. The angel who gave intimation of his birth to Mary, declared that the throne of his father David should be given to him; and the eastern magi, who came to do homage to him at his birth, inquired after him, and when they found where he was, did obeisance to him in the specific character of King of the Jews, Lu. i. 32; Mat. ii. 2, seq. When the time approached for his manifesting himself to Israel, the era was heralded by his fore-runner as that which was to be signalized by the setting up of the kingdom of heaven, and he therefore, who was at hand to do it, could himself be no other than the proper king. The same truth breaks out at intervals throughout the whole of his career, and formed the most prominent part of the good confession which he witnessed before Pilate and sealed with his blood, Jn. xviii. 36, 37. There was no question then whether he was to be a king, but only what sort of king. Here it was that the difference between Jesus and others discovered itself, and that his incomparably deeper insight into the mind of God and the real nature of things shone fully out. The kingdom over which he was to preside could be no merely terrene dominion or worldly lordship, such as they in their superficial earthliness imagined; it must stand in fitting accordance with the other parts of his office, and be, indeed, the natural outgoing and result of the revelations of divine truth which he brought as the prophet, and the priceless redemption from the evil of sin which he executed as the high-priest of his people. Like these, therefore, it must be predominantly spiritual in its character and agencies—a kingdom, as he himself testified, founded in the truth, and through the truth operating upon the hearts and consciences of men. Thus only could he make them willing subjects of the King of heaven, and provide for himself a dominion, such as it became him the Lord of glory to wield, and as he could render it, wherever it prevailed, a kingdom of righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. That he ever had any other plan in view respecting his kingdom, as has sometimes of late been asserted, is devoid of all proof. In his sermon on the mount, in his parables, as well as in the whole tenor and spirit of his life, he made it evident that he had no sympathy with the carnal views of his countrymen, and that his kingdom was to be one rooting itself within, and developing itself in all that is holy and good.

It thus appears that the offices of Christ form one complex and closely related whole—each, when rightly understood, is the necessary complement of the other; and though they were from the first contemplated as essential to the work of Christ, and as such had formed the theme of prophetic intimation, yet in the idea conceived of them, and the manner in which that idea was actually realized, we perceive undoubted evidence of a divine elevation and a true originality. The appearance in this world of one capable of forming so lofty a conception of his office, as the foundation of a new standing and destiny for fallen man, and embodying the conception in the actual doing and suffering of what it required at his hands, was an event of surpassing interest and importance; it was like the bursting forth of a fresh spring-time upon the world, or, as it is represented in Scripture itself, the commencement of a new creation. To come forth as one not despairing of the thorough reformation of the world—notwithstanding the foul abominations that were feeding upon its vitals, and the many fruitless efforts that had been made to rectify them—was itself matter of admiration. But it was greatly more so to exhibit in his own spirit and behaviour the living exemplar of what a world so renovated would be—to be cognizant of all sin, and yet himself free from any taint of its impurities—in thought and deed perfectly conformed to the holiness of God; and not only this in himself, but generously braving the mighty task of undertaking to make as many as would submit to him partakers of the same excellence, heirs of the same glorious destiny. This was emphatically a new thing in the world, and was fitted to produce, as it actually has produced, a mighty revolution in individual and social life, such as may well serve for a pledge and earnest of what still remains to be accomplished. It was of necessity that he, who had charged himself with the work, should be without spot or blemish. For, as has been justly said, "the real manifestation of divine grace can exist only in one in whom the one spring of action is the fulness of love which he derives from perfect fellowship with God, and in whom this forms the principle which regulates his whole life. The power of a new life in God can proceed only from that source in which all the creative power of this life lies. Now this is the idea of a sinless and holy personality. Were there not at the head of the Christian religion such a being, it were inconceivable how it could be eminently the religion of reconciliation and redemption, or how the deep-rooted consciousness of being reconciled and redeemed should have come to form the fundamental belief of the Christian world. With such a being at the head of Christianity this is at once explained" (Ulmann's Sinlessness of Jesus, p. 122). It is explained, if—but only if—along with the existence of the perfect life that is in Jesus, we take into account the provision he made for its communication to the souls of men. Like the corn of wheat that must fall into the ground and die before it can bring forth fruit, so Jesus had not only to be in himself the Living One, but also to die in the room of others, that he might communicate to them of the life that is in himself; and so, when we combine with the properties of his person and the faultless excellencies of his life, the perfection also of his mediatorial work, there is everything that is required to render him the stay and the hope of mankind.

DATES AND PERIODS CONNECTED WITH THE HISTORY OF JESUS CHRIST.—The common era of A.D. was fixed by the Abbot Dionysius Exiguus in the sixth century, and assumes the birth of Jesus to have taken place in the year of the city Rome 754. A more careful examination, however, of the historical data proves this to have been about four years too late. (1.) For, in the first place, the gospel narrative leaves no room to doubt that the birth of Jesus took place before the death of Herod the Great. But there is good reason to believe that Herod died in the year of Rome 750, and shortly after a noticeable eclipse of the moon that took place that year (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 4, 4; 8, 1; 9, 3). (2.) This date is confirmed by the historical circumstances given by Luke, ch. iii. 1, 2, in connection with the Baptist's entering on his public ministry, presently after which Jesus is affirmed to have been about thirty years of age, ch. iii. 23. The most specific of the circumstances noted is, that it was the fifteenth year of Tiberius. Augustus had died in the year of the city 767; if 15 were added to that, we should have 782, and again 30 subtracted, for the approximate period of Christ's birth, we should have the year of the city 752. This brings the matter two years farther down than the former date; but then it is known that Tiberius was associated in the imperial government with Augustus two years before the death of the latter; and if these two years are included, as is most probable, then the fifteenth of Tiberius would be coincident with the year of the city 750. (3.) An argument is also deducible from the presidentialhip of Cyrenius, as mentioned in Lu. ii. 2; for according to recent investigations, this could not have commenced earlier than about four years before the common era of A.D., or lasted longer than two years. But this cannot be exhibited in detail here. (See under CYRENIUS.) (4.) The early Christian fathers, Irenæus, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, and of later date Eusebius and Epiphanius, concur in placing it in 751 or 752. They do not, however, appear to have investigated the matter very carefully, and rested chiefly upon the fifteenth of Tiberius. Indeed, it is scarcely possible to determine quite exactly the time; but if we should say not less than three, and not more than four years before the common era, we must be on either side within the mark. Pretty long discussions upon the subject may be found in Fynee Clinton's Fasti Romani; Ideler, Handb. der Chronologie, vol. ii.; Greswell's Harmony, vol. i.; Lardner's Credibility, vol. i.

The season of the year when Christ was born has also, it is now generally admitted, been wrongly fixed. It was a considerable time before any day appears to have been observed as an anniversary; and when an observance of that description began, churches and individuals in different parts of the world differed from each other regarding the proper time. The Eastern church for a time coupled together the birth and baptism of Jesus, and celebrated both on the 6th of January as the Epiphany. Ultimately the Romish tradition came to prevail which connected it with the 25th of December. The circumstance that shepherds were found by night tending their flocks on the plains of Bethlehem, when the event happened, is alone decisive evidence against this opinion; for there the nights are greatly too cold at that season of the year to admit of such a practice. The custom now is, and doubtless was also then, for the shepherds to begin to tent it with their flocks about the vernal equinox, and to cease doing so shortly after the autumnal. One or other of these periods has been thought the most probable by independent inquirers; and the greater probability, we think, on general grounds, is in favour of the vernal equinox. Such is the opinion also of Mr. Greswell (Harmony, vol. 1. p. 361, seq.), though several of his grounds appear fanciful. There are historical probabilities, however, that seem to point in that direction; and surely, if the event was ordered, as we may well conceive it might be, so as to present some fitting correspondence between the natural and the supernatural, no period of the year could be imagined more appropriate for the birth of Him who was to make all things new, than the fresh and joyous season of spring, when the deadness of winter has gone, and everything is ready to burst forth into leaf and blossom. That season also presented a historical, as well as a natural correspondence; for it was then that the birth-day of Israel as a people had commenced, and in the feast of the passover had its ever-recurring commemoration. It was worthy of divine wisdom to arrange it, that the event, which was to constitute the new and higher life-era, should take place about the same period; and the coincidence might even serve as one of the incidental circumstances that gave indication of the great reality being come.

That the birth of Jesus Christ, therefore, took place in the year of Rome 750, and most probably in the spring of that year, may be regarded as the nearest approximation to the truth we can now arrive at. But the exact year of his death is still matter of dispute, and will probably continue to be so. This arises chiefly from the vague manner in which one of the feasts occurring during his ministry is indicated by St. John; that, namely, noticed at ch. vi. 1, at which he healed the poor paralytic beside the pool of Bethesda. If this feast was the passover, as is believed by many of the ablest commentators, then his entire ministry must have extended over three years—about three and a half—as in that case there would be three passovers, including the last, on which he was present at Jerusalem, J. a. u. 13;

v. 1; xiii. 1, and one which apparently he did not attend on account of the violence exhibited toward him by the Jews about Jerusalem, Jn. vi. 4; vii. 1. Not a few, however, contend for the feast mentioned in Jn. v. 1 being that, not of the passover, but of Purim, which took place in the latter part of February or beginning of March—in which case the passover referred to at Jn. vi. 4, may have been that of the April following, and the whole duration of the public ministry of Jesus may not have exceeded three and a half years. Wieseler (Chron. Synops. p. 202, ss.), among others, strenuously adopts this view; but in doing so, he crowds the events of one of the most important stages of Christ's ministry into what one cannot but feel to be an incredibly short period. He would throw all that is recorded between Mat. iv. 12 and ch. xv., into the transactions of one or two months, placing also the Baptist's imprisonment in March, and his death in April of the same year. This is against all probability; and the grounds of the calculation are in many respects extremely fanciful. It is plain, that after the first passover which our Lord attended subsequent to his baptism, he continued for a considerable time about the Jordan and in Judea, Jn. iii. 22; iv. 1-3; and that he should, in the course of what remained of the year, have himself performed three distinct missionary tours through Galilee, Mat. iv. 23-25; Lu. viii. 1; Mat. ix. 35-38, beside sending out his disciples on a similar tour, Mat. x. 1, delivering the sermon on the mount, and doing many of his mightiest works—all which would be necessary on the supposition in question—is so extremely unlikely, that nothing but the most urgent reasons could commend it to our belief. It is impossible to speak of more than probabilities, where the data are so comparatively few and general; but they seem decidedly greater on the side of those who hold that the feast in Jn. v. 1 was a passover; that there were consequently three passovers in our Lord's ministry, beside the one at which he died, or in all four; and that his death took place in his thirty-fourth year. If his birth occurred, as we suppose, in u.c. 750, and his baptism in u.c. 780, then his death would fall in u.c. 784.

As all the more important incidents and transactions belonging to our Lord's earthly career will be found noticed in connection with the persons and places with which they are respectively associated, it is deemed unnecessary to give anything like a detailed outline of his life on earth. (See, for example, JOSEPH, MARY, CYRENIUS, HEROD, TEMPTATION (THE), RESURRECTION, DEMONIAL POSSESSIONS AND CURES, TRANSFIGURATION, &c.)

CHRISTIANS (Χριστιανός), the now prevailing designation of the followers of Jesus, and first applied to them, we are told, in Antioch, Ac. xi. 26. This appellation, on the part of the Antiochians, has often been ascribed to the light and sarcastic humour of the heathen population, and consequently regarded as, in its origin, something like a nickname. But there is no valid ground for this; and when the relation between Christ and his people, in respect to what constituted him emphatically the Christ, is duly taken into account, as stated in the preceding article, one might be inclined to say, that if the name did not actually arise within the Christian community, it ought to have done so. Indeed, the probability is on the side of its having actually so arisen. We cannot otherwise account for its ready adoption by believers, and its almost universal application. St. Peter uses it as the fit designation of Christ's people—as a term for such already in familiar use, 1 Pe. iv. 16; and certainly not in any slighting, but a most deeply serious mood, it was used by king Agrippa, when he exclaimed, "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian!" Ac. xxvi. 28; but when a contemptuous spirit sought vent to itself, it betook to such epithets as Nazarenes, Galileans, that were plainly meant to cast upon Master and disciple a common reproach.

CHRONICLES, THE BOOKS OF. This great historical work stands last in order and forms but one book in the Hebrew canon. Its arrangement after the books of Kings, and its division into two parts, is the work of the LXX. This division was adopted by the early printer Bomberg, in his editions of the Hebrew Bible, and is now followed generally in the printed text and in all the versions.

I. Name and Contents.—The Hebrew name of the book is דִּבְרֵי הַיָּמִים (dibrē hayyamim), words, or rather acts of the days, much the same as "journals" or "annals." The title given to it by the LXX was Παράλειπόμενα, "things which are left," an ambiguous, and therefore unsuitable designation, whether it be taken, with Movers and Hävernick, as denoting "remains" of other historical works, or with De Wette and others, as "things omitted," understanding it of the writer's design, which is not properly the case, to supplement the omissions of the earlier canonical histories. The usual, and very appropriate name Chronicles, "Chronicon totius divinae historiae," was given to it by Jerome.

According to its contents the book forms three great parts, thus:—

1. Genealogical tables, interspersed with geographical, historical, and other remarks, 1 Ch. 1.-ix., viz.—

The generations of Adam to Abraham, ch. 1. 1-28; of Abraham and Esau, ch. 1. 28-64; of Jacob and his son Judah, ch. 2.; of king David, ch. 3.; of Judah in another line, ch. 4. 1-23; of Simeon, ch. 4. 24-43; of Reuben, Gad, and Manasse, with historical and topographical notices, ch. 5.; two lists of the sons of Levi, ch. 6. 1-30; genealogical registers of Heman and Asaph, ch. 6. 31-43; of Merari, ch. 6. 44-50; of Aaron, with list of the residences of the Levitical families, ch. 6. 50-81; list of the sons of Issachar, ch. 7. 1-5; of Benjamin and Naphtali, ch. 7. 6-13; of Manasse, ch. 7. 14-19; of Ephraim, with notices of their possessions, ch. 7. 20-29; of Asher, ch. 7. 30-40; a second list of the descendants of Benjamin, with the genealogy of Saul, ch. 8.; list of families dwelling at Jerusalem, with intimation of the tribes to which they belonged, ch. 9.

2. The history of the reigns of David and Solomon, 1 Ch. 11.-2 Ch. 36., the narrative beginning with the disastrous engagement with the Philistines, wherein Saul and his three sons perished. The remark that "Saul died for his transgression which he committed against the Lord," 1 Ch. 11. 13, introduces the call of David to the throne, ver. 14.

3. The history of the kingdom of Judah—excluding that of Israel—from the separation under Rehoboam to the destruction of the Jewish state by the Chaldeans, 2 Ch. 1.-xxvii., with a notice, in the last two verses, of the permission granted by Cyrus to the exiles to return home and rebuild their temple.

Besides important notices of an historical character not found in the other books, there are others of a doctrinal and devotional nature. There is one psalm,

1 Ch. xvi. 7-36, the first which David assigned for public worship, ver. 7.

II. Relation of Chronicles to the earlier Canonical Books.—From the analysis of contents now presented it will be seen that the Chronicles traverse nearly the whole field of Old Testament history, and must, in consequence, present many points of contact with the earlier Scriptures, historical and prophetic, more especially however with the books of Samuel and of Kings.

1. Sources of the Chronicles.: Whether the older canonical Scriptures, or original independent documents!—With regard to the genealogical tables in the first nine chapters, this question is easily settled; for although the genealogies of 1 Ch. i.-ii. 2 are substantially the same as in Genesis, greatly abridged, and with the omission of nearly all the historical notices, these matters being already so well known as to render repetition unnecessary—a strong, because indirect, argument for the authority of the Mosaic writings—yet the greater portion of those which follow is found nowhere else. Even in this abridgment of the older genealogies there is manifested much independence. In proof of this it is only necessary to observe some of the appended notices, e.g. 1 Ch. i. 51, "Hadad died also," an addition to Ge. xxxvi. 39, it being inferred by Hengstenberg (Geneln. of the Pentateuch, vol. II. p. 248), and others, from the latter passage, that Hadad was still living in the time of Moses. After 1 Ch. ii. 2 the genealogical lists are interspersed with fuller details, and the work attains to more completeness and independence. It is difficult, however, to determine how far the present books of Samuel and of Kings were made use of by the writer of the Chronicles. Titles of books specially referred to as authorities by the writer:—

- (1.) The words (or acts, תַּרְבִּיטִים, dibrē) of Samuel, of Nathan, and of Gad, 1 Ch. xxi. 29.
- (2.) The words (acts) of Nathan, the prophecy of Abijah, the visions of Iddo, 2 Ch. ix. 29.
- (3.) The book of the kings of Judah and Israel, variously referred to as (a), The book of the kings of Judah and Israel, 2 Ch. xxv. 26; xxxi. 32; (b), The book of the kings of Israel and Judah, 2 Ch. xxvii. 7; xxxv. 27; xxxvi. 8; (c), The book of the kings of Judah and Israel—the Hebrew title slightly different from (a), 2 Ch. xvi. 11.
- (4.) The book of the kings of Israel, 2 Ch. xx. 34; xxxiii. 18.
- (5.) The midrash (story, E. V.), of the book of the Kings, 2 Ch. xxiv. 27.
- (6.) The book (acts) of the prophet Shemaiah, and of the seer Iddo, 2 Ch. xii. 15.
- (7.) The midrash of the prophet Iddo, 2 Ch. xiii. 22.
- (8.) The words of Jehu, the son of Hanani, 2 Ch. xx. 34.
- (9.) The acts of Uzziah, written by the prophet Isaiah, the son of Amos, 2 Ch. xxxii. 32.
- (10.) The words of Hosai (the seers, E. V., after the LXX.), 2 Ch. xxxiii. 19.
- (11.) The chronicles of king David, 1 Ch. xxvii. 24.
- (12.) The Lamentations [of Jeremiah, but different from the canonical book], 2 Ch. xxxv. 25.
- (13.) The vision of Issiah, the son of Amos, 2 Ch. xxxii. 32; probably the canonical book of that prophet.

In addition to this ample list of authorities, reference is made to genealogical registers, 1 Ch. v. 7, 17; vii. 7, 9; ix. 1; public archives, though in some cases no doubt private documents, called in Ne. vii. 5 שֵׁפֶר הַיָּמִים (sepher hay- yachas), "book of the genealogies." It is well known how careful the Jews were as to this matter; and there is evidence, Est. ii. 22, of the inconveniences it occasioned them when they could not satisfactorily establish their descent. It is also easy to see the purpose which, in divine providence, this was intended to subserve.

If any value is to be attached to this history, it is unquestionable that those documents must have been in existence at the time, and that they were consulted by the writer of the Chronicles. By no ingenuity can it be shown that these writings, or the greater portion of them, were the present books of Samuel and Kings, as De Wette, Movers, and others maintain; for not only are the titles too numerous and varied for that supposition, but they are referred to for further information, on matters entirely omitted in the books of Samuel and Kings, or if mentioned, yet with greater brevity than in the Chronicles. If further proof were wanting of the independence of the other historical books which marks the Chronicles, it would be found in the diversities by which they are severally distinguished, amounting, as sometimes alleged, to contradictions, and certainly to divergences only explicable by difference of sources, and a selection of materials consonant with the design of the respective writers.

2. Relation of Contents.—Still, however, the relation of the Chronicles to the books of Samuel and Kings is very great. In the history of David, of Solomon, and the kings of Judah, there are upwards of forty sections in common, only occasionally distinguished by a different arrangement. But, on the other hand, many particulars, more especially in the lives of David and Solomon, recorded in these books, are entirely passed over in the Chronicles, and in their stead are given notices of the state of religion and of public worship.

(1.) The principal omissions in the Chronicles, are: The family scene between Michal and David, 2 Sa. vi. 20-25; David's kindness to Mephibosheth, 2 Sa. ix.; his adultery with Bathsheba, 2 Sa. xi. 2-xii. 25; his son Amnon's defilement of Tamar, and the rebellion of Absalom, 2 Sa. xiv.-xix.; the revolt of Sheba, 2 Sa. xx.; the delivering up of Saul's sons to the Gibeonites, 2 Sa. xxi. 1-14; war with the Philistines, 2 Sa. xxi. 15-17; David's psalm of thanksgiving, and last words, 2 Sa. xxii.-xxiii. 7; Adonijah's attempted usurpation, and the anointing of Solomon, 1 Ki. i.; David's last will, 1 Ki. ii. 1-9; Solomon's throne established by the punishment of his opponents, 1 Ki. ii. 13-46; his marriage with Pharaoh's daughter, 1 Ki. iii. 1; his wise decision, 1 Ki. iii. 16-28; his officers, glory, and wisdom, 1 Ki. iv.; his strange wives, and idolatry, 1 Ki. xi. 1-40. The entire omission of the history of the kingdom of Israel. (See on this and the particulars which immediately follow, Kell, Einleitung, p. 480-483, Frankf. 1853.)

(2.) Matter peculiar to the Chronicles.—List of the heroes who came to David at Ziklag, and of the hosts who came to Hebron to make him king, 1 Ch. xii.; David's preparation for building the temple, ch. xxii.; the enumeration and order of the Levites and priests, ch. xxiii.-xxvi.; the order of the army and its captains, ch. xxvii.; David's directions in public assembly shortly before his death, ch. xxviii. xxx.; Rehoboam's fortifications, his reception of the priests and Levites who fled from the kingdom of Israel, his wives and children, 2 Ch. xi. 5-34; Abijah's war with Jeroboam, ch. xiii. 3-20; notice of Abijah's wives and children, ch. xiii. 31; Asa's works in fortifying his kingdom, and his victory over Zerah the Cushite, ch. xiv. 3-14; a prophecy of Azariah which induced Asa to put down idolatry, ch. xv. 1-15; address of the prophet Hanani, ch. xvi. 7-10; Jehoshaphat's endeavours to restore the worship of Jehovah, his power and riches, ch. xvii. 2-xviii. 1; his instructions and ordinances as to judgment, ch. xix.; his victory over the Ammonites and Moabites, ch. xx. 1-30; his provision for his sons, and their death by his son and successor, Jehoram, ch. xxi. 2-4; Jehoram's idolatry and punishment, ch. xxi. 11-19; death of the high-priest Jehoiada, and the apostasy of Joash, ch. xxiv. 15-22; Amasiah's warlike preparations, ch. xxv. 5-10; his idolatry, ch. xxv. 14-16; Uzziah's wars, victories, and forces, ch. xxvi. 6-15; Jotham's war with the Ammonites, ch. xxvii. 4-6; Hezekiah's reformation and passover, ch. xxxix. 3-xxxi. 21; his riches, ch. xxxii. 17-30; Manasseh's captivity, release, and reformation, ch. xxxiii. 11-17.

(3.) Matter more fully related in Chronicles.—The list of David's heroes, 1 Ch. xii. 11-47, of which the names, vs. 42-47, are wanting in 2 Sa. xxiii. 8, &c.; the removal of the ark from Kirjath-jearim to Mount Zion, 1 Ch. xiii.; rv. 2-24; xvi. 4-43, comp. with 2 Sa. vi.; the candlesticks, tables, and courts of the temple, 2 Ch. iv. 6-9, comp. with 1 Ki. vii. 38, 39; description of the brazen scaffold on which Solomon knelt, 2 Ch. vi. 12, 13, comp. with 1 Ki. viii. 22; in Solomon's prayer, the passage 2 Ch. vi. 41, 42, from Ps. cxxxii. 7-9; mention of the fire from heaven consuming the burnt-offering, 2 Ch. vii. 1, &c.; enlargement of the divine promise, 1 Ch. vii. 12-16, comp. with 1 Ki. ix. 3; Shishak's invasion of Judea; the address of the prophet Shemaiah, 2 Ch. xii. 2-5, comp. with 1 Ki. xiv. 23; Amasiah's victory over the Edomites, 2 Ch. xxv. 11-16, comp. with 2 Ki. xiv. 7; Uzziah's leprosy; its cause, 2 Ch. xxvi. 16-21, comp. with 2 Ki. xv. 5; the passover under Josiah, 2 Ch. xxxv. 2-19, comp. with 2 Ki. xxiii. 21, &c.

3. Design of the Chronicles.—An examination of these particulars of omissions, additions, and variations, as compared with the earlier historical books, will enable the reader to ascertain the manner in which the writer of the Chronicles used the old memoirs to which he refers, and the special object of his history. The particulars in which he varies from the earlier historical books are not accidental, but are strongly indicative of a plan. This is particularly seen in the additions and reflections introduced into his narrative, indicating strong theocratic views. See, for instance, how he dwells on the history of David, Asa, Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, and like-minded kings, adding many important particulars to the not unfrequently abbreviated statements in the parallel books. But still more does this appear in the entire omission of aught that respects the kingdom of Israel, save only the intimation in the genealogical tables that Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh were carried away captive by the Assyrians because of their sins, 1 Ch. v. 25, 26.

It is a very superficial criticism which regards these additions as indicative merely of a Levitical spirit, and the omission again of some particulars in the life of David, and other kings of Judah, as simply apologetic; while it would account for the exclusion of all reference to the kingdom of the ten tribes, from the hatred with which they were regarded by their brethren of Judah. It is certainly more reasonable to conclude that the additional details, the specification of the Levitical and priestly functions according to their original arrangements, were designed to adapt the history to the altered circumstances of the times, to the exigencies introduced by the entire overthrow of the one kingdom, and the seventy years' desolation of the other; and that the writer, through the teaching of the divine Spirit, had been led to a more direct application of the promises made to David, and to discern in these alone the future restoration and stability of his country. This indeed is a marked characteristic of the sacred literature of the restoration period, and it would be instructive to trace how the influence of the captivity, with its preceding and concomitant providences, conduced to this end. These principles operated strongly in the writer of the Chronicles. Thus 1 Ch. xvii. 11-14, comp. with 2 Sa. vii. 12-16, manifests more distinctly the Messianic character of the promises made to David, the views no doubt being corrected by the calamities which had overtaken the nation and the royal house. The natural seed of David is lost sight of in the spiritual, so that there is no longer reference to a forsaking of Jehovah's law, anticipated in the message of Nathan, as given in 2 Sa. vii. 14, nor intimation of the punishment by which defection should inevitably be followed. So also with David's thankful acknowledgment to God for this gracious promise: "And this was yet a small thing in thy sight, O Lord God; but thou hast spoken also of thy servant's house for a great while to come: and is this the manner of man ^{תֹרֵר הָאָדָם} torath hāadam, the law of the man), O Lord God!" 2 Sa. vii. 10; the last clause of which is thus given in 1 Ch. xvii. 17, "Thou hast regarded me according to the order of the man from above ^{כְּתֹרֵר הָאָדָם הַמֵּלְאָכִי} ketor hāadam hamma'alah, O Lord God." (See Pye Smith, Script. Test. i. p. 171, 4th ed.) But the Messianic aspirations are still more marked in the genealogical tables, where it may be seen that while no place is given to some of the tribes, as Dan and Zebulun, the genealogy of the tribe of Judah, in the line of David, is traced from Adam down to the writer's own time, 1 Ch. i. 1-27; ii. 1, 3-15; iii., extending to a point beyond any other Old Testament record of a strictly historical nature, and so forming the last Old Testament link of that genealogical chain which is resumed and completed in the New Testament, Mat. i. In particular, the important note in these seemingly dry registers, 1 Ch. v. 2, "Judah prevailed above his brethren, and of him the chief ruler," i.e. the chief ruler or prince was destined to spring (not as in E. V. came) from Judah, in evident allusion to Ge. xlix. 10, on which see also 1 Ch. xxviii. 4, where David recognizes the choice of Judah as "ruler."

Other peculiarities distinguishing the book of Chronicles, and fitting it for the altered circumstances in the time of its composition, are the substitution of modern and more common expressions for such as had become unusual or obsolete; compare in the original 1 Ch. x. 12 with 1 Sa. xxxi. 12; 1 Ch. xv. 29 with 2 Sa. vi. 16, &c., particularly the substitution for the old names of places, those which were in use in the writer's own day: thus, Gezer, 1 Ch. xx. 4, instead of Gob, 2 Sa. xxi. 18. Abel Maim, Abel on the water (Merom), 2 Ch. xvi. 4, instead of Abell-beth-maachah, 1 Ki. xv. 20. So also the omission of geographical names which had become unknown, or had ceased to be of interest, as Helam, 2 Sa. x. 16, 17, omitted in 1 Ch. xix. 17; so also Zair, 2 Ki. viii. 21, comp. with 1 Ch. xxi. 2. See particularly 2 Sa. xxiv. 4-8, comp. with 1 Ch. xxi. 4. There is also the endeavour to substitute more definite expressions for such as were indefinite, and so possibly ambiguous, as 2 Ch. xxxviii. 3, comp. with 2 Ki. xvi. 3; and 2 Ch. xxv. 24, comp. with 2 Ki. xxii. 16.

III. Credibility.—The credibility of the Chronicles has been greatly contested by rationalistic writers, but by none with more tenacity than De Wette, first in his Beiträge zur Einleitung, Halle, 1806, i. p. 1-132, and subsequently in the successive editions of his Einleitung, where he has brought together every sort of difficulty and alleged contradiction, many of which rest only on assumptions, which would not be tolerated if applied to any other than a biblical writer. It indeed cannot be denied that many difficulties do exist in this portion of Scripture, and not a few apparent contradictions between its statements and those of the other historical books, particularly as regards proper names and numbers, but which, even if they cannot be satisfactorily explained, scarcely warrant the calling in question the sincerity or the credibility of the writer. Thus, for instance, it is objected that 1 Ch. ii. 6 is a false combination of 1 Ki. v. 11 [iv. 31]; but nothing is more common than the recurrence of the same names in different families and tribes, and at different periods; and although Hävernick unnecessarily admits that some of the names in the two passages are identical, it would certainly indicate rare confusion on the part of the writer of the Chronicles to bring together times and persons so far apart from one another. Ethan the Esarathite, of the family of Merari, 1 Ch. vi. 20 [44, E.V.], was one of David's masters of song, 1 Ch. xv. 17, and the author of Ps. lxxxix. Heman, also an Esarathite, and author of Ps. lxxxviii., was a leader of David's sacred choir, 1 Ch. xv. 17, and it is utterly inconceivable that persons, as it would appear, so well known to the writer of the Chronicles, should so inconsiderately be reckoned among the posterity of Judah, and assigned to a time so long antecedent to that of David.

There are however real difficulties, particularly in the genealogical tables, and also in various numerical statements, and these, it may be supposed, arise in a great measure from corruption of the text; for it is in such cases that there is the greatest facility for the rise and the perpetuation of false readings, the context affording little aid for their detection, or rectification if detected. The text of the Chronicles furnishes many instances of such corruptions, although in several cases, where it differs from the corresponding passages in the books of Samuel and of Kings, it is just as possible that it shows the true reading. A remarkable case is 1 Ch. vi. 13 [28], "And the sons of Samuel; the first-born Vaahni and Abiah," comp. with 1 Sa. viii. 2, "Now the name of his first-born was Joel, and the name of his second Abiah." It is easy to see how this contradiction has arisen. The name Joel had fallen out of 1 Ch. vi. 13, and some transcriber, seeing the necessity for some name after "the first-born," transformed וַחַשְׁתִּי (rehashenti), "and the second," into a proper name, Vaahni. The mistake is as old as the LXX.: ὁ πρωτότοκος Σαυὶ καὶ Ἀβιά. The Syriac and Arabic read as in Samuel (Jour. of Sac. Lit. April, 1852, p. 198). In 2 Ch. xiii. 2 the mother of Abijah is named "Michaiah, the daughter of Uriel of Gibeah," but in 1 Ki. xv. 2, 10, 13 "Maachah, the daughter of Abishalom." The LXX. and Syriac have Maachah also in 2 Ch., which must have been the correct reading. As the mother of Abijah is designated the daughter of Absalom, this may mean no more than grand-daughter, Uriel being the husband of Absalom's daughter; but as Abijah's wife, and the mother of Asa, is also called Maachah, 1 Ki. xv. 13; 2 Ch. xv. 16, it may be that in 2 Ch. xiii. 2 the name of Asa's mother is written instead of that of Abijah's.

1. Passages where the readings in Chronicles are obviously corrupt: sometimes the work itself showing the erroneous nature of the reading. Thus, 2 Ch. xxxi. 2, Ahaziah's age when he began to reign is stated at 42 years; 2 Ki. viii. 26 makes it 22, and with this agree all the versions, whereas the reading of Chronicles is confirmed only by the Vulgate. As Jehoram, the father of Ahaziah, lived only 40 years, 2 Ch. xxi. 20, it is impossible that his son could have been 42 years when he began to reign. Other examples are 1 Ch. xviii. 4, comp. with 2 Sa. viii. 4; 2 Ch. iii. 15; iv. 5, comp. with 1 Ki. vii. 15, 26; 1 Ch. xi. 11, comp. with 2 Sa. xxiii. 8; 1 Ch. xxi. 12, comp. with 2 Sa. xxiv. 13; 2 Ch. ix. 25, comp. with 1 Ki. v. 6.

2. Passages where the correct reading is that of the Chronicles. The father of Amasa is designated in 1 Ch. ii. 17, "Jether, the Ishmaelite;" in 2 Sa. xvii. 25, "Ithra, an Israelite." Examples of numerical statements: 1 Ch. xviii. 4, comp. with 2 Sa. viii. 4; 1 Ch. xix. 18, comp. with 2 Sa. x. 18; 1 Ch. xxi. 12, comp. with 2 Sa. xxiv. 13; 2 Ch. iii. 15, and 1 Ki. vii. 16, comp. with 2 Ki. xxv. 17; the height of the "chapters" on the brazen pillars, as given in the first two passages, is confirmed by Je. lii. 22.

3. Passages where the correct reading is doubtful: 2 Ch. ii. 2, 17 [18], comp. with 1 Ki. v. 30 [16]; 2 Ch. viii. 10, comp. with 1 Ki. ix. 23; 2 Ch. viii. 18, comp. with 1 Ki. ix. 28. (On the numerical discrepancies, see Reinke, Beiträge zur Erklärung des alt. Testaments, vol. 1 1 ste. Abhand.)

4. Passages erroneously regarded as contradictory: Between 2 Ch. xxviii. 20 and 2 Ki. xvi. 7-9, there is no contradiction, as they relate to different stages of the war; and it is quite possible that the mercenary Tiglath-pileser from an ally became an opponent; a fact even intimated in 2 Ki. xvi. 18, by Ahaz's removal of a gallery which might afford access to an enemy, "from the presence of (or for fear of, מִפְּנֵי, mippene) the king of Assyria." In 1 Ch. xi. 23, "An Egyptian, a man of great stature, five cubits high, and in the Egyptian's hand was a spear like a weaver's beam;" 2 Sa. xxxiii. 21, "An Egyptian, a goodly man (יֵשׁוּעַ בֶּן-נֹחַדִּי, ish mare, a man of appearance), and the Egyptian had a spear in his hand." The explanation of Reinke is exceedingly forced; and is in fact unnecessary, for there is no contradiction; the one passage being more specific, but still in accordance with and its purport implied in the other: the Egyptian's noticeable appearance was his stature, with which also his spear corresponded. 2 Ch. xxxiv. 3-7 places the reformation under Josiah in the twelfth year of his age, while 2 Ki. xxii. 8 assigns to it the eighteenth. Thinius stoutly opposes the statement in the Chronicles; but Bertheau satisfactorily shows that the two statements are perfectly reconcilable, 2 Ch. xxxiv. 3-7 referring only to the beginning of the work of reformation, while the other passage points to some great progress in it, the rooting out of idolatry. According to the one statement, the work of reformation was begun in the twelfth, according to the other it was finished in the eighteenth year. This is required by 2 Ch. xxxv. 19. The same with many others.

The discrepancies, even were there no satisfactory solution, cannot greatly affect the character of the writer of the Chronicles: for first, the probability as regards correctness will be found on the part of the later writer, who, having the earlier works before him, would not unnecessarily, in matters of fact, and plain numerical statements, where differences and contradictions were so easily discernible, vary from the earlier accounts favoured by the authority arising from age and prior acceptance. There can be no question, moreover, that many of the discrepancies are owing to the fault of copyists; while in some they are the result of the different views and designs of the respective writers, or the brevity of their statements.

In proof, however, of the accuracy of the Chronicles, the following particulars are worthy of consideration:

First, The writer is exceedingly definite in his statements. Thus the time when it occurred to David to build the temple of the Lord is indicated, 2 Sa. vii. 1, "It came to pass when the king sat (כִּי יָשָׁב) ki yashab) in his house," &c., but more definitely stated in 1 Ch. xvii. 1 (כִּי יָשָׁב kadsher yashab) "as soon as he sat," &c. (see Hengstenberg, Christol. i. p. 144. Berlin, 1854), while the omission of the words, "and the Lord had given him rest round about from all his enemies," removes the chronological difficulty in that statement. Of his accuracy, again, in the genealogical notices, the following example may suffice. In 1 Ch. ii. 16, mention is made of two sisters of David, Abigail and Zeruiah, the latter of whom was the mother of Joab, Abishai, and Asahel, who are never designated after their father, but always after their more illustrious mother, 2 Sa. ii. 18; xxi. 17, &c. Amasa is referred to as a blood relation of David, 2 Sa. xix. 14; according to 2 Sa. xvii. 25, Amasa was a son of Abigail, and she sister of Zeruiah, the mother of Joab; but the daughter of Nahash, not of Jesse, and thus only the half-sister of David. Therefore it is that, in the genealogy of Jesse, 1 Ch. ii. 13-17, she is not styled his daughter, but only referred to as the sister of David; a distinction which does not at first sight strike the reader, and the force of which could not indeed be learned without the information furnished in the book of Samuel. So also 2 Ch. vii. 7-10 explains the abbreviated statement, 1 Ki. viii. 65, and the otherwise contradictory expression "the eighth day," ver. 66—a proof how many of the discrepancies arise simply from the brevity of the statement.

Secondly, The scrupulous exactness with which the writer excerpts from the original documents, is vouched for by the fact of his sometimes retaining the very words, although involving expressions no longer applicable to his own time—a practice which, strange to say, has furnished ground to assail his accuracy. Thus the Simeonites are said to possess the seats of the Amalekites in Mount Seir, dwelling there "unto this day," 1 Ch. iv. 42, &c., although, long prior to the composition of the history, they had been removed from all their possessions. So also, in the account of the removal of the ark to Solomon's temple, it is added, "and there it is unto this day," 2 Ch. v. 9.

Lastly, but of more importance, is the indirect confirmation given to several statements in the Chronicles by other passages of Scripture. Thus, Hezekiah's preparations in fortifying Jerusalem, when threatened by Sennacherib—his stopping the fountains and "the brook that ran through the midst of the land," 2 Ch. xxxii. 1-4, are fully confirmed by Is. xxii. 8-11, and, according to Ewald, by Psalm xlvi. 13, &c.; but which Hengstenberg with more probability refers to the victory of Jehoshaphat, 2 Ch. xx. A further reference to this victory of Jehoshaphat is found in Joel iv. [iii.]; the prophetic vision resting on this history, which is thus the foundation of the divine judgment on the enemies of the theocracy. (See Hävernck, Einleitung, ii. i. p. 216.) In the reign of Jehoram the Philistines and Arabians invaded Judah, plundered the royal palace, and carried away the king's sons and wives, 2 Ch. xxi. 16, 17. To this incident the prophet Joel refers, ch. iv. [iii.] 5, 6, where the Philistines are threatened for their plundering the Lord's property, and their sale of the Israelitish captives; the same also in Am. i. 6. The Philistines, again, in the time of Ahaz, invaded the south of Judah, and took several important cities, 2 Ch. xxviii. 18. With this agrees the prophecy of Is. xiv. 28-32, which again finds its fulfilment in 2 Ki. xviii. 8.

It is important also to notice how the Chronicles form a commentary on various passages of the other books, and evince the accuracy of such statements as at first sight seem to contain discrepancies. Thus, in 2 Sa. vii. 5, no reason is assigned why David should not build the house of the Lord; and in 1 Ki. v. 17 [3], in the message of Solomon to Hiram, an external reason only is assigned, as the heathen prince could not comprehend the deeper one. This, however, is given in David's communication first to Solomon, 1 Ch. xxii. 8, and afterwards to Israel in assembly, 1 Ch. xxviii. 2. The addition, "But I have chosen Jerusalem that my name might be there," 2 Ch. vi. 8, comp. with 1 Ki. viii. 16, is exceedingly important: the choice of Jerusalem, as the centre of the theocracy, was dependent on the choice of David to be ruler over Israel—the one was included in the other, 2 Sa. vii. The truthfulness of the history may be said to be even attested by the names of the exiles born shortly before the restoration, from their so naturally reflecting the hopes which about that time must have been strongly entertained. Thus 1 Ch. iii. 19, 20: Hananiah (Jehovah's grace); Berechiah (Jehovah's blessing); Hasadiah (Jehovah's mercy); and Jushabhesed (mercy returns).

IV. Age and Author.—That the Chronicles form one of the latest of the Old Testament compositions cannot admit of doubt. Its reference to the decree of Cyrus respecting the restoration, 2 Ch. xxxvi. 22, 23, is sufficient evidence of this. There is further the circumstance that it brings down the genealogy of David, 1 Ch. iii. 19, &c., to a period admitted on all hands to be subsequent to the restoration. Indeed, according to De Wette (Einleitung, sect. 189) and others, the genealogy of David is brought down to the third generation after Nehemiah, on the assumption that Shemaiah, the son of Shecaniah, ver. 22, was a contemporary of Nehemiah, Ne. iii. 29; but, according to the best authorities, including Keil, Movers, and Hävernck, it goes no further than Pelatiah and Jesiah, ver. 21, the grandsons of Zerubbabel, the writer then adding, as they think, some names from David's surviving posterity in general. In proof of this, observe that it is not said that Shemaiah was the son of Shecaniah; indeed, the contrary is intimated, from the way in which the words "sons of" are prefixed to several of the names, but without mention of the names of such sons: all that the writer evidently meant was to enumerate the more distinguished individuals and families of the posterity of David who returned from exile, but without specifying the particular relation in which they stood to Zerubbabel. This is probably the case with the names in ver. 20, which seem to interrupt the genealogy of Zerubbabel in ver.

19, 21. With regard to Zerubbabel, the statement is express; and to show still more the writer's intimate acquaintance with, and interest in the matter, Shelomith, a daughter of Zerubbabel, is inserted. At all events, Shemaiah, ver. 22, was unquestionably not a descendant, but a contemporary of Zerubbabel: he was one of the princes who returned from exile; and his genealogy, which extends to the third generation, was parallel with that of Zerubbabel, which reaches only to the second, but coming down to the same time. The name Hattuah, ver. 22, occurs also Ezer. viii. 2, as that of a descendant of David, who returned with Ezra from Babylon: this would favour the view advanced, if the identity could be established; but for this there is no evidence. But a more important note of time is the notice in 1 Ch. ix. 17, 18, regarding the Levitical porters, "who hitherto (הָיָה עַד הַנּוֹעַן, ad henna, until now, to the time of the writer) waited in the king's gate;" and of two of which, Akkub and Talmon, mention is made in Ne. xii. 25, 26, as "keeping the ward, at the thresholds of the gates . . . in the days of Nehemiah, and of Ezra the priest the scribe."

These conclusions from historical notices are confirmed by various peculiarities of expression and by the whole literary character of the composition. Of the peculiarities marking the late age of the writer, is the term בֵּית (birah), E. V. "palace," applied to the temple, instead of the old and usual הֵקֵל (hekal). This was an imitation of the great Persian cities, in correspondence with which Jerusalem is conceived of as having its palace, afterwards called Bâpis. Another term with which the Hebrews became acquainted in Babylon was בִּזְיָא (butz), byssus, which occurs in none of the older books, notwithstanding the frequent mention of cotton, and is found only in 1 Ch. iv. 21; xv. 27; 2 Ch. v. 12, 13; Es. i. 6; and in a book written in Chaldea, Eze. xxvii. 16 (Eichhorn, Einführung, sect. 468). So also the mention of אֲדָרְכּוֹן (adarkon), E. V. "dram," but more correctly daric, 1 Ch. xxix. 7; also Ezer. ii. 66; viii. 27; Ne. vii. 70, a Persian coin, the current money of the time. Jahn (Einführung, sect. 50) refers to a remark in 2 Ch. iii. 3, that the cubit was after the "first (or old) measure," intimating that a new standard was in use in the time of the writer. The literary character of the work, in general, entirely betokens a period when the language was greatly deteriorated through foreign influences, particularly during the exile, manifesting many peculiarities of style and orthography. Many examples of the latter, as the interchange of aleph with he quiescent, may be seen on comparing the two lists of David's heroes in 1 Ch. ix. and 2 Sam. xiii. With respect, again, to the later books, more particularly that of Ezra, there are many important resemblances, a list of which may be found in Hävernick, p. 270.

This determination of the age of the composition narrows the ground of inquiry as to its authorship. The Jewish opinion that Ezra was the author of the Chronicles was universally received down to the middle of the seventeenth century, when it was called in question by the English deistical writer Hobbes, who assigned to it an earlier date. It was Spinoza who first referred it, on the contrary, to a later period than the time of Ezra, bringing it down to the time of the Maccabees, a view adopted in modern times by Gramberg, and partly by De Wette. Carpoz, Eichhorn, Hävernick, Welte, and modern writers in general, consider Ezra to be the author. Ewald (Geschichte des Volkes Israel, 2 to Anag. i. p. 253) admits that the Chronicles and the book of Ezra are by the same author, and even contends that they originally formed one work, not the production of Ezra himself, but a much later writer. Jahn denies all appearance of similarity between the Chronicles and Ezra, and ascribes the former to some unknown writer at the close of the captivity.

The identity of authorship of the books of Chronicles and Ezra can be established by numerous arguments, additional to the marks of similarity in expression already adverted to. The internal relation of the Chronicles and the book of Ezra was early recognized. This is seen from the arrangement of the two adopted by the LXX. different from that of the Jewish canon. Further, the writer of the third (apocryphal) book of Ezra has wrought up the two writings into one. The Talmud and the rabbins maintain that Ezra was the writer of the Chronicles; indeed, according to Huet (Demonst. Evangelicæ, iv. 14), "Ezram libros Paralipomenon lucubrassè, Ebreorum omnium est fama consentiens."

The conclusion of Chronicles, and the beginning of the book of Ezra, are almost identical in expression, from which it is but reasonable to infer that the one was intended to be a continuation of the other, the one history terminating with the decree for the restoration from captivity, the other narrating how that decree was obtained, and how it was carried out. Without this connection the opening words of the book of Ezra must appear exceedingly abrupt, presenting a form of commencement which is in reality only a continuation. (See Ex. i. 1.) The connection thus indicated is further evinced by the style, the manner of narration, and of regarding events from a Levitical point of view, common to the two works; the whole spirit, in fact, and characteristics are identical. Thus the frequent citations of the law, and in similar terms, as כַּמִּשְׁפָּט (kamishpat), meaning "according to the law of Moses," 1 Ch. xxiii. 31; 2 Ch. xxxv. 13; Ezer. iii. 4, yet also in Ne. viii. 18. The descriptions of the sacrificial rites are in the two books very full, and in nearly the same terms, comp. Ezer. ii. 2-5 with passages like 1 Ch. xvi. 40; 2 Ch. viii. 18; xiii. 11; so also the account of the celebration of the passover, Ezer. vi. 19, &c., and 2 Ch. xxx. 35; and the order of the Levites in charge of the temple, Ezer. iii. 8, 9; 1 Ch. xxiii. 2, 3. What presents the greatest apparent contrast in the two books is the high-priest's genealogy, in 1 Ch. vi. 1-15 in the descending line terminating with the captivity, and in Ezer. vii. 1-5 in the ascending line from that priest himself to Aaron; but a little consideration will reconcile the discrepancy. The two lists are partly parallel, and partly the one is a continuation of the other; as regards the latter point there can be no conflict, and as to the former it will be observed that the list in Ezra is considerably abridged, many links being omitted (Bertheau), and this could the more readily be done if the writer had elsewhere given a complete register. So far then for the identity of the writer of the Chronicles and of the book of Ezra; but for the proof that this was Ezra himself, "the ready scribe in the law of the Lord," reference is made to the article EZRA.

[Exegetical Helps.—The Chronicles is a portion of Scripture which, although well deserving of careful study, has been rarely made the subject of separate exposition, either in ancient or modern times. Recently, however, very valuable dissertations have appeared in defence of its credibility, rich in critical and exegetical matter; particularly so Kail's Versuch über die Bücher der Chronik, Berlin, 1833; Movers' Untersuchungen ab. die bibl. Chronik, Bonn, 1834; and the portion of Häverniok's Einleitung in das alte Test. Erlang. 1839, II. i. sect. 172-181, devoted to this subject. The parallel passages in Samuel and Kings furnish much aid to the expositor; at the same time, the differences thus presented give rise to some of his greatest difficulties. Next in importance is the version of the LXX., which, upon the whole, closely follows the Masoretic text, Movers and Bertheau considering Chronicles one of the best executed portions of the LXX. There is only one Targum on the Chronicles, a production of the latter half of the seventh century—Paraphrasis Chaldaica libri Chroniconum cum ver. Latina et notis Beckii, 2 vols. 4to, Aug. Vind. 1680-83, an improved edition of which, by Wilkins, appeared at Amst. 1715. It is said to be of little critical value. Theodoret, Questions in Paralipomenon, Opera ed. Schulze, vol. i. Halse, 1769; Procopius of Gaza, In libros Regum et Paralip. Scholia, Mouraii opera, vol. viii. p. 1, fol. Florent. 1741. A valuable work, according to Carpov, particularly for the genealogical registers, is Lavater's Commentarius in libros Paralipomenon, fol. Tiguri, 1573 (Heidelb. 1599). The notes of Michaelis on 1 Chron., and of Rambach on 2 Chron., in Annotationes in Hagiographos Vet. Test. libros, vol. iii. Halse, 1720, deserve notice. The only modern work is Die Bücher der Chronik erklärt von Ernst Bertheau, Leip. 1854, of considerable critical value, but decidedly rationalistic. [D. M.]

particular line in and through which any great act was or should be effected, than the precise epoch of its occurrence. To this too is probably to be ascribed the various breaks occurring in the record, showing that the Scriptures look more to the future than to the past. But notwithstanding the obscurities arising from this circumstance, and others which a venerable age and relation to the earliest times may have thrown upon the Old Testament, the difficulties in its chronology are probably not greater than those which attach to the New Testament, and certainly they are less than those found in any other ancient history. Indeed, no small part of the difficulties have arisen from futile and unwarranted attempts to bring the Hebrew chronology into harmony with other schemes, which, in a great measure, are palpably fabulous, while in no particular can they be supposed to rest upon better evidence than the biblical history.

Our limits forbid taking a complete survey of scriptural chronology; and instead therefore of offering desultory remarks on so extended a field, the present article will be limited to the Old Testament, and to an examination of its more important epochs, as the deluge, the call of Abraham, the exode from Egypt, with the addition of some remarks on the date of the foundation of the temple; for thus far there can be no proper collision with any external chronology, and the data for the adjustment of any difficulties must be sought for in the Bible alone.

CHRONOLOGY. The division and computation of time must from the earliest period have engaged the attention of mankind. Such natural and obvious cycles as the day, month, and year, would present the readiest means for noting the course of the seasons and the order of events. The Bible, the only authentic record of the first ages of human history, shows that these divisions of time were early in use. The lives of the patriarchy, beginning with the first man, were computed by years, measured, there is no question, by the annual course of the sun, and not consisting, as sometimes alleged, of mere lunations. Months also are mentioned in the history of the deluge; and it has been computed from the data there furnished, that the time of Noah's continuance in the ark comprised a solar year. That there was a weekly cycle too is with great probability deduced from the same history; but whether this was the division of time referred to in the expression "at the end of the days," Ge. iv. 3, is uncertain, as this may perhaps with greater probability be understood of the close of the year. But although sufficient intimation is given in the Bible that the computation of time was carefully attended to from the first, yet considerable difficulties attend the chronology of the early history, from this circumstance among others, that the chronology was subordinate to the genealogy; it being deemed by the sacred historian of more importance to mark the

I. From the Creation to the Deluge.—The chronological data which the Bible supplies with regard to this period are sufficiently ample and explicit. The history proceeds by generations, but in order to avoid the uncertainty arising from a term so variable and indefinite, the length of the generation is in every case distinctly stated. But here unfortunately the biblical chronologer encounters one of his chief difficulties, in determining whether he is in possession of the genuine text, seeing that there are important variations between the Hebrew and such closely related documents as the Samaritan Pentateuch, the Septuagint version, and the writings of Josephus. The nature and extent of these discrepancies will be seen from the following tables, comprising this and the succeeding period, for both are affected in the same manner; and they are here brought together in order to illustrate more fully the principle in which the variations originated, and so helping possibly to detect whereinto the corruption has been introduced.

* NOTE.—This is "two years after the flood," when Shem was a hundred years old (Gen. xi. 10).

Inspection of the preceding tables will show that between the Hebrew text and the Septuagint, with which Josephus closely agrees, there is a remarkable difference in the lengths of the successive generations, amounting to 600 years in the antediluvian, and to 700 years in the postdiluvian; while the systematic appearance exhibited by the variations in the case of the several patriarchs, proves that it is the result not of accident but of design. In the Hebrew the centenary deficiencies in the lengths of the generations are added to the residues of the lives; while in the Septuagint the centenary additions to the lengths of the generations are subtracted from the residues of lives, so as to make the total length of the lives in the two alike. On which side the fabrication is to be charged, is a question greatly disputed among chronologers. It is unnecessary to cite the eminent authorities who have ranged themselves on either side of this controversy; suffice it to say, that the fathers of the church, Origen and Jerome excepted, from their acquaintance only with the Septuagint, followed its method of reckoning; but on the revival of Hebrew learning at and after the Reformation, more deference was shown to the Masoretic chronology. About a century after that religious movement, Archbishop Usher published his great work, Annales Veteris Testamenti, Lond. 1650, fol., founded on the Hebrew text. The chronology of the English Bible was regulated by this scheme. Among the other works on this subject, and on the same side, produced during that period of profound learning, mention must be made of the elaborate work, now almost unknown, of the erudite Principal Robert Baillie of the university of Glasgow, entitled Operis Historici et Chronologici Libri duo, Amstel. 1663, fol. On the other hand, Isaac Vossius appeared in defence of the Septuagint in his Dissertatio de vera Etate Mundi, Hag. 1650, 4to. The labours of Jackson (Chronological Antiquities, 3 vols. 4to, Lond. 1762), and of Hales (New Analysis of Chronology, 2d edit. 4 vols. 8vo, Lond. 1830), have greatly contributed in procuring among British scholars a preference for the chronology of the Septuagint, although there are not wanting many symptoms of a reaction, to mention only Clinton's Fasti Hellenici, Oxford, 1834, &c., and Brown's Ordo Saeculorum, Lond. 1847, in both of which the Hebrew chronology is followed.

The chronology of the Samaritan Pentateuch meets at present with no favour; and in fact the evidences of the liberties which have been taken with this recension are of too glaring a character to escape notice; as for instance the circumstance that of the ten antediluvian patriarchs, three—viz. Jared, Methuselah, and Lamech—died in the year assigned to the flood. But irrespective of this, its testimony in favour of either of the other two chronologies is neutralized by the fact that, while in regard to the period before the deluge, omitting Noah, whose history was too minute and circumstantial to admit of being tampered with, it agrees with the Hebrew except in three instances, in two of which the Hebrew corresponds with the LXX., and in the other with Josephus; whereas, with respect to the postdiluvian period, it agrees with the LXX. in every instance, excepting only in the case of Cainan.

The chief reliance, however, of the advocates of the extended chronology is on the testimony of Josephus (Russell, Connection of Sac. and Prof. Hist. i. p. 67, Lond. 1827), but even here the evidence is not so unimpeachable as at first it may appear. The similarity observable between the Septuagint and Josephus in the first period is indeed so striking, particularly when viewed in connection with the diversity which marks the second, as of itself to awaken suspicion that the one chronology has been conformed to the other, independently of the Hebrew original. This suspicion is further strengthened by finding that in other passages of Josephus, as, for example, Antiq. vii. 3, sec. 1; x. 8, sec. 5, the Hebrew chronology has been followed. These passages, bearing only incidentally on the matter in dispute, and involving besides arithmetical processes, may in that way have escaped the adjustments to which the more obvious and direct statements comprised in two short sections (Antiq. i. 3, sec. 4; 6, sec. 5) had been subjected. It might be unfair to press such discrepancies as the statement (Antiq. i. 3, sec. 3) of the period of the deluge at 2656, whereas the sum of the generations specified in the next section amounts only to 2256 years; or the statement (Antiq. i. 6, sec. 5) that Abraham was born 292 years after the deluge, while the actual sum of the generations specified immediately after is 993 years; for the first is obviously an inadvertence, and the other may have been the attempt of a transcriber to introduce the shorter reckoning. Should it, however, be urged, that the four terms of Josephus, for there are so many at least, into which the shorter computation enters singly or in combination (Jour. of Sac. Lit. Jan. 1860, p. 61) have been falsified, a process very unlikely, as nothing could be thereby gained, while the other more numerous and direct terms were untouched, the authority of Josephus in this controversy suffers greatly from the corruption thus assumed. If, as Hales admits (New Anal. of Chron. i. p. 294), "his dates have been miserably mangled and perverted, frequently by accident and frequently by design," there is a strong presumption, from the ignorance of the Hebrew Scriptures on the part of his transcribers, compared with the general acquaintance with the Greek version and the decided preference shown to its chronology, that it was from the latter rather than from the former the variations proceeded.

In the absence then of all consistent testimony on the part of the Samaritan Pentateuch, and even of Josephus, although not readily admitted by his advocates, recourse is had to other considerations for proving the superiority of the longer chronology. Of the grounds on which Dr. Russell, in his one-sided plea for the Septuagint, founds the assumption of a corruption of the Hebrew text, one is, that the Jews had both a motive and an opportunity for falsifying their Scriptures (Connection, p. 73-79), the motive being that their rejection of Christ rendered necessary an extensive change in their dates and calculations, owing to a generally entertained opinion that the world was to continue only 6000 years, and that Christ was to appear in the sixth millennium; while an opportunity for effecting the change was found in the troubled state of affairs during their wars with the Romans, when many copies of their sacred books were lost, while those that remained were confined to themselves, and understood only by few. Without, however, entering into a discussion of these assertions, it is enough to remark that they can be met by others equally plausible if not more convincing. What greater opportunity could have presented itself for conforming the scriptural dates to a theory, if such existed, than that afforded by the publication of the LXX., and before copies were to any extent multiplied? And that some such antecedent theory existed as is disclosed by the longer chronology, and that consequently there was a motive for extending the scriptural scheme, admits of no doubt; and it may be added, that it is to the influence of this or similar theories that the chronology of the LXX. is indebted for much of its present acceptance. Independently of numerous minor traces which the Septuagint version bears of the soil on which it was produced, it can be shown pretty clearly, if there be any truth in the scheme of Egyptian chronology lately propounded by Poole (Horæ Egyptiacæ, Lond. 1851), that the extended reckoning was an endeavour to bring the chronology of the sacred Scriptures into harmony with that of Egypt. The very fact then, if such it should be proved, that the Septuagint synchronizes with the Egyptian chronology, instead of proving the correctness of the former as against the Hebrew, is, considering the uncertain sources whence the Egyptian chronology was deduced, the principles on which it was constructed, and the disposition so strong in that people and other ancient nations of assigning a high and even fabulous date to their origin—witness the dynasties of Manetho, which Bunsen and Lepsius are vainly labouring to reduce within some conceivable limits—the strongest possible testimony against the scheme followed by the Septuagint.

Another presumption advanced against the integrity of the Hebrew text, is found in the difficulties with which, as regards especially the postdeluvian patriarchs, the statements are encumbered, owing to the short period between the flood and Abraham; as for instance the fact of that patriarch being made contemporary with Noah for more than half a century, and with Shem during his whole lifetime. Attaching no weight to the other difficulties alleged, as that Abraham alone, and to the exclusion of Shem, the founder of the family, who, according to the chronology, was then alive, was introduced into covenant with God through the rite of circumcision (Russell, Connec. i. p. 99), as resting on a misapprehension of the object of the divine procedure, there are, it must be allowed, considerable difficulties attaching to the chronology of this period. But these admit of being regarded in two different lights. They are either the result of the abbreviation introduced into the Hebrew text, or they have been the occasion of the lengthened scheme adopted by the Septuagint. In the former case they must have been as apparent to the authors of the forgery as to modern critics, and so have discouraged any such attempts; while on the other hand, the existence of these difficulties and seeming contradictions furnished very strong motives for their removal. The quarter most susceptible to such influences, it is not difficult to indicate; for the matter is raised from the region of conjecture by the circumstance that in one instance the Septuagint goes beyond its usual caution of merely lengthening the generation, by the addition of a new name and generation to the genealogies, and for which there is no support whatever (see CAINAN), so that even its great defender Hales admits—"The Septuagint version is not to be followed implicitly: it requires correction in some parts" (New Anal. of Chron. i. p. 289)—an admission which goes far to damage its entire authority in the present controversy.

Nor is the aspect of matters at all improved in favour of the Septuagint, when from these more external considerations we turn to an investigation of the changes effected. On examining Table I. given above, one of the first things that strikes the reader is the remarkable uniformity which characterizes the figures in the first column headed Sept., the same also with the Sam., presenting upon the whole a gradual diminution in the lengths of the successive generations, and a marked contrast with the figures in the Hebr. column. In the one case there is something very like an artificial formula; in the other, there are the natural inequalities and abrupt changes which may be expected in real life. But these attempts at uniformity were carried too far, and to an extent which threatened to upset the system; for notice must be taken of an important variation in the generation of Methuselah, the best Greek MSS. making it 167 years. This reading, adopted by Stier and Theile (Polyglotten-Bibel, Bielefeld, 1847), and by Tischendorf, in his edition of the Septuagint (Lips. 1850), makes the uniformity still more marked; but it was somehow perceived that this required that Methuselah should survive the flood for at least fourteen years. In examining Table II. also, it will be perceived that the Septuagint assigns nearly the same length to a generation as in the preceding period, although after the flood human life was reduced at once to one-half, and gradually to one-third and one-fourth of what it had been before that catastrophe. But enough: there is, to say the least, no such preponderating testimony in favour of the Septuagint's chronology, as furnishes any ground for setting up its authority against that of the original; and the latter must still be regarded as possessing the strongest claim to our belief.

II. From the Deluge to the Call of Abraham.—Much that properly belongs to this period has been anticipated in the remarks on the comparative value of the Hebrew and Septuagint chronologies, for the tampering with the record has been pursued to a certain extent to the case of Terah, the father of Abraham. That point being once settled, little remains to embarrass the reader. Cainan, also introduced by the Septuagint into this period, has been already sufficiently considered (see CAINAN). There is one point, however, in connection with this period not yet adverted to, not certainly of the same importance, nor of the same nature, as those already considered, yet one which has afforded ample room for disputation to biblical chronologers. This is the year of Abraham's birth. The difficulty here, however, does not arise, as in the former case, from anything properly external to the Scriptures, or such as would bring in question the integrity of the text, but originates in a statement recorded in the New Testament, the nature of which will presently appear.

According to Ge. xi. 26, Terah was seventy years old when he beget Abraham, Nahor, and Haran; according to Ge. xi. 32, Terah died at the age of 205 years; while Ge. xii. 4 states that Abraham was seventy-five years old when, in consequence of the divine call, he departed from Haran to go into the land of Canaan. On this reckoning Terah must have survived the migration of Abraham sixty years. The protomartyr Stephen, in his address before the Jewish council, Ac. vii. 4, however, expressly states that Terah predeceased his son's migration: "When his father was dead, he (Abraham) removed him into this land wherein ye now dwell." Some writers content themselves with the remark that the Jewish chronology which Stephen here followed must have been at fault; so Alford (Greek Test. in loc.) and Kurtz (Herzog's Real-Encyclopädie, i. p. 71), without once adverting to the strong improbability that the Jews should have so misinterpreted such a plain passage of their Scriptures, and one so related to the history of their great ancestor; while others as summarily dispose of the contradiction by feigning a visit of Abraham to Terah before his death, after whose decease he returned to the Promised Land. Not satisfied with these or similar modes of adjustment, not a few eminent chronologers take a different view of Ge. xi. 26, holding that it does not necessarily follow from this passage that Abraham was the eldest son of Terah, and so born in the year specified. On the contrary, they make him to have been the youngest son, and born when his father was 130 years old. Usher is usually regarded as the propounder of this theory; but it is of much older date, having been held by Calvin, Musculus, and others of the Reformation period.

In estimating the weight due to this supposition, it must be at once admitted that the mention of Terah's death before the historian enters upon the history of Abraham, is in itself no evidence of the real order of the events recorded, as it often occurs in Scripture that all that concerns a particular individual is disposed of before treating of the next historical personage. It must also be admitted that Ge. v. 32, where Shem, although the second son of Noah, is placed first of his three sons, all of whom are said to have been born in the 500th year of their father, is not altogether analogous to the present passage; for possibly only a short interval elapsed between the birth of Noah's sons, while with regard to Terah no less than sixty years are alleged between the eldest and the youngest. It is also somewhat unfavourable to this view that there is thus no direct intimation of the year of Abraham's birth—the most illustrious personage of Old Testament history—if the want is not compensated by the express mention of his age at the time of his call, a far more important epoch as regards the sacred history than that of his birth.

But notwithstanding these deductions, there are arguments of no little weight favourable to this supposition. Haran, whom it is thus concluded was the eldest son of Terah, predeceased his father, leaving one son, Lot, and two daughters, Milcah and Iscah, Ge. xi. 27-29. Milcah became the wife of her uncle Nahor; but of Iscah there is no further mention under that name in Scripture. Abraham's wife is named Sarai, but the historian here gives no hint who or whence she was; and not until a subsequent stage in the history, and from a statement of Abraham himself, does it appear that she was his sister, Ge. xx. 12. From the manner in which Iscah's name is introduced in connection with Milcah's, in the notice of the marriages of Abraham and Nahor, and no further reference to her—not even on the removal of Terah and his family to Haran, when a list of the emigrants is given, Ge. xi. 31: "And Terah took Abram his son, and Lot the son of Haran his son's son, and Sarai his daughter-in-law, his son Abram's wife;"—from this and other considerations it has not unfrequently been concluded, even by such as are by no means inclined to the view in support of which this argument is now adduced, that Iscah must have been another name for Sarai. The rabbinical writers in general held this identity, as appears from the Talmud, the Targum of Jonathan, and also from Jarchi; and it was the current opinion in the time of Josephus (Antiq. l. 6, sect. 5). The only thing that can be urged to the contrary is Abraham's statement, Ge. xx. 12, "And yet indeed she is my sister: she is the daughter of my father, but not the daughter of my mother." From this it is objected that the last clause forbids the taking of the term "sister" in the same latitude as "brother" elsewhere, or as denoting "a niece," as if Sarah was the grand-daughter of Terah. This objection is of little weight, considering the circumstances in which Abraham made the statement. He had been convicted of practising a deception in giving out that Sarah was not his wife but his sister, and in now palliating his offence he had a motive for placing his consanguineal relation to Sarah in the most colourable light: he cannot, however, say that she is his full sister, but is a step further removed—she is not the daughter of his mother—this not being the notice of a second marriage of Terah, but a hint of the real state of the case. Now, if the identity of Iscah and Sarah can be established, it follows that Abraham must have been much younger than Haran, whose daughter was only ten years younger than her husband, Ge. xvii. 17.

Another consideration which renders it highly probable that Terah's death was prior to Abraham's removal from Haran is, that otherwise the aged patriarch must have been left there alone, for all the members of his family specified as having accompanied him from Ur of the Chaldees followed Abraham into Canaan, Ge. xii. 5. Even Lot, who had no divine call to undertake a journey in a worldly point of view so unpromising—that Lot was susceptible to such considerations appears from his history, Ge. xiii. 10, 11—joins his uncle, instead of remaining with his desolate grandfather. This is inconceivable if Terah was still alive. Further, there is no communication kept up between the emigrants into Canaan and the relatives left behind at the original seat of the family. Not until after the intended offering of Isaac, fifty years at least after the entrance into Canaan, did Abraham hear of the state of his brother's family, Ge. xxi. 20. If then Terah must have died prior to Abraham's removal to Canaan, the latter must have been born when his father was 130 years old, or 302 years after the flood. (See Table IV. on p. 324.)

III. From the Call of Abraham to the Exode.—From the creation to the death of Joseph, there is an uninterrupted series of dates; but from the latter event to the exodus there is no note of time, save the statement in Ex. xii. 40, that a period of 430 years had elapsed between the children of Israel's departure from Egypt and the commencement of their sojourn; but whether this included their sojourn in Canaan or only in Egypt, is a point much controverted. The Septuagint (Codex Vaticanus) gives the passage thus: "But the sojourning of the children of Israel, during which they dwelt in Egypt and in the land of Canaan, was 430 years." The Samaritan recension: "And the sojourn of the children of Israel and of their fathers in the land of Canaan and in the land of Egypt," &c.; and this reading is followed by the Alexandrian codex of the Septuagint. That these are unauthorized additions to the text is not denied by any biblical critic, although it may be questioned whether they do not correctly convey the import of the original.

But first as to the facts of the case deducible from the genealogies and notes of time as far as they extend. From the call of Abraham to the birth of Isaac, 25 years, Gen. xii. 4; xxi. 5; hence to the birth of Jacob, 60 years, Ge. xxv. 26, and again to Jacob's going down to Egypt, 130 years more, Ge. xlvii. 9, 28, or 25 + 60 + 130 = 215 years in all. Now Levi, whose genealogy is given in Ex. vi. 16-20, must have been about 42 years when he went down with his father into Egypt, and as he lived in all 137 years, he must have spent 95 years there. But Amram the father of Moses married his father Kohath's sister Jochebed, "the daughter of Levi, whom her mother bare to Levi in Egypt," Nu. xvi. 50, who must therefore have been born within the period of 95 years just specified, extending from the going down to Egypt to the death of Levi. But as Moses was 80 years old at the exode, Ex. vii. 7, it is evident that the sojourn in Egypt could not have extended to anything approaching 400 years, without assigning to the mother of Moses at the time of his birth an age altogether inconceivable. But taking Jochebed's age at about 45, and supposing her to have been born 5 years before the death of her father Levi, we shall have 90 + 45 + 80 = 215 years for the sojourn in Egypt, which added to the interval from the call of Abraham to Jacob's removal into Egypt, gives the whole period of 430 years. With this agrees the statement of the apostle Paul in Ga. iii. 17, where he reckons the period from the promises made to Abraham to the giving of the law as 430 years.

There are unquestionably serious difficulties connected with this view, the most important of which is that it is opposed to the express statement of Ex. xii. 40, not as in the English version, "Now the sojourning of the children of Israel, who dwelt," but, "Now the sojourning of the children of Israel which they sojourned in Egypt, was 430 years." But the difficulties arising from the limited time afforded by the shorter period for the multiplication of the Israelites to such a degree, as even more than eighty years before the exode to alarm the Egyptian government, are as nothing compared with the demand made, on the supposition of the longer sojourn, that several generations between Kohath and Amram have been intentionally or accidentally passed over in the genealogical tables (Kurtz, Geschichte des Alten Bundes, II. p. 18). In confirmation of the longer period, it is maintained that the period of Israel's sojourning in a strange land, and of their servitude and sore affliction, is prophetically announced as 400 years, Ge. xv. 13, an intimation referred to in Ac. vii. 6. That this, however, is not to be too closely pressed and applied exclusively to Egypt, appears from the following considerations. Without insisting that prophecy is to be interpreted by history, and not conversely history by prophecy, it may be remarked that while no particular country is specified, the appellation "a land that is not theirs" was, as regards Abraham and his immediate posterity, more applicable to Canaan than it was to Egypt during the Israelites' sojourn there. Up to the time when it was taken possession of by Joshua, Canaan, though the "land of promise," was in every sense a strange (ἀλλοτρία, Heb. xi. 9, comp. Ac. vii. 6) land, Abraham or his posterity having no possession in it beyond a place of sepulture, and no fixed dwelling, whereas in Egypt they had the land of Goshen by royal grant. Further, that this intimation comprised more than the sojourn in Egypt, is also shown by the fact that, on the one hand, the state of servitude, oppression, and exile, is limited by the fourth generation, before the close of which they should be put in possession of their own land. If this was not to be reckoned from the time when the promise was made, but from some future, unknown, and it might be remote term, it could afford but little encouragement; for if so, it might actually extend as well to 4000 as to 400 years. And on the other hand, that the statement, or that part of it which foretold servitude and oppression, applied only to a portion of the time even as regards Egypt, and not to the whole period indicated, needs no proof; and yet it shows the danger of pressing too closely prophetic announcements of this kind. The true exposition of Ex. xii. 40 seems to be that the historian of the exodus, looking back from the position to which, in accordance with this divine promise, Israel had now attained, regarded the whole intervening experience as preparatory to this redemption—the state of wandering and oppression had reached its lowest point, had, in fact, been realized in the Egyptian bondage, which might therefore be said to represent it. It is only on this supposition that we can explain not merely the actual state of the case as detailed in or deducible from the preceding record, but also the universal opinion entertained among the Jews themselves as to the shorter period, as may be seen in the writings of their rabbis and of Josephus (Antiq. II. 15, sect. 2), apparently in strong antagonism to this passage of Scripture, an antagonism which early led to the interpolations in the versions, as already adverted to.

IV. From the Exode to the Foundation of Solomon's Temple.—There is no portion of biblical history which, as regards details, presents so many chronological difficulties as this. For forty-seven years after the exode, the course of the history is clearly defined, but afterwards there are various interruptions, and sometimes an entire absence of chronological data. From Joahua's division of the land, Jos. xiv. 10, comp. w.th De. ii. 14, to the servitude under Chushan-Rishathaim, Ju. iii. 8, there is no explicit indication of time. After this there are various data down to the death of Samson, from which to the accession of David they are again very scanty. In these circumstances, it is only an approximation that can be attained with regard to numerous particulars. There are, however, several checks supplied by a comparison of various statements in the narrative; while the whole period is covered by the intimation in 1 Ki. vi. 1, that from the coming out of Israel from Egypt to the fourth year of Solomon's reign, when he founded the temple, there were 480 years. But here again two formidable difficulties present themselves. The first is, that this number is far exceeded by the sum of the years obtained from a careful consideration of the materials furnished in the history of the judges. This if taken by itself might admit of explanation, as showing that some error had entered into the computation, possibly because some of the judges were not successive but contemporaneous, and exercising their functions in different districts, or because relying too implicitly on round numbers, of which there are so many traces in the book of Judges, or from some other cause. But another and more inexplicable difficulty tends greatly to diminish the probability of this supposition, and indeed renders any such reconciliation nugatory. This is the statement of the apostle Paul, Ac. xiii. 18-22: "About the time of forty years suffered he their manners in the wilderness. And when he had destroyed seven nations in the land of Canaan, he divided their land to them by lot. And after that he gave unto them judges about the space of 450 years, until Samuel the prophet. And afterward they desired a king: and God gave unto them Saul the son of Cis, a man of the tribe of Benjamin, by the space of forty years. And when he had removed him, he raised up unto them David to be their king." There are here three terms of 40, 450, and 40 years; and the first question is, Are they consecutive? or does the second period apply only to the rule of the judges, passing over the interval from the entry into Canaan to the first of these rulers? Many writers maintain that no other sense can be given to the words than that the time of the judges alone lasted 450 years, but this is perhaps pressing the language too far. It need not, however, be disputed, as on either supposition the period far exceeds that given in 1 Ki. vi. 1; nor does it make any material difference that, as indicated by the word about, 450 is a round number. The attempts at reconciling these two passages have been numerous but unavailing, and as the statement in 1 Ki. vi. 1 is manifestly at variance with the data supplied by the history itself, there is no remedy but to admit that the text has been somehow corrupted. There is the less difficulty in making this admission, from the circumstance that there is no reference to this date by any of the various writers who compiled histories of the Jews from the materials supplied in the Bible down to Eusebius, who first employed it as the basis of some chronological hypothesis. The chronology of Ac. xiii. 20, it may be added, corresponds exactly with that followed by Josephus, who reckons 592 years from the exode to the building of the temple (Antiq. viii. 2, sect. 1), the alleged contradiction between this and the 612 years, as given in two other passages (Antiq. xx. 10, sect. 1; Cont. Apion. ii. 2), arising from overlooking the fact that the latter period, which Hales erroneously regards as spurious (New Analysis of Chron. i. p. 216), includes the time occupied in building the temple and the king's house.

In the subsequent periods of Old Testament history, there are various chronological difficulties; as for instance, in determining the duration of the Hebrew monarchy, and tracing the parallelism of the two kingdoms from their separation under Rehoboam to the deportation of the kingdom of Israel. These difficulties, though exceedingly numerous and perplexing, do not involve such important consequences as those already considered: they concern minute details rather than extended periods, and arise not from the want of numerous and explicit chronological data, but from causes not yet fully apprehended by the biblical expositor. For this, however, and the various particulars connected with the preceding periods, the reader is referred to other articles.

CHRYSOLITE [χρυσόλιθος, Rev. xxi. 20, literally, golden stone], a general name for precious stones of a yellowish colour, but understood to be commonly applied to the topaz of the moderns. (See TOPAZ.)

CHRYSOPRASUS [χρυσόπρασος, Rev. xxi. 20, literally, gold-leek or yellow-green, a name given to precious stones composed of these colours]. It is generally regarded as having been applied to a species of beryl.

CHUB, a country or people associated with Ethiopia, Lud, Phut, and others in Eze. xxx. 5, but of which nothing is known. The opinions of commentators are mere conjectures.

CHURCH, a term derived from the Greek κυριακόν, literally, the Lord's house; after the analogy of the words ἀνάκτορον, ἀνάκειον, which, originally denoting a royal palace, came to signify a temple, especially that of Castor and Pollux. The corresponding term in the New Testament is either ἐκκλησία, i.e. the assembly of the called, or συναγωγή; this last, however, only occurs twice, viz. Ja. ii. 2 and He. x. 25. Both expressions are used indifferently by the Alexandrian translators to express the Hebrew words קָהָל and עֵבֶד, the congregation of Israel: from the Septuagint they passed into the New Testament, but the former, ἐκκλησία, gradually, in the language of Christians, supplanted the latter, both because St. Paul commonly employs it in his epistles, and especially because it became necessary to mark the distinction between the Christian church and the Jewish synagogue. An assembly of the called, or of Christians, viewed in relation to Christ, its heavenly king, present by his Spirit wherever two or three are gathered in his name, Mat. xviii. 20; and viewed also in relation to its structure, which is that of an organized body, and not of a collection of atoms without mutual dependence and a common end, 1 Co. xii., was fitly called κυριακόν (kirche, kirk, church), as the palace or building in which the Lord, by his Spirit, resides, Ep. ii. 22. The word ἐκκλησία never, in the New Testament, signifies the actual building in which Christians assembled for public worship; the first mention of regular structures of that kind occurs long after the apostolic age.

Examining carefully the language of Scripture on this subject, we find two, and only two, really distinct meanings of the term ἐκκλησία, according as it is used to signify either one or more local Christian societies, or the one true church, which, though a really existing body, has no visible head, or common visible government, upon earth. In the sense of a visible society, the word sometimes denotes a company of Christians small enough to meet for worship in a single house, Ro. xvi. 5; sometimes a larger community, comprehended within the limits of a city or a district, as the church of Rome, or of Corinth, or the churches of Galatia; occasionally perhaps, though this meaning is open to question, the whole assemblage of local churches throughout the world, or the visible church catholic. On the other hand, we read of "the church of God among" such societies, Ac. ix. 28; of the church as "the body," and the bride, of Christ, which he will one day present to himself, "without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing," Ep. v. 23-27; of "the general assembly and church of the first-born, which are written in heaven," He. xii. 23; with other descriptions of like import. In such passages as these the idea of locality evidently disappears, and gives place to a view of the church, inward, spiritual, or, in theological language, mystical. Most of the errors that have prevailed on this subject have arisen from a neglect or denial of the distinction here indicated. In the remarks that follow we shall attempt, first, to describe the organization of local Christian societies; and, secondly, to point out the connection, and yet the distinction between them and the one true, or as Protestant theologians call it, the invisible church.

I. Christ, it is admitted on all sides, came not merely to promulgate certain doctrines, hitherto unknown or but partially known, but to found upon earth a community, or system of communities, to which his disciples should belong. Christianity was to have, not merely adherents, in the sense in which any school of ancient philoophy might be said to have such, but a visible form and consistence in the world; its followers were to be enrolled in social combinations, the limits of which should be well defined and easily ascertained. Thus alone, as Bishop Butler remarks (Anal. p. ii. c. 1.), could the new religion maintain itself from age to age, amidst the changes of society and the fluctuations of opinion. "Miraculous powers were given to the first preachers of Christianity, in order to their introducing it into the world; a visible church was established in order to continue it, and carry it on successively throughout all ages. Had Moses and the prophets, Christ and his apostles, only taught, and by miracles proved, religion to their contemporaries, the benefits of their instructions would have reached but to a small part of mankind. Christianity must have been in a great degree sunk and forgotten in a very few ages." Now to the idea of a visible community; it seems essential that there should be, (1) Outward signs or tokens of admission into, and continuance in it; (2) A form of polity, and an executive government, authorized to perform public acts, and to enforce such regulations as the society may think fit to impose upon its members.

Whence, in the case before us, were these indispensable constituent elements of visible union derived? We must remember that Christianity was not an isolated phenomenon in the history of the world, but the last of a long series of divine dispensations, each of which prepared the way for its successor. Christianity is the offspring of Judaism. Its founder was himself a son of Abraham after the flesh; its first heralds were all Jews; its first adherents were gathered from that nation. It was but natural then that, as far as was possible, Christianity should assimilate to itself the existing institutions amongst which it sprang up. Accordingly our Lord, in those express appointments of his which were to distinguish his followers from the rest of mankind, adopted, with certain modifications, ordinances and customs which he found in being, and with which his disciples were familiar.

Three such appointments can be traced to Christ's own institution—the two sacraments, baptism and the Lord's supper, and the ministry of the Word. The rite of baptism, whether, as some have supposed, employed among the Jews before the Christian era in the admission of proselytes to Judaism, at least well known as the symbol of the ministry of John the Baptist, was constituted by our Lord the rite of admission to the Christian covenant: only, instead of being a baptism of repentance merely, it was to be baptism in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost—a form based upon the distinctive doctrine of Christianity, that of the Trinity in unity. But to those within the sacred inclosure stated instruction was to be furnished; the nations were first to be "discipled" by the preaching of the gospel and baptism, and then to be brought under a course of "teaching," Mat. xxviii. 19, 20: now, stated teaching implies the existence, sooner or later, of a ministerial order, one of whose offices this should be; and thus the second external rite of a Christian society is the ministry of the Word. Finally, as a pledge and seal of continued fellowship with Christ and his members, the sacrament of the Lord's supper was appointed, borrowed from ceremonies customary at the passover, and intended, amongst the spiritual Israel of the Christian church, to take the place of the ancient ordinance, Mat. xxvi. 26-28; 1 Co. v. 7, 8. From these considerations it is that the Reformed Confessions generally define a local church to be "a congregation of faithful men, in the which the pure Word of God is preached, and the sacraments be duly administered according to Christ's ordinance" (comp. Angl. art. xix.); though, to these notes some, as the Scottish Confession, add a third, the exercise of discipline. And they insist upon these notes as the essential ones, because of none other can it be said that they are of Christ's own appointment.

The polity of the church, to which we now proceed, must, in like manner, be supposed to have had its basis in existing arrangements connected with the old dispensation; but since we have here no distinct prescription of our Lord to allege, the question becomes one of historical research. Two models, or platforms, of church polity, and only two, were known to the apostles; the divinely prescribed temple service, with its threefold ministry of high-priest, priest, and Levites, and the more recent institution of the synagogue. This latter plays so important a part in the early promulgation of the gospel, that a few words on its rise and its nature may not be out of place. The worship of the synagogue, in the distinct form in which it meets us in the New Testament, cannot be referred to an earlier date than the Babylonish captivity. The exiles of Zion, "by the waters of Babylon," deprived of the temple services, endeavoured to supply their place by such religious exercises as still remained within their reach: they came together as opportunity offered, to hear at the mouth of a prophet words of consolation and instruction, Esa. xlv. 1; xx. 1; xxxiii. 21. Restored to their native land, the Jews continued these homiletic services, the value of which would be the more felt when the gift of prophecy was withdrawn. In the book of Nehemiah, ch. viii. 1-8, we have an account of a religious service which presents a close resemblance to what afterwards became the stated worship of the synagogue: Ezra ascended a pulpit of wood, read portions of Scripture, which were interpreted to the people, and the whole concluded with prayer and thanksgiving. The example thus set was speedily followed, and in Jerusalem alone, in our Lord's time, there are said to have been 480 synagogues. The dispersion of the Jews after the captivity produced a corresponding diffusion of the new mode of worship; and at the time of Christ, Jews, and Jewish synagogues, were found established in every considerable city of the Roman empire.

From what has been said, the nature of the synagogical worship may be gathered. With the temple, or the Levitical worship, the synagogue had no connection. Its services were not typical and sacrificial, but verbal and homiletic. The function of teaching, though properly belonging to the rulers of the synagogue, could be delegated to any properly qualified person. Thus our Lord, in his character of Rabbi, or teacher, "preached," without hinderance, "in their synagogues throughout Galilee," Mar. i. 23; and to the apostles, in their journeys, the same permission appears to have been freely granted. With respect to the polity of the synagogue, it was generally framed on the presbyterian model; a college, or senate of persons skilled in the law, being invested with the chief authority; but sometimes, in the smaller villages, a single doctor of the law administered its affairs. Thus, in the New Testament, we read sometimes of the "rulers," and sometimes of the "ruler" of the synagogue. The duties of the governing elders were to teach and to rule; while upon another class of inferior ministers devolved the care of the sacred books and other subordinate offices. Besides being used for public worship, the synagogues were places of public instruction, and courts of judicature for smaller offences; they were empowered to inflict the penalties of scourging and of excommunication, Mat. x. 17; Lu. xii. 11; Jn. xi. 22.

Did the apostles then frame the polity of the church after the pattern of the temple or of the synagogue? Each side of the question has had its advocates; but the impartial reader of the New Testament will probably have no difficulty in arriving at the latter conclusion. In the first place, the services of the temple were, as we know, incapable of multiplication; they were, by divine appointment, fixed to one spot; and no Jew, rightly instructed in the principles of his religion, ever could, or did, think of erecting in a foreign land a counterpart of the sacred structure. How then could it have occurred to the apostles to establish Christian temples in each city in which they preached? In the next place, the early history of Christianity shows how solicitous the apostles were to avoid any visible rupture with the theocracy, as long as the latter stood. They, with the first converts, frequented the temple at the appointed hours of prayer, Ac. iii. 1; and even the great apostle of the uncircumcision, who so zealously vindicated the liberty of the Gentile converts from the yoke of the law, thought it not inconsistent with his professed opinions to comply, as a matter of expediency, with the legal ordinances, Ac. xxi. 6. We read that the believing Jews at Jerusalem were "all zealous of the law," Ac. xxi. 20; and the apostle who records this fact mentions it without any mark of disapprobation. But to have established in the Christian church a transcript of the temple and its services, and that in close proximity to the original building (for in Jerusalem the first congregations of Christians came into existence), would have placed them in direct opposition to the existing economy; and, as far as human hinderances could do so, would have seriously impeded the progress of the gospel. It is not then antecedently probable that the apostles would have adopted this platform of church polity.

And this surmise is amply confirmed by the actual correspondence which the New Testament exhibits between the organization of the first church and that of the synagogue. Two of the orders of the Christian ministry were, beyond doubt, borrowed from the Jewish institution—those of the diaconate and the presbyterate. It is commonly supposed that the former was first instituted in the persons of Stephen and his companions, Ac. vi.; but however this may be, it is certain that the deacons of St. Paul's epistles and of subsequent church history corresponded substantially to the inferior ministers of the synagogue. The next grade, that of presbyters, is still more clearly of synagogical origin. The appellation is a literal translation of the Hebrew word denoting the elders of the synagogue; and the functions were identical. According to St. Paul a presbyter, or episcopus (these terms in the apostolical epistles denoting the same order), "must be apt to teach," "able by sound doctrine both to exhort and convince the gainsayers;" the elders that ruled well, as well as taught, "were to be counted worthy of double honour," 1 Ti. iii. 2; v. 17; governing and teaching being, as in the synagogue, their main duties: while no passage can be adduced in which the sacerdotal term kierus, proper to the temple, is applied to any order of Christian ministers.

Such, for a time, was the polity of the early church; it was governed by apostles, presbyters, and deacons, the first being oecumenical, the two last local, officers. Of the third well-known order, that of bishops, the origin is more obscure. Many have thought that in the commissions of Timothy and Titus we have an episcopate proper; but this is hardly compatible with the fact that these ministers were evidently not stationary at Ephesus and Crete; indeed, were not intended to be so by St. Paul (see 2 Ti. iv. 21; Tit. iii. 12). They, in fact, belonged to a class of persons who may fitly be called apostolical commissioners: these were not attached to any particular church or district, but remained in attendance upon St. Paul, and by him were despatched to various places as need required. Such also were Silvanus, Sosthenes, Lucius, Tychicus, probably the "messengers" (ἀπόστολοι) of the churches mentioned in 2 Co. viii. 23, and others. At most, then, we can say that in Timothy and Titus we have the rudiment of the episcopal office. On the other hand, no sooner do we pass from inspired to uninspired history than we find this form of government universally prevailing. It is spoken of by Ignatius, for example, in a manner which shows that it was even then of no new date. It is difficult to account for this universal and apparently uncontested diffusion, save on the supposition of its having been instituted or sanctioned by the apostles. On the whole, we shall probably not be far wrong in supposing that, not long after St. Paul's death and the destruction of Jerusalem, the surviving apostles either confirmed an informal episcopacy which had naturally sprung up in the churches, or appointed for the first time this new order of ministers, placing such apostolical men as Timothy and Titus in the localities with which they were best acquainted, which explains and accounts for the ancient tradition that these two were the first bishops of Ephesus and Crete respectively. It was natural that the apostles, as the most eminent of their number were gradually removed by death, should look forward with some anxiety to the period when the church should be left wholly without those inspired guides who had formed a common centre and bond of union which all Christians recognized. To supply the deficiency as far as might be, they, if the almost unanimous testimony of the early church is to be accepted, instituted this superior order of ministers, who should at once serve as centres of unity to the churches under their particular jurisdiction, and organs of communication between them and other Christian societies. Such was the ancient idea of the episcopate, and thus far, but not as inheriting apostolic powers, may bishops be considered as successors of the apostles. They were successors so far as that by their means the visible church, which otherwise might have become disintegrated, was held together, and made conscious, so to speak, of its essential unity. Under this aspect the episcopate may be regarded as, on the one hand, the natural expression of Christian union; and, on the other, as a safeguard against the incursions of heresy: for heresy, being in its nature isolation (dispersis) from the common faith of the Christian body, the natural corrective of it was inter-communion of the various parts of the body with each other, a result which, as has been observed, was secured by the institution of episcopacy.

With episcopacy we leave entirely the ground of apostolical appointment, it being admitted by all parties that the subsequent developments of polity are of un-inspired origin. Their natural history, however, is the same. The tendency to visible union which led the Christians of a given locality to congregate round a living centre, impelled, in like manner, neighbouring churches with their bishops to form centres of union; hence the origin of provincial synods and of metropolitans. Metropolitan circles themselves soon expanded into still more extensive combinations; and, in fact, so long as no political impediments arrested the work of consolidation, there was no reason why it should not continually advance. As long as the Roman empire held together no such impediments existed. Hence we find provinces coalescing into patriarchates, political considerations determining the patriarchal sees to the three leading churches of Rome, Antioch, and Alexandria. Later on, Rome, the capital of the world, and the scene of the labours and death of the great apostles Peter and Paul, assumes the lead in ecclesiastical as once in political affairs: the Roman patriarch became invested, not by any formal delegation of power, but by tacit consent and the custom of the church, with an undefined precedency, which in due time settled down into an acknowledged primacy, with fixed rights and privileges. So early as the age of Cyprian the groundwork of the Papacy had been laid. That great churchman, in whose works the germ of many a future corruption is manifest, regards the collected episcopate of Christendom as forming a corporation, an undivided whole, of which each bishop is the representative. "The church," he writes, "one and catholic, is knit and compacted together by the mutual adhesion of a cemented priesthood;" "the episcopate being one, is represented in its totality in individuals" (Epist. lxi. De unit. Eccles.) When once this Cyprianic idea of the unity of the universal episcopate had taken hold of men's minds, that of a living centre, in whom the whole body should see its unity visibly represented, followed as a matter of course, and in due time was realized. And viewed in this light there was nothing positively antichristian in the primacy of the Bishop of Rome. If it was not against the principles of the gospel for the faithful of a diocese to gather themselves round a bishop, or for the bishops of a province to evolve out of their number a metropolitan centre, no more, it should seem, was it for the episcopate of the Roman empire to develop from itself a centre, which should have the effect of binding together and consolidating the whole body. At what point the Papacy began to assume an unchristian character will be shown hereafter.

II. Such is a sketch of the organization of the visible church. We proceed now to make some remarks upon the distinction, and yet the inseparable connection, between the church as it appears and the church in its truth. But what is the church in its truth? Or, in other words, wherein does the essential being of the church consist? How are we to define it? These are preliminary questions which require some answer. Two, not absolutely but relatively, opposite views on this subject have prevailed; the one, that of the Romanist, regards the church as primarily a visible institution, whose essence lies in its polity and its rites; the other, that of the Protestant, regards it as primarily a communion or congregation of saints, of those, that is, who are in living union with Christ. In the eye of the Romanist all are truly members of the true church, and therefore members of Christ, who profess the same faith, receive the same sacraments, and are in communion with the Bishop of Rome; it matters not whether they be destitute of saving faith, or even living in mortal sin (Cat. Rom. c. x. s. 10). Consistently with this view, the attributes of the church all assume an external character: its unity consists in its subjection to one visible head, the occupant for the time being of the chair of St. Peter; its sanctity in its being dedicated to God in the same sense in which the vessels of the tabernacle were; its apostolicity in the lawful succession of pastors. This theory, as is obvious, applies those descriptions of the church which speak of it as the body or the bride of Christ to an external community, viz. the papal; as external, in the language of Bellarmin, "as the Roman people, the kingdom of France, or the republic of Venice" (De Eccles. Mil. c. 2); and so confounds the two aspects of the church, between which, as we believe, Scripture establishes a distinction. It is against this low and secular conception of the church, which ignores its essential characteristic, the presence of the Holy Spirit, as an operative principle in the hearts of Christians, that the Reformed Confessions mean to protest, when they describe the true church as invisible. What they mean is, that that which makes us members of Christ, and of Christ's body, viz. saving faith, is invisible, for God alone can see the heart: "Though the men be visible," to adopt Bishop Taylor's language, "yet the quality and excellence by which they are distinguished from mere professors and outsiders of Christians, this, I say, is not visible" (Dissuasive from Popery, part ii. b. i. s. 1).

What, let us ask, was the church when it first came into existence on the day of Pentecost, antecedently to any work of visible organization? What it was then, will for ever determine wherein its true being lies. But at that moment it was not primarily a visible institution, whether episcopal or presbyterian, but simply a company of men, "all filled with the Holy Ghost," Ac. ii. 4. It was the promised descent of the Spirit, and not a visible polity, or the practice of visible rites, which transformed a company of Jewish believers into members of Christ. The apostles themselves, officially appointed as they had been before this event, do not attempt to execute the charge committed to them until it had taken place; then, and not until then, do they proceed to preach and organize. So that the church was in being before she gave any visible evidences of her existence; that is, she is primarily, or before she is anything else, a communion of saints. This communion of saints, once in being, does not, indeed, remain a mere invisible communion: Christians assemble, under the guidance and teaching of the apostles, for religious exercises, the sacraments now begin to be administered, the Word to be preached; still the idea of the church is once for all fixed. And the order of things here first presented is maintained throughout. If the Lord "added to the church daily such as should be saved," they were added, not on the supposition of a mere external profession, but as repentant believers, Ac. ii. 38, 39; not in the mass, but as the Lord gave them power to believe: that is, there was supposed to be a work of the Spirit on the heart antecedently to visible union with the church. In like manner the sacraments were to be administered, not promiscuously, but to believers; to real believers, as far as man could judge. The opus operatum view of Rome finds no countenance in Scripture. A member of Christ, or of Christ's body (for the expressions are co-extensive), is presumed to be in Christ, as the branch in the vine, Jn. xv. 1, i. e. by a vital, sanctifying union; nor can any passage be adduced in which the expression "in Christ" may not be shown to presuppose repentance and faith. Hence, the sacraments or other ordinances give, not being, but visible being, to the church; the faith which unites to Christ, unseen by man, gives evidence of its existence by submission to Christ's ordinances, and by the good fruits which it bears; the church therefore can esteem no man a Christian until he be baptized. But as the fruits of faith do not make faith what it is, so the ordinances and external equipments of the church do not constitute its true essential being. To ascertain this we must consider what will abide after time shall be no more, and the means of grace no longer needed. And this can be nothing but the work of the Holy Spirit, by which the new creature is formed, and carried on to perfection.

It may be replied that this is contrary to the analogy of the elder dispensation, of which forms were the essence, and in which that which was visible preceded that which was unseen. The fact is admitted; but so far from there being any analogy between the two dispensations in this particular point, the reverse is the case; they are strongly contrasted, both in the declarations of the New Testament and in actual fact. Of the law it is said that it was the ministration of the "letter," while the gospel is that of the "Spirit;" the former was a yoke of bondage, but "where the Spirit of the Lord is there is liberty," 2 Co. iii. 17; "the law came by Moses, grace and truth by Jesus Christ," Jn. i. 17. A complicated ritual, descending to the minutest details, regulated from without the religious life of the Jew. He could not move in any direction without finding himself confronted by some law or precept, which confined his liberty of action, and prescribed what course he was to take. If a tabernacle was to be erected, it must be of a certain size, of certain materials, of certain furniture; if there must be priests to minister in it, their tribe and family, their ritual of consecration, their very garments must all be accurately prescribed; if the worshipper would offer sacrifice, a number of minute ceremonies must be observed. His food, his raiment, his domestic arrangements, were matter of law. "Touch not, taste not, handle not;" this was the spirit of the Mosaic religion; and by reason of the theocratical form of government, all the regulations of the law, political and domestic, as well as those appertaining to the worship of God, partook of a religious character. The law, in short, was "a schoolmaster" to bring the Jew to Christ; a preparatory system working, after the manner of educational systems, from without inwards; that is, aiming, by means of external discipline, at impressing certain habits of thought and feeling, as the mould impresses its figure on the passive clay. Under such a system, a ceremonial law had its natural place; just as in the process of education, especially its earlier stages, we content ourselves with literal prescriptions, and multiply rules to meet every possible case. And if it be asked why so elementary a system was necessary, the reply is that the Jew, when first placed under his law, was incapable of a more spiritual one. Both in knowledge and in spiritual power he was a child, Gal. iv. 3; the great truths veiled under the Levitical ritual were but dimly, if at all, apprehended by him; the gift of the spirit was not his by covenant, Jn. vi. 40; as a child consequently he was treated. And it was only by slow degrees, as prophecy expanded its scope, and the temporal theocracy began to be shaken, that he learned to separate the letter from the spirit, and to pass from the childhood to the manhood of religion.

Let the volume of the New Testament be opened, and how different, in the point under consideration, is the religious system there portrayed! Christ assuredly was no lawgiver in the sense in which Moses was. Had he been so, he would have commenced his ministry by laying down a complicated system of enactments, by establishing a ritual and a graduated hierarchy. But nothing of this kind appears in the original record; a ceremonial law finds no place in the first promulgation of Christianity. Christ appears in the character of a teacher; and if at the close of his ministry he instituted the two sacraments, as visible pledges of union with himself and with his people, yet in their nature and in the principle of their operation they were entirely different from legal ordinances. They were not to the disciples new in form, though they were so in application; they are not the formative instruments but the visible expression of the life within. They were not given in conjunction with the appointment of a priestly order, in whose hands alone they were to possess a covenanted validity; nor with a prescribed ritual. Believers are to be baptized in the name of the Father,

Son, and Holy Ghost; baptized Christians are to eat of the bread and drink of the cup; thus much, and not much more, can be positively gathered from the terms of the original institution, which comprises no liturgical formulary, and seems purposely to decline any details of ritual. And this, because Christians are regarded as no longer children, but men in discernment, in whose case therefore general rules take the place of literal prescriptions. The same may be said of the apostolic appointments which meet us later on in the inspired pages. We have certain general principles, certain leading precedents, laid down for the guidance of Christian societies; but, as before, a studied absence of minute detail, a singular abstinence from positive legislation on such points. It seems as if the apostles thought that Christians could be trusted, to a great extent, to frame regulations for themselves, always of course in an apostolical spirit, as circumstances might call for a contraction or extension of the existing ones. The band which encircles Christianity in the Christian Scriptures is of elastic materials. In nothing is the difference between the two dispensations more marked than in the gradual manner in which the visible organization of the church proceeded. While the Mosaic system was imposed perfected at once in all its organic parts, the polity of the church advanced step by step as need required. Had the apostles followed the analogy of the earlier economy, they would have carried about with them a fixed model, which they would have set up at once in all its integrity wherever they obtained a footing. How differently they proceeded needs not to be pointed out. As long as the simpler arrangements sufficed, they were suffered to remain; it was only when difficulties arose, or the extension of Christianity rendered additional organization necessary, that the apostles interfered to supply the defect. The diaconate arose from incidental circumstances; presbyters and bishops were the supply for obvious necessities. Creeds and liturgies had the same origin. When heresies arose, more stringent tests had to be applied to candidates for baptism; when a mixed multitude began to crowd into the church, it was no longer safe, as at the first, to trust the exercises of public devotion to unpremeditated efforts. In short, the Christian society followed the law of all societies which have their true being within: it developed itself from within outwards; not, like the Mosaic system, in the reverse direction. The point at which the papal theory became unchristian was when it transformed this process of natural development into a system of prescribed law; as when it asserts that episcopacy was in the original draught of ecclesiastical polity given by Christ to the apostles, that the pope is jure divino head of the visible church, &c.; from which, of course, it follows that all who may separate from the Papacy are as much transgressors of a divine ordinance as were Korah, Dathan, and Abiram.

If the church then be, in its idea, a community of those who are in vital union with Christ, and under the influence of his Spirit, it is obvious why we cannot identify it, under this aspect, with the aggregate of local Christian societies in the world. For we know, both from the prophetic announcements of Christ himself, and from experience, that every visible church is like a field containing tares mixed with the wheat; containing, that is, many who, though by profession Christians, are not members of Christ, nor led by his Spirit, but who cannot at present be separated from external communion with the true believers. These are not really of the church, that is, of the church in its truth; but are accidentally, in this life, joined to it: hereafter Christ himself will dissolve the outward connection, Mat. xxv. 32. Add to this that in visible churches we never can do more than approximate to the proper position which each member of Christ holds in his body. Many are first in a visible church who are last in the true church, and vice versâ. And Scripture, as we have seen, recognizes the distinction; speaking of churches, but also of the Church, which is the body of Christ. It is only to this latter that the attributes of the Constantinopolitan creed really belong. It is only of this that it can be truly said that it is holy. This too alone is one; one by an organic unity, and not merely by sameness of parts. If the Papal theory of the visible unity of the church under one visible head be not, as it is not under present circumstances, capable of realization, the only unity of which local churches, as such, are susceptible is sameness of polity, faith, and sacraments; but in no proper sense are they one society, which implies a central government: they are independent communities, founded on the same principles and having the same objects, and so far only are one, one as the monarchies of Europe are one. But Scripture speaks of a higher unity than this; of a unity under one "Head, from whom the whole body" is "fitly joined together and compacted;" of an organic unity, or that which results from the connection of the members with the Head and with each other. Such a unity the true church alone possesses; being, in fact, always one society, or respublica, under its unseen Head, governed and animated by one Spirit, but not yet manifested in its corporate capacity, Ro. viii. 19. To the invisible church too alone belong, in their proper and full meaning, the theoretical terms, election, adoption, priesthood, temple, and sacrifice, &c.; the body of Christ now occupying the place of the theoretical nation in its collective capacity; while in local churches the synagogue reappears. Hence, in such churches there is no proper priesthood or sacrifice; if these terms are used under the gospel it is only figuratively (see 1 Pe. ii. 9; He. xiii. 15). The Christian temple is not a material building, but "the blessed company of all faithful people," the "living stones, built up a spiritual house, to offer spiritual sacrifices," 1 Pe. ii. 5.

Do we then make two distinct churches, a visible and an invisible? By no means. If the distinction between the church in its idea, and the church as it appears, is scriptural, not less so is the indissoluble connection between the two. The connection lies in the means of grace, the Word and the sacraments, which, administered by visible churches as such, are the instruments whereby the body of Christ is replenished with members and built up in the faith. To visible churches this ministry is committed, for, the virtue of Christ's ordinances depending upon his promise and the faith of the recipient, it matters not by whom they are administered; the unworthiness of the minister, however much to be lamented, is no bar to the efficacy of the Word and the sacraments; and since by these the true church is gathered in, it is obvious that the members of Christ are always part, a larger or a smaller one, according to circumstances, of some local Christian society: Extra vocatorum cœtum non sunt quærendi electi. Hence, to constitute a true church, it is sufficient that there the pure Word of God be preached, and the sacraments duly administered; for then we are assured that there, in that locality, there will be a part of Christ's body; which, when tribulation or persecution thins the ranks of mere nominal Christians, may become more and more co-extensive with the visible society, though we cannot expect that it ever will be exactly so. The error of sectarian movements has commonly been, the forgetting that this hidden condition, this external conjunction with heterogeneous elements, is an imperfection necessarily attaching at present to the body of Christ: whence the violent attempts to sever the connection, and form a society of true saints; that is, to manifest the sons of God before the time;—attempts which, as might be expected, end in disappointment. A very brief time elapses before the separatist body, however pure at first, attracts to itself impure adjuncts; and so the work has to be begun again, with no better success. It is, in truth, one and the same church that is the object of consideration, only regarded under different aspects or from different points of view, according as we fix our attention on its external notes, and its visible condition in this world, or its true essential being. The distinction therefore is not absolute, but relative; which, if it had been borne in mind, would have obviated many of the misconceptions that have prevailed on this subject.

CHU'SHAN- OR CUSHAN-RISHATHAIM [Ethiopian of wickedness], the somewhat peculiar name of a king of Mesopotamia, who oppressed the Israelites for eight years. They were delivered from his hand by Othniel, Ja. iii. 8-10. No other king of Mesopotamia is mentioned in history; and it is probable that this person was merely a chieftain of the district, who by dint of superior energy, and perhaps unscrupulous policy, established for himself a sort of kingdom, which proved of ephemeral existence.

CHU'ZA (Xoufás), the steward of Herod Antipas, mentioned only in connection with his wife Joanna, who was one of the pious women that ministered to the Lord of their substance, Lu. viii. 3.

CILICIA, the ancient division of Asia Minor which lay nearest to Syria, having the Mediterranean on the south, Pamphylia on the west, the Taurus range on the north, separating it from Lycaonia and Cappadocia, and on the east the range of Amanus with the Syrian frontier. It was divided into two parts—a western, called Cilicia Pedias (level or plain), and an eastern, Cilicia Tracheia (rough or mountainous); the former well watered and fertile, the latter rugged, and chiefly fit for timber and pasturage. The boundary-lines, in regard to these divisions, and in regard to the separation of Cilicia from Pamphylia, seem to have been either shifting or imperfectly known; for ancient authors are by no means agreed in the accounts they give of them. Strabo, for example, places the boundary between Cilicia and Pamphylia at Coracesium, 26 miles farther east than it is placed by Pliny, who takes the river Melas as the separation; while another, Mela, fixes on the promontory Anemurium, 50 miles more to the east than Strabo's. It is about the river Lamus, which Strabo makes the division between the two parts of

Cilicia, that the country begins materially to change its character; the portion to the west, the Tracheia, contains a comparatively narrow sea-board of level country, while to the east, the Pedias, the beach becomes low and gravelly, and there are broad plains that extend inland to the foot of the mountains. These plains are intersected by three considerable rivers, which being fed in summer by the melting of the snow on Taurus, are remarkable for the coldness—the Cydnus (now called Bhulgar Dagh), on which Tarsus stood, up to which it was navigable in ancient times, though now, on account of bars formed near the mouth, it can only be entered by the smallest boats; the Sarus (the present Sihun), which is about 300 feet wide at the mouth; and then farthest to the east, and flowing into the Bay of Issus, is the Pyramus (Jihun), the largest of the three, which is estimated by Xenophon at 600 feet wide at the point where it was passed by the army of Cyrus (Anab. i. 4, sect. 1), but it is supposed to have since then changed its direction, and to enter the sea upwards of 20 miles to the east of its ancient outlet; it is now about 500 feet wide near the mouth. Besides ordinary products, the district was distinguished for its breed of horses, its saffron, and also a sort of cloth, made of goats' hair, which went among the Romans by the name of cilicium. "Cilicia, surrounded by mountain barriers, with a long coast and numerous ports, a fertile plain, and mountains covered with forests, possessed great natural advantages. Its position between Syria on the one side, and the rest of Asia Minor on the other, made it the highway from the Hellespont and the Bosphorus to the eastern shore of the Mediterranean, and the middle course of the Euphrates. Its proximity to Syria invites the cupidity of any one who is master of that country; and the Greek rulers of Egypt coveted the possession of the opposite coast of Cilicia, which contains the materials of shipbuilding, which Egypt does not" (Smith's Dict. of Greek and Rom. Geography). It would appear that the Romans about the Christian era sometimes coupled Cilicia with Syria for one provincial administration. (See article CYRENUS.) The more immediate occasion of this was the necessity of subduing, and keeping in subjection, the hardy mountaineers, with their bold and troublesome chiefs, who held possession of the higher and less cultivated districts of the region.

The Cilicians are understood to have been of Aramaic origin, and are expressly said by Herodotus to have derived their name from Cilix, a son of Agenor, the Phœnician (vii. 91). It was not till after the time of Alexander that the Greeks began to settle in it; but in process of time they became the possessors of its chief towns and the leaders of its civilization. Tarsus on the Cydnus, Seleuchia on the Calycadnus, Antiochia and Arsinoe on the coast of the Tracheia, were all Greek towns; and Tarsus rose to become one of the great schools for taste and learning in the ancient world. It has acquired a greater renown, however, from being the birthplace of the apostle Paul. Mopsuestia or Mopsus, another town situated on the Pyramus, and near the eastern border of the province, also acquired celebrity from having become toward the close of the fourth century the residence of Theodore, whose theological writings exercised a powerful influence in the East, and gave rise to considerable heats and controversies. Shortly before the Christian era, the sea along the Cilician coast had been much infested by pirates, who sided with Mithridates in the war carried on by that monarch against Rome, and were also extensively engaged in the slave trade. But they were at last mastered by Pompey; and the sea, as well as the land in that part of the world, was brought under the all-powerful sway of Rome.

CINNAMON (सिन्धु). Like cassia, cinnamon is mentioned in the Old Testament only as a perfume, Ex. xxx. 23; Pr. vii. 17; Ca. iv. 14. Amongst ourselves it is chiefly used by the cook as a condiment, and by the physician as a tonic and carminative, a gentle cordial and stimulant.

The best cinnamon is procured from Cinnamomum zeylanicum, extensively cultivated in Ceylon and Java. This little tree belongs to the laurel family, and the leaf is not unlike the laurel, though of a lighter green.

[173.] Cinnamon—Cinnamomum zeylanicum.

The white blossom comes out with great profusion, and for many miles around Colombo brightens all the landscape in its season, although it diffuses hardly any perceptible odour through the air. This flower is followed by a nut, from which an oil is extracted, and as this oil burns with a delightful fragrance, when receiving ambassadors and on high state occasions the kings of Candy used to have lamps of it burning in their audience chamber. The wood itself is pervaded by the same grateful perfume, and walking-sticks of cinnamon wood are highly prized, as well as little articles of cabinet-work. (Percival's Account of Ceylon, p. 336-351.)

When branches of the tree are three years old, and not more than two or three inches in diameter, they are lopped off and peeled. The epidermis and green pulpy matter are afterwards carefully scraped off, and the inner bark which remains, of a brownish yellow colour, is made up into quills, with the smaller introduced into the larger, dried in the sun, and packed up in bundles.

In commerce cassia lignea, chiefly from the Chinese markets, is often substituted for cinnamon. The cassia has a stronger and coarser flavour, a darker colour, and a shorter resinous fracture, and its decoction gives a blue colour when treated with tincture of iodine, which the true cinnamon does not. "The great consumers of cinnamon are the chocolate-makers of Spain, Italy, France, and Mexico, and by them the difference in flavour between cinnamon and cassia is readily detected. An extensive dealer in cinnamon informs me that the Germans, Turks, and Russians prefer cassia, and will not purchase cinnamon, the delicate flavour of which is not strong enough for them. In illustration of this, I was told that some cinnamon (valued at 3s. 6d. per lb.) having been by mistake sent to Constantinople, was unsaleable there at any price; while cassia lignea (worth about 6d. per lb.) was in great request." CINNERETH. See CHINNERETH.

CIRCUMCISION. The word denotes simply the cutting around, but is used technically of that particular cutting off or around of the foreskin in males, which from early times had become an established practice among various nations. It first comes into notice in Scripture in connection with the covenant made with Abraham, Ge. xvii. 10-14, "This is my covenant which ye shall keep between me and you, and thy seed after thee: every man-child among you shall be circumcised. And ye shall circumcise the flesh of your foreskin; and it shall be a token of the covenant betwixt me and you. And he that is eight days old shall be circumcised among you, every man-child in your generations; he that is born in the house, or bought of any stranger, which is not of thy seed. . . . And the uncircumcised man-child, whose flesh of his foreskin is not circumcised, that soul shall be cut off from his people; he hath broken my covenant." One might almost gather from these words that the rite was not appointed as something absolutely new; but was rather adopted as, to some extent, an existing practice, and, with a definite prescription as to the day for its administration, associated with the divine covenant as the proper rite of initiation into its privileges, prospects, and obligations. Such, at least, appears to have been the fact. There is undoubted evidence of the rite having been practised from very early times by the Egyptians and Ethiopians. Herodotus professes himself in doubt whether its origin ought to be ascribed to the one of these nations or the other (ii. 104), but seems confident that it should be sought nowhere else. This would not of itself, however, be decisive of the question; for Herodotus proves himself to be no authority except in regard to the existence of the custom; since he affirms of the Syrians in Palestine, that they acknowledged they had derived it from the Egyptians—a palpable mistake; and the commencement of the practice among the chosen people dates from eight to ten or eleven centuries before the time of Herodotus—an enormous period in the early history of the world, and quite sufficient to admit of any practice like this having extended to and become naturalized in quarters entirely different from the place of its origin. And if the relation of the Israelites towards the Egyptians and other races in the north of Africa had been such as to have made it natural for the latter to borrow in matters of this sort from them, the just conclusion, so far as historical grounds go, would be to make the first existence of circumcision coeval with its institution as connected with the Abrahamic covenant; for the record of this is by far our earliest historical notice of its observance. But it cannot be fairly said that the position of the Israelites in Egypt, or their relation subsequently to the inhabitants of the north of Africa, was of the kind required for such a derivation of the practice. It was not from those who were first despised or hated as an insignificant band of herdsmen, and afterwards eyed with jealousy as rivals or striven against as enemies, that the proud Egyptians—who sought to take the lead among the nations, and gloried in being reckoned the teachers not the disciples of others in respect to religion and manners—were at all likely to borrow the rite of circumcision; and this view of its origin and diffusion through that part of Africa, once zealously maintained (for example by Witaius in his Ægyptiaca), is now commonly abandoned.

It is not so easy to determine either the precise region where the practice originated, or the grounds which led to its adoption. From the measure of painfulness and mutilation involved in the operation, it could not but be otherwise than repugnant to the natural feelings; and it must have been associated with some important considerations of a physical or religious kind, before it could have obtained such early and widespread prevalence. It has been supposed, and is still maintained in certain quarters with a plentiful degree of confidence, that the primary ground of its adoption was of a physical nature—that in the places of its first rise and most general prevalence it was actually found to be conducive to health, and was believed to be productive of fruitfulness, and was hence regarded as a sort of medicinal application (Kaltich on Genesis xvii.). The proof of this, however, is very meagre, and far from sufficient to establish the position for which it is adduced. It is true, Philo long ago thought that the practice had originated in the belief of its tendency to promote health and fruitfulness; but, like many other of Philo's views, this was merely the opinion of a philosophical religionist speculating in his closet. "It prevents the disease of carbuncle"—much, we suppose, as the amputating of the foot would prevent gout; but there are not many that for the sake of avoiding the contingency of a very occasional disease of either sort, would think of forestalling the evil by such a remedy. It is also stated that it is a preventive against certain local disorders in the parts, that it precludes physical inconvenience among the bushmen, that the attempted abolition of something similar to circumcision among the females in Abyssinia, through the exertions of certain Catholic missionaries, was followed by dangerous physical consequences, which obliged them to desist—all manifestly gross exaggerations of some fancied, or at most merely exceptional and peculiar cases. Why is no physical inconvenience or corporeal malady (of a general description) found from the want of the practice among tribes and nations inhabiting similar latitudes and following like occupations to those of the peoples among whom it has prevailed? It is perfectly possible, that men in certain circumstances may have supposed they incurred the maladies and inconveniences referred to from the want of circumcision, or avoided them from having undergone it; but the things themselves are so partial, and the occasions so rare, on which the occurrence of them could be attributed to such a cause, that it is in the highest degree improbable the practice should, for such reasons, have acquired the prevalence and tenacity of a national custom among even a single people, to say nothing of people so widely removed, and so differently circumstanced, as the Egyptians, the Ethiopians, the Troglodytes, the Kafirs of South Africa, and islanders in the Pacific Ocean.

The connection of the practice with cleanliness, which in the case of the Egyptians was very distinctly indicated by Herodotus (ii. 37), and which was also mentioned by Philo, has something more to be said in its favour, as a natural reason for the existence of the practice. It might at least have some weight with so peculiar a people as the ancient Egyptians—so peculiar also in their notions of cleanliness, that for the sake of this, Herodotus tells us, they drank from cups of brass, which they scoured every day; wore linen garments always newly washed; and that the priests, who were the kind of pattern-men, washed themselves in cold water twice every day and twice every night, and even shaved their whole body every third day, that no vermin might be harboured about their persons. The historian may have been perfectly right in saying of them, that "they circumcised themselves for the sake of cleanliness, thinking it better to be clean than to be handsome." Yet one can scarcely think, that even for them this could be an adequate reason for the existence of a really national practice; it might possibly go far to account for it among the priests, the separated and, as to cleanliness, the normal men; but its connection with cleanliness was too limited and incidental to originate and maintain it as a general observance among the mass of the people; and certainly it could have little weight with the savage Troglodytes, and the barbarous or semi-barbarous nations in other parts of Africa that are said to have practised the rite from the remotest antiquity. There is, however, some reason to doubt whether it actually had a national prevalence among the Egyptians, or was not confined chiefly to the priestly and military classes. Herodotus, no doubt, speaks of it as if it had been national; but he was wont to judge too much from apparent circumstances—wont also to draw too general and sweeping conclusions from partial facts, and even sometimes to take for facts what were but vague traditions or virtual fables; and it may still have been the case at the time he visited Egypt, that neither were the people as a whole circumcised, nor were motives of cleanliness the sole ground for its observance by those who practised the rite. The passage in Jos. v. 2-9, so often referred to (still also by Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, v. 317; and Kaltich on Ge. xvii. 10) as a proof of the universal practice of circumcision among the Egyptians in ancient times, and of their accounting those unclean who had not undergone it, is quite misunderstood when so applied. After stating that the people had not been circumcised who had been born during the sojourn in the wilderness, and that in obedience to the command of the Lord Joshua caused them to be circumcised after the passage of Jordan had been effected, "the Lord," it is added by the historian, "said to Joshua, This day have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you;" as if—such is the interpretation put upon the words—the Egyptians had been cognizant of the fact of the rite of circumcision having fallen into desuetude during the forty years' sojourn, and had in consequence been taunting the Israelites as an unclean people. An altogether improbable supposition—for, cut off as the Israelites were from any direct intercourse with Egypt, how were the Egyptians so much as to know that the rite had ceased to be performed? Other tribes, it was known, practised it in the desert—and why might not they? Why, at any of the stations where the Israelites rested for weeks or months together, might they not have found time and opportunity to practise so comparatively simple an operation? One does not see how the knowledge, or even the suspicion of the fact in question, should have got abroad in Egypt, and formed there the subject of remark to the prejudice of Israel. Nor, if their uncircumcised state had become perfectly known in Egypt, does it appear how the administration of the rite should of itself have been sufficient to take away the reproach of Egypt. The children of Israel entered Egypt as a circumcised people, and yet were so far from being free from reproach, that they were looked upon as a sort of abomination by the Egyptians, Ge. xlv. 34; so little, on the Egyptian side, had circumcision to do, either with the first occasion, or with the ultimate removal of a ground of reproach.

It is to other and more serious aspects of the position of the Israelites that we must look for a proper explanation of what is said respecting the rolling away of the reproach of Egypt; their old task-masters there had something else and greater to reproach them with, in connection with the wilderness sojourn, than the simple non-observance of circumcision. For the Israelites had left Egypt with strong assurances and high hopes of being soon put in possession of a land flowing with milk and honey; but how had it turned out! Instead of a quiet settlement in a rich and fertile territory, they had found only a wandering to and fro in the trackless desert. This was the reproach that Moses anticipated, when he heard for the first time of the Lord's purpose to fall from the immediate execution of the covenant-promise: "Wherefore should the Egyptians speak and say, For mischief did he bring them out, to slay them in the mountains, and to consume them from the face of the earth?" Ex. xxxii. 12. And so again, when the determination was actually formed to delay the fulfilment for a generation, and a threat was even held out of an utter destruction of the people, the same thought recurs to Moses—"Then the Egyptians will hear it, and will tell it to the inhabitants of this land;" "Remember thy servants Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; lest the land whence thou broughtest us out say, Because the Lord was not able to bring them into the land which he promised them; and because he hated them, he hath brought them out to slay them in the wilderness," Nu. xiv. 13, 14; De. ix. 27, 28. This was emphatically the reproach of Egypt, which she cast upon the covenant-people up till the period in question—the non-fulfilment of the grand promise of the covenant. But why should the rolling away of that reproach be so especially coupled with the circumcising of the new generation, after they had crossed the Jordan? Simply because this was the fit and proper time for initiating into the covenant those in whose behalf its provisions were now to be implemented. The fathers—all the full-grown men who had left Egypt—had, on account of their wayward and rebellious spirit, been rejected by the Lord; the covenant, so far as they were concerned, was suspended, and had necessarily to be so for their children too, till these children had arrived at the state when they could act for themselves. These historical circumstances are distinctly noticed by way of explanation in the passage of Joshua. Hence, circumcision, the peculiar sign of the covenant, properly fell into abeyance, while the covenant itself was under a kind of suspense; as, on the other hand, when the time for fulfilling the covenant had returned, it was fit that the people should, by the administration of the distinctive rite, be again formally brought under its yoke; and fit, too, that the precise moment for doing this should be when, by the destruction of the Amorites on the east side of the Jordan, and the miraculous crossing of the Jordan itself, the people had undoubted evidence of the Lord's purpose to fulfil all he had promised. They had now received ample encouragement to enter into the covenant; and to indicate the nearness and certainty of the connection between this and the fulfilment, the Lord declared that already the reproach of Egypt was rolled away; there should be no longer occasion for it. (See Calvin, Hengstenberg, Kell, on the passage referred to.)

Rightly viewed, then, no support can be obtained from this passage in favour of the view that the Egyptians as a nation practised circumcision, and that they so generally associated it with notions of cleanness as to reproach those who omitted its observance with being in a shameful condition. That the Egyptians viewed the practice as having some sort of relation to cleanness, and that this might be regarded as one of the reasons which led to its observance there, especially among the priests, is all that can fairly be affirmed on the subject. Whether or not it was ever so generally practised in Egypt as to be a national usage, it appears to have been regarded as strictly binding only on the priesthood, and those who were initiated into the sacred mysteries—on which account, it is reported the priests refused to initiate Pythagoras, unless he first submitted to be circumcised (Clem. Alex. Strom. l. p. 130). It did, therefore, in point of fact come to be associated with religion—a religion that made undue account of outward distinctions and merely natural virtues—and was recognized as the distinctive badge of those who were its more peculiar representatives. Now, nothing more is needed as a basis for the use made of it in connection with the covenant of God. For, what was the design of that covenant? It was to constitute those who belonged to it a chosen people—a people brought into such near relationship to Jehovah, that they should be called a kingdom of priests, Ex. xix. 6; De. vi. 4, 7; and might, as having such a peculiar interest in him, be at once the subject of his distinguishing goodness and the witnesses of his truth and glory. The institution afterwards of a priestly class in Israel in no respect cancelled this general destination of the people; it only served, by the elevation of a more select portion, with its peculiar rights and symbolical ministrations, to exhibit the true nature of the calling and destination of the people. Now, in affixing circumcision to such a covenant, as its peculiar badge and seal, the one necessarily came to participate in the character of the other; circumcision could no longer be what it was in Egypt, and perhaps in other heathenish countries, a mere symbol of cleanness or of separation to a distinct religious position; it became impressed with the moral nature of the God of the covenant to which it was attached, and symbolized the holiness which was the essential element and grand aim of his character and government. Cleanness in the spiritual sphere—in other words, separation from the defilements of nature, and surrender as from a new position to the love and service of God—this, which was to form the characteristic of members of the covenant, became also the import of the distinctive badge or sign of the covenant—circumcision.

There was a natural fitness in the ordinance for such a purpose, apart from the historical reason for its employment. By the mutilation it practises on the organ of generation, it points to corruption in its source as adhering to the very being and birth of men—propagating itself by the settled constitution of nature, which transmits from parent to child a common impurity. Most appropriately, therefore, might a rite, which consisted in cutting off somewhat of the filth of the flesh of nature's productiveness, be taken as the symbol of a covenant, which called men away from nature's pollution, and sought to raise them into blessed fellowship with the life and holiness of God. It, as it were, espoused the circumcised to Jehovah, Ex. iv. 25, that he and his offspring might occupy a higher sphere, and follow the direction of a purer impulse, than could be found in the merely natural line of things.

There can be no doubt that the better part of the Israelites themselves perfectly understood this symbolical import and bearing of the rite of circumcision. They knew that it bespoke purity of heart and conduct, or implied the call to a holy life, on the part of the members of the covenant, and was no mere badge of external separation from the other nations of the earth—which, indeed, it could but imperfectly do from its prevalence among surrounding tribes. Hence Moses expressed his incapacity for the high and holy work to which the Lord called him, by saying that "he was a man of uncircumcised lips," Ex. vi. 12; it was but corrupt nature that spoke in him. Hence also he exhorted the people, with reference to the peculiar service before them, to "circumcise the foreskin of their heart, and be no more stiff-necked," De. x. 16; as again at a later period the prophet Jeremiah, "Break up your fallow-ground, and sow not among thorns; circumcise yourselves to the Lord, and take away the foreskins of your heart," ch. iv. 4. So that St. Paul simply indicated what all along was involved in the ordinance, and put on it a Christian interpretation, when he said, "We are the circumcision who worship God in the Spirit," Phi. iii. 3. It had become, however, too closely interwoven with the ceremonies of Judaism, and was itself of a nature too grossly carnal, to be suited to the dispensation of the gospel, and was consequently, with the introduction of the new era, supplanted by another ordinance of like spiritual import, and in better accordance with the genius of Christianity.

In connecting circumcision with the Abrahamic covenant, the Lord expressly ordained its administration on the eighth day: "And he that is eight days old (literally, a son of eight days) shall be circumcised among you, every man-child in your generations." There is no evidence that any of the ancient tribes or nations among whom circumcision prevailed, except those sprung from Abraham, performed it at so early a period; it seems rather, so far as their practice in this respect is known, to have been reserved to the age of puberty. There may still, however, have been something in the usages of early times which rendered it fitting to have the rite performed about the eighth day, so as the better to draw men's attention to its spiritual import, and prevent them from substituting other things of a superstitious nature in its place. Religious rites connected with the period of childhood appear to have been introduced at an early period, and in later times at least, most probably also in earlier, were wont to be connected with the commencement of the second week's existence of the child. Among the Latins the day for giving the child a name was the eighth if a girl, the ninth if a boy; and there was on the occasion a solemnity preceded by a lustration of the child, on which account it was called the lustration-day (dies lustricus). The tenth day appears to have been commonly observed among the Greeks for a similar purpose, though the seventh is also mentioned; and it was usual to signalize it by a sacrifice and a feast, to which friends were invited. These customs are indicative of a tendency, that probably discovered itself generally in the early history of nations, to have, along with the imposition of a name on the child, whereby it came to assume a kind of separate individuality, a religious ceremony, having respect to its purification from sin and its commendation to the favour of Heaven. And as circumcision, from its nature and design, was not only a rite of purification, but an initiatory rite of that description, introducing the child into its covenant life and prospects, it was fit that it should be coeval with what stamped the child's individuality—that, at the end of one of the briefest revolutions of time, on the entrance of a fresh week of his earthly existence, when he received his proper name, he should also receive the sign of his covenant-standing. In later times we find it expressly noted that the name and the circumcision went together, Lu. ii. 20; and the probability is it was so from the first. The son of an Israelite was thus constituted a member of the covenant at the same moment that he received his designation as a distinct member of the family.

In the case of foreigners coming to the knowledge of the true God, and seeking to be admitted to a participation in the blessing of the family of Abraham, circumcision was indispensable. Strangers might come and worship, without it, in the court of the Gentiles, but they could not be recognized as members of the covenant. Of those who submitted to this condition on a large scale, there were the Idumeans, when they had been vanquished by John Hyrcanus (1 Mac. i. 41, 42), who must therefore have previously abandoned the practice, and the people of Adiabene with their king Izabates (Jos. Ant. ix. 2).

CISTERN. The word usually translated cistern in Scripture (בֹּר, bor) properly signifies a dug place or pit; and according to the connection, is to be taken in the sense of cistern, pit, prison-house, or sepulchre. When the reference is to a place used as a receptacle for waters, cistern is, of course, the proper rendering; and in that case, as the words for cistern and well very nearly correspond (bér and bor), so there is often no material difference between the things signified by them. For, one class of cisterns consisted of excavations formed around a spring, for the purpose of retaining the water, which at certain seasons bubbled up from below; and such might indifferently be called wells or cisterns. Others, however, and these what more commonly bore the name of cisterns, were covered reservoirs dug out of the rock or earth, into which, during the rainy seasons, either the rain itself or the waters of some flowing stream were conducted, and kept in store for the season of drought. And these again varied, according to circumstances, both in their dimensions and in the manner in which they were prepared—some being dug in the simplest style, others lined with wood or with cement, and others again fitted up with considerable ornament. Describing some of the commoner sort, on the route from 'Akka to Jerusalem, and near the village of Hableh, Dr. Robinson says, in the supplementary volume of his Researches, "We were here surrounded by cisterns dug out in solid rocks, mostly with a round opening at the top. Some were entirely open. One of them, seven feet long by five broad and three deep, was merely sunk in the rock, with two steps to descend into it. Another, of similar dimensions, had but one step left in it. A larger cistern was near the water-course; it was twelve feet long by nine broad, and about eight feet deep; two rude and very flat arches were thrown over it, and on these rested the covering of flat stones, some of which still remained. All these excavations were evidently ancient" (p. 137).

President Olin, in his Travels (ii. p. 84), describes something of a better sort near Hebron: "Just without the city are some cisterns, which probably belong to a very early age. A large basin, forty-seven paces square, stands outside the gate by which we entered the city. It was nearly full of greenish water, and has been repaired at a period apparently not very remote. It is of very solid workmanship, built of hewn limestone, and may be eighteen or twenty feet deep. The descent is by flights of stairs situated at the four corners, by which the water is brought up in vessels and skins, and poured into troughs for the flocks, or carried away for domestic uses. It was not at this time fit for drinking. Another pool, of smaller dimensions, occupies higher ground on the north side of the city. These reservoirs are filled by the rains, and are unconnected with any perennial fountain."

In a country like Palestine, to which summer is always more or less a season of drought, which can scarcely be said to have more than one perennial stream (the Jordan), it must from the earliest times have been one of the chief cares of the inhabitants to provide themselves with such artificial means of supply as cisterns; and no town of any size, not immediately on the banks of the Jordan, could have thought itself safe without them. The most exact information we have of any particular place in this respect relates to Jerusalem. The natural situation of the city is by no means advantageous for the supply of water. There are only three small fountains in its immediate vicinity, belonging to the valley of Jehoshaphat, and none in the city itself. Yet the supply of water must have been ample; for never, even during the long and terrible sieges which it has had to endure, do we read of any scarcity of water having prevailed; thousands are recorded to have perished of hunger, but no mention is made of their sufferings being aggravated by thirst. The besiegers often suffered from want of water, but not the besieged (Jos. Ant. xiii. 8, 2; Wars, v. 12, 3, 9, 4); plainly implying that the city was furnished with the means of laying in a large supply for the time to come. The peculiarity is briefly noticed in the description of Strabo: "Jerusalem—a rocky, well-inclosed fortress, within well-watered, but without wholly dry" (xvi. 2, 40). In explaining how it should have been so, we must again refer to Dr. Robinson, who says, "The main dependence of Jerusalem for water at the present day is on its cisterns; and this has probably always been the case. I have already spoken of the immense cisterns now and anciently existing within the area of the temple, supplied partly by rain-water and partly by the aqueduct. These of themselves in the case of a siege would furnish a tolerable supply. But in addition to these, almost every house in Jerusalem of any size is understood to have at least one or more cisterns, excavated in the soft limestone rock on which the city is built" (i. p. 490). He then refers to the house of a gentleman in which he resided, and which had so many as four cisterns, one of these measuring no less than thirty feet square and twenty deep. The water is conducted into these cisterns from the roof when rain falls; and with proper care remains pure and sweet through the whole of summer. Such now is, and such also from the remotest times must have been, the method taken to keep Jerusalem supplied with water; and much the same necessity existed in regard to most of the cities and towns in the land of Canaan.

Various allusions by way of figure are made to cisterns in Scripture. The breaking of the wheel at the cistern—the wheel that was used to send down and pull up again the bucket which drew water from the larger cisterns—is used in Ec. xii. 6, as an image of the breaking up of the animal economy, which perpetually sends, while it is at work, the flow of vital blood from the heart to the extremities. To drink waters out of one's own cistern is a proverbial expression, Pr. v. 16, for confining one's self to the legitimate sources of pleasure which God has associated with our state, as contradistinguished from those which are the property of others. But the merely human and artificial nature of cisterns, which are of man's workmanship and have no living spring within them, serve as a fit emblem of the insufficiency of creature-confidences, and of the folly of preferring these to the infinite and ever-flowing fulness of God—as in the solemn charge of the prophet, "My people have committed two evils; they have forsaken me, the fountain of living waters, and hewed them out cisterns, broken cisterns that can hold no water," Je. ii. 13.

CITIES OF REFUGE. See REFUGE (CITIES OF).
CITIZENSHIP played an important part in the ancient republics of Greece and Rome, to which there is no exact parallel in the history of the covenant-people. With the latter it was not the rights of a particular city to which importance was attached, but the rights of the community at large, in whatever particular locality any member of it might have his lot cast. In so far as relative distinctions existed, it was with tribes and families, not with particular cities, that they were connected. Citizenship in the ordinary sense rises into importance only once in Scripture—namely, in the case of the apostle Paul. He had by birth the rights of a Roman citizen; and these he put forward on one occasion to obtain a slight mark of respect in recompense for the wrong that had been done him, Ac. xvi. 57; on another, to shield himself from an unjust castigation, Ac. xxii. 26; and still on another, to secure for his cause an impartial hearing at Rome, when it was like to be overborne by the craft and subtlety of men in Judea, Ac. xxv. 11. The rights themselves of Roman citizens were of two classes: one higher, entitling the person who held the citizenship to vote in a tribe on any public measure, and also to enjoy the honours of magistracy, as well as to discharge the functions and pursue the occupations of private life. This was citizenship in the complete sense. But it could not be possessed by many; and a lower degree of citizenship was frequently possessed and exercised, by virtue of which one was entitled to claim the full protection of the laws, and enjoy the comforts and immunities of social life. The establishment of the empire, with the political changes to which it gave rise, naturally led to a gradual approximation of the two classes, by first lowering, then virtually abolishing the more distinctive privileges of the higher class. As possessed by the apostle Paul the right of citizenship must be understood to belong to the other class; it entitled him to the private liberties of a native Roman, and the protection of the general laws of the empire. How he should have come to acquire this right has been matter of dispute; but there is now no longer any doubt that it was acquired, not from his having been born in Tarsus (which was a free city only in the sense of having the right to be governed by its own magistrates), but as being the son of a father who, on grounds of personal merit or by purchase, had been raised to the rank of a citizen. It is a matter of certainty that Jews were not unfrequently Roman citizens (Jos. Ant. xiv. 10, 3; Wars, II. 14, 9).

Jewish citizenship—using the word in the more extended sense—depended on compliance with the terms of the covenant. The sacred was here the basis of the civil; and they only who by circumcision had been received within the bonds of the covenant, and afterwards conformed themselves to the rites and obligations it imposed, were entitled to a place in the commonwealth of Israel. The place thus acquired might be again forfeited by committing those transgressions which had capital penalties annexed to them, and doubtless in all cases when these were incurred, and when no repentance followed, the guilty individuals were excluded in the reckoning of Heaven; such souls, according to the oft-repeated formula, were cut off from among their people. But if we look to the outward, or human administration, this result by no means uniformly followed; and men might be, too commonly were, recognized as members of the Hebrew commonwealth after they had broken some of its fundamental laws. The right of citizenship, therefore, would vary, according as it might be a human or a divine point of view from which it was contemplated.

In one passage—though the reference is lost in our translation—St. Paul designates the place and calling of Christians from their connection with a city; he says, “our citizenship (or commonwealth, for in one or other of these related senses must πολιτευμα be understood) is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Saviour”—that is, even now we have our names enrolled as members of that celestial community, of which Christ is himself the ever-living Head; and it behoves us to act in accordance with the exalted position we occupy, and the animating prospects it sets before us.

CITY. This word is evidently used with some latitude in Scripture, so as to include the smaller towns, and sometimes even what must have been little more than straggling villages. For example, Cain is represented as building a city, Ge. iv. 17, and Bethel, the ancient Luz, is called a city at the time of Jacob's passing sojourn at it, Ge. xxviii. 16. These could then have been nothing but hamlets; and many similar cases might be referred to. Most commonly, however, the term was applied to larger places, and such as were surrounded with walls, strengthened at proper intervals by fortresses, and usually possessing besides a citadel or tower of greater strength in the centre. The cities of Palestine seem to have been commonly of this description, even so early as the conquest by the Canaanites; for the spies reported that their cities were “walled and very great,” and Moses himself describes them as “great and fenced up to heaven,” Nu. xiii. 28; De. ix. 1. The gates in the walls appear to have been made of different materials; as sometimes they are spoken of as burned with fire, which seems to imply that they were of wood, and sometimes they are said to have been made of brass Am. i. 7, 10; Is. xiv. 2. The cities also differed very much as to the character of the streets; in most cases they must anciently have been, as they still are, narrow; while there were others, though we know of none such in the land of Canaan, which had large open spaces and ample gardens within their precincts. Babylon, in particular, is well known to have been of this description. But the distinguishing features of each city will fall to be noticed in connection with the individual name.

CITY OF DAVID has a different sense in the New from what it bears in the Old Testament. By the angels who announced the birth of Christ, Bethlehem was called the City of David, Lu. ii. 11, as being the place where David had been born, and where he resided till he was anointed king. But the fortress of the Jebusites, which David took, and which he afterwards chose for his peculiar dwelling-place, went by the name of his city, 1 Ch. xi. 5. It was more commonly called Mount Zion.

CITY OF GOD was applied as a designation of Jerusalem, Ps. xlv. 4, on account of its being from the time of David the place where God more peculiarly put his name, and where the temple stood. The designation expressed its most glorious distinction.

CLAUDA, a small island, to the south-west of Crete, mentioned in the narrative of St. Paul's voyage and shipwreck, Ac. xx. 11, 12. Its modern name is Gozzo.

CLAUDIUS, the fifth Roman emperor, whose full name was Tiberius Claudius Nero Germanicus, succeeded Caligula, and reigned from A.D. 41 to 54. Compared with his predecessor, Claudius may be thought of with respect, though he was a weak man, the tool of women and of favourites, and among some good things did many also that were bad. His name occurs only twice in sacred history; first in connection with a famine, which was felt with severity in the East, Ac. xi. 28, seq.; and then as the author of a decree, which obliged all Jews to flee from Rome, Ac. xviii. 2. In regard to the former, his reign was noted for the frequent occurrence of scarcity (Lardner, Credibility, b. i. ch. 11); and in regard to the second, we have the express testimony of Suetonius, who in his life of this emperor (ch. 25) says, "He expelled the Jews from Rome, who were continually raising disturbances, Chrestus being their leader" (impulsores Chresto). It has commonly been supposed that by Chrestus is here meant Jesus Christ, and that Suetonius having heard of the fame of Jesus, imagined he had something to do with the local disturbances which led Claudius to banish the Jews for a time from Rome, or possibly meant to state that the disturbances themselves arose from contentings about the truth of Jesus. The point either way must still be held doubtful; but apart from it the passage contains a very explicit testimony to the fact recorded by St. Luke.

CLAUDIUS LYSIAS. See under LYSIAS.

CLEAN AND UNCLEAN are terms of frequent occurrence in connection with the rites and usages of the old covenant. Like everything there, while they have a primary bearing on the outward state and behaviour, they have also a higher and symbolical import. To get any distinct idea of the lessons intended to be conveyed by the arrangements respecting clean and unclean, it will be necessary to consider these in some detail.

I. The first distinction of the kind that meets us in Scripture is clean and unclean in respect to ANIMALS—animals, however, not in themselves, but in their relation to man's use. It appears so early as the deluge, and is referred to as an already existing distinction, not as one then for the first time introduced. Noah was commanded to take with him into the ark of every clean beast by sevens, and of the unclean by twos; for the reason, no doubt, that the one were required for purposes which the other were not, and which would render a single pair of each an inadequate supply for the necessities even of the small remnant of the human family preserved in the ark. These necessities, however, were not connected with food; for up till the period of the deluge there is no appearance of animal food having been either granted to men, or indulged in by them. Presently after the deluge, however, the liberty was conceded, and when first conceded, it seems to have been without restriction: "Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you, even as the green herb have I given you all things," Ge. ix. 3—not a certain portion merely of the living creaturehood, but the whole, in so far as man might find it serviceable for bodily support. The grant itself was unlimited; it was left to mankind themselves to set any limits they might choose to its application. We must look elsewhere, therefore, than to dietary regulations for the original ground of the distinction among animals into clean and unclean; and we can think of nothing but the ancient usages in regard to sacrifice. Indeed, the sacred narrative itself plainly enough points in this direction; for it tells us that Noah, on coming out of the ark, "built an altar unto the Lord; and took of every clean beast, and of every clean fowl, and offered burnt-offerings on the altar," Ge. viii. 20—the clean, therefore, were those deemed fit for sacrifice, the unclean such as were unfit.

As the origin of the distinction is lost in primeval antiquity, the principles on which it proceeded, and the lines of demarcation it drew, cannot be known with certainty. Our reasoning upon the subject must be to some extent conjectural. The history of the fall, however, forms the ground of a certain distinction in the animal world; the serpent being thenceforth pronounced accursed above all creatures, it could scarcely fail to be looked upon as the extreme type of an existing evil in nature—the palpable embodiment of something mischievous, and, as such, unclean, not to be brought into familiar contact with the pure and good. Observation and experience would soon enable the earlier inhabitants of the world to add to the same class, according as indications were discovered of wild natures or noxious qualities in the different species of creatures around them. And though there might be many with which their acquaintance was too partial to admit of their determining to which category they properly belonged, yet we can easily understand how birds and animals of prey, creatures armed with stings or other obvious weapons of offence, or animals like the swine, disgusting in their smell and filthy in their habits, would as by common consent be assigned to the class that had some affinity with evil, that bore on them the impress of impurity; while the tame and docile creatures of the ruminant species—the cow, the goat, the sheep—and in the feathered tribe the cooing, gentle dove, would not less naturally be viewed as reflections of the opposite qualities, because seeming to have something akin to the human instincts of mankind. Thus from the first there were found the occasion and elements of a certain distinction among the inferior creatures; and as animal sacrifice occupied the chief place in religious worship, the latter class of creatures, in which the good so obviously preponderated, would, as a matter of course, be deemed the proper materials wherewith to conduct the sacrificial service. Such a mode of thinking, in itself natural, would be greatly confirmed and rendered in a sense imperative, if—as there is good reason to believe—the Lord by an overt act laid the foundation of animal sacrifice, by himself taking the life of one or more animals, in order to provide a symbolical, as well as a real clothing for the first transgressors. (See SACRIFICE.)

The distinction thus begun, and probably at first confined within very narrow limits, was in process of time more fully developed, and extended from the institutions of worship to the articles of daily food. When the law entered, the scattered elements of sound thought and symbolical action which previously existed were in this, as in other departments of religion, formed into a regular system, so as to be made subservient to a properly varied and wholesome instruction. Probably little alteration was needed in regard to the victims for sacrifice, except to fix the line more definitely on the negative side between the clean and the unclean, as the general corruption of worship, and in particular the practice, very early introduced, of sacrificing to evil as well as to benignant deities, had gradually led to the immolation of nearly all sorts of animals. In Egypt pigs were sacrificed as well as sheep and oxen, and not only goats and bulls, but also dogs, cats, crocodiles, &c., were accounted sacred, and had their respective modes and places of divine honour. In the Mosaic law, therefore, a return was made to an earlier and purer system; and all sacrifices were confined to animals of the flock and herd—that is, sheep, goats, and cattle—and to birds of the dove species. But in respect to food a somewhat wider latitude was allowed, though only, one might say, in the same line. Thus the animals pronounced clean were those which at once chew the cud and divide the hoof, and which all belong substantially to the herd and the flock, simply including along with those just mentioned, creatures of the deer species. They are the kinds which in all countries and ages men have generally, and as it were instinctively, fixed upon for their chief supplies of animal food, being those that best concoct their own food. Of the four classes mentioned in Le. xi. 4-7, which approach the permitted line, yet are kept without it—the camel, because, while chewing the cud, he does not divide the hoof; the coney (Heb. אֶפְרָיִם, probably the jerboa), and the hare, because they chew the cud, but instead of a divided hoof, have a foot with three or more toes; and the swine, because there is the divided hoof without the chewing of the cud: they were not such as to occasion by their prohibition any material privation or inconvenience. The two first have nowhere been sought after as articles of food; and of the two last, the hare, from its shy and timid nature, never could be much used, and the swine, though by dint of modern refinement it has been turned into a common and wholesome means of support, still holds an inferior place, and appears to have stood yet lower in remote antiquity. The most degrading employment in the fields was that of swine-herd; and, in Egypt, if any even touched a pig he was obliged to bathe himself and wash his garments (Herodot. ii. 47).

The FISHES allowed for food were marked out by a distinction equally simple and characteristic with that of the animals: those which had fins and scales were to be accounted clean, all others unclean. And these, again, comprise a considerable proportion of such as are esteemed to this day the most wholesome and agreeable, and, indeed, relatively a much larger proportion of the fish than were accessible to the Israelites in Canaan; for those found in the Jordan and the Lake of Gennesaret mostly have the characteristics of the clean, and those also known to exist in the Mediterranean, along the Syrian coast—mackerel and other common sorts—are of the same description. The rule excluded from the table of the Israelites fishes of an oily nature, and shell-fish which are also, however, less digestible than the others; but it gave them all, or nearly all, that even in a culinary respect they could have occasion for.

In respect to BIRDS no specific rule is laid down, but certain kinds only are interdicted by name; and the names are such as to render it impossible for us in many cases to identify them. There can be little doubt, however, that they consisted almost entirely, perhaps it should be said without reserve entirely, of birds of prey; leaving all such as feed on grain, and are in nature akin to the domesticated animals, in the category of clean, and proper for food.

The INSECTS allowed to be eaten are described as those "which have legs above their feet, to leap withal upon the earth," such as "the locust, the bald locust, the beetle, and the grasshopper after their kind," Le. xi. 21, 22. The description evidently points to a quality that lifts the several species mentioned somewhat above the crawling, almy brood that are more properly comprised under the name of insects; and though even those allowed for use form very poor articles of food, they yet want the filthy and repulsive character which attaches to the insect tribe generally.

Now, it is clear, on a moment's reflection, that whatever may have been the design of drawing such distinctions between clean and unclean in food, there was nothing ascetic in the matter; the object could not have been to make any material abridgment of the ordinary pleasures of the table. For, with all that was cut off, enough was still allowed to gratify every reasonable indulgence; in each department of animal existence the best, the most wholesome, the most agreeable to the palate were freely allowed. So much was this the case, that the view might with some appearance of truth be maintained (as it has once and again been propounded, for example by Michaelis, and by Beard in Kitto's Cyclopaedia), which treats the regulations as in their main object of a sanitary nature, restraining the covenant-people from such articles of food as might tend to induce scrofulous or other diseases, and directing them to those which were suited to the climate and likely to produce cleanly habits and a healthful husbandry. This might not unfairly be said, if one looked simply to the physical aspect of the matter, and made account only of the relation between the animal natures to be sustained and the animal food given for their nourishment. But in the revelations of God to Israel, and the institutions he set up amongst them, nothing bears this merely natural and economical character; all is pervaded by the ethical spirit, and ever aims at bringing into view the eternal distinctions between good and evil of a moral kind, of right and wrong. Nor did the Lawgiver leave it at all doubtful that such also was his object in establishing the distinctions between clean and unclean in food. For the things forbidden are not simply laid under an interdict as unlawful, but they are pronounced abominations. Defilement, not merely some certain or contingent malady, should ensue on partaking of them, Le. xi. 10, 13, &c. And not only so, but the reason of all the prohibitions respecting food is at the close traced up to the holiness of God, and the necessity of his people being conformed to his image therein. "Ye shall not make yourselves abominable, . . . for I am the Lord your God; ye shall therefore sanctify yourselves, and ye shall be holy, for I am holy; neither shall ye defile yourselves with any manner of creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. For I am the Lord that bringeth you up out of the land of Egypt, to be your God; ye shall therefore be holy, for I am holy," Le. xi. 43-45. What explicit utterances, and strong iterations in regard to the connection between the dietary restrictions laid upon them and the moral character they were to maintain!—as if God would have no member of the covenant to be ignorant or unmindful of the relation in which all stood to holiness of heart and conduct!

We may not on this account require to overlook the propriety and wholesomeness of the restrictions in a dietary point of view, for here, as in many other respects, the moral may have based itself upon the natural, and the good in the one sphere served as a handmaid to point the way to a higher good in the other. But in regard to this higher good itself, we are not, like the Jewish doctors and their too numerous followers in Christian times, to think of the merely external separation which was to be maintained between Israel as a people on the one hand, and the different nations of the world on the other—as if Israel were imaged in the clean animals, Egyptians, Babylonians, Philistines, &c., in the unclean. For such a separation might have been kept up by mere diversity of customs, apart from anything essentially moral; and in itself was never set forth as an end to be aimed at, excepting in so far as it might be necessitated by the holiness of the one class and the abominable corruptions of the others. Otherwise than as a precaution for maintaining, or the means of exhibiting Israel's distinctive holiness, national isolation would have been an evil rather than a good; it could only have tended (as was proved by the actual result) to nourish in the covenant-people a spirit of self-complacent pride, and shut them up in a hardened exclusiveness from the surrounding nations, to whom they were called to be a blessing. We must therefore look deeper to get at the true rationale of the matter. Corporeal things were here the ordained symbols of spiritual; and as in the one Israel had to look primarily to himself, so had he in respect to the other. The clean and the unclean in the animal world had its counterpart in his own soul; and the watchfulness and the care with which he had to guide his choice among the living creatures around him, that were fitted to minister to his support or comfort, must perpetually admonish him of the like watchfulness and care he should apply to the region of his spiritual being. There also he is constantly in danger of coming into contact with abominations which may leave the taint of impurity behind. He must know every day, every hour of his waking existence, to refuse the evil and choose the good; and he can do so, only by accepting that which the law of his God declared to be akin to his own moral nature, precisely as the same law prescribed what was most akin to his physical nature for the materials of his bodily food. Thus the things of the corporeal life were made to serve as an image of the spiritual, and the restrictions laid upon the appetite, when properly understood, became like a bit and bridle to the soul.

The view now given of the distinction between clean and unclean in food, is in perfect accordance with the use made of it in the vision of St. Peter, Ac. x. When the door of entrance into the church of God was to be laid open to Gentiles as well as Jews—uncircumcised as well as circumcised—he was made to see a great sheet let down from heaven, filled with all manner of four-footed beasts of the earth, and wild beasts, and creeping things, and fowls of the air; and heard the word addressed to him, "Rise, Peter, kill and eat." His Jewish feeling led him instinctively to reply, "Not so, Lord; for I have never eaten anything common or unclean." But the voice again rejoined, "What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common." It is a superficial explanation of this parabolical vision to say, that it pointed directly and merely to the abolition of external distinctions between Jew and Gentile; which would imply, that the prohibition formerly existing in regard to the eating of unclean things had no other end than the maintenance of such distinctions. Its immediate and primary object was to teach that the sanctification wrought by God was the grand thing, and that where this had been accomplished, all other things, as of inferior moment, must be regarded as of themselves falling into abeyance. The distinction between clean and unclean in food was itself but an imperfect mode of helping the true sanctification of men, and was hence destined to go into desuetude the moment higher means were brought to bear with effect upon the end in question. Hence the ready application of the principle to the case of Cornelius and his family: God puts his Spirit into them, and gives them the undoubted seal of salvation, while they are still outwardly uncircumcised; but what of this? The end is already reached; the Lord himself has sanctified them; they have become under his own hand vessels of honour, fitted for the Master's use; "What then am I that I should withstand God?" So the apostle reasoned with himself, and justly. He thought that if the spiritual reality were now secured by the direct action of the word and Spirit of God, there was no longer any need for the old fleshly symbol; Heaven above had dispensed with it, and so should the Church on earth. We thus, no doubt, reach the abolition of any formal distinction on the part of God between Jew and Gentile; but only by first arriving at a deeper truth—the establishment of the new and more effective method of purification through the grace of Christ, whereby the old fleshly ordinances and symbolical distinctions became antiquated. This was the more immediate point aimed at.

II. There were various other grounds and occasions of uncleanness under the old covenant, but they all rest on the same fundamental principle as that now unfolded; and it is consequently the less needful to dwell upon them. In them also the external defilements were but the image of the internal; they continually spoke of a higher purification being needed than that which concerned the flesh.

For example, the mere touch of the dead defiled; though it were the carcase of a clean beast, yet if a man came anyhow into contact with it, he remained unclean till the even, Le. xi. 39; if it were the carcase of a beast in itself unclean, the impurity became intensified, and he could only be cleansed by a trespass-offering, Le. v. 2; if it were the dead body of a relative, or of some other fellow-creature, as the occasion was greater so the defilement also rose higher, and he could only be cleansed by the application of water, mingled with the ashes of the red heifer, continued at intervals during seven days, Nu. xix. 11, 12; and whenever death happened in a house or tent, all in it and about it remained under the taint of defilement for seven days. It was not that there was anything directly sinful in the contact itself with the dead in such cases—this may have come about without the slightest blame, or even in the discharge of imperative duty; but still the individual was brought into contact with that which was the wages of sin and the awful image of its accursed nature. Therefore, to carry up his thoughts to the source of the evil, and impress him with a salutary horror of the real defiler, the symbolical system under which he was placed made the occasions of accidental, or even necessary intercourse with the dead, the means of awakening salutary impressions in the soul. It virtually said, by all such appointments, Beware of sin, which is the death of the soul, and which is the ultimate cause of all that interferes with the enjoyment of life in the kingdom of God.

The same explanation is to be given of the uncleanness connected with leprosy, which was viewed as a sort of living death, the disease that bore the most exact image of sin. (See LEPROSY.)

But another, and indeed the only additional class of defilements of a general kind, sprang from what may not unfitly be called the opposite quarter—the generation and birth of children. Uncleaness was contracted, though in different degrees and differing also as to the form of purification by which cleansing was to be obtained, on the part of men by irregular discharges from the generative organs, and on the part of women by their periodical issues, and more especially by childbirth, La. iii. xv. This can only be understood by a reference to the law of generation, as the channel of transmitting the depravity which by reason of the fall has become inherent in human nature. It pointed to the pollution which has tainted the very fountain of life on earth, and perpetually pressed on men's attention the great truth uttered from the depth of the psalmist's experience, when he confessed, "Behold, I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me." Thoughtful persons could never have reflected on the legal ordinances of this description, without perceiving in them the clear indications of a sore disease at the very root of humanity, though humiliating circumstances in their own history, such as that which called forth the penitential cry of David, would at times give additional force and pungency to the lesson. On the same ground, perhaps, may best be explained the striking peculiarity in the case of a female, as compared with a male birth—the uncleaness in the former case being appointed to last for sixty-six days (in such a sense to last, that the mother could only then come to the house of God, and present her purification offering), while in the other the one half, or thirty-three days, were sufficient, La. xii. It is with woman that the fall was more directly connected; in her condition also that its present effects are more conspicuously manifest; and it was not unfit, that a standing testimony to such things should be embodied in the ordinances connected with her purification. Besides, the ordinance of circumcision, in the case of the male child, came at the commencement of the second week, to separate, in a sense, betwixt it and the mother, and raise it to an individual covenant position, while nothing of a like nature was administered to the female child. But considered either way, the link of original sin, connecting parent and child in a common evil, and the child of one sex more peculiarly than another, is what seems most naturally to account for the difference of time.

CLEMENT (Gr. Κλήμης) is named only once in the New Testament, but named with much esteem and honour by St. Paul, as one of those fellow-labourers who had been especially serviceable to him at Philippi, and whose names were in the book of life, Phi. iv. 3. Early tradition, appearing first in Origen, then confirmed by Eusebius, Jerome, and others of the fathers, have identified this person with the Clement of Rome, who, toward the close of the first century, wrote the epistle addressed by that church to the church at Corinth, included in the writings of the apostolical fathers. Roman Catholic authorities have universally accredited this tradition; but among Protestant writers opinions have varied. And, indeed, there are no grounds to go upon for any definite opinion, apart from tradition. So far as Scripture is concerned, we merely know that at the time of Paul's imprisonment at Rome, and within a short period of the close of his career, Clement was at Philippi, and apparently holding some office in the church there. He may, of course, afterwards have removed to Rome, and have been raised to the charge of the church there formed. But the tradition is too late in its origin, and too variable in its statements, to beget much confidence in its favour. Jerome's version of the story makes him succeed Peter as Bishop of Rome, and Tertullian represents him as ordained by Peter. Others place Linus before Clement; and a still further variation places Cletus and Anacletus between Peter and Linus. Rufinus endeavoured to harmonize the discrepancies to some extent by making Linus and Clement to be joint-bishops. Modern Rome authoritatively determines Clement to have been the second from Peter; her order of succession is, Peter, Linus, Clement, Cletus, Anacletus. But this is making history, rather than following it. (See under PETER.)

The epistle which goes by the name of Clement is certainly a writing of great antiquity, has every appearance of being a genuine production, is in perfect accordance with the teaching of Paul, and on several accounts is the most precious of the remains that belong to the age immediately subsequent to the times of the apostles. In the first centuries it was often read in the churches. It has survived to modern times in a single copy, forming part of the MS. that contains the famous Alexandrian copy of the Greek Scriptures, known as Codex A.

CLEOPAS (Gr. Κλεόπας), one of the two disciples who travelled to Emmaus on the day of the resurrection, and had the memorable interview with Jesus recorded in Lu. xxiv. The name of the other disciple is not given, but Cleopas is expressly mentioned at ver. 18. And it has been a question, whether he is the same with the person called Cleophas, Κλωπᾶς, in Jn. xix. 25. This latter person is more commonly called Alphaeus, Gr. Ἀλφαῖος, which is but another mode of pronouncing the Aramaic original, and was the father of James the Less. Opinions have varied as to the question of his identity with Cleopas, and there are no grounds for arriving at a determinate judgment. It seems strange if they were not the same, and if the person named Cleopas was now for the first time mentioned in gospel history, that our Lord should on such an occasion have appeared to one so comparatively obscure as to be hitherto overlooked. But the circumstances of the time were altogether peculiar; and common probabilities are not, in such a case, to be greatly relied on.

CLOUD. There is a frequent figurative use of cloud in Scripture, which sometimes bears a more special respect to the peculiarities of a Syrian climate, but which can still without material difficulty be understood by the inhabitants of nearly every region of the habitable globe. The long-continued and often scorching heat of summer, which for months prevails throughout Syria with little or no interruption, naturally rendered clouds an image of refreshment and blessing beyond what persons living in a more temperate and variable climate might be disposed to make them; there is at least a force and emphasis in such a use of the natural phenomena, for the natives of eastern climes, which the others can but imperfectly apprehend. Thus Solomon takes "a cloud of the latter rain" as the most fitting emblem, under which to represent the hopeful and gladdening influence of the king's favourable countenance upon those who enjoy it, Pr. xvi. 16; and the commanding of the clouds to rain not, or as it is again expressed, shutting up the heaven so that there be no rain, was wont to be given as the most appalling signal of coming sterility and desolation, Is. v. 6; De. xi. 17. On the other hand, the darkening of the sky by the intervention of clouds gave to these, when considered by themselves, and especially as contrasted with the habitual clearness of an eastern atmosphere, an aspect of gloom, and rendered them the natural emblems of frowning events in providence and seasons of darkness and sorrow. So, for example, Joel represents the period of approaching judgment as "a day of clouds and of thick darkness," ch. ii. 2, and the desolating host of God appears in the vision of Ezekiel as "a cloud covering the land," ch. xxxviii. 9. The Lord himself, with reference to the severer aspect of his character, the punitive righteousness which is ever ready to take vengeance on sin, is described as having "clouds and darkness round about him," not without respect also to the mysteriousness of the procedure in which this not unfrequently shows itself, Ps. xcvi. 2; La. iii. 40. The fleet, airy, vision-like appearance which the clouds often present in the higher regions of the atmosphere, taken in connection with the terrific elements of power, the balls of lightning, sometimes treasured up in them, rendered them again appropriate signs of Jehovah's movements in providence—the chariots, as it were, on which he rides to the execution of his purposes, Ps. civ. 3; Is. xix. 1; Da. vii. 13. Finally, their height above the earth serves as a symbol of what is lofty in character, and they are employed as a kind of synonym for the visible heavens; thus God's faithfulness is said to reach to the clouds, and in the clouds his strength has its seat, Ps. lvi. 10, lxviii. 24; i. e. both alike are above the measure and limit of earthly things, they partake of the vastness and perfection of heaven.

CLOUD, PILLAR OF. This is constantly represented as the more peculiar seat and symbol of the Lord's presence with his ancient people, during the most singular period of their history; that namely which commenced with their deliverance from the power of Pharaoh, and reached to their settlement in the land of Canaan. On the very night of the deliverance this remarkable symbol made its appearance; and the same passage which first announces its existence tells us also of its continued presence with the covenant-people during their unsettled condition. "And the Lord went before them by day in a pillar of a cloud, to lead them the way; and by night in a pillar of fire, to give them light, to go by day and night. He took not away the pillar of the cloud by day, nor the pillar of fire by night, from before the people," Ex. xiii. 21, 22. Within a very brief period of their starting, they reaped an important benefit of an outward kind from this supernatural cloud; for on the occasion of their passing through the Red Sea, the cloud removed from the front to the rear of the Israelitish host, so as to form a screen between them and the Egyptians, under cover of which the passage to the opposite shore was securely and quietly effected; to the escaping party it "gave light by night," while to their pursuers it "was a cloud and darkness." This alone shows the variable appearances which the cloud was capable of presenting; it assumed different forms and aspects, according to the circumstances of the time, and the ends more immediately to be served by it. From the standing designation of a pillar, which is applied to it with considerable frequency, we must suppose it to have usually presented a columnar appearance rising toward heaven; while occasionally it seems to have expanded itself, in order to form a covering, whether, as in the passage above referred to, from the violence of the enemy, or as other passages would appear to imply, from the intense heat and brightness of the sky, Ps. cv. 39; Is. iv. 5. It is expressly stated, that by day it was like a cloud covering the tabernacle, while by night "there was upon the tabernacle as it were the appearance of fire until the morning," Nu. ix. 15. We may therefore describe it as a fiery column, enveloped in a cloud-like smoke—the fire being so repressed as not to be seen during the day, but shining forth with a mild radiance during the night.

This cloud-like and fiery column might no doubt have served as the sign of the Lord's immediate presence with his people, without having any peculiar aptitude for the purpose—that is, it might have been arbitrarily chosen to be the symbol of the divine presence, though there should have belonged to it no special aptitude for such a design, beyond the circumstance that the Lord had thought good to select it. But such is not usually the way in which sacred symbols are chosen; they have a natural use or significance that forms the basis of the higher end to which they are applied, and in a measure also supplies the key to a right understanding of their import. And there is the more probability that the same was the case here, as the pillar of cloud and fire was, above all others, that with which God identified himself in Israel. Nor is there any difficulty in discerning the natural aptness of the symbol. For regarding the internal fire as the heart and body of the appearance, this, whether considered in respect to the light it emits, its radiant splendour, or its fervent heat (all which are in Is. iv. 5 associated with the sacred pillar), constituted one of the most striking emblems of the divine nature, and one of constant recurrence in Scripture. "God is light, and in him is no darkness at all," says the apostle John, 1 Jn. i. 5, meaning by light, of course, what is such in the moral sphere, unspotted holiness and truth, but in the very mode of expressing it indicating the affinity between the natural and the spiritual; as was done also by the psalmist, when he represented God as covering himself with light as with a garment, Ps. civ. 2. Fire as light, then, is the natural emblem of God's purity; as splendour it is the emblem of his ineffable glory, Ex. xxiv. 17; Da. vii. 10; and as fervent heat the emblem of his holy hatred and consuming wrath against sin, De. iv. 24; He. xii. 29. So that in every aspect of it, this fiery column was a peculiarly fit and expressive symbol of the character of God in his relation to the covenant-people; and the cloudy form, which even by night veiled the fiery brightness, and during the day altogether overshadowed it, reminded them that he was a God who concealed at the very time that he manifested himself; that the light in which he really dwelt was inaccessible and full of glory; and that it became his people to tremble before him, as incapable yet of knowing more than a small part of his ways, even while they rejoiced in the goodness that he made to pass before them.

It was undoubtedly intended that in the apprehensions of the people the more benignant aspects of the symbol should predominate. And hence in its ordinary appearance there was nothing frowning or terrific; the fiery glow was tempered and restrained by the circumambient cloud; and the offices of kindness it was made even externally to perform, in guiding and protecting the host, connected it in the experience and observation of the people with their personal well-being. Still elements of terror lay within; and the fiery obullitions that sometimes burst forth from it to consume the transgressors gave solemn testimony to the fact that the same righteousness which was pledged to protect and bless the people, if they remained steadfast to the covenant, was also ready to chastise their unfaithfulness, Le. x. 2; Nu. xvi. 35.

No mention is made of the cloud after the people left the wilderness and took possession of the Promised Land, until the consecration of Solomon's temple, when, in token of the Lord's owning the place as his peculiar dwelling, in lieu of the now antiquated tabernacle, the cloud again appeared as the symbol of the divine glory, 2 Ch. v. 12, 14. There is no reason, however, to suppose this to have been more than a momentary sign, one given for the occasion. It would have been against the genius of the old covenant to render any symbol of the Lord's presence stationary and permanent; to have done so would have been to give a dangerous encouragement to the idolatrous tendencies of the people. Hence, while God did not wholly abstain from the use of symbolical manifestations of himself, he took care to vary them, so as to keep up the impression that they were only symbols; nor did he ever employ them more than occasionally, that their design might appear to be but temporary helps to his people's faith. The abiding sign of his presence, and the fixed exhibition of his character, was to be found in the tabernacle, with its sacred ark and tables of the covenant. To this alone Israel was to look, and to the great realities enshrined in its structure and services for the living manifestation of God's favour, and the continued enjoyment of his blessing. It was in perfect accordance, therefore, with the whole nature of the old economy, that the pillar of cloud should cease, as a regular manifestation of Deity, to be connected with the tabernacle or temple after the people had been settled in Canaan; and it is only from having overlooked these fundamental considerations, that Jewish, and also some Christian writers, have contended for its permanent existence till the destruction of the temple by the Babylonians. Ezekiel, indeed, speaks about that time of seeing the glory of the Lord leaving the temple, ch. i. 4; xi. 23; but it was of what appeared in vision that the prophet spoke; and, in the reality, it merely announced the fact that God had now, on account of the people's sins, actually deserted the house, and surrendered it to desolation.

CNIDUS, the name of a city and peninsula in the south-west part of Asia Minor, and situated between the islands of Rhodes and Cos. It is mentioned in the narrative of St. Paul's voyage toward Rome, as a point which they had great difficulty in reaching, on account of the opposition of the wind, Ac. xxvii. 7.

COAL, COALS. Two Hebrew words are found in Scripture, which are rendered "coal" or "coals" in our version. One of these (קָהָל, pehham) is traced to a root signifying black, and accordingly its proper meaning seems to be coals not yet lighted. It occurs only three times: twice when the smith working in the coals is mentioned, Is. xlv. 12; 11v. 16, where the connection determines nothing as to the precise meaning; but the third time, Pr. xxvi. 21, where the other word is also used, and plainly in contradistinction, so that on this occasion that second word (גַּחְלֵיט, gahheleth) is rendered "burning coals," "as coals are to burning coals, and wood to fire." And this meaning "burning coals" seems to be suitable to all the passages in which the word occurs, while it is absolutely necessary in some of them, as besides the one now quoted, Ps. cxl. 10; Pr. vi. 28, translated "hot coals," Pr. xxv. 22; 2Sa. xiv. 7, in which last text to quench one's coal is obviously a metaphor for extinguishing one's family and house, as similar expressions are used among ourselves, such as desolated hearths. At times, however, the meaning of this more frequently used word is brought out with the greatest distinctness in the original by an addition, such as coals of fire, and once, Eze. i. 13, burning coals of fire.

It has been disputed whether the Hebrews had coals at all, in the proper sense of the word, or merely charcoal. But there is strong reason to believe that real coal, the same as ours, was employed in the ancient world, and the mountains of Lebanon do certainly contain seams of coal, which occasionally crop out at the surface. These have been worked by the present uncivilized and negligent governors of the country, so that we may well believe they were not neglected by the Phœnicians. There is therefore nothing improbable in the supposition that the Israelites were acquainted with mineral coal. This would admirably suit two passages of a poetical description, in which coals are said to be kindled by the breath of Leviathan, Job xii. 21, and by the breath of the Lord in his glorious appearance, Ps. xviii. 8. But while we grant this to be the more natural way of understanding metaphors which would be strangely tame if we referred them to artificial fuel, we have no reason to think that mineral coal was in common use, and there are some passages of Scripture which distinctly point to wood as the substance from which the coal was derived. This is in harmony with the use of charcoal in eastern countries at the present day. Thus, coals of juniper, or broom, are mentioned, Ps. cxx. 4. In Is. xlv. 19, and Eze. xxiv. 11, we read of coals in immediate connection with the burning of wood spoken of in the preceding context. And in Le. xvi. 12 the high-priest is commanded to go into the most holy place, with a censer full of burning coals of fire from off the altar; on which altar we know that wood was regularly burned, whereas mineral coal could scarcely have been obtained by the Israelites as they moved through the desert.

In the New Testament coals are mentioned only in Ro. xii. 20, a quotation from Pr. xxv. 22. A slightly modified form of the word occurs in Jn. xviii. 18; xxi. 9, which is well rendered "a fire of coals;" but it determines nothing as to the material, whether it was wood or not.

One or two other passages occur, in which the sense is substantially given in our version, though the word "coal" is used with, at the best, questionable accuracy. In La. iv. 8, "their visage is blacker than a coal," the literal rendering is that of the margin, "is darker than blackness." In 1 Ki. xix. 6, Elijah saw "a cake baken on the coals," perhaps rather upon a hot stone; and a like remark may be made on the "live coal from off the altar," i. e. which was laid upon the prophet's lips. A somewhat difficult word is twice used in Ca. viii. 6, "the coals thereof are coals of fire:" perhaps it had been better left in general, "the flame," or "the burning thereof." This same word occurs in Hab. iii. 5, "burning coals went forth at his feet," more probably, burnings, inflammations, that is, some sort of disease, as rendered in the margin, and also elsewhere in Scripture.

COCK, HEN (Ἀλέκτωρ, ἄρνις, lit. bird). No recognized allusion to domestic poultry occurs in the Old Testament, but as there is no enumeration of species of the birds permitted to the Hebrews for food in Le. xi. and De. xiv., it is possible that it may have been included in the general term "all clean birds" of the latter passage.

In the New Testament the compassion of the Lord Jesus toward Jerusalem is touchingly compared by him to the tender care of the maternal hen over her chickens: "How often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen doth gather her brood under her wings, and ye would not," Lu. xiii. 34; Mat. xxiii. 37. The other passages which make mention of the species are those in which the crowing of the cock is alluded to, either generally as the conventional mark of a certain hour of the night, Mar. xiii. 35, or specially as the signal given to Peter on the occasion of his faithless denial of his Lord, Mat. xxvi. 34, 74, &c.

An assertion in the Mishna—"They do not breed cocks at Jerusalem, because of the holy things"—has been supposed to militate against the possibility of Peter's hearing a cock crow on the occasion referred to. The mere existence of a general rule cannot weigh against a recorded fact, for laws even far more stringent than this are frequently transgressed. But the cock needs not to have been in Jerusalem, for Peter was standing in the porch of the high-priest's palace, with the slope of the Mount of Olives just over against him not half a mile distant, whence he might hear with shrill distinctness the crow of a cock, in the deep silence of the hour that just precedes the dawn of day.

The term "cock-crowing" used by the Lord Jesus in Mar. xiii. 35 is manifestly conventional for a certain season of the night. The ancients divided the period between sunset and sunrise into four watches, which were sometimes numbered "the first, second, third, fourth watch of the night," Lu. xii. 38; Mat. xiv. 25; and at other times received distinct names, as in Mar. xiii. 35—"the even," from sunset to about nine o'clock; "midnight," from the hour just named to twelve; "cock-crowing," from twelve to three; and "morning," from three to sunrise. Cocks generally crow without much regularity in the latter part of the night, and are mostly vociferous a little before day-break; so that, though the "shrill clarion" was not often heard until the third watch was actually past, yet, as the most striking peculiarity of a portion of the night for the most part devoid of any obvious characters, the third division might be well named from it; especially as there is an occasional preliminary crow uttered soon after midnight.

The difficulty that, according to three evangelists, the Lord Jesus announced the threefold sin of Peter before the cock should crow, while according to Mark it was predicted and occurred before the cock crew twice, is easily met. Mark's is doubtless the more exact account; for the precise always explains the more general. But the second was plainly the crowing, par eminentie; the first probably being the voice of a more distant bird, faintly falling upon Peter's ear, and producing no reflection, or the preliminary solitary crow of some cock wakeful before the time.

That domestic poultry were kept by the Israelites at a very early period is highly probable. Several species apparently distinct are still found wild in the forests and jungles of India, and two at least, Gallus Sonneratii and G. Stanleyi, are abundant in the woods of the Western Ghauts, to which our familiar fowl bear so close a resemblance that naturalists consider the former to be their original. Domestic poultry have existed in Hindoostan from the remotest antiquity; probably much earlier than the twelfth century B.C.; for in the Institutes of Menu, which Sir William Jones assigns to that age, we read of "the breed of the town-cock," and of the practice of cock-fighting (v. 12; ix. 222).

When the cock found its way to Western Asia and Europe we have no record. Fowl of plumage so gorgeous, of size so noble, of flesh so sapid, of habits so domestic, of increase so prolific, would doubtless early be carried along the various tracks of oriental commerce.

[175.] Pheasant and Game-cock, from bas-relief, Khorsabad. Botta's Ninive.

There is no trace of it, so far as we are aware, on the monuments of Pharaonic Egypt; but we find the cock figured in those of Assyria. In a hunting and shooting scene depicted at Khorsabad (Botta, pl. cviii.-cxiv.), the scene is laid in a forest whose characteristics seem to indicate a mountain region, such as Media or Armenia. Much game is represented, including many kinds of birds, one of which seems to be the pheasant. But the most interesting is a large bird, which appears from its form, gait, and arching tail, to be our common cock; it is walking on the ground amidst the trees. So far as this is evidence, it would go to prove that the fowl, in a wild state, existed at that period in Western Asia, though now unknown on this side the Indus.

The cock and hen are distinctly represented in the Xanthian sculptures, of an era probably contemporaneous with the Khorsabad palace of Nineveh. They appear also on Etruscan paintings, having probably a much higher antiquity (Mrs. Gray's Etruria, p. 28, 45). The early Greeks and Romans figure them on their coins and gems, and speak of them as perfectly familiar objects, with no allusion to their introduction. They had even found their way into Britain at some unknown period long anterior to the Roman invasion: for Cæsar tells us with surprise that the Britons did not think it right to eat the goose or the hen; though they bred both for the pleasure of keeping them (Bell. Gall. lib. v.) This is a very interesting allusion, since we are compelled to refer their introduction into this island to the agency of the Phœnicians, who traded to Cornwall for tin centuries before Rome was built. Under these circumstances their absence from Egypt, where in modern times they have been artificially bred to so immense an extent, becomes a remarkable and unaccountable fact.

COLLEGE is the name applied in the English Bible to the place where Huldah the prophetess resided: "So Hilkiah the priest, and Ahikam, and Achbor, and Shaphan, and Asahiah, went unto Huldah the prophetess, the wife of Shallum the son of Tikvah, the son of Harhas, keeper of the wardrobe; (now she dwelt in the college in Jerusalem); and they communed with her," 2 Ki. xxii. 14. If the word college were to be understood in anything like its modern sense, as a place for academic pursuits or the study of sacred learning, it could not but appear strange that a woman should have had apartments in it. The idea is attributable to the rabbinical authorities, who explain מִשְׁנֵה, mishneh, as some sort of school-house in the neighbourhood of the temple. But the word is merely a numeral, second, and is always used of something in the second rank or second place, or, more generally, another as contradistinguished from a first. So that when used here of the dwelling-place of Huldah, it must refer to a part of the city which might in some sense be regarded as second to that more immediately in view: "in the other, or lower part," that which was, so to speak, a second city. Compare Zep. i. 10; Ne. xi. 9, where a part of the city is expressly so called.

COLONY, in the Roman sense, the only sense in which it occurs in Scripture, and even that only once, Ac. xvi. 12, was a kind of offshoot from the parent state, consisting of a body of citizens, who were sent out with the formal sanction and approbation of that state to found and possess a commonwealth. A law was passed, authorizing a colony in a particular place to be founded, fixing the quantity of land in connection with it to be distributed, and appointing certain persons, who varied in number according to circumstances, to superintend the execution of the decree. The members of the colony went voluntarily to the new field; no one was under any constraint to go; and those who went still retained the rights of Roman citizens. Of course, if the place was distant, they could rarely exercise these; but in their new settlement itself they had civic rights precisely similar to those enjoyed by the members of the Roman state resident in the capital. So that a Roman colony was a sort of image of the parent city—itsself, strictly, a part of the Roman state, and within its own jurisdiction ruled and governed precisely like the other. (See Smith's Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquity.) Philippi is the only place mentioned in Scripture as possessing such a character; and the fact of its having become a colony will be shown at the proper place.

COLOSSE (Κολοσσαί, sometimes spelled Κολασσαί), a city of Phrygia, on the river Lycus, a branch of the Meander. The first mention of it occurs in Herodotus (vi. 30); this historian narrates that Xerxes, when on his march to Greece, passed from Anana to Colosse, where "the river Lycus, sinking into a chasm in the town, disappears under ground, and emerging at 5 stades distance, flows into the Meander." That it was situated south of the Meander appears from Xenophon's statement (Anab. i. 2. s. 6), that Cyrus, on his way to the Euphrates, crossed the Meander, and after a march of 8 parasangs, arrived at Colosse, which the historian describes as a large and populous city. Not far from it lay the towns of Apamea, Hierapolis, and Laodiceia. It is said, in common with the two latter towns, to have suffered, shortly after its reception of the gospel, from an earthquake; but it must speedily have recovered from this calamity, as in the twelfth year of Nero it is spoken of as a flourishing place. It was never, however, regarded as the principal town of Phrygia; for when that province was divided into Phrygia Pacatiana and Phrygia Salutaris, Colosse stood only sixth in the former division. Both Laodiceia and Colosse were famous for their wool manufacture, and for their skill in the art of dyeing.

Great uncertainty formerly existed as to the exact site of the town. In the middle ages a place called Chonæ, celebrated for being the birthplace of Nicetas Choniates, the Byzantine writer, rose up in the vicinity, and Colosse disappeared. A village called Chonos now exists on the site of the ancient Chonæ (Hamilton, Asia Minor, i. p. 608). For many ages it was thought that Chonæ, and then Chonos, marked the position of Colosse, but the more accurate researches of Mr. Hamilton have fixed the actual site on a plain about 3 miles to the north of the present village. Here he found ruins, fragments of columns, and a quantity of pottery, which latter circumstance usually denotes the former site of an eastern city. He discovered too the caves of a theatre, with some seats still in preservation, and a large space of ground covered with blocks of stone, which, after some examination, proved to be the necropolis of the ancient town. In order to identify these remains with the Colosse of Herodotus, it is necessary to form some probable hypothesis respecting the cleft or chasm which the historian mentions as being in the midst of the town, and receiving into itself the river Lycus. The following clear explanation of this circumstance is from the work of Mr. Hamilton. Amidst the ruins a bridge spans a rapid stream, formed by the junction of three rivers immediately above the bridge, the principal of which, now called the Tchörük, Mr. Hamilton supposes to be the Lycus. Into it two streams, one from the north and the other from the south, pour their waters; both possessing, in a remarkable degree, the property of petrifying. The calcareous deposit of these rivers, settling on the plants and other obstructions which the stream meets with, converts them into its own substance; and in this manner clefts are formed, which gradually approach each other from either side, and in time would meet, forming a natural arch, beneath which the main current would continue to flow, its rapidity preventing the settlement of the calcareous matter. "It is indeed most apparent," writes Mr. Hamilton, "that this has been the case; that in the narrow gorge through which the united streams discharge their waters below the bridge, the two cliffs have been joined, and thus formed the χάσμα γῆς, through which, as Herodotus reports, the waters flowed by a subterranean channel for half a mile, the soft crust having been in all probability broken up by an earthquake." So powerful is the action of the Ak-su, one of these rivers, that a brick thrown into it speedily becomes covered with a thick incrustation, and even has its pores filled up by infiltration. That this is the spot which Herodotus describes admits now of little doubt.

Colossæ was the seat of a Christian church, to which St. Paul addressed one of his epistles. By whom the church was founded is uncertain. In the Acts of the Apostles St. Paul is said to have made two journeys through Phrygia; the first, ch. xvi. 6, to introduce the gospel into those regions, the second, ch. xviii. 23, for the purpose of confirming the disciples; but on neither occasion is any mention made of his having visited Colossæ. This silence of the inspired history, coupled with the declaration of the apostle that the Colossians had not seen him in person, Col. ii. 1, militates strongly against the supposition of his having himself founded this church. The contrary opinion has however been maintained by some writers of eminence, especially Lardner, whose work, or Dr. Davidson's Introduction, may be consulted on this point. If St. Paul was not the founder, that honour must probably be assigned to Epaphras, who was with the apostle at Rome when the epistle to the Colossians was written, and from whom, no doubt, he received the information which led him to address them. In ch. i. 7 of the epistle, the Colossians are said to have "learned" the gospel of the grace of God from Epaphras, "a faithful minister of Christ in their behalf;" from which, in the absence of positive data, we may conclude that he was one at least of those to whom his fellow-countrymen were indebted for their knowledge of Christ. It is very probable indeed that during St. Paul's lengthened sojourn at Ephesus, he was brought into communication, by means of visitors, with various cities of Asia Minor, which thus became acquainted with the gospel, and towards the churches of which, though he had never visited them in person, he stood virtually in the relation of a spiritual father. Such seems to have been the case with Laodicea and Hierapolis, Col. ii. 1; iv. 13, in the vicinity of Colossæ; and a similar hypothesis will account for any peculiarities in the epistle to this last-named city. For thus it would be true that the apostle had never been himself there; while, at the same time, he could address the Colossian converts with an intimacy of personal feeling, and assume a position towards them which would have been out of place in the case of a church in the establishment of which he had had no share whatever. Thus too will the facts, on which so much stress is laid by Lardner and others, be accounted for, that the epistle exhibits such an intimate acquaintance with the affairs of the church, and with so many of its members, and seems also to presuppose, on the part of the Colossians, an acquaintance with Timothy, who, we know, was Paul's companion on his first journey through Phrygia. Nothing is more likely than that this intimate knowledge was gained on either side by visits, on the part of Epaphras, Archippus, Philemon, Apphia, and other members of the Colossian church, to St. Paul at Ephesus, and perhaps other places; where they would also be brought into intercourse with Timothy. The question must remain to some extent in uncertainty; but the probabilities are certainly in favour of the latter view, and against that of Lardner, which Theodoret seems to have been the first to suggest.

COLOSSIANS, EPISTLE TO THE. The genuineness and integrity of this epistle were never questioned in ancient times; nor indeed in modern, until a few German critics, in other respects deserving of a hearing, but apparently unable to resist the proneness to unwarranted scepticism peculiar to their country, threw out doubts upon the subject. Mayerhoff of Berlin, in a work published in 1838, attempted to prove that the epistle is not the production of St. Paul; in which he was followed by Baur of Tübingen, whose researches have apparently led him to the conclusion that of all the epistles ascribed to the apostle, those to the Romans, Corinthians, and Galatians alone are beyond doubt genuine. The reasons which these writers allege for their opinion are of a very unsubstantial character. Mayerhoff insists upon the peculiarities of style, and especially the ἀπαιξ λεγόμενα, which, as he alleges, distinguish this epistle from the genuine ones of St. Paul. Of peculiar expressions it contains, no doubt, an unusual number; but this is easily accounted for by the nature of the subjects on which the writer treats. In general, it may be observed that the argument from ἀπαιξ λεγόμενα is of little weight, unless supported by internal and external evidence. Internal marks of spuriousness Mayerhoff professes to find in the "poverty of thought," and absence of logical arrangement, which, in his opinion, the epistle exhibits; an opinion which the unbiassed readers of it are not likely to share. Baur seems to reject the epistle on the same ground as he does the pastoral epistles: viz. the alleged occurrence of ideas and words derived from the later Gnostic and Montanist heresies, whence he draws the conclusion that it must have been written subsequently to the appearance of those heresies. But why may not the reverse have been the case, and the heresiarchs, by employing them in a new sense, have adapted the apostle's expressions to their own uses? How little dependence is to be placed on such purely subjective arguments appears from the circumstance, that on the same grounds, and as decidedly, as Mayerhoff pronounces the epistle to the Colossians spurious, does De Wette reject that to the Ephesians; so that these critics mutually cut the ground from under each other.

Of the external testimonies to the genuineness of the epistle the following are a few:—Irenæus, Adv. Hæc. lib. iii. c. 14: "And again, in the epistle to the Colossians, he says, 'Luke the beloved physician greets you,' Col. iv. 14."—Clement of Alexandria, Strom. lib. i. p. 277: "And in the epistle to the Colossians he says, 'Warning every man, and teaching in all wisdom, that we may present every man perfect in Christ,' Col. i. 28."—Tertullian, De Præscrip. Heret. c. vii.: "The apostle, writing to the Colossians, warns us against philosophy; 'Take heed,' says he, 'lest any one circumvent you through philosophy and vain deceit, according to the tradition of men,' Col. ii. 8."—De Resurrect. Carnis, c. 23: "The apostle, in his epistle to the Colossians, teaches that we were once dead in sins, alienated from God, with feelings hostile to him; then that we were buried with Christ in baptism, &c., 'And you, when you were dead in your sins, and the uncircumcision of your flesh, he hath quickened with him, having forgiven you all trespasses,' Col. ii. 12."—Later testimonies it is needless to adduce.

Place and Time of Writing.—The determination of the latter point depends upon that of the former, on which different opinions have been held. It must be premised that we cannot, as regards the time and place of writing, separate the three epistles to the Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon; the two former are connected by similarity of contents, and their common bearer Tychicus; the two latter by the salutations of Epaphras,

Marcus, Aristarchus, Demas, and Lucas, and the mission of Onesimus, mentioned in both. Now it is obvious from Ep. iii. 1, iv. 1, and vi. 20; from Phil. 9, 10; and from Col. iv. 8, that all three epistles were written by the apostle during a time of imprisonment; and since the inspired history mentions but two occasions on which, for any length of time, he was in bonds, viz. at Cæsarea for about eighteen months, A.C. XXI. 27, and at Rome for two years, A.C. XXVIII. 30, between these two our choice must be made. General belief, from ancient times downwards, has been in favour of the Roman imprisonment; but recently the other side of the question has been adopted by some German critics of note, among others by Schulz, Schott, Büttger, Wiggers, and lately Meyer. Neander, however, Harless, and others, have declared themselves for the common opinion; and not without reason, for the objections against it seem by no means decisive. The following are the principal:—It does not seem probable that the apostle would suffer nearly two years of imprisonment at Cæsarea to elapse without employing his pen. But to this it may be replied, in the first place, that other epistles may have been written during that period, and yet not the three in question; and secondly, that it is equally improbable that the two years of the Roman imprisonment passed without memorial, and what we assign to the one period we must, in the present case, take from the other. To this must be added that the imprisonment at Cæsarea was much more strict than that at Rome, in the early part of the latter; and therefore less likely to furnish opportunity for writing epistles. It is urged, again, that it is more natural that Onesimus should have fled to Cæsarea, which was comparatively near, than to Rome, which was at a distance. But, on the other hand, a vast metropolis like Rome would afford better shelter to a fugitive than a provincial town; and from the constant intercourse between the provinces and the capital Onesimus would experience no difficulty in escaping thither. Meyer, after Wiggers, insists upon the omission of the name of Onesimus in the passage of the epistle to the Ephesians, in which St. Paul recommends Tychicus to that church, Ep. vi. 21, which, he thinks, can only be accounted for by the supposition that the two companions started from Cæsarea, in which case they would necessarily arrive at Colossæ first, where Onesimus would be dropped, and Tychicus proceed to Ephesus alone. But to found an argument on such a slender foundation as this is obviously unsafe. It was not necessary to commend Onesimus to the Ephesian church, inasmuch as not he but Tychicus was properly the bearer of tidings from St. Paul, and indeed he had no other reason for touching at Ephesus but that he was journeying in company with Tychicus. In Col. iv. 9, where Onesimus is named, the case is different: he had been an inhabitant of the town, was one of themselves, and was now returning under peculiar and interesting circumstances. Finally, it is remarked that St. Paul requests Philemon to prepare him a lodging at Colossæ, in the expectation that he would be enabled to repair thither shortly, Phil. 23; whereas in Phi. ii. 24 he expresses a resolution of proceeding, after the termination of his Roman imprisonment, to Macedonia, and thence, according to the plan laid down in Ro. xv. 23, 24, westwards rather than eastwards. It is impossible, however, to say what changes the apostle may have been induced by circumstances to make in his plans: probably the projected journey to Spain never took place, or was postponed; and if so, there is nothing extraordinary in the supposition that, on his liberation from Rome, he, instead of proceeding direct to Asia Minor, took Greece and Macedonia in his way, and visited Philippi before he arrived at Colossæ. On the whole, this is a case in which external tradition may properly be allowed to determine the question; and this is unequivocally in favour of Rome as the place of authorship. (See Schulz, Stud. und Kritik. 1829, p. 612, f.; Wiggers, Do. 1841, p. 436; Neander, Apostelgeschichte, i. p. 436; Harless, Ephes. Brief. p. 68; and Davidson's Introduct.)

This point being assumed as settled, the date of the epistle ranges within narrow limits. The latest period that has been assigned to the Roman captivity is A.D. 63, the earliest A.D. 60; the epistle then must have been written between 60–65, and probably in the year 62 (Harless); but the exact date cannot be determined. (For the order in which the cognate epistles were written, see the article on the EPISTLE TO THE EPHESIANS.)

The Object of the Epistle.—This is manifest on the surface. The apostle had received information, probably through Epaphras, of the appearance of erroneous tendencies, both doctrinal and practical, in the Colossian church, against which he felt it incumbent on him to warn his readers. Three such tendencies are specified:—1. A pretentious philosophy, which affected an esoteric knowledge, received through tradition, and which abandoning Christ the Head, indulged in unhallowed speculations on the number and nature of the spiritual beings with which the invisible world is peopled, Col. ii. 8, 18. 2. The observance, if not the asserted obligation (for this does not appear), of Jewish ordinances, Col. ii. 16, 20–22. 3. The practice of ascetic regulations, Col. ii. 23. A question here at once arises: Were these various errors found united in the same party or individual? At first sight they seem mutually to exclude each other. The pharisaic Judaizers exhibited no proneness either to a speculative gnosis or to asceticism; the Gnostic ascetics, on the other hand, were usually opposed to a rigid ceremonialism. If it so improbable however that, in a small community like that of Colossæ, three distinct parties should have existed, that we are driven to the conclusion that the corrupt tendencies in question did really exist in combination in the same persons; and the difficulty will perhaps be alleviated if we bear in mind that in the apostolic age two classes of judaizing teachers, equally opposed to the simplicity of the apostolic message, though in different ways, busied themselves in sowing tares among the wheat in the visible church. The former consisted of the rigid formalists, chiefly Pharisees, who occupy so prominent a place in the history of the Acts and in several of St. Paul's epistles, and who contended for the continued obligation of the law of Moses upon Gentile converts; the latter were speculative adherents of the Alexandrian school, whose principle it was to subordinate the letter to the spirit, or rather to treat the former as a mere shell, which the initiated were at liberty to cast away as worthless, or intended only for the vulgar. With this false spiritualism was usually combined an element of oriental theosophy, with its doctrine of the essential evil of matter, and the ascetic practices by which it was supposed that the soul is to be emancipated from the material thralldom under which it at present labours. To angelology, or the framing of angelic genealogies, the Jews in general of that age were notoriously addicted; in the pastoral epistles (see 1 Tim. 4), we again meet this idle form of speculation. That persons, imbued with these various notions, should, on becoming Christians, attempt an amalgamation of them with their new faith is but natural; and the ill-assorted union seems to have given birth to the Gnosticism of a subsequent age, with its monstrous tenets, the product of an unbridled imagination. Teachers then, or perhaps a single teacher, Col. ii. 14, of this cast of Judaism had effected an entrance into the Colossian church, and seems to have there experienced a favourable reception. In a Gentile community like this pharisaic Judaism could not have so easily gained a footing; but the mixture of mystical speculation and ascetic discipline, which distinguished the section of the Alexandrian school alluded to, was just adapted to attract the unstable; especially in Phrygia, from time immemorial the land of mystic rites, such as those connected with the worship of Cybele, and of magical superstition. From this congenial soil, in a subsequent age, Montanism sprang; and, as Neander remarks (Apostelgeschichte, i. p. 442), it is remarkable that, in the fourth century, the council of Laodicea was compelled to prohibit a species of angel-worship, which appears to have maintained its ground in these regions (οὐ δεῖ Χριστιανὸς . . . ἀγγέλους δοσιάζειν καὶ συνάζειν, Can. 36).

We must not, however, suppose that these tendencies had worked themselves out into a distinct system, or had brought forth the bitter practical fruits which were their natural consequence, and which, at a later period, distinguished the heresiarchs alluded to in the pastoral epistles, and the followers of Cerinthus. The corrupt teaching was as yet in its bud. The apostle therefore recommends no harsh measures, such as excommunication: he treats the case as one rather of ignorance and inexperience; as that of erring but sincere Christians, not of active opponents; and seeks by gentle persuasion to win them back to their allegiance to Christ.

Contents.—Like the majority of St. Paul's epistles, that to the Colossians consists of two main divisions, one of which contains the doctrinal, the other the practical matter. Of these the former, again, contains two distinct portions; from the commencement of the epistle to ch. i. 27, and from that point to the end of ch. ii. In the former of these portions the apostle, after the usual salutation, returns thanks to God for their faith and love, of which he had received accounts from Epaphras, ch. i. 1-8; and describes the earnestness of his prayers in their behalf that they might continually advance in spiritual wisdom, power, and fruitfulness, ch. i. 9-12. The ultimate source of the blessings which they enjoyed was the love of the Father; by whose grace they had been transferred from a state of sinful alienation into a state of acceptance, in and through Christ, whose blood was sufficient to cleanse from all sin; who before his entrance into the world, as Creator, claimed equality with the Father, and is now constituted Head of the Church and Lord of all things, ch. i. 12-27. The second paragraph commences with an expression of the apostle's solicitude for the spiritual welfare of those churches which had not enjoyed his personal ministry, the Colossians among the number; whence he passes to the immediate object of the epistle, and exhorts his readers, as they had received Christ, to walk in him, and not to permit themselves either to be seduced from the simplicity of the faith by a show of human wisdom, or to be entangled in a yoke of bondage to ceremonial observances from which Christ had set them free. In Christ they were complete; in him they possessed all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge; risen with him to a new and heavenly life, they were dead, as well to the rudiments of a lower stage of religious knowledge, as to the sins of their former unconverted state, ch. i. 28-iii. 4.

In the latter half of the epistle the apostle enforces the practical duties flowing from these truths. Having put on the new man they were to mortify the fleshly nature; cultivate the fruits of the Spirit, especially humility and love; and by mutual admonition and instruction promote the spiritual well-being of the whole body, ch. iii. 5-18. This general exhortation to holiness of life then branches out into particulars, embracing the relative duties of husband and wife, children and parents, masters and servants, ch. iii. 18-iv. 4. The writer intreats their prayers that the Word of God might, in his bonds, have free course; and refers them to Tychicus, the bearer of the epistle, for further information respecting himself. The salutations of those who were with him at Rome, and an injunction to transmit the epistle to the church of Laodicea, and in turn to procure one which had been written to that church, conclude the epistle, to which the apostle, with his own hand, attaches his signature.

[This epistle has not been so much commented on as some others of St. Paul. For the general sense and connection, Davenant (Expos. Epist. ad Col. Geneva, 1655) and Calvin may be consulted; for critical purposes, Olshausen, Bähr (Basel, 1830), Alford; also the recent commentaries of Ellicott and Eadie.]

COMMON has not unfrequently in Scripture the sense of unclean, as in the word of St. Peter, "I have not eaten anything common or unclean," Ac. x. 14; also Mar. vii. 2; Rom. xiv. 14, &c. This is easily explained. The sanctified was what was set apart to God, taken out of the category of common things, and impressed in some respect with a sacred character; so that what still remained common was in the eye of the law virtually unclean. (In respect to the ordinary use of the word, in the expression "having all things common," see ALMSGIVING.)

CONCISION [cutting away], a contemptuous term used by St. Paul in Phi. iii. 2, to denote the zealots for circumcision. He changes the term for the purpose of indicating more pointedly their real character; instead of saying "beware of the circumcision," επιτρομή, namely the party who pressed the necessity of still observing that ordinance, he says, "beware of the concision," κατατομή: as much as to say, they no longer deserve the old and venerable name; what they stickle for is a mere concision, a flesh-cutting. And then he goes on to state the reason, "for we are the circumcision"—the reality has now passed over into us, who believe in Christ and are renewed in the spirit of our minds.

CONCUBINE (Heb. שְׂפָדָה, Gr. παλλακίς or παλλακή, Lat. pellec—all manifestly but different variations of the same word) was the name given to a sort of second or inferior wife—one who shared the bed of the man, and had a recognized position in the household, though still occupying the place to some extent of a servant, and subject to the proper spouse, if there was one in the house. Among the Romans it was only at a comparatively late period that concubinage acquired any kind of legal sanction; but when it did so, concubina came to be generally substituted for the hitherto more common pellez or mistress. Among the Greeks, however, the distinction between wife and concubine was recognized by Demosthenes as one even then well established and familiarly known—the former being, as he says, for the begetting of legitimate children and taking charge of the affairs of the house, the other for performing daily ministrations about the person (c. Neeser. 1385, 30). In the East concubinage had manifestly come centuries before into general practice. It meets us in Ge. xxii. 24, in a notice respecting the family of Bethuel, the father of Rebekah, who, in addition to eight children by his wife Milcah, had also a concubine, Reumah, who bore him four children besides. Indeed, it had substantially appeared before in the household of Abraham himself; for when he consented to take Hagar to his bed, although it was as Sarah's bondmaid that she was so received, yet the relation meant to be established was undoubtedly much of the same sort; the children to be born of Hagar were to be reckoned, in some sort, as Sarah's, and to take rank as proper members of the family. This intention was afterwards modified by divine interference; but the son of Hagar was still by no means reckoned illegitimate, and it was from incidental circumstances, rather than from the nature of the case, that Ishmael did not meet with an altogether corresponding treatment. In the next generation of the chosen family we find no mention of a state of concubinage; Isaac seems to have had no partner of his bed but Rebekah, and no children but her twin sons Esau and Jacob. But in the next generation again the evil re-appears in an aggravated form; and not only does Esau multiply his wives at pleasure, but Jacob also allows himself to be led by comparatively trivial and unworthy considerations to take first two wives, and then two concubines. Nor was the practice ever wholly discontinued among the covenant-people; it was brought to some extent under law, and placed substantially on the footing of a marriage-relationship, Ex. xxi. 7-9; De. xxi. 10, seq.; so that the man who entered into it was not allowed summarily, and without any reason assigned or regular proceeding instituted, to put away even a bondmaid or captive, whom he had thus received to his bed and board, but was bound to give her a legal writing. And this state of things existed till the coming of Christ, when a higher tone of feeling and a stricter practice were introduced. But the consideration of it more properly belongs to the subject of divorce, or to the more general subject of marriage. (See MARRIAGE.)

The chief difficulty connected with the matter of concubinage (which equally applies, however, to the marriage of more wives than one) bears on the apparent laxity of permitting it at any period among the covenant-people, and the apparent inconsistency in the divine administration of permitting it at one period and prohibiting it at another. It seems as if either the principles of the divine government were not so unchangeable as they are commonly represented, or the persons commissioned to reveal them had not been equally inspired at one time as compared with another. This, however, were a hasty conclusion; for the question really resolves itself into the larger one, which concerns the progression of the divine plan, and the consequent toleration of defects and imperfections in the earlier, which must cease to appear in the later, stages. In the natural administration of God there is such a difference in the inevitable conditions of childhood and youth as compared with those of mature life, and in the entire condition of mankind on earth as compared with that of the angelic world or of the redeemed in glory. And as the church of the old covenant stood greatly below that of the new in point of knowledge and grace, it was, in like manner, inevitable that there should have been in various respects a defective practice, marks of moral inferiority in private and social life, such as should have no existence now, since the relatively perfect has come. Such precisely was the case in respect to the point now under consideration. The original appointment of God in regard to the family constitution, that it should be based upon the union of one man and one woman, and that these two by reason of their union should be regarded as one flesh, made it clear to all what was the mind of God, and what, for those aiming at perfection, was the standard to which they ought to have conformed. But the corruptions consequent upon the fall, which grew and widened as the history of the world proceeded, so marred the original constitution in respect to the marriage relationship, that the proper standard fell practically into abeyance, and the whole that seemed meet to divine wisdom, at the setting up of the Old Testament economy by Moses, was to impose certain checks and restraints of a legal kind in the way of its excessive violation. It was ordained that no one who had taken a woman to wife, even though it was a wife of inferior standing, a sort of concubine, should put her away without a writing of divorce, which necessarily required time, and consideration, and the employment (for the most part) of a scribe, and witnesses—an imperfect check, no doubt, but still a check in the way of arbitrary procedure, and as a general or civil regulation (which it really was), possibly carrying the restraint as far as could safely be done. The very enactment of such a regulation, as our Lord argued against the Pharisees, Mat. xix. 8, was a witness against the hardness of their hearts, and it was an utter abuse of its design to regard it as a license to be indulged in, instead of a restraint to be borne. It set limits within which the authorities might tolerate the existing imperfections, but it left unrepealed the original appointment, and, properly viewed, should have but served to recall men's attention to it.

So difficult was it to turn the tide of degeneracy in this respect which had set in upon the world, and so hard even for the highest authority to prevail in purging the moral atmosphere of society, that the practice of concubinage yielded only in the slowest and most gradual manner even to our Lord's explicit declaration. Long after the establishment of Christianity the state recognized concubinage, as contradistinguished from marriage, though not in co-existence with it; and even so late as the year A.D. 400 the first ecclesiastical council of Toledo allowed communion to persons living in concubinage, while it excluded polygamists. For centuries concubinage was quite common both among clergy and laity. It was first formally abolished among the clergy, but only with general effect about the period of the Reformation; afterwards, also, it was denied to the laity; and the civil law gradually conformed itself to the ecclesiastical.

CONIAH. See JECONIAH.

CONVERSION, when used in a religious sense, is a turning from sin to holiness, or from the love of self and the world to the love and service of God. The things included in it will be treated of under REPENTANCE and REGENERATION.

CONVOCATION, is a calling together, or an assemblage of a sacred character; and hence has the epithet holy usually attached to it. It denotes such meetings for sacred purposes as took place at the stated festivals, and on Sabbaths, Ex. xii. 16; Le. xxiii. 2; Nu. x. 2; xxviii. 18, &c.

CONY (צפ, shaphan). A small quadruped common in the rocky parts of Palestine and surrounding countries, having no affinity with the rabbit of Europe, but belonging to a different order. Strange to say, its nearest affinity is with the huge rhinoceros; and though the assertion may startle some who behold a little creature, not unlike a guinea-pig in form and size, yet if they were to compare the skeleton of the so-called cony with that of the huge pachyderm, they would find exceedingly little diversity between the two, except in dimensions. It is the Hyrax syriacus of zoologists.

[176.] The Cony—Hyrax syriacus.

Various local names have been applied to the shaphan. The LXX. translate the word by χοιρόγυλλος, "a grunting-hog." According to Bruce it is called in Abyssinia ashkoko. In Syria the term is Ganam Israel, which the French zoologists have metamorphosed into Daman; to the modern Arabs it is familiarly known as the weber. It is said to inhabit in numbers the precipices which border that terrific fissure which affords an exit for the Kidron, as well as other inaccessible rocks. Its feet are not suited for burrowing—the toes being round and soft, protected by broad hoof-like nails; but it resorts to caverns or deep clefts in the rocks. Here the little animal dwells in society, a score or more being frequently seen sitting at the mouth of their cave, basking in the sun, or coming out to enjoy the freshness of the evening air.

Laborde thus notices this little animal:—"Two of our guides set out upon an excursion, their guns on their shoulders, saying they would go and hunt the oueber, an animal commonly met with in this part of the mountain. In the course of a few hours they returned, bringing something wrapped up in their cloaks. We saw by the merriment displayed on their countenances, that they had not been unlucky. They immediately produced four little animals, which they had found in their lair, being the whole of the family—the father and mother, and two young ones a fortnight old. These creatures, which are very lively in their movements, endeavoured to bite when they were caught.

Their hair is a brown-yellow, which becomes pale and long as the animals grow old. In appearance, on account of the great vivacity of the eyes, the head being close to the shoulders, and the buttocks being drawn in, and without a tail, they resemble the guinea-pig. Their legs are all of the same height, but the form of their feet is peculiar; instead of nails or claws they have three toes in front and four behind, and they walk like rabbits on the whole length of the foot. The Arabs call it el oueber, and know no other name for it. It is common in this part of the country, and lives upon the scanty herbage with which the rain in the neighbourhood of springs supplies it" (Laborde, p. 114). [P. H. G.]

CO'OS, OR COS, a small but fertile island in the Ægean Sea, off the south-west point of Asia Minor, which was once touched by the apostle Paul on his way from Greece to Jerusalem, Ac. xxi. 1. It does not appear that he rested at it, or perhaps did more than pass by it; so that nothing depends on its state for the illustration of apostolic history. It is about twenty-five miles long by ten broad.

COPPER occurs only once in our translation of the Scriptures, though if it were the proper rendering there, one can scarcely avoid the conclusion that it should have appeared also in other passages. It is at Ezr. viii. 27, where, among the vessels reported to have been brought back from Babylon, we find mention made of "two vessels of fine copper, precious as gold." The word is that usually rendered brass (נְחֹשֶׁת), and undoubtedly indicates a metal hard, well tempered, and capable of taking a very fine polish, so as, on that account, to possess a high value. This could not be said simply of copper, especially at Babylon, where it is known to have existed in considerable abundance, and to have been in comparatively common use. Either brass, therefore, which is a compound of copper and tin, or some other alloy, in which copper formed a principal part, must have been meant. If in this passage brass should rather have been used than copper, there are others in which the reverse holds; it should have been copper and not brass. Thus, in De. viii. 9, it is said respecting Canaan, "Out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass;" and again in Job xxviii. 2, "Brass is molten out of the stone;" certainly not brass in either case, which, being an alloy, is never found in a native state; but probably enough copper, as this was one of the mineral products of the Holy Land. And the allusion in the last of the two passages to the process by which it was obtained, clearly implies that the smelting of copper from the ore was known at the period when the book of Job was composed. It should be understood, then, that when reference is made to the ore, or to the metal in its original state, not brass, but copper is the word that should be employed. "In most other instances," as stated by Mr. Napier (Ancient Workers and Artificers in Metal, p. 64), "the word brass should be translated bronze, an alloy well known in the earliest times; and as copper is the principal metal in this alloy, it follows that a reference to bronze necessitates a previous metallurgical operation for copper." The same writer also states, that "many of the ancient copper alloys had to stand working by the hammer; and their working was such, either for toughness or hardness, that we cannot at the present day make anything like it; which is surely strong presumptive evidence that the copper as well as the tin they used for these alloys must have been pure, and that they had means for effecting this object."

It confirms the view now given of the early knowledge of copper, and of the processes necessary to bring it to practical use, that at the discovery of America the natives were found in plentiful possession of articles made of this mineral. "Columbus, when at Cape Honduras, was visited by a trading canoe of Indians. Amongst the various articles of merchandise were small hatchets made of copper, to hew wood, small bells, and plates, and crucibles for melting copper. When the Spaniards first entered the province of Turpan, they found the Indians in possession of abundance of copper axes. The ancient Peruvians used copper for precisely the same purpose with the Mexicans; their copper axes differ very little in shape from ours. The knowledge of alloying copper was possessed by both the Mexicans and Peruvians, whereby they were enabled to make instruments of copper of sufficient hardness to answer the purposes for which steel is now deemed essential. The metal used as an alloy for copper was tin; and the various Peruvian articles subjected to analysis are found to contain from three to six per cent. of that metal" (Silliman's Journal, ii. p. 51).

It is ascertained that the Egyptians at an early period were well acquainted with working in bronze; and it is most likely that what are called brazen vessels in the books of Moses were really of bronze; this rather than simple copper, because bronze is less subject to tarnish, and takes on a finer polish; and rather bronze than brass, because zinc, which forms a component element in brass, does not, as far as yet discovered, appear to have been known to the ancients.

CORAL (קורל, ramoth). In Job xxviii. 18, this word occurs as the name of some proverbially precious thing, being enumerated with pearls, gems of various kinds, and gold, as not worthy to be compared with wisdom. The only other example of the word is Eze. xxvii. 16, where Syria is represented as occupying in the markets of Tyre with ramoth, among other things.

The etymology of the word is obscure. The LXX. seem to have been quite ignorant of what it meant; for in the latter passage they transcribe it as the name of a place, while in the former they strangely render it by "meteors" or "the heavenly bodies." The local dialects give us little light on the matter.

The various peoples enumerated by Ezekiel as trading in the markets of Tyre, may have been either the buyers or the sellers of the articles enumerated. In the instance in question, "purple" is one of the articles in which Syria is described as trading. But purple was one of the staple productions of Tyre, and Syria would scarcely have brought purple to sell at Tyre, but would doubtless be there as a purchaser. Moreover, her trade is expressly said to have been in "the wares of Tyre's making." Hence probably ramoth was an article manufactured by the Tyrians, and sold by them to the Syrians. The Greek writers, Homer especially, frequently allude to the Sidonians, the near neighbours and compatriots of the Tyrians, as the manufacturers of all kinds of bijouterie and jewellery.

The received and traditional rendering of ramoth by coral is probably correct. From time immemorial there has been a great demand for this article in the East, wrought as at this day into various ornaments and jewels; and from the same remote antiquity has the supply of the raw material been drawn from the coast of North Africa; the chief seat of the fishery being to the present time the immediate vicinity and bay of Tunis, where once sat Carthage, the queenly daughter of royal Tyre. The red coral would therefore certainly be one of the articles which Tyre would receive in the rough state from her colony Carthage, and which her skilled artists would work up for the adornment of the Syrian ladies. It is doubtless the ramoth of the Hebrews.

The red coral is the stony skeleton of a compound zoophyte, allied to the sea-anemones of our coasts. It forms a much-branching shrub, of which the beautiful scarlet stone forms the solid axis, which is covered during life by a fleshy bark, out of which protrude here and there upon the surface minute polypes with eight tentacles. It grows only in the Mediterranean, and principally, as already observed, on the African coast, from Tunis to Oran. It is found attached to the rocks at considerable depths, as from 20 to 120 fathoms.

The demand for it has given rise to a fishery of some importance, about 180 boats being employed in it on the coast of Algeria, of which 156 fish in the neighbourhood of Bona and Calla, obtaining 36,000 kilogrammes (about 720 cwts.) of coral, which, selling at the rate of 60 francs per kilogramme, produces a return of £90,000 sterling.

The mode by which it is obtained is the same which has always prevailed, and is rude and wasteful. A great cross of wood loaded with stones, and carrying at the end of each arm a sort of net formed of cords partly untwisted, is lowered from a boat, and dragged over the bottom. The branches of the corals are entangled in this apparatus, and as the boat moves on are torn off; at intervals it is pulled up and the produce secured. Of course a great deal must be broken off which is not secured, but yet it is a profitable employment. A boat manned by nine or ten hands has been known to bring in 80 or 100 kilogrammes in a day, yielding £20 or £25 sterling; but such success is rare. The fishery is prosecuted from the 1st of April to the end of September, during which there may be on the average about 100 days in which the fishermen can work. [P. H. G.]

CORBAN, the Hebrew term for a gift or offering, in the general sense to God. The corresponding term in Greek is δῶρον; but in a discourse of our Lord, in which he reproved the false teaching of the Scribes, the original word corban is preserved by the evangelist

Mark, though he gives, at the same time, its interpretation. Moses had commanded children to honour their parents, and had said that if any one cursed father or mother he should die the death, "but ye say," adds our Lord, "If a man shall say to his father or mother, Corban, that is to say, a gift, by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me; he shall be free: and ye suffer him no more to do ought for his father or his mother," ch. vii. 11, 12. The words "he shall be free," it is proper to state, are inserted in the translation merely to bring out the meaning more distinctly, there being nothing corresponding to them in the original. They may be omitted, however, and what follows taken as the concluding portion of the deliverance of the scribes—thus: "If a man shall say to his father or mother, Corban, that is to say, a gift, by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me; ye even suffer him no more to do ought for his father or his mother." There can be no doubt as to the substantial meaning of the passage, though there are minor shades of difference among interpreters as to their modes of eliciting it, or the extent to which the rabbinical maxim, referred to by our Lord, actually reached. Plainly, our Lord meant to say, that the honour which a child owed to his parents bound him to give of his substance to these parents whatever they might actually need, and that when such needful portion was withdrawn from so befitting a purpose by being destined as a gift to God, this was only, under the pretext of honouring God, doing despite to his most explicit injunctions—dishonouring God by dishonouring his earthly representatives. Such would be the case if the proceeding referred to were adopted in respect to a single article which the parents of a youth might actually require, and which by an unseasonable consecration to the altar he withheld from them. But, of course, the iniquity complained of would be much greater if a youth were allowed to pronounce that word of devotion to religious uses upon all he had, and after doing so were allowed to retain the whole for his own use, though prohibited from giving it to others, even to his own parents—if such were the practice in question, as Lightfoot has endeavoured to show from rabbinical authorities, the case as against the Jewish teachers becomes greatly aggravated. But it may be doubted how far this extreme is involved in the charge of our Lord.

CORIANDER. Ex. xvi. 31, the manna is compared to מִן־לֶבְנֵי־גַד, the seed of gad, white. This must have been a plant familiar to those for whom the inspired penman wrote, and we incidentally learn that in the old Punic or Phœnician language, closely alien to the Hebrew, the name of the coriander was goid. With the exception of the Samaritan codex, which has oryza decorticata, or shelled rice, all the old versions are unanimous in rendering it coriander.

Coriandrum sativum is a plant of the umbelliferous order, occurring throughout the entire coast of the Mediterranean. In Egypt its seeds are eaten as a condiment with other articles of food, and in our own country the tender leaves are used in soups and salads. In Essex it is cultivated to a large extent for the sake of its seeds. These, owing to the presence of a volatile oil, when dried have an agreeable aromatic flavour, and they are in great demand among confectioners and the bakers of sugar bon-bons.

The fruit, or coriander-seed, is globular, about the size of a corn of white pepper, of a grayish-yellow colour, and finely ribbed. We need not suppose that the manna was coloured like a coriander, but its parti-

CORINTH. One of the most celebrated cities of Greece, capital of a small district in the neck of land joining the Peloponnesus with the northern division of Greece. The proper name of this district was Isthmus; from which circumstance the title came to be applied to any similar strip of territory connecting a peninsula with the mainland. The original name of the city was Ephyre; afterwards, though at what time is uncertain, it assumed the appellation by which it is known in history. By Homer it is indifferently called Ephyre and Corinth. The latter name still survives in the modern corruption, Gorthis.

History.—From the names which certain places in the city retained, and especially from the oriental character of the worship of Aphrodite or Venus, to whom the whole of the Acrocorinthus, or citadel of Corinth, was dedicated, it has been argued, and with great probability, that the district was first colonized by Phœnicians, who, we know, possessed other settlements in Greece. The oriental settlers appear to have been succeeded by a mixed population of Æolians and Ionians, the former, however, being the dominant race, as is proved by the traditions which represent the earliest rulers of Corinth as belonging to it. Among these the mythological heroes Sisyphus—whose reputed cunning no doubt typified the mercantile spirit of the community over which he reigned, and Bellerophon—whose exploits rivalled those of Hercules, occupy a conspicuous place. The latter was worshipped with divine honours at Corinth. A still earlier legend connects the name of the city with Corinthus, a descendant of Æetes, the father of Medea, who is said to have abandoned the sovereignty of Corinth for that of Colchis. On the death of Corinthus, the last male representative of Æetes, the inhabitants of the city invited Medea to assume the sceptre: the renowned sorceress accordingly arrived with her husband Jason, but after a short sojourn returned to Colchis, leaving the throne to Sisyphus. In the historical age the Dorians, under the conduct of Aletes, appear as the first conquerors of the isthmus. Occupying a hill called Solygeius, near the Saronic Gulf, they waged war upon the Æolic population, and finally reduced it to subjection. It was impossible, however, in a maritime state like Corinth, to maintain in their strictness the Doric institutions, which were founded upon landed tenure; and accordingly, while the sovereigns were of Doric descent, the citizens, both of the conquering and the conquered race, participated in equal rights of citizenship. The dynasty of Aletes lasted for twelve generations (from B.C. 1074 to 747): it was succeeded by an oligarchy of the Bacchiad family, so named from Bacchis, one of the royal line; and this, in its turn, gave place to the tyranny of Cypselus and his son Periander, who together reigned from B.C. 657 to 583. It was during this period, especially the latter part of it, that Corinth attained that commercial eminence which made her one of the first cities of Greece. Admirably situated for the operations either of trade or of naval warfare, she successfully contested the dominion of the Ægean Sea with the Æginetans, and exercised an undisputed supremacy over the western waters of Greece. She was the first of Greek states that constructed a fleet of triremes, or ships of war. It was westwards, however, that the tide of Corinthian colonization tended; and such powerful colonies as Corcyra, Syracuse, Leucas, Ambracia, &c., attested the vigour of the parent country. After the death of Psammetichus, the son of Periander, who reigned only for three years, Corinth, coming under the influence of Sparta, reverted to an oligarchical form of government, and became one of the most influential members of the Peloponnesian confederacy. Friendly at first to Athens, the Corinthians became jealous of the rapid strides of this power after the Persian war; a sentiment which passed into open hostility on the accession of Megara to the Athenian alliance, and the assistance furnished by Athens to the Corcyreans in their quarrel with the mother city. This latter event was the immediate cause of the Peloponnesian war. Throughout this war the Corinthians were the bitterest opponents of the Athenians; and at the close of it, when the battle of Ægospotami annihilated the naval power of Athens, their animosity was shown by a proposal that the city should be razed to the ground. Jealous in turn of the supremacy which Sparta had now attained, they turned their arms against their former allies; and in conjunction with the Athenians, Boeotians, and Argives, waged a war with Lacedæmon, called the Corinthian war, which, after various turns of fortune, ended with the peace of Antalcidas, B.C. 387. In the subsequent war between Sparta and Thebes, Corinth again appears as an ally of the former; but exhausted by the struggle, she concluded a separate peace with Thebes. From this period to the battle of Chæronea, Corinth remained inactive; she then, like the other states of Greece, became subject to the Macedonians, who maintained a garrison in the fortress of the Acrocorinthus. Rome succeeded Macedonia in the government of Greece; and by her new conquerors Corinth was attached to the Achæan league. She madly joined in the Achæan revolt; and after the defeat of the allied forces by the Romans under Mummius, this general inflicted all the miseries of conquest upon the devoted city. The temples and buildings were levelled to the ground; the males were put to the sword, and the women sold as slaves; and the paintings, and other works of art, in which from its wealth Corinth abounded, were carried off to Rome. After this terrible blow, Corinth remained for a century in ruins. At length, under the auspices of Julius Cæsar, who sent thither a colony of his veterans and freedmen, a new city sprang up on the site of the old; and from the advantages of its position, speedily became a prosperous place. At St. Paul's visit, about 100 years afterwards, it was the residence of a proconsul, and the political capital of Greece. An unbroken series of disasters marks its subsequent history. In common with the rest of the Roman empire, it suffered from the ravages of the Goths; fell under the power of the Venetians, who retained it till the overthrow of the western empire; and from them passed into the hands of the Turks, with whom it remained until Greece became a separate kingdom. The modern town Gortho, which occupies the site of Corinth, is an insignificant place, with a population of about 2000: it is supported chiefly by a small export trade in dried fruit and honey.

Situation and Topography.—The situation of Corinth on the isthmus, between the two inland seas of Greece, has been already described. Compared with its political and commercial importance, the Corinthian territory was of small extent. From the Geraneian mountains, which towards the north-east formed the boundary between it and Megara, to the Oneian ridge on the south, its length may have been about 18 miles: the breadth varied considerably with the conformation of the coast; from the river Nemea, which divided Corinthia from Sicyon, to the confines of Epidauria, it was about 22 miles, while the isthmus measured only $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles across. The soil was generally deficient in fertility. Neither the mountain spurs, which covered a great part of the district, nor the sandy plain of the isthmus, were fitted for agriculwhich, in diameter, are the largest of that order of architecture now existing in Greece. A mass of brick-work, probably one of the baths erected by Hadrian, and an amphitheatre excavated from the rock on the eastern side of the town, mark the subsequent occupation of the Romans. Compared with Athens, Corinth offers but a scanty field to antiquarian research.

Religion; Manufactures, &c.—The religion of Corinth was, like that of the rest of Greece, polytheistic, or rather it consisted in the worship of deified heroes, and of the powers of nature personified. But besides what was common to it with the national mythology, it possessed peculiar features of its own, which evidently were derived from an eastern source. The patron goddess of the city was Aphrodite or Venus, to whom was erected a magnificent temple on the Acrocorinthus, where 1000 female slaves were maintained for the service of strangers. In no other Greek city is an institution of this kind, which reminds us of the worship of Mylitta at Babylon, as described by Herodotus (Clio, 1, 199), known to have existed. The flagrant publicity of the Phallus worship, the disgusting symbol of the fertility of nature, is another proof of the licentious character of the national religion. As might have been expected, this noxious element produced a corresponding effect upon the manners of the people, who were notorious, even in Greece, for dissipation and profligacy. The wealth which poured into the city, and the crowds of merchants who flocked thither, made it the favourite abode of courtezans, among whom two of the name of Lais, remarkable for their beauty and their avarice, have been handed down to posterity. From St. Paul's epistles it may be gathered that these luxurious and sensual tendencies survived the conquest by the Romans, and perpetuated themselves in the new city founded by Cæsar. A large portion, however, of the national treasure was diverted into worthier channels. It contributed to adorn the city with numerous splendid temples; and it was from Corinth that the most ornate of all the orders of Grecian architecture took its origin and its name. The art of painting is said to have been here invented; and at the period of the Roman conquest, it abounded with masterpieces in this branch of art. For one picture of Bacchus, by Aristides of Thebes, afterwards transported to Rome, Attalus, king of Pergamus, offered in vain a sum equivalent to £5000 of our money. In statuary, especially of bronze, the expression "Corinthian brass," which was applied to the finest specimens of that art, attests the excellence of the Corinthian workmanship. Vases of terra-cotta, famous throughout Greece, and eagerly purchased at enormous prices by the Romans, formed an important branch of trade. In literature the Corinthians were less successful. At one period indeed, during the reign of Periander, poetry was cultivated; and the name of Arion especially, the friend of Periander, though not a native of Corinth, is associated with the invention of the dithyramb. But the muses found no congenial home in this emporium of trade. Among the illustrious writers of Greece no Corinthian name is found; nor does that of any great statesman or orator grace the annals of the national history. Corinth was content to be the eye of Greece ture. One portion only, the plain lying on the coast between Corinth and Sicyon, repaid the labours of the husbandman; and this was so valuable, that "what lies between Sicyon and Corinth" became a proverbial expression for great wealth. The most conspicuous object in the vicinity of Corinth was the Acrocorinthus, a lofty mountain rising 2000 feet above the level of the sea, compared with which the Acropolis of Athens sinks into insignificance. This gigantic fortress was justly considered the key of Greece, and its possession marked the supremacy, for the time being, of the successive conquerors of that country. On the north side of it, on a table-land of rock, about 200 feet above the level of the sea, stood the city, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile distant from the port-town of Lechæum, on the Corinthian Gulf, with which it was connected by long walls resembling those which joined Athens to the Piræus. The corresponding port on the Saronic Gulf, now Bay of Kechries, was called Cenchreæ, Ac. xviii. 18; Ro. xvi. 1; it was distant from Corinth about 8 miles, and was the emporium of the trade with the East: the modern name Kechries still marks the spot. The city was in size inferior only to Athens: the whole circuit of the walls, including those of the city and Acrocorinthus, the two long walls to Lechæum, and the fortifications of the latter place, was about 120 stadia, or 13 miles. Of the population we have no trustworthy accounts; it is supposed to have amounted to 100,000, of whom about 80,000 inhabited the city, the remainder being scattered over the country. In the time of Pausanias, who has left a description of Corinth as of Athens, the city contained many splendid edifices and works of art, part being relics of the ancient city, and part the work of the Roman colonists. Of Grecian Corinth, all that remains is a cluster of seven Doric columns, on the western side of the modern town, which belonged to a temple, and in a commercial point of view; resigning that title, as regards literature and philosophy, to her political rival and inveterate foe Athens. In the neighbourhood of the city were celebrated every third year the Isthmian games, so called from the scene of their celebration. One of the most important contests, the foot-race, furnished St. Paul with striking illustrations of the Christian life, of which, in his first epistle to the Corinthians, he takes care to avail himself, 1 Co. ix. 24-27.

Introduction of the Gospel to Corinth.—Insignificant, however, as the place which Corinth, as compared with Athens, holds in the estimation of the classical student, it occupies a far more important position than the latter city in the early history of the church. A flourishing Christian community was there founded by the great apostle of the Gentiles, to which two of his most important epistles were addressed. The following is a brief account of this event. It was on his second missionary journey, Ac. xviii. 1, that Paul, leaving Athens, where the gospel had had but scanty success, turned his steps towards Corinth. The reasons which determined his course thither are not difficult to conceive. Corinth was then the metropolis of the province of Achaia, and the principal seat of government and trade. Its ports were crowded with vessels, and its streets swarmed with a mixed population of Jews, Greeks, and Roman attendants upon the proconsul. The constant communication which went on between it and the most flourishing regions both of the East and the West, including Rome itself, would insure the extensive propagation of the gospel. Moreover, as was their custom in mercantile cities, Jews had here congregated in great numbers; and in every place which St. Paul visited, it was to his brethren after the flesh that he first addressed himself. At this particular period too, the decree of the emperor Claudius banishing Jews from Rome, had increased the number of Hebrew residents in Corinth. Impelled no doubt by these considerations, the apostle here took up his abode. He found in the city two Jews, Aquila and his wife Priscilla, natives of Pontus, on the shores of the Euxine Sea, who, in consequence of the decree of Claudius, had repaired thither; and discovering that they were of the same trade which he himself had been taught in his youth, the manufacture of haircloth tents, he associated himself with them. Their conversion appears to have speedily followed; and they became valuable fellow-helpers with the apostle in his arduous labours. These labours commenced immediately: every Sabbath in the synagogue, in which as a doctor of the law he had a right to teach, Paul reasoned out of the Scriptures, persuading both native Jews and proselytes that Jesus was the Christ. A fresh impulse was communicated to his zeal, by the arrival of his beloved friends Timothy and Silas, with joyful tidings of the prosperous condition of the church of Thessalonica. So energetic an assault upon the strongholds of Jewish bigotry and unbelief could not be made without exciting the hostility of that perverse people: they organized a formidable resistance; they blasphemed the holy name which Paul preached; and at length the apostle, with a symbolical action expressive of final rejection ("he shook his raiment, and said unto them, Your blood be upon your own heads," Ac. xviii. 6), turned from them to the Gentiles. The house of Justus, a converted proselyte, contiguous to the synagogue, furnished a convenient place of resort for those who were desirous of instruction. Encouraged by a vision, in which the Lord declared that he had much people in the city, Paul continued his labours, which resulted in the conversion of many of the Corinthians; among whom Stephanus with his household, 1 Co. xvi. 15, and the hospitable Gaius, Ro. xvi. 23, deserve particular mention; and what was of still greater importance, of Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue. These persons the apostle, deviating from his ordinary practice, baptized himself, 1 Co. i. 14-16. A year and a half had thus been spent, when a new proconsul, Gallio, the brother of Annius Seneca, the philosopher, arrived at Corinth, to assume the reins of government. The unbelieving Jews, exasperated by the progress of the gospel, and especially by the defection of Crispus, lost no time in accusing Paul before Gallio of violating the law of Moses. Fortunately for the infant church, the new governor was a man of sense and humanity. Refusing to hear the apostle's defence, he drove the Jews from before the judgment-seat; alleging that, if their complaint had related to any breach of the criminal law of Rome, he would have listened to it, but that he would not intermeddle in their private religious disputes. To add to their discomfiture, the Greeks, encouraged by the impartiality or apathy of the proconsul, proceeded to personal violence, and beat Sosthenes, the chief ruler of the synagogue, before the very judgment-seat, Gallio looking on with indifference. A decisive triumph was thus gained by the Christians; and Paul continued his labours unmolested, until circumstances called him to leave this missionary field and proceed to Asia Minor. During the apostle's absence from Corinth, Apollos, an Alexandrian Jew and former disciple of John the Baptist, who had been led by means of Aquila and Priscilla to the knowledge of Christ, repaired thither; and being both eloquent and learned, successfully took up the work where Paul had left it, and watered the seed of divine grace which the apostle had planted, 1 Co. iii. 6. The subsequent condition of the Corinthian church, and the number of St. Paul's visits to it, will be best considered under the article on the EPISTLES TO THE CORINTHIANS. This church afterwards fell into obscurity, though one of its bishops, Dionysius, who lived towards the close of the second century, is said to have exercised considerable influence over the surrounding Christian communities.

CORINTHIANS, EPISTLES TO THE. Two of the principal epistles of the great apostle of the Gentiles: as expositions of doctrine, second in importance only to the epistle to the Romans, and the most instructive of all the inspired compositions of their class, from the insight which they furnish into the personal character of St. Paul himself, and the constitution, parties, and heresies, of the apostolic church.

Genuineness and Integrity.—On the former of these points no doubt, in ancient or modern times, has ever been entertained. These epistles are so strongly impressed with the spirit and peculiarities of St. Paul, both in their matter and in their style, and the historical notices which they contain so faithfully correspond with the narrative of the Acts of the Apostles, that to question their genuineness would be to question the existence of the apostle himself. Even German criticism, which has left few of the books of the canon unassailed, here acknowledges the irresistible force of the evidence, and acquiesces in the general belief of Christendom. The external testimony is as satisfactory as the internal. Our limits will only permit us to cite a few of the earliest writers who allude to the authorship of our epistles. Clement of Rome, towards the close of the first century, writing to the Corinthians, urges them to "take the epistle of the blessed apostle Paul." "What," he proceeds, "in the commencement of the gospel, did he write to you? Truly under the influence of the Spirit he gave you injunctions respecting himself, and Cephas, and Apollos, on account of your having been, even then, addicted to party spirit" (c. xlvii.; comp. 1 Co. i. 10). Polycarp, about A.D. 120: "Are we ignorant that, as Paul teaches, the saints shall judge the world?" (Epist. c. xi.; comp. 1 Cor. vi. 2). The epistle to Diognetus, in the works of Justin Martyr, A.D. 167: "The apostle, censuring that knowledge which is exercised without sincerity, says, 'knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth,'" 1 Co. viii. 1. Irenæus, A.D. 177: "The apostle also, in that epistle which he addressed to the Corinthians, plainly teaches the same, when he says, 'I would not have you ignorant, brethren, that all our fathers were under the cloud,'" &c. (Adv. Hæres. b. iv. c. 27; 1 Co. x. 1-12). Athenagoras, A.D. 177: "It is manifest that, according to the apostle, 'this corruptible must put on incorruption, in order that the dead being restored to life, each may receive the things done in the body, whether good or bad'" (De Resurrect. Mort.; 1 Co. xv. 24; 2 Co. v. 10). Clement of Alexandria, A.D. 189: "The blessed Paul has released us from this inquiry in his first epistle to the Corinthians, in which he writes — 'Brethren, be not children in understanding: but in malice be ye children, but in understanding be perfect'" (Pædag. i. 33; 1 Co. xiv. 20). Tertullian, A.D. 200: "Paul, in the first epistle to the Corinthians, notices persons who denied, or doubted, the resurrection of the body" (De Præscrip. c. 33). The same writers frequently quote the second epistle. Thenceforward the stream of external testimony becomes wide and full.—As regards the integrity of the epistles, that of the first has never been disputed; with the second the case has been otherwise. The discrepancy, in point of tone, between the first eight chapters of this epistle, in which the apostle addresses his readers rather in terms of commendation than of censure, and the last five, which are of an objurgatory character, led Semler, a German theologian of the last century, to propound the hypothesis that it consists of three distinct epistles, viz.—(1), ch. ix., an epistle to the churches of Achaia on the subject of a collection for the saints at Jerusalem; (2), ch. x. 1-xiii. 10, an epistle to the Corinthians asserting St. Paul's apostolical authority; and (3), the remaining portions of the epistle as it stands. Others (Weber, Paulus) supposed that the latter half was a separate composition; thus making the present epistle to consist of two originally distinct ones. This latter supposition was adopted partly to account for the disappearance of an epistle assumed to have been written between our first and second, and which it was thought we actually have in either the former or the latter portion of the second epistle; an assumption, however, which itself rests on doubtful grounds. Respecting the main fact upon which all these theories are based, viz. the change of subject and tone in the last chapters of the second epistle, it may be observed that it is not greater than several transitions which occur in the first epistle; and that it is sufficiently accounted for by supposing that the apostle, without expressly naming them, addresses himself in the two portions of the epistle to different sections of the church; in the first eight chapters to those who acknowledged his apostolic mission and submitted to his exhortations; in the remainder to those who, misled by the judaizing teachers, were still disposed to question his authority. We have every reason then to believe that the second, not less than the first, epistle has come down to us in its original form.

Number of Epistles written by St. Paul to the Corinthians.—Connected, as we have seen, with the discussion respecting the integrity of our second epistle, is the question, How many epistles did St. Paul address to the Corinthian church?—a point on which different opinions have been maintained. The determination of it depends, in great measure, upon that of another question, viz. How many visits did St. Paul make to the Corinthians? on which therefore it will be necessary to make a few remarks. The Acts of the Apostles make mention of two visits only of the apostle to Corinth; the former in Ac. xviii., when the church was founded, and which was of eighteen months' duration: the latter in Ac. xx. 2, which took place after Paul had been driven from Ephesus by the tumult of Demetrius, and had completed his journey through Macedonia. Before this latter visit, both our present epistles must have been written; the first from Ephesus, the second from one of the Macedonian churches during the journey just mentioned. It would appear then that up to the sending of the second epistle only one visit had taken place, and that the apostle's knowledge of the state of the Corinthian church, as exhibited in the epistles, had been derived from the reports of others (the household of Chloe, 1 Co. i. 11, and probably Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, the messengers of the Corinthian church); and this is the ordinary hypothesis. It is, however, very difficult to reconcile it with the express statements of St. Paul himself in 2 Co. xii. 14 and xiii. 1, that he was now about for the third time to visit Corinth. The expressions of the former passage ("Behold, the third time I am ready to come unto you") have indeed been interpreted to signify merely, that the apostle had now, for the third time, entertained the intention of a journey; but this can hardly be called the natural meaning of the words, and moreover it leaves the second passage unexplained. If the Acts of the Apostles professed to give a complete account of St. Paul's labours and journeys, it would of course govern our interpretation of the epistles; but since this history is manifestly of a fragmentary character, it is best, as in the similar instance of the journey to Arabia, of which no mention is found in the Acts, to supplement it from St. Paul's own statements, and to suppose that a journey, of which no record remains, took place. The limits of time within which we must place it are easily determined. It is plain from 2 Co. i. 23, that in the interval between the writing of our two epistles St. Paul had not seen the Corinthians; and since the first epistle was sent from Ephesus not long before he left that city, the visit in question must have been paid some time during his sojourn there. We gather from the apostle's expressions when referring to it, 2 Co. ii. 1, that it was of a painful character, and at the time productive of little fruit.

Assuming the fact of this unrecorded visit, we can have the less hesitation in taking in their natural sense the words on which the question of the number of the Corinthian epistles mainly turns. "I wrote unto you," says St. Paul in 1 Co. v. 9, "in the" or "my" "epistle not to company with fornicators." As far as the form of the expression is concerned, the words may be well understood of the epistle which the apostle was then writing; we have a similar usage in Ro. xvi. 22, Col. iv. 16, 1 Th. v. 27, and 2 Th. iii. 14. But the great, the almost insuperable, difficulty remains, that in our present first epistle no such injunction appears; and the usual reference of commentators to the excommunication of the incestuous person, as by implication involving such a command, is hardly satisfactory. The excommunication in question was a solemn act of St. Paul himself, and of a peculiar nature, see 1 Co. v. 4, 5, apparently occasioned by the neglect of the church to comply with a previous admonition to the same effect, and which appears to have been interpreted too strictly; to have been supposed, that is, to include unbelievers as well as delinquent brethren. St. Paul, alluding to this former admonition, conveyed, as it should seem, in a lost epistle, corrects the misunderstanding, and explains that it was intended to apply only to the latter class of persons, see 1 Co. v. 10, 11. There seems then reason to suppose that at least one epistle to this church has not been preserved; nor is there any difficulty in admitting this, if we remember that not every composition of an inspired man must necessarily have been composed under the influence of inspiration, and therefore intended to form a part of the canon. The prophets, for example, must have left many writings which were never admitted into the canon of the Old Testament; of Solomon's varied compositions, 1 Ki. iv. 32, 33, only a few were by the ancient church deemed worthy of that honour. In like manner the apostles may have indited many letters which, like their oral teaching, have not been handed down. Is it credible that, during his active and prolonged ministry, St. Paul wrote no more than his fourteen canonical epistles? Certain letters may have perished, because not written under the influence of inspiration; the inspired compositions both of the Old and New Testament forming but a small portion, a divinely superintended selection of the productions of their several authors—a circumstance which has not been always borne in mind by critics, e.g. Bishop Middleton, who, discussing the question before us, writes—"Besides the extreme improbability that a canonical book should have been lost, . . . no instance has been produced in which an ancient writer has cited the pretended first epistle, or even alluded to its existence" (On the Greek Art.; 1 Co. v.) But an apostolic epistle is not necessarily a canonical book; and the absence of reference, on the part of early authors, to the lost epistle, is sufficiently accounted for by the fact of its not having formed part of the canon. The order of events, then, may be arranged as follows:—During his sojourn at Ephesus, St. Paul, receiving unfavourable tidings of the state of the Corinthian church, especially of its laxity of discipline, addressed an epistle to it on this subject, to which the Corinthians replied, 1 Co. vii. 1. His written admonitions proving of little avail, he paid them a short visit, as it should seem with no better result. On his return to Ephesus, and not long before his departure from that city, he wrote a second epistle, our present first, in which he enters at length upon the points, both in practice and in doctrine, which needed correction. Soon afterwards he left Ephesus and proceeded to Macedonia, having first sent Timothy, Ac. xix. 22, and then Titus, 2 Co. vii. 5, to Corinth, to report upon the state of things there, and especially upon the effect which the epistle had produced. On Titus's rejoining him in Macedonia with more favourable accounts, our second epistle was written, and was followed, shortly afterwards, by the apostle himself. Thus much may be regarded as borne out by our existing sources of information; much more doubtful is the theory, first propounded by Bleek, that Titus carried with him an epistle which has also been lost, so that in all four epistles were addressed to the Corinthians. Bleek's conjecture was founded on certain expressions in our second epistle, which seemed to him inapplicable to anything contained in the present first, particularly such passages as 2 Co. ii. 3, 4, and vii. 12; whence he concluded that an intermediate epistle must have been sent from Macedonia, couched in terms of strong censure. His hypothesis, however, seems to rest on insufficient grounds; and by recent writers, Neander among the rest, it has been rejected.

Place and Time of Writing.—On these points little need be added to the observations already made. "I will tarry at Ephesus until Pentecost," 1 Co. xvi. 8, points out both the place and the time of writing; the subscription in our English Bibles "from Philippi" being manifestly erroneous. Since St. Paul left Ephesus about Pentecost A.D. 57, this epistle must have been written in the early part of that year. The bearers of it were probably Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, 1 Co. xvi. 17, delegates from the Corinthian church to Ephesus. The notices contained in the second epistle are not so definite. Paul had recently left Asia, 2 Co. i. 8, for Macedonia, taking Troas in his way, where he had expected to meet Titus, on the return of the latter from Corinth, 2 Co. ii. 12, 13. Disappointed in this, he passed over into Macedonia, where Titus joined him, and where this epistle was written, ch. ix. 2.—at what particular place is uncertain. Since after the sending of it he visited Greece and abode there three months, Ac. xx. 3, and then is found at Easter A.D. 58 at Philippi, on his return to Jerusalem, it must have been written towards the latter end of A.D. 57. The bearers of it were Titus and two brethren, whose names are not mentioned, but one of whom was probably Luke, 2 Co. viii. 16-22.

State of the Corinthian Church at the time.—The rich and luxurious metropolis of Greece was not in itself a favourable field for the progress of Christianity in its native simplicity. The visible success indeed of the apostle's labours was, as compared with that achieved in other places, very great; but many of the converts were but imperfectly established in the faith and practice of the gospel. On the one hand, the habit of philosophical speculation, so congenial to the Hellenic mind, arrayed itself against that submission of the intellect which revelation presupposes and demands, or still more perniciously attempted so to spiritualize the facts of the gospel as to deprive them of objective reality; on the other, the laxity of Corinthian morals could with difficulty be taught to abandon practices which were wholly inconsistent with the elevated standard of the new religion. As long as Paul was present in person, his apostolic authority sufficed to check these corrupt tendencies: but his departure was the signal for their overt manifestation. To these dangers, naturally arising from the character and associations of the converts, must be added the influence of rival teachers, whose doctrines were more or less antagonistic to those which Paul had delivered. That judaizing section of the apostolic church which followed in the wake of the great apostle wherever he went, marking him out for its especial enmity, appears to have despatched to Corinth, as it did to Galatia, some of its emissaries, carrying with them letters of recommendation from other churches, 2 Co. iii. 1, for the purpose of forming an adverse party. As elsewhere, so in Corinth, it was part of their plan to counteract the influence and disparage the authority of Paul, by throwing doubts upon the validity of his apostolic mission, and drawing injurious comparisons between him and those of the twelve who had seen the Lord in the flesh. As one extreme usually produces its opposite, it is not to be wondered at that they who had cordially embraced the teaching of the apostle should have been tempted to identify his doctrine with his person; and forgetting that he was but the instrument of a higher power, to which, and not to man, the spiritual increase was to be referred, to inscribe his name on their banners as the leader of a party. Moreover, the chief fellow-worker with Paul in this church had been, unconsciously no doubt, the occasion of a division of sentiment. It had been the apostle's care to deliver his message with the utmost simplicity of speech, lest he should foster the notion, so likely to prevail in a Greek city, that Christianity was but a new philosophical system, to be recommended by the graces of oratory, or a show of superior intellectual subtlety: he "came not with excellency of speech or of wisdom," that their "faith" might "not stand in the wisdom of men but in the power of God." His successor, however, the eloquent Apollos, proceeded to erect upon the foundation thus laid a structure more in unison with the intellectual habits of the Alexandrian school, in which he had been nurtured. There could, indeed, have been no essential difference between his doctrine and that of Paul, for he is everywhere spoken of as a faithful minister of Christ; but to the Corinthian taste his mode of expounding the Old Testament, and his greater facility in the use of the Greek language, may have proved more attractive than the simple energy of the apostle, and gathered to him a body of peculiar admirers.

In this manner, no doubt, it is that the origin of three of the parties mentioned in 1 Co. i. 12 is to be accounted for. Some declared themselves to be for Paul, others for Apollos, while the judaizing party chose the name of Peter, the apostle of the circumcision, as their watchword; a circumstance which proves that they had by no means the same influence at Corinth as at Galatia, for otherwise they would probably have named themselves after James, whom the strictest section of the Jewish Christians regarded as their head. It does not, in fact, appear that at Corinth they ventured to assert the continued obligation of the law of Moses, even to the extent of submitting to circumcision, as they did in other places: the temper of those with whom they had to deal rendered caution in their proceedings necessary. What is meant by the fourth party alluded to by St. Paul, that which professed to be of Christ, is more difficult of determination. At first sight we might be led to suppose that it consisted of those who, influenced by feelings of enmity towards Paul, insisted upon the fact that he had not, like the other apostles, seen our Lord in the flesh, and attempted on this ground to assign to him a position of inferiority: they had received the gospel from eye-witnesses and ear-witnesses of the Word of life; the adherents of Paul from one who, as he himself confesses, was born out of due time. And this hypothesis might seem to be confirmed by the only two passages in which any explanation appears of the ambiguous expression in question, viz. 2 Co. v. 16 and x. 7; in the former of which Paul declares that to have known Christ after the flesh confers, under the gospel, no prerogative; and in the latter claims a closeness of connection with Christ not inferior to that of which this party boasted. It labours, however, under the objection, a great if not a fatal one, that thus there would be no real distinction between the party of Peter and the party of Christ; since the former took precisely the same ground in their opposition to Paul, viz. that of instituting injurious comparisons between him and the rest of the apostolic college; whereas the language of the epistle seems naturally to imply that "they of Christ" constituted a distinct party. If it be urged, as it is with great acuteness by Baur, that just as the followers of Apollos are spoken of as distinct from those of Paul, and yet we cannot suppose that any essential difference existed between them; so the party of Christ may be classed under that of Peter, as a subdivision, possessing the common quality of judaistic tendencies, but distinguished by a peculiar animosity against Paul as an individual; and thus there were but two really distinct parties, that of Paul and that of Peter, either with its subordinate modification—it may be replied that in this case we should expect to find the name of some apostle, or human leader, corresponding to that of Apollos, and not the name of Christ, as the symbol of this peculiar section. If this objection be thought an insuperable one, the only remaining theory which possesses any show of reason is that of Neander and Olshausen; that, not judaistic but rationalistic tendencies formed the characteristic of this portion of the Corinthian church; that, in opposition to the legal and scrupulous spirit of the former, it was distinguished by the opposite extreme of laxity and philosophical indifferentism. In point of fact, the polemical portion of the first epistle (the second contains no dogmatical or ethical discussion) is directed almost entirely against, not legal tendencies such as those which form the subject of the epistles to the Galatians and Colossians, but such an abuse of Christian liberty as might be expected to exhibit itself in the heathen centre of Greek civilization. In the first four chapters the apostle argues against an undue estimation of human wisdom, with a manifest reference to the Greek philosophy: the case of the incestuous person which follows, indicates a laxity of morals which is not likely to have been of Jewish origin: under the aspect of the possible inexpediency of things in themselves abstractedly lawful, the questions respecting pleading before heathen tribunals, marriage, and the partaking of flesh offered to idols, are treated: in the tenth chapter the examples from the history of the Israelites seem intended as warnings against a licentious perversion of the grace of God. If, now, we suppose that, among the manifold varieties of opinion that prevailed in this church, there were some who renounced all connection with the apostles, who, though but human instruments, were nevertheless the appointed instruments of establishing Christianity in the world; and on the ground of some traditional sayings of our Lord, or even without such a basis, professed to frame for themselves a philosophic Christianity, which both in doctrine and practice should affect a latitudinarian freedom—arrogating to themselves, as distinguished from their brethren in the faith, the exclusive title of Christians; we have, perhaps, as near an approximation to the truth as the confessed difficulties which surround the subject will permit.

The evils arising from the prevalence of party spirit did not terminate with the divisions thereby introduced into the church. Each section receding as far as possible from the antagonist one, serious extremes of error were the necessary result. Ecclesiastical discipline became so relaxed, from the difficulty no doubt of enforcing it under present circumstances, that delinquents of the worst description were tolerated in the communion of the church, 1 Co. v. The precepts of Christian charity were on all sides forgotten. Among spiritual gifts, which at Corinth manifested themselves in unusual abundance, those were chiefly valued, not which ministered to the general edification, but which most tended to exalt the individual, 1 Co. xiv. Differences among Christians, instead of being, as was the usual practice, referred to arbitrators chosen from themselves, were brought before heathen courts of judicature, to the scandal of the Christian name, ch. vi. On the subject of marriage, extreme opinions were held. Christianity, in opposition to a false asceticism, pronounces marriage honourable in all, and sees in it an emblem of the union between Christ and his church, Ep. v. 29-33; yet, equally opposed to the Jewish sentiment which attached disgrace to an unmarried life, it contemplates cases in which the latter may be chosen, not only without danger, but as a special means of advancing the kingdom of God, Mat. xix. 11, 12. At Corinth there seems to have been, on the one hand, a disposition, probably on the part of the followers of Paul, who was himself unmarried, to exalt celibacy, as in itself a meritorious state; and, on the other, an attempt, proceeding no doubt from the party of Peter, to make marriage obligatory on all, and so to abridge the legitimate liberty of Christians in this respect, 1 Co. vii. Here too, as at Rome, Ro. xiv., disputes had arisen respecting the lawfulness of eating meat which had been offered to idols. To the Jewish Christians, by whom, under the law, the feasts of the peace-offerings had been regarded as symbolical of communion with Jehovah, this practice appeared little less than idolatry; while even Gentile converts, of scrupulous conscience, might entertain doubts on the subject. However groundless in themselves such scruples might be—for true it was that idols were “nothing in the world,” and meat offered to them could contract no real pollution—it was the duty of those who possessed clearer light to respect them, and to abstain from what might wound the conscience of the weaker brethren. This, however, they were far from doing. They boasted of their knowledge; they insisted upon their abstract right to act as they pleased in things indifferent. Some proceeded so far as to partake of the banquets celebrated in the very temples of the heathen deities. The consequence was, not only that scrupulous consciences were offended, but that some were tempted, against their convictions, to follow the example set them, and to commit what they conceived to be sin, 1 Co. viii. 2.

In the celebration of divine worship abuses had crept in. Contrary to the Greek custom, the women appeared in the assembly unveiled, 1 Co. xi. 6; and even ventured to speak in public, ch. xiv. 34. But especially in the most sacred and distinctive ordinance of Christianity did the leading defect of this church exhibit itself; and the sacrament of the Lord's supper, intended to be both a means and a symbol of the fellowship of believers with each other and with their Lord, became an occasion of dissension and invidious separation. At the agape or love-feast with which, in the apostolic age, the ordinance was wont to conclude, the worshippers usually partook, without distinction, of the viands provided; but at Corinth a custom prevailed of each contributor to the banquet consuming his own portion apart; which necessarily brought out into strong relief the distinction between rich and poor, destroyed the notion of equality in the presence of Christ the common Lord, and even gave rise to disgraceful excess, 1 Co. xi. 20-22.

Serious doctrinal errors complete the melancholy picture which this apostolic community presented. If there is any tenet which peculiarly belongs to the gospel, it is that of the resurrection of the body, which Christ was the first authoritatively to announce, Jn. v. 28, 29, and of which by his own resurrection he has given a visible pledge. This fundamental doctrine was called in question by certain of the Corinthian church; and if the party of Christ has been rightly described as consisting of speculative religionists, who moulded the truths of revelation to suit their taste, we can hardly be mistaken in supposing that from them this heretical tendency proceeded. After the fashion of the false spiritualism which pervaded the Gnostic heresies of the next age, and the seeds of which were coeval with the gospel itself, they probably interpreted the apostolic teaching on the point in question to signify a mere spiritual resurrection of the soul, to take place in this life; thus not only robbing the doctrine of its true value and significance, but, by implication, denying the fact of Christ's resurrection, and therewith undermining the whole structure of redemption: for, as the apostle remarks, “if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain, ye are yet in your sins,” 1 Co. xv.

Such was the state of affairs in the Corinthian church a very short time after the apostle's presence had been withdrawn from it. So soon, and with such diligence, did the enemy sow tares among the wheat. The picture, though painful, is instructive; not only as furnishing the natural history of kindred errors in our own time, but as teaching us how fond the notion is, sometimes entertained, of the immaculate purity of the early church, and how from the first, according to St. Paul's own predictions, Ac. xx. 28, 30, heresy and schism found an entrance into each visible Christian community.

Contents of the Epistles.—The first epistle may, as Olshausen remarks, be divided into four parts. In the first, extending from the commencement to the end of ch. iv., Paul discourses generally on the divided state of the church. He traces their party-spirit to its true source, an undue estimation of the wisdom of this world, whereas Christ alone is the wisdom as well as the power of God, ch. i. For himself, he had determined to know and to preach nothing save Christ and him crucified; and this with all plainness of speech. Such topics, however, and such a mode of delivering them, only the spiritual man could appreciate; it was from their deficiency of spiritual apprehension that the Corinthians had attached so much importance to the human instrument, and exalted one teacher above another, whereas, whether it were Paul, or Apollos, or Peter, all were but stewards of the mysteries of God, ch. ii. iii. That he himself was a true apostle of Christ, his sufferings for the gospel's sake sufficiently proved; but under any circumstances man's judgment weighed little with him, and his ultimate appeal was to the Searcher of hearts, ch. iv. The second division, from ch. v. 1 to x. 33, is occupied with the concerns of Christians as individuals. The incestuous person was to be excommunicated; the command, however, given in a former epistle, to separate themselves from delinquents of this description was to be understood as applying only to those who called themselves brethren, ch. v. Differences among Christians were not to be brought before heathen tribunals, ch. vi. On the question of marriage St. Paul delivers his opinion that, while forced celibacy, apart from a special call thereto, could not but prove pernicious, there might be cases, or there might arise circumstances, which would justify the adoption of single life; adducing his own example as an instance in point, ch. vii. With reference to idol-offerings, Christian liberty was not to be strained so as to become virtually intolerance: all things might be lawful, but all things were not expedient: and though in itself one kind of meat was neither better nor worse than another, the law of Christian charity imposed restraint where indulgence would cause offence or lead to a violation of conscience, ch. viii. ix. x. In the third portion of the epistle Paul gives directions for the decent celebration of public worship; with a particular reference to the abuses which prevailed in the mode of celebrating the Lord's supper, and in the exercise of the extraordinary gifts of prophecy and speaking with tongues. Inasmuch as the edification of the whole body was to be principally studied, prophecy, which could be understood by all, was to be preferred to the gift of tongues, which, without an interpreter, remained fruitless save to the speaker himself, ch. xi. -xiv. Lastly, in ch. xv. the doctrine of the resurrection is, by analogies drawn from the natural world, in a masterly manner vindicated: and the epistle concludes with a request that a contribution might be made for the saints at Jerusalem, who at that time stood in need of temporal assistance from their Gentile brethren, ch. xvi.

The second epistle arranges itself under three divisions. In the first, ch. i. -vii. 16, the apostle speaks of his sufferings for the gospel's sake; the burden of which, however, was alleviated by a consciousness of the dignity of his office, as a minister of the New Testament, and by the prospect of that exceeding and eternal weight of glory which awaits the faithful servants of the Lord. The incestuous person, having given satisfactory proofs of repentance, was to be received again to the communion of the church. He was rejoiced to find that his former epistle, which he had written out of much affliction of heart and with many tears, had produced a salutary impression, and led to measures of practical amendment. The second portion, ch. viii. ix., enters at length upon the subject of the collection then being made throughout those regions for the poor saints at Jerusalem. In the third, ch. x. to the end, Paul defends himself against the insinuations of the false teachers who had endeavoured to undermine his authority. Though he might be comparatively rude in speech, he was not so in knowledge; nor did he come behind the very chiefest apostles, either in the natural privilege of Jewish birth or in the evidences of an apostolic commission. He had wrought miracles among them; he had received revelations from the Lord. His labours and his sufferings in the service of Christ had been far more abundant than those of his opponents. He, especially, their spiritual father, should not have been thus compelled to vindicate his authority; they themselves, the fruit of his ministry, were his letters of commendation; let his enemies produce, if they could, a similar testimony. Since the latter sought a proof of Christ speaking in him, they should have it if, when he arrived, he should find matters in no better a condition; but he trusted that such an exercise of discipline would not be found necessary. An exhortation to mutual love and peace brings the epistle to a close.

CORMORANT (קָרָמֹרַנְט, shalach, La. xi. 17; De. xiv. 17; קָרָמֹרַנְט, kaath, Is. xxxiv. 11; Zep. ii. 14). The kaath is elsewhere rendered pelican (see PELICAN), and this seems to be its correct meaning. We see no reason to doubt that our English version is right also in considering the shalach to be the cormorant. The LXX. render the word by καρπακρηνς, or that which rushes down; which idea is also expressed by the Hebrew קָרָמֹרַנְט, to cast down.

Col. Hamilton Smith prefers the Caspian tern, on the ground that the cormorants catch their prey by diving, [181.] Greater Cormorant (Phalacrocorax carbo).—The bird in front is in full plumage, that behind in its Spring dress.

“and none of them rush flying upon their prey,” though he allows that the gannet does. But he has mistaken the habit of the true cormorants, for these, like the gannet and other Pelecanidæ, frequently drop from a height upon their fishy prey, as may readily be observed in both of our native species.

The greater cormorant (Phalacrocorax carbo) frequents rocky coasts, where it delights to sit on lofty projecting points watching the fish below; these it occasionally plunges upon, catching its slippery prey and holding it with great ease by means of the sharp hooked beak. More frequently, however, it shoots along in a line nearly close to the surface of the water, or sitting on the wave, dives after the prey. It is trained to fish for man's use in China.

This bird is common on the coasts of Syria and Palestine; Rauwolf saw numbers of black, long-necked birds, sitting among the rocks and sea-washed crags near Acre. He supposed them sea-eagles, but his description precludes the supposition; they were no doubt cormorants. [P. H. G.]

CORN. The Hebrews, like ourselves, had a generic word for all kinds of grain, including the cereals and their allies. דגן (dagan) is nearly equivalent to our English "corn," and would comprehend millet, rye, barley, &c., as well as wheat, all of which will be found noticed in their proper places. Besides these, it is by no means improbable that the Hebrews were acquainted with what we call Indian corn, or as it is sometimes called, Turkish corn, the Zea mays of Linnæus.

In 1817, Parmentier (Nouveau Dictionnaire d'Hist. Naturelle, tome xviii.), founding on the silence of Varro, Columella, Pliny, and the other agricultural and botanical writers of classical antiquity, concluded that maize was unknown till the discovery of America; and in 1834, Meyer asserted that "nothing in botanical geography is more certain than the New World derivation of maize" (quoted by Duchartre in Orbigny's Dict. d'Hist. Nat.) But since then, in his magnificent monograph (Hist. Naturelle du Maïs, 1836), M. Bonafous, the director of the Royal Garden of Agriculture at Turin, has shown that it is figured in a Chinese botanical work as old as the middle of the sixteenth century—a time when the discoveries of Columbus could scarcely have penetrated to the celestial empire; and what is more conclusive, in 1819, M. Rifaud discovered under the head of a mummy at Thebes, not only grains but leaves of Indian corn. Nor is it at all impossible that the $\zeta\epsilon\iota\alpha$ of Homer and Theophrastus may include the plant in question. The wide diffusion of this corn through the Indian archipelago, and on the Indian continent itself, is in favour of the hypothesis which claims it as a native of the Old World, and if it was known to the Egyptians, nothing could be more natural than its early introduction into Palestine.

In his amusing and characteristic treatise on "Cobbett's Corn," remarking on the offering of "green ears of corn," Le. ii. 14, the author says—"What a curious meat-offering, to parch green grains of wheat by the fire! Oh, no; this meat-offering was to consist of ears of green corn [maize]; that is to say, corn in the milky state, roasted before the fire; and no wonder that it was chosen for an offering, for the most delicious thing it is that ever delighted the palate of human being. The general way of cooking these 'green ears,' as the Americans call them, is to boil them, and to eat them as bread along with meat, or sometimes with butter. The context would add additional conviction, if any were wanted; for the 15th verse says, 'thou shalt put oil upon it, and lay frankincense thereon.' Now we, when we have roasted our ears of corn before the fire, put butter and salt thereon." If we were absolutely secure in assuming that the corn of the Bible may occasionally denote this plant, it would give additional expressiveness to the numerous passages which speak of "eating green ears," of "cutting off the tops of the ears of corn," and such presents as "full ears of corn in the Auks thereof," Le. xiii. 14; Job xxiv. 24; Mat. xii. 1; 2 Kl. iv. 2. There is also force in what Cobbett says regarding the "seven ears of corn coming up on one stalk" in Pharaoh's dream, Ge. xii. 5. "The wheat root will send up sometimes, if it have room, from twenty to fifty stalks, but never more than one ear upon one stalk. Seven ears is a great number for a corn plant to have; but (and the fact is truly curious) the New York Evening Post, of the 26th of August last, records as a wonder a corn-stalk on the farm of a Mr. Dickerson, in Bedford county, having seven full ears upon it. And it happens singularly enough, that one single corn plant in my field has on one stalk seven ears of corn." [J. H.]

CORNELIUS, a Roman centurion, or commander of a hundred, in what was called the Italic band, Ac. x. 1. The band ($\sigma\tau\epsilon\iota\alpha$, manipulus) consisted of two centuries, and formed the third part of a cohort, as this again the tenth part of a legion. This particular band bearing the epithet of Italic probably arose from its consisting chiefly of soldiers levied in Italy—although such names as "the Coldstream Guards," "the Sutherland Highlanders," &c., familiarly applied to regiments in our own country, and continued when they no longer indicate the quarter whence the individual men have been derived, shows that the term Italic cannot of itself be regarded as a certain proof that the band at that particular time was composed of men who strictly belonged to Italy. Still this circumstance, coupled with his own undoubtedly Roman name, Cornelius, may justly be held conclusive as to himself. The Cornelian was one of the most distinguished families of Rome; and it is by no means improbable that the person before us may have been of this noble patrician stock, especially as the emperor Julian classes him among the few persons of distinction that in early times embraced Christianity. He may have been, however, of inferior rank; as in later times many plebeians are mentioned bearing the name of Cornelii, and Sulla alone, who belonged to that gens, liberated no fewer than 10,000 slaves, and gave them his family name.

The Cornelius who has acquired so honourable a place in New Testament history was evidently a person of free, open, ingenuous mind, and, even before his formal admission into the Christian church, well advanced in the knowledge and fear of the true God. At the first mention of his name he is described as a devout person, and one who feared, not the deities, but τὸν Θεόν, the one God, and that too with all his household, Ac. x. 2. Unacquainted as we are with the earlier history of Cornelius, we can say nothing, except by conjecture, in regard to the means or opportunities by which he may have been led so far into the reception of the truth. It is probable enough that his position at Cæsarea, and his occasional residence in other parts of Syria, perhaps of Palestine itself, may have brought him into contact with some of the more intelligent Jews, who, though adhering with blinded prejudice to what they should now have abandoned, still stood immeasurably above the best instructed heathen as to the clearness of their views and the strength of their convictions in divine things. It is perfectly conceivable that he may also have formed some acquaintance with one or more persons if not actually converts to the Christian faith, yet favourably inclined toward it, and not unwilling to turn his mind in that direction. This even seems to be not doubtfully implied in the commencement of St. Peter's address to him; since it is there said, "The word which God sent unto the children of Israel, preaching peace by Jesus Christ, that word, ye know which was published throughout all Judea, and began from Galilee after the baptism which John preached," Ac. x. 34, 37. A certain acquaintance with the facts of gospel history, on the part of Cornelius and his household, is here assumed by the apostle; he sets out on the supposition that what now was needed was merely such an authoritative declaration of the truth as might warrant the implicit faith of those who heard, and qualify them for entering into the membership of the church. The same thing appears further to be implied in Cornelius being so expressly designated a man of prayer and charity, and in both respects of so earnest and faithful a character, that they had been going up for a memorial before God. When all these things are put together, it seems impossible to doubt that this man and his family had even before the visit of the apostle Peter attained to the knowledge of God, were honestly acting according to their light and privileges, and in the sincerity of their heart were desirous of obtaining more information, or arriving at more assured convictions than they yet possessed of the truths respecting Christ's person and work among men. They were already in God's sight accepted, and it was only necessary that their recognized position among men should be in accordance with their state before him, and should have added to it the spiritual endowments connected with a place in the Christian church.

Such plainly appears to have been the case of Cornelius at the time immediately preceding Peter's visit; and it is needless to embarrass one's self with the question, whether he belonged to what were subsequently called proselytes of the gate, or to that called proselytes of righteousness. It is quite uncertain when such epithets began to be applied, and, however settled, it can throw no light upon the case of Cornelius. He was still undoubtedly a Gentile so far as circumcision was concerned, and was hence represented by the apostle as a man of another race or tribe, and in Jewish estimation unclean. The whole point and moral of Peter's mission to him turned upon that, as the first element in the case, and upon God's accepting him to salvation notwithstanding as the second. It was precisely here that the apostles and the infant church needed a clear light and an explicit warrant. They knew perfectly that the salvation of Christ was for Gentiles as well as Jews, and that the gospel they had to preach had every creature of mankind for its object. The commission they received from Christ before his departure left them in no doubt respecting this, Mar. xvi. 15; Lu. xiv. 47; and they themselves at the outset gave expression to the universality of the call and the world-wide comprehensiveness of its aim, Ac. ii. 39; iii. 21. But the question that still waited for practical solution was, Were those who might embrace the call from other nations to be received without circumcision? Could they find an entrance into the church of Christ without passing through the gate of Judaism? The disciples as a whole—whatever may have been the convictions of individual members—were still of opinion that the old gate must stand, that as yet at least they had no authority for dispensing with it. Therefore, that the barrier might be removed, and the door of faith freely opened to the Gentiles, the case of Cornelius, with the special revelation given to Peter beforehand and the transactions that shortly after ensued, arose at the fitting time, and led all who were willing to be instructed to the proper result. By the vision granted to Peter, he was indoctrinated in the great fundamental principle, that what God had cleansed he should not call common or unclean; and then by the messengers from Cornelius, sent in obedience to another vision from above, he was guided with unerring certainty to its application. He presently learned that this pious, though uncircumcised, soldier was already a man accepted of God, virtually in a sanctified condition; and on proclaiming to him and his household the gospel of Christ's salvation, he saw the Spirit descending on them, and giving manifestation of his presence by the same miraculous signs which had at first appeared in the apostles themselves. Clearly, enough, therefore, God had sanctified these believing heathen, and could Peter, could any man in the Christian church, venture to call them unclean? The question was conclusively solved, and to reject from the membership of the Christian church an uncircumcised believer in Christ was henceforth in effect, as Peter put it before the gainsayers, to withstand God, Ac. x. 17.

CORNER-STONE, is an epithet prospectively applied by the prophet Isaiah to the Messiah in ch. xxviii. 18, "Behold I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner-stone, a sure foundation." The reference is obviously to the foundation of the building, and when the corner-stone is particularly specified, it can only be because this occupied the most important place in the foundation of the building—that which held together the outer walls, and on which the whole structure might be said more especially to rest. In Ps. cxviii. 22, which in all probability is a later composition, it is called the head or chief stone of the corner; and in Ep. ii. 20; 1 Pe. ii. 8, 16, the epithet is applied specifically to Christ; he is called the chief corner-stone. The ideas suggested by it in respect to Christ are his fundamental importance, as prophet, priest, and king to the church, the massive strength of this foundation, and its admirable fitness for at once sustaining and binding together in blessed fellowship the whole brotherhood of faith.

COVENANT (Heb. ברית, berith) is applied to various transactions between God and man. Divines very commonly make two main covenants, and under these range all others of a more specific or partial kind that occur in Scripture; viz. the covenant of works, and the covenant of grace—the first made with Adam, settling the terms of the original constitution of things, and fixing the alternative that should ensue on its violation; the other entered into between the Father and the Son, for the redemption of as many out of the fallen race as should attain to life eternal. (See Witsius on the Covenants, Ridgely's Body of Divinity; Boston's Notes on the Marrow of Modern Divinity.) It is proper to note, however, that such a division is better fitted for bringing out doctrinally the great features of the plan of God, and the specific bearing of individual parts of the divine administration in regard to it, than throwing light on the distinctive uses of the term covenant in Scripture. The constitution under which Adam was placed, however it may have possessed the essential characteristics of a covenant, is never designated by that name in the Word of God, not even in Ho. vi. 7; for if we should there read with some commentators, both in former and present times, "They, like Adam, have transgressed the covenant," it still comes short of an explicit application of the term covenant to the Adamic constitution. The covenant which the prophet refers to as having been transgressed, was undoubtedly that which had been made with Israel at Sinai; and the allusion to Adam (supposing it to exist) could not, in strictness, be carried further than to indicate, that as he had transgressed against one divine ordination, so had they against another. But it seems a more natural view of the passage to take it as given in our English Bible, "They, like men, have transgressed the covenant:" they have acted the common part of humanity; notwithstanding all that has been done for them, in spite of the special grace and privileges conferred upon them, they have acted no better than men generally—like them failing in steadfastness, and turning aside into the path of transgression.

The Hebrew term for covenant, berith, is commonly derived from the root ברך (brakh), to cut, to cleave, then to eat; and it is supposed that the name was so derived from the practice of ratifying such agreements by a religious act—the contracting parties uniting together in the presentation of an animal sacrifice, and passing between the parts of the victim. This explanation seems to have the countenance of Je. xxxiv. 18, where the Lord charges the people with having failed to perform "the words of the covenant which they made before him, when they cut the calf in twain, and passed between the parts thereof." It derives some countenance also from Ge. xv. 9, seq., where the "smoking furnace and burning lamp," symbols of the Lord's presence, are represented as passing between the pieces of the sacrifice, as Abraham himself had evidently done before, and "in that same day," it is added, "the Lord made a covenant with Abram." It may be doubted, however, whether this solemn act of passing between parts of the sacrifice was not confined to strictly divine covenants, while in covenants generally sacrificing and eating together may have been all that was customary. Such apparently was the case when Jacob and Laban entered into covenant, Ge. xxxi. 54. But whatever the particular form, there is reason to believe that the solemn killing and eating usual at the ratification of important contracts was what originated the peculiar expression for covenant; and this, once established, appears to have diffused itself generally; as among the Greeks appears in their δρακία τέμνειν, σπονδάς τέμν., and the Latins, fœdus ferire, fœdus ictum.

The first transaction we meet with in Scripture which is expressly designated a covenant is that entered into with Noah after the flood. The Lord then established his covenant with Noah, and for the obvious and permanent sign of it set his bow in the cloud, Ge. ix. 11-17. And the next is the one already referred to in Ge. xv., when he first entered into covenant with Abraham. On both of these occasions, however, there was not strictly a mutual compact, but an ordination on the part of God, according to which special arrangements in providence were to be made for those interested in the covenant, and might be looked for with the same confidence that men look to each other for the fulfilling of a contract. In the Noachic covenant there was simply the ratification of God's purpose to preserve the world against any future deluge, and to continue the race of men and the other races of the animal creation throughout all succeeding ages. In like manner in the first draught, as we may call it, of the Abrahamic covenant, the whole that was announced was God's settled purpose to convey to Abraham and his seed the inheritance of the land of Canaan, Ge. xv. 18-21. We can thus easily understand how the Septuagint should have rendered the Heb. term berith, on these occasions and generally wherever it afterwards occurs, by the word διαθήκη, disposition or will, rather than by συνθήκη, compact or mutual agreement. This latter term would naturally appear to carry too much the aspect of an engagement in which the contracting persons stood somewhat on a footing, and mutually bound themselves by obligations, to convey a suitable impression of those transactions in which nothing directly or prominently appeared but the bountifulness of God in purposing, and his faithfulness in accomplishing what he purposed. It was thought better to take the other term, which, while it failed to express the contracting element in a covenant, brought more forcibly out than any other could have done, what really was most prominent in the earlier covenants of God with men—his own gracious disposal of his affairs for their good. As the divine plan proceeded, the contracting element was brought more distinctly forward in respect to man. Even in the covenant with Abraham, when it was established in its more mature form, Ge. xvii., while a still fuller exhibition than formerly was made of the rich grace that was to be the heritage of Abraham and his seed, there was at the same time an express stipulation that the members of the covenant should be all circumcised—which again implied that they should be holy—otherwise, they had no reason to look for the blessings promised in the covenant. The covenant of law ratified at Mount Sinai, and grafted on that earlier covenant of promise, reversed, in the respect now under consideration, the relation of things: it gave special prominence to the obligations laid upon the people, and threw more into the background the purposes of mercy and loving-kindness entertained toward them on the part of God. It ran throughout in this strain: Since God has proved himself to be such a benefactor toward you, you must in return act in a corresponding manner toward him; and if you fail to do so, every privilege is forfeited, every promise in the earlier covenant is ready to be withdrawn. These are the two covenants to which attention is specially drawn in the Scriptures of the Old Testament. But there was also the covenant made with the house of David, 2Sa. vii., which formed the basis and occasion of many representations contained in the later prophetic Scriptures. It was in reality, however, but another and more specific form of the covenant with Abraham, and had for its main object to mark with greater exactness the line through which the grand purpose of blessing promised in the Abrahamic covenant was to find its accomplishment. The seed-royal thenceforth was to be in the house of David, and in connection with it, especially in connection with one who was to be pre-eminently the child of promise in that house—all good, first to Israel, and then to the other families of the earth, was to have its destined realization, Ps. ii. xxi.; Is. ix. 6, 7, &c. This later covenant, therefore, if viewed in respect to its higher interests, coincides with the Abrahamic covenant; it points to the same ultimate issues, requires also the same medium for bringing them to pass, and differs only in more specifically indicating the particular channel and mode through which the result was to be attained.

It is evident from what has been said, that the whole of these covenants found their accomplishment in Christ—though in different respects, and according to their distinctive ends and objects. The covenant of Noah was confirmed in him, because he placed on a sure and permanent foundation that kingdom of righteousness which was the only effectual safeguard against future condemnation and wrath; so also the covenant with Abraham, because he has made good the perfect righteousness, by virtue of which a well-spring of life and blessing was opened for every race and generation of men; and so again, the covenant with David, because he is that horn of salvation raised up in David's house, who is to reign for ever over God's heritage, and who will reign till all his and their enemies are made his footstool. Finally, even the covenant of law may be said to have found its confirmation in Christ; for its high demands of righteousness were satisfied to the full by his obedience unto death, and the principles enshrined in its symbolical ritual were once for all established, though the external forms enshrining them, as being by their very nature of a provisional kind, were made to vanish away.

In New Testament scripture we read only of two covenants—the new and the old, the former brought in and established by the work of Christ, and the latter in consequence ceasing to exist. The relation between these covenants, and the necessity of the one giving way when the other was formally introduced, is the point that is argued at length in the epistle to the Hebrews, especially in ch. vii.-x. By the old in this case is meant the covenant of law, with all its outward institutions and corporeal services, ratified at Sinai—regarded as old, simply because in the order of time its full and formal ratification had taken place before the other was properly brought into formal operation. In germ this other had existed from the first; and partial exhibitions had been given of it all along the world's history. It was involved in the promise of recovery given at the fall; for this contained in its bosom the whole work and issues of redemption. It was still more distinctly indicated in the covenants made, first with Abraham and then with David; as is formally proved in several places by the inspired writers of the New Testament, Ac. ii. 25-30; Ga. iii. 13-20, &c. So that if one looks to the heart and substance of the matter, the covenant sealed by the blood of Christ, and with its glorious heritage of blessings made sure in him to all the seed of believers, might justly be called the old covenant, in comparison of which the covenant of Sinai was of recent origin as well as of temporary duration. But in popular and current designations respect is usually had to the more obvious aspect of things; and as the covenant of law had run its course, and for many generations had held a prominent place in the minds of the people before the covenant of promise attained to its completeness, and received its proper establishment in Christ, so it naturally became known as the new, while that which it antiquated, and at the same time fulfilled, was designated the old.

This covenant of grace, whether in its more provisional forms, or now when brought to its complete and perfected state in Christ, mainly exhibits what God would do, or has done, for men, and as such may admit of being contrasted with the transaction at Sinai as a covenant in the stricter sense. There is such a contrast in Ga. iii. 16-18, where the revelation of law is called emphatically the covenant, while the exhibition of God's purpose of grace to Abraham, and confirmed in Christ, is represented as the word of promise, or simply the promises. And in a passage, He. ix. 15-18, which has given rise to a great deal of controversy, this new covenant, or covenant of promise, is presented in the light of a testament, or disposition of goods on the part of Christ the testator. This undoubtedly is the natural import of the language, and, we are persuaded, is also its real meaning. The explanation is to be sought in the particular aspect under which in that part of the epistle the sacred writer contemplates the covenant. It is that which, as already noticed, led the ancient Greek interpreters to employ the term διαθήκη, disposition or testament, rather than συμβήκη, compact, as the synonym for the Heb. berith; viz. the prominent exhibition given in it to the grace and loving-kindness of God. It appeared more as God's revealed mode of disposing of his affairs for the good of his people, than a mutual engagement between him and them. The contracting element consequently retires into the background, and the beneficiary alone becomes prominent. Hence, there is a real point of contact between the divine covenant and a human testament—an aspect common to them both, which is seized upon as affording an incidental illustration to the line of argument pursued in the epistle. A testator, who disposes of his goods by a regular will, must himself lose possession of them by death before the disposition takes effect; and Christ, as mediator of the new covenant, in reality its proper author, was substantially in the same position as regarded the bestowal of its blessings. These blessings were all his; so far as he was personally concerned he had them from the first in inexhaustible fulness; but only by first in a sense quitting possession of them, could he bestow on others a title to the inheritance of them; by death he must lose all, that they who lay under the ban of death might come in him to inherit all. And thus the ideas of covenant and testament coalesce in the work of Christ; he is at once mediator and testator—by the same act establishing for ever what God pledged himself in covenant to provide, and transmitting to the members of his elect family the everlasting inheritance of life and blessing. (See for a fuller explanation of the subject, Fairbairn's Hermeneutical Manual, p. 314, seq.)

The passage just referred to in Hebrews is the only one in which the idea of testament is connected with διαθήκη, and the only one where it should have been so translated. In all other passages where testament now stands, the term covenant should be substituted; and what we now call the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments had been more fitly designated the Scriptures of the Old and New Covenants. The Vulgate by its testamentum, instead of fœdus, in this gave an unhappy direction to the versions of modern Europe. In particular the words used by our Lord at the institution of the supper, should have been rendered, "This cup is the new covenant in my blood," as this would far more readily, and without any danger of confusing the idea in people's minds, have made manifest the reference intended to the better covenant, founded on better promises, which was to be confirmed by the blood of Christ. The employment of this term would also serve to keep in view what, doubtless, is designed not to be forgotten—the mutual engagement which still subsists, even in this higher covenant, between the Lord and his people. Comparatively speaking the contracting element may be said to have fallen into abeyance, but not absolutely; it is still there; and while the Lord engages to sustain a certain part toward his people, they, in return, stand engaged to sustain a corresponding part toward him. This does not warrant us to say that the fulfilling of their part in the covenant forms the condition on which they are to expect the fulfilment of his. The proper representation rather is, that the performance of God's part in bestowing the benefits of the covenant on those who really enter into it, carries along with it, as a necessary consequence, their reception of the gifts conferred, and their use of them unto all righteous and beneficent ends. Where this latter is not done, it is a clear sign that the other has never actually been experienced; so that for any to imagine they are partakers of the covenant, while they are still leaving unfulfilled the holy ends at which it aims, is but to deceive themselves with a notion of blessing, without the corresponding reality.

COVENANT OF SALT is a proverbial expression occasionally used in Scripture for a fixed and settled arrangement. Salt being the great preservative in natural things, the antidote to corruption and decay, it is coupled with covenant to denote the perpetuity of what is promised. Thus the heave-offerings were said to be given to the family of Aaron by a covenant of salt, Num. xviii. 19; and the kingdom over Israel is, in like manner, said by Abijah to have been given to David and his sons for ever, by a covenant of salt, 2 Ch. xiii. 5—in other words, by a perpetual destination.

CRACKNELS, a kind of cakes, baked hard, and somewhat resembling the harder sorts of biscuit among us, 1 Kl. xiv. 3

CRANE (קָרָן, soos, Is. xxxviii. 14; קָרָן, sis, Je. viii. 7).

A migratory bird with a sibilant voice, is indicated by these words: our crane answers well enough to the former requisite, but not to the latter, for its voice is a loud sonorous clangour. The LXX., however, render the word in each case by χελιδών, swallow, which is more obviously migratory than the former, because much more familiarly known, and because its migrations are performed in large hosts, which assemble in the sight of man before they take their departure. Its voice, too, is a soft sibilant chattering, well expressed by the sound of the word sis.

All the species of swallow and swift, five in number, that are known in England, are common in Egypt and Palestine. As another word seems to designate the swift (see SWALLOW), we may probably understand either the chimney-swallow (Hirundo rustica), or the house-martin (H. urbica); or possibly both may be included in an indiscriminate appellation.

The former is probably partially migratory and partially permanent in Palestine. It is wholly migratory in Asia Minor, being seen only from April to October. In Abyssinia Bruce found it in winter. In Egypt it has been seen going south in autumn: while Napier, in his Reminiscences of Syria, records finding it near Esdraelon in December and January.

Jehovah contrasts the instinctive knowledge and punctuality of these and other migrating birds with the stupidity and carelessness of his covenant-people.

CREATION. A profound interest has ever attached to the subject expressed by this term, the human mind wherever raised to a true consciousness of itself being led by a kind of necessity to inquire into the nature and origin of the things around it. No ancient religion was complete without its cosmogony—a strong attestation to the fundamental character of the principle, however perverted in heathenism, which refers all things to God; and no philo sophy could avoid speculating on the same great and mysterious theme, rarely leading however to satisfactory conclusions. The sacred books of the Hebrews, the most ancient literature extant, have also their cosmogony; but while all the other speculations of antiquity on this subject are now unheeded or forgotten, except as matters of curiosity, this possesses a vitality which has survived the greatest revolutions in human thoughts and feelings, and a power which no amount of resistance has succeeded in overcoming. In former times it was attempted, but unsuccessfully, to reduce this cosmogony to the level of those of heathenism, with which it has little in common; but more recently it has been subjected to another and severer ordeal by being confronted with the accumulated facts of modern science, busied with investigating the origin and history of the earth. The result to the Bible is, as might have been expected, variously viewed, according to the qualifications and opportunities for judging, and even the prejudices of individuals. Some without much scruple abandon the Hebrew narrative as an obsolete relic of the past, bearing, as they allege, the marks of immature knowledge or limited research, a product of the Egyptian learning of Moses or some equally questionable source. Others on the contrary have their faith in it as a divine testimony greatly confirmed; while a third and perhaps larger party have, from a supposed conflict of statements, various doubts awakened within them, and they are beset with difficulties which they are unable to solve. They cannot close their eyes to the irresistible evidence of science, which seems to conflict with some of the commonly understood statements of Scripture as to the age of the earth and its primeval condition; nor stop their ears to the testimony of credible witnesses, who may be more conversant with scientific matters than themselves; and yet they are unwilling to discredit that time-honoured record on which, as regards all other and far higher interests, they can implicitly rely.

It is this aspect of matters which has at present given an unprecedented interest to all that bears on the relation of reason and revelation in those points in particular where they come more immediately into contact, and renders more than ever necessary a calm review of the chief questions in dispute. But as it is to the doubting and perplexed, who still, however, retain a firm belief in the authority and inspiration of Genesis, that the following remarks are principally submitted, all questions as to the source whence Moses derived his cosmogony, or the mode in which it was communicated to him, may be dismissed as irrelevant; and so also the attempts, either prompted by hostility to the Bible or proceeding from ignorance of its character, to resolve its opening statements into myths or poetry, as incompatible with what they profess to be, and as they are understood, in the subsequent inspired writings—a historical narration of the acts of the Almighty Creator when he called the universe and the earth into being.

Having thus greatly narrowed the very extended field of inquiry, we proceed to examine some of the more important particulars in which the narrative of the creation in Genesis comes into contact, or as many allege into collision, with the authenticated facts of geology, physiology, and the kindred sciences. For greater distinctness an arrangement is adopted, which if not the most logical, yet admits of the greatest comprehension, beginning with some preliminary observations serviceable to the main discussion.

I. Sources of Information—Reason and Revelation.—Any knowledge man may possess of the nature of creation, and the manner in which the universe or the earth was brought into its present condition and made the abode of life, must be derived solely from the communications of the Creator himself; for no human eye witnessed the operations, and no mere theory or speculation could ever attain to any certainty on the subject. The Creator has been pleased to make such communications: He has written the earth's history in indestructible character on its own rocky bosom; and although the writing had been long unheeded, it has at length attracted the notice of learned and inquiring minds. But this is not the only record of creation: there is another book in which it has also a place assigned to it by God. No inquirer after truth will do right if he neglect either the testimony of Scripture or the teaching of science; but it is of no less importance that he bear in mind the diversity of their ends, if he would arrive at the whole truth and avoid what must otherwise appear contradictions. The object of the Bible is not to teach science: its aim is moral and religious; but while it must of necessity impart such information as fully apprises man of the character of the Creator, and his own relation to him and to the creatures, it is obvious that it will be conveyed in a language immediately intelligible, and not in a form fitted only to bewilder minds untutored in the language of science. But though different in their ends, science and revelation cannot be hostile in their relation, seeing that if the one is a discovery of God through his works, the other is the discovery of God in his word. There may be, and no doubt are, misinterpretations of the language of the one record as well as of the other, giving rise to apparent contradictions, not chargeable entirely, however, to the side of the biblical expositor; for there have been as many false theories in science as there have been faulty expositions of Scripture. But even as it is, the harmony is greater than the discord; and scripture exposition has certainly been benefited by the Bible being brought for a time into a supposed antagonism with science. A reference need only be made to the great Copernican controversy which agitated men's minds in the seventeenth century, which though now only provoking a smile at the obtuseness and obstinacy of theologians, was at the time no special indication of mental weakness or bigotry, but only afforded a proof that an adjustment cannot be immediately effected between a newly-discovered truth and all previous conceptions, yet in time such an adjustment was effected without any violence to the language of Scripture, nay, rather with some advantage, inasmuch as part of its language was henceforth better understood.

It is also to be noted, that it is as little prejudicial to the character of Scripture as an inspired production, that its interpretation varies or advances with the amount of knowledge which, no doubt with other and higher requisites, the expositor at any time brings to bear upon it, as it is to the great phenomena of nature that they were long the subject of wild hypotheses, and are now only coming to be better understood—the only legitimate conclusion being that in neither case do there exist infallible interpreters. In these circumstances there need be no hesitation in admitting that there are contradictions on the subject of creation, not between the two records themselves, which cannot be, as having God for their common author, but between man's interpretations of them; but, at the same time, a most emphatic protest ought to be raised against the application of the epithet "irreconcilable" to such contradictions, as being a term unwarranted by experience, and but little consonant with the modesty of true philosophy. A man must have fully mastered all sciences, and be at the same time an infallible interpreter of God's Word, before he can venture on the use of such terms—qualifications somewhat surpassing even the attainments of those "competently informed persons of the present day," in whose minds, according to the testimony of Baden Powell, "the literal interpretation of the judaical cosmogony has died a natural death" (Unity of Worlds, p. 468).

II. The Nature of Creation as deducible from Revelation and Science.—Taking "creation" in its highest sense of the origination of the material universe, it is admitted by the highest authorities (see Herschel, Frelhm. Disc. on Nat. Phil. p. 38), to be a subject beyond the range of science; and even in its secondary meaning of the orderly arrangement of matter into the forms which it now presents, it comes only partially within its range. Geology can trace back the earth's history to a certain point, but beyond that it cannot penetrate: the first pages if ever written have been obliterated; and so the stony record maintains a complete silence as to the world's birth. Nor is the evidence afforded by astronomy in any degree more explicit. No doubt there are not wanting theories, which as matters of probability may be entitled to more or less consideration; but it ought to be distinctly remembered that they are simply theories, and not authenticated facts.

Creation in the strictest sense can be known only from revelation. It is the Bible alone that can tell of the origin of the universe and of its great efficient Cause. "Through faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God," He. xi. 3; and the testimony whereon faith relies is the declaration—"In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth," Ge. i. 1. But although science can furnish no reliable information regarding that beginning, there are other beginnings of which it clearly testifies. It does teach that all the orders of life now in existence, and many older but now extinct, had a beginning; and the same also as regards the still more ancient sidereal motions which have gone on so long and so regularly. That the universe is not eternal, is a truth fully established. So numerous and indubitable are the indications of beginnings of order and life, that this is now a demonstrated fact, no longer dependent on the subtleties of metaphysics, but on evidence patent to common sense and understanding. "The 'infinite series' of the atheists of former times can have no place in modern science: all organic existences, recent or extinct, vegetable or animal, have had their beginning; there was a time when they were not. The geologist can indicate that time, if not by years, at least by periods, and show what its relations were to the periods that went before and that came after; and as it is equally a recognized truth on both sides of the controversy, that as something now exists, something must have existed for ever, and as it must now be not less surely recognized that that something was not the race of man, nor yet any other of the many races of man's predecessors or contemporaries, the question, What then was that something? comes with a point and directness which it did not possess at any former time" (Miller, Testimony of the Rocks, p. 127, 128).

But while revelation must thus be the primary and in part the only source of information as to creation and the origin of things, it is important to keep in view what Scripture really does say upon the subject, and what it passes over in silence. Its several statements on the first of these points will come under consideration in a subsequent section; but in the meantime it will be necessary to determine how the act ascribed to the divine Being in the opening sentence of the Bible, "In the beginning God created," &c., is to be understood, whether it is to be taken as intimating the origination of matter, or merely the arrangement of matter previously existing.

The latter is the view more generally adopted, and by parties who in the motives by which they are influenced are directly opposed to one another; one class being actuated by the desire to reduce the biblical creation to the level of heathen cosmogonies; and the other, to bring it into harmony with scientific discoveries. Of the latter class again, some admit that absolute creation is a biblical doctrine, though not taught in Genesis, or deducible from the Hebrew term rendered to create; while others deny that it is taught in the Scriptures at all, but rests entirely on metaphysical grounds. But that the creation of Genesis goes beyond the mere arrangement of matter and fashioning it into worlds or systems, and includes the origination of matter by a primordial act, appears from the following considerations:—

1. By such as maintain the opposite view, it is argued that no importance can be attached to the term בָּרָא (bara), to create, inasmuch as it is synonymous, and as such frequently interchanged, with other two terms אָסָא (asa) and יָצַר (yatzar), respectively rendered to make and to fashion, but neither of which is ever taken to indicate absolute creation. But while it must be admitted that the terms are sometimes interchanged, yet there is such a marked limitation in their use as shows that the terms are not synonymous, but that the first is separate and distinct from the others. It would be out of place here to enter upon critical disquisition of Hebrew roots and etymologies in support of this proposition, and for which the reader may consult Macdonald's Creation and the Fall, Edin. 1856, p. 61-64; suffice it to remark, that so determinate is the idea expressed by the term בָּרָא , that this particular verb is exclusively confined to divine acts, unlike the others, which are used of human as well as divine operations. No doubt its usage is not limited to the primordial creation, but extends to other acts of God as well, yet only in a secondary acceptation, and in no case is there any reference to pre-existing materials, though of course except in the first creating act such is not absolutely excluded.

2. But another consideration is, that whatever may be the general usage of the term בָּרָא , the question turns not so much on the sense of the verb taken alone and apart from the context, as on the way in which it is to be viewed in such a peculiar collocation as—"In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." Granted that in itself the term does not absolutely deny or affirm the presence of pre-existing matter, and that this can be inferred only from the context or the subject treated of, the question comes to be, What can be the meaning of the term here? The expression, "in the beginning," evidently refers to the beginning of created existence, in contradistinction to the eternal being of the Creator, and is thus an absolute beginning. This then is a passage by itself and distinct from all others, and must be interpreted in accordance with the pure, absolute monotheism of the Hebrews, inculcated in no passage of Scripture more plainly than in the first sentence of Genesis. This is the distinguishing characteristic of the biblical creation, as opposed to all heathen cosmogonies and philosophical speculations, that it represents the pure and simple idea of a creation from nothing, without eternal matter and without demiurgic co-operation.

But with the exception of ascribing creation from the first act to the closing operation absolutely to God, and giving intimation of the order of the divine operations, particularly as regards the creation of man, Scripture maintains a remarkable reserve, not anticipating science or cramping human inquiry. As to the mode of the Creator's working in particular, there is an absolute silence, the record showing only that the several productions were pure efforts of the divine will, to which no resistance was offered. With this we must be satisfied; for as to anything further, true science confesses itself ignorant. And, indeed, it would be well, no less for the reputation of science than for the interests of revelation, that such consideration were always manifested as to the limits between the known and the inscrutable; and that men of learning did not impose upon themselves and others by the use of such terms as "natural development," or "creation by law," which, if not used in an atheistic sense, and if they have any meaning at all, are merely a confession of, or a pitiable attempt to conceal, ignorance on a subject with regard to which such an admission would be no reproach, as it concerns matters which must ever remain inscrutable to man. But with these speculations we have at present nothing to do, for they concern more immediately the apologist of natural religion, than the expositor of the biblical creation.

III. The Place of Creation in the Bible.—Those who would resolve the Mosaic narrative of creation into poetry and fables, or would otherwise set aside its statements, because a part merely of "a record of older and imperfect dispensations adapted to the ideas and capacities of a peculiar people and a grossly ignorant age" (Baden Powell, Unity of Worlds, p. 306), cannot have deeply, if at all, reflected on the fundamental place which the doctrines here taught hold in the Bible, or on the character for truth and consistency which must belong to the imperfect equally with the perfect dispensation, if the God of truth be the author of both. This narrative, however, occupies no such isolated and unimportant place as many would assign to it; and its very position in the front of the Bible precisely indicates the relation of the doctrine therein taught to all revealed truth; for in every sense of the term, creation is the first revelation of God.

Here, however, it is of more importance to notice the relation of the first two chapters of Genesis to one another, because they are not unfrequently represented as containing two distinct and partly contradictory narratives of creation.

The first chapter, with the first three verses of the second, forms the narrative of creation properly so called—a continuous and entire epitome of creation in all its extent, and from the period when God summoned the universe into being down to the time when, having introduced man upon the earth, he ceased from the work of creation, pronouncing it to be all very good, and solemnized and sanctified the sabbath-day, the rest of the Creator when his great work was done. The first narrative of the creation which has ever been admired for the sublimity of its style, and the felicity of its arrangement, is in one point of view complete in itself; but in respect to the purpose which secured it a place in the sacred Scriptures, it is defective. It, indeed, intimates distinctly the high place occupied by man in the creation, but more copious information was needed in order fully to explain his character and condition, and the particular constitution under which it pleased the Author of his being to place him; and hence the supplementary narrative which follows. The first then is a narrative of creation in all its parts; the second is a filling up or expansion of one of those parts, but so closely related to the first, that the reader, from the intimations therein contained, is led to anticipate such particulars, while on the other hand they are obviously required by the history which follows.

Any apparent contradictions between the first and the supplementary narrative are due entirely to the diversity of their aims, and consequently of their arrangement. In the first the order of time is strictly adhered to; but in the second this is subordinated to a grouping together of facts and statements, all of which are more or less related to man's creation and the provision, physical, moral, and social, made in his behalf.

It is necessary then to advert to the relation of the first two chapters of Genesis, inasmuch as the supplementary statements of the second are frequently too much overlooked in discussions of this kind, a circumstance which operates unfavourably on any judgment that may be formed of the character of the biblical creation, because it is thereby presented more in a physical or scientific relation, giving rise perhaps to the assumption that such information was unneeded, than in the deep moral and religious aspect which the special account of man's location on the earth confers upon it. The second narrative will also be found serviceable in the exposition of various terms and statements of the first, particularly in showing that Scripture itself requires that the days of creation be taken in a wider sense than that usually assumed.

IV. The Time of Creation.—Not more clearly are the summers and winters which have passed over the head of man indicated by the altered features and the furrowed countenance, than is the hoar antiquity of the earth by the traces which time has imprinted upon it, but here the measure is not by seasons or even centuries, but by unknown and incalculable periods. Little more is needed in this place than simply to state the proposition—its evidences are so numerous, as well in the department of astronomy as of geology, and so familiar to all who have given any attention to the subject, and at the same time so irresistible, that it may be regarded as a first principle of science. The astronomer calculates from the known velocity of light that some of the stars reflected in his space-piercing speculum, must have occupied their places in the heavens untold ages ere the light by which they are now revealed could have reached the earth. The geologist again, carrying his researches downward into the bowels of the earth, sees creations superimposed upon creations in their now rocky sepulchres in a slow ascending series; and each of which must, in their origin, progress, and decay, have occupied periods of which he will not attempt the calculation, but which nevertheless he does not hesitate to denote by myriads and similar expressions indicative of a duration well fitted to overwhelm the mind, but for the refuge afforded by the consideration that there was still an eternity beyond the first creating act of the everlasting God.

The time when creation began and during which it continued being thus seen on indisputable evidence to be so inconceivably remote and immense, the conclusion is immediately felt to clash rudely with what we have been accustomed to regard as the teaching of Scripture on the subject of creation, when the earth was conceived of as not six days older than its first human inhabitant. No wonder then that men's minds were agitated on this subject, and that they hesitated to listen to the claims of a new philosophy which called upon them summarily to abandon their cherished traditional belief. Happily a better understanding at length prevails, and even this question of time has not the formidable aspect it once possessed. With regard indeed to the date of creation, the controversy may be said to be almost settled by the admission that Scripture gives no intimation whatever upon the subject. Neither in Genesis nor in any other passage is any determined period specified as that of the first creating act; the expression, "in the beginning," with which the volume of inspiration opens, leaving it altogether undefined. It intimates only that the Creator, at some point in the flow of past duration, called into being things which previously had no existence. It expressly teaches, however, that the world is not eternal, that it had a commencement, but fixes no limit to its age. So far is Scripture from limiting the past duration of the earth, that on the contrary there are many intimations of its high antiquity. "Of old hast thou laid the foundation of the earth," Ps. cx. 25. "The Lord possessed me in the beginning of his way, before his works of old," Pr. viii. 22. And in particular Ps. xc., entitled "A prayer of Moses the man of God," seems to assign an antiquity to creation exceeded only by the eternity of the Creator. "Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting thou art God," ver. 2, where there seems also a distinction between the age of the mountains, or of the earth generally, and that of עֵלְמָלַךְ (tebel) the Habitable world.

It is the time occupied, however, in the process of creation, as indicated by science, that presents the greatest apparent contradiction to the biblical testimony. But it is of importance to premise the fact—to be afterwards more fully considered—that while geology demonstrates that creation must have been protracted through immense and immeasurable eras, it yet as unequivocally shows that its closing act, the introduction of man upon the earth, was at a comparatively recent period. This of itself goes far to harmonize the two testimonies. There are other points of accordance to be afterwards stated, but this is perhaps the most valuable. The difficulty nevertheless remains, that the narrative of Genesis assigns six days to the work, while a passage in the decalogue is even more express—"In six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is," Ex. xx. 11.

To obviate this difficulty, various schemes of reconciliation have been proposed. The theory which for a time obtained most currency was that which limited the Mosaic narrative to the existing creation, the introduction of the present orders of plants and animals, with man at their head, a process which occupied six natural days; thus taking no account of the extinct creations or the vast periods which they disclose, and for which room was found prior to that chaotic state described in ver. 2, and after the period marked as the beginning. The chaos was thus the total, or according to another modification of the theory, the partial wreck of the previous creation disclosed by geology, but of which Scripture takes no cognizance.

But of this scheme of reconciliation it is enough to remark that while in all its modifications, more particularly the latest, it offers considerable violence to the tenor of the original narrative, breaking up its continuity, and in various other respects putting a forced construction on some of its expressions, and still more to the language of the decalogue; it is also openly at variance with the testimony of the rocks. Geology shows unequivocally that between the system of organized beings to which man belongs, and the ages immediately preceding, there is no such break as that supposed. "It is a great fact, now fully established in the course of geological discovery, that between the plants which in the present time cover the earth, and the animals which inhabit it, and the animals and plants of the later extinct creations, there occurred no break or blank, but that, on the contrary, many of the existing organisms were contemporary during the morning of their being with many of the extinct ones during the evening of theirs. We know further that not a few of the shells which now live on our coast, and several of even the wild animals which continue to survive amid our tracts of hill and forest, were in existence many ages ere the human age began" (Müller, Testimony of the Rocks, p. 121). Indeed, the whole evidence of geology is against this scheme (see the article CHAOS). In these circumstances it is unhesitatingly abandoned by all who have given careful attention to the subject, for some other more adequate to the necessities of the case; and that we take to be the assumption that the days of creation are not simple, natural days, but that they symbolically represent undetermined periods.

It is not a little favourable to this view to find that it was in some degree entertained long before the difficulties of geology were felt, and its exigencies and demands on time could possibly bias the judgment of the biblical expositor. As early as the time of the fathers this view extensively prevailed; as may be seen in the writings of Basil the Great, Gregory of Nyssa, Augustine, Ambrose, and others. Augustine's words are: "Qui dies cujusmodi sint, aut perdifficile nobis aut etiam impossibile est cogitare, quanto magis dicere" (De Civ. Dei, xi. 6); while Ambrose considers the way in which the first, or rather the one day, as he remarks, is spoken of, as "prophetici prerogativa sermonis" (Hexameron, ii. 1, 1). These notions, whether well or ill founded, must certainly have originated in considerations connected with the narrative itself; and they are at least not open to the objections which, with some show of reason, may be brought against the modern expositor, of having his exegesis influenced by extraneous forces—objections however invalid in themselves yet exciting prejudice, and which it is well to have removed in this satisfactory way.

The scriptural evidence for warranting the extension of the days of creation beyond the limit of ordinary or natural days, and for taking them in a figurative or symbolical sense, may be stated thus:—

1. The term day is frequently used figuratively, perhaps in all languages, and symbolically in the Bible, to denote a much larger measure of time. Examples of its figurative use in the Mosaic writings are: "The Lord shall cover him all the day long," De. xxiii. 12; and, "As thy days so shall thy strength be," ver. 25. Other instances of this usage are the expressions, "the day of Jehovah," Is. ii. 12, the appointed time for the manifestation of his power; and, "the day of salvation," 2 Co. vi. 2. Of course the mention of evening and morning falls in quite naturally with this interpretation, and is nowise opposed to it, as sometimes erroneously deemed. For an example of this figurative application of the terms see Ge. xlix. 27. Examples of the symbolical use of the word day, by which it is made the representative of a higher period, are also frequent in the prophetic writings, particularly those of Daniel; on the principle no doubt that for the time being, divine Wisdom saw it meet not to determine more definitely the periods thus indicated—a principle applicable it might be shown to the revelation of past time no less than future, especially in such a case as the present.

But without determining whether the days are to be understood in a figurative or symbolic sense, for either supposition sufficiently answers the requirements of the case, it may be remarked that in the narrative of the creation itself, and within the compass of a single verse, the word day is used in two senses: the period during which light prevails, and the periods of creation, whatever these may be; while it is further to be observed that not until the adjustment of the celestial luminaries on the fourth, did there exist measures of time, and accordingly there was nothing to indicate the duration of the first three days in the ordinary acceptation of the term. Of the duration of these earlier days at least nothing is or could be determined; the only thing noticed is the order of succession, as each day followed the other, but separated by an evening, denoting probably an intermission of creating energies; and during which it may be supposed there occurred the gradual extinctions of the first created forms. Indeed it is enough to remark that those were God's days, measured only by him with whom "a thousand years are but as yesterday when it is past, and as a watch in the night," Ps. xc. 4.

2. But not only does it appear from the general usage of Scripture, and from considerations connected with this narrative itself, that the days of creation need not necessarily be limited to days of twenty-four hours, there are other considerations proving that they must be taken in an extended sense. The first that deserves notice is the work assigned to the third day, consisting of two distinct acts: gathering together the waters, so as to lay bare a portion of the earth's surface; and then clothing this dry land with vegetation. Excluding entirely for the present all ideas of second causes, through which it may be conceived were produced the inequalities on the earth's surface to which the relative distribution of land and water is due, and supposing it the result altogether of a miraculous agency, there must, on the supposition that it was a sudden act, or one limited to twelve or even many times twenty-four hours, be such an accumulation of miracles involving such a suspension of all the previous laws of nature as is utterly perplexing to the mind. There must have been the application of forces not only sufficient to elevate the great mountain masses, and then suddenly to restore the equilibrium of the immense body of water so violently put in motion, there must also have been a supernatural process to dry the soil for the reception of vegetable life. These results may be conceivable as the effects of Omnipotence, but the processes are not easily reconciled with the analogy of the divine working as indicated in Scripture, nor even with the spirit of this very narrative, which although it does not specify, yet certainly does not exclude the application of second causes, as appears from the inspired commentary of the writer of Psalm civ., where distinct reference is made, ver. 8, to the convulsions and upheavals through which a separation was effected between the land and water.

The difficulty now stated is not of recent origin, nor owing to any conflict between geology and the biblical creation: it was felt by the older expositors; and even by the rabbinical writers, who in order to enlarge the time of those stupendous operations, referred, by some forced philological rule, their commencement to the second day (see Grotius, Critic. Sacri), but without any advantage really resulting from such an infinitesimal addition of time.

Another circumstance of the same character as to its demands on time, is the exercise assigned to Adam of bestowing names upon the animal creation, and which must have been begun and finished on the sixth day, or more strictly in the interval which elapsed between his own creation, which had been preceded on the same day by that of the animals, and the creation of Eve, which was also comprised in the work of the sixth day. This is even a stronger case than the preceding, inasmuch as it cannot be disposed of by a reference to the miraculous. God can effect his works instantaneously, but man requires time for his exercises and operations; so that whatever may be assumed as to the capacities and intuitional apprehensions of unfallen man, of the exercise to which he was here called, however limited may have been its extent as regards the number of species to be reviewed and named, or whatever may have been its intended purpose, it is difficult to conceive how it could be completed within the space of a few hours, which is all that can be assumed if the sixth day on which all those events occurred was simply a natural day.

If there are thus in the narrative itself circumstances demanding an extension of the days beyond the usual acceptation, is there anything to indicate them as in any way peculiar, and the full force of which could be seen only when in due time their meaning came to be thus apprehended? Besides the peculiarity already adverted to, of days before the existence of that arrangement by which days are now alone constituted, there are special characteristics attached to the first and seventh days, the initial and concluding terms of the series. The day which witnessed the beginning of creation is designated by the cardinal one, and not by the ordinal first: "It was evening, it was morning, one day." This peculiarity, so unusual in the language, arrested the attention of Josephus (Antiq. i. 1. 1), Philo (De Opif. Mundi, sect. 9), and several of the Christian fathers, and has been variously explained. It will be found however, from a careful examination of the use of this Hebrew numeral, that the only admissible conclusion is, that it must be here taken in its not unusual sense of designating by way of pre-eminence something rare or remarkable, see Eze. vii. 8; Ca. vi. 9; Da. viii. 3; and so intended to indicate that the evening and the morning spoken of belonged not to an ordinary, but to a peculiar day; in fact, to a period of indefinite duration. This conclusion is not a little strengthened by the recurrence of the same remarkable expression "one day" in one other passage of Scripture, and in a connection which leaves no doubt that it is the designation of a period—the millennium, as some suppose, Zec. xiv. 7, "There shall be one day (it is known to Jehovah) when it shall not be day and night; for at the evening time there shall be light." The day here announced is altogether peculiar: the only one of its kind which shall dawn upon humanity: its peculiarity will consist in the absence of the usual alternations of day and night, of course in a moral sense. Now if prophecy which scans the far distant future has a day peculiarly its own, is there anything incredible in the supposition that creation may have also its peculiar day, seeing that its days nearly all terminated long ere man existed or his history began, and must accordingly in this instance, no less than in the other, be a day "known to Jehovah," and by implication to him alone! History unquestionably is not to be interpreted as prophecy, for the language and symbolism in the two cases are distinct, but God's own record of his creating processes differs from all other history, and if in its character it may differ so also in its chronology. This distinction effectually disposes of an inconsistency sometimes charged upon the Scripture interpreter of dropping this peculiar use of the word day at the close of the narrative of creation, and not carrying it forward into his exposition of the subsequent history, which it ought to be seen was written upon different principles, as the events it records occurred under widely different conditions.

But still more noticeable is the manner in which the seventh day is described in the history of the creation. If anywhere in Scripture there is intimation that the days of creation exceeded in duration man's brief days, there is certainly such in the passage which describes the sabbatic rest of the Creator when his great work was finished, Ge. ii. 2.3. From the references elsewhere in Scripture to this rest as the great end of the creation and the consummation of the creature's happiness in and with God—"Requies Dei requiem significat eorum qui requiescunt in Deo," as Augustine (De Civ. Dei, xi. 8) remarked long ago—sufficient light is thrown upon its nature and consequent duration to prevent us conceiving of it as commensurate with man's present short and troubled sabbath. The latter is but a faint and inadequate type of the rest that remaineth for the people of God, He. iv. 9, and into which the Creator himself entered when he ceased from adding to the mere material creation, in order to carry on the moral and spiritual government of the world, a proper subject being found in man, created in God's own image, and the restoration of whom from the ruins of the fall, is in reality "a new creation," 2 Co. v. 17, raising man to a higher platform of life than that on which the first or material creation placed him.

It fully accords with this view to find that with respect to the seventh-day the invariable formula in the other cases, "It was evening, it was morning," is here wanting. It could not be employed, because God's sabbath extends over the whole present order of things, and has not yet come to a close. God rested from the work of creation: and neither reason nor revelation gives any hint that that work has ever been resumed.

Now, if such be God's sabbath-day, the seventh, or close of the creating week, analogy, and every principle of sound interpretation, require that the week itself, and the days of which it was composed, be thus indefinitely extended, and regarded as God's week and working days, and in no sense commensurate with those of man. Man's days are only a derivation and symbol of those archetypal days; the only thing which bears any comparison with them is the day, or course of Christ's working upon the earth, of which he himself said, "I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day: the night cometh when no man can work," Jn. ix. 4.

There is no weight whatever in the objection that this view makes void the law of the sabbath, for "it is not the absolute length of the days of creation, but their number and order that constitutes the essential character of the narrative in its relation to the institution of the sabbath." In the two cases the proportion is alike, but in the one it is, as was suitable to the subject of the law, upon a very minute scale. While it was chiefly man, as is plain from the sabbatic institution, irrespective of other considerations, that those consecutive but long prospective operations regarded, it is no less an evidence of wisdom and goodness, that when they were revealed so as to constitute a foundation for the sabbath, God chose for denoting them that division of time which most readily presents itself to the human apprehension, instead of perplexing the mind with the actual notation of ages upon ages which a more advanced state of knowledge would discover and also more fully comprehend. (See on this, Miller's Footprints of the Creator, ed. 1849, p. 306.)

V. The Order of Creation.—The deductions of science touching the order in which the course of creation proceeded are in remarkable harmony with the statements of Scripture.

1. The first point worthy of notice is that the Mosaic narrative intimates that "the heavens and the earth," which is the common Hebrew designation of the material universe, had a contemporaneous origin; they are not merely the effects of a common cause, but are in fact of one and the same act. Other passages of Scripture observe the same connection, and the same relation of time, see Pa. cii. 23. Indeed, it is one of the great objects of Scripture to teach the close relationship between all the parts of creation as the productions of the same divine Mind. All the orbs of space, whether seen by the eye or disclosed only by the telescope, were created simultaneously with our own planet. The work assigned to the fourth day in no way conflicts with this statement, as will be shown below. The relation thus declared by revelation is fully corroborated by the testimony of science, which distinctly shows that such is the connection of the parts, that if not created at the same time they must at least have had contemporaneously impressed upon them their present form and motions.

2. The next stage in which the work of creation is presented exhibits the "earth"—for it is with it only that the narrative has chiefly to do—as "without form and void," entirely desolate and destitute of inhabitants, shrouded in the primeval darkness, and wrapped up in a universal ocean. There was no life, vegetable or animal; even the first conditions of life were wanting. Light was the next product of creative Omnipotence; and to this succeeded the atmospheric arrangement, the formation of the "firmament," or rather, according to the Hebrew—the former term involving a fiction of the Greek philosophy—the expanse, the canopy of sky overhead, and which supports the clouds or "the waters above the heavens." (See FIRMAMENT.) Here, however, must be noticed the distinction made in Hebrew between light in itself, and the bodies into which it is collected or from which it is emitted—the terms being distinct; thus intimating, when viewed in connection with the notice of the creation of light on the first day, and its concentration into the heavenly orbs not until the fourth, the fact, only recently recognized by science, that there is no necessary connection between light and those luminaries. This, if known to the objectors, should certainly silence that shallow criticism and philosophy which finds a notable instance of ignorance of the laws of nature displayed by this narrative when it makes vegetation to precede the sun. The planetary bodies created and endued with motion round their own centres, and in an orbital path, were no doubt, like the earth itself, undergoing preparation for their appointed services, although of this the narrative takes no notice, save only that on the fourth day the light, perhaps previously diffused through space, was collected into those central orbs, around which their dependent systems had from the first revolved, although now in a new relation.

In all these particulars, the testimony of science is exceedingly distinct, and in complete harmony with the statements of Scripture. It tells that light is not merely the first condition of life, but also of inorganic form. In the process of crystallization its power is particularly marked, and in all the molecular arrangements of the mineral masses which so largely constitute the very framework of the earth—its rocks and mountains. Indeed, it may be said, the absence of this universal agent would restore again the old chaotic state of things. How strikingly harmonious with the deductions of science, to find that in the Bible the first place is assigned to its creation! The same may be said also with respect to the atmospheric arrangements which succeeded the creation of light. Without the existence of the atmosphere, so wisely tempered for the support of life, and so adapted for its other important offices in the economy of nature, there could be no life even in the lowest form, and no enjoyment: no sound even could issue from the wide wastes of earth, and no light could be diffused over its surface. Therefore was it created next in order to light; and therefore its place so precise and appropriate in the Mosaic narrative of the creation.

3. But the course of creation proceeds. The arrangement of the earth's surface was the next thing effected. The universal ocean was on the third day brought within limits, and the dry land made to emerge from its previous watery covering. How this was effected Scripture does not say; but here it is that the domain of science first properly begins. At this stage of the creating processes commenced the action of those mighty and long-continued forces, the evidences of which are seen everywhere in the dislocated crust of the earth, and which caused the dry land to appear; first probably in the form of rocky islets gradually raising their heads above the surrounding water, growing in extent, and becoming more and more connected, until what was at first groups of rocky points attained the character of continents. There may not be sufficient evidence to connect the primary formation of the geologist with the first dry land, for at these great depths of creation the light is still very obscure; but according to the Scripture narrative, no sooner is the dry land snatched from the deep than it is clothed with vegetation—the first and lowest form of life. The work of the fourth day was that arrangement of the heavenly bodies which constituted them luminaries—not their creation or motions—for that was the work of the beginning, or at least of the first day.

This was followed by the creative mandate of the fifth day, which replenished the waters with its various forms of animal life, and the air also with its winged tenants; but as the priority of vegetable life and its separation from the animal creation by the intervention of a whole day or period are points on which geology, it may be thought, pronounces a contrary judgment, some further remarks must be made upon the subject.

Till very recently geologists were unable to find traces of a primeval vegetation of so old a date as the animal remains of a low type of life certainly, which occurred extensively in the lower strata. Now, however, the further progress of the science furnishes evidence of vegetable life as early as any animal existence. "So far as yet known plants and animals appear together" (Miller, Testimony of the Rocks, p. 17). Without attaching any weight to the position thus latterly assigned to the plant, or to the probability to which it gives rise, that further discovery may detect a vegetable creation long prior to animal life, it will be enough if the absence of vegetable remains from the lower strata can be shown not to be inconsistent with the existence of a flora on the earth; and if, on the other hand, it can from independent testimony be shown that the place of the plant in the creation must have been such as is announced in Genesis. As to the first of these points, let it be observed that as the stratified rocks were formed at the bottom of the ocean, and often at great depths, terrestrial plants can be expected to occur only rarely; while the rarity of marine plants is accounted for by the fact that they are mostly natant, or confined to rocky shores; while further, the cellular structure of the earlier plants was very unfavourable to their preservation, the contrary being the case with the early forms of animal life. As to the other point, this general consideration need only be urged, that vegetation is the ultimate support of animal life, and therefore must have preceded it. (See Professor Dana, Science and the Bible, Biblioth. Sac. Jan. 1866, p. 117.)

4. But if, on the question now considered, science refuses to pronounce a judgment, her utterances are full and explicit regarding the succession of the subsequent creating acts. Animal life began in the waters. The work of the fifth day perfected that of the second, which consisted in the partial adjustment of the waters by the superimposed atmosphere; and as these two elements were, through the intervening arrangements, prepared for the reception of life, they are duly peopled with their respective tenants—the waters with "the moving creature that hath life"—the rapidly multiplying or swarming creatures, as they are characteristically termed in the Hebrew, and the air with the "winged creatures," or birds.

It was not until the next day of creation, however, that the dry land was peopled with animals properly its own—the mammiferous quadrupeds: a far higher form of life than anything that preceded. This day too witnessed the introduction of man—a being differing entirely from all the preceding creations, and divinely constituted their sovereign.

As regards the particulars now stated, the order of Genesis is strictly the order of geology; here there is no uncertain or discordant note. There is not only a harmony in the general testimony that the successive changes through which the earth has passed have been improvements in its condition and capabilities as a habitable world, but also in the specific evidence as to the order in which its various inhabitants have been introduced. According to the testimony of science, no less than of Scripture, the fish preceded the reptile and the bird, and these again preceded the mammiferous quadruped, while it again preceded man (Miller, Footprints of the Creator, p. 233). The two records in fact here run parallel; there is no conflict, not even an apparent contradiction. Excepting the question of time there is no appearance of contradiction from the first announcement of the Creator's work down to the close; when everything was found to be very good; and if this question can be settled in a way which shall accord with the facts of science, and without violence to the language of revelation, the accordance will be such as must satisfy every mind that the information communicated in the first chapter of Genesis is not the result of man's reasonings or imaginings, but must have come directly from God. Still more marked is the harmony of the two records with respect to man's creation—his place in the course as well as in the economy of nature, the only point which remains to be considered.

VI. Man's Place in Creation.—The manner in which the account of man's creation is introduced, and the space which it occupies in the record, bespeak for him at once a place peculiar and apart from all preceding creatures. The distinguishing dignity bestowed on man by his creation in the image of God, with his consequent relation to the Creator and Ruler of the world, raise questions of the highest possible concern, but as these more properly belong to another department, it is only in its physical aspect that the subject falls to be considered here.

1. Man the End of Creation.—As reason and revelation unite in testifying that creative energy upon the earth proceeded on the principle of progress, so also they unite in the affirmation that it was consummated in man. This progression is seen to have been divinely predetermined, and man's place in it is the termination of a process which had been going on since the dawn of creation (M'Cosh, Typical Forms, p. 666), the very first organization being as it were a prophecy of the last. In remarkable accordance with this analogy presented in nature is the language of the psalmist: "I will praise thee; for I am fearfully and wonderfully made: marvellous are thy works; and that my soul knoweth right well. My substance was not hid from thee, when I was made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth. Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being imperfect; and in thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them." Man is the perfection and summary of all preceding organization. Beyond this, according to the divine predetermination, creation cannot reach; no succeeding dynasty on the earth can supersede the human race.

2. Man's Creation limited to a Single Pair.—Where or in what numbers the various species preceding the creation of man, whether vegetable or animal, were introduced, Scripture affirms nothing. If in these cases science can show that there were various centres of creation, the fact may be readily accepted as one to which revelation offers not the slightest opposition. It is quite different, however, with the theories which would deny a common origin to the human race, for upon this point the language of Scripture is explicit. The account of man's creation in Genesis, with the derivation of the whole human race, however widely diversified, from one ancestral pair, is a truth repeatedly reaffirmed in the Old and New Testaments, and indeed constitutes one of the first principles of Christianity, being, if not the very foundation, yet an essential element of the doctrine of the atonement, De xxiii. 8; Mat. xii. 4; Ac. xvii. 26; Ro. v. 14, 19.

No doubt numerous appearances in natural history are strongly opposed to the doctrine of the unity of the human species, and several distinguished writers have boldly challenged its correctness. But with every disposition on the part of some of the opponents to strain to the utmost every fact and phenomenon in natural and civil history which in any way favour their own conclusions, the falsity of the doctrine has never been established. The common origin of mankind has been questioned, but not disproved. And until such is the case, no valid objection can lie against the biblical statement on the subject. Indeed, it may be added that the probabilities against such a conclusion are increasing with the advance of science, and that the difficulties which at one time threatened to be insuperable are being gradually lessened, and the problem is thus so far simplified that the unity of mankind can now scarcely be maintained to involve an improbability. In this, as in other respects, the conclusion is evidently tending to the establishment of the principle, that "common ideas underlie the whole system of the universe, declaring a unity of nature parallel with the unity of the infinite Author." (See Dana, Thoughts on Species, Biblioth. Sac. Oct. 1857, p. 855.)

It may indeed be difficult to show how the many and marked differences which characterize different families of mankind could have arisen, and how they have become so intensely fixed as they prove to be; yet it will be more difficult to explain the close affinities, physical, intellectual, and moral, which link together all the tribes of mankind, if a common origin be denied to them. "If in the case of man," asks Baden Powell, "they have occurred as transitional varieties, how comes it that they have become so inveterately permanent? And if those changes have all occurred within the lapse of a few thousand years of the received chronology, it cannot with any reason be denied that similar changes might occur among inferior animals, and become just as permanent. And if so, changes to an indefinitely greater extent might occur in indefinite lapse of time. If these changes take place by the gradual operation of natural causes, it would be preposterous to deny the possibility of equal or greater changes by equally natural causes, in other species, in equal or greater periods of time. The advocates of the fixity of species would argue that the single spot on a butterfly's wing, which constitutes a species, never has changed, and never can change without a miracle; and yet the vast differences between a European and a Negro or Australian are mere modifications of one parent stock by natural causes in the lapse of a few thousand years!"

This reasoning is not so triumphant as its author seems obviously to entertain. It reduces the controversy entirely to a question of natural history; takes no account whatever of moral considerations, or the disparity between man and all the lower animals, giving rise in the one case to causes different, not only in degree but in kind, from those which could possibly operate in the other. It is admitted by naturalists (Pickering, Races of Man, Lond. ed. p. 220), that the diversity of races has greatly contributed to the dispersion of man over the earth, and designed, as Scripture testifies he was, for this universal diffusion, Ge. i. 28, he was also, no doubt, fitted for inhabiting all climes and countries, a wide and diversified range of existence. So that thus, even physically viewed, man differs from all other creatures; the nearest approach to him in this respect being his constant and faithful attendant the dog, which is as noted for its varieties as man himself. The question is, however, of too wide a compass to be adequately discussed here.

But admitting that natural causes, however long they may have operated, cannot adequately explain the present appearances, there is no alternative, if we exclude the development theory that men grew up in more or less favoured circumstances from the next lower animals, but to admit supernatural causes, or, in other words, direct divine interpositions. The opponents of specific unity refer the diversities to distinct acts of creation. But is this necessary; or is it philosophical to call in the aid of a greater cause, when it cannot be proved that a less may not suffice? If recourse must be had to supernatural causes, which we are far indeed from denying, it is more reasonable to conclude that the Creator originally implanted certain predispositions to be manifested in the progress of the race, or that he introduced at a subsequent period changes to facilitate the dispersion of the nations, than that by distinct acts of creation he constituted the varieties. A very strong presumption in favour of this supposition is the gradual transition through which the several varieties of the human race are abated off from one another, preventing the naturalist from arriving at any definite conclusions regarding their number. Looking at the extreme types only, it may occasion considerable doubt whether any of these could originate from one another. Further observation, however, shows that between these extremes, whether of hue or anatomical structure, there are means whence the transitions proceed by insensible gradations. This leads to the conclusion either that the races of man must be indefinitely multiplied or that they were originally one. "There is, I conceive," says Dr. Pickering, "no middle ground between the admission of eleven distinct species in the human family and the reduction to one" (Races of Man, p. 315).

3. Man introduced into a World already the Scene of Death.—No intimation of geology is supported by better evidence than that which declares that death had been in active operation on the earth long before the creation of man; that whole creations had lived and died; that then as now, birth, growth, and dissolution succeeded one another in a continued round; and that, as at present, one part of creation warred with and preyed upon another. In the whole past record of life on the earth there is no indication of a time when death's ravages were unknown, whether operating by natural decay, or by violent convulsions and catastrophes of nature. Physiology, moreover, pronounces this to be a universal and necessary law of organized life, and a wise and benevolent provision in such a world as ours.

These conclusions have greatly disturbed the minds of many who fancy they find in them a discrepancy with the sacred record, which connects death with the apostasy of man. Such, however, have really no ground for alarm, for there is no discrepancy whatever between science and Scripture on this subject. The Bible certainly and most distinctly teaches that the death which man experiences came upon him because of his transgression, Ro. v. 12; 1 Co. xv. 21; but nowhere does it give the least intimation that the death of the inferior animals is connected with that event, its language being, in every instance where it refers to death, limited entirely to man. As regards its power over the inferior creatures Scripture gives no express testimony, yet its existence may be considered as tacitly assumed in the history of creation.

But although, as already remarked, death is in the present state of being a necessary law of all organized life, whether it be viewed in connection with the law of assimilation, the process by which plants and animals separate their appropriate food from all other particles of matter, on which depends their growth and also their decay, or with the law of the propagation of the respective races, this furnishes no argument against the immortality which, on the testimony of Scripture, would have been bestowed on man had he obeyed the law of his Creator. How this could have been, it would be presumptuous to dogmatize; and yet, to the believer, it need not occasion any serious difficulty. There might have been some provision in man's original constitution fitted to counteract all tendency to decay; while doubtless there would be some divine interposition by which from time to time the successive generations would be removed without tasting death to other scenes of existences. Something confirmatory of or analogous to this has been already presented in the history of mankind in the translations of Enoch and Elijah, and examples on a far larger scale are predicted for the future at the conclusion of the present dispensation, 1 Co. xv. 51, 52.

4. Man's Creation a recent Event.—Geology shows that man's creation is not only the last term of the creative series, but also that it is a very recent event as compared with the great periods which preceded and the creations to which they gave birth. Among all the facts of geology there appears to be none better established than this. To adduce only the testimony of Lyell—"I need not dwell on the proofs of the low antiquity of our species, for it is not controverted by any experienced geologist; indeed, the real difficulty consists in tracing back the signs of man's existence on the earth to that comparatively modern period when species, now his contemporaries, began greatly to predominate. If there be a difference of opinion respecting the occurrence in certain deposits of the remains of man and his works, it is always in reference to strata confessedly of the most modern order; and it is never pretended that our race co-existed with assemblages of animals and plants, of which all, or even a large proportion of the species, are extinct" (Principles of Geology, 6th ed. p. 177, 179).

This might have sufficed regarding the point, but for the attempts to get rid of this testimony because of its negative character. Thus Baden Powell—"The prevalent belief in the very recent origin of man, geologically speaking, depends wholly on negative evidence. And there seems no reason, from any good analogy, why human remains might not be found in deposits corresponding to periods immensely more remote than commonly supposed, when the earth was in all respects equally well suited for human habitation. And if such remains were to occur, it is equally accordant with all analogy to expect that they might be those of an extinct and lower species. The only real distinction in the history of creation which marks a supposed 'human epoch,' is not the first introduction of the animal man in however high a state of organization, but the endowment of that animal with the gift of a moral and spiritual nature. It is a perfectly conceivable idea that a lower species of the human race might have existed destitute of this endowment" (Unity of Worlds, p. 464, 465).

On this strange and utterly unphilosophical statement one or two remarks must be offered. First, the complaint as to the evidence being only negative is certainly very unreasonable, seeing it is the only evidence possible or even conceivable in the case. The assertion is that man did not exist on the earth contemporaneously with many extinct creations, and the proof is that not a single trace of his remains is discovered in connection with theirs. It is the upholder of the contrary position that is bound to produce the positive proof in the form of some human fossil of an earlier age. Again, the fiction of a non-spiritual man is unworthy of serious consideration—it is a positive contradiction; for how are we to conceive of a creature, whatever may be its form or organization, to be a member of the human race, if destitute of a moral nature, the first essential of man? The idea is utterly ridiculous. It has been well asked—"Suppose for a moment that the fossil remains of such a being were to be found, how are we to recognize it? what are the peculiarities of the skeleton of an animal man?" (A. Thomson, Edin. N. Philoa. Jour. April, 1856). But it is unnecessary to pursue this matter further. "It may be safely stated that that ancient record in which man is represented as the last-born of creation is opposed by no geologic fact; and that if, according to Chalmers, 'the Mosaic writings do not fix the antiquity of the globe,' they at least do fix—making allowance of course for the varying estimates of the chronologist—the antiquity of the human species" (Miller, Testimony of the Rocks, p. 106).

In conclusion, if it cannot yet be affirmed that all discrepancies have been removed in the testimonies of the two records, the expectation is not unfounded of a complete reconciliation as the result of further study of the great questions raised. The path on which the interpreter of Scripture has entered appears to be the right one, and although his progress may be slow, and he may have sometimes to retrace steps inadvertently taken, the difficulties and contradictions now encountered will, in the end, prove a positive gain to the interpretation, and a proof of the credibility of the Bible. Even already its opening narrative is placed in such a light as may be said to demonstrate its divine origin. There is so much that modern science has for the first time disclosed regarding the earth's history, that the idea of Moses or any other man previous to this nineteenth century being the author of the biblical record is altogether incomprehensible. Indeed, the very statements regarding the order of creation, which at first provoked the greatest opposition, because opposed to the usual and untaught conceptions of mankind, now actually prove some of its strongest confirmations, showing, in the clearest possible light, that none could have given such a history of the earth, and its successive revolutions, but its Creator and Upholder. [D. M.]

CREEPING THING. This phrase is used in holy Scripture to designate not only reptiles, properly so called, but insects, worms, and even the smaller mammalia.

[P. H. G.]

CRESCENS (Gr. Κρησκης), one of Paul's companions in his bonds and, as is generally supposed, a fellow-labourer in the gospel. He is mentioned only once, in 2 Tim. iv. 10, and is spoken of as having departed into Galatia. Various traditions have been handed down respecting him, according to one of which he belonged to the seventy disciples of Christ; but they are of no authority.

CRETE, now Candia, a large island in the Ægean section of the Mediterranean, off the Peloponnesus. The length of the island is given by Pliny at 270 Roman miles, but this is much too large; it is only about 158 miles English. It is comparatively narrow in breadth, varying from 8 to 38 English miles. It is broadest in the middle. The island is very mountainous, having a continuous mass of high land stretching along the entire length, intersected by many deep and fertile valleys. Near the middle the mountain peaks rise to the height of 7674 feet, several of which belong to the famous Mount Ida. The greater part of these mountains are clothed with forests of olive, chestnut, walnut, and pine trees, oaks and cypresses. They contain a number of remarkable caverns and grottos, including the famous Labyrinth of antiquity, an extensive and intricate natural excavation at the foot of Mount Ida. It was in Crete that the scene was laid of many fabrications in Grecian mythology; in particular, it was fabled to be the birthplace, as well as to possess the tomb, of the "father of gods and men," and in connection with king Minos gave rise to a whole series of legends respecting the upper and nether worlds. In civil matters Crete was like a world by itself; it stood aloof from the states of Greece in their great wars and conflicts; but being itself divided into several independent states, each with their little capital and senate, these often carried on war with one another. When assailed from without, however, the common patriotism rallied the people together, and all united in defence of their mother-country. This expression itself—μητρὶς, mother-country—was a Cretan word. In the course of time it fell with all the other states and islands in that part of the world under the sway of Rome, and together with Cyrene formed a Roman province. This took place upwards of half a century before the Christian era; and from the time of Augustus it was a senatorial province, governed by a proconsul.

The Cretans had a name in ancient times for being good sailors, for which their insular situation furnished them with peculiar advantages; also for their skill in archery, and expertness in ambushing. Hence they were frequently engaged as light-armed troops in the employ of other states. Their moral character, however, does not appear to have ever stood high; and the testimony of a native Cretan, as quoted by the apostle Paul, Tit. i. 12, places them very low in the scale of intelligence and probity: "The Cretans are always liars, evil beasts (vile brutes), slow bellies"—that is, lying, grovelling, lazy gormandizers. This was written in the sixth century before Christ by Epimenides, a native of Gnosus (now Knosoli) in Crete; but the first part of the quotation, Κρητες δει ψευδοται, being also found in Callimachus the Cyrenean, the entire passage was sometimes attributed by mistake to him. The first part of the description, indeed, was so frequently applied to the Cretans, that Κρητις, to act the Cretan, was regarded as a sort of synonym to ψευδοθαι, to play the liar. The classics abound with allusions to this characteristic; as Ovid, when wishing to gain credit for what he asserts, says that even Crete, though noted for its lying (quamvis sit mendax), could not deny it (De A. Am. i. 227), or again, when referring to Cretan witnesses, he throws in the sarcastic remark, that Cretans do not always lie (tit. 19); and Lucan deems it enough to stamp the untrustworthiness of Egypt, to say that she is as mendacious as Crete (viii. 872). Plato distinguishes between Lacedæmon and Crete, by describing the one as cultivating brevity of speech, βραχυλογίαν, and the other, not so much multiplicity of words, as multiplicity of thoughts, πολυλογία μᾶλλον ἢ πολυλογία (Leg. i. p. 780), a facility in suiting the thought to the occasion. Heathen authors have dwelt less upon the other tendencies of the Cretans referred to by the apostle, and we may hence naturally infer that they did not form quite so marked and general a characteristic. That they prevailed to a very considerable extent, there can be no doubt; as the apostle himself had good opportunities for judging. It is clear that he personally laboured for a time on the island, as he speaks of having left Titus there, not to commence a new work, but to carry forward what the apostle had begun, and complete the organization of the Christian churches, Tit. i. 6. He did not despair of the gospel even on so corrupt a soil; but charged it the more earnestly on believers, that the very prevalence of corruption should have the effect of making them the more watchful of their behaviour and exemplary in their conduct.

Mention is made of Crete in the narrative of St. Paul's voyage and shipwreck. Contrary winds preventing the voyagers from continuing their direct course on the north side of the island, they sailed southward, rounding Cape Salmons, the eastern promontory of Crete, and took shelter in the Fair Havens, near Cape Matala. Afterwards, in endeavouring to make for Phœnice (now Port Lutro), a more secure and commodious harbour farther west, they were driven off the coast by a violent storm, and passing under the small island of Claudia were carried to Malta. (See Smith's Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul.)

CRISPUS, a ruler in the Jewish synagogue at Corinth, and one of those who were converted to the faith of Christ by the ministry of Paul, Ac. xviii. 8; 1 Co. i. 14. As he and his household had been baptized by the apostle, we may suppose they were among the earlier converts.

CROSS, CRUCIFY. The Greek word for cross, σταυρός, properly signified a stake, an upright pole, or piece of paling, on which anything might be hung, or which might be used in impaling a piece of ground. But a modification was introduced as the dominion and usages of Rome extended themselves through Greek-speaking countries. Even amongst the Romans the crux (from which our cross is derived) appears to have been originally an upright pole, and this always remained the more prominent part. But from the time that it began to be used as an instrument of punishment, a transverse piece of wood was commonly added: not, however, always even then. For it would seem that there were more kinds of death than one by the cross; this being sometimes accomplished by transfixing the criminal with a pole, which was run through his back and spine, and came out at his mouth (adactum per medium hominem, qui per os emergat, stipitem, Seneca, Ep. xiv.) In another place (Consol. ad Marcianum, xx.), Seneca mentions three different forms: "I see," says he, "three crosses, not indeed of one sort, but fashioned in different ways; one sort suspending by the head persons bent toward the earth, others transfixing them through their secret parts, others extending their arms on a patibulum." There can be no doubt, however, that the latter sort was the more common, and that about the period of the gospel age crucifixion was usually accomplished by suspending the criminal on a cross piece of wood.

But this does not of itself determine the precise form of the cross; for crosses of three different shapes were known to have been in use. One, and that probably the most ancient, was in the form of the letter T, which as commonly written consisted simply of a perpendicular line with another laid across the top, making two right angles, T. In the earlier Christian writers this letter is often referred to as a symbol of the cross, and, on account of such a resemblance, Lucian, in his usual style, prefers a charge against the letter (Jodic. Voc. xii.) The letter X represents another sort, which has received the name of St. Andrew, from a tradition that on a cross of this description the apostle of that name suffered martyrdom. But the commonest form, it is understood, was that in which the upright piece of wood was crossed by another near the top, but not precisely at it, the upright pole running above the other, thus \perp —and so making four, not merely two right angles. It was on a cross of this form, according to the general voice of tradition, that our Lord suffered; but there is nothing in the narratives of the evangelists which determines this to have been the form employed, rather than either of the other two. It is, however, the one most commonly met with in the paintings and sculptures that have survived from the earlier ages.

Punishment by the cross was confined to slaves or to malefactors of the worst class (Hor. Sat. 1. 3, 82; Jur. vi. 219). When a person was condemned to this punishment he was usually stripped and scourged (Livy, xxxiii. 36; Val. Max. 1. 7). Before being actually condemned our Lord had been scourged, Lu. xxiii. 16; Jn. xix. 1, and on this account, probably, it was omitted afterwards. The criminal was appointed to carry his cross to the place of execution (Pint. De Tard. Dei Vind.); which was also exacted, as a matter of course, at the hands of Christ, though another was afterwards compelled to share the burden with him, Lu. xxiii. 26. When the place of doom was reached, the criminal was stripped nearly naked, and either bound or nailed to the cross, which was then hoisted and set up, so as to cause the feet of the victim to be three or four feet from the earth. If the nailing was the most painful mode in the first instance, the other was more so in the end; for the sufferer was left to die of sheer exhaustion, and when simply bound with thongs it might take days to accomplish the process; for usually a strong pin projected out of the central stem, on which the body of the sufferer rested. Instances are on record of persons surviving on a cross for nine days. But in our Lord's case there were circumstances altogether peculiar, which must have greatly tended to shorten the period of suffering. Ignorant of these, Pilate indicated his surprise that the death of Jesus should have occurred so soon, Mar. xv. 44. And as there were peculiar circumstances tending to produce an unusually speedy death, so there were reasons for effecting the removal of the body with the least possible delay. Had the Romans been left to themselves they might have allowed the body to hang on the cross for days; but by the Jewish law removal before sunset was imperative, De. xxi. 22, 23; and the near approach of the Jewish Sabbath—a Sabbath also of peculiar solemnity—rendered it especially needful, in our Lord's case, that no time should be lost in having the body committed to its proper resting-place.—It may be added, that crucifixion as a capital punishment was abolished by Constantine, in consequence of the sacred associations which the cross had now gathered around it.

The singular importance attaching to the death of Christ, according to the scheme of salvation unfolded in the gospel, could not but communicate somewhat of its own character to the instrument on which it was undergone. From being in itself the most vile and repulsive of objects, the cross has become in the minds of believers the symbol of all that is holy and precious. As Christ crucified is the wisdom of God and the power of God unto salvation, it was but natural that those who experienced the power of this salvation should glory in the cross, as the instrumental occasion by which such unspeakable good had been procured. But this is a feeling that obviously needs to be kept within definite bounds, and jealously guarded, lest it should grow into a species of idolatry, and supplant the very object it was intended to honour. Apart from Christ himself, the cross remains what it naturally was, a base and contemptible thing, and utterly incapable, if viewed otherwise than as the symbol of what he accomplished on it, of imparting either life or blessing. The early Christians contemplated it merely as such a symbol; and hence it was usually associated in their minds with hopeful and joyous, not with gloomy and ascetic feelings. So, it is justly remarked by Maitland, in his interesting work on the catacombs, "When the cross was employed as an emblem, as it very often was, it wore a cheerful aspect. Pilate may set a seal upon the sepulchre, and the soldiers may repeat their idle tale; but the church knows better; and, thinking rather of Christ's resurrection than of his death, she crowns the cross with flowers." On the early tomb-stones of the Christians, therefore, the cross was the emblem of victory and hope, and they often had the word victrix written underneath or alongside of it. It was only after the morbid and ascetic spirit of monkery had made way in the church that the cross became associated with a gloomy, self-tormenting piety; and only when superstition took the place of true, spiritual devotion, that the figure of the cross came to be used or borne about as a sacred charm. This last abuse began much earlier than the other, for it appears to have prevailed extensively in the fourth, and to have been not uncommon in the latter part of the third century. Even then people signed the cross in token of safety, and laid stress on figures of it as a preservative against both spiritual and natural evil. This superstitious feeling was at once expressed and stimulated by the discovery of what was held to be the true sepulchre of Christ, and of the real cross on which he suffered. The empress Helena, mother of Constantine, about the year A.D. 326, and when she was on the verge of eighty years old, made a pilgrimage to the holy places, and was rewarded, among other things, by this notable discovery. A Jew, who doubtless understood from the taste and tendencies of the noble visitant what was likely to bring the most grateful response, furnished the information which led to the desired result; only, as three crosses were found at the spot, it was for a time difficult to ascertain with certainty which might be the Saviour's. But on the suggestion of Macarius, Bishop of Jerusalem, they were tested by their power of working miracles; and as one only was reported to possess this quality, it was accordingly declared to be the genuine cross of Christ. This, however, was but the beginning of wonders; for, as is well known, bits of this real cross soon began to be distributed throughout Christendom; and the traffic grew till it was calculated the whole might have sufficed to build a ship of war, while the original remained still undiminished. It is one of the most striking evidences on record of the melancholy proneness of the human mind to idolatry and superstition, and shows how close and vigilant a watch should be set on the workings of pious sentiment, from the moment it begins to decline into a wrong direction! The subject, however, in this aspect of it, belongs to church history rather than to that of biblical literature.

Figuratively, cross is used in Scripture, in a general way for what is painful and mortifying to the flesh.

Our Lord himself so uses it when he says, "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me," Mat. xvi. 24. And THE CROSS, by way of eminence, that namely of Christ, is taken as an emblem of the doctrine or religion with which it is so closely connected, Phi. iii. 18. The enemies of the cross of Christ, are such as in their heart and behaviour are opposed to the spirit and design for which he suffered on the accursed tree.

CROWN. The common Hebrew word for this is atárah (אֲתָרָה); it is derived from the root which signifies to surround, then to encircle in a distinguishing or honorary manner, especially with chaplets, diadems, or such like things upon the head; so that the atárah in the emphatic sense of crown was just the capital cincture and ornament of the person—in kings, the peculiar badge of royalty; in priests, of sacerdotal dignity (though in Scripture another term is commonly used for this—מִצְנֶפֶת, mitznepeth); in combatants, of victory.

In ancient times such crowns, though called by a common name, would naturally differ according to the [184.] Egyptian, Assyrian, and other Crowns.

2. Egyptian Crown of the lower country.—Wilkinson.
3. Egyptian Crown of the united upper and lower countries.—Wilkinson.

5. Assyrian Crown of Sardanapalm III.—Layard.
6. Assyrian Crown of Sennacherib.—Layard.

manners of the time and the condition of the personages who wore them. Even for kings, we have no reason to think they bore anything like a commonly recognized or stereotyped form. Indeed, a comparison of the distinctive head-dresses of the Egyptian and Assyrian kings with the more simple, though probably more costly diadem of the Roman emperors, is sufficient proof that there was great variety of form. Some of them, it will be observed, especially those of the Assyrian monarchs, approach very nearly in shape to the priestly tiara, and were in fact nothing else than an elevated, elaborately wrought, and perhaps gemmed turban. That they were usually made of costly materials, and were for dignity and ornament rather than for use, appears from the allusions to them found in ancient writers. Even the comparatively petty king of the Ammonites had a crown which contained a talent of gold and precious stones, which David took with the city Rabbah, and placed upon his own head, 2 Sa. xii. 30. Reference is made in Ps. xxi. 3 to a crown of pure gold as the proper badge of a king, whose state corresponded to his position; so that in David's time gold must be understood to have formed the chief material for the manufacture of royal crowns; but nothing is indicated respecting the form.

It was a Grecian custom to crown with a wreath of leaves, or a chaplet of flowers, those who came off victorious in the public games. We read of nothing corresponding to this in the Old Testament; but reference is made to the custom by St. Paul as one perfectly familiar to his Corinthian readers (near whose city some of those games were celebrated), and he draws the distinction between such and the Christian prize, by designating the one corruptible, and the other incorruptible, 1 Co. ix. 25. In reference also, partly to this worldly custom, and partly to the usage of kings, the final inheritance of the saints is represented as a crown, to which they are at once born as heirs of glory, and to which they must fight their way as spiritual combatants—a crown of righteousness, 2 Ti. iv. 8, because it is attained to only as the final issue of a life of righteousness; a crown of life, Re. ii. 10, or a crown of glory, 1 Pe. v. 4, because a perennial life of blessedness and glory shall be the portion of those who receive it. But another and less creditable custom of the ancient heathen in respect to the use of temporary crowns is referred to, at least once, in Old Testament scripture—the custom, namely, of encircling with a coronal of leaves and flowers the heads of those who were engaged in the mirth and revelry of public festivals. Thus the prophet Isaiah apostrophizes the drunkards of Ephraim, as having on them a crown of pride, a glorious beauty of a fading flower, ch. xxviii. 1. And in the apocryphal book of Wisdom the reference is still more distinct—"Let us fill ourselves with costly wine and ornaments, and let no flowers of the spring pass by us; let us crown ourselves with rose-buds before they are uttered," ch. ii. 7, 8. Occasionally allusions are made to crowns in a quite general way, as to what is peculiarly honourable and glorious; as when a virtuous wife is called "a crown to her husband," Pr. xii. 4; when the wise are said to get riches, and old men grandchildren, for a crown, Pr. xiv. 24; xvii. 6; or when faithful ministers of the gospel have their converts reckoned to them for a crown of joy, 1 Th. ii. 19. In such cases the crown is simply regarded as the sign or emblem of the state.

CRYSTAL. There is no further peculiarity in the reference made to crystal in Scripture, than that in the original Hebrew two terms are so rendered, gabish (גַּבִּישׁ), and kerach (כֶּרַח): These both properly signify ice, the one from the congelation that causes it, the other from the smoothness that appears on its surface. It was an ancient opinion, that crystal was simply ice in a harder state of congelation than usual; and hence, not merely the Hebrew gabish, but the Greek κρύσταλλος, from which our crystal comes, signified equally clear ice and rock-crystal, the two being regarded as but one substance. This of course was a mistake, but it accounts for the common designation. Rock-crystal is produced in the warmer, as well as in the colder regions of the earth; and is composed of the finest species of quartz. It is so pellucid, that "clear as crystal" is a familiar expression in Scripture, Re. iv. 6; xxi. 11, &c., as well as in ordinary discourse. Its terrible or dazzling brightness, when shone upon by the light of the sun, is referred to in Eze. i. 22. And from the value set upon it, in connection with these qualities, it was ranked by the ancients among the precious stones, and sometimes even named with gold as of like value, Job xxviii. 17.

CUBIT. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

CUCKOO (קִיטִי, shachaph). The name of some bird, mentioned only in the lists of unclean fowl in Le. xi. and De. xiv. It is impossible to say with certainty what species or even genus is intended. The LXX. translate the word by λάρος, the gull, and various conjectural identifications have been proposed. Where nothing certain can be advanced, the rendering of the English version is not at all improbable, and is quite as good as any other. The cuckoo (Cuculus canorus) is a bird of considerable size, unfit for food, because habitually feeding on reptiles and large insects, common in Palestine, and sure to attract popular notice from its peculiar and well-known call.

The very word shachaph, especially if it was pronounced shachoph, was a good imitation of the dissyllabic voice of this bird; and not improbably was so intended, just as our word cuckoo, variously repeated in all European languages, and yakob, which the bird is supposed by the Arabs to utter. The latter indeed call it teer el yakob, or Jacob's bird, on this account.

The cuckoo is spread over the whole of Asia and Africa as well as Europe, migrating northward in spring, and southward in autumn. It is said to pass the winter in Palestine. Mr. Strickland saw it at Smyrna, and Messrs. Dickson & Ross sent specimens to the Zoological Society from Erzeroom. Buckingham, travelling across the mountains between Damascus and Sidon in April, heard the familiar call, loud, distinct, and clear, though the ground was covered with deep snow. It is probable that the cuckoo does not breed in Palestine.

[P. H. G.]

CUCUMBER. The Talmudists derive the Hebrew plural קִיטִי, from the obsolete root קִטִי, "to be hard, heavy, difficult," owing to the hardness and indigestibility of this tempting but dangerous fruit (Gesenius). This was one of the Egyptian dainties which the Israelites missed in the wilderness, Nu. xi. 5; and according to Hasselquist, no country can vie with Egypt for cucumbers. Not only does it yield in abundance the common species, Cucumis sativus, but a variety to which he gives the epithet "Egyptian melon, or queen of the cucumbers"—the Cucumis Chate of Linneus. "This grows in the fertile earth round Cairo, after the inundation of the Nile, and not in any other place in Egypt, nor does it grow in any other soil. This fruit is a little watery, the flesh is almost of the same substance as the melons; it tastes somewhat sweet and cool. The grandees and Europeans in Egypt eat it as the most pleasant fruit they find, and that from which they have least to apprehend. It is the most excellent fruit of this tribe of any yet known. The princes in Europe may wish they could get it into their gardens, for it is certainly worth a place on their tables" (Travels, 258). It is likely, however, that it was the more common sort with which the Hebrew bondsmen were chiefly acquainted; and this is so plentiful, that at the present day the cucumber-leaf is a proverbial expression for anything of frequent occurrence, as in the saying—"It is written upon the cucumber-leaf, 'He who watches during the night, sleeps during the day,' " i. e. it is written where the meanest people may read it (Burckhardt's Arabic Proverbs, No. 660).

But plentiful as cucumbers were—often growing by the roadside, or where the neighbourhood of a fountain supplied the means of irrigation—they were still private property, and were not intended for the use of every promiscuous passenger. Accordingly, it was not unusual to set some one to watch them, and, in 1. 8, the lonely daughter of Zion is compared to a "lodge in a garden of cucumbers"—alluding either to the slight shelter which screened the watchman from the sun, or the little stage or platform where he maintained his post of observation, at once commanding an extended view and secure from beasts of prey. [J. H.]

CUMIN (κῦμα, and κυμῖνον), is the Cuminum Cyminum of Linnæus. Like the anise, the coriander, the dill, and the caraway (Carum Carui), it is an umbelliferous plant, with seeds aromatic, pungent, and carminative. A native of Upper Egypt and Ethiopia, it is still extensively cultivated in Sicily and Malta. It would appear to have been a favourite herb among the Hebrews, and as late as last century it retained a place of some importance in pharmacy. (See J. C. Ehrmanni Dissertatio Medica de Cumino, Argentorati, 1733.) Its flavour is less agreeable than the seeds of the caraway, to which it has almost entirely given place in this country; but it is still used by veterinary surgeons, and according to a letter of Mr. Field in the Times, when the oil of cumin is rubbed on the hand, and held to the nostrils of a vicious horse, it exerts such an influence over the animal that the performer is enabled to proceed with his other manipulations till he gains entire mastery over him. When the cumin is ripe, its seeds are easily detached from the stalk, as is the case with the coriander, the fennel, the caraway, and plants of the same order. A thrashing-sledge, or wooden rollers, might be needed to separate from the ear the grains of wheat or barley; but for dill and cumin a rod was thrashing instrument sufficient. To this Isaiah alludes, ch. xxviii. 27, in that parable where, from the processes of the husbandman, he so beautifully illustrates the variety and congruity of the divine dispensations. The Pharisees are upbraided for that morbid scrupulosity which, whilst living in the neglect of the weightiest duties, paid "tithe of mint, and anise, and cumin," Mat. xxiii. 23; and it is a curious coincidence that, amongst the Greeks, a hard and pettifogging punctiliousness should have been nick-named "cumin-splitting." In his Wasps, Aristophanes calls a miserable haggler and hoarder by one of those sea-quipedalian epithets which he so delights in, κυμανο-πριστο-καρδαμο-γλυφος, a cress-seed-paring cumin-carving skin-flint. [J. H.]

CUP. The earliest mention of cups on record is in the dream of Pharaoh's butler, Ge. xi. 11. Subsequently the word is of frequent recurrence in the Bible, both in its proper sense as a material cup used for drinking at meals or at religious festivals and ceremonies, and in its figurative sense, in which its applications are most varied and significant. In Ge. xlv. 5, its use in divination is likewise intimated, showing the great antiquity of this practice among oriental peoples.

Among the Egyptians the forms of cups and vases were very varied, the paintings upon the tombs representing many of most elegant design, though others are equally deficient in the properties of form and proportion. The forms used during the fourth and other early dynasties (1700 B.C.) continued to be common to a late date. (Egyptians of Time of Pharaohs, Lon. 1867, p. 48.) There are not any representations of cups like the head of an animal (Nineveh and its Palaces, 3d edit. pp. 216, 210). Many of the Egyptian vases, cups, and bowls were of gold (Hered. ii. 151) and silver, Gen. xlv. 2; comp. Nu. vii. 84, some being richly studded with precious stones, inlaid with vitrified substances in brilliant colours, and even enamelled. Pliny states that "the Egyptians paint their silver cups, representing Anubis upon them; the metal being painted not engraved," apparently referring to enamel in contradistinction to the ordinary inlaid work (Wilkinson). The cup of Thothmes III. (in the Louvre) is of gold highly ornamented; it measures about 7 inches in diameter, and has fish and other devices chased upon the bottom, and round the sides a border of hieroglyphics in relief punched upon it from within. Bronze vessels have been frequently found in the tombs, and a bronze table was discovered at Thebes, on which were about twenty of different forms. Bottles, bowls, and cups were likewise made of hard stone, such as granite, porphyry, basalt, and alabaster, so called from Alabastron, a town in Upper Egypt, near quarries which produced this material. Those vases, in which costly scented ointments were exported from Egypt, were all made at this town, whence the vase was called an alabastron, a word erroneously translated in the authorized version of the New Testament, Mat. xxi. 7, an "alabaster box," instead of an "alabaster vase." The characteristic form of these vases, which differ only in being more or less elongated, is that they are broad at the base, gradually tapering to the neck, and usually with little projections at the sides. Example A (No. 189) is the most common form: B is in the collection of the Duke of Northumberland, and is still half filled with ointment

The small pieces shown over the tops of the vases are their stoppers, made also of alabaster. Vases of this material and of the same shapes are common in the tombs of Greece and Etruria; one was discovered at Halicarnassus inscribed with the name of Xerxes in hieroglyphics and in cuneiform characters (in Brit. Mus.) All the specimens extant were unquestionably made in Egypt, no other quarries of alabaster having been known until recent times, when the material was discovered in Arragon, in Spain, and is hence called arragonite. The cups used for offerings to the gods were of very simple shape, as were many of the drinking-cups, some of which, however, were adorned with flowers and other devices. Numerous cups and bowls were of earthenware, and of vitrified pottery, the latter being often ornamented with various patterns, some having fish and lotus blossoms on the concave bottom, and some were in the form of the lotus itself (Wilkinson).

Besides vases and cups of the precious metals, hard stones, and pottery, the Egyptians had other varieties in glass and porcelain. Glass was one of the earliest manufactures known in Egypt. A glass bead has been found bearing the name of a Pharaoh of the eighteenth dynasty, proving it to be more than 3200 years old, and glass bottles are represented on paintings of far more ancient date (Wilkinson). Some cups, small bowls, and bottles were formed of a coloured composition which has been called glass-porcelain; it was esteemed a recommendation that the colour should pass directly through the fused substance, and this peculiarity was sometimes imitated, either to deceive the purchaser or to supply a cheaper commodity.

Among the Assyrians the cups and vases were even more varied in form and elegant in design than among the Egyptians, as is evinced by the numerous examples in the British Museum, and by the representations on the sculptures. The materials employed were the same—the precious metals, copper, bronze, glass, and pottery, both glazed and unglazed. In one sculpture at Khorsabad (Botta, pl. lxxvi.), is represented a large vase, that evidently from its dimensions contained "royal wine in abundance," Es. 1. 7, into which the attendant cup-bearers are dipping drinking-cups. These cups terminate in the head of a lion, and it is to be inferred, from the construction of the handle with a hinge-like articulation to the bowl (No. 190, fig. 2), that they are of metal, and probably gold. Other festal cups are more like bowls in form and fluted (No. 190, fig. 3; King and Queen feasting in Garden, B. M.) In other scenes from Nimroud, the king is drinking on his return from the chase (B. Mus.), and is pouring out a libation (Ibid.) One series represents him drinking in the presence of the gods of Assyria, reminding us of the metaphor in Ps. xvi. and xxiii.; and one chamber was apparently specially devoted to representations in regular alternation of the king with a cup and the king with two arrows, and attended by divinities (see DIVINATION). Many cups of the form of those seen in the hand of the king were found by Layard in the ruins of Nimroud, and are now exhibited in glass cases in the middle of the Assyrian gallery in the British Museum. They are made of bronze, are of exquisite workmanship, and are embossed in separate compartments with numerous figures, representing men and animals. One of the most frequently repeated figures is that so common in Egyptian sculptures, bearing reference to time, or cycles, or periods. Other cups are embossed with the Assyrian winged animals; some have nodules of silver, and others again have small garnets set into the bronze at certain interlacings of the ornament. They are all of beaten work, Nu. viii. 4; Ex. xxxviii. 17-22, in which art the ancients had attained great skill and perfection, and appear to be of the nature of those "vessels of fine copper" spoken of by Ezra, ch. viii. 27, as "precious as gold." There can hardly be a doubt, from the character of the decoration, that these are cups for divining—a practice common to Syria and Egypt as early as the time of the patriarch Joseph. The question, "Is not this it in which my lord drinketh, and whereby indeed he divineth?" Ge. xlii. 6, would lose half its force if the custom had been unknown to the sons of Jacob. Mr. Layard has also deposited in the British Museum several drinking-cups of like form covered with Hebrew characters. They are of much more recent date, having belonged to Jews who lived in the cities of Mesopotamia, where the same superstitions exist even to the present day. Drinking-cups, both of brass and silver, and of precisely the same shape, are still in common use all over the East. They are generally decorated with some Arabic sentence bearing a mystic sense. In Persia there is a tradition that there is a cup called "Jami Jemshid," the cup of Jemshid, an ancient king of that country, in which could be seen the whole world and all the things which were doing in it. The same tradition asserts that this cup, filled with the elixir of immortality, was discovered in digging the foundations of Persepolis. The Persian poets ascribe to this cup the prosperity of their ancient monarchs (Nineveh and its Palaces, 3d edit. p. 306, 307). [The Assyrian divining cups referred to above are called Bowls in the British Museum, and figures of some of them are given under the article BOWL.—ED.]

In a figurative sense the word cup is often used for a man's lot or portion, Ps. xi. 6; xvi. 5; xxiii. 5. Babylon is called a golden cup, possibly in allusion to her superstitious rites, and because of her sensuality, luxury, and affluence, Je. ii. 7. The "cup of devils," as opposed to the "cup of God," symbolized idolatry. It signifies afflictions, Ps. lxxv. 8; Is. ii. 17, 22; Je. xxv. 16; xlix. 12; II. 7; La. iv. 21; Eze. xxiii. 31-33; Hab. ii. 16; Ra. xiv. 10; xvi. 19; and sufferings, Mat. xx. 22; xxvi. 39; Lu. xxii. 43; Ju. xviii. 11; Heb. ii. 9. The cup of salvation and thanksgiving to the Lord, Ps. cxvi. 13. The "cup of blessing," derived from the practice of the Jews in their thank-offerings when, at the feast of the remnants of the sacrifices, the master of the feast pronounced blessings over a cup of wine, and then gave each of the guests in turn to drink, 1 Ch. xvi. 2-4. Our Lord is supposed to allude to this custom in the institution of the cup, Lu. xxii. 17; 1 Co. x. 16.

CURSE. See ANATHEMA.

CUSH. 1. The eldest son of Ham. He was father of six sons, the most noted of whom was Nimrod, Ge. x. 6-8; 1 Ch. i. 8-10.

2. A Benjamite at the court of Saul, whose calumnia-tion of David gave occasion to the inditing of Ps. vii., wherein the psalmist protests his innocence of those charges. As no such individual, however, is mentioned in the historical notices of that period, many expositors conclude that the name Cush, which in its gentile form Cushi, Je. xlii. 23, signifies moor or black man, is a sym-bolical designation of the dark malice of the enemy, whom the Jewish writers, with the exception of Abenezra, take to be Saul himself. So also several modern expositors, as Vatable, Tarnov, Glass (Philol. Sac. lib. iv. 3, 8), Burk (Gnomon Psalmorum, t. p. 51), and Hengstenberg. It is thought, moreover, that there is a play on the name Kish, the father of Saul. These suppositions have, however, little to support them. What chiefly opposes the application to Saul is the fact, as Rosenmüller remarks, that Cush appears in the character of a calum-niator more than of a persecutor. Pfeiffer (Dub. Vexata, Opera, t. p. 297) takes it to be Shimei, 2 Sa. xvi. 5. Abenezra and Drusius, with more probability, suppose that it must have been the proper name of a person otherwise un-known.

[D. M.]

CUSH, a country frequently mentioned in the Old Testament, but apparently with such latitude of meaning as makes its determination a question of considerable dif-ficulty in biblical geography. It derived its name most probably from Cush, the son of Ham. Most versions, ancient and modern, including the English, which re-tains the Hebrew name only in Is. xi. 11, render it Ethiopia; itself a term of varied signification in ancient writers, who, following its Greek etymology αἰθω—ἠῶς, applied it to all sun-burned, dark-complexioned races, especially those above Egypt, Herodotus (iii. 94; vii. 70) extending it to Asiatic nations. So much, however, is settled, that Cush in various passages can be no other than the country in Africa south of Egypt, Ethiopia, corresponding to the modern regions of Nubia and Northern Abyssinia; for the view of Bochart, who held that in every instance it was some country in Arabia that was meant is now universally abandoned. That Cush adjoined Egypt appears from Eze. xxix. 10, where Egypt's desolation is announced as extending "from the tower of Syene unto the border of Cush" (E. V.), or rather "from Migdol to Syene and (or even) to the border of Cush" (Haverstick, Hitzig); Migdol being the most northern point of Egypt, and Syene the most southern place of importance (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, 1 p. 174). This is further confirmed by the various pas-sages where Cush and Egypt occur together, as Is. xx. 3-5, Ps. lxxviii. 32 [31], and those where mention is made of the connection and confederacy subsisting between their inhabitants, Eze. xxx. 4; Je. xli. 8, 9; Na. iii. 9. Cushites came out of Egypt with Shishak against Jerusalem, 3 Ch. xii. 3. Cush also occurs in connection with Egypt and the Sabeans, שַׁבְאִים (sabaim), Is. xiv. 14, different from the inhabitants of שֶׁבַא (shebā), a people of Arabia, so fre-quently mentioned in Scripture. The Seba here re-ferred to was quite a distinct country, probably Meroë in Upper Egypt; it was inhabited by a descendant of Cush, Ge. x. 7. In Je. xiii. 23 the black colour of the Cushites is so noticed that it must have evidently differed greatly from that of the Jews, a remark not at all applicable to an Arabian people, while very suitable to negroes.

But if it was unquestionably an extreme view of Bochart, who found Cush only in Arabia, the view advanced by Shultess, Gesenius, Bunsen, and others, who admit only an African Cush, is no less so, and it is only by offering violence to various passages of Scripture that it can be maintained. That several localities should be called by the same name is explicable from the frequent migrations of the early nations, who would give their own names successively to the various regions into which they removed. That Mesopotamia was the original seat of a portion at least of the Cushites is plain from the statement relative to Nimrod, whose empire em-braced portions both of Babylonia and Assyria, Ge. x. 8-12; and that either there or in Arabia there was another Cush appears from several passages, which can be explained only on such an assumption. The arguments in favour of an Arabian Cush are briefly these—1. It is mentioned in connection with Midian, a country on the east of the Red Sea: "I saw the tents of Cushan in affliction: the curtains of the land of Midian did tremble," Hab. iii. 7. It is almost universally allowed that Cushan is but another form of Cush; for there is no foundation whatever for connecting it as is sometimes done (Kitto's Cyc. Bib. Lit. t. p. 508) with Cushan-Rishathaim king of Mesopotamia, Ju. iii. 10. Delitzsch (Der Prophet Habakuk, Leip. 1843, p. 150), who admits only the African Cush, holds that its men-tion along with Midian is intended to show how places so far removed from each other were equally affected by the theophany; but this is exceedingly strained, and at variance with the parallelism of the passage. 2. The wife of Moses is called a "Cushitess" in Nu. xii. 1. If this be Zipporah, the daughter of the priest of Midian, there is thus indubitable evidence of the connection between Cush and Midian. This can be set aside only by supposing that the reference is to a second marriage of Moses, and this again is maintained on the ground that the objections of Aaron and Miriam against their brother were utterly incongruous if applied to a marriage which had subsisted for more than forty years. But admitting that it is a second marriage which is thus re-ferred to, the case is not materially altered, for still Cush must be sought near the place of Israel's encamp-ment, as it cannot be supposed that Moses would go to Ethiopia to fetch a wife. 3. But perhaps a stronger argument is the mention of Arabians as contiguous to the Cushites. Thus: "Moreover the Lord stirred up against Jehoram the spirit of the Philistines, and of the Arabians who are near (אֶרֶץ-יָד, al-yad, at the hand or side of) the Cushites," 2 Ch. xxi. 16, which can hardly apply, as Delitzsch maintains, to countries separated by the Arabian Gulf.

Other arguments adduced by Michaelis (Spielotium Geograph. Hebr. t. p. 149) in favour of the Arabian Cush are not decisive, and the passages on which he relies apply with greater probability to the African Cush. Thus, Sennacherib when threatening Judea hastens back to the defence of Assyria, on a report that Tirhakah king of Cush was about to attack him, 2 Ki. xix. 9; Is. xxxvii. 9; from which Michaelis infers that if Tirhakah was king of Ethiopia he could only reach Assyria through Palestine, and so could not take the Assyrians in the rear, as the withdrawal of Sennacherib seems to imply. On this it is enough to observe, that as the Egyptians are found at Carchemish on the Euphrates, 2 Ch. xxxv. 20, without having passed through Palestine, the same may have been the case with their neighbours and allies the Ethiopians. That Tirhakah was king of Ethiopia is placed beyond doubt from the records on the walls of temples in that country. El Berkel (formerly Napata) was his Ethiopian capital, where his name and monuments are found. Indeed, his successful opposition to the Assyrian power is recorded on a temple at Medénet Háboo, where are the figure and name of this king, and the number of captives he took (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, t. p. 140). The other instance, from 2 Ch. xiv. 9, is equally unsatisfactory. Zerah the Cushite with an immense host penetrates as far as Marehab, but when discomfited before Asa they take the road to Gerar, in the south of Palestine, which would bring them to Ethiopia through Egypt. That this was an Ethiopian force is confirmed by a subsequent notice, 2 Ch. xvi. 8, that it included the Lubim, supposed to denote the people of Fitya in Africa.

With regard to several notices of Cush it is impossible to determine whether they apply to the African or to the Asiatic Cush. In Zep. iii. 10, Is. xviii. 1, 2, mention is made of the "rivers of Cush," and in the latter passage of a land beyond them which "sendeth ambassadors by the sea, in vessels of papyrus on the face of the waters;" and in Eze. xxx. 9 it is declared that "messengers shall go forth from the Lord in ships to make the careless Cushites afraid," all which imply a well-watered country, and a maritime region, or at least one of easy access from the sea. The latter characteristic corresponds equally well with the physical character of Arabia and of Ethiopia; the eastern coast of the latter, washed by the Indian Ocean and the Red Sea, is much indented, and contained some good harbours, but then neither of the two countries was noted for its rivers, unless we suppose the reference is to the Nile and its branches. Some authors, however, not satisfied with this, suppose another Cush in the region of Susiana, bounded on the south by the Persian Gulf and on the west and south-west by the Tigris. It is still called Chusistan, and is indeed a country abounding in rivers. The same place is thought to be mentioned in 2 Ki. xvii. 24 as Cutha, and this again is supposed to be the Chaldean form of Cush, by the substitution of the Hebrew letter tau for shin, as in the name Athur for Ashur. In support of this view it is further maintained that otherwise the notice of Cush, in the geography of Eden, Ge. ii. 13, is utterly inexplicable. Still the evidence is too weak to warrant the supposition, for the geographical notices of Eden are themselves so intricate as to forbid their application to any hypothesis regarding other disputed localities.

[D. M.]

CUTH'AH, a province in the Assyrian empire, from which Shalmaneser transported colonists to occupy the land in Samaria left vacant by the exiled Israelites, 2 Ki. xvii. 24, 30. The precise region so designated is altogether unknown. But from the admixture of this people among the new Samaritan population, the term Cuthite was applied by the rabbinical Jews, in the Chaldee and Talmud, to the Samaritans generally, and words peculiar to the Samaritans are called Cuthian.

CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH. Among the charges brought against the Israelites was one, and so important that it is recorded three times, forbidding them to make cuttings in their flesh for the dead. "Ye shall not make any cuttings in your flesh for the dead, nor print any mark upon you: I am the Lord," Le. xix. 28. Again, in respect particularly of the priests: "They shall not make baldness upon their head, neither shall they shave off the corner of their beard, nor make any cuttings in their flesh," Le. xxi. 5. And more fully: "Ye are the children of the Lord your God: ye shall not cut yourselves, nor make any baldness between your eyes for the dead," De. xiv. 1, 2—לַמֵּת (lameth) determining the meaning of לִנְפֶשֶׁת (lanephesh) in Le. xix. 28, showing it to be an ellipsis for מֵת וְנֶפֶשׁ (lanephesh meth). (Vater, Commentar. ii. p. 211.) Then is added a reason of the prohibition: "For thou art an holy people unto the Lord thy God, and the Lord hath chosen thee to be a peculiar people unto himself, above all the nations that are upon the earth."

Among ancient nations it was customary to give expression to grief, especially for the dead, in the most passionate form: rending the garments, plucking out the hair of the head and beard, and even lacerating the person were ordinary accompaniments. This was the case not only with the passionate and excitable orientals; but also among the nations of the north and the west, as the Scythians (Herodotus, iv. 71), and also the Greeks and Romans (Ovid, First Eleg. iii. 3; Tibullus, Eleg. i. 1. 1). The same custom prevails in the East to the present day. Mrs. Postans, in her Recollections of the East (Journ. of Sac. Lit. July, 1848, p. 107), remarks: "In all mourning ceremonies in the East, that are conducted with any pomp, it is customary to hire persons to disfigure themselves and make loud lamentation. At the Mahometan ceremonies of the Mohurrum not only do bands of women in green dresses follow the bier of Hoossein and Hassan, beating their breasts and tearing their hair, but fakirs and mad enthusiasts dance around it, cutting themselves with knives, and running skewers through their tongues. Some Moslem servants in our employment at Mandavie, to whom we had given leave to attend Mohurrum, returned so much wounded as to be incapable of service for some time, so fiercely had they made cuttings in their 'flesh for the dead.'"

Indeed, notwithstanding the express charge to the contrary, this practice prevailed extensively among the Jews themselves during the decline of the monarchy, as appears from the prophecies of Jeremiah. In announcing the impending calamities, the prophet, ch. xvi. 6, describes their extent and severity by declaring that in the universal sorrow, the usual tokens of individual grief should be forgotten: "Both the great and the small shall die in the land: they shall not be buried, neither shall men lament for them, nor cut themselves, nor make themselves bald for them." This laceration of the person was also a sign of great sorrow in general. In Je. xii. 5 mention is made of eighty pilgrims going up to Jerusalem after the sack of the city by the Chaldeans; and in such a plight as indicated deep mourning for the destruction of the place whither they had been wont to go up to worship, "having their beards shaven, and their clothes rent, and having cut themselves." In ch. xlvii. 5 Philistia is represented as a female who has torn her hair and cut her flesh in token of grief for some awful catastrophe; so also ch. xlviii. 27, with regard to the lamentation which would result from the desolation of Moab—the cutting of the flesh being accompanied, as appears from Is. xv. 2, by baldness of the head and cutting off the beard.

Tracing these practices to the idea of thereby propitiating the manes of the deceased, and connecting them with similar rites in the worship of Moloch and Baal, 1 Ki. xviii. 28, some writers upon this subject regard the primary object of the prohibition in the Hebrew law to be the removal of all occasion and appearance of idolatrous worship. This connection is however exceedingly doubtful, for as Le Clerc well remarks, "alia enim ratio est funeris, alia sacrificii (Comm. in Lc. xix. 28). The practice so far as regards religion undoubtedly originated in false apprehensions of the character of the deity, and was an attempt to propitiate his favour; while as an indication of sorrow for the dead, it may have sprung only from the obscurity which shrouded a future state, while the prohibition may have been intended as an admonition to the Israelite of his relation to God, as one not limited to this present life, or one which could be interrupted by death, and of the superior knowledge which he enjoyed in respect to a future state over the heathen, and so calling for the avoidance of a practice which ill accorded with such convictions (see Willet, Hexapla on Leviticus, Lond. 1631, p. 476). Ewen Spencer admits as much (see De Leg. Heb. ii. 12, sec. 2). It lends some confirmation to this view that the Roman laws of the Twelve Tables contained injunctions as to moderating grief at funerals, and in particular forbade laceration of the flesh for the dead (Corp. Jur. Civ. v. p. 63, 67, ed. Godofredus, 1563), a prohibition supposed to be connected with the strong hopes which the Romans cherished of a future though natural life. The Hebrew law may thus correspond to the apostolic admonition: "I would not have you ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not even as others which have no hope," 1 Th. iv. 13; and if so, it has an important bearing on the question how far the doctrine of a future state and a resurrection is revealed in the Pentateuch. (See further, Macdonald's Introd. to the Pentateuch, p. 113, 114. Edin. 1861.)

CYMBALS. See MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

CYPRESS (צִפְרִיָּה, berosh), a well-known tree. One of the most beautiful passages in the Apocrypha is the description of Simon the high-priest, Eccles. i. 1-31; see also xxiv. 13:—

"He was as the morning-star in the midst of a cloud,
And as the moon at the full;
As the flower of roses in the spring of the year;
As lilies by the rivers of waters;
As the branches of the frankincense-tree in the time of summer;
As a fair olive tree budding forth fruit;
And as a cypress-tree which groweth up to the clouds.

When he put on the robe of honour,
And was clothed with the perfection of glory;
When he went up to the holy altar,
He made the garment of holiness honourable"

The κνυδάριστος of the above passage is not improbably the צִפְרִיָּה of 1 Ki. v. 8; Ps. civ. 17; Eze. xxvii. 5; xxxi. 8, and other passages, translated "fir-tree." It is abundantly native on Lebanon, and was prized by the ancients next to the cedar.

The Cupressus sempervirens, well described by Loudon as "a flame-shaped, tapering, cone-like tree, with upright branches growing close to the trunk, and resembling in general appearance the Lombardy poplar," is one of the most striking and impressive members of the great coniferous order. With its dark evergreen foliage, and with its strict spiry growth, all pointing towards heaven, it seems as if designed on purpose for the cemetery, and at once a mourner and a monument. Accordingly, throughout Syria and Turkey, where it attains a height of 60 feet, its tall form may be constantly recognized standing sentinel over the tombs:

"Dark tree! still sad when others' grief is fled,
The only constant mourner of the dead."

For similar purposes it is now familiar amongst ourselves; although its sad supremacy is likely soon to be divided with the new species lately discovered in China, and which combines the solemnity of the cypress with the tender grace of the weeping willow—the C. funebris, of which Mr. Fortune gives a graphic description, and a figure, in his Wanderings in China (vol. ii. p. 42).

The fine-grained, fragrant wood, with its beautiful red colour, was highly prized from the earliest period, and was justly famed for its durability. The Egyptians made of it cases for their mummies, and the Roman pontiffs are still, we believe, consigned to cypress coffins; and, as a proof of its comparative indestructibility, it is said that when the cypress doors of St. Peter's at Rome, which had lasted from the days of Constantine, were eleven centuries afterwards removed by Pope Eugene IV., in order to be replaced with gates of brass, they were still perfectly sound. From the similarity of the name, it has been very generally supposed that the gopher-wood from which Noah's ark was constructed was cypress, and we are not aware of any topographical consideration which should render this opinion improbable; whilst the durability of the timber is in favour of the supposition, when we remember the length of time that the ark was in building. [J. H.]

CYPRUS, a large island in the Mediterranean, off the coast of Phœnicia and Cilicia, lying south-west and north-east. The island is of very irregular shape, and toward the north-east stretches out into a long narrow peninsula. Its extreme length is about 148 English miles, and for two-thirds of the length it is about 40 broad. The mountain range of Olympus occupies the main body of the island, and in some of the higher points reaches to the height of 7000 feet. The scenery in many parts is bold and rugged; there are abrupt eminences and lofty woodlands, but these often interchanging with fertile fields and deep picturesque valleys. The mountains contain copper, gold, and silver, and a considerable variety of the precious stones. Accordingly the Phœnicians, the great miners and traders of remote antiquity, soon found out its value, and to a considerable extent colonized it. Its earlier inhabitants were of Phœnician origin; but the Greeks in process of time established cities in it, and ultimately became its chief and ruling population. The principal cities were Salamis, Citium (now Larnaka), and Paphos (now Baffa), all near the sea-coast; but there were many others of some note. In its political relations the island passed through much the same fortunes that befell the part of Asia to which it is adjacent. Under Amasis it was in subjection to Egypt; but from the time of Cambyses it became a portion of the Persian empire. It once and again revolted against the Persian yoke, but was each time reduced to subjection. With the fall of the Persian power it passed over to the sway of Alexander, and furnished him with 120 ships for the siege of Tyre. After various other changes of dominion it was taken possession of by Rome, in a manner far from creditable to the imperial city; and before the Christian era, was turned into a senatorial province governed by propretors, with the title of proconsul. When the empire was divided, Cyprus was attached to the Byzantine or eastern section. The crusaders conquered it in 1191 under Richard I., and held possession of it for about three centuries. But in 1473 the republic of Venice acquired it, and it remained under their sway till 1571, when it was finally subjugated to the Turkish yoke by Selim II.

Cyprus was one of the earliest fields of missionary enterprise out of Palestine. This partly arose from the scattering abroad that took place on the death of

Stephen, Ac. xi. 19, and still more from Cyprus having been the birth-place of Barnabas, who naturally desired to carry to his native region the tidings of that salvation which he had himself received. The general population of the island must have presented anything but a hopeful field for the speedy triumph of the cross, as they were not only sunk like other heathen in abominable idolatry, but were more peculiarly devoted to a species of worship which everywhere told most disastrously upon the manners of the people. This was the worship of Venus, or rather the Syrian Astarte; for the worship partook essentially of the oriental character, and wanted much of the grace and refinement which the Greeks threw around even their corrupter superstitions. The Venus-worship of Cyprus was fearfully licentious, and had respect mainly to the generative powers of nature. Sensual indulgence, therefore, flourished under the patronage of religion, and of necessity pressed like a night-mare upon all the higher feelings and aspirations of the soul. Still, however, Barnabas did not despair; he hoped against hope, the more so as there appears to have been a number of Jews in the island, who stood free at least from the grosser forms of pollution around them. He accordingly sailed straight for Cyprus, when he and Paul were sent forth by the church at Antioch, Ac. xiii. The particulars of their mission in regard to Cyprus are not given, except in regard to the proconsul of the island, Sergius Paulus, who sought an interview with them at Paphos, where he was residing. This circumstance alone implied considerable success; as it is no way probable that a man in the station and with the prepossessions of Sergius would have paid any heed to such ambassadors of the cross, unless their mission had already caused some stir. In dealing with him their chief obstruction arose from the subtle and perverse attempts of a depraved Jew, Bar-jesus, one of that class, at this time unhappily numerous, who for purposes of gain gave themselves to the cultivation of magical arts, by which they played upon the credulity and fears of the heathen. This man so resisted the work of the Lord as to draw down upon him the solemn rebuke of Paul, and also through his word a judicial visitation of blindness; which so impressed the mind of the governor, that he became obedient to the faith. The island was subsequently visited by Barnabas, in company with John Mark, after the painful separation between him and Paul, Ac. xv. 39; and the gospel, we may reasonably suppose, from that time began to take root, and spread through Cyprus the blessings of salvation. The great majority of the people are still professed Christians, but with all the ignorance, credulity, and superstition that usually distinguish the members of the Greek church.

CYRENE, OR CYRENÆ (Gr. Κυρήνη, modern name Curen), the chief city of a district in the north of Africa, called Cyrenaica, also the Lybian Pentapolis, from its comprising five principal towns. The district lay between Egypt and Carthage, having the former on the east and the latter on the west. Libya was the African name of the territory in which Cyrene was situated; and on the African side it stood nearly right over against the Grecian Peloponnesus, with Crete lying between. Cyrene was in ancient times the most important Greek possession in Africa. It was founded by Greek colonists, who were Dorians, under the direction of Battus, about 630 years before the Christian era. The site was well chosen, being in one of the most attractive and fertile districts of North Africa. Even still, says a recent explorer, "the hills in the neighbourhood abound with beautiful scenes. Some of them exceed in richness of vegetation, and equal in grandeur, anything that is to be found in the Apennines" (Hamilton's Wanderings in North Africa, p. 78). It would seem that the old Hellenic colonists cultivated friendly relations with the native Libyans, and to a much greater extent than usual became intermingled with them by marriage relationships (Herod. iv. 146-149). The constitution of the state was framed somewhat after the model of Sparta, and took the shape of a limited monarchy; for several generations the supreme power remained in the hands of the family of Battus. But ultimately the entire district became an appendage of Egypt, and along with this passed into the hands of Rome considerably before the Christian era (B.C. 75).

Cyrene, when in the height of its prosperity, carried on an extensive commerce with Greece and Egypt; and it has even left its marks on the history of Hellenic literature. Aristippus, a native of the place, was the founder of a philosophic sect; and Callimachus the poet, and Carneades, the founder of the new academy at Athens, were both by birth Cyrenians. Such incidental facts indicate great literary as well as commercial activity; and we need not therefore be surprised to find, either that numbers of Jews were located there, or that they belonged to the more active and enterprising portion of their countrymen. Accordingly, Strabo expressly mentions Jews as forming a considerable part of the population (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 7); and, for so distant a settlement, they occupy a rather prominent place in New Testament scripture. The Simeon who bore our Lord's cross was of Cyrene, Lu. xxiii. 26. They had a synagogue of their own at Jerusalem, Ac. ii. 10; vi. 9, some of the members of which took an active part against Stephen; others, however, embraced the doctrine which Stephen had taught, and on being dispersed by the persecution which arose at his death, they went back to their native region publishing the gospel of the kingdom, Ac. xi. 20. Lucius also, a native of Cyrene, is mentioned in Ac. xiii. 1, as one of the prophets and teachers in the church at Antioch. We need not wonder, therefore, that the country at an early period was brought under Christian influence; and Cyrene was doubtless one of the main centres from which the light of the gospel diffused itself so early, and with such wonderful success, throughout Libya and the neighbouring regions of North Africa.

Extensive ruins have been found on the site anciently occupied by Cyrene, and they have recently been made the subject of more careful research. Some account was given of them by Della Cella, who visited the ruins in 1821-22; by Captain Beechy, in 1828; and still more recently by Hamilton, in the work already referred to. Various of the remains, chiefly statues of Grecian mould, and somewhat mutilated, have been deposited in the British Museum. The most striking remains, however, are the tombs, which are hewn out of the solid rock, and have thus survived the destruction which has overtaken the city. Tombs of this description were not in accordance with Greek usage, and they are justly regarded as an indication of the influence possessed in Cyrene of the native population of the district, and bespeak a certain affinity between the cast of thought prevalent there, and that which constructed the magnificent tombs and pyramids of Egypt.

CYRENIUS (Gr. Κυρήνιος: it is properly a Latin name, and should be written Quirinus or Quirinius). The only person referred to in Scripture of this name is the one mentioned in Lu. ii. 2, in connection with the taxing or enrolment which brought Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem at the time of Christ's birth. The statement has given rise to much disputation, and to various modes of solution, with the view of meeting the historical difficulties with which it is connected. There can be no doubt that the Cyrenius referred to—whose full and proper name was Publius Sulpitius Quirinus—was procurator or governor of Syria subsequent to the birth of Christ, and who about ten years after the real, or six years after the vulgar era, began to take up a census of the whole population with a view to taxing. This event is referred to in Ac. v. 37, and at various places in Josephus, as one that led to very considerable disturbances among the people. So far as it, therefore, is concerned, there is no room for any difference of opinion. But is that the event to which St. Luke points in the statement before us? So, many in present as well as former times, have maintained. The evangelist, they imagine, confounded the time of the Saviour's birth with that of the census of Cyrenius; or, as is now more commonly alleged, he confounded some special mission intrusted to Cyrenius involving some enrolment of the population, with the work of the regular census which he took up some years afterwards, when he had actually become president of Syria. There may have been, it is thought, an order issued for certain statistical returns some years previous to the census, and Cyrenius may have been sent into Syria to execute the work in that part of the empire. In which case the mistake of Luke would simply have consisted in saying, that the enrolment was made while Cyrenius presided over Syria, he having been at the time only a special commissioner, acting under the regular presidents or governors (so Meyer). Or, on the ground of this special though subsidiary agency, he may have been regarded as ruler or ἡγέμων of Syria (so Beza, Grotius, Ideler, Credner, Robinson, &c.) Another view, advocated by many distinguished writers, proceeds on the ground of πρώτη, first, being here put for the comparative: "This enrolling was made before that Cyrenius was governor of Syria" (Lardner, Tholuck, &c.) And a still further modification of meaning in connection with the πρώτη has been adopted by Calvin, Wetstein, Mack, Hofmann, and others, according to which it is taken adverbially, thus: "This same enrolling was first made (or, was first carried into effect) when Cyrenius was governor of Syria." The decree for it had been issued before, and certain steps in connection with it had been taken, but the actual execution, at least as regards the taxing, only took effect when Cyrenius became president of Syria.

Of these different modes of understanding the passage of the evangelist, none is quite natural, and some are plainly inconsistent with the historical accuracy, not to say inspiration, of the writer. In so plain and simple a narrative, it is against probability to suppose that a superlative should have been put for a comparative in the way indicated by one class of interpreters—that the evangelist should have said "first of his presiding," instead of "before that he presided;" and the examples brought in support of it cannot be regarded as strictly parallel. Nor, if the mission of Cyrenius at the time referred to had been of the special and subordinate kind understood by another class, could he with propriety have been represented as at the time presiding over Syria; for it is one thing to speak of a person being a ruler in a country, and as such having some special work to do in it, and another to say that such a thing was done while he had the presidency or government of it. This naturally implies that he was at the time its presiding and governing head; which Cyrenius could not have been in respect to Syria, if he had simply been commissioned to take up some statistical returns concerning its population. It is possible, however, according to the last form of opinion indicated above, that an enrolment with a view to taxing, or a general census of some sort, may have been ordered at the time of Christ's birth, and, after having proceeded a certain length, may have been somehow arrested in Judea, and only at last carried out when the government of Syria came into the hands of Cyrenius. This is perfectly conceivable; and the view suggested by it is no further liable to objection, than that it requires somewhat too much to be supplied to make the statement properly intelligible. If the decree for the enrolment was actually issued at the birth of Christ, and had the effect of bringing Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem, it would have been a rather brief and enigmatical mode of announcing the future progress and result of the matter to say, that the enrolment was first made when Cyrenius was governor of Syria—if so be that his government only commenced after a lapse of ten years from the birth of Jesus.

While therefore we might say of this mode of representing the matter, that grammatically it is not untenable (for numeral adjectives, such as πρώτος, in the nominative are often used adverbially, qualifying the verb that follows rather than the noun with which they agree), and that the historical circumstances might also have been in substantial accordance with the view it takes; yet it is not altogether satisfactory. And if one is to go by what may be called the fair and natural impression which the words are fitted to convey, we shall be disposed to infer that at the time of our Lord's birth there was a decree of enrolment actually carried into effect in Judea; that at the time Cyrenius was the highest and most direct representative of the Roman power in Syria; and that the enrolment in question was a first one, as contradistinguished from something of a similar description that subsequently took place. The question then is, whether any historical support can be found for these positions, and especially for the position that Cyrenius had to do with the government of Syria about the actual period of our Lord's birth, as well as afterwards, at an interval of about ten years. Now, this latter point, on which so much hangs for the minute accuracy of St. Luke, has lately received a very remarkable elucidation, and evidence apparently conclusive has been adduced to show that Cyrenius was twice in command of the province of Syria; and on the first occasion much about the period indicated by the evangelist. In a work on Roman antiquities by A. W. Zumpt (Commentationes Epigraphicæ ad Antiquitates Romanas Pertinentes), there is a chapter on the presidents of Syria from Caesar Augustus to Titus Vespasian; and in the course of his historical investigations the author necessarily comes across the statement of St. Luke regarding Cyrenius, which he properly regards as entitled to consideration in a simply historical respect—the more so, as there are confirmatory statements of a similar kind in some of the fathers (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. i. 5; Iren. Hæres. ii. 22, 6; Tert. Adv. Jud. 9, &c.) In these places reference is made to the fact of a general census being taken at the period of Christ's birth, and also to Cyrenius as being governor of Syria at the time. Zumpt therefore concludes that there is prima facie ground for holding such to have been the case, and proceeds to consider, whether there be any notices in Roman history relating to the period which are capable of throwing light upon the subject. The first, and the leading passage he refers to is one in Tacitus (Annal. iii. 48), noticing the death of Cyrenius in A.D. 21, in which it is stated of this Cyrenius, that he was a man of comparatively humble origin, born at Lanuvium; that in the army he had proved himself to be a person fit for conducting affairs that called for stringent and active measures; that under Augustus he had obtained the consulship; that by and by, for having reduced the fortresses of the Homanadenses throughout Cilicia, he had obtained triumphal badges, and had been appointed rector to Caius Caesar (grandson of Augustus), on the latter obtaining the government of Armenia, in whose company, while at Rhodes, and before actually entering on the administration of Armenia, he had paid court to Tiberius, who was at the time sojourning there. By comparing this with various other statements in Tacitus and contemporary notices from other quarters, it is found that the Homonadenses here referred to as having been subdued by Cyrenius, and on account of whose subjugation he obtained triumphal badges, were the rough and freebooting highlanders in the uplands of Cilicia; and both from the force necessary to overcome them, and from the honours awarded to him in consequence, it is plain that Cyrenius must have had a legion at his command, and in connection with that a province. What, then, constituted the province? Cilicia by itself was far too small to form a province worthy of being assigned to a man of consular rank, with a legion under him; there must have been coupled with it some neighbouring region, which, from its extent of territory and relative situation, admitted of being conveniently associated with Cilicia, for the purpose of being placed under one jurisdiction. And it so happens that Syria, the region on the east of Cilicia, is the only one that can be thought of. For Proconsular Asia was too remote from the Homonadenses, and was besides in a subjugated state some time before this, and made a senatorial province; nor, for the same reasons, could it be Bithynia and Pontus. Galatia adjoined the Cilician territory; but the governor of it had no legion assigned him, and it is also known to have been usually assigned to one of the rank merely of prætor. It is stated by Dio (lvi. 12), that Augustus in the twenty-seventh year of his reign surrendered to the senate all the thoroughly reduced and quiet provinces, the only districts he reserved to himself in connection with Asia Minor were Cilicia and Cyprus. But in B.C. 22 Cyprus was also granted to the senate (Dio, lvi. 4). So that Syria alone remains as a region that could be conveniently joined to Cilicia, to make out a sufficient province for a man of consular rank, and having command of a legion.

There are other collateral notices which confirm the result thus obtained from the passage of Tacitus. For it appears, that both some years before the birth of Christ and some years after, Syria and Cilicia belonged to one province. Cneius Piso was governor of Syria in B.C. 17, and when obliged to levy troops against Germanicus, he sent an order for supplies to the Cilician reguli or chiefs (Tac. Ann. ii. 70, 78), which there is no probability they would have complied with, unless he had had a right to demand what he sought. Besides, Piso himself was afterwards accused by Tiberius of seeking to possess the province of which he had the command; and the evidence of this was, that he was reported to have seized the fortress of Celenderis, a fortress in Cilicia (Ann. ii. 80, lvi. 12, 14). Vitellius also, when president of Syria, about A.C. 36, sent troops to subdue the Cliteæ, who were a people of Cilicia (Ann. vi. 41). So that there is ample evidence of Cilicia having been coupled with Syria, about the period of the Christian era, under one provincial administration.

Supposing then, as we are plainly warranted to hold, that Cyrenius was one of those who had the presidency of the two regions conjoined into a single province, what precisely was the period of his holding it, as indicated by Tacitus in the passage noticed above? It must have been at the time he was rector to Caius Cæsar; for it was the proximity of his province to that of Armenia, obtained by Caius, which specially fitted him for doing the part of rector to the young prince. In this capacity he visited Egypt with Caius, and some other places, but did not accompany him to Armenia; for before Caius went thither, M. Lollius had been appointed rector, and Cyrenius (it would seem) had gone to Rome at the request of the emperor to be married to Lepida, a lady of high rank, who had been destined for Lucius Cæsar, the brother of Caius. But Lucius died in A.D. 2; and connecting this period with the time during which the married life of Cyrenius lasted (twenty-one years), and with the period itself of Cyrenius's death, which was before the close of A.D. 21, it is evident that the marriage must have taken place close upon the death of Lucius. It was about the same time, or very shortly before it, in the year A.D. 1, that Caius Cæsar, after being made consul, set out for Armenia, accompanied by Lollius as rector; and consequently in that year also it must have been, or perhaps the latter part of the year before it, that Cyrenius quitted his post in the East, and was succeeded by Lollius. Several notices mention Lollius in his capacity as rector to Caius, and the part he took with him in Armenia (Suet. Tit. Cæs. 12, 13; Velleius, ii. 102); but there is no evidence that Cyrenius was with him after he actually entered on his office. Before the close of the year A.D. 1, therefore, Cyrenius had held the governorship of Syria and again quitted it—he had subdued the Homonadenses in the Cilician part of the province, a work so difficult and meritorious that he obtained triumphal badges on account of it—he had afterwards for a time held, along with his province, the office of rector to Caius Cæsar on his way to Armenia; and for all this it is impossible to assign a period of less than about four years. He must have entered on his presidency about four years before the Christian era; and that is precisely the term by which the real birth of Christ seems most probably to differ from the vulgar era. Hence the conclusion is, that Cyrenius actually did hold the presidency of Syria about the time of Christ's birth; and as Luke was himself a native (as is supposed) of Antioch, the chief town of Syria, it was quite natural that he should by some brief notice indicate the governor of the province at that important crisis. The proof of all this may be seen at length in the work of Zumpt above referred to, or more briefly in Fairbairn's Hermeneutical Manual, p. 461, seq.

It has been usual for those who look simply to the accounts of Josephus, to ascribe the presidency of Syria at the birth of Christ either to Saturninus or Varus, according as they have placed the period of his birth earlier or later. Josephus certainly speaks of Varus as being governor at the period of Herod's death (Ant. xvii. 9, 3), which in all probability took place shortly after the birth of Christ. And there can be no doubt that Saturninus immediately preceded Varus. The succession, however, as fixed by Zumpt from other sources, stands thus (the dates are those of the common era):—C. Sentius Saturninus obtained the province in B.C. 9; P. Quinctilius Varus, B.C. 6; P. Sulpitius Quirinius, B.C. 4; M. Lollius, B.C. 1; C. Marcus Censorinus, A.D. 3; L. Volusius Saturninus, A.D. 4; P. Sul. Quirinius (the second time), A.D. 6, &c. It is quite possible that, after Cyrenius entered on his province, and in the western parts of it, among the ravines and fastnesses of Cilicia, was subduing the Homonadenses, Varus may have continued for some time in the government of the eastern parts; and hence as the person still exercising in fact the powers of government in those parts, Josephus may be guilty of no historical inaccuracy in the mention he makes of Varus after the death of Herod. Engaged as Cyrenius was elsewhere, either Varus or some other person must for a time have had the command of the troops in the district bordering on Judea.

In regard to the ἀπογραφή, or registering itself, which is associated by the evangelist with the governorship of Cyrenius over Syria, in the absence of definite information, it is impossible to arrive at certainty. It is spoken of in language that seems to denote a strict universality as far as regards the Roman empire: the decree went forth from Cæsar Augustus, that all the world—πάντα τῆν οἰκουμένην—should be enrolled or registered. Expressions of this sort are, no doubt, sometimes used of a definite locality more immediately in the eye of the writer; but as the subject of discourse is a decree of the Roman emperor, it seems scarcely competent to understand the sphere it was to embrace, when so described, as less extensive than the dominions over which his authority prevailed. The decree therefore was for the Roman world, and for Judea and the country around, merely as a part of that great whole. But possibly enough the decree may not have been issued at one and the same time for all; though a general order, it may have been, and most probably was, appointed to be carried into effect piecemeal. The evangelist indicates only two things regarding it—its general character, and the mode and time in which it was brought into operation in Palestine. Nor in this does he say that Cyrenius had any charge of it there; but simply that the time when it was carried into effect was that in which he held the presidency of Syria. The decree, it is not improbable, was connected with some general survey of the empire. During the reign of Augustus, a geometrical survey of the empire appears to have been taken; for it is incidentally referred to by several writers on rural affairs—in particular by Frontinus (De Colonia), who speaks of the measurements made of all landmarks and boundaries in the time of Augustus, and even mentions the name of the surveyor Balbus, who set down in books all the measurements of cities and provinces throughout the empire (see Grosvenor, Harmony, vol. i. for various testimonies to this effect). Yet, what is remarkable, no historian has expressly noticed the fact. There has been noticed, however, a brevarium imperii (Tac. Ann. i. 11; Suet. Aug. c. 102; Dio, lvi. 33), which it took many years to complete, and which must have been based on very extensive returns as to the population of the empire and its resources. The decree noticed by the evangelist Luke had very probably to do with this object, at least it seems to have differed from the census subsequently taken by Cyrenius throughout Syria; for the one had respect to the persons and families of the people (indicated by their repairing to their several cities), and the other to their means and resources; on which account Cyrenius is expressly called an appraiser of their substance (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 1). Whether viewed therefore in respect to the presidency of Cyrenius, or to the political measure represented as having been carried into effect during it in Palestine, there is nothing in contemporaneous history to invalidate, and not a little to confirm, the accuracy of the sacred historian.

CYRUS (Gr. Κύρος, Heb. כּוּרֻשׁ, koresh), the name in Persian for sun, and so precisely corresponding with the Egyptian Phrah or Pharaoh. In Scripture it occurs only as the name of the Persian king who overthrew the kingdom of the Babylonians, and issued the decree for the return of the exiled Jews to their native land, 2 Ch. xxxvi. 22, 23; Ezr. i. 1; 1a. xlv. 28; xlv. 1; Da. v. 31; vi. 28.

The history of Cyrus was from an early period involved in fable and romance, and it has become impossible to separate accurately between the false and the true. Even Herodotus, who flourished only about a century after the time of Cyrus, and who was himself by no means disposed to question very closely the reports that were furnished him of distinguished personages, yet speaks distinctly of the embellishments that had been thrown around the history of Cyrus by those who sought to render the name of the hero great and venerable. He already found it necessary to choose between different stories, and only professes to give the narrative he received from those who seemed desirous of adhering to the simple truth (i. 95). Ctesias, a Greek physician, who lived for seventeen years at the Persian court in the reign of Darius Nothus (B.C. 416-400), though about half a century later than Herodotus, yet had opportunities for ascertaining the truth respecting the affairs of Persia, such as Herodotus could not have enjoyed; and he professed to have drawn his history of them from the Persian archives themselves. But it is impossible to say how far in such a life as that of Cyrus even these were to be depended upon; the probability is, that they were far from presenting an unvarnished tale. Besides, the history itself of Ctesias has been lost; and nearly all we know of that part of it which relates to the times of Cyrus is contained in the extracts preserved from it by Photius. In various things, however, he differs widely from Herodotus; and so again does Xenophon, whose Cyropaedia cannot be regarded as anything, and indeed scarcely professes to be anything, but a historical romance. There must unquestionably have been something very peculiar and extraordinary in the life and career of Cyrus to have given rise to this fabulous tendency; and one can easily conceive that when once fairly begun the tendency would grow, and the materials it had to work upon would accumulate, as the fame of the conqueror of Babylon and the founder of the Persian empire became more extensively diffused. The further from his age, the more difficult would the task of discrimination become. Elements of truth there may have been in the other accounts, which are altogether omitted in Herodotus; but upon the whole, his account is now generally supposed to approach the nearest to the truth of any that have come down to modern times.

The exact date of the birth of Cyrus is not known; but the accession of his grandfather Astyages to the Median throne is ascribed to B.C. 594. Mandane, the daughter of Astyages and mother of Cyrus, was given in marriage to a Persian of the name of Cambyses. So far the accounts of Herodotus and Xenophon agree; but they differ entirely in regard to the relation of Cyrus to Astyages. According to Herodotus, the old king was resolved to destroy the life of the infant as soon as it was born, on account of an unpropitious dream he had prior to the birth; and with this view he got Mandane beside him, during the period of her pregnancy, and committed the child, at the moment of its birth, to his favourite Harpagus, to have it secretly despatched. Harpagus gave it to a herdsman of Astyages, whose wife happening at the time to give birth to a still-born child, the latter was exposed, and the infant Cyrus substituted in its room. The child grew and became distinguished for king-like qualities, which betrayed his origin; and Astyages, incensed at the deceit that had been practised upon him by Harpagus, took the cruel revenge of inviting him to a banquet, at which the flesh of his own son was served up to him in a dish. Harpagus, however, in turn took his revenge; for, when Cyrus had reached manhood, he was incited by Harpagus to aim at the overthrow of Astyages, whose tyranny had made him odious to his people, and a party among the Medes was at the same time organized to support the pretensions of the young Persian. The plan succeeded; Cyrus at the head of the Persians revolted against Astyages, and in the conflict that ensued victory declared on their side; Astyages was deposed, and with him the Median dynasty terminated. What followed was strictly the Persian dominion, though from the connection of Cyrus through his mother with the Median race, and from the Medes readily accepting him as king, the empire he founded is usually styled that of the Medo-Persian. Xenophon represents Cyrus as occupying quite another position toward Astyages. He was brought up at the court of his grandfather, was treated with the greatest kindness and respect, served in the Median army under his uncle Cyaxares, son and successor to Astyages, and, merely as the general and deputy of his uncle, conducted the war against the Babylonians and took the city. The fabulous nature of this account, however, appears from another, and more strictly historical part of Xenophon's writings; for, in his Anabasis (b. iii. 4, 7, 12), he refers to the transference of empire from the Medes to the Persians, and represents it as the result of a civil war. The account of Herodotus, therefore, must be viewed as the more correct; although it is perfectly possible, that either Astyages himself, or one of his sons, may have been for a time associated with Cyrus in the empire, with the view of conciliating the Medes to the change. Cyrus, there is every reason to believe, became, when a comparative youth, and by force of arms, the real head of the kingdom; but—as even Herodotus reports him to have treated Astyages with kindness after the conquest—policy may have dictated the association of Astyages with him in the empire, or possibly Cyaxares, the son of Astyages, mentioned in the erroneous account of Xenophon. These internal relations of the royal house, at the time of Cyrus's accession to power, can only be spoken of problematically; recent investigations connected with the Assyrian and Chaldean remains have as yet thrown no fresh light on them; and the uncertainty which has hitherto rested on the matter is likely still to prevail. That Cyrus became king of Persia, or supreme head of the Medo-Persian empire, admits of no doubt; that he also, as leader of the Medo-Persian forces, successfully coped with the Chaldean power, and made himself master of Babylon itself, by diverting the course of the river, and entering by its then deserted channel into the heart of the city, while the people were engaged in a festive celebration, is likewise sufficiently authenticated. These are the two main facts in the history of Cyrus, which are pre-supposed regarding him in Scripture, and to which very explicit reference was made in Isaiah, even before they actually occurred. (His earlier victories over Croesus and the Lydians are not alluded to.) The point which in this connection chiefly causes difficulty, is the statement in Da. v. 31, which affirms that "Darius the Median took the kingdom (viz. of Babylon), being about threescore and two years old;" and in ch. vi., which speaks of Darius as the king, after the Median conquest, and represents Daniel as prospering under him, and afterwards under Cyrus the Persian. The most common mode of explicating this part of the sacred history has been by adopting the account of Xenophon in preference to that of Herodotus, and supposing that Daniel's Darius the Mede was the Cyaxares of Xenophon, the uncle of Cyrus. An ancient opinion, however, identified him with Astyages; an opinion espoused by Syncellus, and apparently favoured by Da. ix. 1, where Darius is called the son of Ahasuerus or Ahasverosh. This is but another form of the name Cyaxares (as appears alone from Tobit xiv. 15), and Astyages was the son of Cyaxares. In that case, Astyages may be regarded, not as the proper name of the old king, but as a name of honour, which, indeed, there is some reason for supposing at any rate; since it bears some resemblance to the Aidahak, "the biting snake," which was long borne as a title by the old Scythic kings of the country (Rawlinson's Herodotus, l. p. 417, note g.) The personal name of the last Median king, whom Cyrus succeeded, may still have been Darius. The chief objection to this explanation is a chronological one; for the fall of Babylon is fixed by the most careful inquirers to the year B.C. 538; and if the person designated Darius the Mede was the same with Astyages, and then only in his 62d year, he must have been born in the year B.C. 600, which is only about seven years before the date usually assigned for the ascension of Astyages to the throne, and is also at variance with a fact stated by Herodotus, that he was married in his father's lifetime (i. 74). But the dates and transactions of the Median history are not very certainly known; and it is possible that if we had the means of more thoroughly and minutely understanding them, the apparent inconsistency now adverted to might disappear. We must either suppose this, or conclude with Mr. Rawlinson that "there are scarcely sufficient grounds for determining whether Darius Medus of Daniel is identical with any monarch known to us in profane history, or is a personage of whose existence there remains no other record" (Herod. l. p. 418).

The explanation given in Smith's Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography, inclines also to the identification of Darius the Mede with Astyages. After stating that the Scripture notices do not really accord with the representations of Xenophon, and that his account is entitled to no credit, the writer proceeds to state "that a much more probable explanation is, that Darius was a noble Median, who held the sovereignty as the viceroy of Cyrus, until the latter found it convenient to fix his court at Babylon; and there are some indications, on which a conjecture might be founded, that this viceroy was Astyages. It is quite natural that the year in which Cyrus began to reign in person at Babylon should be reckoned (as it is by the Hebrew writers) the first year of his reign over the whole empire. This view is confirmed by the fact, that in the prophecies of the destruction of Babylon, it is Cyrus, and not any Median king, that is spoken of." (But see under DARIUS.)

The procedure of Cyrus in reference to the Jews, after he took charge of affairs at Babylon, is highly honourable to him, and in itself not unnatural. From the position of Daniel he could not remain long unacquainted with the case of the Jews, and, we can scarcely doubt, also would be informed of the things noted in their Scriptures which he had been instrumental in fulfilling. Such information must alone have rendered him favourably disposed toward them; and the comparatively pure form of monotheism, under which he had been reared in Persia, must have still further disposed him to look with favour on those who stood aloof from the idolatries of Babylon—the rather so, if (as there is reason to believe) the reformation effected by Zoroaster in the popular creed, and the recall of the Persian people by him to a purer worship, was coincident with the reign of Cyrus. The divine unity being already received by him as a fundamental principle, and the sun, or fire generally, being regarded only as a symbol of God, he might with perfect propriety say, as he is represented to have said in the decree he issued respecting the Jews, “The Lord God of heaven hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth,” &c..

EXR. 12. But that he opened his mind to the instructions of Daniel and his fellows respecting God’s people, and from these received his more special light, there can be little doubt. And hence, both from his readiness in listening to divine counsel, and the important part he acted in accomplishing the divine will, he is called by anticipation in Is. xlv. 1, “the Lord’s anointed,” for though without the external form, he had the reality of a divine unction, qualifying him for important service in connection with the kingdom of God. It is on this account, and not simply because he was a king, that such language is used concerning him.

After the conquest of Babylon, Cyrus, according to Herodotus, engaged in a war with the Massageteæ, a people beyond the Araxes, and there lost his life. Ctesias represents him as falling in battle with a nation called Derbices, who were assisted by the Indjans. According to Xenophon he died quietly on his bed, and after the manner of a sage, holding serious discourse with those about him. The probability is that he fell in battle, as nothing but truth could have given currency to a report of that description, after so splendid a career. His tomb was at Pasargada, the palace near Persepolis, built on the spot where he defeated the Medes. A description is given of the tomb in Arrian (vi. 20); it was a neat quadrangular edifice, with a low door, leading into a little chamber, in which lay a golden sarcophagus, containing the body of Cyrus. The tomb bore this inscription, “O man, I am Cyrus who gave the empire to the Persians, and was lord of all Asia; therefore grudge me not my sepulchre.” It is generally supposed to have perished, but Sir R. K. Porter has sought to identify it with an extant building (vol. i. p. 498).

DABERATH, written also DABAREH, in the Sept. Δαβρωθ and Δεββα, a town on the borders of Issachar and Zebulun, Jos. xix. 12; xxi. 28; 1 Ch. vi. 72. It was one of the cities assigned to the Levites; and is understood to be the same with the Dabira of Eusebius and Jerome, which they connect with Mount Tabor in the region of Diocæsarea. Robinson supposes the name to be still preserved in Deburish, “a small and unimportant village, lying on the side of a ledge of rocks just at the base of Tabor” (vol. III. p. 210). The ruins of a Christian church are still visible.

DA’GON, a god of the Philistines, with an important temple dedicated to him at Gaza, and another likewise at Ashdod or Azotus, Ju. xvi. 21, 23; 1 Sa. v. 2-7; 1 Ch. x. 10; 1 Mac. x. 83; xi. 4. Also a god of the Assyrians, worshipped under the name of Oannes (Berosus in Cory’s Fragments, p. 22, 23, 30, 31; Assyrian Sculptures in the British Museum; Botta’s great work, pl. xxxi.) The passage in Sanconiatho (Cory, p. 10), which derives Dagon from dagan (דגן) corn, “because this deity was the discoverer of corn and husbandry,” has given rise to much discussion among the learned (Bochart, Hieroz. 1; Beyer, Addit. ad Seldon, p. 285); but as the same authority also affirms that after Dagon had found out bread, corn, and the plough, he was called Zeus Arotrius, it would follow that the Dagon to whom the temples were dedicated was a distinct deity from the Dagon or Zeus Arotrius, the god of agriculture. The derivation from דג (dag), fish, and און (on or aon), idol—DAG-ON—FISH-GOD, is on the other hand much more conclusive and accordant with the principles of formation, and with the root דגה (dagah), which signifies to multiply, to be increased—for nothing can be more prolific than a fish, hence a symbolic form compounded of the human intelligence—man, and of the properties of the inhabitant of the sea—a fish, would be a most significant idol for a commercial and maritime people like the Phœnicians. It seems plain indeed, from the description given in Scripture itself, 1 Sa. v. 4, that the form of Dagon was of this sort—human only in the upper part, but in the lower different, and so peculiar as to present what was properly distinctive of the idol. The words strictly rendered stand thus, "When they arose early on the morrow morning, behold Dagon was fallen upon his face to the ground before the ark of the Lord; and the head of Dagon and both the palms of his hands were cut off on the threshold, only Dagon was left on him"—that, namely, which properly made him the idol he was, and which gave him the characteristic fish-like appearance. The Assyrian sculptures also place before our eyes an actual representation of the Dagon of the Philistines, which exactly corresponds with the description in question; and likewise a representation of the Dagon of the Assyrians, according in all particulars with the account of Berossus. The sculpture from Khorsabad (Botta, pl. xxxii.-xxxv.), represents the building of a port or making of a road from the coast up to some important maritime city, situated upon an extremely steep and rocky eminence; and large pieces of timber for the work are being brought by numerous ships and boats. The prow of the vessels terminates in the head of a horse, the emblem of the Phœnicians and the Carthaginians, and the stern in the tail of a fish. That the wood is brought some distance by sea is intimated by its having to pass two considerable places, one built on a projecting piece of land, a rocky promontory or perhaps island, which may represent insular Tyre, whose king in the time of Solomon supplied all the cedar and fir for building the house of the Lord, 1 Ki. v. 6-10; Ezr. iii. 7; and the second fort, built on the coast, possibly Sidon.

Among a great variety of marine animals, including the shell-fish of the Tyrian dye, the Assyrian combination of man, bull, and eagle, is seen walking with stately gait, and the divinity of the Philistines, Dagon, half man half fish, is likewise accompanying the expedition and encouraging the men. A bull with eagle's wings, but not the head of a man, is seen sporting in the waves. In none of the castellated buildings are any signs of hostility, and we are farther assured of the pacific character of the operations by the presence of the divinity of the coast, and of the Assyrian symbolic figures, uniting in countenancing and aiding some project, probably of defence, executed by the natives of the coast. (For a further account of this subject, see Mr. S. Sharpe, in Nineveh and its Palaces, 3d ed. p. 169.) The sculpture found at Nimroud, and now in the British Museum, represents the figure of a divinity wearing a short fringed tunic, long furred robe, bracelets, armlets, and two daggers. In his left hand he carries a richly decorated bag, and his right hand is upraised in the act of presenting a pine cone. His beard is elaborately curled, and on his head is an egg-shaped cap, with three horns and the ears of a bull; covering the back of this cap is the head of a fish, while the body of the fish falls over his shoulders and continues down his back: the whole figure in short as described by Berossus—"In the first year there appeared from that part of the Erythrean Sea which borders upon Babylonia, an animal destitute of (endowed with, Bry) reason, by name Oannes, whose whole body (according to the account of Apollodorus) was that of a fish; that under the fish's head he had another head, with feet also below, similar to those of a man, subjoined to the fish's tail. His voice too, and language, was articulate and human; and a representation of him is preserved even to this day." In Miss Fanny Corbeaux' admirable papers on "The Rephaim," she has some ingenious speculations to prove that the Chaldean Oannes, the Philistine Dagon, and the Mizraimite On are identical (see The Rephaim, and their Connection with Egyptian History, Journ. Sacred Literature, vol. iii. No. 6, new series).

The temple of Dagon at Gaza was pulled down by Samson, Ju. xvi. 23. When the Israelites were defeated at Eben-ezer, the Philistines took the ark of God and deposited it in the temple of Dagon at Ashdod, 1 Sa. iv. 10, 11; v. 1, 2. After the death of Saul at Gilboa, the Philistines cut off his head and fastened it up in the temple of Dagon, 1 Sa. xxxi. 4, 8; 1 Ch. x. 1, 4, 6, 10. The temple of Dagon at Ashdod was burned by Jonathan, the brother of Judas Maccabeus, about B.C. 148, 1 Mac. x. 84. There was a city in Judah called Beth-dagon, Jos. xv. 41; and another on the frontiers of Asher, Jos. xix. 27.

[J. B.]

It is not unimportant to notice—as confirmatory of the view just given of Dagon worship—that deities of the same description were worshipped along the Syrian coast; in particular Derceto, the female deity of Ashkelon, of which Diodorus testifies, that she had the face of a woman, but the rest of the body was in the form of a fish (αὐτὴ δὲ τὸ μὲν πρόσωπον ἔχει γυναικὸς, τὸ δὲ ἄλλο σῶμα πᾶν ἰχθύος, ii. 4). Indeed, as Creuzer remarks, the word Dagon, from dag, fish, is "the root from which the fish-women Derceto and Atergatis must have been derived. The latter, which assumes so many forms, Atergatis, Atargatis, Adargatis, Argatis, Arathis, Argata, is as to its derivation compounded of addir (אֲדִיר), great, glorious, and dag, fish, and consequently designates the great, the divine fish. The other name, Derceto (Δερκετώ) is only an abbreviated form, and has arisen from the dropping of the preformative syllable; for there still always remains the root-syllable dag, deg, and gad, ged, the essential one in the designation of the fish-deity" (Symbolik, ii. sec. 12). The worship of deities under this unnatural and fantastic form probably had its first rise (as is also indicated by the learned writer just quoted) in the traditions respecting the prevalence of the waters in primeval times, terminating in those of the general deluge; in consequence of which the marine powers of nature seemed to issue in, and give birth to, the dry land and its productions, with man at their head. So that a fish form, culminating in a male or female head, might, according to the crude and idolatrous notions of the ancient Syrians, be a suitable representation of the deity to which they owed their place and being on the Syrian coast.—ED.

DALMANUTHA; what in Mar. viii. 10 are called "the parts of Dalmanutha," appear in Mat. xv. 39 under the name of the "coasts of Magdala." Dalmanutha was probably a village on the western shore of the Lake of Gennesareth, either the same with Magdala, or in the same neighbourhood. But no certain information has reached us regarding either.

DALMATIA, anciently a part of Illyricum, but mentioned separately in 2 Ti. iv. 10 as the region for which Titus had left Paul, while the latter was at Rome. It lay on the eastern coast of the Adriatic Sea, and stretched towards Macedonia.

DAM'ARIS, the name of an Athenian female, who along with Dionysius the Areopagite, is honourably mentioned as having listened to the preaching of St. Paul, and formed part of the infant church which he founded at Athens. Nothing further is known of her.

DAMASCUS [Heb. Dammēsek, modern name esh-Shām], certainly one of the most ancient cities of the world, the capital formerly of the kingdom of Syria, and still the seat of a pashalic, as well as an important mart of commerce. It is situated at the foot of the most south-easterly range of Anti-Libanus, which in that region varies from 600 to 800 feet, but near Damascus rises to 1500 feet above the extensive plain with which Damascus is connected, while the plain itself is about 2200 feet above the level of the sea. An hundred more may be added for the site of the city, making fully 2300; whence it has the advantage of a temperate climate and cooling breezes. It lies in the direction of north-east from the Sea of Tiberias, from which it is distant about 25 hours' or three ordinary days' journey, and as many more are required to complete the distance to Jerusalem. The site of Damascus combines so many advantages in respect to beauty and fertility, as well as geographical position, that a city could scarcely ever have been wanting to it. It forms a convenient halting-place and entrepôt between the northern and southern regions of that part of Asia; and a more desirable locality for the purpose cannot well be conceived. The scenery in the neighbourhood is comparatively flat on every side, except the north; and there the range of hills is peculiarly bare and sterile. Little vegetation is to be seen save in the mountain streams, and particularly in the valley of the Barada, which, however, becomes peculiarly deep and narrow for a considerable space before it issues from a gorge in the mountains, about two miles to the north-west of the city. "One of the impressions," says Stanley (Sinai and Pal. p. 410), "left by the East is the connection between verdure and running water. But never—not even in the close juxta-position of the Nile valley and the sands of Africa—have I seen so wonderful a witness to this life-giving power as the view on which we are now entering. The further we advance the contrast becomes more and more forcible; the mountains more bare, the green of the river bed more deep and rich. At last a cleft opens in the rocky hills between two precipitous cliffs; up the side of one of these cliffs the road winds; on the summit of the cliff there stands a ruined chapel. Through the arches of that chapel, from the very edge of the mountain-range, you look down on the plain of Damascus. It is here seen in its widest and fullest perfection, with the visible explanation of its great and enduring charms. The river with its green banks is seen at the bottom, rushing through the cleft; it bursts forth, and as if in a moment scatters over the plain, through a circle of 30 miles, the same verdure which had hitherto been confined to its single channel. Far and wide in front extends the level plain, its horizon bare, its lines of surrounding hills bare, all bare far away on the road to Palmyra and Bagdad. In the midst of this vast plain lies at your feet the vast lake or island of deep verdure, walnuts and apricots waving above, corn and grass below; and in the midst of this mass of foliage rises, striking out its white arms of streets hither and thither, and its white minarets above the trees which embosom them, the city of Damascus."

The river Barada here spoken of is understood to have been the Abana of the ancient Syrians, called also Chyrsorrhoeas by the Greeks. Its course, after leaving the mountain-range out of which it rises, is along the north wall of Damascus, thence proceeding eastwards through the plain, till it empties itself by one branch into the lake el-Kibljuh, and by another into a lake a little farther north, esh-Shürktjeh. On passing the city, however, as many as nine or ten branches are derived from it for supply to the houses and gardens, as also to feed canals in different directions through the plain. But notwithstanding such draughts, it retains a considerable volume of water, and preserves the appearance of a fine clear stream. The Pharpar, anciently spoken of as also a river of Damascus, 2Ki. v. 12, could scarcely be any other than the A'waj, which rises in Mount Hermon, and flows through the more southerly parts of the plain in which Damascus is situated, till it reaches the lake Hijāneh. It could therefore only be called a river of Damascus, by Damascus being identified with the kingdom of which it was the capital, or at least with the extensive plain in which it formed the chief point of interest. The distance of Damascus from the two lakes into which the Barada falls is about 20 miles, or 6 hours; to the other lake the distance is a little more.

In regard to the city itself, there is nothing now at least (whatever there may have been in remoter times) which is fitted to awaken much admiration in the minds of European travellers, except the copious supply of water, and the pleasant gardens, orchards and baths, which it is thereby enabled to possess. This, however, has its accompanying evils and disadvantages; for the number of reservoirs and fountains scattered throughout the courts, and often even introduced into the parlours of houses, favours the production of mosquitos in the later part of summer and autumn, renders the lower apartments in houses damp, also cold in winter, and is the source of a good deal of ague and rheumatism. It has led too, to the very general practice, especially among the females, though not confined to them, of walking upon high clogs or pattens. Of the streets there are only a few that produce a favourable impression; the greater part are narrow, crooked, and dirty. The principal street is also one of the straightest, and is regarded by the Christian population as "the street which is called Straight," mentioned in Ac. ix. 11 as that in which Paul took up his abode shortly after his conversion. It runs right through the city nearly in the direction of from east to west, and is about a mile in length. That it is not by any means what it once was seems certain. Comparing the past with the present, Mr. Porter says, "In the Roman age, and up to the time of the Mahometan conquest, a noble street extended in a straight line from this gate (the east, Bab-Shurky) westward through the city. It was divided by Corinthian colonnades into three avenues, opposite and corresponding to the three portals. I have at various times traced the remains of these colonnades over about one-third of their whole length. Wherever excavations are made in the line, bases of columns are found, and fragments of shafts lying prostrate under accumulated rubbish. The street was like those still seen in Palmyra and Jerash; but unfortunately the devastations of war, and the vandalism of Arab and Turkish rulers, have destroyed almost every remnant of its former grandeur" (Handbook, p. 477). This street is chiefly remarkable now for the busy scene it usually presents of persons coming and going in the interests of trade and commerce. The houses in this street, as well as others, are commonly built with a framework of timber, filled in with the clayey soil of the plain, the better sort having a few courses of stone at the bottom. Externally they have a shabby appearance; but those of the wealthier inhabitants are highly decorated inside, and are of course richly provided behind with fountains and shrubs.

Among the more noticeable public buildings, though none are very remarkable, is the eastern gate already mentioned, which exhibits some remains of Roman architecture—the castle, which is situated in the north-west quarter of the city, and in its foundations dates from the Roman period, a large and imposing structure viewed from without, but little more than a shell—and above all the great Mosque of the Ommiades, which is understood to have been originally a heathen temple, and afterwards the church of St. John the Baptist. It occupies a quadrangle of 163 yards by 108; is of various styles of architecture; is divided into nave and aisles by Corinthian pillars, has a floor of tessellated marble, and three minarets. There are many smaller mosques throughout the city, upwards of eighty it is said, the domes and minarets of which are among the chief architectural ornaments of the city. The bazaars are of great variety and extent; a particular quarter of the city is assigned to them, and they are separated according to their respective wares and trades. They usually take the form of covered arcades, with a row of narrow shops on each side. The commerce connected with Damascus consists to a considerable extent in goods brought from the East, especially from Bagdad, and from European countries through Beirut. But the manufactures of the place are also of some variety and importance. Its once famous sword-blades, indeed, exist no more; and the fabrics named damasks from the city, though still made there, have lost their ancient renown, and are surpassed by those of European production. About 4000 looms, however, are said to be employed for stuffs of mixed silk and cotton; for cotton alone about 400. Gold and silver thread is manufactured pretty largely, horse and camel gear, perfumes and delicate oils, soap, &c.

The population of Damascus, with its suburbs, is estimated at 150,000. Of these nearly 130,000 are Moslems; while there are about 15,000 Christians, and from 5000 to 6000 Jews. The Christians are subdivided into the various sects of Greeks, Greek-Catholics, Syrian-Catholics, Maronites, &c., the two first divisions, however, constituting by much the greater number. The Christian and Jewish populations have each a quarter of the city assigned to them—both in the eastern part, but the former more to the north, the latter to the south.

History.—The notices that occur in Scripture of Damascus reach back to the time of Abraham; the steward of his house, whom at one time he expected to become his heir, was Eliezer of Damascus, Ge. xv. 2; and as another place, Hobah, had its locality indicated from its relation to Damascus, the latter must even then have been a city of some note, Ge. xiv. 15. Its origin, however, is lost in antiquity, and that it was built by Uz, the son of Aram, and great-grandson of Noah, according to Jewish tradition, cannot be received with any confidence. How it flourished, or through what changes it passed during the generations that followed the time of Abraham, we know not. After the lapse of well-nigh a thousand years, it appears as an important

Syrian city, joining hands with the king of Zobah against David; the hostile league was defeated by the king of Israel, and Jewish garrisons were placed in Syria of Damascus, 2 Sa. viii. 5, 6. In Solomon's time, however, the Syrians threw off the foreign yoke, and under Rezon Damascus became the seat of a Syrian kingdom, 1 Ki. xi. 23-25. This kingdom grew, and in a few generations became one of the most formidable rivals of Israel. Two Benhadads, father and son, waged long and bloody wars with the contemporaneous kings of Israel, 1 Ki. xv. 21; and when Hazael killed his master, and seized the throne of Damascus, it fared still worse with the Israelitish territories. He defeated the combined forces of Israel and Judah, seized the country east of the Jordan, made the king of Israel his tributary, and even levied a contribution of Jerusalem, 2 Ki. viii. 28; x. 32-34, &c. After this warlike operations were continued between Syria and Israel with various success; latterly the two combined against Judah, when Rezin was king of Damascus, with the view of displacing the house of David; but as this warred with the settled purpose of Heaven, the counsel came to nought, 2 Ki. xv. 37; xvi. 5, 6; Is. vii. 1-9; and in a few years more the rising monarchy of Assyria got possession of Damascus, and carried its king and people captive to Kir, 2 Ki. xvi. 9; Is. x. 9. Damascus as the seat of royalty was now, and for many centuries, merged in the great monarchies which successively ruled over that part of the world—the Assyrian, Babylonian, &c. In this state of subjection Old Testament history closes on the fortunes of Damascus; and during the many contests for empire that succeeded, while Damascus often changed its masters, it never became properly the capital of a kingdom.

In New Testament history Damascus is chiefly celebrated as having become the scene, not precisely of St. Paul's conversion, but of his residence for a short time after his conversion, and his first labours in the cause of Christ. Tradition still points to the part of the city wall by which he is said to have made his escape; but the particular wall is known to have been several times rebuilt; and the connection of St. Paul with any part of it rests on no solid foundation. At that time the city was under the sway of the tributary king of Arabia, Aretas (see ARETAS), and is known to have contained a large Jewish population (Josephus, Wars, ii. 20, sec. 2). By and by it became the seat of a Christian bishop, who ranked next in that quarter to the patriarch of Antioch. Among the bishops who took part in the council of Nice in A.D. 325 the name of Magnus of Damascus occurs. But in process of time the Christian influence in Damascus was overshadowed by the Mahometan. The city fell, A.D. 635, into the hands of the khalif Omar. The khalifs of the house of Ommiyeh even fixed their residence in it, so that Damascus again became the capital of a powerful empire. For nearly a century (A.D. 661 to A.D. 750) it sent forth armies that spread terror from the plains of Languedoc (where they were ultimately defeated by Charles Martel) to those of Hindoostan. But the dynasty of the Ommiades at last gave way to that of the Abbassides, which fixed its seat at Bagdad, and governed Damascus by a prefect. Subsequently, the city shared in the manifold vicissitudes which passed over the provinces of Western Asia, till it fell, in A.D. 1516, into the hands of sultan Selim I.; from which time it has remained under the sway of Turkey—the head of a large pashalic, and the most populous and flourishing city which belongs to Asiatic Turkey. Many cities in the East have surpassed it in the extent of their population and the splendour of their edifices; but in tenacity of existence, and the power of retaining a certain measure of prosperity under all dynasties, and through the most varied successions of fortune, Damascus may be said to stand unrivalled in the world's history.

DAN [judge]. 1. One of the sons of Jacob by his concubine Bilhah. The circumstances connected with his birth gave rise, as not unfrequently happened among the covenant-people, to the name by which he was called. Rachel in her vexation at having no children, and with the view of obtaining at second hand what had been denied directly to herself, prevailed upon Jacob to take her maid Bilhah for a concubine; and on a son being afterwards born, she called his name DAN, judge; for God, said she, "hath judged me, and hath also heard my voice, and hath given me a son," Ge. xxx. 6. This son took rank, like the other sons of Jacob obtained in a similar manner, with those born of Leah and afterwards of Rachel herself; and in the blessing pronounced by Jacob on his death-bed, their full covenant-standing is recognized, and the benefits resulting from it distinctly secured to them. Of Dan it was said, with marked reference to the import of his name, "Dan shall judge his people, as one of the tribes of Israel;" that is, he shall have the full tribal position, and his posterity shall be as independent in their separate capacity as those of the other sons. This announcement probably was made in particular to Dan, because he was the first of the sons born of the concubines that came near to receive the blessing; and the judgment of the father in his case virtually determined the question of privilege also for the others. Dan did maintain a respectable tribal position. Though only one son is mentioned as having been born to the father, Ge. xlv. 23, yet at the period of the exodus the tribe stood second in number, having no fewer than 62,700 adult males, Nu. i. 39. These had increased to 64,400 at the close of the sojourn in the wilderness, Nu. xvi. 43. It does not appear, however, that the tribe was otherwise distinguished, or ranked quite in proportion to its numbers; for nothing remarkable is noticed in the history respecting its general influence, and though it was placed at the head of the northern division of the host in the march through the wilderness, Nu. iii. 25, yet when actually settled there a comparatively small territory was assigned it; nor did its people, even within that territory, succeed in dispossessing the original occupants of some of the better positions. The portion assigned them lay on the coast, having parts of Judah and Benjamin on the east, Ephraim on the north, and Simeon on the south. But being in the immediate neighbourhood of the hardy and well-equipped Philistines—for the district lay partly within the Philistine territory—the available land proved somewhat too narrow for the Danites, and they were pushed back into the more mountainous region, where they encroached on the boundaries of Judah, Joa. xv. 33; xix. 41; Ju. i. 34. It is said in Jos. xix. 47, according to the received translation, "And the coast of the children of Dan went out too little for them." In the original there is nothing corresponding to the too little; but by an old interpretation the going out from them, which is in the original, was understood to mean, drawn away from them, so as to leave them with too little for a possession. This however is a somewhat arbitrary mode of interpretation; and the more correct rendering is, "And the border of the children of Dan went from them," that is, away to a distance from their proper settlement, or beyond the district at first allotted them. And the text immediately proceeds to tell how; for it is added, "and the children went up to fight against Leshem (Laish), and took it, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and possessed it, and dwelt therein, and called Leshem Dan, after the name of Dan their father." This is a brief notice of what is related at length in Ju. xviii., with attendant circumstances not very creditable to the religious and moral character of the tribe. The Leshem or Laish referred to stood on the most westerly of the sources of the Jordan, about four miles from Paneas on the way to Tyre, and the settlement formed there by the Danites constituted the extreme northern possession of the Israelites; so that "from Dan to Beersheba" became a proverbial expression to indicate the entire distance from north to south.

The most notable personage connected with the tribe of Dan was the Nazarite Samson, who, being raised up and miraculously endowed by God for the deliverance of his people, gave an additional and specific confirmation to the word spoken by the dying patriarch. Furnishing in the person of Samson one of the judges of Israel, it was true also of Dan, in this more restricted and peculiar sense, that he judged his people; but not even then was he remarkable for the higher attributes of character. Samson's mode of warfare, and we may probably infer the procedure of the tribe generally, strikingly corresponded with the description given in the remaining portion of Jacob's words, "Dan shall be a serpent by the way, an adder in the path, that biteth the horse's heels, so that his rider shall fall backward." By a misapprehension of the proper import of these words, and a misapplication of them to events not lying within their scope, some of the Christian fathers found in them a prediction of the future Antichrist. What they really contain is a characteristic delineation of Dan as a warlike tribe, indicating it as one that should be distinguished less for bold, decided, and magnanimous action, than for sly and effective ambush-work—watching its opportunity to fetch a blow when the objects of its hostility were not looking for it, and making severe reprisals when the victory might have seemed to be won. Such was peculiarly the characteristic of Samson's victorious energy; and the procedure of the tribe in regard to the conquest of Laish was much of the same description. Possibly its proximity to the powerful and warlike Philistines may have fostered this tendency in the tribe, and led them to adopt the policy it naturally gave rise to, as the wisest, sometimes the only practicable one, in their circumstances.

2. DAN was also the name of a city, situated in the extreme north of the Promised Land, as Beersheba at the farthest south. In later times it acquired a bad notoriety from having been selected by Jeroboam as one of the two centres of his idolatrous worship; he set up the calves he made, the one in Dan and the other in Bethel, 1 Ki. xii. 29. The latter place, one can easily see, was well chosen as a rival to Jerusalem, and might catch many who were on their way thither. But Dan was so much on the mere outskirts of the Israelitish territory, that a place more within the district afterwards known by the name of Galilee would evidently, in point of situation, have been more suitable for Jeroboam's purpose; and we naturally imagine that some collateral reason must have weighed with him in fixing upon so remote a position. This we readily find in the preparation that had been made to his hand in that new settlement of the Danites; for at the very first they set up there, and continued ever afterwards to maintain, a species of idolatry. On their way to the place they stole the image of Micah, and carried with them his priest, Jonathan; and the sons of this man, it is said, continued to be priests in Dan, and to minister in connection with a corrupt worship, till the day of the captivity of the land, Ju. xviii. 30, 31. All therefore that Jeroboam had to do, was to substitute one graven image for another, and to adapt the sacred buildings associated with it to a greater throng of worshippers—which the Danites were more likely to hail with satisfaction than to resist as an innovation. It is probably on this account more particularly—that is, from the low moral tone of the tribe of Dan generally, and the share it had in the corruption of the worship of God in ancient times, that in the sealing vision of the Apocalypse, Re. vii., in which by means of numbers derived from the Israelitish tribes— $12 \times 12 \times 1000$ —a representation was to be given of an ideally perfect and complete church, since one of the tribes required to be omitted, that of Dan, was the one actually fixed on. The city that bore the name of the tribe, and some of the most prominent events of its history, were so identified with the work of apostasy and corruption, that it seemed meet to exclude this name from a scene which so distinctly pointed to the election according to grace. The city became early involved in the judgments and calamities which befell the northern parts of Palestine, 1 Ki. xv. 20, and is never mentioned after the close of the Old Testament record; nor has any certain trace been found of it in modern times. According to an ancient opinion, which however is destitute of any solid foundation, the second syllable in the name of the river Jordan was derived from this town. (See JORDAN.)

DANCE. The term used for this in the Hebrew Scriptures (מַחֹל , machol) is derived from a root which signifies to move or leap in a circle, to twist or turn round, and most naturally indicated that kind of ring or chorus dancing, which appears to have come very early into practice on joyous occasions, and in eastern countries still retains its place. That the verb signifies to dance after this manner, in such passages as Ju. xxi. 21, 23; 1 Sa. xviii. 5; 2 Sa. vi. 16, admits of no reasonable doubt. But some prefer taking the noun (machol) in the sense of a musical instrument—probably a kind of pipe; and the Arabic version sometimes renders it by a word that imports a sort of drum. But the ancient translation of the Septuagint gives the sense of dance ($\chi\omicron\rho\omicron\varsigma$), and the highest modern authorities (such as Gesenius and Fürst) take the same view. In all the passages where our English Bibles speak of persons giving vent to their joyous feelings in dances, they have the support both of the most ancient interpreters and of the most competent scholarship of the present day.

The earliest notice we have of the dance in Scripture presents it as an accompaniment to sacred song, and this among the Hebrews appears to have been always its chief employment. The lyrical productions which sought to express the more lively and melting moods of the soul, were found, especially on occasions of profound and general interest, to be insufficient of themselves to represent the strong excitation and rapid movements that were experienced within; the flow of words must be aided by appropriate sounds and actions—by music and dance. So it was on the exciting occasion of the deliverance of Israel at the Red Sea, when the triumphal ode which celebrated the deliverance was sung with music and dancing; Miriam taking the lead, and followed by others of the Israelitish women, Ex. xv. 20. In like manner, at the memorable slaughter of the Philistines which was inaugurated by David's personal victory over Goliath of Gath, the women we are told came out of all the cities of Israel, singing and dancing, answering one another and saying, Saul hath slain his thousands and David his ten thousands, 1 Sa. xviii. 6, 7. David himself at a later period danced before the ark of the Lord, when it was carried into Jerusalem—danced and played on instruments of music with such warmth and energy as to incur the reproach of Michal, for acting, as she thought, in a manner unbecoming his royal dignity, 2 Sa. vi. 5, 16. The usual practice, it would appear, in Israel was to allow the dancing on joyous occasions to be performed by bands or choruses of women; they are very commonly named as the only parties that engaged in it; and this, no doubt, would tend to aggravate in Michal's eyes the apparent indecorum of David on the occasion referred to: he would seem to be doing in the excess of his religious joy what it was hardly proper for a man, to say nothing of a king, to perform. The kind of dance that was usual on such occasions (indicated as already noticed by the etymology of the name) may be gathered from what is still common among the Arabians. "The dance of the Arabs resembles in some respects that of the Albanians, and those who perform it are scarcely less vehement in their gestures, or less extravagant in their excitement, than those wild mountaineers. They form a circle, holding one another by the hand, and moving slowly round at first, go through a shuffling step with their feet, twisting their bodies into various attitudes. As the music quickens their movements are more active; they stamp with their feet, yell their war-cry, and jump as they hurry round the musicians. The motions of the women are not without grace," &c. (Layard's Nineveh and its Remains, i. p. 119). On strictly religious or serious occasions, there would of course be some modification of this energetic action, and on all occasions where females alone were the performers. What still prevails in the East is probably not materially different from what was usual in the time of David or even of Miriam. "The great lady still leads the dance, and is followed by a troop of young girls, who imitate her steps, and if she sings make up the chorus. The tunes are extremely gay and lively, yet with something in them wonderfully soft. The steps are varied according to the pleasure of her that leads the dance, but always in exact time" (Lady M. Wortley Montagu's Letters).

Unless the case of Jephthah's daughter be regarded as an exception, when she went out to meet him on his return from victory with timbrels and dances, Ju. xi. 34, there is no mention among the ancient Israelites of dancing but in connection with sacred songs and religious solemnities. It may have been practised at other times; most probably indeed was so by the more fashionable and worldly portion of the people; but no record exists of it. And as the jealous manners of the East admit of little comparatively of free intercommunion between the sexes, so the practice of what is called promiscuous dancing—dancing performed conjointly by men and women—appears to have been nearly, if not altogether unknown. It was regarded as peculiarly a female mode of expressing joy or affording entertainment; and on those occasions when both sexes did take part in the performance, they seem to have occupied separate places. Such we learn from Jewish authorities was the case in that feast which was more than any other celebrated with demonstrations of joy—the feast of tabernacles; in which, according to Maimonides (as quoted by Alsworth on Le. xliii.), "In the evening of the first good day they prepared in the sanctuary a place for the women above, and for the men beneath, that they might not be together; and they began to rejoice at the end of the first good day. They struck up the pipe, and played on harps, and psalteries, and cymbals; and every one with instruments of music which had skill to play with his hand; and he that could sing, sang with his mouth. And they skipped, and clapped hands, and leaped, and danced, every man as he could, and sang songs and hymns. And it was not the common people that did this, or whoso would; but the great wise men of Israel, the heads of the sessions and synedrions, elders, &c.—these were they that leaped, and danced, and played, and rejoiced in the sanctuary, in the days of the feast of booths." Of professional dancers, such as are known to have been in request among the rich and luxurious families of Rome, there is no trace in Israelitish history; and the daughter of Herodias is the only one in a family of distinction, even in the later periods of the history, who is reported to have excelled in the practice as an accomplishment. That in her, too, it was something quite unusual might naturally be inferred from the extravagant offer of recompense it called forth from Herod, Mar. vi. 22, 23.

Dancing is occasionally used in a figurative sense as an emphatic term for joy or gladness, as in Ps. xxx. 11, "Thou hast turned for me my mourning into dancing." But the figure is so natural, that it can occasion no embarrassment to the simplest reader of Scripture.

DANIEL [God's judge, i.e. one who delivers judgments in the name of God], a name first borne by one of David's sons, afterwards also by a Levite of the race of Ithamar, 1 Ch. iii. 1; Est. viii. 2; but the person with whom the name is chiefly associated, and the only one that bore it who held a prominent place in Scripture history, is the well-known prophet and counsellor in Chaldea. The story of his life, as well as the character of his prophecies, are in various respects peculiar; and to be properly understood and vindicated they require to be viewed in connection with his actual position, and the circumstances of the kingdom of God generally at the time. These mutually throw light on each other; and it is mainly from viewing them too much apart, that objections have been raised both against the credibility of Daniel's life, and the genuineness of certain portions of his writings.

I. We glance first briefly at the leading events of his life as recorded in his book—the only source of information we possess respecting the details of his history. We there learn that he was among the captives who were carried to Babylon on the first occasion of Nebuchadnezzar's hostile invasion of Palestine, ch. i. 1. This statement gives rise to some difficulty, from its placing the assault so early as the third year of Jehoiakim's reign; in that year it is said Nebuchadnezzar came to Jerusalem and besieged it; while in Je. xxv. 1, the fourth year of Jehoiakim is identified with the first of Nebuchadnezzar. It is also in this fourth year that the battle of Carchemish is usually placed, in which Nebuchadnezzar humbled the power of Egypt, and became master of the countries in Asia over which the Egyptian sway had for some time previous extended. Nor can the attack and conquest of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar be well placed before that event; in all probability it did not precede but followed the greater victory. By connecting Nebuchadnezzar's coming against Jerusalem, therefore, with the third year of Jehoiakim, we must suppose that the period of its commencement is given (compare Jonah i. 3, where the same expression is used of a setting out), while in reality the capture of Jerusalem, and the deportation of a portion of its inhabitants to Babylon, was a year later. Two other deportations followed after this; one in the reign of Jeconiah, after an interval of eight years; and the final one on the destruction of Jerusalem, ten years later still, in the time of Zedekiah.

According to the common chronology it was in the year B.C. 606 or 607 that Daniel and his companions were transported to Babylon. His own age at the period is not given; but there can be little doubt that he was in comparative boyhood, having been selected, along with some other of the Israelitish captives, for their comely appearance, good parts, and liberal education, that they might be instructed in Chaldean learning, and become qualified for standing before the king and serving him in matters of state. It is not expressly said that Daniel himself was of the seed royal of Judah; but as the captives of this first period would seem to have been chiefly of the nature of hostages, and as particular mention is made of the princes and the king's seed among them, there can be little doubt that Daniel belonged, if not to a family of princely rank, at least to one of some consideration and influence in Judah. In common with his three companions, who were selected for a three years' training, Daniel received a new name, that of Belteshazzar, which meant prince or favourite of Bel: as if he was now given over and consecrated to the god of Babylon. So doubtless he would have been if he had followed the course which the king of Babylon had destined for him; but another spirit moved in the breast of the Jewish captive, and rendered the Daniel, not the Belteshazzar, the proper index to his public career. It was the spirit of the Jewish theocracy, wakened into fresh life in his bosom and that of his noble companions, by what might have served in less thoughtful and elevated minds to extinguish it. He did not disdain by reason of it to submit to the training appointed for him, and to apply himself to the study of the heathen lore, in which the king desired his proficiency. This he well understood might be serviceable to him, as increasing the materials of his skill and cultivation; and in such departments of knowledge and art he had before him the eminent examples of Moses and Joseph. But in the matter of food—as the law of God had given definite prescriptions respecting what might and might not be partaken of—prescriptions that were sure in some respects to be violated in the preparation of every heathen, especially every royal, banquet—Daniel made conscience of abiding by the divine requirement, and refused to go beyond the simple but lawful fare of a vegetable diet. The remonstrances of the overseer could not shake him from his purpose; and approving himself, as he did, superior to the heathen youths of his standing in wisdom and learning, the experiment which he requested leave to make in respect to his food was granted to him. The result proved entirely satisfactory; he was found to have gained rather than lost in personal appearance by his adherence to the dictates of conscience, which, in the circumstances, could not be regarded otherwise than as an indication of the favour of Heaven.

Having stood so well the trial of the three years'

course of preparation, Daniel was received among the learned men—the magi—attached to the court of Nebuchadnezzar. And apparently not long after—for the matter is assigned to the second year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, ch. ii. 1, that is, after he came to the full possession of the kingdom, which was not (according to the usual computation) till about two years after the subjugation of Jehoiakim—at that early period of his connection with the fraternity of Chaldean sages, an event occurred which at once lifted Daniel to the highest place among the trusty friends and advisers of the king of Babylon. The thing of itself originated in caprice and folly, but it was overruled by God to exhibit in the most convincing manner the insight which Daniel was privileged to gain into the divine secrets. Nebuchadnezzar had been visited by a dream which troubled him, and having meanwhile lost hold of the dream itself, he demanded from the class to which Daniel belonged, both the recovery of the dream and its interpretation; not only demanded this, but enforced his demand by the threat of instant death, if they failed to satisfy his desire. They did fail, however, all excepting Daniel, who after earnest supplication to God, along with his pious companions, had the dream and its interpretation revealed to him from above. The effect of this singular interposition in behalf of Daniel and his companions was, that through them Nebuchadnezzar came to some knowledge of the true God whom they worshipped; while Daniel was at once raised to one of the highest places of trust in the kingdom, and his companions also shared in his elevation.

A considerable period elapsed, during which no incident in Daniel's personal history is recorded, but which, in respect to his companions, was distinguished by the remarkable circumstance of their deliverance from the fiery furnace, ch. iii. This second and still more wonderful interposition of Heaven in behalf of the Hebrew captives must have greatly added to the impression already produced of the living power and presence of Jehovah; and the more so, as the iron will of Nebuchadnezzar himself, not less than the honour of his gods, had been prostrated before the superior glory that manifested itself in them. It seemed, indeed, as if at the close of the transaction the Babylonian monarch had become an intelligent and reverent believer in the most high God. But though some sacred influence may have remained upon his spirit, the sequel too clearly proved that he was not properly weaned either from his idols or from his own over-weening pride. For another—and the only other—occasion in connection with this monarch, which was rendered subservient to the establishment of Daniel's character and position, was one also which betrayed the still unsanctified spirit of Nebuchadnezzar. It was the dream he had—probably at no great distance from the close of his reign—respecting a lofty and umbrageous tree, giving shelter for a time to all the beasts and fowls of heaven, but by and by cut down by a decree from the upper sanctuary, and left with nothing but the stump in the earth, till seven times had passed over it. This dream, after a fresh failure on the part of the wise men of Babylon, Daniel interpreted of the present position of Nebuchadnezzar himself, and the judgment that was impending over him for his heaven-daring pride. It was a trying thing for Daniel to be the bearer of such an interpretation; and we cannot but admire the mingled fidelity and tenderness which appeared in his mode of communicating it. This could not but soften the mind of Nebuchadnezzar at the time; and the view disclosed respecting the approaching future was so remarkably verified in providence, that it led to the issuing of a general proclamation by Nebuchadnezzar, which at once extolled Daniel as superior to all men in spiritual wisdom, and magnified the name of God as alone possessing the kingdom, the power, and the glory among men.

It would appear that after the time of Nebuchadnezzar Daniel's merits had fallen into neglect; for in the next emergency with which his name is associated—that of Belshazzar's feast, with the direful tragedy in which it closed—he was brought to remembrance by the queen, as now a comparatively unknown Jewish captive, but one who had acquired celebrity in the days of Nebuchadnezzar, for the supernatural wisdom and discernment that were found in him, and had been raised to the highest place among the wise men of the time. The Belshazzar here mentioned is called the son of Nebuchadnezzar; but as this word is often used for any near descendant, as well as for the immediate offspring of a person, it is quite possible, and has indeed been generally supposed, that the Belshazzar of Daniel was the grandson of Nebuchadnezzar, and corresponds with the Naboned of Berosus. (See NEBUCHADNEZZAR.) The materials are still too defective for enabling us to pronounce with certainty on the names of those who succeeded each other in the old Babylonian dynasty, and their relations to each other. But there can be no doubt that the reigning king, at the time when the city was taken by the Medo-Persian army, was distinguished for luxurious living, rather than for warlike prowess, and that the city was even surprised by its captors when dissolved in revelry and mirth. The story in Daniel confirms this account; and superadds the intelligence, that the scene of the royal banquet was suddenly disturbed by the appearance of a hand writing certain words upon the wall, which he alone was found able to read and interpret. The meaning he drew from the hand-writing imported the immediate overthrow of the Babylonian empire by the Medes and Persians; and in announcing the fearful import of the vision, he took occasion to connect the impending doom with the sins that led to it, and declared the insult which was that very evening given to the God of heaven, by the profane use of the vessels of his sanctuary to purposes of festive entertainment, to be the filling up of the measure of Babylon's iniquity. So that, putting all together—through this Daniel—this God-judging man, first the mystic lore of Babylon, then its lordly magnificence and pride, and now finally its very existence as an independent empire, was judged and brought to nought, that the word and kingdom of God might stand.

The change of dynasty in Chaldea however did not relieve Daniel from the molestation of adversaries, or secure for him the undisturbed possession of the honour and influence he had won. The very distinction he had acquired, and which appears to have been fully accorded to him by the Medo-Persian conqueror, for the king "thought to set him over the whole realm," proved a source of danger, as it provoked the envy of the heathen governors over whom he was exalted. They therefore concerted a plan for his overthrow, by getting it enacted that no one for a period of thirty days should ask a petition of any one except of the king. On the ground of this foolish and arbitrary statute Daniel was accused of high treason, because he continued as before in prayer to God, and was condemned to be cast into the den of lions. The king found his mistake, when he perceived the advantage that was taken of his enactment; but to maintain inviolate the fixed character of the Medo-Persian legislation, which was pressed by the adversaries of Daniel, he allowed the judgment to proceed—hoping that deliverance might somehow come to Daniel from a higher source. Nor was he disappointed. The faithful servant of Jehovah was miraculously preserved from the mouths of the lions; he came up again unscathed; while those who had sought his destruction, when the judgment they extorted against him was meted out to themselves, fell a prey to the ferocity of the lions the moment they were cast into the den. Thus, under the new dynasty, as under the old, this chosen representative of the cause of Heaven continued to judge the heathen, and to present a living exhibition of the invincible might and glory of Jehovah.

The only other action in which we find him engaged, was one that evinced, not merely his strong theocratic spirit, but along with that his fervent and humble piety, which now enabled him to prevail directly with God, as formerly he had prevailed with men. It was near the close of his long and honoured life, when finding that the period had drawn nigh for the accomplishment of God's purpose to recover the dispersions of his people, and be favourable again to his land, he poured out his heart before God in confession, supplication, and thanksgiving; and, in answer, obtained the remarkable prophecy of the seventy weeks, which were to terminate in the events of Messiah's work and kingdom, ch. ix. This is represented as having happened in the first year of Darius, about the year B.C. 536, which, on the supposition that Daniel was only fourteen years old when he went into exile, would make him now in his eighty-fifth year. He still lived a few years after that; for the vision commencing with ch. x. is referred to the third year of Cyrus; so that he must have reached the verge of ninety before his course on earth was brought to a close. (For the references made in certain parts to NEBUHADNEZZAR, CYRUS, and DARIUS, see the articles at these words.)

The other events that fill up the recorded life of Daniel consist of the series of apocalyptic visions he received. The first of these is assigned to the first year of Belshazzar's reign, ch. vii.—the vision of the four successive kingdoms, represented by so many wild beasts, followed by a fifth under the image of one like a Son of man; the second, which represented, under the images of a ram and a he-goat, the fortunes of the Medo-Persian and Grecian monarchies, with the bearing of the latter on the affairs of the covenant-people, is placed in the third year of Belshazzar's reign, ch. viii.; and the last—omitting the vision of the seventy weeks already noticed, ch. ix.—is connected with the third year of Cyrus, and goes into many detailed representations concerning the operations of the earthly kingdoms with which Israel after the restoration was to be brought into contact, pointing at the close to the final issues of the divine administration, and the consummation of all things, ch. x.-xii. Specific reference will be made to these visions in what follows; and it is unnecessary to characterize them further at present.

As regards the personal history of Daniel, it is only necessary to add, that while he lived to see the proclamation issued for the return of his countrymen to their native land, and had his heart intently set on its accomplishment, he did not himself take advantage of the opportunity given to exchange his heathen abode for a home on Israelitish ground. His extreme age would doubtless form a sufficient reason for his remaining where he was—coupled, it may be, with the consideration that during the short remainder of his earthly life he might be of more service to the infant colony at the seat of worldly power, than if he should go to take part with them in the struggles of their new position, for which also his advanced age well-nigh disqualified him. It is probable that he died in Susa, where he received his latest visions; and that this was the general tradition among the Jews in the East appears from the monument which was erected to him there, and which Benjamin of Tudela reports to have seen, in the latter part of the twelfth century, standing in front of one of the Jewish synagogues. But other reports fix on Babylon as the place of his death and burial.

II. It was not to be supposed that a history of deeds and revelations which partakes so much of the peculiar and the marvellous, as that now surveyed, should escape the attacks of modern rationalistic criticism, as well as of the infidelity which is opposed to everything supernatural and divine. A great many minor objections have been brought into the field—more, however, for the purpose of affording a cover to consciences which are somewhat unwilling to rest their disbelief on simply infidel grounds; but there can be no reasonable doubt that the head and front of the offence taken at the history and the writings of Daniel lie in the extent to which they exhibit the supernatural element, first in action, and then in prophecy. Now, this ground of exception should vanish, with those at least who are believers in revelation, if it can be shown that the affairs of God's kingdom were at the time in such a position as to call for peculiar interpositions from above, and that those exhibited in the book of Daniel are precisely of the kind which the circumstances of the period and the analogy of the divine dealings might warrant us to expect. This, we think, is what can easily be made appear.

The era of the Babylonish exile, coupled as it was with the present downfall of the throne of David, and the scattering of the Lord's people by a heathen power, was obviously a very singular one in the history of the divine dispensations, and if not met by extraordinary manifestations of the power and faithfulness of God, must have proved most disastrous to the interests of truth and righteousness. Something corresponding to it appeared at an earlier period—though in a comparatively nascent form—when the children of the covenant, as represented by the person and family of Jacob, were ready to sink under an accumulation of evils—the most hopeful scion of the family being sold as a captive into a foreign land, where he was for a time treated with cruel injustice, and by and by the family itself involved in the struggles of a severe and long-continued famine. It seemed for a season as if, instead of being destined to benefit the world by the overflow of blessing secured in covenant to them, they were to be overborne by the troubles and calamities which were pressing in upon them from the world. But God could not allow matters to proceed thus; he must vindicating his own cause; and he did so by the supernatural insight which he imparted to Joseph, and which, coupled with the other eminent gifts he possessed, and the remarkable direction given to events in providence, turned the depression of Jacob's family into the occasion of their more marked and blessed enlargement. It was so again at the period of the exodus; supernatural endowments, miraculous interpositions suited to the occasion, became indispensable for the accomplishment of the divine purposes. Now, if we should draw any distinction between these periods in the earlier history of Israel and that of the Babylonian exile, as to the call for special interpositions on the part of Heaven, it is plainly to this last that the preference is due. For after having for a series of ages identified himself with the covenant-people in Canaan, and set up amongst them a throne and kingdom to which he had solemnly promised the heritage of the world, the Lord now, on account of their incorrigible obstinacy in transgression, cast their glory in the dust, and gave them as a helpless prey into the hands of the gigantic worldly power which, in the person of Nebuchadnezzar, seemed to spurn all limits to its dominion. If there had really been no limits—if, for absolute want of power in the religion of the covenant-people and their divinely instituted kingdom, they had been broken and scattered under the sceptre of a heathen monarch—then the power of the world had proved mightier than the truth and faithfulness of God. This could not possibly be the case; nor could it even appear for any length of time to be so, without the most unhappy results both in respect to the representatives of the worldly power and to the faithful remnant of the covenant-people. How were such results to be prevented? No otherwise than we can conceive than by fresh interpositions of divine power, exerted in behalf and through the instrumentality of that faithful remnant, such as might compel the king of Babylon and his minions to see that in them—few and politically impotent though they were—there slumbered a might and a skill, before which their conquerors must own themselves vanquished. The war between God and the world would thus be carried into the enemy's camp, and the weak things of God made to confound what is strongest in man; or, in other words, the higher elements of power which belonged to God's people would be made to shame and overpower the lower, which are all that the world in the very noontide of its glory can bring into play.

Now, the wonders exhibited in the history of Daniel, and recorded in his book, are precisely of the kind that were needed in the circumstances, in order to produce the effect here supposed. This has been well stated by Keil: "The miracles are wrought for Daniel's sake and his companions; they tend to Daniel's glory. The reason of this is to be sought in the position which Daniel was called to occupy; since at a time when God could not manifest his glory in his people as a body, he had, on the one hand, to represent that people in his own person before the king of Babylon, who deemed himself almighty; and, on the other hand, to represent before the heathen, and at the supreme court of the world's heathen monarchy, the theocracy which externally had fallen a prey to the power of the Chaldeans, as well as to strive by his presence for the preservation of God's people, and their return to their own land. It was necessary [not only that there should be miracles, but] that the miracles should assume a powerful and imposing character, in order to make a due impression on the powerful representatives of heathenism; and that they served this purpose is shown by the termination of the exile, and especially by the edict of Cyrus, which does not limit itself to a bare permission for the Jews to return to their own country, but expressly ascribes honour to the God of Israel, as the God of heaven, and commands the building of his temple" (Einleitung in das Alte Testament, p. 459).

Considered in this point of view the question respecting the supernatural events and revelations recorded in the book of Daniel resolves itself into another—whether the cause of the old covenant really was the cause of God, and as such was to be preserved from falling under the power of the world? If it was to be saved from the general wreck which overtook the existing relations and interests of the period, nothing could have accomplished the purpose but some such singular interpositions as are here reported to have taken place in its behalf; and that it did survive when all around perished—nay, sprung into fresh energy of life and action from what seemed the very grave of its existence, can no otherwise be accounted for than by the fact of such interpositions; the extraordinary result is the outstanding and incontrovertible sign of the extraordinary means employed to bring it about. For even if we could suppose that the writings of the other prophets, in particular those of Isaiah, might have contributed, on being made known to Cyrus, to bring about the result, there must still have been found some one like Daniel, who possessed the requisite consideration and influence to communicate that knowledge, and induce the conqueror of Babylon to act upon it. This, in the circumstances, could be no easy matter. And if extraordinary providences may have been required to produce the individual needed for the occasion, they were certainly not less required to sustain the faith and reanimate the hearts of the scattered members of the covenant, so as to keep them from total apostasy, and dispose them when the time came to undertake the resuscitation of their polity. It is impossible to conceive how this should have taken place, without the clearest signs going before of the special interposition of God in behalf of the affairs of the covenant, and the palpable ascendancy of his cause above the powers of heathendom. And that Daniel was the person through whose transcendent worth and living agency the miraculous intervention of Heaven displayed itself, not only the testimony of his own book, but the references made to him by the prophet Ezekiel, afford convincing evidence. In two places he refers to Daniel—first, at ch. xiv. 14–20, as along with Noah and Job an illustrious example of piety and worth in the midst of surrounding degeneracy, though without being able to deliver others by it; and at ch. xxviii. 3, as the beau-ideal of wisdom, which Tyrus in his extravagant self-elation thought it possible to surpass. The earliest of these notices occurs in prophecies delivered probably about fourteen years after Daniel's removal to Babylon—ten after his interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, which laid the foundation of all his greatness; and the other came five years later still, when his excellence and fame must have been known far and wide. There is no ground, therefore, for regarding the allusions in Ezekiel otherwise than as of a strictly historical kind; and they could only have been made on the supposition of Daniel's character and fame having been fully established.

But Daniel as there represented was a type, as well as an eminent saint and a chosen vessel for divine communications. He was, in the true sense, a representative man; his personal history imaged the course which his predictions indicated as destined for the church of God; it prefigured a rise from the lowest depression, and through a long, arduous, often-renewed conflict with the powers of evil in the world, to the highest place of authority, to the mastery of the world itself. The exhibition of this chequered, but ultimately triumphant course, forms the great burden of the peculiar revelations that came through him; and they were given forth—not as in the prophets strictly so called, with a directly hortative aim, and with respect to the immediate wants of the church—but as from his own political position, standing on the world's watch-tower, where he was conversant with its higher movements, and from whence, with an eye illuminated by the Spirit of God, he could descry throughout future time the manifold evolutions of its successive monarchies, till they were finally displaced by the kingdom of God. There was thus a perfect congruity between his calling as a man and his revelations as a seer. His sphere of life brought him into contact with the affairs of empire; and the Spirit gave him an insight into such affairs, both as regards the world and the church, for the ages to come. His book, therefore, in its distinctive character and its grand scope, may be designated the Apocalypse of the Old Testament, as the Revelation of St. John is that of the New.

The prospective circumstances of the Lord's people now peculiarly called for such an apocalyptic insight into the future. The exile formed a new era in their condition, and was the commencement of a state essentially different from what had previously existed. They were never to be altogether gathered again from their dispersions among the nations; and henceforward the kingdom of God was to assume a more diffusive character. As a consequence of this new phase of things, prophecy as an abiding gift and ordinance in the sacred community was presently to cease. Even with the remnant who found their way back to Judea, and maintained a political organization till the times of reformation, there was to be no aid from the living voice of prophecy, except at the outset of their career. And a long dark period of comparative feebleness and adversity was to intervene, during which, with curtailed privileges and a defective political organization, the people of God should have to maintain a struggle with heavy trials and discouragements, sometimes even with the most fierce and determined assaults on their very existence as the covenant-people of Jehovah. The seventy years of exile (so it was revealed to Daniel) were to be succeeded by seventy prophetic weeks, weeks of years, before the great hope of the nation was to be realized, and as well previous to that event, as in connection with it, troubles and desolations were appointed. If there was any period, as Calvin has said, when God might seem to have been asleep in the heavens, it was during the period that elapsed between the close of the Babylonish exile and the advent of Christ. And it could not but prove the more trying to the Lord's people, as the writings of the prophets abounded with so many glowing representations of the glorious future that awaited them. There was therefore a peculiar need, ere the period actually commenced, for those apocalyptic visions, which opened up the vista of the future in a way that had not been done before—which at once announced the happy and triumphant issue, and portrayed the dangers and conflicts through which it had to be reached. Even the particularity of the delineations, which have respect to the nearer future, ch. viii. xi., and which from the earliest times has been an occasion of offence, finds its explanation in the great want of the period—the want of a clear light to guide believers in the midst of the gloom that enveloped them; and in so far as it differs from other prophecies of a like kind—such as 1 Ki. xiii. 2; Is. vii. 8; xiii., &c.—differs only in degree, and much also as the character of the respective periods themselves differed.

One may still further note the congruity, not merely of the revelations as a whole to the circumstances and prospects of the covenant-people, but also of the form and manner of their communication to the respective positions of the parties interested. It was Daniel alone, indeed, through whom all the revelations came, but the first apocalyptic outline was given to Nebuchadnezzar, the representative of the world's monarchies, though he had to wait on a higher wisdom for skill to decipher its import. And hence, as given to one who was conversant merely with the outward form and aspect of things, that vision contemplates the several kingdoms in their external nature and relationships, ch. ii., while the next vision, ch. vii., which stretches over the same field, and exhibits substantially the same general outline, penetrates into the interior of the objects contemplated, and reveals their hidden character. For such a vision Daniel's spiritual discernment supplied the proper receptivity, and therefore it was reserved for him; and even to him was only communicated after he had been in a measure specially prepared for it by the earlier and less profound communication. It was now also that the rise, operations, and downfall of the Old Testament antichrist were fitly disclosed, ch. vii. 19-27, since they concerned the internal, even more than they did the external, affairs of God's kingdom. And to assure the hearts of the true children of the covenant still further—to satisfy them that, however severe and terrible the conflict should be while it lasted, it was only to be a temporary cloud darkening their spiritual horizon—some more detailed visions were afterwards given to the prophet, ch. viii. xi. xii. These disclosed the various workings and evolutions of the earthly kingdoms that bordered on the "glorious land" and its people, and brought out the shifting, uncertain, transient condition of the former in striking contrast with the sure mercies that were destined for the latter.

THE AUTHENTICITY OF THE BOOK OF DANIEL, with the credibility of its contents, has been by anticipation vindicated from the attacks which have been both recently and in former times urged against it, by the preceding remarks, which have had it for their object to unfold the real nature and bearing of the things recorded in the book. For its authentic and credible character, to a large extent, rests on the kind of wonders, and the form of the revelations, which it describes; and the peculiarities attaching to them being sufficiently accounted for by the present and prospective circumstances of the covenant-people, the objections fall of themselves. A class of objections raised out of the historical personages mentioned in the book—Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar, Darius, Cyrus—may also be passed over in silence here, as they will be found noticed, and their groundlessness shown, in connection with the individual names. And, on the other side, there fall to be added to what has been already advanced in support of the genuineness and canonical value of the book, the following important considerations:—

(1.) Its place in the Jewish canon. That it existed there from the period of the completion of the Old Testament canon, admits of no reasonable doubt. The only ground for difference of opinion is as to the reason of its having been assigned by the Jewish authorities to another than the prophetic portion of Old Testament scripture; they have placed it in the Hagiographa, between Esther and Nehemiah. So far, however, from militating against the full authority of the book, or interfering, as was once supposed, some sort of slight upon Daniel, it rather points, as Hävernick has justly stated, in the contrary direction (Commentar, p. 39), for it implies that the position "must have been assigned to the prophet deliberately. Were the book an interpolated one, it would doubtless have been smuggled into the collection of the prophets." The position is to be accounted for partly from Daniel having had simply the prophetic gift without the prophetic office, and partly from his being regarded as the historian—prospective as well as retrospective—of an important period in the divine dispensations.

(2.) The reference made to the book in the time of the Maccabees, as already extant and familiarly known to the covenant-people, is also important. (See especially Macc. i. 54; ii. 59, 60; comp. with Da. ix. 27.)

(3.) So, too, and still more, its recognition by our Lord and his apostles, and that not only as forming part of the Jewish Scriptures, which were collectively stamped as the oracles of God, but as containing explicit predictions of things yet to come. Our Lord, in Mat. xxiv. 25, pointed emphatically to the "abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet," words which at once designate him as a divinely-inspired man, and as the bearer of an announcement which, at the time referred to, was going to find its verification. Christ's familiar appropriation also of the title "Son of man," is based on the prophecy in Da. vii., and the expressions in Mat. xxiv. 30, xxvi. 64, evidently point to the same prophetic word. In St. Paul's writings, 1 Co. vi. 2 is founded upon Da. vii. 22, and 2 Th. ii. 3, 4 on Da. vii. 25, xi. 36; while, in the Apocalypse of St. John, there is a pervading use of the language and the symbols of our prophet. Allusions are still further made to portions of the book in Lut. i. 19 and He. xi. 33. Indeed, there are few books of the Old Testament that have exercised so marked and decided an influence over the New, or have there received an acknowledgment so explicit and full.

(4.) The language, partly Hebrew and partly Chaldean or Aramaic, and both precisely those of the period to which the book belongs, is a strong confirmation of its genuine and truthful character. It is somewhat difficult to assign a satisfactory reason for the alternating manner in which the two dialects are employed; first Hebrew to ch. ii. 4, then Aramaic to the end of ch. vii., and again Hebrew to the close of the book. We cannot say that the historical portions were given in Aramaic as the vernacular, and the more strictly prophetic in the more sacred dialect, for the second and the seventh chapters are both in the fullest sense prophetic. Nor will it altogether do to say with Auberlen (ch. ii. sect. 1), that the Aramaic was used in ch. ii. vii. because in these portions the development of the worldly powers is represented from a world-historical point of view, for in ch. vii., at least, the mode of contemplation is no more of that description than in the remaining chapters. It would seem, as Hengstenberg, after Bleek and De Wette, has remarked, that the change was commenced at ch. ii. 4, simply from the Chaldean wise men being there introduced, and speaking in that dialect; that from the author's familiarity with it he continued for a time to employ it, since, from the acquaintance with it possessed by his contemporaries, it was a matter of indifference whether he wrote in Aramaic or in Hebrew. But however this may be, we can understand how Daniel, to whom both Hebrew and Aramaic were familiar, might at different times have employed both; while we cannot understand, or even conceive, how any imitator, in the age of the Maccabees or later, should have so interchanged these dialects. If the author had really belonged to so remote an age, neither the Hebrew nor the Aramaic of this book (which is the same with that of Ezra and Nehemiah) would have been natural to him; he would rather, in all probability, have written in Greek; and at all events, if he had attempted the older languages of the country, he would never have thought of employing them in the manner that we find practised here.

(5.) There is, finally, displayed throughout the book a correct acquaintance with the manners and usages of the time, such as could only be obtained by a person actually living amid the affairs, and at the period, of which it treats. These, in many respects, differed from what prevailed in the times that followed; and though various attempts have been made to prove the author at fault in some of them, they have all signally failed. Recent discoveries in the department of Assyrian antiquities, as well as the notices of ancient writers, confirm, in all important points, the allusions in Daniel.

[The literature on the book of Daniel is pretty extensive, both in this country and on the Continent. Beside the investigations into his life and writings to be found in commentaries on the Old Testament—such as those of Jerome, Theodoret, Calvin, Melancthon, Calov, &c.—many separate works have appeared in recent times; among which the most important are Hengstenberg's Authentic des Daniel, translated into English, and along with his similar work on Zechariah and the prophecies of Balaam, forming one of Clark's foreign volumes; Hävernick's Untersuchungen über das Buch Daniel; still more recently, and forming an important contribution to some portions of the book, Auberlen's Der Prophet Daniel und der Offenbarung Johannis, &c., of which a translation has also been published by the Messrs. Clark; the portion of Hengstenberg's Christology which treats of ch. ix., Hofmann's Weissagung und Erfüllung, and Kell's Einführung, in the parts which treat of this book, are well deserving of consultation; as also the Exposition of Ros, which has been translated by the late Dr. E. Henderson. Of works by English and American authors, the following among others deserve consultation: Stonard on the Seventy Weeks of Daniel; the Commentaries of Moses Stuart, and Barnes (the latter a highly creditable production, and on most parts of the book affording a very useful help, where also will be found a pretty full account of the literature connected with the subject). Most also of the later works on prophecy, such as Newton's, Davidson's, Nolan's, Fairbairn's, treat at some length of the predictions in Daniel.—In the Septuagint translation and that of Theodotion, various unwarranted additions are made to the book of Daniel; one inserted at ch. iii. 24, the prayer of Azariah, &c.; then at ch. iii. 52, the song of the three children; the history of Susanna, forming ch. xiii.; and the narrative of Bel and the Dragon, ch. xiv. These form no part of the Hebrew text, and in the English Bible are printed separately as parts of the Apocrypha. They were expressly excepted against by Jerome, and though admitted into his translation, were marked by an obelus, as belonging to a different category from the writings of Daniel. They are liable to all the objections which have been urged against the Apocrypha, and which need not now be repeated. There are also specific errors in them, such as calling Daniel a priest, and the affirmation that serpents were worshipped at Babylon.]

DARIUS is the Greek form of what in Hebrew reads Darjaveah, דַּרְיָוֶשׁ; and this again is now understood to be a Hebraistic modification of the Darheush or Daryush which has been found in a Persepolitan inscription. Dara, in modern Persian, means lord, and this, either with the formative termination sh, or with an abbreviation of kshah, king, made the name Darheush, which the Hebrews pronounced Daryavesh, and the Greeks Dareius or Darius. Adhering to the Greek form of the name, which is most familiar to modern ears, Darius appears in Scripture as the name of three kings.

1. DARIUS. The first person of this name, is the one mentioned in Da. v. 31; vi. 1; ix. 1, where he is called "Darius the Median," "son of Ahasuerus (Ahashverosh), of the seed of the Medes," and is represented as having taken the kingdom of Babylon, or being "made king over the realm of the Chaldeans." This, it has often been asserted, is contrary to fact, as Cyrus was the conqueror of Babylon, and the first Darius who reigned over the Medo-Persian empire was Darius Hystaspes, who succeeded Cambyses, the son of Cyrus. It is true that the Greek historians so represent the matter. According to Herodotus and Ctesias, the line of Median kings closed with Astyages, and the empire was transferred to the Persian Cyrus; so also Diodorus Sic., Strabo, Polyænus. Xenophon, however, ascribes to Astyages a son, whom he calls Cyaxares; a name which has been shown by Scaliger (De Emend. Temp. l. vi.) and Vitranga (Obs. Sac. ii. p. 308) to be identical with Ahashverosh, the Greek Xerxes. And as those Medo-Persian names were all of the nature of titles, it is supposed by the authors referred to, and many others, that the Darius of Daniel was the Cyaxares of Xenophon. This view is confirmed by the testimony of Josephus, who calls Darius the son of Astyages, but adds that he was known to the Greeks by another name (Ant. q. x. 11). And under the word Darics, a gold coin, Suidas has the explanation that it was "so named, not from Darius the father of Xerxes, but from another and more ancient king;" which again is confirmed by the fact of this coin being mentioned in the books of Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah. The chief difficulty in this explanation arises from the different parts assigned to the son of Astyages in Xenophon and Daniel respectively; in the former, Cyaxares has nothing to do personally with the conquest and government of Babylon, while in Daniel Darius is represented as both getting possession of Babylon and living for some time in it. On this account the supposition has lately been made (Smith's Dict. of Ancient History and Mythology) that the Darius of Daniel was probably the first governor of Babylon under Cyrus, and that he is viewed as the actual sovereign till Cyrus himself found it practicable to take charge of the kingdom. But this view seems to create as many difficulties as it solves, and cannot be regarded as satisfactory. In particular, it leaves unexplained those passages, both in Scripture and in profane authors, which ascribe the overthrow of the Chaldean power to the Medes in combination with the Persians, and indeed sometimes to the former even more promi-nently than the latter. (Da. v. 28; Is. xlii. 17; Je. i. 11; Joseph. Ant. x. 11, 4; also a passage in Abydenus, quoted from Nugasthenes, and referred to by Bertholdt in his excursus upon this subject.) And if Darius had been merely a viceroys, appointed by Cyrus for a time, we cannot understand why his reign should have been spoken of as an independent thing, and lasting till that of Cyrus the Persian. In short, there seems as yet no satisfactory unravelling of this part of ancient history; and as matters stand, we must simply hold that there is evidence to believe in the existence of a Median monarch at the time of the capture of Babylon (called Darius in Daniel), but one who seems to have occupied little more than a nominal place, and that the real power was in the hands of Cyrus.

2. DARIUS. The second person spoken of in Scripture under the name of Darius, Est. iv. vii.; Hag. i. 1; Zec. i. 1, there can be no doubt is the well-known Darius Hystaspes of history, who succeeded the usurper Smerdis in B.C. 521. He carried into execution the decree of Cyrus regarding the rebuilding of the temple at Jerusalem, and the re-establishment of the Jews in their ancient territory.

3. DARIUS. He is named, Na. xii. 22, as the king up to whose time the succession of the priests was registered. The probability is that this was the Darius Nothus of the Greeks, who ascended the throne B.C. 423—that is, only a few years after Nehemiah's time; but some understand by it Darius Codomannus. (See JADDUA.)

DARKNESS, in the physical sense, is on three occasions very specially noted in Scripture. The first is at the period of the creation, when darkness, it is said, "was on the face of the deep;" the dispelling of which, by the introduction of light, was the commencement of that generative process by which order, and life, and beauty were brought out of the primeval chaos. (See CREATION.) The second relates to the period of Israel's deliverance from the land of Egypt—a visitation of peculiar darkness, "darkness that might be felt," being one of the plagues that were found necessary to break the iron will of Pharaoh, and induce him to let the people go. (See PLAGUES OF EGYPT.) The third occasion was the awful moment of our Lord's crucifixion, during which St. Matthew relates that "from the sixth hour there was darkness over all the land unto the ninth hour," ch. xxvii. 45. It is rightly rendered "over all the land;" for though some, chiefly ancient writers, have insisted on adhering to the more general import of the original (ἐπὶ πᾶσαν τὴν γῆν), "over all the earth," and have sought out certain notices which seem to favour their opinion, there can be little doubt that the other view is the correct one. It was only in the land of Judea, where the tragedy of the crucifixion was proceeding, and where alone any sense of its enormity, or even any knowledge of its existence, might be found, that the exhibition of a prevailing darkness could carry an intelligible significance. The world at large had not as yet come into contact with the person and the claims of Jesus; and beyond the theatre of his earthly ministry the darkness attending his crucifixion would have been as little in place as the miraculous attestations that heralded his birth, or the earthquake that opened the graves of many at his resurrection. It is, therefore, a mistaken zeal which prompted the inquiry after a universal darkness in connection with the death of Christ. But how that local darkness, which overspread the land of Judea, was produced, is a point on which no information has been given, and on which it is needless to speculate. The fact of its having been at the time of full moon, and when consequently the moon could not come between the earth and the sun, puts the supposition of an eclipse out of the question. It is enough to say that, as the divine purpose required at the time a supernatural darkness in attestation of the appalling nature of the work which was in progress, so, by some means or another, a peculiar obscuration of the sun's rays was effected sufficient to strike an awe into the minds of thoughtful observers.

As a symbol of spiritual truths and ideas, darkness has a somewhat varied application in Scripture, founded on the different properties and effects of the natural phenomenon. With reference to the obscurity in which darkness wraps the objects of nature to one's view, it is often used as an emblem of spiritual blindness, of total or comparative ignorance of the things of God's kingdom, as when it is said, "darkness covers the earth, and gross darkness the people," Is. lx. 2; "the darkness is past, and the true light shineth," 1 Jn. ii. 8; "the light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehended it not," Jn. i. 5, &c. With respect, again, to the gloom in which things are enveloped when covered with darkness, this naturally becomes significant of sorrow and distress; hence, "the day of darkness" is an expression for the season of sore trouble and calamity, Joel ii. 2; Is. viii. 22; ix. 1; xiii. 10, &c.; and "outer darkness" is the term used by our Lord to indicate the blank despair and unrelieved wretchedness of hell, Mat. viii. 12; xiii. 13. Still again, as darkness affords a convenient pretext and covering for the performance of deeds which shun the light of day, so "the works of darkness" is employed to designate the more flagrant exhibitions of unrighteousness, Ep. v. 11. Finally, from the awe which intense darkness produces upon the mind, the sense of profound and solemn mystery which it awakens respecting the scenes and operations around us, it appropriately images the Godhead in its more mysterious and awe-inspiring manifestations; so God is represented as dwelling in the thick darkness, and having clouds and darkness round about him, 1 Ki. viii. 12; Ps. xcvi. 2; while, in respect to the purity of his character and the everflowing riches of his goodness, he is also said to be light, and to have in him no darkness at all, 1 Jn. i. 5.

DATHAN [belonging to a fountain], one of the chiefs in the tribe of Reuben, who took part with Korah in his rebellion against the authority of Moses and Aaron. (See KORAH.)

DAUGHTER is used in Scripture, like SON, with some latitude. Even when referring to natural relationships it is not confined to those of the first degree, does not simply indicate the immediate female offspring of any one, but includes also the more distant relatives and descendants; such as daughter-in-law, niece, and sometimes even sister, Ra. iii. 18; Ge. xxiv. 17. More generally still it is used of the female branch of a line, or the female portion of a community, as in the expressions, "the daughters of Moab," "the daughters of the Philistines," "the daughters of Aaron," Num. xix. 1; 2 Sa. i. 20; Lu. i. 5. Then, as cities were very commonly personified as women, they naturally had the designation given to them of daughters of the country to which they belonged—as the daughter of Zion, the daughter of Jerusalem, or, as some prefer putting it, the daughter-Zion, the daughter-Jerusalem, taking the particular city as in apposition with the term daughter, which indicates its relation to the country. (See Hengstenberg on Pa. ix. 14.) If, according to the other method, we take Zion, Jerusalem, as the mother that has the daughter, then by daughter must be understood the people who inhabit the city—its living progeny. It seems upon the whole better, and more in accordance with the oriental style of thought, to regard the city itself as the daughter; the offspring of the country as the seat of art and active occupation, much as the branches of a tree are also called its daughters, because springing from it and sustained by it—for example in Ge. xlix. 22, "a fruitful bough, whose daughters (branches) run over the wall." And finally, as a person may be regarded in some sense as the product of the time or period that has passed over his head, so the daughter or the son of so many years is a Hebraistic mode of indicating the age to which one has attained; thus Sarah is designated in the original "a daughter of ninety years," Ge. xvii. 17.

DAVID [beloved], one of the most renowned names in sacred history, and one that has perhaps more interesting and endearing associations connected with it than any other in Old Testament times. David was indeed, as Bayle long ago remarked, "one of the greatest men in the world"—although Bayle himself, in his article on the life of David, certainly did what he could to diminish the greatness, by presenting in as odious a light as possible the sins and infirmities that marred the perfection of David's character.

Early life.—David was the son of Jesse of Bethlehem, the youngest of eight sons, 1 Sa. xvi. 11. The precise period of his birth cannot be ascertained; but supposing him to have been fifteen or sixteen years old at the time Samuel was sent to anoint him king (which cannot be far from the mark), his birth may be assigned to B.C. 1084 or 1085. Of his boyhood nothing whatever is recorded; but as his father was the lineal descendant of Boaz, the grandson of that "mighty man of wealth," we may reasonably infer that the family was in good circumstances, and that the earlier years of David were spent in ease and comfort. It makes nothing against this that on the first occasion of his appearing on the stage of sacred history, he had to be brought from tending his father's flocks; for according to the simple manners of those times, the sons of even wealthy families took part in such employments; Boaz himself shared in the labours of the harvest-field. In that particular line of employment also, to which, whether from personal inclination or from respect to parental authority, David gave the early flower of his life, we cannot but perceive an important means of training and preparation for his future career. He thus became acquainted with the solitudes of nature; knew what it was to make his home in gloomy caverns and desert wilds; and while, in the ordinary tenor of life, finding ample opportunity for silent thought and heavenward musings, he was not without scope for active energy and stirring adventure, in climbing, as he must oft have done, the rocky heights or deep ravines with which the pastoral districts in the south of Judah abound, and in defending his flocks from the assaults of the beasts of prey that occasionally issued from the wilderness. David himself at a later period mentions two encounters of this description, in one of which a bear, and in another a lion, fell under his hand, 1 Sa. xvii. 35. In a further respect, too, there was a fitness in the scenery and the occupation; for though the country in that part of Palestine presents no grand or very fascinating aspects, yet in its elevated, open, undulating character—its bare hills varied with fertile fields and vine or olive clad slopes—with the vast desert stretching away to the south, and on the east the ever-memorable region of the cities of the plain, and the mountain ridges of Moab lying beyond—in a pastoral country like this, David's youthful mind had enough to kindle its love of nature, and fill it with many profound and interesting associations. Neither the scenes it presented, nor the employments it called him to engage in, could be lost on one in whose soul breathed the spirit of sacred song.

The purpose of God to reject Saul and his family from the throne of the kingdom, brought David at once from the depths of obscurity to a prominent place in Israelitish history. We only know of him as Jesse's son, when we hear of his distinction by divine appointment, and solemn consecration to the highest office in the commonwealth. Saul had been chosen because the desire of all Israel was toward him; but the divine sovereignty manifested itself so peculiarly in the case of David, that no one suspected—not even the prophet employed on the occasion, nor the members of Jesse's family—that the election was to fall on him. One after another of Jesse's sons was made to pass before Samuel, but with no other result than of giving him to understand that still the object of the Lord's choice was not there; and it was not till the prophet had asked whether there were not a son still remaining, that the real object of search came into view. This was David, who at the time was in the fields tending his father's flocks; but on being sent for and appearing, the divine voice whispered in the ear of Samuel, This is he; "and Samuel took the horn of oil and anointed him in the midst of his brethren," 1 Sa. xvii. 12. It was emphatically the Lord's doing; no man, if left to his own imaginings, would have thought of choosing this youthful shepherd to the high but hazardous position of becoming the rival and successor of the house of Saul. Yet there was something in his appearance, it would seem, which, young and inexperienced as he was, gave promise that the choice might one day find its full vindication; for he was of winning aspect and goodly to look upon. Nature had already in the youth given assurance of a man; but greatly more than nature even in her highest gifts and endowments was needed for the lofty undertaking devolved on the son of Jesse. Chosen to do the part of a man after God's own heart, and to found a kingdom in which God's mind and will were to be carried out, in opposition to the rebellious strivings and headstrong violence of man, he must be in an especial manner a vessel of grace; and so, what was symbolized by the anointing presently took effect, and "the Spirit of the Lord came upon David from that day forward." Spiritual endowments were conferred upon him corresponding to the high place and calling he had received.

There can be no doubt that the specific object of the anointing was to set apart David as the future possessor of the throne, and that Samuel was perfectly cognizant of its full import; for the word that came to him was, that he should go to the house of Jesse in order to anoint one of his sons to be king; and precisely on this ground Samuel at first expressed his unwillingness to execute the commission, lest Saul should hear of it, and kill him, 1 Sa. xvi. 1, 2. It does not appear, however, that the prophet gave any distinct explanation of the matter to the family of Jesse. The transaction appears rather to have been done as a kind of mystery; and it seems probable from the narrative, that while the family of Jesse witnessed the anointing of its youngest member, they were left to gather from the result what was its ultimate aim. The whole, possibly, they could gather from it in the meantime, was that David was set apart for some special service to God, and was to be furnished for his mission with appropriate gifts. How much more David himself knew we cannot tell; the prophet may have communicated to him privately a further disclosure of the divine purpose, which we cannot doubt David himself would be anxious to obtain. But whether he got this at the time or not, he must have perceived, from the very nature of his position, that it was only gradually the purpose of God concerning him could reach its destined aim; and that the high sphere he was called to occupy must be won by high service previously rendered. We are not on these accounts, with some (Ewald, Gesch. des Volkes Is. ii. p. 519; Eisenlohr, Das Volk Is. i. p. 199), to bring into suspicion the historical verity of the outward anointing, as if it were but a symbolical representation, under the guise of history, of David's internal call to the destiny that was before him. In a case like David's the internal call must have had an external occasion on which to ground itself; and as the end to be reached was not merely a position of honour or influence in God's kingdom, but a divine office, to which consecration by oil through the hands of a competent party had already become the recognized seal, nothing short of this could have satisfied and sustained the mind of David in the desperate struggle that lay before him. Besides, incidental notices which occur in later parts of the history show that others, even in the opposite interest, had become cognizant of David's appointment to the kingdom, as if some decisive act on the part of God concerning it had come to their knowledge. Saul himself, in one of his melting moods, declared his belief that David should surely be king, and that the kingdom of Israel should be established in his hand; and Jonathan had virtually confessed as much some time before, 1 Sa. xx. 15; xxiv. 20. At the close of the struggle, when the tribes of Israel came to Hebron to acknowledge David as king, and have him publicly consecrated, they came with the testimony that the Lord had called him to feed his people, and be the captain over Israel, 2 Sa. v. 2. Abner also, somewhat earlier, puts it even more strongly; for he speaks of the Lord having sworn to David concerning the kingdom—apparently pointing to some notable and overt procedure regarding it, 2 Sa. iii. 9. In short, comparing one part of the history with another, we cannot dispense with the historical reality of David's consecration by Samuel; this was the fundamental ground at once of his own hopes and aspirations, and of the general recognition of his claim; and the fresh anointing that took place at Hebron can only be regarded as the national response to what had been long previously and as in a mystery transacted at Bethlehem.

From his anointing to the beginning of his reign.—The new calling and endowments of David presently began to discover themselves—but at first only within the comparatively humble sphere of private life. Higher things, however, than the tending of the flocks now at times engaged his attention; for when mentioned, as he next is, in connection with Saul's spiritual malady, we find him commended by one of the royal attendants as one whom he knew to be "cunning in playing, and a mighty valiant man, and a man of war, and prudent in discourse;" he added also, "comely in person, and the Lord is with him." This does not necessarily imply that David had already taken part in warlike expeditions, and distinguished himself on the field of battle, for which up to the period in question he could have had little or no opportunity. But it indicates that God, who had called David to a higher sphere of life, had also prompted his mind to the employments and pursuits which were to fit him for reaching and filling it aright. His poetical spirit and fine taste, which were afterwards to be turned to such noble account, had been seeking improvement, and meet exercise, by the use of the harp; already, perhaps, wedding sweet music to immortal verse. And as in those comparatively rude and disjointed times eminence in public life required as an indispensable condition skill and bravery in war, he also applied his energies in this direction, and became expert above his fellows in the handling of military weapons, and remarkable for the heroic bearing which bespoke the capacity for their suitable employment. Then, doubtless, as he was under God's special training, opportunities of a certain kind were from time to time afforded him, both for the display of his gifts, and for his acquiring the confidence in them which it was essential he should possess. Of such a kind, particularly, was the occurrence respecting the lion and the bear, to which reference has already been made, and the report of which could not fail to spread to some distance. But we may be sure there were others also of a like kind, calculated to deepen the impression, though no special notice is taken of them in the brief narrative of his early life. And it was perfectly natural, that when an occasion was presented at the court of Saul for the use of some of his peculiar gifts, there should have been one at hand who in the providence of God was able to testify to their existence and bring them into notice.

The occasion, we are told, led to David's introduction to the presence of Saul, and his employment for a time around his person. When Saul heard of David's skill as a harper, he sent a request to Jesse that he would cause David to repair to him; and Jesse, not only complied with the request, but himself also went, carrying some presents for the royal household. The object, too, contemplated by the proposal, we are informed, was gained; David's music quieted the morbid and gloomy workings of Saul's bosom, so that he "loved David greatly," and he asked and obtained permission from Jesse to let the young stranger continue with him. It is even said he made David his armour-bearer. But this must have lasted for but a short season; and it is even difficult to account for what follows, on the supposition of David having stood for any period of time in the presence of Saul, and been much about him as armour-bearer. For when David, in the next scene described, stepped forth and accepted the challenge of the Philistine, there was an apparent ignorance respecting him on the part of Saul and those about him, which it is not quite easy to understand. Various efforts have been made to get rid of the seeming anomaly—some by transposing portions of the text, others by altogether omitting portions, on the ground of their being later interpolations, &c.—but without producing any satisfactory result.

The more probable view of the matter is, that the difficulty arises from the brief and somewhat fragmentary character of this part of the sacred memoir. The account of the affair with Goliath, contained in ch. xvii., has all the appearance of a separate and independent piece at first—probably written for the purpose of being handed about, as an authentic and full narrative of a most memorable transaction, and inserted by the historian just as it stood. Hence, in this portion of the narrative a fresh statement of David's family relationships is given, ver. 12-14, as if nothing had been said about them before. Yet even here a pre-existing connection is implied between David and Saul, in the passing intimation that "David went and returned from Saul to feed his father's sheep at Bethlehem." The original connection had been speedily broken up, probably by the report of warlike preparations on the part of the Philistines summoning the king to active duty; and David had been too much occupied during his brief sojourn at Saul's court with his artistic employment as harper, to become much known in any other line. For his nomination to be one of Saul's armour-bearers imports little as to any peculiar intimacy with Saul. Joab, we learn, had no fewer than eighteen armour-bearers, 2Sa. xviii. 15; and it is likely Saul had a still greater number. The name was probably given to David at first very much as a kind of court-distinction; without involving anything like the necessity of personal attendance in warlike operations, such as those which were required to meet the Philistines. David therefore returned to Bethlehem, and resumed his original occupation, in order to allow his elder brethren to join the army of Israel. He might the rather do so, as he must have perceived that it could not be in the capacity of a common soldier he was to find the road to eminence opened for him. But yet, after what had already happened, there could scarcely fail to be some kindlings of desire and hope in his bosom, perhaps some moving impulses of the Spirit, instinctively drawing him toward the field of conflict, as soon as the camps of Israel and the Philistines had come to be pitched in hostile array against each other. When so drawn thither, the fitting occasion presented itself in the proud and insolent defiance that was hurled by Goliath of Gath against the host of Israel. He saw with shame the hearts of his countrymen quailing before the heathen champion; and felt constrained by the Spirit of God to accept the challenge, and wipe off the reproach. Already the zeal of the Lord's house consumed him; and in spite of fears suggested by the timid, and taunts thrown out even by his own brethren, he went forth to grapple in mortal conflict with him who defied the armies of the living God. There was no faltering in his step; his heart was strong with heroic confidence for the occasion; but it was confidence in the might and faithfulness of God, rather than in the skill and prowess of his own arm, and a confidence that could throw itself back for support on earlier experiences of the divine interposition. Nor was it now misplaced; the giant adversary fell under the God-empowered shepherd of Bethlehem; and catching the spirit of this youthful hero, the hitherto abashed forces of Israel rose as one man, and put the embattled host of the Philistines to rout.

The impression produced by this action was immense; not merely the thing done, but the spirit and manner of doing it, rose far above the sphere of ordinary life.

It was as if a higher being had suddenly alighted upon the scene, and made a new era to emerge in the affairs of Israel. No wonder that men's minds were astounded, and that even such as were not entire strangers to David began to ask who he was. It is in this way we would account for the interrogation of Saul, "Whose son is this stripling?" It does not necessarily imply that he was totally unacquainted with David; possibly enough he recognized in him the stripling harper, who had been for some time in his own employment; but now the youth had sprung into such higher being—so noble a heroism breathed in his words and behaviour, that the little Saul had known of him seemed by no means adequate to account for what now appeared; and he could not but think that the youth who could speak and act thus must have had some peculiar training. It was quite natural in the circumstances; and another peculiarity in the narrative—one which has often been the occasion of difficulty, or of formal objection, that, namely, of David's being said to have taken the head of Goliath to Jerusalem—may find its explanation in the original design of the narrative, already adverted to. For if it was intended to present a sort of rounded and complete view of David's history in reference to this important transaction, which, in a sense, laid the foundation of his future greatness, the ultimate destination of the head of Goliath might fitly enough have been noticed at the close of the narrative, although it was not till a considerable time afterwards that the circumstance actually occurred. At the same time there is nothing in the known relations of the period to have prevented its being done immediately; for the scene of conflict was at no great distance from Jerusalem; and though the fortress of Zion was not taken till David became acknowledged king, the city of Jerusalem was from an early time occupied in part by the Israelites, Ju. i. 21.

The greatness of David's success in this remarkable conflict proved the occasion of unexpected trouble; for the ascription of higher praise to him than to Saul in the songs with which the women greeted the conquerors—"Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands"—roused the morbid jealousy of Saul, and prompted the question respecting David, "What can he have more but the kingdom?" Such a thought would probably never have crossed his mind, but for the solemn announcement made to him some time before by Samuel, that the Lord had rejected him from being king, and had given the kingdom to a neighbour of his that was better than he, 1Sa. xv. 28. Thence it became impossible to shut his eyes to the probable result that seemed heaving in prospect, and thinking of David as the neighbour destined to occupy his throne. He eyed him, therefore, from that day forward. Yet the secret conviction that the hand of God was in the matter—the excellence also which shone forth in David, his winning manners, and prudent behaviour, which were equal to his prowess in war, rendered it advisable for Saul in the meantime to suppress his feelings, and proceed by stratagem rather than by open violence. But he could not control himself; and in the part he actually played, stratagem and violence, deceit and cruelty, alternated with each other. Even in the first deliberate attempt against the life of David there was something apparently of both; for the evil spirit, it is said, came upon Saul, and he prophesied (i.e. assumed somewhat of the frenzied air and excited manner of a prophet), and availed himself of this extraordinary state and humour of the moment to strike at David with his javelin. David, however, was on his guard, and the blow missed its aim, 1Sa. xviii. 10, 11. It would appear that something of a like kind was tried a second time, for it is stated that David avoided out of Saul's presence twice; so that a feeling of awe seemed to spring up in the mind of Saul respecting David, as toward one under the special protection of Heaven, and visibly partaking of the divine blessing. He would therefore resort to other and more covert methods: give him command of a troop of soldiers, that he might be exposed to the perils of war; send him on an expedition against the Philistines, in the hope of having him slain by their hands; even wed him to his daughter, on condition of his producing an hundred foreskins of the Philistines, hoping that he should lose his life in the attempt to make it good. But all in vain as regarded the great object of Saul's ambition: David prospered whithersoever he went, rose higher and higher in the general esteem, and was not only married to Michal, Saul's daughter, but greatly loved by her, and by Jonathan her brother. These members of the royal family did what they could to appease the brooding jealousy and dislike of their father. David himself at intervals still tried the charmed influence of his harp; and Jonathan put not his honour merely, but his very life in jeopardy, that he might secure for David upright and honourable treatment at the hands of his father—but with no beneficial result. The reprobate spirit of Saul became more and more settled in its antipathy to the purpose of God regarding the son of Jesse; and it became at last evident that nothing remained for David but flight. Even this he effected with difficulty, and only under cover of a stratagem practised by his wife, by means of an image personating him in the bed, and by feigning him to be sick.

Then began one of the most marvellous series of trials and persecutions, of vengeful malice and resolute prosecution of evil, on the one side, and, on the other, of noble endurance, elastic energy of spirit, fertility of resources, and wonderful escapes, coupled with manifold reversion of good, to be found in the records of history. In threading his perilous way through this dark and chequered part of his career, it is impossible to say that David always kept the right course, and that he never resorted to improper means to secure his safety or advance his interest. There can be no doubt that his faith sometimes failed, and that a mistaken expediency and virtual falsehood occasionally took the place of open and manly reliance on better resources. Of such a kind, in particular, were his false pretence to Ahimelech at Nob, that he was in urgent haste upon the king's business, which incidentally led to a most disastrous result, 1Sa. xxi.; his repairing for protection to the king of Gath, and feigning himself mad to escape the danger in which he found himself involved, ch. xxi.; his subsequent return to the same quarter, after many narrow escapes from the hand of Saul, and carrying with him now a well-disciplined force, with which he professed to be doing service to Achish, while in reality he was taking the advantages his situation afforded to fight against the enemies of his country, ch. xxvii. These were undoubtedly marked and obvious failures in the history of David, blemishes that mar the perfection of his character, from the consequences of which he needed once and again to be rescued by the special interposition of God. But it should be remembered, on the other side, that the circumstances in which David was placed were of a singularly harassing and vexatious description. He was, in the most emphatic sense, a persecuted man; for his troubles came upon him, not from any malice harboured in his bosom, or wickedness found in his hand, but on account of his pre-eminent valour and worth, and these as the signs of a calling from Heaven, which he durst not quit if he would. The adversary, too, with whom he had to struggle, whatever he might originally have been, was now in a most relentless and savage humour; a man who sought to strengthen himself by his wickedness, Pa. iii. 7; and so resolutely bent on extinguishing the cause of David, that no deceit, tergiversation, or vindictive violence was deemed unsuitable to his purpose. Experience shows how rarely even mature Christian men can, in similar circumstances, and for any length of time, preserve their equanimity, and refrain from meeting one form of evil by resorting to another. But how much more must it have been so in the case of a solitary individual like David! and he a mere stripling at the commencement of the troubles, little more than turned of twenty! one, moreover, who lived under a far less clear and perfect dispensation than the Christian! Even with such odds against him, he did for a time bear the provocations and assaults aimed at him with a fortitude and a meekness of wisdom but rarely exemplified. And if afterwards, when hunted like an outlaw from place to place, and, amid the general terror and suspicion that prevailed, scarcely knowing whom to trust, or whither to betake himself, he should sometimes have stumbled in his course, this ought rather to move our pity than excite our astonishment or draw forth our censure. David himself was by no means insensible of his failings. He ever, indeed, asserted his innocence in respect to the charges brought against him by Saul; and protested, that so far from seeking after mischief, he had often returned evil with good, and was suffering for his very righteousness, 1 Sa. xxiv. xxvi.; Pa. vii. xvii. iii. &c. But this was perfectly compatible with a sense of shortcoming or sin in other parts of his procedure. How readily, for example, did he take blame to himself on hearing of the results that incidentally grew out of the deceit he had practised at Nob—the slaughter of the priests—exclaiming in bitterness of soul to Abiathar, “I have occasioned the death of all the persons of thy father’s house!” 1 Sa. xiii. 22. So again, in the affair with Nabal, what consciousness of error betrays itself in the benediction he pronounced on Abigail for arresting him in his rash purpose to shed blood! “Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, which sent thee this day to meet me; and blessed be thy advice, and blessed be thou, which hast kept me this day from shedding blood, and from avenging myself with mine own hand,” ch. xxv. 32, 33. And still again, in Pa. xxxiv., composed on the occasion of his escape from the miserable plight in which he found himself at the court of Achish, though he does not expressly confess to the error of his course, he yet virtually does so, by ascribing his deliverance entirely to the loving-kindness of God, in no respect to his own crooked policy—nay, solemnly warns all who would look for mercy and blessing from Heaven, to keep their tongue from evil and their lips from speaking guile. The truth now burst fully on his view, that while present safety, or at least ultimate deliverance, was sure to all God’s people, it was only to be obtained through humble reliance on God’s name, and steadfast adherence to the way of his commandments. Indeed, the very inditing of this, and many more spiritual songs, during the period of these Sauline persecutions—songs so remarkable for the healthfulness of their tone, so fervent in their breathings after God, so fraught with the dewy freshness of a youthful piety—is itself a conclusive proof of the habitual uprightness of David’s course—a palpable evidence that they could be only occasional aberrations into which he fell, while still in its settled frame his soul continued right with God.

From his ascension of the throne to his great backsliding.—The third stage of David’s career commences with the fall of his great adversary, which opened the way to his possession of the throne. The change was instantaneous in one respect, though only gradual in another. The defeat of Israel on Gilboa, which proved fatal to Saul and Jonathan, relieved David of all fear of further persecution; the strength of the rival interest was gone; and the two parties had virtually changed places. On David’s part, however, there was need for all the discretion and practical sagacity of which he had previously shown himself to be so eminently possessed. For his connection latterly with the Philistine territory could not fail to have involved him in a certain degree of suspicion, which the adherents of the house of Saul would gladly take advantage of to his prejudice; and the very misfortunes which had befallen that house itself would not unnaturally create in the bosoms of many a recoil in its favour. Moved partly perhaps by this chivalrous feeling, Abner, the captain of Saul’s host, had resolved to stand by the cause of his late master, and gave to Ishbosheth the benefit of his military talents and experience. It was evidently proper, therefore, that David should leave no room to doubt how he felt in such a crisis of his country’s affairs as had now arisen, and show where his sympathies really lay. Hence, at the very outset, the summary judgment he caused to be inflicted on the selfish and sordid Amalekite, who by his own confession had given the finishing stroke to Saul’s life, and then hurried off to David with his crown as an offering, which he had a right to present, and which David could not but thankfully accept at his hands. Hence, also, the friendly greeting he sent to the men of Jabesh-Gilead, who had jeoparded their lives to give to the bodies of Saul and Jonathan an honourable burial. And, more than all, the song he indited on their mournful fate—so touching in its allusions, so free and full in its gush of tender and patriotic feeling, that no one who heard it could doubt the generous affection that glowed in his bosom, or fail to perceive how truly his heart beat for the honour and wellbeing of his country. As the knowledge of such things spread, the impression in David’s favour must have grown, and the minds of the people have been turned toward him, as the only man fitted to rally the scattered forces and repair the shattered condition of Israel.

It need not therefore surprise us to learn, that the men of Judah presently came and anointed David as their king, 2 Sa. ii. 4. He had previously, in obedience to the divine direction, left Ziklag and taken up his abode at Hebron. But even before this, and also before the catastrophe at Gilboa, the way was preparing for David’s ascendancy, and many accessions were made to his party. In 1 Ch. xii. we have a long list of persons, many of them designated mighty men of war, who went over to David from the different tribes of Israel—not only from Judah, but also from Gad, Manasseh, and not a few even of Saul's "brethren of Benjamin"—so that, as it is said, "there came to David to help him day by day, until there was a great host, like the host of God." It would seem that the signs of Saul's perdition had become so palpable, and the yoke of his arbitrary and jealous administration so oppressive, that the result was anticipated by a considerable number of the more clear-sighted and valiant men, who turned away from Saul as the destroyer, and began to look to David as the hope of their country. So that by the time David left Ziklag for Hebron he had, one might say, the state and equipment of a king; and the large spoil which he had been enabled to distribute among the cities in the south of Judah, after his defeat of the Amalekites, at once evinced the strength of his host and the liberality of his heart toward his brethren of his own tribe.

David was still only thirty years of age, 2 Sa. v. 4.—a comparative youth, though already old in a varied and hard-earned experience. It was now simply a question of time with him as to the possession of the entire kingdom; for it soon became manifest that Ishbosheth was altogether unfit to guide at such a crisis the reins of government. There were, however, a good many skirmishes between his forces under Abner, and those of David under Joab; in one of which Asahel, the brother of Joab, fell a sacrifice to his own rashness by the hand of Abner. A quarrel by and by ensued between Abner and Ishbosheth, on a ground far from creditable to the former; and Abner immediately entered into negotiations with David. What were the terms of their agreement we are not told, excepting that David made the restoration to him of Michal, Saul's daughter, an indispensable preliminary. The reasons for this doubtless were, that Michal, in the first instance, was his lawful wife, and had been unrighteously taken from him and given to another man (of the name of Phaltiel); that it would have been unbecoming in him, a manifest violation of order and decorum, to have sitten on the throne of Israel, while his proper wife remained in the possession of one of his subjects; and that the resumption in this respect of his own, was fitted to tell with a conciliatory effect on the adherents of Saul's house. To place Phaltiel's attachment to Michal in opposition to such grounds, and represent David's conduct in the matter as selfish and hard, is to subordinate the claims of reason and principle to mere natural feeling.

This part of the conditions was speedily fulfilled by Abner, Phaltiel weeping, it is said, at the separation of Michal from him, but offering no resistance. The further connection of David with Abner was violently interrupted by Joab, who seeking to be revenged for the death of his brother Asahel, and not improbably also actuated by some feeling of jealousy in regard to the place likely to be occupied by Abner, under the guise of a friendly interview with Abner took occasion to slay him. David was affected with deep sorrow at this calamity, which both in itself, and from the manner in which it was perpetrated, was fitted to tell most unfavourably on his interest. He therefore publicly bewailed what had happened, celebrated the memory of Abner as that of a prince in Israel, and strongly reprobated the conduct of Joab, though he durst not proceed further against him. There was no necessity for any such restraint in regard to the perpetrators of another crime—the two men who laid violent hands on Ishbosheth, and brought his head to David: these he ordered to be instantly put to death. But now the path was clear for the reunion of all the tribes under the sway of David; by the providence of God, and by his own inherent fitness for the work, he stood in a manner alone; and so the whole commonwealth of Israel came by their representatives to Hebron and anointed him their king, 2 Sa. v. 1, seq. This was the third and final anointing David received. The precise date of it is not given, but it must have been near the close of the seven years during which David is said to have reigned at Hebron; since it was clear he could not for any length of time have continued the seat of his government there after being made the head of the whole nation. Accordingly, the first thing we hear of his movements after his elevation to the full sovereignty, respects the conquest of the stronghold of Zion, which till then had been held by the Jebusites, and the selection of Jerusalem as the capital of his kingdom. The situation had many natural advantages for such a purpose, and it was so carefully fortified by David, that it became a place of great strength.

The prosperity of David however, in one direction, naturally gave rise to opposition and assault in another. It was to be expected that the Philistines in particular, with whom David had been so closely connected, would resent his elevation to the throne, and would endeavour to establish over him the ascendancy they had latterly acquired over the house of Saul. Accordingly, they came up in full array against him once, and even a second time; but in each case were completely defeated, 2 Sa. v. 17-25. At a later period the Philistines appeared again among the assailants of David, but not, it would seem, by themselves; they acted in concert with the other surrounding nations—the Moabites, Ammonites, Syrians, and Edomites—who together involved David in a series of arduous struggles, and sometimes in great apparent danger; but with the help of God he proved triumphant over all, 2 Sa. vi. viii.; comp. with Ps. lx. lxxxiii. cviii. So that the kingdom received through his instrumentality both a firm consolidation and a wonderful enlargement: Israel was united at home into one compact body, and it held a political sway over the tribes that lay around them from Egypt to the Euphrates. But David knew his mission too well to suppose that a political ascendancy, or a national resuscitation, was all he had to accomplish. The religious, not less than the political, state of his people called for a reforming energy. There were disorders of old standing, such especially as had come in about the time of Eli's death, and which must have been aggravated by the ungodliness that characterized the party and later proceedings of Saul. David therefore addressed himself in earnest to the task of bringing the public service of God into a proper organization, and infusing new life into its ministrations. This lay fully within the scope of his calling, as the earthly head of the theocracy; for as such it belonged to him to rule in the name of God, and take order to have all that pertained to the divine will and glory efficiently carried out. And as the tabernacle was still in a mutilated condition, the ark of the covenant having never been restored since it was captured by the Philistines and deposited at Kirjath-jearim, his first object was to have this brought back and set in its proper place. That place now, he was given to understand, was Jerusalem—where was to be the centre of the kingdom in a religious as well as a civil respect; and the covering under which it was to be put was a tent specially provided for it, doubtless after the pattern of the old one, and so provided, we may naturally suppose, by divine direction. The probability is, that the original tent was by this time in a decayed and shattered condition—unfit for being transferred to a city like Jerusalem, and set down there in the midst of new and ornate buildings. It was therefore left standing at Gibeon, 1 Ch. i. 3, while a new one formed after its likeness was pitched in Jerusalem; whither also were carried the brazen altar, together probably with the rest of the more important utensils. A day was then set apart for bringing up the ark to its appointed place in this tabernacle; but from want of due preparation, and a certain degree of irreverence shown by Uzzah in laying hold of the ark, the judgment of the Lord broke forth, and awe-struck by the visitation of Heaven upon Uzzah, it was left for a time in the house of Obed-edom, which was nigh at hand. But only for a time; the purpose of bringing the ark into Jerusalem was again resumed, and accomplished also amid great demonstrations of joy and gladness. In these David himself took so active a part, that he was reproached by Michal for behaving in an unkinglike manner. His hilarity, however, was the result of religious feeling, the exuberance of spiritual joy, which it was more his glory to exhibit on such an occasion, than would have been cold and stately decorum, such as Michal desiderated. It is to that occasion also, as is generally believed, we owe one of the finest of David's sacred lyrics—Psalm xxiv.—equally remarkable for the depth of its spiritual meaning and for the hallowed fire that glows in its moving strains. But this was only one of many compositions of a like nature, which David through the Spirit prepared for raising the hearts and animating the devotions of the covenant-people. They now reaped in this respect also the fruit of David's bygone troubles. For, as has been justly said, "it was the cross which first brought David's poetical gift into full development. His first psalms were composed during the time of the persecutions from Saul, and the old saying, 'where would have been David's psalms, if he had not been persecuted?' has its foundation in truth" (Hengstenberg on the Psalms, Append. sect. 2).

Besides the psalmodic poetry which David produced in such abundance for the service of the sanctuary, he also paid much attention to the cultivation of sacred music, in which he was himself so great a master. Certain Levitical families were set specially apart for the purpose of conducting the music of the temple, with their heads and leaders Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun, 1 Ch. xxv. No fewer than 4000 out of the 38,000 Levites existing in David's time were employed in this department of service; some, however, being stationed at Gibeon beside the old tent, while the rest served at the new one in Jerusalem. Ultimately, of course, the temple absorbed the whole. For the purpose of securing an orderly and efficient administration in other parts of the sacred ritual, the priests also were divided into families, forming twenty-four courses, which continued to apostolic times, 1 Ch. xxiv. Some of the arrangements were, we may suppose, introduced gradually, and certain alterations would naturally be made after the erection of the temple. But to David belongs the honour of initiating this higher and more perfect celebration of the Old Testament worship, and of accompanying it with such spiritual songs as gave living expression to its great truths and principles.

David's zeal for the house of God did not even rest with these strivings for a more lively and befitting performance of the tabernacle service: he sought to have the very fashion of it changed, by raising the tabernacle itself into a magnificent temple. He thought it unseemly that the ark of God should continue within curtains, while he was himself dwelling in an house of cedar, 2 Sa. vii. 2. Go, and do all that is in thine heart, said Nathan the prophet, when he first heard the proposal; but he afterwards received a special revelation from God, instructing him to express the divine approval of David's purpose, but reserving the execution of it to the peaceful times of David's successor; and in consideration of David's faithfulness and zeal, assuring him of a perpetuity of his kingdom, yea, indicating in no doubtful terms, that from his loins, and as the ultimate inheritor of his throne, should come the glorious Saviour and Head of redeemed humanity, 2 Sa. vii. 12-17. This great promise forms the basis of all the Messianic psalms, in which its import is more distinctly unfolded—such as Ps. ii. xvi. xxii. xlv. cx. &c. It forms the climax of David's heritage of glory, as the period when it came was that also of the culmination of his spiritual life: he had now done his noblest works for God, and in return he received the highest tokens of the divine satisfaction. Would that he had but known how to stand where he had attained, and to drink with meekness of wisdom the cup of bliss which was made to run over!

But the result proved otherwise; David could not abide in this fulness of honour. There had been a root of bitterness in his domestic condition—tolerated in him as in others from the imperfection of the times, but by no means accordant with the scriptural ideal of a holy life—and from its very nature apt to grow and become a snare to the soul. We refer to his polygamy, wife after wife having been added to his household as he rose to consideration and influence in the world: beside Michal, first taken from him and again restored, Ahinoam and Abigail, whom he successively married in the wilderness, then at Hebron the daughter of Talmi king of Geshur, Abital, Eglah. And now, in the noon-tide of his prosperity, as if these could not suffice to minister to his fleshly desire, and having espied in a moment of weakness the beautiful wife of Uriah, he took her to his bed, while her husband was fighting at a distance in the service of the king. A most mournful defection of itself in such a man! but fearfully aggravated by the series of iniquities that followed in its train—the base attempts, first by cozening, then by intoxicating drink, to hoodwink Uriah in regard to the dishonour that had been done to him—and, when these failed, the still baser device practised through Joab of sending him to a post of danger, and treating him so as to insure his falling by the hands of the enemy. One's soul trembles, on reading the history, at the amazing depth it discloses of deceitfulness and depravity in the human heart—even in a heart that has passed through a most peculiar training and risen high in the divine life. So blind and senseless in spiritual things had David become, that nothing but the message of God by Nathan, with the piercing application, "Thou art the man," availed to rouse him from his false security, and bring him to a sense of the enormity of his procedure. But when once properly aroused all his better feelings revived, and if the guilt of true believers seldom reaches a height like his, as rarely perhaps do they attain to his measure in depth and pungency of penitential grief. The evidence of this survives, not merely in the historical record of his tears, and supplications, and fasting, 2 Sa. xii. 16, seq., but also, and still more, in those penitential psalms in which he has depicted "the soul's deepest hell of agony," and provided for all time forms of devotion for those who are wrestling with the fears of guilt and condemnation. Indeed, viewed in respect to his peculiar calling as the sweet Psalmist of Israel, David could not have served either his own or future generations of the people of God as he has done, unless he had grappled with convictions of guilt in their more appalling forms, and felt all God's waves and billows passing over him. For though—to use the language of another—"we neither excuse his acts of wickedness, nor impute them to the temptation of God, who cannot be tempted of evil, neither tempteth any man, yet by his loss the church hath gained; out of the evil of his ways much good hath been made to arise; and if he had not passed through every valley of humiliation, and stumbled upon the dark mountains, we should not have had a language for the souls of the penitent, or an expression for the dark troubles which compass the soul that feareth to be deserted by its God" (Irving, Preface to Horne on the Psalms).

Even that does not comprise the whole of the church's gain. As new views were now disclosed to David's soul of the unspeakable depth and bitterness of sin, so he was prepared for relishing in his own behalf, and in a measure presenting to others, a new and deeper revelation of the future King that was to spring from his loins, and to bring the kingdom to its destined completeness. He already knew that the right to reign over the house of God was to be linked in perpetual union with his line; that blessing in the higher sense was not to be attainable among men, except as the fruit of the covenant made with him. But alas! how deeply must he now have felt that he was himself incapable of imparting that blessing! Outward triumphs he had been enabled to accomplish for the theocracy; his administrative gifts had secured for it a more compact organization, and by his spiritual songs and energetic agency he had most materially contributed to pour fresh life into its institutions and services. But what were all these in comparison with the good that was still needed to reach the destined result! In the great controversy that sin raises between man and God, David found himself like one sinking amid deep waters; his bowels melted as wax before the fire; and from these depths of distress the cry arose in his bosom for one who should be able to grapple effectually with the mighty evil, and bring deliverance from its power. It was, we have reason to believe, when thus exercised, that the eye of David began to be opened by the Spirit on the prospect of a sin-bearing and suffering Messiah. It was no longer one who should merely conquer and rule, that could satisfy his desire—one that should subdue the nations under him and dash their rebel chiefs in pieces like a potter's vessel; but one who should be a priest upon the throne, yea, and a priest on his way to it making reconciliation for iniquity, and by the agonies of a mysterious but triumphant wrestling unto death, slaying the evil in its very root, Ps. xli. xi. cx. Such was the longing that now arose, the hope that now formed itself in David's bosom; and if it dawned upon him through the troubled gloom of painful experiences—if even with much crying and tears he attained to some knowledge of this mystery of godliness, it was surely a blessed compensation to his sorrow, and a wonderful exhibition of divine grace, thus to connect the evil with the good, and make the deep agitations and earnest strivings occasioned by sin point the way so distinctly to the coming light and peace of the world. No common subject and vessel of grace must he have been, whose history in its darker aspects could have been made instinct with such life and hope to the church of God.

The season of punishment, Absalom's revolt.—The important spiritual ends to which David's great backsliding was overruled by God, did not prevent its being the occasion of heavy and in some sense irremediable evils in David's condition. And it is from this sad event that another, and in some respects the most trying and afflictive stage of his history, is to be dated. The prophet Nathan gave clear intimation to him, at the outset, that while God pardoned his sin—to the extent, that is, of not subjecting him to the legal penalty of death which was due to it—yet there should be in the coming events of providence palpable visitations of the divine displeasure on account of it, and that his iniquity should come back upon him in troubles and calamities that should overwhelm him with confusion. It was the glory of David in his better conditions to be a type of the kingdom over which he was placed; the men of his own generation and of future times were to see imaged in him the inseparable connection that existed in God's ordination between the humble, spiritual, God-fearing disposition which it required, and the rich inheritance of blessing and honour which it promised. And when now, after having been so remarkably owned by God, and peculiarly identified with his cause, he turned from his duty of service by flagrantly violating some of the plainest commandments of Heaven, not only he, but all future successors of the throne, must see in God's subsequent dealings toward him, how infallibly a departure from righteousness involved a curtailment of blessing, and how in proportion as sin might be committed the rod of chastisement should certainly be applied. Because he had given great occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme, both the child born of Bathsheba must die, and other calamities, worse even than family bereavement, must be looked for.

It is not necessary to trace very particularly the successive stages in this latter and somewhat melancholy part of David's career; more especially as most of them will be found noticed in connection with the names of individuals who shared at different points in the transactions. But there came first, with mournful resemblance to the father's sin, the unnatural love of Amnon to his sister Tamar, ending in the violation of her chastity; then the murder of Amnon by Absalom, followed by Absalom's flight to Geshur. By and by came, after his recall from exile, the revolt of Absalom himself, who carried his disrespect to his father, and his own personal ambition, to their utmost height, by conspiring at once against David's life and for the possession of the throne. So skilfully had the plot been laid, and so grievously shaken were the foundations of David's authority at the time, that he was obliged to seek refuge in flight: having the sadness of his condition embittered by the twofold sting, that it was his own son who sought his life, and his own sin that was finding its retribution in the unnatural crime. It was undoubtedly this latter thought that made him at first so distrustful of his resources, and throughout the conflict that ensued rendered him subject to a weakness and vacillation, of which we find comparatively few traces in the earlier and brighter parts of his history. The remembrance of his grievous backsliding, as the real cause of the troubles that had come upon him, seems to have hung like a cloud between his soul and the countenance of God; so that, with all his efforts to regain confidence and assured hope, fears and misgivings constantly returned upon him, and he was doubtful how long the cloud might be allowed to continue, or how far the rebuke might proceed. He did, however, by degrees attain to some measure of repose, by throwing himself back on the covenant faithfulness of God, and reflecting that however he might have stumbled in his course, still with him was the truth and righteousness of God, while those who were against him plainly made vanity and lies their refuge, Ps. iii. iv. Nor was his confidence misplaced. The Lord again interposed in his behalf, and gave to his armies success in the day of battle; although to him the joy of victory was more than counterbalanced by the anguish he experienced from the death of Absalom. (See ABSALOM, AHITHOPHEL, &c.) He afterwards recovered himself; and when the rebellion was entirely crushed, he wrote that stirring and sublime song which is given in 2 Sa. xxiii., and which with certain alterations forms Psalm xviii., celebrating the Lord's goodness in delivering him from all his enemies. The first part refers more especially to the troubles of his early life, and the second to those of the later.

The procedure of David, partly during the period of this great rebellion, and partly after its termination, toward the family of Saul, has often been made the subject of severe remark. It is admitted that the king had shown great kindness to Mephibosheth the son of Jonathan; but he is charged with ultimately treating him in an unkind manner, when allowing Ziba to retain half the inheritance that belonged to Mephibosheth, after having improperly obtained possession of it by carrying a slanderous report of his master, 2 Sa. xix. 24, seq. In this charge it is assumed that Mephibosheth's account of the matter was altogether correct, and that the king had no ground whatever of complaint against him. But we are by no means sure of that; and indeed the natural impression of the narrative evidently points in another direction. "The whole speech of Mephibosheth," says Eisenlohr, "betrays a bad conscience, and his guilt, which could not bear a close investigation, is but too manifest" (l. p. 288). Had Ziba acted the utterly false and selfish part that is here represented, it is extremely improbable that David would have allowed him to be so great a gainer by his treachery; the probability rather is, that neither the servant nor the master had acted precisely as they should have done, and that such a division as that proposed by David was the readiest and most expedient way of bringing the matter to a conclusion. It was a display of clemency to both to deal with it as David actually did. Another, and still heavier charge has been brought against David, in regard to the slaughter of seven sons of Saul to appease the anger of the Gibeonites on account of the nearly total extermination of them by Saul and his bloody house, in flagrant violation of the oath made with their fathers. The bearing of this transaction on the relation of the Gibeonites to Israel and the moral government of Jehovah, will be considered in its proper place. (See GIBEONITES.) But in respect to David, "it has been suspected (so the accusation runs) that the whole was contrived by the revenge of the priesthood for the barbarous massacre perpetrated by Saul on the priestly city of Nob; and that David the more readily acquiesced, since it was desirable for the peace of his successors that the house of Saul should be exterminated. Both suspicions are too probable to be easily set aside" (F. W. Newman). We should rather say quite easily, were there nothing of an unbelieving and envious spirit bent on blackening the characters of those who have played a distinguished part in sacred history, and where facts fail for the purpose, drawing on imagination. There is not the shadow of evidence that David had a sinister end in view in the part he took in the transaction. He merely interposed to rescue the family of Jonathan from any share in the retribution; and afterwards showed marked kindness to Rizpah, the mother of two of the sons that were slain, for the maternal affection she exhibited toward the remains of the deceased. As far as appears, David no further interfered, than to give certain proofs of his consideration and regard. And manifestly the interest of Saul's house was now too much reduced to excite jealousy or dread in the mind of David.

The concluding stage of David's history.—This reaches from the close of Absalom's rebellion to his own decease, and appears to have been, for the most part, passed in peace and quietness; but it was marked by one serious defection, which involved the land in a sore and perilous visitation. The defection in this case was by no means so flagrant and palpable a nature as that of which David had previously been guilty, nor was it so exclusively connected with his own personal behaviour. It would seem that, after the overthrow of Absalom's faction, matters went on so smoothly, and the kingdom in David's hands assumed so firm and settled an appearance, that a feeling of proud security began to spring up in his own mind, and generally in the minds of the people. The enemies, internal and external, had one after another been driven from the field; the administration of David had only become stronger from the unsuccessful efforts that had been made to subvert it; immense resources of every kind were now at command—what could they have any longer to fear? Who might henceforth venture to provoke the hostility of so formidable a power? Such seems to have been the spirit in which David said to Joab, "Go and number Israel and Judah." In him, doubtless, the carnal, self-reliant spirit had its culmination, as the kingdom with its plenitude of resources and its well-ordered government was more peculiarly his. But it is plain that the people shared with their king in the improper feeling; and hence it is said that "the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel," 2 Sa. xxiv. 1—not against David simply, but against Israel at large; "and (to render the cause of the anger manifest), He moved David against them to say, Go and number Israel and Judah." David here acted simply as the head and representative of the entire community, and gave distinct form and expression to what was working in many bosoms. The Lord moved him to take the step in question—so it is said in 2 Samuel; but in 1 Ch. xxi. 1, the motion is ascribed to Satan: "Satan stood up against Israel, and provoked David to number Israel." The purpose, in its sinful character and tendency, was really of Satan, since God tempteth no man to evil; but Satan could only act a subordinate and instrumental part; and that the evil took this precise form rather than any other, was not of Satan, but of God; the ends of the divine government required that it should take this particular direction. So that the action might indifferently be ascribed to Satan or to God, according to the point of view from which it was contemplated. But that the object aimed at in the numbering of the people had anything to do, as some have imagined, with the establishment of a military despotism, or with a scheme of foreign conquest, is an entirely groundless hypothesis, and in palpable contrariety with what is said of the people's participation in the guilt, as well as with the advanced age of the king. There was, no doubt, a large military force in David's reign—which, however, seems rather to have been a sort of militia, than a standing army; for it is said they served by monthly courses, 24,000 each month, 1 Ch. xxvii. And with such an extent of conquered territory, and so many tributary nations to keep in check, a smaller force could scarcely have sufficed for the peace and safety of the kingdom.

To return to the act of numbering: it is somewhat singular that Joab should have possessed a spirit of discernment superior to his master's, and should have sought to divert David from his purpose. The captains of the army generally are represented as having been against it, 2 Sa. xxiv. 3, 4, which renders it probable that the opposition proceeded from politic, rather than religious, considerations. They possibly thought that so formal a mustering of the forces of the kingdom would give rise to the idea, that a military conscription was going to be called for in some new form; or it might seem fitted in their view to awaken a spirit of jealousy toward the officers of the host who were charged with the investigation. But whatever might be the grounds on which they endeavoured to withstand the proposal, the resistance was in vain. David would take no refusal; but no sooner was the work done, than he saw reason to repent of his folly. For, presently after the sum of the people was rendered by Joab, the king's heart smote him with convictions of guilt, and the prophet Gad brought him the choice of three fearful calamities—seven years' famine, three months' pursuit before his enemies, or three days' pestilence in the land. Whichever of these forms it might assume, the judgment, it is easy to see, was fitly adapted to the sin it was intended to chastise; for none of them could happen without laying in the dust the feeling of fancied security, and producing a salutary conviction of feebleness and danger. Pestilence was the calamity actually sent, as David had intreated to be left in the Lord's hands, rather than allowed to fall into those of man. And when no fewer than 70,000 had perished under the judgment, and the plague was beginning to break forth also in Jerusalem, David besought the Lord to accept of his life as an offering, that others less guilty might be spared: "Lo, I have sinned, and I have done wickedly; but these sheep, what have they done? Let thine hand, I pray thee, be against me, and against my father's house." This cry of humble, self-sacrificing love, was heard in the sanctuary above. At the thrashing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite, the destroying angel was arrested in his course; and for a memorial of the transaction, David reared an altar, and offered burnt-sacrifices to the Lord, which were consumed by fire from heaven, 1 Ch. xxi. 26. He even bought the ground for the site of the future temple, and said, "This is the house of the Lord, and this is the altar of the burnt-offering for Israel," 1 Ch. xxii. 1. For the Lord had there not only pardoned the sin of David and his people, but had given the more peculiar token of his presence to accept the person and worship of his people. David therefore recognized this as the sign of a divine selection of the place for the future sanctuary; and in anticipation of the erection of the temple on the spot, he composed Ps. xxx., which at once commemorates his own sin, and the Lord's dealings of judgment and mercy. He had vainly conceived that he had made his mountain to stand strong (so he explains the matter in this psalm); but in a moment he was brought down as to the depths of hell, and only by the goodness of God had his sorrow again turned into joy. All is of God—let Israel henceforth worship on the spot which bears such emphatic testimony to this great truth, and, by acting on it, inherit the blessing.

After this few events occurred in David's history of a public nature. The subject that seems chiefly to have engrossed his attention was the prospective erection of the temple—for which, though restrained from building it, he made large and costly preparations. The quantity of gold and silver, of precious and useful materials of all sorts, which he had amassed for the purpose, was quite enormous; but it is not possible to give with any accuracy its value in modern computation. The spirit, too, in which he gave all, as only a dutiful return to the Lord of a portion of what had been received from him, was truly admirable; and so also was the warm and earnest manner in which he pressed the more wealthy of the people to imitate his example, 1 Ch. xxix. Never was a finer exemplification given of the means and influence of high place consecrated to the service of God; nor, when given, has it ever met with a more general and hearty response. David's soul was refreshed with what he witnessed, and breathed out a fervent prayer that the Lord would keep it for ever in the imagination of the thoughts of the heart of his people; that they, as well as Solomon his son, might keep God's statutes, and build the house for which so large provision had been made. On the same occasion Solomon was anointed king, to remove all doubt as to the succession, and to prevent any further attempts like that shortly before made by Adonijah to disturb the peace of the kingdom. (See ADONIJAH.) To Solomon also David delivered the pattern, which he had drawn of the future house, and of its furniture, which the Lord, he said, made him to understand in writing by his hand upon him, ch. xxviii. 19; so that the primary and fundamental part in the whole matter was performed by David; Solomon's part was merely to carry into execution the counsel and plan of his father.

The faith and holiness of David were probably never more true and steadfast in their exercise than in this closing period of his history. His bodily frame had sunk into what might almost be called premature languor and inaction (for he was little more than seventy when he died); so that his attendants deemed it proper to resort to the peculiar and somewhat questionable device of providing a young woman (Abishag) to couch beside him, for the purpose of infusing a portion of her own warmth into his system. The tried, energetic, and laborious life he had led might naturally bring on this extreme bodily languor. But the powers of his mind seemed still to retain much of their vigour, and when roused into action, as they were at intervals in making his final disposition and arrangements, they shone forth with their wonted lustre, and were directed to the noblest ends. His great object evidently was, when drawing near the termination of his course, to leave upon the mind of Solomon and those about him a deep impression of the truth of God, and of the infinite importance of having its eternal principles of rectitude carried out in the administration of the kingdom. His addresses to Solomon all bore upon this point, and in what are called his last words—that is, his last regular composition—he gave clear and solemn expression to it, made it emphatically his dying testimony. When exactly rendered, they run thus: "The Spirit of the Lord spake by me, and his word was on my tongue. The God of Israel said, The Rock of Israel spake to me, The ruler over men, righteous! ruler, the fear of God! (as if the one were identified with the other). And as the light of morning [he is], when the sun riseth; a morning without clouds—from the bright shining, from the rain there is grass out of the earth! For is not my house thus with God? for an everlasting covenant has he made with me, well ordered in all things and sure. For it [or he] is all my salvation and all delight; for does he not make it to grow? And wickedness is like thorns—they shall all be driven away; for no one will take them into his hand; and if any one touch them, he is filled with iron, and the staff of a spear; and they shall be utterly consumed with fire where they dwell." 2 Sa. xxiii. 3-7. The sentences want the flow of earlier times; the several utterances follow each other somewhat abruptly; but all the more, perhaps, they give vivid expression to the thought which held possession of David's soul, and which he would transmit to his latest posterity—that the ruler in God's kingdom must be wholly set for the interests of righteousness; and that for the very purpose of securing this was God's covenant established with his house for ever. In its full sense the word could only find its realization in Him, who was to be at once the offspring of David and the Son of the Highest. But for that very reason—as the kingdom in its provisional state was to foreshadow and prepare for the higher one in prospect, the lofty ideal of righteous government thus indicated with his dying breath by the psalmist, should have been constantly kept in view by every one of his successors on the throne, and as far as possible realized. In the spirit of prophecy David foresaw the ideal should one day become the actual—God's faithfulness to his covenant would secure it; and all true members of the covenant were called by his latest breath to strive towards its accomplishment.

Among David's last words and charges certain things occur, which have been thought by some to be at variance with these higher sentiments and aims. In particular, exception has been taken to the charge given to Solomon to bring Shimei to account for the shameful part he had acted in the day of David's calamity, and to mete to Joab the retribution that was due for the innocent blood he had shed, in treacherously slaying Abner and Amasa. To ascribe this, however, to a vindictive spirit, and regard it as indicative of a want of honourable feeling, would be to place it in opposition to the whole tenor of David's life, which was distinguished for nothing more than its forgiving, generous, and disinterested spirit. And it is against all probability to suppose that the immediate prospect of death, which is wont to soften even wild and vengeful dispositions, should have stimulated David's habitual mildness into ferocity. The explanation is to be sought in a quite different view of the matter. "Beyond all reasonable doubt, it was regard to high public duty that moved David to hand over Joab to capital punishment, and commit Shimei to the vigilance of his successor. The conscience of the monarch was burdened. As the highest magistrate of the kingdom, he felt that he had not vindicated the authority of God's law in the case of Joab. Joab was an unpunished murderer. Shimei had in him the spirit of a rebel and a traitor. If David had been under the influence of a personal feeling, he would have despatched both of them long before. His personal feeling was all the other way. The thought of their punishment was horrible to him; he could not bear to speak of it; but the sense of public duty was too strong to be overborne always" (Blaikie's David, p. 423). Besides, there were political considerations which trammelled David, and rendered the execution of justice in such cases next to impossible; but these expired with himself, and it was right that the law of the kingdom should now have free course, and take effect without respect of persons.

"And David died in a good old age, full of days, riches, and honour:" in many respects the most remarkable man who appeared in ancient times—as a ruler over men, eclipsed only by that more than mortal King, who wields the destinies of God's everlasting kingdom. Most truly did he serve his generation according to the will of God; nay, all generations that have since arisen have had reason to call him blessed. And while, as justly remarked by another (Eisenlohr), worldly monarchs so commonly aim at the oppression of their people, or have the nature of their dominion marked only by external displays of power, and a glory that quickly vanishes out of sight, it was the distinguished honour of David, along with his ennobling properties, and by means of them, to give a permanent elevation to the entire state and prospects of his people, to set them free from the bonds under which they naturally lay, and plant among them the seeds of future life and fruitfulness. By what he was, and what he did, he became the root of all the higher developments and expectations that afterwards disclosed themselves in the kingdom of God.

[The works of Ewald, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, vol. ii., and of Eisenlohr, Das Volk Israel, vol. i., in those portions of them which relate to the life of David, may be consulted with profit; although in what respects the historical correctness of some parts of the text, and some of the more peculiar points in the history, they are far from being safe guides. The treatises of Delaney, and Chandler on the life of David, are still deserving of being consulted; and a sensible, judicious, well-toned volume on the subject, by the Rev. W. G. Blaikie, David, King of Israel, 1856, will be found useful. Many of the leading features of David's character and history are also admirably touched on in Hengstenberg's and Delitzsch's Works on the Psalms. And for some of the differences in respect to numbers (for example, the three years of pestilence in 1 Ch. xxi. 12, and seven in 2 Sa. xxiv. 13), and other minute points in the account of Chronicles, as compared with that of the books of Samuel, see at CHRONICLES.]

DAVID, CITY OF. See JERUSALEM.

DAY, one of the commonest divisions of time, and the earliest on record, being that so frequently introduced into the history of the creation, Ge. 1. As there used, it marks an entire revolution of time, as of natural day and night; not day as distinguished from night, but day and night together: "The evening and the morning were the first day." And it is remarkable that the evening takes precedence of the morning, as if the reckoning had been made from sunset to sunset, not from sunrise to sunrise. Such, in process of time, undoubtedly, came to be the Jewish mode of reckoning. "From even unto even shall ye celebrate your sabbath," was the order prescribed in the law, Le. xxiii. 32; and so in regard to the paschal feast, which was appointed to commence on the fifteenth day of the month, or immediately after sunset on the fourteenth, Ex. xii. 18. The same rule obtained in regard to other days. Nor was it by any means confined to the Jews; the Phœnicians, Numidians, and other nations of the East, are said to have followed the same custom, if it was not indeed the custom generally followed in remote antiquity. The ancient Germans, says Tacitus, "compute not the number of days, but of nights; the night appears to draw on the day," ch. xi. And Cæsar says, in like manner, of the Gauls, "They measure time, not by the number of days, but of nights; and accordingly, observe their birthdays, and the beginnings of months and years, so as to make the day follow the night" (Bell. Gal. vi. 18). Of this a memorial still exists in our "seven-night," "fortnight," to express the period of seven and fourteen days respectively.

In the earlier periods of Old Testament history no further divisions of the natural day appear than those of morning, noon-day, and evening, Ge. i. 5; xiii. 16. The night, in like manner, appears under a threefold division of first, middle, and morning watches, La. ii. 19; Jn. vii. 19; Ex. xiv. 24. The mention of hours first occurs in the time of the Babylonish captivity, Da. iii. 6; v. 5. It would appear that the Babylonians were among the first to adopt the division of twelve equal parts for the day, as Herodotus testifies that the Greeks derived this custom from the Babylonians (ii. 109). The Hebrews also adopted it; and in New Testament scripture we often read of the third, the sixth, the ninth hours of the day, which were the more marked divisions of the twelve. The night was divided into the same number of parts. But from the variations in sunrise and sunset, this division, which had these natural phenomena for its two terminations, could never attain to exactness, and was therefore unsuited to nations that had reached a high degree of civilization. Such nations accordingly fell upon the plan of adopting midnight as the fixed point, from which the whole diurnal revolution might be reckoned, divided into twice twelve, or twenty-four hours. And this division is now followed by all European nations, and in a great part of the civilized world. In many countries of the East, however, the old mode of reckoning from sunrise to sunset still continues.

With the exception of one passage, Jn. xi. 9, which expressly mentions the twelve hours of the day, we never meet in New Testament scripture with the mention of any particular hours, excepting the third, the sixth, and the ninth, which correspond respectively to our ninth, twelfth, and third. The ninth and third were regular hours of worship at the temple, Ac. ii. 15; iii. 1, the times for the morning and the evening sacrifice. Other terms of a less definite kind are occasionally used as notes of time—such as cock-crowing, late, early, midnight; but these have much the same import in all languages, and need no particular explanation.

The Sabbath was the only day among the Hebrews which had a distinct name, the rest being designated simply as first, second, and so on. In later times the sixth-day, from its immediate relation to the Sabbath, was sometimes denominated the paraskenté, or preparation. (See under PREPARATION.)

Day is often used by the sacred writers in a general sense, for a definite period of time—an era or season, when something remarkable has taken place, or is destined to do so, Ge. ii. 4; Is. xxii. 5; Joel. ii. 2, &c. And it accorded with Hebrew usage to designate by the term day or night what probably formed only a part of these: thus by three days and three nights might be understood only a portion of three. Mat. xii. 40; xvii. 33, 64, comp. with 1 Ki. xii. 5, 12. As it is also by day that the more active portion of man's life is spent, so day is used to express the whole term of life considered as a season of active labour, Jn. ix. 4.

DEACON, DEACONESS, the English form of the Greek διάκονος, which is used sometimes more generally of any one performing ministerial service, of whatever sort, and sometimes more specially of one filling the office of the diaconate in a Christian church. In the more general sense the term is applied to persons engaged in discharging the higher, as well as the lower kinds of service—to the apostles, and even to our Lord himself. In Ro. xv. 8 Christ is called "a minister (literally a deacon) of the circumcision." And once and again the apostle Paul designates himself and his fellow-labourers in the gospel the Lord's deacons, Ep. iii. 7; 2 Co. vi. 4; Col. i. 2. But from an early period the word was appropriated as the distinctive appellation of a class of officers in the church—a class that appears to have existed nearly from the commencement in all the more considerable churches, and probably also in many of inferior dimensions. When Paul wrote to the church at Philippi, he addressed his epistle "to the bishops and deacons," as the recognized and official representatives of the body. In his epistle to the Romans he incidentally mentions the name of a deaconess of the church at Cenchrea, ch. xvi. 1, implying that there were in that part of Greece even females who exercised a diaconate; and if these, certainly also males. And in writing Timothy as to the manner in which he should execute the special commission given him in respect to the church at Ephesus, he not only points to the existence of deacons, but describes at some length the qualifications and behaviour by which they ought to be distinguished, 1 Ti. iii. 8, seq.

The earliest notice that exists in regard to the appointment of deacons is that of which an account is given in Acts vi. The circumstance that gave rise to their appointment determines also the nature of their office. While the church at Jerusalem was in the freshness of its youthful zeal, and abounding in charitable ministrations, certain of the Grecians, or converted Hellenists, complained that their widows were comparatively overlooked. It was a natural consequence of the rapid growth of the society, and of the apostles, who were its official heads, having more to do than they could properly undertake. On the presentation of this complaint, therefore, they began to see the necessity of a subdivision of office, with a corresponding distribution of work. The higher function belonged specially to them of ministering the Word of God, and founding by spiritual labours the church of Christ in the earth. To this they must devote themselves; and they could not leave it, as they said, "to serve (διακονεῖν) tables." They therefore exhorted the people to look out from their own number seven men who might be set over this business—men "of honest report, and full of the Holy Ghost." The advice was followed, and seven accordingly were chosen, whom the apostles ordained to the office of ministering or diaconizing in what lay below the province of those who had to attend to the ministry of the word and prayer. Their special business obviously was to look after the distribution of the alms of the church, and to see that none, especially of such as were not natives of Jerusalem, were neglected.

It has been argued by some, in particular by Archbishop Whately (Kingdom of Christ), and Bishop Hinds (History of the First Century), that as these seven were appointed for the purpose of superintending the ministrations to Grecian widows, there must have been an earlier designation of persons to the diaconate, who had a general charge of the distributions, especially as the apostles treated it as a thing which did not properly belong to them; and that those now chosen were only added to the existing number, to prevent any further complaints of partiality. But this view is not acquiesced in by those who have most carefully investigated the apostolic age; nor does it seem borne out by the recorded circumstances. The church at Jerusalem only gradually acquired a complete and regular organization. For a time the constant presence of the apostles, and the all-pervading brotherly feeling among the members of the community, would appear to render unnecessary official service of a subordinate kind. As they had their goods to a large extent in common, so the distribution would take place in a great degree also in common, the apostles allowing it to proceed, rather than actively interfering with it. But when the want of a more complete organization was found to have led to an irregular and partial action, the course of wisdom manifestly was to have a class of officers to look specially after the matter; and as it was the foreign converts who in such a case were most apt to be overlooked, so the persons actually appointed were probably, for the most part, of that class. There is no reason, however, for supposing that they all were. Philip, in particular, seems to have been a native of Palestine, and so, it is possible, were some of the others, though their names were Grecian. But as it was chiefly those from a distance who, as we have said, were likely to be neglected, so prudence would readily dictate the selection of deacons in much greater proportion from the foreign than from the native membership.

The title of deacons is not actually applied to the persons thus appointed; although in being appointed, as it is said, διακονεῖν τραπεζῶν, to serve or minister at tables, they are virtually so called. All ancient ecclesiastical writers regard the occasion of their appointment as that of the institution of the order of deacons. Not, however, of that as it came by and by to exist, constituting a lower order of clergy. Chrysostom and others expressly distinguish in this respect between the original diaconate and the ecclesiastical diaconate of subsequent times; and so do all the more recent and unbiassed church historians (Neander, Giesler, Rothe; also of commentators, Baumgarten, Alford, Hackett, Alexander). The institution, as recorded in the Acts, appears to have contemplated nothing further than the remedying of a present disorder, and by a fixed arrangement providing against a recurrence of the evil. It had consequently to do simply with the proper management of the alms of the church and the oversight of the poor. And so, in the office as originally set up in the other churches, and recognized by the apostle Paul, not a word is dropped of any higher work having been assigned these deacons than what belonged to the primitive seven; it is with the pecuniary or material interests of the congregation that they are associated, not with superintending and ruling in spiritual matters, 1 Ti. iii. At the same time one can easily understand how closely, at certain points, the one department of duty would press upon the other, and how readily the respective limits of each might, to some extent, be crossed. Having charge of the alms and offerings of the church, the deacons would naturally come to take the management of the agape or love-feasts, also of what was required for the administration of the Lord's supper; and it was but a step farther, which in many cases could not fail to be soon taken, to distribute through their hands the elements of the supper to the members of the church, and, in connection therewith, to exercise some supervision over the members themselves. Hence, in the account given by Justin Martyr (about A.D. 140) of the celebration of the eucharist, the deacons are represented as distributing to those present the bread and wine, and also conveying portions to the absent (Apol. sect. 66, 67). In the larger communities the work of the diaconship might thus by degrees encroach upon the province of the eldership, and include in its operations a certain amount of spiritual superintendence and pastoral agency; while, on the other hand, in the smaller communities, where there was no need for the same subdivision of labour, the presbyterate might themselves undertake what deacons were instituted to discharge.

Viewed in respect to the constitution of the church, the institution of the diaconship exhibits a development; yet one that was the result of circumstances, and afforded a pattern of what might lawfully and properly be adopted by Christian communities, rather than a direction, to which they must in all circumstances be conformed. The original occasion, and the fact of the institution of deacons, showed (as remarked by Baumgarten) that the apostolic office was not an adequate organization for the whole church. The weaknesses of human nature beginning, as they soon did, to discover themselves among the members of the community, called for the institution of a subordinate office, to work to the hand of those who filled the higher; and in yielding to this call the apostles gave the weight of their authority and example, not merely to the institution of this particular office, but also to a wise accommodation to circumstances in the direction and management of the affairs of the church. The high qualifications they set forth for those whom they deemed eligible to the office of deacon, disclosed to all future times the place due to the more spiritual elements of character in constituting a title to official appointments within the church; and the mode of appointment, recognizing alike the privilege of the ordinary members to choose, and their own authority to sanction the choice and ordain to the office, afforded at the outset a happy exemplification of the manner in which the rights of all should be respected. In process of time, and no doubt arising from another felt necessity, elders were appointed in the church at Jerusalem, for the purpose, in all probability, of taking the regular charge of the community, after the apostles began to be much required elsewhere, Ac. xv. 4. And of the seven who were first chosen to fill the office of deacon, two at least (Stephen and Philip) partook so largely of the copious outpouring of grace then conferred on the church, that they entered with great success on the work of evangelists. This, however, must be carefully distinguished from what properly belonged to them as deacons; it came to them from the special endowments and impulse of the Spirit.

The mention of Phoebe as a deaconess in the church at Cenchrea, Ro. xvi. 1, implies, as already noticed, the existence of a female deaconship in apostolic times. It would be rash to infer, however, from such a casual mention, that appointments of this sort were general in the church; and from no recognition of the office being found in the pastoral epistles, and no historical record anywhere of its origination, we may justly conclude that nothing essential depended on it, and that it was to be regarded as only of occasional or temporary moment. (Some have thought that the prescriptions regarding widows in 1 Ti. v. 9, have reference to deaconesses; but this is not by any means certain.) In the cities of Greece and Asia Minor, where women lived very much apart, and could rarely be had access to except by members of their own sex, deaconesses might be for a time almost essential to the well-being and progress of the church. But in Rome, and the West, greater liberty was enjoyed by the female portion of society in their intercourse with the world, and the service of deaconesses would be less urgently required. That they did very commonly exist in the larger churches, during the earlier centuries, the records of ecclesiastical history leave no room to doubt, though no general rule seems to have been adopted regarding them; and in process of time the institution of nunneries turned into a distinct and artificial channel nearly all that was available of separate female service.

DEAD SEA. See SALT SEA.

DEATH may be defined the termination of life; an event of different and unequal import, according to the nature and value of the life which it terminates and destroys. To this issue, life of every kind below the sun—vegetable, animal, human—is alike subject. In so far as it is connected with organization, this to our habits of thought appears, not indeed a necessary, but yet a natural consequence of the conditions of its existence. The material frames which are the seat and instruments of life, of volatile elements, and of fragile structure, seem not made to wear and last for aye; and in fact are constituted under a twofold law—the one determining their growth and development to an appointed maximum or maturity of life; the other, when this has been reached, inducing a process of decay, which, in the time appointed, issues in exhaustion of the vital functions, and decomposition and disappearance of the vital form.

Beyond question, it had been possible for God, if such had been his pleasure, to have made all creatures under a law of life. Scripture assures us, that man at least was at first placed conditionally under this law. There is, however, decisive evidence that, from the beginning, all other terrestrial life was constituted under the law of death. Besides the indications already referred to, of a limited and transient existence to plants and animals generally, the reproductive and assimilating organs and powers common to all living creatures, and the destructive organs, instincts, and habits of birds and beasts of prey, unmistakably contemplate, as they provide for, a system or constitution of things in which death should reign. It was long and generally held, indeed, that this law in the natural economy supervened upon the introduction of sin. But this 'idea, which Scripture does nowhere assert or sanction, is hard to be reconciled with the conclusion which physiology and anatomy have deduced from the deadly and digestive organs and powers of the animal frame, with the same certainty that any final cause is inferred from any of the works of God. And it must be regarded as conclusively refuted by the discoveries of geology, which demonstrate the prevalence of death in ages long anterior to the creation of man, or, so far as is known, the existence of sin. The earth's strata are now found to be full of the buried and embalmed remains of extinct life. Entire creations appear to have been destroyed in so many successive great catastrophes; and it is made evident by the state in which many of these fossils are found, that then, as now, life was sustained by death. Nor can it well be doubted that this state of things obtained even in the days of man's primeval innocence. If we try, we shall find ourselves baffled in the attempt to conceive how, even then, death could be strange or unknown. Must not the revolving year have been marked by the opening and the fall of the earth's foliage—the ripening, and consumption, and decay of the earth's fruits? Could our first parents drink of the rivers of paradise, or tread its verdant surface, or keep and dress its trees and plants, without—in every draught, at every step, by every stroke—quenching or cutting down myriads of animalcular or insect, as well as vegetable life? Although the flesh of animals was not yet given to man for food, is it supposable that the laws of animal life itself were all the while in abeyance—its instincts restrained, its powers unused, its appropriate pleasure withheld or denied? We know that, from the day of man's creation, he had given to him the idea of death. It was set before him as the just desert and consequence of disobedience. And whence should he have derived his conception of the import of the threatened evil, so readily as from death's visible dominion over the fowls of the heaven and the beasts of the field? It may be thought that this fact, if it were so, must have shaded and sullied the light and bliss of paradise. Yet with distinct knowledge and just confidence in the divine wisdom and goodness, why might it not as well consist with the happiness of unfallen man, as shall the greater death which sin has introduced, and will perpetuate in the moral universe, with the perfect blessedness of God's unfallen and redeemed family in the paradise above?

As incident to creatures of mere instinct or animal nature, there can be nothing judicial or of the nature of punishment in their ordination to death. Whether it may have been ordained by anticipation, or in keeping with the moral and legal relation of man, as to exist in a state of sin, and under a dispensation of judgment, we are not warranted to pronounce. It is, however, beyond question that, from this cause, and for man's sake, a curse has been brought upon the ground, and the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. Still man himself is by this means the greatest sufferer; and so far as it affects the other creatures, it can be only a physical evil, equally without moral cause or penal effect, of which by their nature they are unsusceptible. How this appointment is to be reconciled with the benevolence of the Creator is a hard question, which no light yet given to man enables him fully to resolve. So far, however, it may relieve the mystery, that, as a general rule, the enjoyments of the inferior creatures greatly exceed their sufferings—that death is but little, if at all, the object of their fear, or much even a cause of pain to them. Dr. Livingstone's experience, when seized by a lion, strikingly confirms this. "The shock," he says, "produced a stupor similar to that which seems to be felt by a mouse after the first shake of the cat. It caused a sort of dreaminess in which there was no sense of pain nor feeling of terror, though quite conscious of all that was happening. It was what patients partially under the influence of chloroform describe, who see all the operation, but feel not the knife. This peculiar state is probably produced in all animals killed by the carnivore, and if so, is a merciful provision by our benevolent Creator for lessening the pain of death" (Travels, p. 12).

That the sum of animal enjoyment quenched in death is largely compensated by the law of increase and succession, which both perpetuates life, and preserves it in the vigour of its powers and the freshness of its joys, is certain; and also—as bearing upon the physical and moral condition of man, to whose behalf, as chief in this lower world, all arrangements and disposals affecting the lower forms of life were subordinated—that their subjection to death has both enlarged immensely the extent of his physical resources, and multiplied manifold the means of his moral development and discipline.

But man himself is involved in the common doom. It is appointed unto all men once to die. This appointment is felt by us of nearer concern, and is shrouded in deeper mystery. Whatever theory be held with regard to the constitution of our nature, all are agreed as to its high pre-eminence above all other forms of terrestrial life. "God made man in his own image, after his own likeness, and set him over the works of his hands." It surely is not the imagination of a vain conceit, but rather the suggestion of a due reverence of divine wisdom, which would anticipate exemption from death as the distinction and privilege of a creature whom he has crowned with glory and honour. He guards and defends man's life by the severest sanctions of his law against the hand of violence; and can it be thought that, but for some special cause, his own hand would ever have been stretched out against it to destroy it? The reigning fact, man's death, seems to confute these reasonings, and almost resistlessly forces upon us the conclusion, that death is a physical necessity, or a universal law, extending to all material organizations, however otherwise psychologically distinguished or divinely allied. And this opinion has generally obtained among men of pantheistic and materialistic views in philosophy, and of Pelagian and Socinian views in theology. But surely it is impossible, consistently with God's omnipotency, to allege the necessity or the power of this law, as existing in despite of his pleasure and purpose, to constitute our nature under a law of life. It is more than probable that the other orders of creatures who dwell in life immortal in the heavenly places are not all spirit, or without their own mode and form of organized existence. We are assured that the bodies of the risen saints shall be clothed with incorruption and immortality. We know that, even as now constituted, the life of these frail bodies in antediluvian ages was prolonged to the verge of a millennium. And why should it be thought impossible for God, if so it had pleased him, to endure them with the powers, or provide for them the means, of repairing the wear and waste of life, so as to preserve their powers and sensibilities in unabated vigour and freshness, "even to length of days for ever and ever?"

This, Scripture informs us, was in the beginning provisionally ordained. The threatening of death against the breach of the covenant, is rightly understood to imply the promise of deathless and incorruptible life, so long as the covenant should stand. And the tree of life in the midst of the garden, if not by its physical virtue the means of life's perpetual and perfect renovation, was certainly the sacramental pledge of God's purpose to preserve it inviolate while man was steadfast in the covenant. And now that death reigns over all, the appointment is referred neither to physical necessity nor to arbitrary will, nor, as some have urged, to its suberviency to a partially beneficent economy in nature, by which the aggregate of sentient happiness in creation is increased; but to a judicial decree announced from the beginning by God, as judge, against man as a transgressor of his law.

Thus runs the tenor of the covenant or constitution under which life—man's life—was originally given and held, "Thou shalt not eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, for in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." And in terms equally explicit, to the transgression of the law is the entrance and reign of death over man ascribed: "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." Let it be observed that this declares the cause of death as it reigns over all men only. It affirms nothing respecting the cause of death as it reigns over other orders of creatures, in the present or in preceding stages of the world's existence. Whether, in any way, they may have been constituted under a law of death by anticipation, and as in keeping with a state of things in which death should reign over man, we do not venture to pronounce. That, indirectly and as a consequence of their relation to man as a sinner against God, their sufferings have been increased, and their lives shortened, it is impossible to doubt or deny. But if, in this view, sin be the occasion of their death, it cannot be the cause of it. They are incapable of sin, and cannot die judicially for sin. The contrary opinion which long and generally prevailed, that the creatures were immortal until man sinned, has as little to justify it in Scripture as in science. Death, it is there said, is the law of their being. And the true doctrine of the Scripture is, not that they die because man has sinned, but that man, because he has sinned, has forfeited his original and high distinction, and has become "like the beasts that perish."

It is unnecessary here to multiply Scripture proofs of this awful and humbling truth. Every one is familiar with the frequent and equivalent testimonies, that death is "the fruit," "the wages," the "end," and consummation of sin. And the circumstances which attend and induce it impressively connect it with sin as its cause.

How, if not through guilty forfeiture, should the life of man have been abbreviated in its term, so much more than that of many of the inferior creatures, and in so many instances still further shortened by disease and by calamity? To how great extent is it consumed by the fire of evil passion—smitten by the stroke of vengeful violence—taken away by the arm of judicial authority?—in all these cases sin visibly working death. And while embittered and burdened by manifold pain and sorrows, how irresistibly does conscience within disquiet and alarm us, by the conviction of guilt and the terror of righteous judgment?

But now, what is death?—or what does it import as an appointed doom? To answer this question rightly we require to ascertain the true constitution of our nature. Obviously death must be very different in the view of the materialist, who regards man as only a higher species of animal, whose mental and moral distinctions are the mere result of a higher physical organization; and in the judgment of those who consider man as the possessor of a soul distinct from the body, the subject and seat of a higher nature. If the body be the whole of man, death is the end of his conscious existence. If he consist of body and spirit, this event may prove but his birthday into another and more important state of being. Now, this point, which till the present hour has proved too hard for man himself to demonstrate, Scripture decides conclusively for all who will receive its testimony. Man is both body and spirit: the first placing him in communication with this outward world, the second allying him to God and his spiritual creation. The record of his primeval state exhibits the reality and effect of this complex being. While his earthly paradise yielded its riches and pleasures to every sense and sensibility of his animal nature, his higher life found its appropriate and pre-eminent occupation and delight in the service and communion of the "Father of his spirit."

These views, as they magnify the life which God gave us, must be felt to complicate the nature and effects of death. How then does it affect us? Does it reach the whole man, body and spirit? If so, how are they severally and together affected by it? And in what order, and by what process, does it consummate its work?

1. Death extends to the entire man and to every part of his nature. Against himself the threatening was directed, "In the day thou eatest thereof THOU shalt die." Beyond doubt the outward man perisheth, and surely the inner man, the subject of that sin of which the body is but the instrument, cannot have escaped the force of the dread sentence. God's Word assures us that the soul that sinneth shall die. Nay, it speaks of men as already dead, who yet live in the body—dead therefore spiritually. On the other hand, it speaks of men now alive through grace, who shall never die, while yet the graves are ready for them. Men who walk after the course of the world, and live in pleasure, are pronounced "dead in sin"—dead while they live. And while whose loveth his brother has "passed from death unto life," he that hateth his brother "abideth in death." These scriptures, while they distinguish between bodily and spiritual death, represent both as included in the sentence, and threatened and executed against the sinner.

2. To what effect then does death exert its power upon the body and the spirit severally and together? It is not unimportant to observe, that this is not extinction of existence, or annihilation either of the one or the other. For a time the body retains its form, and its substance, however changed, is never lost; much more may it be presumed shall the spirit survive. Not indeed that spirit more than body is immortal independently of God's will. But that seeing he preserves our inferior part, he will much more preserve the higher and more kindred product of his creative power. The effects of death upon the body itself are matter of common observation. Immediately it makes it powerless and insensate as the clod of the valley, quickly turning its comeliness into corruption, and finally reduces its form and structure into shapeless dust. The effect of bodily death on the spirit of the man where nature is thus divided, it may be more difficult to estimate. This may depend in part on the value of the earthly portion he has lost, and partly on the future portion on which he has entered; but it cannot be indifferent either to the child of sorrow, or to the subject of grace, more than to the heir of this world, whom it has stripped of his whole inheritance of good. While we look on the deserted and impassive corpse, and say "It is all over with him now," the disembodied spirit must still find itself the subject of a maimed and imperfect nature. For the effect of death upon the spirit is necessarily different from the effect of it upon the body. Consciousness belongs to its nature, and must endure while it has being. Its proper life lies in the harmony and subjection of its powers and dispositions to the nature and will of God; its death in contrariety and enmity to Him. This involves the disruption of a holy dutiful relation to the Father of spirits—and by inevitable consequence, a deprivation of those fruits of his love and favour on which life and blessedness depend. "Your sins have separated between you and God." This is emphatically the bitterness of death. As it affects the body, it terminates all happy connection with the external world; as it affects the spirit, it excludes from all joy in God. Though now, while its effects are incomplete, it is neither altogether unfeared nor unfeared, yet the engrossments of earthly life meanwhile lessen our sense and apprehension of the magnitude of the evil. Not till the body is cut off from its earthly portion, and the spirit cast out from its portion in God, shall its awful import be fully known.

3. It may tend further to clear this subject, to notice briefly the order and process through which the work of death is consummated. Though incurred instantaneously on the act of transgression, its effects follow by successive stages, and at several and more or less distant intervals. As caused by sin, the spiritual man, as the proper subject and source of the evil, first feels its power. Its very touch intercepts all happy intercourse with a holy God. This was felt and seen on the day that Adam sinned. His fear and flight at the voice of the Lord God in the garden was the unmistakable symptom of a soul already dead in sin, which could not, dared not, live with God; while his expulsion in displeasure from the symbols of God's presence, marked no less clearly that God had ceased to live with him. Thus was executed to the letter the word which God had spoken, "In the day thou eatest thou shalt surely die." But the work of death thus begun does not stop here. The disruption of the creature's relation to God, it may well be conceived, must introduce disorder into all the relations and interests of its being; nor unless with a view to some ulterior design of signal judgment or of more signal mercy, might its full development and consummation be long delayed. But in subserviency to this end does man live on, in the body for a season, though, as to God, "he is dead while he liveth." Yet it is but for a little time. Whatever be the result of this day of forbearance, the work of death goes on—the body is dead because of sin. There is no discharge from this decree, and no exception to it. The body returns to the dust whence it was taken. This is another crisis which awaits every individual man in his own time. As distinguished from spiritual, it is called temporal death, as superadding exclusion from the things of earth and time, to the loss of all happy interest in God. There remains but one further stage ere it reach its complete and final issue, both in the individual and the race. When the designs of the divine administration in our world are finished, the bodies of all who sleep in dust shall be re-organized. There shall be a resurrection of the just and of the unjust. While the just, by faith through grace, shall be raised to life incorruptible and glorious, the unjust, impenitent and unbelieving, shall awake to the resurrection of damnation. The whole man shall go away from the glory and joy of God's presence into everlasting punishment. This is the second death.

From the Word of God, which thus sets forth the terror and duration of the death which entered and reigns over man through sin, we receive the glad tidings of life—eternal life, given back to sinners through grace. Christ, the Lord from heaven, having borne and exhausted in his own body on the tree, the curse of the first covenant incurred by the sin of Adam, is constituted to his church and people the Redeemer from death and the Author of eternal life. It is an anxious question how may these tidings consist with the continued reign of death over the bodies of men, alike over men of Christian faith and character, as surely, as shortly, as painfully, as humbly, as over the unbeliever and the ungodly! Shall we hold that while it retains indiscriminately the same repulsive and appalling aspect to all, its nature to the Christian is nevertheless changed from a foe to a friend, and as some speak, a favour—a benefit—the fruit of God's fatherly love. This it will be equally hard to reconcile with Scripture testimony or human feeling. It is indeed said, that to the Christian "to die is gain," but plainly this is not meant of what it is, but of what it does. It is ever spoken of as the fruit and desert of sin, and as an enemy—"the last enemy." In Christians as in others, "the body is dead because of sin." But if so, where is the efficacy, or what the proof of the efficacy, of the Redeemer's death? If still his people die for sin, has not Christ died in vain; and is not the hope of his people vain? God forbid! Had it been the declared intent or the promised effect of the interposition of Christ, to arrest the sentence against sin, or to prevent its full execution upon the sinner, this universal mortality might have been alleged as a practical evidence of the entire failure of his design. But Scripture and experience concur to show us, that the purpose of Christ's interposition was not to prevent or arrest the work of death in progress, but to undo and reverse the completed ruin. It is to be observed, that notwithstanding the redemption by Christ, every child of Adam, in soul and body alike, inherits this sad entail. The heirs of the Christian salvation, like others, are born in spiritual death and abide in it, many of them often for a lesser or longer period of their time in the flesh. The redemption of the cross does not cut off nor remove from them the entail from the broken covenant, until in a day of grace they believe and live anew by his quickening Spirit. On the same principle we may presume it asserts its dominion over the body as over the spirit. Thus first, under the power and in vindication of the first and broken covenant, sin reigns unto death over the whole man, and next "grace reigns through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord." This completed triumph however is reached, like death's conquests, by successive stages, and at several and distant epochs. First, in the day of regeneration, on the return of God's Spirit, when life begins anew, where death first began its work, in the soul. From thenceforward, though still bound to a body of death and sin, the man is quickened and made alive from the death of sin. Again, in the day of dissolution, when the body returns to its dust, he is set free from the encumbrance of mortal flesh, and in the spirit reaches the blessed state of just men made perfect. And finally, in the day of the resurrection of all the dead, when Christ shall come the second time, to reap the matured trophies of his first advent, "death shall be swallowed up in victory." The bodies of his saints raised incorruptible, and re-united to their spirits—glorious in his image—shall enter upon their inheritance of endless life. [J. H.]

DEBIR [oracle, hence applied by Solomon as the distinctive name of the most holy place in the temple, 1 K1. vi. 16, 19; vi. 8, &c.], the name of a town in the tribe of Judah, a few miles to the west of Hebron. This was a later name, for before the conquest of Canaan it had been called Kirjath-sepher, which means book-city, Jos. xv. 16; Ju. i. 11, and also Kirjath-sanna, Jos. xv. 49, which, according to Bochart, signifies city of law or instruction. These were probably but different forms of substantially one designation; and Debir, in the sense of oracle or authoritative utterance, does not very materially differ in meaning. Some would make it still nearer, taking Debir in the sense of things written, arranged in a row; but this seems unnatural (Kell on Joshua, ch. xv. 16). The place is never mentioned in the history of subsequent times; but it must have been a town of considerable importance and strength at the time of the conquest; as its siege and capture by Joshua is particularly described, Jos. x. 28, 29, and having been retaken by the Canaanites, Caleb promised his daughter Achsah to the person who should succeed in again subduing it. The prize was gained by Othniel, the nephew of Caleb, ch. xv. 16. We may suppose, from the name, that in former times it had been a seat of learning of some sort; and possibly this might form one reason for afterwards making it a priestly city, ch. xxi. 15. Another town of the same name is mentioned in connection with the inheritance of Gad, Jos. xiii. 24.

DEBORAH [bee]. 1. Rebekah's nurse; of whom explicit mention is made only in connection with her death. She died after Jacob's return to the land of Canaan, and was buried under an oak near Bethel, Ge. xlv. 8.

2. DEBORAH. By much the most distinguished person, who bore this name, was one of the public characters raised up during the period of the judges in seasons of trouble and emergency. The tribe she belonged to is not distinctly mentioned, though it is usually, and with the greatest appearance of probability, supposed to be Ephraim. She is called a prophetess, and is said to have judged Israel, Ju. v. 4, taking her seat under a palm-tree, which came to bear her name, in Mount Ephraim, between Ramah and Bethel. Thither the people resorted for counsel during the oppression of the land by Jabin. The very circumstance of a woman appearing to take such a part was a sign of the degeneracy of the times, and the prevailing want of faith among the covenant-people. Deborah herself referred to this in the rebuke she conveyed to Barak for his faint-heartedness in the cause of God, ch. v. 9; and again, more generally, near the commencement of her song—

“In the days of Shamgar, the son of Anath,
In the days of Jael the ways were deserted,
And highway-travellers went by crooked by-paths;
Leaders failed in Israel—they failed,
Until that I Deborah arose—Arose as a mother for Israel.”—(De Wette's Translation.)

Even she, however, with all the influence which her prophetic gifts conferred on her, had the greatest difficulty in rousing the people to make common cause against the enemy; and it appears from different parts of her song (especially ver. 16, 17, 23) that portions of the tribes refused the most urgent solicitations to venture into the conflict. A comparatively small number of men, chiefly of the tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali, with some also from Ephraim and Issachar, under the command of Barak, amounting only to ten thousand, actually assembled, and pitched on Mount Tabor. Thither Sisera, the captain of Jabin's army, with an immense host, and no fewer than nine hundred chariots of war, drew his forces, and encamped in the plain below. Notwithstanding the disparity of numbers, however, at the word of Deborah, the small but select company of Barak rushed down upon the enemy, and put the whole multitude to flight. In this hostile encounter, it would appear, from certain allusions in the song, that the force of Barak was signally aided by interpositions of Providence. Deborah compares the day to that of the Lord's appearance on Mount Sinai, when the heavens dropped and the earth melted; speaks also of a fighting from heaven, of the stars fighting in their courses, and of the river Kishon sweeping away the adversaries, ver. 4, 20, 21. The language is no doubt general, and in form highly poetical; but it certainly conveys the idea of something like a violent storm, probably of thunder and rain, occurring at the time, and receiving a direction, that tended materially to co-operate with the attack of Barak in discomfiting the enemy. The result was a complete deliverance from the thralldom which had for many years oppressed the land; and while Deborah in her song of praise does not overlook the human instruments that took part in the struggle, she is careful to ascribe the real cause and glory of the achievement to God. The song, considered simply as a poetical composition, undoubtedly possesses high merit. As it is one of the oldest lyrics in existence, so for some of the higher qualities of that species of poetry—for dramatic life and action, for pictorial skill in the employment of a few graphic strokes, for glow of feeling, boldness and energy of expression, torrent-like rapidity of thought and utterance—it has rarely been surpassed, and, as a female production, perhaps seldom equalled. Exception has been taken to it in a spiritual point of view, on account of the unqualified praise it pronounces on the conduct of Jael, and the revengeful spirit it seems to breathe against the enemies of Israel. But in such judgments the peculiar circumstances of the times are too much overlooked; and it is silently implied not only that the same principles are to be maintained at all times by the people of God, but that they must also receive nearly the same mode of manifestation. But this were to make the present the standard and measure of the past, to make the manhood condition of the church give the law to its comparative childhood. (See, however, under JAE)

[The song of Deborah has been treated at considerable length by various German writers, especially by Herder in his Geist der Ebraischen Poesie; also in his Letters on the Study of Theology; by Kenrick in a separate publication; by Von Gumpach in his Attest. Studien—to which the critical student may refer. Such writers, however, are not the best guides in respect to the theological bearing of the song.]

DEBT. In the legislation of Moses the treatment of debt is remarkably just and equitable, and contrasts favourably with what prevailed among many nations of antiquity. From the general distribution of property, indeed, among the members of the Hebrew commonwealth, the precautions taken to secure the perpetuation of inheritances, and the discouragements laid on commercial enterprise, there was comparatively little temptation to the incurring of debt among the Israelites; in the great majority of cases, if incurred, it must have been the result of culpable folly and extravagance. It was proper, therefore, that penalties to some extent should be imposed to check the tendency where it might flagrantly discover itself. The first, and the only one that in ordinary circumstances would require to be brought into play, was the forfeiture of the paternal inheritance till the year of jubilee. But this might sometimes not be sufficient; it might be necessary for the debtor himself to go along with his inheritance, in order to yield a sum adequate to meet his obligations, to sell his services for a season, as well as his property, and this was the furthest claim that the law authorized. “If thy brother that dwelleth by thee be waxen poor, and be sold unto thee, thou shalt not compel him to serve as a bond-servant; but as an hired servant, as a sojourner shall he be with thee, and he shall serve thee unto the year of jubilee; and then he shall depart from thee, both he and his children with him, and shall return unto his own family, and unto the possession of his fathers shall he return,” Le. xxv. 39-41. In reality, this species of slavery was only a going into service for a term of years, that the creditor might reap the benefit, and was very far from reducing the debtor to a place among the goods and chattels of another. The creditor was not empowered to imprison his debtor, or visit him with any corporal infliction; nor could practical hardship and injustice be enforced, except by a violation of the statutes of the kingdom. No doubt, there were violations of that nature in the times of public backsliding and degeneracy; but these are not to be ranked with severities sanctioned by law, and which were not unknown in other countries. In Rome the creditor could subject the debtor to very harsh treatment, and in certain cases could press even capital punishment. The right of incarcerating debtors in Egypt had proceeded so far before the time of Sesostris, that he is said to have interfered for their deliverance (Diod. i. 54). A law was ultimately enacted prohibiting the seizure of a debtor's person; but by another law the creditor was entitled to possession of the family tomb, so that the debtor lost the right of interring any member of his family so long as the debt remained unpaid (Wilkinson, ii. p. 35).

enactments in the legislation of Moses may justly be regarded as a proof of its comparatively mild spirit, and still higher proof was to be found in the many wise provisions it contained for securing a well-conditioned people, and checking the evils that lead to the accumulation of debt. (See under USURY and SERVITUDE.)

DECALOGUE (Gr. δέκα λόγοι) the term commonly applied by the Greek fathers to designate the ten commandments, or ten words, as it always is in the original (Sept. δέκα λόγοι), and now commonly employed in theological language for the same purpose. It does not actually occur in Scripture; but as it is the most fitting collective designation of the ten commandments, we shall present under it the explanations that seem needful to be given respecting the form and substance of this remarkable piece of divine legislation.

1. Its economical importance first demands notice. The giving of it marks an era in the history of God's dispensations. Of the whole law this was both the first portion to be communicated, and the basis of all that followed. Various things attested this superiority. It was spoken directly by the Lord himself—not communicated, like other parts of the old economy, through the ministrations of Moses—and spoken amid the most impressive signs of his glorious presence and majesty. Not only were the ten commandments thus spoken by God, but the further mark of relative importance was put upon them, of being written on tables of stone—written by the very finger of God. They were thus elevated to a place above all the statutes and ordinances that were made known through the mediator of the old covenant; and the place then given them they were also destined to hold in the future; for the rocky tablets on which they were engraved undoubtedly imaged an abiding validity and importance. It was an emblem of relative perpetuity. The very number of words, or utterances, in which they were comprised, ten, bespoke the same thing; for in the significance that in ancient times was ascribed to certain numbers, ten was universally regarded as the symbol of completeness (Spencer de Leg. Heb. l. iii.; Bähr, Symbolik, vol. i. p. 176). And in accordance with all this, as also in further confirmation of it, the position in the tabernacle assigned to the tables which contained the decalogue, bespoke their singular importance: they were placed at the centre of the whole religion and polity of Israel—in the ark of the covenant, that stood between the cherubim in the most holy place, under the throne of God. They were emphatically "the tables of the covenant;" the law which was embodied in them was itself termed "the covenant," De. iv. 13; ix. 9; Ex. xxv. 21, &c.; and simply from being the depository of them the ark bore the name of the "ark of the covenant." In the revelation of law, therefore, the decalogue stands comparatively alone; it has a place and character peculiarly its own, and while it had a close and pervading relation to other parts of the Mosaic economy—had a close relation also to the prior covenant of promise, which it distinctly recognized and embodied in its very form (for all which see under LAW), there must have belonged to it a depth and fullness of meaning, such as no other piece of legislation possessed, and entitling it to the pre-eminent distinction it occupied. This on examination will be found to be the case; but there is a preliminary point that requires first to be briefly noticed.

2. There has been given to the decalogue a double record, first in Ex. xx. 2-17, again in De. v. 6-21; and there are certain differences between the two forms, which have been taken advantage of by rationalistic interpreters, sometimes for the purpose of disparaging the historical correctness of either form, and sometimes as a conclusive argument against the doctrine of plenary inspiration. The differences are of three kinds: (1.) Simply verbal, consisting in the insertion or omission of the Hebrew letter v, which signifies and; in Exodus it is only omitted once where it is found in Deuteronomy, namely, between graven image and any likeness, in the second commandment; but in Deuteronomy it occurs altogether six times where it is wanting in Exodus; and of these, four are at the commencement of the last four commandments, which are severally introduced with an and, joining them to what precedes. (2.) Differences in form, where still the sense remains essentially the same; under the fourth commandment, it is in Exodus "nor thy cattle," while in Deuteronomy it is "nor thine ox, nor thine ass, nor any of thy cattle"—a mere amplification of the former by one or two leading particulars; and in the tenth commandment, as given in Exodus, "thy neighbour's house" comes first, while in Deuteronomy it is "thy neighbour's wife;" and here also after "thy neighbour's house," is added "his field"—another slight amplification. (3.) Differences in respect to matter: these are altogether four. The fourth commandment is introduced in Exodus with remember, in Deuteronomy with keep; the reason also assigned for its observance in Exodus is derived from God's original act and procedure at creation, while in Deuteronomy this is omitted, and the deliverance of Israel from the land of Egypt is put in its stead; in Deuteronomy the fifth commandment runs, "Honour thy father and thy mother, as the Lord thy God commanded thee," the latter words having no place in Exodus; and in the tenth commandment, instead of "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife," it stands in Deuteronomy "Thou shalt not desire thy neighbour's wife"—differing only, however, in this, that the one (covet) fixes attention more upon the improper desire to possess, and the other upon the improper desire itself.

It is obvious that these differences leave the main body or substance of the decalogue, as a revelation of law, entirely untouched; not one of them affects the import and bearing of a single precept; nor, if viewed in their historical relation, can they be regarded as involving in any doubt or uncertainty the verbal accuracy of the form presented in Exodus. We have no reason to doubt that the words there recorded are precisely those which were uttered from Sinai, and written upon the tables of stone. In Deuteronomy Moses gives a revised account of the transactions, using throughout certain freedoms, as speaking in a hortative manner, and from a more distant point of view; and, while he repeats the commandments as those which the Lord had spoken from the midst of the fire and written on tables of stone, De. v. 22, he yet shows in his very mode of doing it, that he did not aim at an exact reproduction of the past, but wished to preserve to some extent the form of a free rehearsal. This especially appears in the addition to the fifth commandment, "as the Lord thy God commanded thee," which distinctly pointed back to a prior original, and even recognized that as the permanently existing form. The introducing also of so many of the later commands with the copulative and, tends to the same result; as it is precisely what would be natural in a rehearsal, though not in the original announcements, and came from combining with the legislative something of the narrative style. Such being plainly the character of this later edition, its other and more noticeable deviations—the occasional amplifications admitted into it, the substitution of desire for covet, with respect to a neighbour's wife, in the tenth command; and of the deliverance of Israel from Egypt, for the divine order of procedure at the creation, in the fourth—fall to be regarded as slightly varied and explanatory statements, which it was perfectly competent for the authorized mediator of the covenant to introduce, and which, in nature and design, do not materially differ from the alterations sometimes made by inspired writers of the New Testament on the passages they quote from the Old (see Fairbairn's Hermen. Manual, p. 364, seq.) They are not without use in an exegetical respect; and in the present case have also a distinct historical value, from the important evidence they yield in favour of the Mosaic authorship of Deuteronomy; since it is inconceivable that any later author, fictitiously personating Moses, would have ventured on making such alterations on what had been so expressly ascribed by Moses to God himself, and which seemed to bear on it such peculiar marks of sacredness and inviolability. (Havernick's Introduction to the Pentateuch, sect. 26.)

It follows from these remarks, that any view formed of the decalogue as a whole, or of any of its parts, which rests upon the differences in the later as compared with the earlier form, and gives the preference to the later, must be rejected; it inverts the proper order and relation of things. Of such a nature is the view that is sometimes propounded respecting the fourth commandment, where the reason urged in Deuteronomy for its faithful observance by the Israelites—their signal deliverance from the land of Egypt—is made to supersede the more general ground on which the institution is based in Exodus; and the sabbatical ordinance is consequently exhibited as a distinctively Jewish solemnity. Even were this to be taken as the only reason assigned, the argument founded on it would not be valid; for the fifth commandment also is enforced by a strictly Israelitish promise, while no one is foolish enough to maintain, that the matter of the command is thereby contracted into a merely Israelitish obligation. In all ages of the church special reasons, arising out of present acts of mercy or of judgment, may be, and often have been, employed to enforce general and permanently binding duties. In the case now more immediately in hand, the special could never be intended to interfere with the earlier and more general; it could only have been thrown in as an incidental and subsidiary consideration: both, because the deliverance of Israel from Egypt could not, like the argument from creation in Exodus, be adduced as an adequate reason for formally grounding an institution like the Sabbath, and also because the account in Deuteronomy professes to be no more than a rehearsal of what had elsewhere obtained its primal record. It is not there, therefore, but in Exodus, that we are to look for the more fundamental representation. God's delivering Israel from Egypt might well induce them to practise the mercy involved in the Sabbath as an existing institution; but the procedure of God in creating the world in six days and resting on the seventh, was what originated the sabbatical order, and fixed it in the very constitution of things.

Another and equally groundless application has been made of the precedence given in Deuteronomy to the wife of one's neighbour, as if, by placing this before his house (which stands first in Exodus), a kind of separate place were secured for her, and to covet the wife were a different thing in principle from coveting house and possessions: thus the prohibition to covet falls into two commands. So, for example, Kurtz, in his History of the Old Covenant; although, in stating the opposite view, he presents what may justly be regarded as a conclusive argument against it: "The command, Thou shalt not covet, it is said, however manifold may be the objects of covetous desire, is still essentially one. This is raised to undoubted certainty by the circumstance, that in Exodus the house, while in Deuteronomy the wife, is named first. If there were indeed two commands, the ninth according to Exodus would be, 'Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house,' but according to Deuteronomy, 'Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife.' This, however, would be an absolute inexplicable contrariety; whereas, if all the objects of covetous desire were brought into one command, the transposition would be quite trivial and insignificant, in no respect more noticeable than the other differences which appear in the free reproduction of the commandments in Deuteronomy" (ii. sect. 47, 8). Kurtz admits the truth of this—if the relation of the account in Deuteronomy to that of Exodus were as we have supposed; but refusing to concede this, and conceiving that the position of the wife in Deuteronomy may be the original one, that the form in Exodus may have arisen from a corruption in the text—that the twofold introduction of thou shalt not covet, applied to wife and goods respectively, renders it in fact a double precept (as if the second command might not for a like reason be split into two)—and that by so splitting it we most readily get a division of the whole commandments into the sacred three and seven—three for the first, and seven for the second table; on these grounds, which are entirely hypothetical and fanciful, Kurtz adheres to the Romish view, which finds two precepts of the law in the command against coveting. The alleged grounds cannot weigh much with those who take the records of Scripture as they stand, and in their treatment of these accustom themselves to look at things in their broad and natural aspect, instead of straining after minute and refined considerations.

3. Discarding, then, such disturbing notions regarding the matter of the ten commandments, and holding these to have been pronounced and engraven on the tables as recorded in Ex. xx., we have to note the distinctive peculiarities and excellencies that characterize them as a revelation of God's will, or a comprehensive summary of man's duty. There are certain points concerning them on which a diversity of opinion exists, and particularly as to the distribution of the commands into two tables: but there are great and important features about which little or no room for controversy may exist. (1.) One of the most prominent of these is the intensely and predominantly moral tone of the revelation. It speaks throughout, not of formal distinctions or external services, but of fundamental principles, holy feelings, essential relationships, and the pure, reverent, upright, or merciful behaviour, by which they should be honoured and maintained. Even the comparative externalism of the fourth command appears but as a provision for securing a moral aim—participation for each individual in the sacred rest and blessing of God, and seasonable repose for his dependants and cattle. At such a time—in an age when religion was everywhere running out into shows and ceremonies—under an economy also which itself partook so largely of the outward and symbolical—it surely was a remarkable, as well as ennobling peculiarity, that this central revelation of truth and duty should have stood so much aloof from the circumstantial, and brought men's hearts so directly into contact with the realities of things. (2.) A second, and equally conspicuous point, is the relative place given to the things which concern men's obligations toward God, and those which concern their obligations toward their fellowmen. If it may be matter of dispute how many of the specific ten belong to the one class, and how many to the other, it is certain—palpable to every eye—that the claims of God go first, and gradually merge into the claims that lie upon one member of the human family to another. To be right with God—it was thus virtually proclaimed—is the first, the grand thing; yea, and that which, when properly attained, is the best security for keeping right with one's fellowmen. Religion, as consisting in the knowledge and love of God, is the root of social worth; and fidelity to the higher relationships is the ground and animating principle of obedience in the lower. Hence also it is in connection with those commands which more or less directly affect our relation to God, that reasons are assigned for the observance of them (in the first the reason even takes precedence of the command); while in those that explicitly relate to our neighbour there is the naked utterance of the precept: as if, when the former was complied with, the latter could require no separate enforcement. Josephus already drew attention to this as one of the characteristic excellences of the constitution set up by the hand of Moses, who did not (says he) "make religion a part of virtue, but saw and ordained other virtues to be parts of religion" (Apon, ii. 17); and it is in the decalogue that this distinctive feature has its most palpable and striking embodiment. (3.) Another remarkable feature in this moral code is the admirable order and arrangement of its several parts. It does not merely present a summary of human obligation toward God and man, but presents it in such a form as itself bespeaks the impress of a divine hand. Thus in regard to the objects contemplated in the different precepts, they begin at the most vital point, and gradually recede to what less closely and directly touches the person or interest of the individual: God—in his being, in his worship, in his name, in his day, in his earthly representatives; then one's neighbour—in his life, in his dearest possession (his second-self, as it were), in his common property, in his general standing and position (all that may be affected by false testimony regarding him), in his place in one's good-will and affection. Then, in regard to the subjects of the obligations imposed, everything belonging to them as rational beings is in each department of duty laid under contribution—heart, speech, and behaviour; yet in different order, as might best suit the different relations. The moment one's relation to the true God—the spiritual, the all-seeing, the omnipresent—comes into view, it is of necessity the heart that is primarily concerned; he must have the proper place in its regard and homage, otherwise nothing in a manner is granted; the work of obedience is never so much as begun. Here, therefore, the decalogue takes its commencement, in the demand of God to be acknowledged as alone entitled to the homage of his creatures: no other must be set up before him—not even in the imaginations of the heart, for he is also there, nay there specially and peculiarly. That the heart is more immediately in view, is still more evident from the prohibition given in the next command against graven images; implying, that if he was properly eyed at all, it must be in the region of the inner man—in the spiritual regard that was proper to a spiritual being, of whom no visible representation was admissible. Then, as here we have the consecration of the heart to God, so in what follows there is a like consecration demanded of the speech (the third), and the conduct (the fourth, and to some extent also the fifth). If now we turn to the other class of relations, while the heart of love is equally necessary to yield a full and proper satisfaction to their claims, it is not so indispensable as regards the overt acts of duty, or the personal interest of one's neighbour. He may be the object not of hostile or injurious, but of dutiful and benignant treatment, though the heart is not toward him as it should be; and here, accordingly, the order is of the inverse kind—deed (in the sixth, seventh, and eighth), speech (the ninth), and the heart (the tenth). But if we regard the fifth as occupying a kind of intermediate position between the divine and the human—parents being somewhat in the room of God, and yet the objects of only a human affection—then the honour enjoined toward them may be said to include all the three—heart, speech, and behaviour are alike involved in it. But as regards the precepts more distinctly and obviously relating to one's neighbour, the order is as exhibited above; from the behaviour to the speech, then from the speech to the heart. Thus, "the end corresponds with the beginning; the heart is distinguished as the alpha and the omega, as that from which everything proceeds, and to which everything tends" (Hengstenberg). And with the spirituality of the law so clearly stamped on the very form of the decalogue—a law, too, that as proceeding from a spiritual and holy God, must necessarily have partaken of his own character—it seems almost inexplicable how divines can be found (as they sometimes still are) speaking of it as demanding only an external and civil obedience. (4.) One further peculiarity concerning it deserves to be noted—namely, its predominantly negative aspect. That it was not simply the prohibition of overt acts of evil which the decalogue aimed at, but that every "thou shalt not" implied a counter "thou shalt," is manifest from the heart being, as has been stated, so distinctly required, and also from some of the commands taking the positive form (the fourth and fifth). At the same time it cannot be without a meaning that they were made to run so much in the prohibitory style. It doubtless arose from the depravity of the human heart, which needs on every hand to be restrained and checked in its tendencies to sin. The more immediate reason of the law being given was, because of the abounding of transgression, Ga. iii. 1; and the prohibitory form into which its commands were chiefly thrown, testifies that the bent of men's spirits is toward the evil and not toward the good. So that the decalogue, in its very form, is a standing testimony against the sinfulness of man, as well as for the holiness of God.

tion, is seen to be a matter of comparatively little moment when the decalogue itself is rightly understood. Stress is undoubtedly laid upon the number ten, as that in which the whole were comprised; and the fact is also once and again stated, that they were written upon two tables. But it is nowhere indicated how many of the commands were written upon one table and how many upon another. For anything said in Scripture itself, the two may have been chosen simply because, from the size of the ark in which they were to be deposited, one might not have been sufficient for the purpose, and more than two would have been unnecessary. In New Testament scripture we find the import of the ten comprised under two fundamental precepts, called respectively the first and the second commandments: the one requiring the supreme love of God, and the other the love of one's neighbour as one's self, Mat. xxii. 37-39. But though the ground of this division exists in the very nature of the moral law, and the precise words embodying it are found in different places of the Pentateuch, so that it could not be unknown to the ancient Israelites, it is not said, either in Old or New Testament scripture, how many of the ten precepts of the law are embraced in the first and great commandment of love, and how many in the second. Nothing therefore depends, for any scriptural principle connected with the subject, on the precise division adopted; and if the several precepts were but fairly dealt with and fully exhibited, no concern need be felt about their formal classification. In reality, however, there have been considerable diversities of opinion in the matter, and not merely certain schools of interpretation, but entire communities have shown a disposition to take up here a distinctive ground regarding it. There can be no doubt as to what was the earliest, and what also must ever be regarded as the simplest view. Both Philo and Josephus expressly state, and in doing so doubtless indicate the prevailing belief of their time, that the decalogue fell into two halves, in correspondence with the two tables, and that five were written upon the one table and five upon the other. In his treatise on the decalogue Philo calls the fifth commandment (Honour thy father and thy mother, &c.) the concluding one of the first table, and also represents it as having had its place on the confines of the two tables, because of the parental relationship appearing to partake partly of the divine and partly of the human. Josephus is equally explicit both as to the division into the two fives, and also as to the first five terminating with the command to honour father and mother (Antiq. III. c. 4, sect. 5). "The first commandment," he says, "teaches us that there is but one God, and that we ought to worship him only; the second commands us not to make the image of any living creature, to worship it; the third, that we must not swear by God in a false matter; the fourth, that we must keep the seventh day by resting from all sorts of work; the fifth, that we must honour our parents; the sixth, that we must abstain from murder; the seventh, that we must not commit adultery; the eighth, that we must not be guilty of theft; the ninth, that we must not bear false witness; the tenth, that we must not admit the desire of that which is another's."

This arrangement, so far as regards the ten constituent parts of the decalogue, has also the suffrage of many of the most intelligent and learned of the fathers. Origen, in his eighth homily on Genesis, not only adopts it, but reasons for it, in preference to another mode which was beginning to find advocates, and which would throw the first and second command into one; he rejected this because he could not in that case get the number ten complete; either, therefore, not knowing of the attempt to accomplish this by dividing the prohibition against lust into two, or not deeming it deserving of notice. Jerome (on Ep. vi. 2), follows the same order; also the author of the commentary on Ephesians in Ambrose's works; Gregory Nazianzen, in his poem on the decalogue; and it became the prevalent one in the Greek church, as in later times among the churches of the Reformation, excepting the Lutheran.

Augustine adopted a different mode of enumeration which has received the sanction of Rome, and is also adhered to by most Lutheran divines. According to it the first and second commands, in the explanation just given, are thrown into one, on the ground that they both relate to the worship of God; and the prohibition against coveting is split into two, from its being said to be one thing to covet a man's wife, and another to covet his house or possessions. But obviously the chief reason was to find in the first part of the decalogue, the more distinctively religious part, a reference to the Trinity. After referring to the other view Augustine said, it appeared to him more congruous to divide the whole into three and seven, "inasmuch as to those who diligently look into the matter, the precepts which relate to God seem to insinuate the Trinity" (Quest. in Ex. 71). But this respect to the Trinity in a moral code would be out of place; and though both three and seven were occasionally employed as sacred numbers in Scripture, yet one can see no adequate reason for such a division in the decalogue, which from the very nature and form of its contents points to a perfectly simple twofold division. Besides, the command to acknowledge but one God did not of itself exclude the possibility of worshipping him by images: the one has respect to the object of worship, the other to its manner—two distinct things; while coveting is essentially one, whatever its precise object. To make the coveting of a man's wife different in kind from coveting his house or field, would be to take it out of the category of coveting, and place it in that of sensual indulgence (the seventh). This arrangement, therefore, is greatly inferior in naturalness and logical order to the one previously mentioned; and practically it has proved an unhappy one; as it has served in Roman Catholic countries to throw quite into the back-ground the prohibition against idol-worship.

A mode of enumeration current among the Jews, and indeed adopted in the Talmud, so far coincides with the Augustinian view, that it combines the first and second commands into one; but differs in other respects. The first command, according to it, is the declaration, "I am the Lord thy God, who brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage"—which, however, is no command, as Origen long ago remarked, but is simply the revelation of the Being who proclaims the commands, and, as such, lays the ground of all the obligations imposed, more especially of that imposed in the first command immediately following—to take him, and him alone, for God.

There still is a difference of opinion among the Reformed, who agree with Philo, Josephus, Origen, &c., as to the mode of making up the ten commands, in regard to the division into two tables; many, with Calvin, referring four to the first and six to the second; while others, following Philo and Josephus, assign five to the one and five to the other. This last is undoubtedly the simplest arrangement, and is justified by the consideration that parents are viewed as God's earthly representatives, toward whom the young must first "show piety," as the best preparative for their ultimately fearing God. But, as already remarked, the command can only in part be referred to the first table; it has a certain affinity also with the second; and while formally it should perhaps be associated with divine obligations, it practically links itself to human interests and social duties.

DECAPOLIS, the Greek αἱ δέκα πόλεις, the ten cities, thrown into one word, and applied as a proper name to a region or district lying to the north and north-east of the Sea of Galilee. It is occasionally mentioned in the gospels as a district, from which people came to wait on our Lord's ministry, or which he himself visited; but without any specific account of the territory it embraced, or the cities whence it derived its name, Mat. iv. 25; Mar. v. 20; vii. 31. That it belonged to the part of Syria mentioned above is evident from the last passage referred to, where it is said that Jesus, "departing from the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, came to the Sea of Galilee, through the midst of the coasts of Decapolis." It is sometimes spoken of as belonging to Galilee, but only one of the cities included in the ten lay within the bounds of Galilee proper (Scythopolis). The list of Pliny is the following:—Damascus, Philadelphia (the Rabboth of De. iii. 11), Raphana, Scythopolis (the Bethshan of 1 Sa. xxxi. 10), Gadara (in Perea, Mar. v. 1), Hippos, Dios, Pella, Gerasa (Gadara), and Canatha. Pliny admits that there was some diversity in regard to the cities actually assigned to the district (in quo non omnes eadem observant, Nat. His. v. 16); and Josephus certainly must have understood the matter otherwise, as he designates Scythopolis the greatest city in the Decapolis (Wars, iii. 8, 7), which he could not have done, if, according to his reckoning, Damascus had belonged to it. Eusebius seems to have regarded it as a section of Perea, since he describes it as that part of Perea which lies about Hippos, Pella, and Gadara (Onomath.) The probability is that the precise cities to some extent differed at one period as compared with another. They seem to have been associated together, not in a civil, but in a commercial league, with the view of promoting the interests of the Greek population resident in them; and it may have been found expedient at times to drop a particular city from the number, and assume another in its stead. The diversity that appears in the ancient enumerations would thus be quite naturally explained.

DEDAN occurs as the name of two different individuals mentioned in Scripture—the earliest, a son of Raamah, and grandson of Cush, Ge. x. 7; and the other, one of the sons of Jokshan, and grandson of Abraham by Keturah, Ge. xiv. 3. Nothing is said of the particular localities respectively occupied by the families or posterity of these two persons; only, as Jokshan, the father of the Abrahamic Dedan, was sent away by Abraham, along with the other sons of Keturah, "eastward, unto the east country," it may be presumed, that if the family grew into a distinct tribe, it would be found somewhere in that direction. Such in reality was the case. In the burden of Arabia, as depicted by Isaiah, ch. xxi. 13, special mention is made of the travelling companies of Dedanim; from which we may infer that they formed one of the many Arabian tribes, and that they were much given to the caravan or inland trade of the East. In like manner the prophet Jeremiah associates them with the Edomites, and represents the calamity which was ready to befall the seed of Esau, as fraught with danger to the inhabitants of Dedan; they are admonished to take special precautions, lest it might involve them also in ruin, ch. xlix. 8; and in ch. xxv. 23 he connects Dedan with Tema and Buz, two other Arabian tribes. The allusions in Ezekiel are entirely similar, both as to the region they occupied, ch. xxv. 13, and the manners they followed; for they appear among the traders who ministered to the extensive merchandise of Tyre, along with those of Sheba and Tarshish, ch. xxvii. 15-20; xxxviii. 13. These are all the notices to be found in Scripture respecting the Dedanites; and there can be little doubt that they are to be understood of the people who sprung from Jokshan, the son of Abraham by Keturah; since they were found in the quarter to which the father of that Dedan migrated, and appear also in a certain affinity with tribes which belonged to the same original stem.

Of the other Dedan we know absolutely nothing but his parentage; and it is quite arbitrary to suppose with some (Winer, Gesenius), that the genealogies given of the two Dedans were but different traditions of the origin and descent of the one tribe. It has been supposed, chiefly from a place Dadan being known to have stood near the Persian Gulf, that the descendants of the Cushite Dedan had probably settled there, and given their name to the place. But this is quite doubtful; and it is more in accordance with the actual truth to say that no certain information exists upon the subject.

DEDICATION, FEAST OF. A special service of consecration, either in setting apart anything that was to be devoted to a sacred use, or in cleansing a sacred thing from some pollution, that had rendered it unfit for its proper destination, was called a dedication. Thus, the tabernacle was dedicated when, with certain rites of purification, it was actually set apart for divine service, Ex. xl.; and in like manner the temple, when by solemn invocation and sacrificial offerings it was opened by Solomon and the ministering priests, 1 Ki. vii. But what among the later Jews was called emphatically the dedication, and in commemoration of which a stated observance or feast was kept up, was the fresh consecration of the temple after it had been profaned by the foul abominations of Antiochus Epiphanes, as recorded in 1 Mac. iv. 52-59. The event it commemorated took place B. C. 164; and the feast itself is once mentioned in the history of our Lord's earthly ministry. Speaking of his discourses with the Jews on a certain occasion, St. John states "it was at Jerusalem the feast of the dedication, and it was winter," ch. x. 22. The feast fell in the ninth month of the Jewish year, which nearly coincided with our December, on the 15th of the month. Josephus expressly notices the observance of this feast in honour of the Maccabean dedication as practised in his day; and there is no reason to doubt that it was the feast referred to by the evangelist. The celebration of it, however, was not confined to Jerusalem, but was also kept up in other places. They called it "lights," Josephus says (Antiq. xii. 7. 7), because, as he supposed, their liberty had been restored to them beyond their hopes. The feast was observed for eight days, and the modern Jews have turned it into lights, in the literal sense; for "on the first night they light one light in the synagogue, on the second night two, on the third night three, adding one every night till the last night, when they light up eight. These lamps are to be lighted with oil of olive in commemoration of the miracle [that, namely, which they fable to have been wrought at the dedication, when, they say, God miraculously caused a small portion of oil, sufficient only for one night, to burn for eight nights, till a fresh supply could be obtained]; but where oil of olive cannot be procured they burn with wax. It requires no suspension of any business or labour, and beside the lighting of the lamps, and a few additions to their ordinary prayers and daily lessons, is chiefly distinguished by their feasting and jollity" (Allen's Modern Judaism, p. 416).

DEILILAH [the drooping or languishing one], a Philistine woman, who resided in the valley of Sorek, and gained the affections of Samson. It is not said that he took her to wife, but merely that he loved her, and had frequent and familiar intercourse with her. The impression left upon the mind by the narrative of this portion of Samson's life is that she was a person of loose character, and that his connection with her was of an improper kind. Indeed, this seems evident alone from the account which the lords of the Philistines sought to make of her influence over Samson. When it became known how he frequented her house, they endeavoured by bribes to obtain through her the secret of her lover's marvellous strength—which it is scarcely conceivable they should have done, if she had been known to be of good reputation, and had stood to him in the relation of a proper spouse. But they found in Delilah the fit instrument for their purpose. She loved their bribes greatly better than the honour, or even than the life, of Samson, and by dint of cajolery and perseverance she wrested from him the fatal secret, by disclosing which he soon found he had delivered up his strength into the hands of his enemies, and instead of their terror, had rendered himself their sport and tool. She is therefore to be regarded as an example, not of a deceitful and treacherous wife, or even of a lover, in the ordinary sense, proving false to her plighted faith, but rather of a wily and profligate seducer, in whom no confidence should have been placed, and who seeks to captivate only that she may lure and destroy. DELUGE. The word used in the English Bible for the great catastrophe which destroyed the old world is food; but as this term is applied also to other and comparatively common events, the word deluge has now come to be regarded as the more appropriate and fitting designation of the great event under consideration. Accordingly, with this word we shall connect the discussion of the general deluge—so far as such a discussion is admissible in a work like the present.

There are many references in Scripture to the subject, as one of the more important and prominent facts in the world's history, fraught with lessons of instruction for all times; but the historical account of the event is comprised in Genesis, ch. vi.—viii. In this account attention is first very pointedly drawn to the cause of the catastrophe, while it was still only an event in prospect; it was because "the wickedness of man was great in the earth," inasmuch that it even "repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth. And the Lord said, I will destroy man whom I have created from the face of the earth," &c. And again, when announcing to Noah both the purpose of destruction, and the preparation to be made against it, "God said, The end of all flesh is come before me; for the earth is filled with violence through them; and behold I will destroy them with the earth. Make thee an ark of gopher-wood," &c. So that the coming deluge was announced in the strongest terms as a judgment on the incorrigible wickedness of man, which under the benignant constitution of the antediluvian world had reached a height altogether subversive of the great end of God in the creation of mankind, and of the real well-being of the world itself. Then, in regard to the extent of the calamity, it is said, "Behold I do bring a flood of waters upon the earth to destroy all flesh, wherein is the breath of life, from under heaven; and everything that is in the earth shall die. But with thee I will establish my covenant. . . . And of every living thing of all flesh, two of every sort shalt thou bring into the ark, to keep them alive with thee." Fowls after their kind are specified, cattle, and even every creeping thing of the earth—a male and female of each; and in the case of clean creatures, those employed for purposes of worship, the two were afterwards increased to seven. And when the final order was given to take them into the ark, it was said, "I will cause it to rain upon the earth forty days and forty nights; and every living substance that I have made will I destroy from off the face of the earth." Beside these torrents of rain from above, like the opening of heaven's windows, it is afterwards stated that the fountains of the great deep were broken up, that in consequence the waters prevailed exceedingly upon the earth, "covering all the high hills that were under the whole heaven" to the depth of fifteen cubits and upward; that all flesh died upon the earth of man, beast, fowl, and creeping thing; Noah only remained alive, and those that were with him in the ark. At the end of 150 days, we are further told, the waters abated; in the seventh month, on the seventeenth day, they had so far decreased as to admit of the ark resting on Mount Ararat; then, after waiting for a while, Noah sent forth a raven, which did not return, but went to and fro till the waters were dried up from off the earth, that is, it found, though with difficulty, the means of subsistence away from the ark. A dove afterwards sent forth speedily returned, indicating that the earth was not yet ripe for her gentler nature. A second trial with the dove issued in her return with a fresh olive-leaf in her mouth, bespeaking the existence both of dry land and of returning vegetation. A subsequent trial with the dove, after an additional interval, when she no longer returned, convinced Noah that the ground had become well-nigh ready for man and beast, so that ere long the entire inmates of the ark left their temporary abode, to occupy the renovated earth. The whole period they were in the ark was a year and ten days—from the 17th day of the 2d month of Noah's 600th year, to the 27th day of the 2d month of the following year.

Such briefly is the Mosaic account of the deluge; and the difficulties to which it gives rise have respect mainly to two points—the apparent universality ascribed to it, and the equally apparent inadequacy of the means indicated, whether for effecting a universal deluge, or for preserving during an entire twelvemonth a complete representation, after the manner described, of the entire animate creation upon earth. The first question then which naturally calls for consideration, is whether the account is really to be understood of an absolute universality, or of a simply relative one? Undoubtedly, if read from the present advanced stage of the world's history, it would be impossible to understand the language otherwise than of an absolute universality; for now, that every region of the world is known, and known to be more or less occupied by man and beast, it must have been in the strictest sense a world-embracing catastrophe, which could be described as enveloping in a watery shroud every hill under the whole heaven, and destroying every living thing that moved on the face of the earth. But here it must be remembered, the sacred narrative dates from the comparative infancy of the world, when but a limited portion of it was peopled or known; and it is always one of the most natural, as well as most fertile sources of error, respecting the interpretation of such early records, that one is apt to overlook the change of circumstances, and contemplate what is written from a modern point of view. Hence the embarrassments so often felt, and the misjudgments sometimes actually pronounced, respecting those parts of Scripture which speak of the movements of the heavenly bodies in language suited to the apparent, but at variance, as has now been ascertained, with the real phenomena. In such cases it is forgotten that the Bible was not intended to teach the truths of physical science, or point the way to discoveries in the merely natural sphere. Of things in these departments of knowledge it uses the language of common life. And so, whatever in the scriptural account of the deluge touches on geographical limits or matters strictly physical, ought to be taken with the qualifications inseparable from the bounded horizon of men's views and relations at the time. If population had not yet spread very far from the original centre of the human family, nor covered more than a few regions of the earth, as there is good reason to believe (see on ANTEDILUVIAN WORLD), what would be an absolute universality, so far as the human race was concerned, might in other respects be nothing more than a relative universality—if the transactions are simply viewed and recorded in their bearing on the condition and interests of mankind.

Now, that they were so considered is evident from the whole tone and purport of the narrative. It is the moral aspect of the matter which the sacred historian keeps prominently in view; he presents it in no other aspect than as God's judgment on the doomed and impenitent race of transgressors, who had filled the earth with corruption and violence. And just as in the first transgression, so here the living creaturehood of the earth are represented as suffering in the catastrophe, simply from their connection with the rational beings to whom they stood in a relation of subservience. It was consequently the earth as the field of human occupancy—the earth in so far as it had become the theatre of men's moral agency, and the witness of their crimes—which was in the eye of the sacred writer. And whether the catastrophe of which he wrote actually reached farther or not, the circumstances of the case did not absolutely require that it should do so; the demands of scriptural interpretation would be met if it embraced all within the sphere which man had yet made his own; for on that alone was the mind of the sacred penman concentrated.

In confirmation of this as a perfectly warrantable view of the matter, we can appeal to other passages of Scripture, in which expressions, equally universal in their literal import, must still, from the very nature of things, have been meant only of a limited universality—embracing the whole, but still no more than the whole, of the totality lying within the aim and scope of the writer. Thus in the Pentateuch itself, speaking of the great famine in the days of Joseph, it is said, “the dearth was in all lands,” and “all countries came into Egypt to buy corn,” Ge. xii. 64, 67. So again in regard to Israel, when on the eve of entering the land of Canaan, “This day will I begin to put the dread of thee, and the fear of thee, upon the nations that are under the whole heaven, who shall report of thee, and shall tremble,” De. ii. 25. “The fame of David,” it is said in later history, “went forth into all lands;” and of David's son, “all the earth sought to Solomon to hear his wisdom,” 1 Ch. xiv. 17; 1 Ki. x. 24. Turning to New Testament scripture, we find the apostle Paul intimating to the Romans, that “their faith was spoken of throughout the whole world,” and informing the Colossians, that “the gospel which they heard was preached to every creature which is under heaven,” Ro. i. 8; Col. i. 23. Such modes of expression indeed are common in all writings which are addressed to the popular understanding; and they create no difficulty so long as people place themselves in the position of the writer, and think of the kind of universality present to his mind at the time. Nothing more is necessary in respect to the account of the deluge, to render its terms compatible with a limited universality, coextensive with the bounds of the human family, yet possibly reaching to no great distance beyond.

Accordingly, there were not wanting theological writers, who, long before any geological fact, or well-ascertained fact of any sort in physical science, had appeared to shake men's faith in a strictly universal deluge, actually put the interpretation now suggested as competent upon the narrative of the deluge. Thus Poole, who flourished in the middle of the seventeenth century, says in his Synopsis on Ge. vii. 19: “It is not to be supposed that the entire globe of the earth was covered with water. Where was the need of overwhelming those regions in which there were no human beings? It would be highly unreasonable to suppose that mankind had so increased before the deluge, as to have penetrated to all the corners of the earth. It is indeed not probable that they had extended beyond the limits of Syria and Mesopotamia. It would be absurd to affirm that the effects of the punishment inflicted upon men alone applied to places in which there were no men.” Whence he concludes, that “if not so much as the hundredth part of the globe was overspread with water, still the deluge would be universal, because the extirpation took effect upon all the part of the world which was inhabited.” In like manner Stillingfleet, a writer of the same period, in his Origines Sacrae, (b. iii. c. 4) states, that “he cannot see any urgent necessity from the Scripture to assert that the flood did spread over all the surface of the earth. The flood was universal as to mankind; but from thence follows no necessity at all of asserting the universality of it as to the globe of the earth, unless it be sufficiently proved that the whole earth was peopled before the flood—which I despair of ever seeing proved." Indeed, this view dates much further back than the comparatively recent time when these authors lived; for while Bishop Patrick himself took the other and commoner view, we find him thus noting in his commentary on Ge. vii. 19: "There were those anciently (i.e. in the earlier ages), and they have their successors now, who imagined the flood was not universal—ἀλλ' ἐν ᾧ οἱ τότε ἀθρώποι ἤκουον—but only there where men then dwelt; as the author of the Questiones ad Orthodoxos tells us, Quest. 34." It is certain, therefore, that this is not a question between scientific naturalists on the one side, and men of simple faith in Scripture on the other. Apart from the cultivation or the discoveries of science, we have two classes of interpreters of Scripture, one of which find no reason to believe in more than a restricted universality, while the other press the language to its furthest possible extent—take it, not as descriptive of God's judgment upon the earth, in so far merely as it was occupied by men, but with reference to the globe at large, and to an event in its natural history. Which of the two modes of interpretation is to be followed? Surely, in such a case, if science has any clear and determinate light to throw upon the subject, it has a right to be heard; and it would be equally foolish to reject its testimony here, as in the parallel line of physical astronomy.

Now, in making our appeal to science, there is no need for venturing upon hypothetical ground, or travelling into regions which can yield at most but a problematical or doubtful testimony. Such, for example, is the difficulty of accounting, on scientific principles, for such a mass of water as might have been sufficient for enveloping the entire globe to the depth specified in the sacred narrative. If the relative proportions of sea and dry land were precisely then as they are now—if the mountains all stood at the same elevation—and if no other resources than such as are now known to naturalists were accessible for giving the requisite direction to the waters of the earth, and furnishing them in the proper abundance—then the conclusion might be safely enough drawn that the deluge could not be absolutely universal. But it is impossible to say for certain what differences in those respects may have existed at the period of the deluge, as compared with more recent times; and such changes are known to have taken place within the periods of scientific research, as will at least leave room for the supposition, that possibly there may have been natural causes adequate to account for the submergence of all that was then dry land. The same substantially may be said in regard to the skill and resources requisite to construct a vessel capable of bearing any considerable burden, to fit it as a suitable habitation for multitudes of living creatures, and keep them all alive and afloat upon the waters for months together. Here, again, our information is too limited to admit of very definite results being arrived at, being too little acquainted with the position of matters in the antediluvian world, and the supernatural aid that may have been communicated to Noah for the occasion.

But in regard now more particularly to this second point—the capacity of the ark for the preservation and support of animal life—it is one upon which our present knowledge enables us to speak with entire confidence, and in decisive rejection of the idea of a strictly universal deluge. We know from the description of the sacred historian pretty nearly what were the dimensions of the ark, and we now also know near enough for all practical purposes the number of distinct species of animals, fowls, and creeping things upon the earth; and by no conceivable possibility could the ark be made to receive the whole of these by twos and sevens, after the manner specified in the text, and provide food for all sufficient to outlast a twelvemonth. The measurements of the ark are given in cubits, which as anciently employed were of somewhat variable length, though in the earliest times it is most likely the natural cubit that was commonly in use—the distance from the elbow to the point of the middle finger—and which usually amounts to about eighteen inches. But allowing that the larger measure of twenty-one inches should be understood—as is contended for by Raleigh, Shuckford, Hales, Kitto, &c.—we shall have for the length of the ark 547 feet, by 91 feet in breadth. It was made of three stories, so that the area yielded by these numbers must be trebled to give the entire capacity of the structure; but it still does not quite amount to 150,000 square feet; and, as Hugh Miller remarks by way of comparison, must have "fallen short by about 28,000 square feet of a single gallery (the northern) of the Crystal Palace of 1851." Could such a space contain, even for a month, to say nothing of a year, pairs of every distinct species of the animate creation? By the writers above referred to, and many others, laborious calculations are entered into to show that the area of the ark could meet the demands of the problem in its utmost extent; but such calculations always proceed upon an immensely inadequate estimate of the numbers of extant species of living creatures. It is astonishing how these have grown upon our hands, as naturalists have pursued their investigations into different regions of the world. Raleigh thought it enough to "seek room for eighty-nine distinct species of beasts, or, lest any should be omitted, for one hundred." These had to be multiplied by two, and allowance made for the sevens of the clean animals, so that there might be 280 in all; "and all these 280 beasts might be kept in one story or room of the ark, in their several cabins; their meat in a second; the birds and their provision in a third, with a space to spare for Noah and his family, and all their necessaries." Such was the easy mode of stowage for the living creaturehood of the earth, and its necessary food, which presented itself to Sir Walter Raleigh. But the progress of science has made it infinitely harder work for his successors in this line of calculations. Buffon by his more extensive researches in natural history reckoned double the number of quadrupeds that Raleigh thought it necessary to make allowance for; but so far was even he beneath the reality, that instead of 200, there are known to exist upon the earth 1658 species of animals. Such is the number given, for example, in Johnstone's Physical Atlas of 1856; and later editions will probably add somewhat to those already ascertained. But supposing these to be the whole, they could not yield less, when taken by twos and by sevens, than about 4000 animals—for so greatly have the species of ox, deer, sheep, and goat increased (the clean animals which were to be preserved by sevens), that upwards of 1000 individuals of that class alone would need to be reckoned. And then to these have to be added somewhere about 6000 species of birds, not far from 1000 reptiles which cannot live under earth, and of insects some hundreds of thousands. When such myriads of living creatures as these come into our reckoning, it is clear as day, that no single structure could contain accommodation for them all, with means of support for an entire year—not though it were many times the size of Noah's ark. Nor is it simply, we must remember, the lodging-room and sustenance required for so many creatures, that has in such a case to be thought of, but the personal attendance in the ark necessary to minister to all their daily supplies of food, and keep everything in proper order. In this respect we have but the services of eight persons to take into account, and what these could avail even for a tithe of the number specified above, it is impossible to conceive.

There are other considerations of a scientific kind which come in aid of the conclusion we are obliged thus to arrive at. One of these is, the geographical distribution of animals in accordance with the native temperaments and habits of each. In proportion as new regions of the world have been laid open to our view, they have brought us acquainted with fresh species of creatures not found elsewhere; these are to all appearance indigenous and peculiar to their respective localities, and many of them are incapable of living for any length of time in a climate materially different from that which nature has assigned them. They could not, without violence to their respective constitutions, have been kept alive in one region; nor could they, if anyhow brought and kept together, by any conceivable expedients be transported to their distinctive localities. Indeed it appears that throughout the whole history of animated being, the different regions of the earth have had, to a considerable extent, their peculiar forms of organized existence. "The sloths and armadillos of South America had their gigantic predecessors in the enormous megatherium and mylodon, and the strongly-armed glyptodon; the kangaroo and wombats of Australia had their extinct predecessors in a kangaroo nearly twice the size of the largest living species, and in so huge a wombat that its bones have been mistaken for those of the hippopotamus; and the ornithic inhabitants of New Zealand had their predecessors in monstrous birds, such as the dinornis, the aptornis, and the palapterix—wingless creatures like the ostrich, that stood from six to twelve feet in height. In these several regions two generations of species of the genera peculiar to them have existed—the recent generation, by whose descendants they are still inhabited, and the extinct generation, whose remains we find blocked up in their soils and caves. But how are such facts reconcilable with the hypothesis of a universal deluge?" (Miller's Testimony of the Rocks, p. 334.)

Other considerations point to the same result: the natural impossibility, for example, of obtaining or laying up flesh for the support of carnivorous animals and birds; the certain destruction that must have ensued to a very large proportion of the seeds and plants of the earth, if they had been so long under water; and to fresh-water fish, if in all regions of the globe the sea had totally and for months together overspread the dry land; but it is needless here to go farther into detail. The facts already mentioned render the notion of a universal deluge, in the literal sense, at variance with the light of reason; and of the two competing interpretations, we are, in a manner, compelled to decide in favour of that which does not place the sacred narrative in antagonism to the results of modern science. What precise area of the earth's surface might be covered by the waters of the deluge, or by what particular agencies these waters might have been let loose for their work of destruction, it may be impossible to determine with any certainty; since attempts in that direction must be in a great degree conjectural, and can never yield more than a partial degree of satisfaction. Let it be enough to adhere to the general facts—which we believe to be all that are necessarily involved in the scriptural narrative—that somewhere about two thousand years before the Christian era the inhabited portion of the world was totally submerged in water—that the whole existing race of mankind perished in the catastrophe, with the exception of Noah and his family, who were preserved in an immense vessel that he had been instructed beforehand to prepare—and that along with them also were preserved specimens of the living creatures belonging to the region, sufficient to propagate the several species in the new world, and minister to the wants of those who by God's mercy escaped the general destruction. Thus understood, there is not only nothing in the history of the deluge to render it justly liable to suspicion, but there is much also to commend it to our reasonable belief.

I. It is not opposed by any known phenomena in the physical history or condition of the world, but, analogically at least, derives from some of them a measure of confirmation. Had it been capable of proof that the crust of the earth exhibits no appearance of having ever been subject to the operation of violent agencies, or the overflowing of mighty waters, there might have been some ground for questioning the scriptural account of the deluge. But the reverse is known to be the case. There are undoubted indications of both kinds of action—appearances in the earth's strata which can only be accounted for by the most powerful forces from beneath having wrought upwards with disturbing violence—alluvial deposits near the surface which betoken the action of great floods sweeping over the land—in some of these also the remains of animals belonging to still existing or nearly allied species. Such things, if not immediately connected with the Noachian deluge, at least bear evidence to the same kind of agencies which served instrumentally to bring it about, and of results not unlike to those in which it issued.

At one time certainly it was thought that the physical history of the world was capable of yielding a more direct and specific testimony to the scriptural account of the deluge. It was supposed by not a few cultivators of natural science that the organic remains which are found in the rocks of later formation were those of animals and plants that belonged to the antediluvian world, and had been entombed in the bowels of the earth by the catastrophe which terminated that pristine order of things. In Dr. Hales' Chronology, for instance, all such appearances, and along with them the disruptions of the earth into islands and continents, lofty mountains, rugged precipices, and deep ravines, are all thrown together as clear proofs of the universality of the deluge, and even of its general progress from north to south (vol. 1. p. 325, seq.) This phase of opinion, however, could only prevail in the infancy of geological science, or rather before geology had attained to the condition of a science, and when a few isolated appearances were hastily assumed as the basis of some precocious theory. As soon as the appearances came to be subjected to close investigation, it was perceived that those organic remains represented very different periods, and periods not only distinctly marked as earlier and later, but also as so remote in point of time that the most recent of them must be held to have been antecedent to the creation of man and the existing constitution of the world. The opinion referred to, therefore, has now to be numbered among the things that were.

The same fate has subsequently befallen another idea, which had more to countenance it in the actual appearances of things, and for a time received the suffrage of men of science. It is that which ascribed the formation of diluvium or drift found in many parts of the earth to the Noachian deluge. This diluvium, lying near the surface of the earth, and composed of various materials—sand, pebbles, fragments of rocks, organic remains—and often laid as if it had been drifted into its present position by the action of a mass of waters flowing in a particular direction, was at first not unnaturally connected with the deluge. The Reliquiæ Diluvianæ of Dr. Buckland, published in 1823, had for one of its specific objects the establishment of this conclusion; and Professor Sedgwick gave his support to the same view of the subject. But again more careful investigations proved the idea to be destitute of any just foundation. So Professor Sedgwick admitted in a speech before the Geological Society so far back as 1831. He held it then to be “conclusively established, that the vast masses of diluvial gravel scattered almost over the surface of the earth do not belong to one violent and transitory period. It was, indeed, a most unwarranted conclusion, when we assumed the contemporaneity of all the superficial gravels on the earth. We saw the clearest traces of alluvial action, and we had in our sacred histories the record of a general deluge. On this double testimony it was that we gave a unity to a vast succession of phenomena, not one of which we perfectly comprehended, and under the name diluvium classed them all together.” Dr. Buckland, in his Bridge-water Treatise, made substantially the same acknowledgment, and admitted that the phenomena in question appeared to have proceeded from “geological revolutions produced by violent eruptions of water, rather than the comparatively tranquil inundation described in the inspired narrative.” In short, it appears beyond any reasonable doubt, from the component elements of those drift accumulations, and other characteristic marks, that they point to a period much anterior to the deluge of Noah, and indicate an agency greatly more violent and protracted than it is represented to have been. The crust and surface of the earth exhibit no clearly ascertained and indelible traces of the Noachian deluge; nor, in truth, should such ever have been looked for. This was calmly maintained, even when the current of scientific belief ran strong in the contrary direction, by a man who was equally distinguished for his philosophic mind and his simple faith in divine truth—Dr. John Fleming. In Jameson's Philosophical Journal, 1826, he wrote thus: “From the simple narrative of Moses, it appears that the ark had not drifted far from the spot where it was first lifted up, and that it grounded at no great distance from the same spot; that the waters rose upon the earth by degrees; that the flood exhibited no violent impetuosity, displacing neither the soil, nor the vegetable tribes which it supported, nor rendering the ground unfit for the cultivation of the vine. With this conviction in my mind,” he adds, “I am not prepared to witness in nature any remaining marks of the catastrophe; and I find my respect for the authority of revelation heightened, when I see on the present surface no memorials of the event.”

At the same time, if the remains existing on the earth's surface afford no direct or specific proof of the deluge, they still bear a collateral, and by no means unimportant testimony to its credibility. For though, as Buckland has stated in his Bridge-water Treatise, “we have not yet found (nor perhaps are likely to find) the certain traces of any great diluvian catastrophe, which we can affirm to be within the human period, we can at least show that paroxysms of internal energy, accompanied by the elevation of mountain chains, and followed by mighty waters desolating whole regions of the earth, were a part of the mechanism of nature. Now, what has happened again and again, from the most ancient up to the most modern periods in the natural history of the earth, may have happened once during the four thousand years that man has been living on its surface. So that all anterior improbability is taken away from the fact of a deluge such as that of Noah.” This is the fair and legitimate use to make of the evidences that appear in the earth's strata and surface of previous cataclysms and diluvial catastrophes. They conclusively establish the occurrence of facts that belong to the same order as the Noachian deluge, and are perfectly valid against such shallow reasoning as that of Voltaire, who, to get rid at any cost of the Bible account of a deluge, denied the existence of anything of a like nature in the past—could even take refuge in the wild imagination that the soil of the earth might possibly produce fossils. Such an unreasoning extreme of infidelity was well replied to by Goethe, long before Buckland directed his mind to the subject. Speaking of Voltaire in his Autobiography, he says, “When I now learned, that to weaken the tradition of a deluge, he had denied all petrified shells, and only admitted them as lusus nature, he entirely lost my confidence; for my own eyes had on the Baschberg plainly enough shown me, that I stood on the bottom of an old dried-up sea, among the carriæ of its ancient inhabitants. These mountains had certainly been covered with waves—whether before or during the deluge did not concern me; it was enough that the valley of the Rhine had been a monstrous lake—a bay extending beyond the reach of eyesight—out of this I was not to be talked.”

Nor is the analogical argument altogether confined to these convulsive movements anterior to the human period; there have been also, in the times posterior to it, partial changes, oscillations as to natural level in portions of the earth's surface, with corresponding alterations between sea and land, of a kind probably not unlike to what happened at the deluge, though greatly inferior in compass and degree. On the coast of Chili the effect of two earthquakes in 1822 and 1833 was such, that over an area of 100,000 square miles the coast has been raised in one part two feet above high-water mark, and in another to the same extent.

depressed. In the Bay of Baïa, near Naples, there exist the ruins of an ancient temple, that of Jupiter Serapis, with several columns standing nearly erect. For a time these must have been submerged in the sea by the subsidence of the land, as appears from certain holes pierced in them by a class of perforating bivalves, which live only in the sea; while again, by a subsequent, and as must be supposed, very gradual elevation of the ground, they have been raised and now stand above the sea-level. Who can tell how far causes of a like nature may have operated in the region which we have reason to believe was the more peculiar scene of the deluge, and contributed to its accomplishment? The depression to a certain depth of the tracts occupied by the human family below the Caspian, or any other adjacent sea, would have all the appearance, and the effect also, of opening up the fountains of the great deep. And if, within or near that particular region, there are "vast plains, white with salt, and charged with sea-shells, showing that the Caspian Sea was at no distant period greatly more extensive than it is now" (Testimony of the Rocks, p. 348), it cannot be deemed improbable, that when a great work of judgment had to be executed, and a lesson of moral discipline administered to all coming ages, the chief means of executing it might have been found in bringing into play such elements and operations as are known to have been at work in other times and places. So that, if no tangible, conclusive evidence of the Noachian deluge can be appealed to in the physical history of the earth, there is not only nothing to discredit it, but not a little in various respects to commend it to our belief.

II. Passing from the physical to the political or the national history of the world, we find nothing to militate against the scriptural account of the deluge, nothing at least that can stand the test of an impartial and rigid examination. The world contains no authentic records, or extant monuments, that carry up the evidence of human agency and civilization to a period too remote for such a catastrophe as that of the Noachian deluge. The more important nations of antiquity did undoubtedly lay claim to a continued existence, which, had it been real, would have been incompatible with such a general wreck of human life and interests as is represented to have then occurred. But all pretensions of this nature have given way before the advancing light of careful research and scientific knowledge. The old Indian, Chinese, Egyptian, and other such like claims to an incredible antiquity are now universally assigned to the region of fable; and the astronomical tables derived from the East, which were so artfully framed as to deceive such men as Bailly and Playfair, have been found to possess no higher authority than cunning forgeries. (See Narce's Bampton Lectures.) Even later and less suspicious-looking proofs of national longevity, which have been paraded by opponents of the Bible, have on closer examination been found false witnesses in regard to the point under consideration. It is not long since that the zodiacs found inscribed on the temples of Esné and Dendera, in Upper Egypt, had a kind of fabulous age ascribed to them, reaching to thousands of years, not only before the deluge, but before the creation of man, according to the Old Testament chronology. The deciphering however of the Greek portions of the inscriptions, and the partial interpretation of the hieroglyphics, have dissipated these golden dreams of a hoar antiquity. It has been ascertained that the temple at Dendera was consecrated to the Roman emperor Tiberius. "The temple of Esné, whose construction was placed as far back as 3000 years before the Christian era, has a column, whose inscription gives it the date of the tenth year of the emperor Antoninus. There is still more decisive proof, that these zodiacs have no reference either to the precession of the equinoxes, or a change of the solstices. A mummy cloth brought from Egypt has a very legible Greek inscription respecting a young man who died in the nineteenth year of the reign of Trajan. The cloth has also a zodiac painted on it, marked in a similar manner to that of Dendera, and therefore was, in all probability, a mere astrological composition respecting the individual whose body was wrapped up in it. The zodiacs in the temples are probably astrological formulae respecting the dedication of the building, or the nativity of the emperor in whose reign it was constructed" (Dr. Scooter, in King's Geology, p. 63).

It is true that some of the more zealous of those who have given themselves to Egyptian studies still persuade themselves that they have, in the remains of Egyptian architecture, the surviving witnesses of times greatly more remote than the era of the deluge. But it is also true that the data on which their conclusions rest are, to a large extent, conjectural; that the view is not concurred in by Wilkinson, and many of the more learned and judicious investigators of the subject, whose mind was substantially expressed in the words of the great chronologer Ideler:—"The history of ancient Egypt is a labyrinth, of which chronology has lost the thread." Indeed, the view may be said to carry its own refutation along with it, as it would assert for Egypt a high position of art and civilization, when all the world besides was either unpeopled, or sunk in absolute barbarism.

III. But while there are no historical evidences in the political history of the world against the Mosaic account of the deluge, whether written or monumental, there are the amplest traditional testimonies in its favour. These are, from the remoteness of the event, the only kind of direct collateral evidence that the case properly admits of. It was one of Hume's objections against the historical verity of the Pentateuch in general, that it was not corroborated by any concurring testimony. But how could it! There is no written testimony extant, apart from what is found in the Bible (which contains the primeval records of the human race), that comes within centuries of the time to which even the latest accounts in the Pentateuch refer. There is here, therefore, no room for concurring testimonies, though, in respect to such an event as the deluge, at once possessing a world-wide interest, and fitted to leave most memorable impressions on the minds of men, there was abundant room for testimonies of a traditional nature. And these accordingly we have; and have in such fulness and variety that there is scarcely a nation or tribe of historical significance in any part of the world which has not transmitted an account of a general deluge, in which the whole human race perished, excepting a mere remnant saved in a vessel, or by some other means of escape available only to themselves. Sir William Jones, in his Asiatic Researches, with reference to the event in this general aspect of it, calls it "a fact, which is admitted as true by every nation to whose literature we have access, and particularly by the ancient Hindoos, who have allotted an entire Pur-ana to the detail of that event, which they relate, as usual, in symbols and allegories." "It is no longer probable only," he again says, "but absolutely certain, that the whole race of mankind proceeded from Iran (the district of Asia to which Ararat belongs), as from a centre, whence they migrated at first in three great colonies; and that those three branches grew from a common stock, which had been miraculously preserved in a general convulsion and inundation of this globe." To the like effect Mitford, in his History of Greece:—"The tradition of all nations, and appearances in every country, bear witness scarcely less explicit than the writings of Moses to that general flood, which nearly destroyed the whole human race; and those ablest Greek authors, who have attempted to trace the history of mankind to its source, all refer to such an event for the beginning of the present system of things on earth." To these may be added the later testimony of a French writer, one rather of the infidel than the believing school, M. Boué, whose words have been quoted by Hitchcock: "I shall be vexed to be thought stupid enough to deny that an inundation or catastrophe has taken place in the world, or rather in the region inhabited by the antediluvians. To me this seems to be as really a fact in history as the reign of Cæsar at Rome."

It was only what might be expected, in regard to an event which took place before the human family separated into distinct nationalities, that the traditions preserved of it would maintain more or less of a general agreement, but that they would also be tinged to some extent with the peculiar and distinctive features of different places and regions. This is precisely what has happened, although perhaps there is more reason to wonder at the marked agreements with the Mosaic narrative, than at the various national diversities. The traditions of the ancient Asiatic nations are in this case the most important, because they were the earliest to be put on record, and were also the accredited accounts of the descendants of those who settled nearest to the catastrophe. They have been so often given, that it is needless to do more than briefly mention them. The Chaldean tradition, reported by Berosus, and found in Josephus (Ap. i. 19), asserts the fact of a general deluge, and the preservation of only a few persons in an ark, which rested on the mountains of Armenia. The Assyrian, preserved by Eusebius in the words of Abydenus (Evang. Præp. c. ix.), is somewhat more specific, as it designates a single man, named Sisisthrus (otherwise called Xisanthrus), who being divinely forewarned, sailed in a vessel into Armenia, and presently all things became involved in a fearful inundation; by and by he sent out from his vessel several birds in succession, which from the prevalence of the waters constantly returned back stained with mud, till after the third trial they returned no more; and then he was himself taken to the celestial region, while the vessel and its contents rested in Armenia. Polyhistor, as quoted by Cyril (Adv. Juliaum), adds to the account that Sisuthrus had in his vessel birds, reptiles, and beasts of burden. The Indian account, as given by Sir William Jones (Asiatic Researches, ii. 116), represents the sun-born monarch, Satyavatra, as immediately before the deluge addressed by the God Vishnu, in the form of a fish, in the following terms: "In seven days all creatures that have offended me shall be destroyed by a deluge; but thou shalt be preserved in a capacious vessel miraculously formed. Take therefore all kinds of medicinal herbs and esculent grains for food, and, together with the seven holy men, your respective wives, and pairs of all animals, enter the ark without fear." He did so, and was thereby saved, along with his company, from the general destruction, in a large vessel that came floating toward him on the rising waters. The traditions of Egypt upon the subject have not come down to us in any detailed form, but are referred to by Josephus (Ant. i.) and Plato also, in his Timæus, has taken some notice of them. The Greek traditions respecting the deluge of Deucalion differ somewhat in different writers, but the current belief was, no doubt, given with substantial correctness by Ovid. A later form appears in the treatise De Dea Syria, ascribed to Lucian. According to it the antediluvians were a wicked brood, men of violence, regardless of oaths and of the rights of hospitality, without mercy one toward another; on which account they were doomed to destruction. "For this purpose," he goes on to say, "there was a mighty eruption of water from the earth, attended with heavy showers from above; so that the rivers swelled and the sea overflowed, till the whole earth was covered with a flood, and all flesh drowned. Deucalion alone was preserved, to people the world. This mercy was shown him on account of his justice and piety. His preservation was effected thus: he put all his family, both his sons and their wives, into a vast ark which he had provided, and he then went into it himself. At the same time animals of every species—boars, horses, lions, serpents—whatever lived upon the face of the earth, followed him by pairs—all which he received into the ark, and experienced no evil from them."

This account, which has been frequently produced among the heathen traditions of the deluge, and still also by Miller (Testimony of the Rocks, p. 290), betrays, we may say, its own posthumous origin. It is far too close an imitation of the scriptural account, and in particular too ethical in its tone, to be a really heathen account. It belongs to that sub-apostolic age, which witnessed in so many respects a commingling of the heathen with the Christian elements, and must, in its existing form, be regarded as a fabrication. The work from which it is taken is no longer reckoned among the genuine productions of Lucian; but even if it were, as Lucian was acquainted with the sacred books, the real character of the narrative would not be thereby altered. It should cease therefore to be mentioned in this connection. Nor should any use be made (as is still done both by Kitto and Miller) of the Apamean medal, which exhibits the name of Noe inscribed on a floating chest, within which a man and woman appear seated, and to which a bird on the wing is seen bearing a branch. This likewise betrays its origin; it belongs to later times, and is too clear a specimen of what was then very common in Phrygia and its neighbourhood—an indiscriminate use of heathen and biblical sources, and a consequent mixing up of the opinions proper to each, as if there were no material difference between them. It is but another form of what gave birth to the later Sybilline oracles, and the Gnostic philosophy of the first centuries. Tradition has its spurious productions as well as history; and in a case like the present, where the legitimate evidence is so full, there is the less need for calling in the aid of what is unable to stand the test of a rigid examination.

Beside the older Greek and Asiatic traditions of a deluge, traces of the same event have been found where they might least have been expected, among the tribes and races of the New World, and even among the islanders in the Pacific Ocean. The traditions here also vary, though the substance remains in all much the same. The Indians of the North American lakes tell of their forefather, with his family, and pairs of the living creatures, being preserved on a raft, which he had been warned to build, while all others were drowned. Those on Terra Firma, in the opposite direction, believe that when the deluge came, one man with his wife and children escaped in a canoe. The Mexicans had traditions and also pictorial representations of the event, in which one man and his wife escaped in the hollow trunk of a leaf-producing tree, while the water-goddess (Mataloneje) appeared pouring torrents of water upon them, and overwhelming others around them.

Even among the most scattered and savage tribes on the Orinoco, Humboldt found the tradition of a deluge common to them all—the Tamanacs, the Maypures, the Indians of the Rio Erevato—but each giving their own distinctive colour to the story. The traditions, he says, "are like the relics of a vast shipwreck," and as such "are highly interesting in the philosophical study of our own species. . . . In the great continents, as in the smallest islands of the Pacific, it is always on the loftiest and nearest mountain that the remains of the human race have been saved; and this event appears the more recent in proportion as the nations are uncultivated, and as the knowledge they have of their own existence has no very remote date." This, we have no doubt, presents the true rationale of the subject, as to the diversity that appears in the accounts. The diversity, whether among the traditions of the Old or those of the New World, did not arise from an actual difference in the events, but from the one great event, of which they all spake, assuming such distinctive shapes and forms as were given to it by the respective position and circumstances of each.

On the whole, therefore, there is as much confirmatory evidence of this great event as could well be expected. In vindication of the Mosaic narrative we are entitled to say, Here is a fact which in some form has impressed itself on the historical or traditional reminiscences of all nations; which is also not without analogical corroboration from physical appearances in the world's condition; and whether we can solve the incidental difficulties connected with it or not, we should shut our eyes to the strongest evidence if we were to bring into doubt the reality of the event. However little the scriptural narrative of it may enable us to answer all queries, or even to silence all objections that may be raised on the subject, it yet presents what, as far as it goes, is by much the most rational and satisfactory account of the matter, and—what is of special moment—the only one that renders an adequate reason for such a fearful catastrophe befalling the habitable world. For here, as generally in the historical accounts of Old Testament scripture, the moral element, by having the chief prominence assigned to it, distinguishes what is written from the traditional accounts of heathen antiquity. In these accounts the physical alone is brought distinctly into view; our attention is drawn merely to the singular natural phenomena, and to the remarkable incidents of danger or deliverance connected with them. But in the simple narrative of Moses, all takes its rise in the moral—on man's part, in the inveterate corruption which had raged among the antediluvian race, and defied all remedial efforts of an ordinary kind—and on God's part, in the righteousness which could no longer allow the audacity of sin to proceed, but must substitute for abused mercy the severe inflictions of judgment. It is this which Scripture makes prominent, leaving other points in comparative obscurity; and the same prominence must be given to it still, if the sacred narrative shall be either rightly understood or properly used.

DEMAS, a professed disciple and a friend of St. Paul—twice mentioned in his later epistles, as sending, along with others, salutations to brethren at a distance, Col. iv. 14; Phil. 24; but in his last epistle presented under the mournful aspect of one who, through love of a present world, had forsaken the apostle, 2 Ti. iv. 10. It might be but a temporary falling from his steadfastness; but no later notice of his career has survived to correct the unfavourable impression which this naturally produces. Indeed, the tradition of subsequent times classes him among the apostates from the faith (Eph. 5); but this probably arose from a too rigid interpretation of the words of the apostle.

DEMETRIUS, a Greek term, denoting a votary of Demeter, or Ceres, of frequent use among the Greeks, but in New Testament scripture occurring only twice.

1. The first person of the name mentioned is the silversmith at Ephesus, whose chief employment was the making of silver shrines for Diana—most probably silver models of the temple, or of its innermost chamber, with the image there deposited of the great goddess. The prospect of losing this trade by the conversions that were going on to the faith of the gospel, through the instrumentality of Paul, gave rise to a mighty commotion, which was headed by Demetrius, and which for a time placed the apostle in jeopardy, Ac. xix.; 2 Co. i. (See EPHESUS.) 2. The other Demetrius was a disciple commended by the apostle John, as being well reported of by all men, and by the truth itself—that is, possessing a character so purely and transparently Christian, that it might be said to carry its own testimony along with it, 3 Jn. 12. His place of residence is not stated; but if not at Ephesus, it must have been at some place in that part of Asia Minor.

DEMONS. These are spoken of in all Scripture, from the Pentateuch to the Apocalypse; and under this or some equivalent name, they hold the most prominent place in the mythology of all heathen nations, both ancient and modern. "The gods of the heathen," says the psalmist, "are demons," Ps. xcv. 6, Sept. Trans. And St. Paul at once authenticates this translation, and confirms the truth it declares, when he applies it to the heathen of his time, saying, "The things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to demons and not to God," 1 Co. x. 20. The heathen themselves give the same account of their religious beliefs and their sacrificial rites. The demon (δ δαίμων) is the object of their worship, δαισιδαμωρία describes their worship itself, and δαισιδαμων, the worshipper. Thus, Favorinus, a philosopher of Adrian's time, who at different periods of his life resided in Rome and Greece, and the Lesser Asia, describes the religion of these nations indifferently as δ φόβος Θεοῦ ἢ δαίμωνων, the fear of God or of demons. Xenophon, intending to commend the piety of Agesilaus, king of Sparta, says αἰεὶ δαισιδαμων ἦν, he was ever a worshipper of demons. Festus, governor of Judea, as having no other idea of religion in Gentile or Jew, pronounces the accusation of the Jews against Paul a question of their own demon-worship, περι τῆς ἰδίας δαιμονορίας. So also, the men of Athens, on hearing Paul preach Jesus and the resurrection, concluded that he was a setter forth of strange or foreign demons; and Paul in his turn, certainly without intention to compliment their piety, as Dr. Campbell seems to suppose, yet as certainly without thought of saying what they could repel as false or resent as offensive, states it as his observation of them that they were δαιμονομαστῆρες, not, as in the English Bible, "too superstitious" (which is opposed both to the etymological and the historical import), but addicted more than others to demon-worship. On this point it is only further necessary to add, that Scripture ascribes the same thing to the Israelites, in their frequent apostasies from Jehovah their God. "They sacrificed to demons and not to God, to gods whom they knew not; to new gods, that came newly up; whom their fathers feared not," De. xxxiii. 17; Le. xviii. 7; Pa. cri. 37.

But now who or what were these demons whom the world worshipped? The question is not without difficulty, since belonging to the spiritual and unseen world, they are not immediately objects of our knowledge, and the speculations of curious and inquiring, and the impostures of wicked and designing men, practising on the credulity of the ignorant or the imagination of the fearful, have had much to do in creating and upholding every theory or system of demonology which has prevailed. They are therefore in the main, as Scripture styles them, "a work of errors," and exhibit a mass of beliefs or opinions alike contradictory and absurd, and which it were as idle as it is impossible to attempt to distinguish or harmonize. Being, as we have seen, objects of worship, demons must have been believed to be, in some sense or after some sort, divine. Indeed with the Greek, the τὸ θεῖον, the divine, and τὸ δαιμόνιον, the demonish or demonian, were synonymous terms; and οἱ θεοί, the gods, and οἱ δαίμονες, the demons, suggested the same beings. With the philosophers the name of demon (as from δαίμων, knowing), is used as the generic name of intelligent or spiritual natures. Thus Plato styles the maker of the world, τὸν μέγιστον δαίμονα, the greatest demon (Plato, Cratylus, 250); while in the same dialogue, Socrates is made to say, "every wise man that is a good man, is a demon, and rightly called a demon, whether he be alive or dead." But these men, as is also intimated in the same place, did not in this speak their own sentiments, but rather sought to accommodate their language to the belief or feelings of the vulgar; these, it may be presumed, were greatly less elevated and refined. For the most part demons were believed to hold an intermediate place between celestial gods and men, and to act as mediators, negotiating those affairs which it was deemed beneath the majesty of the greater gods to transact immediately with mortals. This is in substance the philosophy of the later Platonists, Apuleius and Plotinus, on this subject. The first of these authors, as quoted by Augustine, who treats of demons, with great learning, in his City of God, has thus described them: "In kind they are animal, in disposition passionate, in mind rational, in body aerial, in duration eternal, having the first three in common with us, the fourth peculiar to themselves, and the fifth common to them with the gods" (Augustine, Civ. Dei, lib. viii. cap. xvi.) This, too, may be regarded as the popular creed, rather than his own, and according to it, demons are not distinguished from deceased and disembodied men. Indeed, immortality seems to have been regarded as the only distinction between gods and men. "What are men?" it is asked in a dialogue of Lucian. The answer is, "mortal gods," θεοὶ σπυροί. And again, "What are gods?" "immortal men," ἀθάνατοι ἀθάνατοι.

On these and similar grounds, it has been contended in modern times, that demons, in the idea of the heathen, were only "human ghosts," and also, were believed to be good and beneficent in their nature and agency. (Sykes' Inquiry; and Farmer on Demoniacs.) It might not be worth while to advert to their views, but for the use to which they have applied them, of discrediting the Scripture doctrine of demons. Like other errors, they are true in part. Many who were worshipped as demons had been men—princes, heroes, or sages, who were deified or regarded as demons after death. The learned Joseph Mede, in treating of the identity of the saint-worship of Rome papal with the demon-worship of Rome pagan, shows that "they were the souls of worthy men deified after death." But he adds, that some were of higher degree, which had no beginning, nor were ever imprisoned in mortal bodies (Works, p. 634). It is more likely, that instead of constituting by themselves a peculiar or distinct order, they should be supposed, on their deification, to have been assumed into the fellowship of a higher, viz. a divine order of beings already existing. And this Farmer himself admits was, to a large extent, the view of heathen philosophers and of Christian fathers. That all demons were good and worthy men who in their deified state used their power only for good to their human kindred on earth, is not less contrary to all evidence. As the ideal representations of certain attributes and powers, of which men saw or felt the manifestation and effect, while the subjects or causes of them were invisible or unknown, how could they be otherwise conceived of than both as good and evil? Sykes says that Hesiod pronounces all the demons of the golden age to be good. But he is forced to say also, that τὸ κακὸν δαίμων, a certain evil demon, is as old as Homer. Indeed, Divinity itself, τὸ θεῖον, is represented by Herodotus and Aristotle as φθονερός τε καὶ παραχθῆς, spiteful and envious of the happiness of men (Her. i. 32.); Apuleius (in Aug. Civ. Dei) represents demons as subject to human vices, and "osores hominum," haters of men; and Porphyry, a virulent enemy of Christianity, says that many of them are wicked and mischievous in the highest degree. "They commonly dwell and roam in places nearest the earth, in order to satisfy their lusts; there is no crime of which they are not capable; they do their utmost to keep us from the knowledge of the gods, and induce us to serve themselves; they assume the form of the great gods to seduce men; they make it their business to inflame their lusts, and set up themselves as great gods." And it may be asked here, how, if regarded only as good, and dispensers of good, can it be accounted for, that over ancient and modern heathendom men have ever sought the aid of the real or pretended exorcist to rid them of the presence of their alleged benefactors?

It is true, certainly, that from the mass of incoherent contradictions which are spoken about demons by the heathen, one may prove almost anything to have had a place in their beliefs. The philosophers, it may be allowed, had no faith in demoniacal existences; what they spoke or wrote of them was in concession to popular prejudice; and others believed anything or everything which fraud might invent, or fear might fancy. But, it is no logical consequence from this, as some have insisted, that demons are merely imaginary existences, and that nothing is true, or known to be true, of them. The argument might with equal reason be alleged, to sanction the conclusion that there is no God, for all worthy ideas of his personality and attributes were overlaid and lost amid the dreams of pantheism, the follies of polytheism, and the negations of atheism. This were certainly too summary a process by which to reach so grave a result. We may for these reasons most warrantably conclude that any reliable information on these subjects, and indeed on every other relating to the world of spirits, has been lost, and in absence of revelation, could not be recovered. But, it might be maintained with some show of reason, that beliefs and practices which have spread so wide, and survived so long, had some beginning in truth—in some nuclei of primitive revelation, around which human deception, practising on human weakness, had gathered those superstitious accretions under which the truth had been buried. Some traces of this Scripture truth, strangely confused and perverted, may be discovered among these superstitious beliefs. Gale (Court of the Gentiles) refers the origin of the supposed mediatory function of demons to the constitution of the Son as mediator between God and man; and though the common idea of their original, as the souls of men deceased, be different from that of the demons of Scripture, they closely resemble them in the ideas entertained of their spiteful and envious nature, and their wicked and malignant influence.

For authoritative information on all that relates to their nature and origin, their sphere and agency, we must, in disregard alike of the ancient heathen and the modern rationalist, depend on the Word of God. And there, while their existence is frequently affirmed, we find their divinity in any proper sense denied, and the worship of them condemned and disallowed. They are spoken of as distinct from man and from God, as spiritual beings, so created originally, but now fallen from their first estate, leagued in revolt against God, and using their power, under his control, both to corrupt and to seduce, to oppress and to destroy man. That there is one being to whom this description applies, the authors before referred to, acknowledge, or at least have not deemed it prudent to deny. But they refuse to admit that demons are of the same order, or have any existence save in the superstitious imaginations of men. "There is," says Lardner, "but one devil;" and Dr. Campbell, who shows strong rationalistic leanings on this subject, says nothing can be clearer from Scripture, than that, though demons are innumerable, there is but one devil in the universe (Gospels, 1. 235). Now, every student of the Greek Testament knows, that as often as the name devils (plural) is applied in our version to spiritual beings, the original is not δαίμονες, but δαίμονες, not strictly devils but demons. So far it is not possible to vindicate our version, but neither is it easy to justify the inference which is so dogmatically made from the original. Confessedly, the old serpent, the devil, and Satan are synonymous, Re. ix. 2, at least they variously describe the same being: as Satan, he is the adversary—as devil, he is the vengeful accuser—as the old serpent, he is the subtle tempter, the δαίμων. Then under the names of Satan and Beelzebub he is called the prince of demons, Mat. xii. 24; Mar.

iii. 23, a title which our Lord concedes to him. And if this do not absolutely decide that, while the name of devil is peculiar to him, he shares the common nature of demons—seeing he is styled also the prince and god of this world and the men of it—it must be admitted to afford a strong presumption that it is so. There are angels, partners of his fall; there are demons, vassals of his kingdom. It may be these are distinct. Is it not more probable that they are the same in nature with one another, and also the same with their prince?

(1.) Our view is confirmed by the general testimony of Scripture, both respecting the devil and demons. If distinguished by these names respectively, they are on the other hand identified in general nature by the common name of spirits or spiritual beings. Thus the devil, the prince and god of this world, is called "the spirit who worketh in the children of disobedience," Ep. ii. 1. And demons and spirits are frequently used as convertible terms in many places of the New Testament scriptures, Lu. x. 17, 20; Mar. ix. 20-26; vii. 25, 29. That in these cases the term is applied personally, does not admit of doubt. The powers, properties, and actions of living personal agents are there ascribed to demons, not less than to the devil, and utterly baffle the theory which regards them as mere creations of fancy. Thus it is said of demons, that "they believe and tremble," Ja. ii. 19. It is curious to see how Sykes disposes of this scripture: "It was, I suppose, from this text that the fathers said those things concerning devils which occur so frequently in their writings. Now admitting that the devil and his angels (demons then are his angels!) dread God, the most that will follow is that here δαίμονια, is applied to evil spirits, and it will be granted that they have reason to tremble. But does it follow that, because in this one place, δαίμονια signifies devils, that evil spirits do, or are allowed to possess men and torment them with diseases?" The question for the present is, not whether they torment men, but simply what their nature is; and it is enough for us to accept the admission that δαίμονια does here signify devils or evil spirits. This it is the scope of Dr. Sykes' inquiry to disprove. And indeed, he has no sooner made the fatal admission, than, fain to retract it, he says, "It may after all be interpreted of departed human spirits," which he labours to show are, like idols, nothing in the world, but, for the occasion, must be thought after all to be capable, in the apostle's account, both of faith and fear.

(2.) Besides having in common a spiritual nature, the devil and demons have a common character. The devil is by eminence "the evil one," the impersonation of wickedness, "a liar and a murderer from the beginning." Demons, again, are evil spirits, unclean spirits, lying spirits, spirits of wickedness (πνευματικά τῆς πονηρίας), Ep. v. 12; and some are said to be "more wicked spirits" than others, Mat. xii. 45, as if there was exhibited among them every form and degree of evil.

(3.) They are leagued together in the prosecution of the same bad cause. The devil is Satan, the adversary of God and man: "he deceiveth the whole world," "he goeth about seeking whom he may destroy." Demons are called "spirits of error," "seducing spirits," 1 Ti. iv. 1, which oppress and torment men, Mat. xv. 21, and moreover in every way seek their hurt and ruin, Re. xii. 10; xviii. 2, 3. If it be objected that their alleged influence is not sensibly perceived, the argument holds equally against the agency of the one devil, as against that of the many demons; nay, equally against the presence and working of the Spirit of God in us. For, as Tertullian says, "neither is discovered in the act of working, which is supersensible, but only in the effects of their work;" and if any will object, with Sykes, that their alleged activity in going up and down the earth in prosecution of their evil work, is contradictory to the statement that the angels which kept not their first estate are reserved in chains to the judgment of the great day, it may be answered that before this argument can have force, one would require to know what is the length of their chain.

(4.) Finally, both are spoken of as involved in the same dread doom; for the devil and his angels the everlasting fire is prepared. So, demons are said to tremble as, in apprehension of coming wrath, they deprecate being sent into the abyss, the abode of darkness; and their ejection by the word of Christ and his apostles is hailed as a conquest over Satan and a forerunner of his fall. Dr. Campbell says that the utmost that can be deduced from all these things is, "that demons are malignant as well as the devil, engaged in the same bad cause, and perhaps of the number of those called his angels and made to serve as his instruments." But he adds, "this is no evidence that they are the same." If not absolute proof of their generic identity, it is certainly decisive evidence of that near and strong affinity which may perhaps still leave room for some difference or inequality of original rank between them. Perhaps the words of Jesus, spoken with reference to the spirit or demon which his disciples could not cast out, Lu. ix. 39, 42; Mat. xvii. 17, 18, "this kind," or race "cannot come forth but by prayer," &c., may countenance the idea that there are diverse kinds of them, as other scriptures, Ro. viii. 37; Ep. vi. 12, &c., seem to intimate that among angelic natures there are gradations in order and influence. But at all events, seeing both have real personal and spiritual being, both are wicked and impure and lying spirits, both co-operating in the same work, as the tempters, and seducers, and tormentors of mankind, and both destined to fall before the power and suffer the vengeance of Christ, who came to destroy the devil and his works—their identity seems to be determined, in so far at least as their power and agency bear on the method of God's moral government, and its subjects are liable to be affected by them.

We may, however, briefly refer, in conclusion, to the words of the apostle before quoted, that the gods of the heathen are demons. In what sense is this to be understood, and how in its proper sense does it bear on the point now under consideration? Let it be admitted, as Farmer and others contend, that demons are to be considered as the spirits of the dead, how then can it be said, but with limited and partial truth, that these were the gods of the heathen? They shared their worship, but did by no means monopolize it; they worshipped also the sun, and moon, and stars, and almost every object in nature, animate and inanimate. And with whatever defective ideas of the divine nature and attributes, it must be admitted that in worshipping the work of their own hands, they professed through them to honour the one true God. This was the professed object of Jeroboam's institution, as seen in 2 Ch. xi. 15. And yet, notwithstanding, it is said that these priests were ordained, and this worship prepared for devils or demons. The worshippers intended it for the worship of God—God himself adjudged it to be for the service of demons. How should this be? If demons, like idols, be nothing, as some hold, they could not worship them in fact; if sometimes worshipped under the imagination that they were departed human spirits, they did not in these cases worship them even in fancy; and it only remains that they served them, in effect, under the influence and in the service of that arch-deceiver and his deceitful allies, who turns all false worship, whether to the dead or to the living, to his own wicked and malignant ends of delusion and destruction.

The doctrine of demons claims the submission of our faith in homage to the authority of Scripture. Its revelations on the subject are confessedly scanty and obscure, and much variety of opinion may obtain respecting their precise meaning and amount. But to set down all that is said of demons, as many do, for old wives' fables, a figment of Gentile superstition, which Scripture, in imitation of the heathen sages, has endorsed and perpetuated in concession to popular belief, is seriously to impugn the authority of Scripture. After all, what difficulties attach to this subject which should urge upon us this issue? It may easily be shown that all that is taught concerning them is in harmony with rational theism. Why should we doubt the existence of other orders of intelligent and moral beings besides man? It were surely a narrow mind that would claim for him a monopoly of the rational creation. But if other such orders exist, can we, in the face of our own character and condition, hold it incredible, that among them also some should be fallen, and depraved, and miserable as we are? We are naturally fain to think of these evils as limited and local, but in truth the great mystery lies less in their extent, than in their existence, at all, in the universe of God. That, possessing this evil nature, they should act in accordance with it, and use their power as they have opportunity to spread the infection of their malice and wickedness, is just what is seen in "evil men, and seducers, who wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived." It may be thought that, as belonging to another sphere of being, they have no access to us, and can have no influence upon us. But, may it not be, that the moral as well as the natural universe throughout is connected by common laws and common interests? Are not angels sent forth from God's presence to minister on earth to the heirs of salvation; is not the Spirit which God gives his people seen and known by his life-giving and blessed fruits in them; and are not, in like manner, the devil and his demon agency discovered in the strong delusions and grievous oppressions which, as we have seen, men have suffered, and do suffer, from their power? [J. H.]

DEMONIACS is the name given to men subject to the power of demons or evil spirits. These are spoken of as entering into, dwelling in, and possessing men; taking, seizing, using their bodily organs and their mental powers at their will, and subjecting them to almost every kind or form of bodily and mental malady which flesh is heir to. Thus, of the cases we read of in the gospels, one has a demon and is blind, his blindness being an effect of the demon's power; and so, another is dumb, another both deaf and dumb, another is bowed down or drawn together, and can in no way lift up herself, another is epileptic, and so on, showing their power over the senses and the whole body. Again we read of others who were frenzied, Mar. v. 1-15:

of others who were hypochondriac, Mar. vii. 32; and of some who were fatuous or imbecile, Mar. ix. 14-17; showing further that mind as well as body, and in many instances mind and body both, were subject to this demoniac tyranny. And again, we read of other cases in which they seem to have inflamed the malignant and unclean passions of their victims, as in the man who abode among the tombs, the man in the synagogue at Capernaum, Mar. i. 24, and Mary Magdalen, out of whom went seven demons. But however this be, the cases before referred to, sufficiently evince that they had power to subjugate the sensory and imagination and reason of men, and to be, if not directly their tempters and corrupters, their grievous tormenters and oppressors.

Such briefly has been generally received as the substance of the Scripture testimony respecting the demoniacs who are so prominent in the gospel history. But in these latter days some profess to have discovered that it is altogether a mistake; and hold, though without prejudice, as they profess, either to the reality of the evil which the demonized are said to have endured, or to the marvellous mercy which they are said to have experienced, that the agency of demons in their sufferings is a groundless and superstitious belief. Mede appears to have led the way in this direction (Works, p. 28). He was followed by Lardner and Sykes and Farmer, men of the Socinian school. As Lardner dogmatically pronounces that "there is but one devil," so Farmer pronounces with equal confidence that "there never was a demoniac among men," meaning by this term, what is generally understood by it, one who was really possessed and acted on by a demon. But the confidence of this assertion is by no means borne out by equal strength of evidence. The subject is confessedly obscure and difficult. Demons cannot be perceived by sense; their influence, whatever it be in effect, is not distinguishable in its exercise from the operation of natural causes. And it will be admitted that the information which Scripture has given us respecting their nature and agency is not so full as to enable us to explain the difficulties, or remove the objections, psychological and moral, which it is so easy to find or make in connection with this, as with most other subjects. This however does not warrant the summary and scornful repudiation of a series of recorded facts, of which, as most men have understood the Scripture, it not only fully details the phenomena, but constantly assumes and expressly assigns and declares the cause.

The explanation now proposed to be given of the case of demoniacs is, that "they are none other than such as we call madmen and lunatics. Madmen not ri morbi or of simple dotage, but by influence of melancholia or mania, from which they imagine, speak, and do things that are most absurd, and contrary to all reason, sense, and use of men; the difference between these being, that melancholy is attended with fear, sadness, silence, reticence, and the like symptoms; mania with rage, raving and frenzy, and actions suitable." (See Mede's Works, p. 29; Sykes' Inquiry, p. 39; and Farmer's Essay, sect. vi.) These forms and kinds of natural disease, they allege, cover and account for all the facts and phenomena which in the demonized, so called, have been generally ascribed to the agency of demons; this being, as Mede expresses it, "a mistake caused by the disguise of another name and notion than we conceive them by," they having been called demoniacs, as others have been called lunatics, though demons had no more influence upon the one, than the moon had upon the other.

Let us examine whether this theory is borne out by Scripture. The proof text which Mede lays as the ground and pillar of this theory is Jn. x. 20, which records the blasphemous words of the Jews regarding Jesus, "He hath a devil, and is mad." "The latter word being" (as he holds) "an explication of the former." Try this interpretation upon Mar. iii. 22, where the same imputation is cast upon him, by substituting the one of these equivalent expressions for the other, and see how it will stand: "He hath Beelzebub, and by the prince of the demons casteth he out demons." Did the Jews here mean to repeat that he was mad, and to ascribe his miracles to his madness; do they not, in both instances, expressly refer the madness and the miracle-working, as effects, to the distinct cause of demoniacal agency?

In the first notice of demoniacs which occurs in the gospel history, they are named as a distinct class of suffering men: "They brought to him all sick people that were taken with divers diseases and torments, and those which were possessed with demons (δαμονισμένους), and those that were lunatics, and those that had the palsy, and he healed them," Mat. ix. 24. Here the demonized and the lunatic, who on the rationalistic theory are identified, are expressly distinguished. We find a case, already referred to, in which the demonized is also said to have been lunatic, Mat. xvii. 16; and another, in which he is said to have been maniac; and it is probable that such cases were frequent. But the right inference from this is, not that all lunatics or maniacs were demonized, or that they only were demonized who were subject to madness in some form; but that this was one only of many forms in which demons used their power over men. So far from being restricted to madness, as Mede and others assert, it is evident that the effects ascribed to demon influence include almost every form of disease, bodily and mental. Thus, of those who were possessed, some were blind, deaf, dumb, bowed down, &c., without being, so far as is known, mentally disordered. Blindness and deafness could be no effect of madness or melancholy. Dumbness, or moody sullen silence at least, might possibly proceed from this cause, but in the case recorded it is expressly ascribed to organic obstruction, Mar. vii. 33-35. And for aught that appears, the daughter of Abraham in the synagogue, though the subject of an afflicted body, was the possessor of a sound mind, and we may hope of a devout heart.

But while, in these outward respects, demoniacs were assimilated to other sufferers, they are uniformly spoken of as specifically distinct. Thus, it is said of our Lord's miracles, that he cured many of their infirmities and plagues, and of evil spirits, Lu. vii. 21; viii. 2. So likewise, in his commission to the twelve disciples, it is said he gave them power and authority over all demons, and to cure all manner of sickness, and all manner of disease, Lu. ix. 1; Mat. x. 1-8; and so, in his commission to the seventy, comp. Lu. x. 9 with ver. 17-20; and again, after his resurrection, in his promise concerning his apostles, Mar. xvi. 17; and, in their discharge of their commission, they are said to have exercised their twofold gift over these different forms of evil, Mar. vi. 13.

we may not be able altogether to ascertain, but some particulars admit of being specified. The first and most obvious distinction is in the producing cause. We are now entitled to say that the passage which Mede adduces to disprove the agency of demons in these maladies is, so far as Jewish opinion goes, an express confirmation of it. "He hath a demon"—that is the agent; "he is mad"—this is the effect—though but one effect of many of the demon's presence and working; and this active cause is not once but constantly distinguished from the malady under which the demoniac suffers. Demons, as shown before (see preceding article), are identified with evil spirits. (Compare Mat. xii. 22, 29; Lu. viii. 2, 4, 39; Mar. v. 1. 24, 30; Mat. xv. 21, 28; Lu. ix. 37, 43; Mar. ix. 14, 29; Lu. xiii. 10, 17). They are not therefore to be confounded with dead men, or with their ghosts—an idea which Sykes and Farmer persistently connect with everything that is said concerning them; for whatever might be the thoughts or sayings of the heathen about demons, or of Jews, like Josephus or Justin Martyr, whose views were assimilated to those of the heathen, this notion has no countenance from Scripture, and is not known to have prevailed among the Jewish people. Demons are there spoken of as personal, conscious, powerful, responsible agents, who perceive and understand, who hate and rage, who speak and act, and tremble. Our Lord always deals with them as such. Not only does he rebuke them, as he is said to rebuke the fever, or the winds and waves—which might be supposed to be in figure; but, what cannot be thus accounted for, he interrogates them as distinct from the possessed, and they reply to him through the organs of their victims;—he commands or restrains them also, as he sees occasion, and they obey him. "What is thy name?" he asks; and the unclean spirit answers, "My name is Legion, for we are many; and he, and all the demons, besought him," &c. There hath fallen prostrate at his feet a deaf and dumb child, and Jesus rebukes the spirit, saying, "Thou deaf and dumb spirit, I charge thee come out of him, and enter no more into him." Again, meeting from the tombs the wretched maniac whom no man could tame, Jesus, distinguishing between the man and the author or cause of his terrible malady, commands him, "Come out of the man, thou unclean spirit." In all this, and much more to the same effect, our Lord does surely distinguish this one species of man's maladies from the rest, and ascribes the difference to the agency of intelligent and moral existences.

This is further confirmed by the effects which often accompanied their presence in the possessed. The first is the knowledge the demoniacs had of Jesus. We do not pry into the processes by which demons seized upon and appropriated the sensory of their victims. We have learned nothing from the philosophizing of others on this subject, and do not profess to be able to throw any light upon it ourselves. But whatever mystery be in the process, it cannot be questioned that in some way these demoniacs were in possession of knowledge not accessible to man. They knew Jesus to be the Christ, Mar. i. 34. Thus, the demoniac in the synagogue exclaimed of Jesus, "I know thee who thou art, the holy One of God;" and the Gadarene demoniac in like manner cried, "What have I to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of the most high God?" It may be said indeed that Christ's name was spread abroad, and that his works had already made him known. But his nature as the Son of God was not yet dreamed of. His character as the holy One of God was not acknowledged. His office as the Christ was but guessed at. Much of this was spoken early in our Lord's ministry, Mar. i. 33-34. At a much later period the people at large were still in profoundest ignorance and error concerning him. "Whom do men say that I am?" he asked his disciples long afterwards, and the answer was, "John the Baptist, but some say Elias, and others one of the prophets," Mar. viii. 28, 29. Even those who besought him for his mercy, cried after him, as "the Son of David," Mat. xv. 21; Mar. x. 47, 48. Obviously then the demoniacs had some avenue to knowledge respecting his person as the Son of God, and of his office as the Christ, which others had not. It were preposterous to ascribe this to madness, which if it surprisingly revive and recall forgotten knowledge, certainly can impart none. Indeed, Scripture refers it to the indwelling demon, who may be reasonably presumed to have derived it from Satan their prince, who, in his encounter with Jesus in the wilderness, had discovered him to be the Son of God.

Another speciality to be noticed, which manifests the supernatural cause of this malady, is the invariable dislike and dread which the possessed had of our Lord. It was true of the demoniacs, as of the demons, that they did "believe and tremble." They do not appear ever to have come to Jesus of their own accord, but, with one exception, to have been brought to him by others. In that exceptional case, as in all the others, their antipathy and terror seem to have been extreme. "What have I to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of the most high God? I adjure thee by God that thou torment me not." "Let us alone, what have we to do with thee, Jesus of Nazareth? art thou come to destroy us? I know thee who thou art, the holy One of God." This infatuated sympathy with their oppressors, and their no less infatuated antipathy to and avoidance of their Deliverer, is something more and something worse than madness. It bespeaks the fascination of a fiendish power roused to its utmost against its destroyer. It is indeed argued that as all this was expressed by the organs of men, it is arbitrary to ascribe it to any other agency. But men under mere natural influences could hardly be the subjects of these dispositions, and could not possibly be possessed of this supernatural knowledge. That the demoniacs so felt and spake, is accounted for by the peculiarity of their condition, as subject to their oppressors, and subdued into sympathy with them in their views and designs.

Further, we find that Jesus has represented the casting out of demons as a necessary part of his own work. Very emphatically he sends this message to Herod, "I must cast out demons and do cures to-day and to-morrow," Lu. xii. 32. He argues from his performance of this work to the truth of his mission, and the advent of God's reign: "If I by the finger of God cast out demons, then the kingdom of God is come unto you," Mat. xii. 28. And over their ejection by his disciples in his name, he rejoiced in spirit, as the beginning and earnest of the downfall of Satan's power, saying, "I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven."¹

How then shall all this be accounted for, if demoniacs were madmen of whatever sort? It has been said that Jesus takes no side in this question; that without participating the people's belief, he accommodated his language to it; and that as the error did not affect the end of his mission, he was not called upon to involve himself in disputes with them by opposing himself to their prejudices. But how dishonouring were all this to our Lord; as if, like the ancients, he practised the doctrine of reserve, or, like the moderns, allowed himself to use words in a non-natural sense, in order "to avoid disputes." But it is untrue in every particular. Can he be said to have taken no side, who so solemnly declared that he cast out demons by the finger and by the Spirit of God? Or can he be said to have withheld or disguised the truth, to humour the people or avoid offence, whose teaching throughout was in contradiction of the false opinions and in reproof of the evil habits of men; and who, on this subject in particular, had only to repudiate the views held by the people, in order to silence their blasphemies and remove their offence. How, for example, when accused of having a demon—and again, of casting out demons by the prince of demons—how could he have so effectually vindicated himself, and dissipated the false and superstitious beliefs of the Jews, as by declaring openly and in terms that there was no demon in the case at all—that neither did demoniacs, so called, suffer from their malice, nor were demons cast out by his power? It is worthy of remark further on this head, that our Lord held this language respecting the evidence and agency of demons, not to the people only, but also, from first to last, to his disciples. On sending them on his service, he gave them power and authority over all demons; and they on their return, as sharing the common belief, report that even the demons were subject to them through his name. Now, it was given to them to know the mysteries of the kingdom; why they should have been kept and left in it, there could be no reason, even if others had been for a time kept in ignorance and error on this matter. For though it is sometimes professed that "this did not affect his mission, seeing it was no more his business to correct men's mistakes in psychology and medicine, than in astronomy," yet these men, when it suits them, hold a very different language. These beliefs, which our Lord is here allowed to have countenanced, or at least not to have repudiated, Farmer denounces as "in many respects of greatest prejudice to Christianity, and affecting the foundation on which the gospel is built" (Essay, chap. III. 238, et seq.); a statement which we of course do not admit, but which, as liable to be made, it is all the more incredible that our Lord should not have expressly condemned the errors that have led to it.

Farmer chooses to refer this language to our Lord's cure of the diseased in general, saying that "all the diseased were spoken of by the Jews as oppressed by an evil spirit, but not as possessed by demons—of such there is no mention!" (p. 44). But why should the apostle, in speaking to Gentiles (Acts x. 48), be supposed to speak according to Jewish opinions, which Farmer regarded as blasphemous?—for such he pronounces the opinion that the devil has the power of disease. Is it not every way more likely that the apostle intended to connect the oppressions upon men, ascribed to demons or evil spirits indiscriminately, with that malignant and tyrannical dynasty, καταδυναστευματους του του διαβολου, of which Scripture everywhere represents the devil as the prince and head? (Lu. x. 7-20; Mar. iv. 14, 15).

VOL. I.

Various objections are made against the doctrine of demoniacal possession—some on particular, others on general grounds. Thus, (1.) the case of the Gadarene, for example, is said in its details to be strange and incredible. It is acknowledged that there are difficulties, both psychological and moral. But they are obviously referrible to the imperfect knowledge we have of the relations between the spiritual and material systems; and besides, they apply in great part equally to the transaction, whether as caused by demons or by mere physical agency. This holds at least of the destruction of the swine, and of our Lord's permission given, or rather, as it must have been, if demons were not concerned, his own active agency put forth to effect it. Also, their deprecation of his command to go out into the deep, or the abyss, εις την αβυσσον, has no conceivable meaning on the theory of natural insanity, while it is in agreement with the threatened doom of demons, Re. xx. 23, with which it may be supposed they were acquainted, and if so, might well fear and deprecate.

(2.) An objection of a more specious form is alleged against the possible truth of demoniac power over men, as undermining the evidence of miracles in general, and of all miraculous cures in particular. If demons can inflict disease, it is the interposition of a power subversive of the system of nature; how can miracles indicate the immediate hand of God? But the answer is not difficult. They do not mark the immediate hand of God—they mark a supernatural power, but what or whence this power is, it requires something more to determine. In all these cases there was not only a contrast in the work of demons and the work of Christ—the one malignant, the other beneficent; but there was, moreover, a contest and a triumph, exhibiting the power of demons as subject, and the power of Christ as supreme. The few instances in which miracles were hurtful, as in the blighting of the fig-tree and the blinding of Elymas, were accompanied with circumstances which readily distinguish them in the consciences of men as the righteous infliction of divine judgment.

(3.) It is stated, as a serious difficulty, that the phenomena and facts ascribed in Scripture to demoniacal possession, should have been confined to the Jewish people, and also to the time of our Lord's sojourn among men; and still more, that notwithstanding all this, the Jews do not seem to have looked upon it as anything strange, nor has it been taken notice of in the history of other people. On these grounds, Mede (Works, 28, 29) and Sykes (Preface to Inquiry) openly repudiate the "story of the gospel" as it has been generally understood. In reply we say that this must stand on its own evidence, nor may its express and positive testimony be affected by negations like these. Besides, it is far from certain that any part of these allegations are well founded. If it be meant that heathen nations had not the same theory of demons as the gospel history reveals, this is admitted. But if it is said that they had no belief, and among them was no mention of demoniac influence, it is so far from true, that Menander states it as the common belief that "A demon besets every man"—ἀπαντι δαιμων ἀνδρι περισταται. The νυμφόληπτοι, the πίθωες, among the Greeks, the larratæ and cerriti among the Latins, all denote so many kinds of demoniacs. That Scripture is silent on the subject previous to our Lord's time, can only be affirmed by men who persist in putting meanings on words and statements different from their obvious import. We read there of "lying spirits" in prophets, 2 Ch. xviii. 21, 22; of "seducing spirits" in kings, 2 Ch. xxviii. 20; of "the unclean spirit in the land," or among the people, Zec. xiii. 2; and of evil spirits, producing the like physical and moral debasement in their victims, which is seen in the gospel demoniacs, Ju. ix. 23; 1 Sa. xvi. 14-23. No doubt these are attempted to be explained away. In the case of Saul, for example, it is held sufficient to exclude anything supernatural, that an evil spirit often signifies an evil temper or disposition, and does not necessarily mean anything else here. Admitting this, and that if the case had stood alone, we might have so received it, does not the antithesis between the Spirit of the Lord departing from Saul, and the evil spirit entering into him, mark a succession of agencies rather than of dispositions? At any rate, seeing the producing power bears the same name, and its agency produces the like effects in him as in the New Testament demoniacs, is not the conclusion at least probable that the cases are specifically the same? This is enough to show that demoniac possession existed before our Lord's time. His words distinctly imply that it should continue after him also. When he promises to give power to his disciples to cast out demons, Mar. xvi., as himself had done, it is certain there should be demons in men, against whom this power should be employed. Accordingly, in the execution of their mission, as we read, Ac. xvi. 16-18; xix. 12, his apostles met with men possessed by evil spirits, and cast them out in the name of Jesus. The history of the first ages of the church is full of the memorials of abounding demoniacs, which, though blended with a world of delusion and imposture, it is not easy wholly to discredit, in face of the express and solemn testimony of the Christian fathers generally. In our own time the evil and the remedy are alike ignored. To a great extent, the being and agency of the "one devil," "the spirit who now worketh in the children of disobedience," is disregarded and forgotten also. May not the disregard of the one as well as of the other proceed from the same cause—the prevalence of the spirit of unbelief, which leads us to look for a natural cause of all spiritual phenomena, whether good or evil? There still are undeniably many phases of human character and experience, which suggest the question whether they be not an effect of demoniac influence—a suggestion which it is much easier to deny or deride than to confute. At all events, Scripture affirms that this power shall be at work in the last days, reproducing the like effects in men, Ra. xvi. 14; xvii. 2.

It is certain, then, that the power of demons was not restricted to our Lord's time, and to the Lord's people. It is not altogether certain that it was even more prevalent then and there, than in other times and places. That more attention should have been then drawn to it, may be accounted for in another way. So long as the evil was hopelessly beyond remedy, little would be said of it, more than of any other endemic visitation. But when the remedy was found—not only alleged but proved in the experience of many, and in the sight of all—it became naturally the wonder of the time. In our Lord's day exorcists swarmed, both among Jews and Gentiles, who practised their art by mystical incantations and with doubtful efficacy. But when

He with authority commanded the unclean spirits and they obeyed, what wonder men should exclaim, "What a word is this!" and that the evil itself should acquire, though not a greater prevalence, yet a greater prominence in the public eye. Or if the fact were otherwise, and the victims of the spiritual tyranny, besides being more conspicuous, were also more numerous and more oppressed than before or since, why need this be deemed either improbable or unworthy? Other forms of affliction have had their day and place as well as this. If the fact were, as seems likely, that about these times men were more addicted than ordinary to sorcery and divination, Ac. xix. 18, 21, might not this, according to the rules of divine judgment, have provoked this special visitation? Or, can it be thought unnatural, that with the knowledge that their time was short, the evil spirits should then, so far as permitted, have thus put forth their malice and activity to the uttermost? Ra. xii. 2 And as regarded our Lord and the ends of his mission, what was so fitted to confirm his claims, and to illustrate his work in the eye of a sense-bound people, as the opportunity thus afforded for the manifestation of his power over the enemy? The demoniacs recovered by his word to a sound body and a right mind, were more convincing trophies of his power, and more palpable representatives of his work, than were his own disciples, in whom the effect of his influence was chiefly inward and spiritual. Hence, as we have seen, he once and again refers to his casting out of demons, not simply like his other miracles, as the proof of his divine mission in general, but as special evidence of his work and errand, as manifested to destroy the works of the devil, and to establish his own kingdom of grace. We may therefore treat with contempt Farmer's sarcasm on this subject, that this view turns the era of our Lord's advent into one of more grievous oppression to men. If the oppression were greater, it had its judicial cause in the sins of men, while our Lord's immediate agency was all directed to restrain and lessen it; and the rest, if aught remain, is to be explained on the same principles which determine the unequal or varying distribution of all other evils. But the reasons of this dispensation lie to a great extent beyond our reach, and we presume not to pronounce with confidence in regard to them. Some, as Trench, would connect them with the punishment or rebuke of sin, and this may be admitted of it in the general, as of every other form of human suffering. But we are not warranted to ascribe these more than other afflictions to any special sin or sinfulness in the individual sufferers, Lu. xiii. 1-3. The case of the lunatic, whom the spirit had taken "from a child," seems to forbid us to put this construction upon them. We may not doubt, however, that like all God's ways of dealing with men, it was meant to serve the great ends of moral discipline. Although it might appear, like insanity, so to overbear the reason, and conscience, and will, as to suspend responsibility, it can be readily understood to have formed the most important exercise of the principles and dispositions of all with whom those "vexed with the devil" were related in social and family bonds, as in the beautiful and blessed example of the woman of Canaan and her daughter. And in whatsoever way, or to whatever effect, all affliction, including insanity itself, subserves the great moral purpose of human life, the same end might be equally accomplished by the worst and most violent assaults of the demon's power. [J. He.]

DENARIUS, ten asses, rendered in the English Bible, though rather unhappily, a penny. Taking into account the difference in the value of money in the gospel age as compared with present times, a shilling would have been the nearer equivalent—although in reality its metallic worth from about the time of Augustus was only sevenpence halfpenny. Before that time it had been worth a penny more. But as it was the full day's wage for a labouring man, Mat. xx. 2, and a soldier got even somewhat less, it must ordinarily have commanded a larger supply of the necessities of life, not only than our penny, but even than our shilling. Some have supposed that the reduction in the weight and value of the denarius above noticed did not take place till the time of Nero; but this seems doubtful.

[200] Denarius of Tiberius Caesar.—Ackerman's Coins of the New Testament.

From the allusion in Mat. xxii. 19 it is plain that the coin then bore the image and superscription of the emperor; in earlier times the symbols of the republic were impressed on it. (See PENNY.)

DEPUTY is the term used in the English Bible for proconsul (Gr. ἀθύρατος), the highest local governor in those provinces which were in the hands of the Roman senate, Ac. xiii. 7, &c. It is once used in the plural, Ac. xix. 33, in the speech of the town-clerk of Ephesus: "There are deputies, let them implead one another"—by which is not to be understood, with some, advocates, or persons to conduct the causes, but proconsuls to deliver judgment. Not that there were more than one such in that part of Asia; but the work generally of such is referred to, or perhaps the assessors in judgment are included.

DER'BE, a city of Lycaonia, in Asia Minor, and manifestly not far from Lystra, with which it is sometimes associated, Ac. xiv. 6; xvi. 1. Paul and Barnabas found protection there when driven from Iconium, and it was the town of Caius, one of the Christian delegates to Jerusalem, Ac. xx. 4. But the exact site is unknown. Commonly it is placed south of Lystra; but this it could scarcely be, if, as Strabo states, it was almost within Cappadocia (xl. p. 569). Three different sites have been suggested by modern travellers; one of them on the lake Ak Göl, which Wieseler adopts. But there is as yet no certainty. (See LYSTRA.)

DESERT is scarcely distinguished in ordinary language from wilderness, although the latter may be regarded as the stronger term, importing either a more extensive or a more intensive form of the drought and desolation involved in the idea. In the English Bible, however, the terms are used indiscriminately, and sometimes the one, sometimes the other, is given as the rendering of midbar (מִדְבָּר), which is the word most commonly employed in the original. The word is derived from a root that signifies to lead to pasture (dabar), and hence the primary meaning of midbar is pasture-land, a tract fit for the feeding of flocks. This in the East is very commonly an extensive plain or steppe, which, during the drought and heat of summer, becomes utterly parched and bare; so that the transition from pasture-land to desert was, in such regions, quite easy and natural. That the word comprehends both the meanings now mentioned—the former as well as the latter—may be perceived even by an English reader from such passages as Ps. lxxv. 13, "They drop upon the pastures of the wilderness" (midbar); and Joel ii. 22, "The pastures of the wilderness do spring." In other passages the desert is spoken of as rejoicing, and again as being dried up, Is. xlii. 11; Joel i. 19. But in many, and indeed the greater number of passages, the idea of sterility is the prominent one, especially where what was emphatically the desert or wilderness, the great wilderness, is spoken of, Ge. xiv. 6; xvi. 7; De. xi. 24, &c. And the term is used in comparisons with exclusive reference to this import; as in Je. ii. 31, "Have I been a wilderness to Israel?" Hos. ii. 3, "Make her as a wilderness, and set her like a dry land."

Another term in the original, arabah (עֲרָבָה), is also rendered by desert or wilderness. This, too, primarily meant plain, but not plain in the sense of pasture, rather that of hollow or level ground, and specially the level into which the valley of the Jordan runs near Jericho, an immense plain extending all the way to the Red Sea. This was the arabah, of which the word is very often specifically used (De. i. 1; ii. 8; Jos. xii. 1; hence also "sea of the arabah or desert," De. iv. 49, viz. the Dead Sea, &c.) But the word also signifies desert generally, as in Is. xxxiii. 9; Je. i. 12, &c.; for the same reason as in the former case, because plains in such countries as Arabia and Palestine are sure to become for a considerable part of the year arid heaths, and also because what went more peculiarly by the name of the arabah was of a singularly bare and sterile character.

DEUTERONOMY, THE BOOK OF. I. Name and Contents.—The fifth and concluding book of the Pentateuch is in Hebrew named from the words with which it opens, אֵלֶּה הַדְּבָרִים (Elleh haddevarim), "these are the words;" but by the LXX. Δευτερονόμιον, "the second," or rather, "the repeated law," to which corresponds the rabbinical name מִשְׁנֵה (Mishneh), or more fully, מִשְׁנֵה הַתּוֹרָה (Mishneh Hattorah), "repetition," or "repetition of the law." The book consists principally of a series of discourses addressed by Moses to Israel, when they had reached the confines of the Promised Land, De. i. 1-5.

Amid various divisions that might be taken of the discourses, we present the following:—

1. Four parting addresses of Moses to the assembled Israelites in the plains of Moab, ch. i.-xxx., viz.—

(1.) An address, wherein he recapitulates the history of the wanderings through the wilderness, as an encouragement for obedience to the law, and a warning against apostasy, ch. i.-iv. 40. To this is added a notice of the three cities of refuge which Moses had set apart on the east side of Jordan, and of Israel's possessions there, ch. iv. 41-49.

(2.) A second address, wherein he notices the giving of the law, and adds many earnest and paternal exhortations to obedience, ch. v.-viii.

(3.) In the third discourse he introduces various modifications and more specific directions with respect to several previous ordinances and enactments, and some altogether new, ch. ix.—xxvi.

(4.) In the last he lays down the advantages as well as the duty of observing the law, by presenting to the people the blessing and the curse, preparatory to their renewing the covenant with Jehovah, ch. xxxii.—xxx.

2. Then follows a notice of the committal of the book of the law to the keeping of the priests, with the lawgiver's charge to them, and his song, ch. xxxi.—xxxii. 47; to which are added—

3. Three appendices: (1.) Announcement to Moses of his approaching death, ch. xxxii. 48-52; (2.) his blessing on the tribes of Israel, ch. xxxiii.; and (3.) an account of his death, ch. xxxiv.

Deuteronomy is thus seen to be a recapitulation both of the history and the laws of the middle books of the Pentateuch, in the form of paternal exhortations, rather than with legislative authority, urging a willing and unreserved obedience to all the precepts and commandments of Jehovah, and a faithful adherence to his covenant. A circumstance which must have greatly added to the solemnity of the occasion was the full consciousness of the speaker, that his own death must precede the enterprise to which, in the first instance, he encouraged his hearers, viz. their taking possession of the land, ch. iii. 27-iv. 22. He, in fact, contemplated his own departure as an event near at hand, ch. xxxi. 2, an anticipation which the close of the narrative shows to have been speedily realized. The admonitions now addressed to Israel took generally a twofold direction: First, a warning against idolatry, ch. iv. 14-40; xvii. 2-7; and secondly, against a spirit of self-righteousness, ch. ix. 4-24—dispositions to which, as their subsequent history but too plainly shows, the Israelites as a people were most prone. This twofold character of his parting exhortations accordingly furnishes a clear proof how intimately the lawgiver was acquainted with the peculiar predispositions of his people, ch. xxxi. 26-29, and an indication of the prophetic spirit with which he spoke.

II. Its Relation to the preceding Books.—The connection between Deuteronomy and the other books of the Pentateuch is very apparent. The contents, historical and legislative, of the three books which immediately precede it are recognized throughout, and in fact constitute its great theme. Yet there are important variations and additions, from which rationalists and others take occasion to deny the identity of its authorship with that of the other books, even when they agree that these could not have been the productions of Moses. The additions and variations found in Deuteronomy, so far, however, from constituting contradictions in respect of the earlier books, or in any way yielding support to the conclusions of the "document" criticism, admit of satisfactory explanation from the special and distinct aim of the author, as apparent from the work itself, and from the altered position of Israel at the time of its composition at the close of their wilderness life.

1. Variations, of which there are numerous instances, in respect to the order and the fulness of historical matters, can be accounted for from the hortatory style, and the object of the writer when recording his discourses. The circumstances were such as called only for a general reference to some transactions, the character and relations of which might be safely assumed as already well known to the parties addressed, and so admitted of the classing together of incidents having a common character, without much regard to strict chronological order. Thus the rebellions of Israel against Jehovah at Taberah, Massah, and Kibroth-hattaavah, are mentioned in connection with the idolatry at Sinai, ch. ix. 22, &c., but without in the least warranting the conclusion that the author considered these events as nearly contemporaneous, or as following in the order in which they are here enumerated. But even in instances of this kind the departure from the chronological order is often more apparent than real. It is objected, for example, that the command to remove the encampment precedes the appointment of the captains, ch. i. 6-16. De Wette says verses 6-8 are put too early; and this appointment of captains, it is also alleged, the writer of Deuteronomy confounded, ver. 16, with the institution of the seventy elders, Nu. xi. But the order for the removal of the camp and its fulfilment are clearly distinguished; and not less so are the appointments of the captains and the judges, both of which took place prior to the departure from Sinai, Ex. xviii. Sometimes, indeed, variations of this kind serve to throw light on particulars incidentally touched on in the more specific accounts of the preceding books. Thus the command, De. ii. 19, 37, not to distress the Ammonites, but to pass by their border, so far from contradicting the notice that "the border of the children of Ammon was strong," Nu. xxi. 24, rather explains this peculiar reference. The separation of the Levites to their sacred offices at first sight would seem to be transferred to a time subsequent to the death of Aaron, ch. x. 8; but a closer investigation at once removes such a misapprehension. The expression "at that time" refers to the time when Moses deposited the tables of the law in the ark, ver. 5. The reference to the time of the abode at Sinai pervades the whole section, and is only departed from parenthetically as regards Aaron's death.

The additions of an historical nature consist partly in the greater prominence which the writer gives to matters which in the earlier books were omitted as self-evident, and partly in the appending of particulars, which, while necessary for the purpose of the writer, exhibit the most minute acquaintance with the Mosaic times and history (Keil, Einführung, p. 111). Additions of the first kind are the command to break up from Horeb, De. i. 6, 7, comp. with Nu. x. 11; the notice "Ye abode in Kadesh many days," ch. i. 46; the repentance of Israel, ch. i. 46, of which no mention is made in Nu. xiv.; Moses' intercession for Aaron, ch. ix. 20, of which there is no notice in Ex. xxxii.—xxxiii. Additions of the second kind are: the command not to distress the Moabites, or wage war with them, ch. ii. 9, 18; not to meddle with the Edomites, but when passing through their territories to purchase bread and water, ch. ii. 4-8; the historical notices of the aboriginal inhabitants of Mount Seir, and of the countries at the Mosaic period in possession of the Moabites and Ammonites, ch. ii. 10-12, 30-33; notice of the sixty fortified cities in Bashan, ch. iii. 4, &c.; the different names of Hermon, ch. iii. 9; more specific details of the attack of the Amalekites, ch. xxv. 17, 18, than in the narrative in Ex. xvii. 8.

The more important variations and additions belong, however, to the legislative sections. Some particulars of this character are entirely new—as the appointment of the three trans-Jordanic cities of refuge, ch. iv. 41-43, directions concerning which had been given in Nu. xxxv. 14, while the command to set apart three cities on the other side is only repeated, De. xix. 9. So also the law as to the appointed place of public worship, whither all sacrifices, offerings, and tithes must be brought, ch. xii. 5, &c., with the repeal of the law which required that animals destined for food should be slaughtered nowhere but at the sanctuary, Le. xvii. 3, &c.; laws with respect to the tithes appointed for sacrificial seasons, De. xii. 11, 17; xvi. 12; xiv. 22, false prophets, enticers of the people to idolatry, and such as might be so enticed, ch. xii.; on regal functions, ch. xvii. 14; the functions and authority of the prophetic order, ch. xviii. 15, &c.; on war and military service, ch. xx.; on the mode of expiating murder, the perpetrator of which was unknown; on female captives of war; the right of a first-born son; the punishment of disobedient and obstinate sons, and the hanging or exposure of the bodies of criminals after execution, ch. xxi.; on unchastity and the rape of a virgin, ch. xxii. 13, &c.; on divorce, ch. xxiv. 1, &c.; various minor laws, ch. xxiii. 5, &c., xxiii. xxv.; the form of thanksgiving to be used on presenting the first-fruits and tithes, ch. xxvi. While in general the laws of the preceding books are only partially repeated and pressed anew, there are some, as for instance that regarding Hebrew slaves, De. xv. 12, &c., comp. with Ex. xxi. 2, &c., which are extended. (For certain variations in the law of the ten commandments in Deut. v. 6-21, as compared with Ex. xx. 1-17, see under DECALOGUE.)

None of these variations and additions, whether historical or legislative, is, however, of a kind to warrant the assertions of De Wette (Einleitung, sec. 156), that "the Mosaic history seems to be more remote from the author of this book than it would be from one who wrote down an historical narrative," and that "the laws are new, not only in respect to the time in which they are alleged to have been given, but in respect to their more modern character." On the contrary, the particulars just referred to afford the clearest evidence of personal acquaintance with all the facts of the Mosaic history, and of an authority to make such additions to and modifications in the Mosaic laws as the altered circumstances required. The references which De Wette detects in these laws to later times and institutions originate either in his misinterpretation of the passage, as when he discovers in ch. xii., xvi. 1-7 an allusion to the temple at Jerusalem, or in his dogmatic preconceptions with respect to the unreality of prophecy, on which ground he objects to ch. xvii. 14-20; xviii. 9-22.

2. The legislation of Deuteronomy as related to that of the earlier books requires some additional consideration. As the historical notices of this book pre-suppose the transactions detailed at length in the preceding history, so also its legal institutions give evidence of prior enactments. The Israelites are here introduced as already in the possession of laws and ordinances of a civil and religious character. That God through Moses had given them special commandments at Sinai in regard to the various matters of duty, ch. i. 18, is the fundamental idea of the whole of these Mosaic discourses. But it is of importance to notice the particular aspect in which the law is here presented. As remarked by Hävernick, "instead of the letter with its legal obligation adverse to all development, which finds in itself the ground of its higher necessity, reflection upon the law here prevails, and even the letter is in this way brought home more to the heart" (Einleitung, sec. 153). To love God is in particular represented as the end and fulfilment of the law, ch. vi. 5; x. 12. This, as an element recognized even in the decalogue itself, where it is made the true ground of obedience, Ex. xx. 6, assumes in Deuteronomy its right place. In other particulars also there is a marked prominence given to the spirit of the law as contrasted with the mere letter—a circumstance which has caused this book to be quoted more largely by the prophets than any other portion of the Pentateuch. The prophetic discourses of Jeremiah and Ezekiel in particular are formed very much upon the model of the addresses and exhortations of Moses to Israel in the plains of Moab. So great indeed is the resemblance between Deuteronomy and the writings of Jeremiah, that it has furnished grounds to the impugners of its genuineness to ascribe its composition to that prophet. Further, as shown under the preceding head, various laws contained in the former books are partly repeated and enforced anew, partly modified, restricted, or enlarged, and even repealed altogether, with the view of suiting them to the change in Israel's circumstances, and the new aspect of affairs arising from the approaching settlement of the people in their new homes, and the cessation of a migratory life with its encampments. Compare for instance De. xv. 17 with Ex. xxi. 7, and De. xii. with Le. xvii. These modifications entirely accord with the spirit and object of the law; but while they are a very strong proof of the credibility of the whole history of the Pentateuch, and particularly of the truthfulness of the wilderness sojourn, they are such as required the authority of the lawgiver himself; for there is a strict prohibition in the book itself against adding to or taking away from the law, ch. iv. 2; xiii. 1. No subsequent writer of Scripture assumes the authority of making such modifications in the law as is done by the writer of Deuteronomy. Still this is not a new legislation, or even a continuation, strictly speaking, of the preceding; it is the Sinaitic legislation enforced anew, and where necessary adapted to the changes which had emerged at the close of the forty years' wandering.

III. Its Prophetic Announcements.—The prophetic character of Deuteronomy is distinctly marked. Moses was fully conscious of his own prophetic standing; for he designates himself as a prophet, and the representative of the great Prophet that should in due time be raised up to complete his work, ch. xviii. 15-19. Indeed, the prophetic endowments of the speaker are apparent throughout his discourses, which show much fuller references to the future than any other portion of the Pentateuch. The intimations regarding Israel's future, with which the book of Leviticus closed, are here more largely developed, comp. De. xxviii. with Le. xxvi. In both these passages expression is given to the twofold aspect of Israel's future, which presented itself to the eye of the seer, and the precise character of which was, as they were distinctly warned, dependent on their relation to the law. The description of the curse, the consequence of disobedience, is much more copious in De. xxviii. 15-69 than in the closing address on the Sinaitic legislation—a circumstance probably owing to the discoveries made in the interval of Israel's proneness to apostasy. However this may be, it is evident to the seer that all these threatenings and admonitions shall prove ineffectual for securing obedience, and that the result will be a dispersion of his people among the nations of the earth, ver. 36, 37; and at a subsequent period, after a restoration from dispersion and exile, their subjection to a close and severe siege within their gates by a nation brought "from far, from the end of the earth," ver. 40-57, followed again by their being "plucked from off the land" given them for a possession, and their dispersion among all people, ver. 63, 64. Yet in the midst of all these threatened calamities, the continued existence of Israel is not only assumed, but is thus prophetically secured; and in the preservation of the people is involved the possibility of the removal of the curse itself, by a new constitution opposed to the character of the law, or in some way satisfying its requirements; for though the curses of the law on the disobedient cannot cease of themselves, but remain "for ever," ver. 44, yet they may be removed by some countervailing power. The concluding intimation of this solemn exhortation, "And the Lord shall bring thee into Egypt again with ships, by the way whereof I spake unto thee, Thou shalt see it no more again," ver. 68, is of similar import with the sentence passed upon man after the fall, condemning him to return to the dust out of which he was taken, Ge. iii. 19. This return to Egypt was an intimation of the cessation and destruction of the development and the history of Israel as a nation, which commenced with their redemption from Egypt, see De. xvii. 16, and has no reference whatever to any literal return to that land (see Baumgarten, Theolog. Comm. ii. 523).

These predictions by the lawgiver of the future of his nation, so remarkably verified, as all must admit, in their history, are continued in ch. xxx. and xxxii., accompanied with the assurance that when in their state of dispersion they return to the Lord, He "will return to his captivity" (שׁוּב שְׁבוּת, Shuv Shevuth), as Hengstenberg (Authentic, i. 104-106) renders it, and will gather them, ch. xxx. 1-3, perfecting their salvation by changing their disposition, ver. 6, 16. There is here plainly expressed what was hitherto only a matter of inference from the fact of the purposed preservation of this people. The prophet further discerns in the blessings awaiting Israel the accomplishment of a purpose of old, shadowed forth in the partition of the countries of the earth among the sons of Adam—an arrangement which had a special reference to the Israelitish people, De. xxxii. 8. Finally, the conclusion of Moses' prophetic song may be regarded as a summary of the whole law and prophecy: "Rejoice, O ye nations with his people; for he (Jehovah) will avenge the blood of his servants, and will render vengeance to his adversaries, and will be merciful to his land and his people," xxxii. 43. This, which was, in a manner, the dying testimony of the lawgiver, is adduced by St. Paul, Ro. xv. 10, as a proof of the participation of the Gentiles in the blessings of the covenant-people, and an interest in all that affects their prosperity. Such a testimony, while corresponding with the promises made to the patriarchs, and with what had been proclaimed respecting the purposes of the theocracy, Ex. xix. 6, evinced the unity of spirit which characterizes the Pentateuch, and is the more important, as concluding the Mosaic legislation, and proving that, in the estimate of the lawgiver himself, it had not that exclusive character which a mere external acquaintance with it is sometimes ready to assume.

But while Deuteronomy thus distinctly points to the future, it supplies proofs of the fulfilment of earlier prophecies. Thus, for instance, in the notice of "the terebinths of Moreh," ch. xi. 30, to which Moses points as the termination of Israel's journeyings, there is a remarkable, because tacit, reference to Ge. xii. 6, from a comparison with which it appears that at length Israel will be conducted to the very place where Abraham first set himself down in Canaan; thus intimating also that the time of wandering and banishment foretold to the patriarch, Ge. xv. 13-16, as appointed for his posterity, was now exhausted.

IV. Its Genuineness and Credibility.—Deuteronomy furnishes less room than any other book of the Pentateuch for the application of that criticism which, under the name of the "document" or "fragment hypothesis" (see GENESIS), would reduce the Mosaic writings to a congeries of the works of different authors and ages. Even the most sceptical of these critics allow that, with the exception of some unimportant interpolations, as they term them—(according to De Wette, ch. iv. 41-43, x. 6-9, xxxii. xxxiii.)—Deuteronomy is the production of one author; while not a few, as Delitzsch, Davidson, and others, who strenuously dispute the Mosaic origin of the other books of the Pentateuch, admit that Moses may have written this book. Indeed, so plainly and repeatedly does the work itself set forth its Mosaic authorship, ch. i. 6; xvii. 18; xxviii. 68; xxx. 19, 20, 27, with the exception of course of the section which records the lawgiver's death, or as Hengstenberg supposes, all after ch. xxxi. 23, which, although part of it was written by Moses, as the song, ch. xxxii., and probably the blessing on the tribes, xxxiii., seems to have been appended by the continuator—that it must be so received, or its testimony both on this and all other matters rejected altogether, for in such a case as this the question of the authenticity of the work is completely involved in that of its genuineness. These direct testimonies respecting the author are fully borne out by the character of the composition, which manifests throughout, as Moses Stuart remarks, after Eichhorn and Herder, "the earnest outpourings and admonitions of a heart which felt the deepest interest in the welfare of the Jewish nation, and which realized that it must soon bid farewell to them" (O. T. Canon, p. 44, Lond. 1846). The modifications of the earlier laws could, as already remarked, have proceeded only from the hand of Moses himself, and in these again are indisputable proofs of the authenticity of the work, but particularly in the fact that it was committed to the keeping of the priests as a sacred deposit of the nation, with an injunction that it should be publicly read at their solemn convocations, ch. xxxi. 9-13.

Even some of the contradictions and anachronisms which the opponents of the genuineness allege with respect to this book, furnish, when carefully examined, important testimony in favour of its Mosaic authorship, as also and more especially of its historical credibility. It has been already shown how some additions to, and variations from, the accounts of the preceding books—which, by De Wette and others, are designated contradictions—serve to supplement, and so to clear up, statements presenting some obscurity in the earlier books. The same is also found to be the case in various other instances. Thus, with respect to the mission of the spies, which proved such a source of temptation to Israel, manifesting indeed in its conception the greatest distrust in their divine leader, it appears from ch. i. 22 that the proposal originated with the people themselves, while in Nu. xiii. 2 the thing, as may at first appear very strange, is stated to have been commanded by Jehovah. There is, however, not only no contradiction between the two statements; but, on the contrary, the one obviates a difficulty which, from the very nature of the proposal, is presented by the other. The proposition proceeded from the people; in their unbelief they brought upon themselves this temptation; but without Jehovah's consent Moses would not have acceded to it. This was given, and moreover Jehovah specified what persons should be sent, Nu. xiii. 1, 2, but of this Deuteronomy makes no mention. Further, the promise to the Israelites of the land of Sihon, De. ii. 24, is represented as being at variance with Nu. xxi. 21, which states that Moses requested a peaceable passage through his territories. But as Hengstenberg observes, "the notion of a contradiction is founded on the assumption that the embassy could have no other object than to induce Sihon to grant the request, De. ii. 30, whereas it was intended to afford him an opportunity of manifesting that hostile determination, which was to effect his ruin." Again, as regards the circumstance that throughout Deuteronomy, except only in ch. xxxiii. 2, where Sinai occurs, the place of the giving of the law is called Horeb, whereas in the three preceding books Sinai is the usual designation, Horeb being used only in Ex. iii. 1; iv. 28; xvii. 6; xviii. 5; xxxiii. 6, it is to be observed that Horeb was the general name of the mountain range of that district, as appears from Ex. xvii. 6, according to which Rephidim was situated in Horeb, while Sinai, on the other hand, was the name of the particular peak from which the law was given (Robinson, Biblical Researches, 2d ed. vol. i. p. 120, 691). The latter name accordingly would appear most prominent in connection with the giving of the law, and while the Israelites continued in the neighbourhood of that scene, disappearing however in the general and well-known name Horeb when they receded from the locality; and when especially, in the book of Deuteronomy, the Sinaitic legislation is contrasted with that "in the land of Moab," De. i. 5; xxviii. 26. This view is further confirmed by the fact that previous to the Israelites' arrival at Sinai, Ex. xix. 1, 2, Horeb only is used—indeed, thus viewed, these peculiarities are examples of those undesigned coincidences which so largely distinguish the sacred narratives, and afford some of the most indubitable tokens of their truthfulness. Further, the apparent contradiction between Nu. xxxii. 39 and verse 29 is explained by a reference to De. iii. 12, 13, and Jos. xiii. 29–31. And finally, with respect to the number of cities assigned to a province of Bashan in De. iii. 4, comp. 1 Ki. iv. 13—a statement which modern sceptics receive with incredulity, a recent explorer remarks: "Though the country is waste, and almost deserted, its cities with their walls and gates, crumbling but not fallen, still remain, the living monuments of its former greatness, and the irresistible proofs of the minute accuracy and truthfulness of God's Word" (J. L. Porter, Jour. Sac. Lit. July, 1854, p. 281).

Leaving, however, these alleged contradictions, which a pretender would certainly not have allowed to escape him, and referring to the article PENTATEUCH for a fuller examination of the genuineness and authenticity as well of this as of the other books of that great work, it may be well, before concluding this section, to indicate briefly some of the views as to the author and age of Deuteronomy held by those critics who deny that it is the production of Moses. A simple statement of facts will at once show how contradictory these views are, and how arbitrary must be the grounds from which such conclusions are deduced.

Thus, according to Stähelin, the author of Deuteronomy is the Jehovist writer of the other books of the Pentateuch—a view at one time acquiesced in by Bleek, who afterwards, however, adopted so far the theory of De Wette, that he held with that critic that he was a distinct person, though they still differed as to the date of the composition—Bleek (Einleit. p. 302, Berlin, 1800) assigning it to the interval between Hezekiah and Josiah, while De Wette placed it in the reign of the latter, having abandoned his earlier opinion, which brought it down to the period of the exile. Ewald, again, holds Deuteronomy to be the work of a Jew living in Egypt during the latter half of the reign of Manasseh (Geschichte, i. p. 171)—a view in which, so far as regards the date, he is followed by Riehm, on grounds which Bleek considers altogether untenable. Others, as Von Bohlen, Gesenius, and Hartman, would, as already remarked, assign the authorship to the prophet Jeremiah.

Not less contradictory and mutually subversive are the views as to the sources to which these critics would assign certain portions of the work. Thus, to take only one instance, the blessing of Moses (ch. xxxiii.), which Tuch regards as proceeding from the Elohist, the oldest writer of the Pentateuch (Die Genesis, p. 556)—a view in which he is followed by De Wette—is held by Bleek to have originated in the time of Uzziah, though he formerly considered it as the composition of Moses himself. It is the same also with respect to other passages; but this must suffice; nor is it necessary to examine the arguments (some of which have been already adverted to) adduced in support of these conflicting and even fluctuating conclusions, all of which are diametrically opposed to the entire character and bearing of the work itself, and to its testimony regarding its origin, and which is here more direct and explicit than in any of the other portions of the Mosaic writings.

V. Its Chronology.—The period of time comprised in Deuteronomy is not stated in the book itself. It can however be approximately determined from ch. i. 3, 4, comp. with Jos. iv. 19; v. 10. According to the first of these passages, Moses began the discourses which constitute Deuteronomy on the first-day of the eleventh month of the fortieth year of the wanderings. According to Jos. v. 10 the Israelites under Joshua encamped in Gilgal, and kept the passover on the fourteenth day of the first month of the following year, having four days previously, or on the tenth, crossed the Jordan, Jos. iv. 19. Before this three days had been occupied in preparations, and in waiting for the return of the spies, ch. i. 11; ii. 22—a circumstance which brings the encampment at Shittim, ch. ii. 1, to the seventh day of the same month. Now, as the Israelites mourned for Moses thirty days in the plains of Moab, De. xxxiv. 8, this would assign his death to the seventh day of the twelfth month (Carpsov, Introductio, vol. i. p. 141, Lipsa 1757).

[Its Literature.—In addition to works on Deuteronomy comprised in expositions of the whole Pentateuch, the following are separate treatises on this book or parts thereof: Luther, Deuteronomion Mose ex Elrebo castigatum cum annotationibus, Witteb. 1524; Calvin, Sermons upon Deuteronomie, with a preface of the Ministers of the Church at Geneva, translated by A. Golding, Lond. 1583; Lorinus (*Soc. [D. M.]

DEVIL. This is the proper English equivalent for the Greek δαίμονος, when applied to the great adversary of God and man; indeed, it is that word itself in an English form; but neither is the Greek term always so applied, nor is the English term altogether appropriated to it; it is employed as the rendering of other expressions in the original, which are not quite equivalent. In its primary meaning the Greek word signifies calumniator or false accuser; and so it is sometimes used in New Testament scripture of persons who are given to evil-speaking or slanderous discourse. Thus, in 1 Tim. iii. 11, it is enjoined respecting the wives of deacons that they "be grave, not alanderers" (δαίμονος); and to the like effect in Tit. ii. 3; 2 Tim. iii. 3. The transference of this epithet to one who, in the world of spirits, is the chief adversary of all good, so as to designate him emphatically the devil, arose quite naturally from the part acted by this malignant spirit toward the people of God as their accuser, always suspecting evil against them, and often distinctly charging it, Job i. 7, 12; Zec. iii. 1, 2; Rev. xii. 9, 10. On this account the Hebrew epithet Satan, the adversary, had been applied to him as a proper name, and this the Greek translators rendered by δαίμονος, devil. It is derived, like most epithets which become proper names, from a prominent characteristic; and, if respect be had to its appellative import, it requires to be supplemented by others in order to bring out the full idea of Satan's character and relation to the people of God. For he is their tempter as well as their accuser, and bears also the name of Apollyon, the destroyer. But as Satan, or devil, expresses generally the antagonistic, malicious, and thoroughly perverse nature of this evil spirit, it has become his usual and received designation.

In New Testament scripture it appears often as the designation of other personalities than the one arch-spirit of evil now referred to; for we read of persons being possessed of devils, in one instance even of a legion of devils being in one unhappy victim, Mat. viii. 28; Mar. v. 9, &c. But in such cases the word used in the original is different; it is demon, which, among the Greeks, was a word of indifferent meaning; that is, it denoted higher spiritual existences generally, good as well as bad, though, by the sacred writers, it is used only of the bad—the subordinates of the great spirit of evil, and his active coadjutors in the work of mischief. (See under DEMONS and DEMONIACS.) In one passage, child or son of the devil is applied to a human being as a strong expression, indicating the extent to which he had surrendered himself to the power of evil, and the tortuous courses to which he had consequently betaken, Ac. xiii. 10. And in still another passage the term itself, δαίμονος, devil, is applied by our Lord to the traitor, "Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil?" Some (among others Dr. Campbell) have objected to the expression here "a devil," on the ground more especially that, as the term in its appropriation to the arch-rebel, always denotes one individual, it is not agreeable to scriptural usage to say a devil, there being strictly but one to whom the designation applies as a proper name, and so they would regard the word, when applied to Judas, as an epithet, translating thus—one of you is an accuser, or malicious informer. But this gives a tame and inadequate sense, and it also overlooks the peculiar usage of this evangelist. It is the tendency of John, more than of the other evangelists, to see the invisible imaged in the visible, in particular to connect human actors and instruments with potencies of a supernatural kind. In his gospel Christ himself is spoken of as being in the Father, and the Father in him; believers also are in Christ, and Christ in them. So, on the other side, the unbelieving Jews are of their father, the devil; they do his works; and when Judas was on the eve of consummating the great deed of apostasy, Satan is represented as entering into him, ch. xiii. 27. Therefore, to apply to Judas the distinctive name of the great apostate and adversary, and to say "he is a devil," was only to give a somewhat more distinct and pointed expression to the close relationship, the virtual identity between the seen and the unseen actor in the drama. The one was in the little company of Christ's disciples what the other is in the rational creation of God. And if Scripture can say of such an one, He is a god—though there be but one who properly bears the name—why may it not, in certain circumstances, say of another, He is a devil! The figurative element that is in such a mode of expression can mislead no thoughtful reader of the Bible.

These, however, are but occasional free applications of a term which, in the ordinary language of Scripture, denotes a being who, in some sense, stands alone, having many indeed associated with him in evil, but none equal to him in rank or power. Hence we read of "the devil and his angels," Mat. xxv. 41, standing in a sort of rivalry and antagonism to "God and the angels," so that, as God presides over the spirits of light, there is a world of darkness, the powers of which are presided over by the devil, as "the prince of darkness." From the influence he exerts over mankind, and the interest he has acquired in things here below, he is styled "the god of this world," the "prince of the power of the air," "the ruler of the darkness of this world," &c., and from the part he acted at the beginning, "the old serpent." The existence of such a being, and of such an empire of evil, in the universe of an infinitely good and powerful God, is undoubtedly a profound mystery, and raises questions of various kinds, which the human intellect is altogether incompetent to solve. That it is a doctrine of Scripture no one can deny, except by a method of interpretation which might be applied to explain away the most specific revelations of divine truth. And if, on account of the difficulties in which the subject is involved to our finite comprehension, we begin to suspend our belief regarding it, where shall we stop? Shall we not, on the same ground, withhold our belief from what is written of the nature of God himself, of the incarnation and work of his Son, of both the origin and the extinction of evil in his kingdom? Such things are all inwrought in mystery to our view, though intelligible and plain enough as regards their relation to us, and their bearing at once on our present condition and our coming destinies. How the devil should have become what he now is—how he should be allowed to prosecute his aims to the extent, and with the measure of success which seem to be accorded to him—or what can be the prompting impulse to such unwearied activity in evil, in a mind capable of so much intelligence, and conscious of so much misery—are matters too high for us to understand. With its usual reserve in respect to things that belong rather to the region of speculation than of practice, Scripture furnishes us with no definite insight into them, and by its very silence inculcates upon all in respect to them the humility and meekness of wisdom. But there are points of practical moment which it does teach, and which it is well for all sound believers rightly to apprehend and believe.

The first of these has respect to the derivation of this antagonistic spirit of evil, which, according to Scripture, had its commencement in time, and arose from a culpable perversion of the good. The doctrine of Scripture here differs essentially from the Manichean principle of an independent, self-subsisting spirit of evil—a principle which, from comparatively early times, insinuated itself into the philosophy of the East. God alone is represented in the Bible as possessed of absolute existence; he is the one I AM; and all besides that belongs to the universe of being is the offspring of his hand; it is of the things that have been created and made by him. But as he is not more absolutely existent than purely and essentially good, whatever proceeded from his hands necessarily partook, in its original state, of his own blessed nature; in its proper place, and for the ends of its creation, it was good. Such, beyond all question, is the teaching of Scripture; and consequently the devil and his associates were not originally what they now are; they have become such by the wilful abuse and deprivation of what their Creator conferred on them. The precise occasion and mode of this departure into evil, as already noticed, is nowhere indicated in Scripture; and the fact itself is implied rather than distinctly asserted in those parts of Scripture which compose the Old Testament. We infer it from the character there ascribed to God, as in himself altogether good, and from the relation which Satan always appears to occupy toward him as that of a limited and dependent creature, who therefore must have derived his being from God, but could not by possibility derive the malice and guile by which it is now perverted; this he could only have of himself. What we can thus infer, however, from Old Testament scripture, is explicitly taught in the New. There Satan and his angels are declared to be fallen spirits, suffering under the just condemnation of God, and reserved to a yet further execution of judgment. The everlasting fire, in which the wicked generally are to have their final doom, is that which has been primarily prepared for the devil and his angels—prepared for them as the leaders of apostasy; and they are hence described as “the angels that kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation;” or, as it is again said, “the angels who sinned,” and who in consequence were “cast down to hell, and delivered unto chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment.” Mat. xxv. 41; 2 Pe. ii. 4; Jude 6. How this sinning should have come about we are not told, for there is no foundation for the opinion of some that it only took shape in the temptation presented to our first parents. On the contrary, the part acted by the head of the rebel host on that occasion, since he proved himself even then to be a liar and a murderer, Jn. viii. 44, is proof, at the same time, that the angelic fall must have been prior to the human. Yet the priority, in all probability, was not great, if the creation of angels belongs to the same era with that of man. We cannot say for certain that it was, nor on the relative period of their transgression have we any clear analogy to guide us; only, from all we are able to know of the original condition of angelic beings, and what was likely to be the effect of that upon their spirits, we can more easily conceive of their having fallen under the power of sin near the commencement of their career, than after they had long lived in the fellowship and enjoyment of God.

Another point, on which the information of Scripture bears unequivocal testimony, is the limited and subordinate nature of the devil's agency. As he has no independent existence, so he has no sovereign dominion; his sphere of operations is on every hand bounded, in subordination to the purposes of the divine government; he can work only where God permits him, and in such ways as can be made subservient to the accomplishment of the purposes of Heaven. Hence, in the parabolical representation of the book of Job, ch. i., the limits are prescribed within which the adversary is allowed to work—a definite course is marked out to him. Hence, also, the things done through his instrumentality are also ascribed to God, as in the numbering of Israel by David, which, originating in a spirit of proud self-reliance, was directly prompted by Satan, and yet had its ordination of God, 2 Sa. xxiv. 1; 1 Ch. xxi. 1; or, in the case of Paul's thorn in the flesh, which was at once God's check upon his vanity, and the messenger of Satan to buffet him, 2 Co. xii. 7. Whatever temptations, therefore, believers may on this account be exposed to, they can be subject to no violence; a restraint is laid upon the movements of the adversary, and if they resist him he must flee from them.

In respect again to the mode of that pernicious agency which is carried on by the devil and his angels, it falls in, like that of angelic agency generally, with the operation of second causes. It is only by giving a higher potency to these, not by any direct or separate action, that the power of the wicked one makes itself felt. That potency may sometimes, as in the possessions of the gospel age, assume the appearance of something like miraculous power, yet it is always within the line of the moral and physical laws which are established in the world. It can somehow intensify the evil which the natural operation of these might be fitted to effect, but it has no power to bring into play anything absolutely new. Even that moral hardening, or blind impetuosity in the way to destruction, which comes from Satan's entering (as it is said) into men, or gaining a sort of personal mastery over them, always appears as the result of a previous course of wickedness, and shows itself in but a more thorough abandonment to the lusts of the flesh and the mind. Examples of this are to be found in Saul under the Old Testament, and under the New in Judas, Ananias and Sapphira, and the subjects of Antichrist. In its worst forms, therefore, it is always to be regarded as the punishment of antecedent guilt and perversity; and it in no respect interferes with the responsibility, or lessens the guilt, of those who yield to it.

Finally, little as we know otherwise respecting the nature and condition of the devil and his angels, we can yet, with perfect confidence, predicate of them utter depravity and intense misery. Their character and aims are in direct opposition to those of God; as the kingdom of the one rises, that of the other falls; and so, to destroy the works of the devil was the very purpose for which the Son of God was manifested, 1 Jn. iii. 8. Whatever tends, therefore, to injure and destroy; falsehood, deceit, guile, malice, hatred of the good, restless and insatiate striving after dominion—these are the elements of satanic thought and influence, missing often, by the very fullness and complexity of evil they embody, the ends they aim at, because necessarily involving an incompetency to enter into the views and feelings of those who love and follow what is good. In the case of such they ever miscalculate the forces they have to contend against, and hence appear often acting a part of maddest folly, or blindly subverting the interests they seek to overthrow. As the result of such depraved aims and such bootless working, devils are necessarily miserable. "Torn loose," to use the words of Twesten, "from the universal centre of life, without being able to find it in themselves—by the feeling of inward void ever driven to the outward world, and yet in irreconcilable hostility to it and themselves—eternally shunning and never escaping the presence of God—always endeavouring to destroy, and always compelled to promote his purposes—instead of joy in the beatific vision of the divine glory, having a never-satisfied longing for an end they never reach—instead of hope, the unending oscillation between fear and despair—instead of love, an impotent hatred of God, their fellows, and themselves—can the fearful condemnation of the last judgment, the thrusting down into the bottomless pit of destruction, Ro. xx. 10, add anything to the anguish of such a condition, excepting that they shall there see the kingdom of God for ever delivered from their assaults, their vain presumption that they can destroy or impede it scattered to the winds, leaving to them only the ever-gnawing despair of an inward rage, which cannot spend itself on anything without, and is therefore for ever undeceived as to its impotence?"

The subject, even within such limits as are cognizable by our minds, has much in it that is dark and mournful. But there is much also of the same in the condition and history of wicked men. The blindness and perversity that is seen to grow upon them, even amid circumstances fitted to operate beneficially upon their minds, the moral impotence and incapacity that ultimately settles upon them in regard to the pure and good, the present evil and misery they are permitted to bring upon others, and the destiny of irrecoverable ruin to which they are themselves manifestly hastening, are, one and all, subjects deeply mysterious and inexpressibly sad. The difference betwixt them, and those which concern the devil and his angels, is one only of degree, not of kind; and what we see and know of the one may serve as a stepping-stone to help our believing conceptions respecting the other. The unbelief which staggers at the higher line of revelations will never stop without also infringing seriously upon the lower; and it will invariably be found that the deniers of satanic existence and agency but partially receive what is written of the depths of human depravity and the woes of human perdition.

DEW. The allusions of Scripture to this natural production are of considerable frequency and variety; but referring, as they do, to what is generally known and understood, they hardly require the aid of explanatory remark. When God says of the goodness he had in store for his repenting people, "I will be as the dew unto Israel," Ho. xiv. 5, or when Job said of the days of his prosperity, "The dew lay all night on my branch," Job xxix. 10, every one perceives that it is the refreshing and fructifying property of dew which is the ground of the comparison. "The dew of his youth," which is said to rest on the Messiah in Ps. cx. 3, is evidently, in other words, the freshness, as of youthful energy, or of life's buoyant and hopeful morn. In other passages respect is had to the gentle and benign manner in which it diffuses itself, the more perceptible and the more grateful that it comes to allay the heats and repair the waste of a parching day, as when Moses represents his speech "distilling like the dew," De. xxxii. 2, and the Lord himself is compared, on account of his gracious manifestations, to "a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest," Is. xlviii. 4; so also the benign influence of brotherly love is likened to "the dew of Hermon, [the dew] that descends upon the mountains of Zion," Ps. cxxxiii. 3. In still other passages reference is made to its chilling effect on the bodily frame when exposed after a hot day to its infrigidating power—"My head is filled with dew, and my locks with the drops of the night," Ca. v. 2; "they shall wet thee with the dew of heaven," Da. iv. 25. Viewed simply in respect to its natural effects on the herbage of the ground, the falls of dew, especially in early summer, and again in autumn, when they chiefly prevail, were of great service in such a country as Palestine, where periodical seasons of rain are succeeded by a hot sun and continuous drought. Hence to have the heavens stayed from dew, 1 Ki. xvii. 1; Hag. i. 10, must have been a serious calamity; and for a mountain to be cut off from supplies of this species of moisture, as David poetically besought in regard to Gilboa, 2 Sa. i. 21, was virtually to be consigned to barrenness and sterility.

DIADEM, as used in Scripture, can scarcely be said to have the distinctive meaning which has been assigned to it as the more peculiar badge of absolute power or imperial dignity. It occurs only in four passages, and as the rendering of words which might equally have been translated fillet, mitre, tiara, or turban (כִּימָרִים קִרְבָּנִים).

Derived from the root which signifies to roll together or around, it was applied by way of eminence to the ornate drapery or wrappings about the head customary in the East, in particular to the costly tiaras of fashionable women, Is. iii. 23, the turbaned cap of the high-priest, and the costly head-bands of sovereigns. Speaking of the insignia of royalty, which by a divine judgment were to be taken from the representative of David's house, Ezekiel says, "Remove the diadem, take off the crown," Eze. xxi. 25—not the diadem, therefore, in the more peculiar oriental sense, since it is coupled with crown; and the two are not likely to have been worn together. Isaiah speaks of converted Israel being as a diadem of royalty—an ornate head-band, such as might befit kings—in the hand of the Lord, ca. lxi. 3. In a similar poetic style Job speaks of his judgment having been to him "as a robe and a diadem"—like comely attire for the body and the head. And again in Is. xxviii. 5, Jehovah is represented, on account of the peculiar manifestations of favour and blessing he was going to bestow on his people, as serving to them for "a crown of glory, and a diadem of beauty"—throwing around them, as it were, the rich and costly attire of a king. These are all the passages in which the expression is to be met with in the English Bible, and in the last the word in the original is different (כִּימָרִים), nor is it elsewhere used of distinctively royal apparel. So far as the testimony of Scripture is concerned, it must remain doubtful whether the kings of Judah or Israel were wont to exchange the diadem with the crown as emblematic of royalty, or whether the terms referred to were not employed somewhat generally of the highly adorned and often richly gemmed head-dresses, which were worn by persons in positions of honour, and more especially by kings and priests.

It is proper to add, however, that the diadem, strictly so called, rather than the crown, was the more peculiar badge of absolute sovereigns in eastern countries. It usually consisted of a band or fillet, about two inches broad, tied behind; made of silk, and inlaid with gold and gems of the rarer kinds. The earlier emperors of Rome did not venture to wear it, on account of its offensiveness to the Roman people; their principal distinction was the imperial or military robe of purple; but Diocletian, in whose hands the imitation of eastern manners became more decided, assumed also the diadem. "It was no more," says Gibbon, "than a broad white fillet set with pearls, which encircled the emperor's head." But other things corresponded; for "the sumptuous robes of Diocletian and his successors were of silk and gold, and even their shoes were studded with the most precious gems."

DIAL. This word occurs only once in our English Bibles, and it is matter of some doubt whether even that once is not too much. It is in the account given of the miraculous sign which was granted to Hezekiah regarding his recovery from an apparently hopeless disease, when the sun's shadow, it is said, went "ten degrees backward, by which it had gone down in the dial of Ahaz." 2 KI. XX. 11. The word here rendered dial (רִשְׁטָה) is the same that is translated degrees in the earlier part of the verse; and its usual meaning is beyond doubt degrees or steps. But what precisely were the degrees or steps of Ahaz, it is impossible with any exactness to determine. That they must have been somehow adapted for marking, by the incidence of a shadow, the progression of the sun's daily course, is evident from the connection; but not less evident, that as the shadow might be made to exhibit either a progress or a regress of ten degrees, the instrument could not have been constructed after the fashion of an ordinary dial for indicating the twelve hours of the day. The more ancient authorities—the Septuagint and Syriac translators, also Josephus (Ant. x. 11, 1)—understood it of certain steps of a stair connected with the palace of Ahaz, which it is easy to conceive, might be so constructed as, by means of the shadow of an obelisk or some other object, to represent the successive divisions of the day in hours, half hours, and perhaps still smaller portions. It is possible, however, that there may have been an instrument or structure with a proper dial-plate, to which the name degrees was applied; and it is again supposed by some, that an obelisk-like pillar might have served the purpose, set up in an open elevated place, with encircling steps on which the shadow fell (Knobel). Various other conjectures have been made in regard to the form, but they are attended with no certainty. Nor has anything been discovered among the monuments of Egypt or Assyria to guide to more definite conclusions; no dials of any sort have been found. It is known, however, that the Chaldeans had a sun-dial so early as the year 540 B.C., which is called the hemicycle, and is ascribed to the astronomer Berosus. It was of a very simple construction, consisting of a concave hemisphere, shaped like the vault of heaven, divided into twelve parts, on which, by means of a globule in the centre, the sun's daily progress was marked under so many divisions or hours. Herodotus informs us that the "pole (πόλος), and the sun-dial (γρόμων), and the division of the day into twelve parts, were learned from the Babylonians by the Greeks" (ii. 109); and by the pole is there supposed to be meant the concave dial, which has just been referred to. So that as inventions of this description appear to have originated with the Babylonians, and are known to have existed at a period not very remote from the time of Ahaz, it is quite conceivable that this king, who was only too fond of borrowing in other things from his heathen neighbours to the north, and keeping up a connection with them, 2KI. xvi. 7-12, may have derived from that quarter some instrument, for which the Hebrews had no other name than the general one of degrees or steps, from its marking the successive stages of the sun's diurnal course.

In regard to the sign performed upon the instrument in question, there can be no doubt it was in the strict sense of the term miraculous; only by being so could it have served the purpose for which it was given. But as the representation is made in popular language, and according to the apparent phenomena, we have no reason to suppose that there was any change in the real motion of the heavenly bodies; the shadow was made to move backwards ten degrees, as if the sun itself had so far retrograded; but the effect was no doubt produced by some divine operation of a merely local nature; since the effect could not otherwise have been confined to a particular instrument or structure belonging to the palace in Jerusalem.

DIAMOND, sometimes adamant, Hebrew רִשְׁטָה (shamir), JE. XVII. 1; EZE. III. 9; ZEC. VII. 12, the hardest and the most precious of all gems. In the English Bible it occurs also at Ex. xxviii. 18, among the precious stones composing the sacred breastplate of the high-priest; but the word is there different in the original (yahalim), and by the Septuagint and Josephus is regarded as the onyx. It is not at all likely that there should have been two terms quite disconnected and unlike to express one gem; and if, as is generally agreed, shamir was the name for diamond, then this gem could not have had a place in the sacred breastplate. It was probably not known to the Israelites at the period of the exodus, or if known, they may not have been acquainted with the art of polishing it, which was difficult of acquirement on account of its extreme hardness. In those passages cited above, which do make mention of the diamond, it is simply this quality of hardness that is made account of; the prophet Ezekiel speaks of making his forehead like a diamond (or adamant), to confront the opposition he had to meet with; and Israel, as represented by the other two prophets, hardened their hearts in sin, so as to become unimpressible like the diamond. Pliny describes the gem as of such indescribable hardness, that it was proof against all heat (duritia inenarrabilis, simulque ignium victrix natura). Modern art has somewhat modified this representation; for while it remains the hardest of minerals, so far from being superior to any power of heat, there is a process by which a heat can be raised so intense as totally to consume it. When subjected to such a process it turns out to be a composition of pure carbon. Its peculiar worth arises from its hardness and transparency; and when found in great perfection and considerable bulk, it rises to almost fabulous value. A single diamond has been sold for £150,000, and others of much higher worth are known to exist—in particular one set in the sword of the Emperor of Russia, weighing 779 carats, and another, immensely greater still, belonging to the King of Portugal, weighing as much as 1680 carats. But, as already noticed, the hardness alone of the mineral is noticed in Scripture.

DIANA. See EPHEBUS.

DIBLATIM [two cakes], the name of the father of one of the women Hosea was instructed in vision to take to wife, Ho. i. 3. (See HOSEA.)

DIBON, a town on the northern bank of the Arnon, originally belonging to Moab, Jos. xiii. 17. It was rebuilt by the tribe of Gad, and hence was called Dibon-Gad, Nu. xxxii. 33; xxxiii. 45. In later times it reverted to the Moabites, and is mentioned among the Moabitish cities against whom the divine judgments are pronounced; Isaiah calls it Dimon, Is. xv. 9; Je. xlviii. 18, 22. A place named Diban has been discovered by modern travellers in the same region, and is supposed to be the representative of the ancient city. The ruins are of some extent.—There was another Diban in the tribe of Judah, Ne. xi. 25; but nothing is known of it.

DIDRACHMA, two drachmas, or a half shekel, the customary contribution to the tabernacle or temple; but see under TRIBUTE.

DIDYMUS (Δίδυμος), a surname of the apostle Thomas, and meaning twin. If translated, as it might have been, the designation would be "Thomas the twin."

DYMON. See DIBON.

DYNAH [judged or acquitted], the daughter of Jacob by Leah. Her history is a kind of brief tragedy. When her father's tent was pitched in the neighbourhood of Shechem, shortly after his return from Mesopotamia, she went out, as it is said, to see the daughters of the land, Ge. xxxiv. 1, that is, mingled with them in free and familiar intercourse. Considering the dissoluteness of manners which prevailed at the time, this was a wrong course for her to pursue, and wrong also for her parents to allow. The consequence was, that she fell a victim to the seductive arts of the place, and was deflowered by Shechem the son of Hamor. It is said, however, that he sincerely loved her, and some time after his misconduct made proposals of marriage to her father. This, it would appear, was not done till the sons of Jacob had been brought from the field, where they were at the time pasturing their flocks, and were consulting with their father how the dishonour was to be met. They were all full of grief and indignation, because "folly had been wrought in Israel;" yet on the proposal of marriage being formally made on the part of Shechem by his father, they agreed to it—but only on condition that the Shechemites should circumcise themselves and become one people with the family of Jacob. The Hivite party submitted to this condition—so sensible were they of the wrong that had been done, and so afraid of the consequences to which it might lead. But there was a want of mutual sincerity in the matter; worldly policy prevailed both in the proposal of marriage on the one side, and the acceding to it on the other. "Jacob's sons (we are told) answered deceitfully"—that is, probably, the two of them who took the leading part in the negotiations—Simeon and Levi, two of Dinah's full brothers. And when the men of the place were labouring under the disability caused by the act of circumcision, these brethren in deceit and cruelty took an unmanly advantage of their position, and cut them all off with the edge of the sword. Jacob had no sympathy with his sons in this foul deed, and both at the time, and on his death-bed, expressed his strong disapprobation of it. But undoubtedly considerable blame must be attributed to Jacob for the state into which he had allowed his family at the time to fall; it was evidently a period of remissness and backsliding; and he seems himself to have neglected to pay to God the vow he had originally made at Bethel. Hence, immediately after the mournful transactions connected with Dinah's fall, the Lord appeared to him, and directed him to go to Bethel and renew his covenant-engagement with God. He took this as an admonition, and called upon his family to put away from them the strange gods they had brought in amongst them, and to purify themselves, Ge. xxxv. 1-3. The evil thus proved the occasion of a revived earnestness and a temporary reformation in the family.

DINNER, at least what was commonly called such among the orientals and the ancients generally, was an early meal, and corresponded nearly to our breakfast or lunch. It was usually taken about eleven. The Greek word for it (ἀπρωτος) comes from a root that signifies early, and by its very etymology denoted the early meal. Their chief meal was the δειπνον or supper, which was taken late in the day, when the ordinary labours being over, families and neighbours could leisurely assemble to partake of a friendly meal. Sometimes, however, the word is employed of a large and formal entertainment; as at Mat. xxii. 4, where in a parabolical representation the kingdom of God is likened to the marriage-dinner of a king's son; and, in another passage, Lu. xiv. 12, the alternative of dinner or supper is put in respect to a feast. This usage may be regarded as somewhat exceptional; and, having respect to the common manners of the East, it is with the supper that the idea of a feast is most fitly associated, and under which the customs connected with formal entertainments may be best treated. (See SUPPER.)

mentioned as one of the few converts from heathenism in Athens who clave to the apostle Paul. Sacred history contains no further notice of him; but ecclesiastical tradition, in proportion to the scantiness of the materials, has made itself busy with his memory. It has reported him as an Athenian, who was distinguished for his literary attainments—one, who first studied at Athens, then at Heliopolis in Egypt; who, when in Egypt, beheld the eclipse of the sun which is supposed to have coincided with the darkness that took place at the crucifixion; and who afterwards, on retiring to Athens and formally embracing Christianity, was made first bishop of the church at Athens. Of course, he had also to suffer martyrdom—for tradition would scarcely allow any early bishop to die a natural death. But all this must be placed to the account of uncertain rumour, and is of too late origin to be deserving of any serious credit. There are certain writings that were composed in his name, probably in the fifth century; these are now universally acknowledged to be spurious, and call for no particular notice here.

DIOTREPES, a name of heathen origin, meaning Jore-nourished, but occurring in the third epistle of St. John, as the name of a person in one of the churches of Asia Minor, who professed Christianity, but was of an ambitious spirit, and even set himself up against apostolic authority. "He loveth to have the pre-eminence, and receiveth us not," saith the apostle; "and not content therewith, neither doth he himself receive the brethren, and forbiddeth them that would, and casteth them out of the church." We hear nothing more of him; and it is probable that the denunciation which the apostle pronounced against him, or the application of the stringent measures he threatened to use, put an end to his malicious attempt to create a party in the church he belonged to.

DISCERNING OF SPIRITS is mentioned in 1 Co. xii. 10 as one of the supernatural gifts which were conferred by the Holy Spirit in apostolic times. It seems to have been a sort of spiritual intuition, enabling its possessors, as with the eye of Heaven, to read the character of those who professed to have divine revelations, and determine whether they were of God or not. We see the exercise of this gift, as directed to what was evil, in the penetrating insight of the apostle Peter respecting the case first of Ananias and Sapphira, then of Simon Magus, and the oracular decision pronounced by him upon their state and behaviour. It was specially needed at a time when the Christian church was beginning to take root in the world, and when, amid the spiritual heavings and excitements that prevailed, the false was sure to intermingle with the true. But as matters grew into regular and settled order, a power of this description would naturally come to be withdrawn, as no longer needed to carry on the affairs of the church; the spirits could be tried by the ordinary tests of doctrine and character, without any supernatural endowments of grace; and so discerning of spirits soon ceased to be mentioned as a special gift, while false teachers were kept in check by the discipline of the church.

DISCIPLE, is one who has learned of another, has imbibed his views, and follows his guidance. It is of course applicable to all true believers, but it is often applied by way of eminence to the twelve who constantly waited upon the instructions of Christ, and after his departure were the representatives of his mind to the world—nearly synonymous, therefore, with apostle.

DISEASES; such as were frequent among the Jews, or any way peculiar to them—leprosy, for example, pestilence, palsy, &c.—will be found noticed under their proper heads; and the general subject, as viewed in Scripture, is no further remarkable, than that all manner of disease is regarded there as the visitation of God on account of sin. It is only after sin had entered, that sickness, in its different forms of disease, and its natural issue death, obtained a footing in the earth. When the Redeemer comes to rectify the evil, he makes himself known as the bearer of our diseases, not less than the remover of our guilt, Mat. viii. 17. And when the final results of his salvation are brought in, as sin shall have been for ever purged away, so disease of every form shall disappear: "The inhabitants shall not say, I am sick, the people shall be forgiven their iniquity," 1a. xxxiii. 24.

DIVINATION, DIVINER. In the ordinary acceptance of the terms, divination differs from prophecy, in that the one is a human device, while the other is a divine gift; the one an unwarranted prying into the future by means of magical arts, superstitious incantations, or natural signs, arbitrarily interpreted; the other a partially disclosed insight into the future, by the supernatural aid of Him who sees the end from the beginning. Among the heathen, who were destitute of the true knowledge of God, and had no authorized interpreters of his will, the distinction now drawn was necessarily unknown; divination and prophecy differed only as the particular from the general; and the diviner, though in a somewhat inferior line, and with less of certainty in his prognostications, was also a prophet. Hence the work of Cicero, which treats generally of men's insight into the future, and the real or pretended means of attaining it, is entitled De Divinatione. He only so far distinguishes as to divide between those who sought to get this insight into the future by artful methods, such as omens and auguries, and those who were thought to obtain presentiments of the future in a more natural way, through a certain excitation of mind, or by means of presaging dreams. But in Scripture language the diviners were false prophets, and divination was allied to witchcraft and idolatry, De. xviii. 10, 18; Jos. xiii. 22; Jer. xxvii. 9, &c. The word most commonly used for divination, kesem (כֶּסֶם), and the corresponding verb kasam (originally to divide, to apportion lots), are used of false prophets and soothsayers, as in the passages just referred to; of necromancers, who professed to evoke the dead, 1 Sa. xviii. 8; of heathen augurs and enchanters, 1 Sa. vi. 2; 2 Kl. xvii. 17; Zec. x. 2; of making prognostications by means of arrows, inspection of entrails, &c., Eze. xxi. 28. Another word (nachash, נָחָשׁ) is occasionally used, though only in two or three passages, Ge. xlv. 15; 1 Kl. xi. 33; Nu. xliii. 23; xlv. 1; and always with reference merely to auguries, or to the arts and incantations by which they were usually taken. But beside these more general terms, various others of a specific kind are used, having reference to particular modes of divination, such as charmers, enchanters, witches, wizards, &c. We shall briefly glance at the different kinds, taking them in historical order.

1. The earliest mention of the practice of divination was that by the cup. To magnify the value of Joseph's silver cup, and aggravate the guilt of purloining it, Joseph's steward was ordered to say to the sons of

Jacob, "Is not this it in which my lord drinketh, and whereby indeed he divineth?" Ge. xiv. 4. The charge, we know, was a feigned one, made for the purpose of trying what was in the hearts of the men toward Benjamin, and the special aggravation in the charge, as to the cup being applied to purposes of divination, we may reasonably suppose was of the same character. The high religious position maintained by Joseph in the most critical periods of his career, renders it every way improbable that he should in a matter of this sort have identified himself with the corruptions of heathenism. But the allusion made in his name (though under a feigned pretext) to divination by the cup, as an existing and well-known practice, shows how early it must have got a footing in Egypt. Nothing is indicated there, however, or in any other part of Scripture, as to the mode in which the cup was used for the purpose in question. It is reported that the cup—the cup as used for sacred purposes—was a symbol of the Nile, which was called "the cup of Egypt;" and by the varying aspects of its contents, it was thought to mirror the forms of all things (Häverniak, Introd. to Pent. on Ge. xiv. 1, and authorities there cited). But the discovery of cups or bowls among the Babylonian ruins with supposed magical inscriptions in them (see under BOWLS), has led to the supposition that this possibly may have been the mode also in Egypt of divining by them. It is certain that cups or bowls are frequently used still in various parts of the East in cases of dangerous maladies, which, having charms written inside by magicians, and water afterwards put into them, this water is expected to work as a cure (Layard's Nineveh and Babylon, p. 511). Such a practice, however, differs somewhat from the art of divination. But as to the fact of divining by cups in ancient Egypt, there can be no doubt. It is mentioned by Iamblichus in his book on Egyptian mysteries (p. iii. sect. 14). And that the superstition descended to comparatively modern times, appears from a circumstance recorded in Norden's travels (published in 1756). When he and his party were at Derri, on the confines between Egypt and Nubia, and in circumstances of great danger, they sent a threatening message to a malicious and powerful Arab. He replied, "I know what sort of people you are. I have consulted my cup, and have found by it that you are the people of whom one of our prophets has said, that Franks should come in disguise, and spy out the land; that they would afterwards bring a great number of their countrymen, conquer the land, and exterminate all" (Harmer's Observations, vol. iv. p. 404). Adam Clarke, in his note on the passage, supposes that the Arab referred to the famous divining cup of Jemshedd, celebrated in eastern romances as a mirror that represented the whole world, and all that was passing in it. Whether he may have done so or not, the evidence his speech affords of the ancient custom of cup-divination is equally manifest.

2. Under the names of sorcerers, wizards, witches, classes of persons are mentioned in the Pentateuch, who, from the import of their names, may be presumed to have dealt in divinations; but their profession only, not the particular methods of carrying it on, is intimated. The sorcerers in Ex. vii. 11 should perhaps rather have been designated enchanters, as the word is, indeed, rendered in De. xviii. 10—mekasheph (מְכַשֵּׁף), one who uses incantations, whether with the design of creating a delusion respecting the present, or begetting false expectations of the future. It is the same word, only with a female termination, which is translated witch in Ex. xxii. 18, denoting a character so offensive to sound religion and morality, that none professing it were to be suffered to live. The wizards in Le. xix. 31; xx. 6; De. xviii. 11, &c.—yiddeoni (יִדְדוֹנִי), from the root to know, hence the knowing ones by way of eminence, the wise beyond others—were those who professed to see into the coming issues of providence, and to have the power, probably by certain forms of incantation, to reveal the secrets of Heaven. But for anything that either this or the other names import, the parties spoken of might resort in turn to any of the modes by which diviners sought to obtain credit for their supernatural insight.

3. The name last noticed is very commonly coupled with another, which does point to a specific mode of trying to elicit the secrets of Providence—having, or consulting with, familiar spirits—oboth (אֹבוֹת), as such persons are called in Le. xix. 31. But this seems to be an elliptical expression for those who had an ob; and the characters in question are more fully described in Le. xx. 27, as those who, "whether man or woman, had ob in them"—i.e. a spirit of python or divination. The witch of Endor belonged to this class; she is called a "mistress of ob" (so the word literally is in 1 Sa. xxviii. 7); and Saul asked her to divine to him by the ob—in the Eng. Bible, "by the familiar spirit." It seems to have been but another mode of designating a necromancer, one who professed to have familiar converse with the souls of the dead, and to derive thence information not accessible to others respecting the designs of Providence and the issues of life. The responses that were given to the questions which such necromancers undertook to answer, were pronounced as from the bloodless and ghastly frame of an apparition, and hence were usually uttered in a shrill, squeakish voice. This is alluded to by Isaiah, when, speaking of Jerusalem in her coming state of prostration and ruin, he represents her speech as like "the voice of an ob out of the earth" (ch. xxix. 4)—the voice of one more dead than alive, peeping or chirping. The necromantic art naturally grew, in the hands of designing and fraudulent men, out of the superstitious notions prevalent among the heathen respecting the spirits or manes of the departed. These were supposed to enter on a semi-deified state after death, and in that state to keep up an occasional connection with certain places and persons on earth, especially the spots where their ashes reposed, and the persons who paid them peculiar honour and regard. It was only what might be expected, that crafty persons would work upon this superstitious belief, and turn it to purposes of fraud and imposture. How readily both the belief, and the delusive practices associated with it, obtained a footing among the covenant-people, the many prohibitions given respecting them in the Pentateuch sufficiently manifest; and the references to them, in the later historical books and the prophetic writings, show that they still held their ground, though solemnly denounced and forbidden, to the very close of the Old Testament canon. But they were far from ceasing then, or with the ancient economy itself; for the rise of saint and relic worship in the Christian church again laid the foundation of a fresh development of the necromantic art, which in process of time furnished materials for some of the darkest and most discreditable chapters in modern history.

4. Apparently another and distinct class of diviners is indicated by a word, which, in the English Bible, is usually rendered observers of times, La. xii. 26; De. xviii. 10, 14; 2 Ki. xxi. 6; 2 Ch. xxxiii. 6; but in 1a. ii. 6; lvi. 3; Je. xxvii. 9; Mi. v. 13, soothsayers or sorcerers. The word is meonenim (מְעֹנְנִים), and is of uncertain etymology—some connecting it with ayn (עַיִן), an eye, others with andn (אֲדָן), a cloud, and some again with anan (אָנָן), to cover.

Hence, a considerable variety of meanings have been attached to it, though all are agreed that it denotes persons addicted to some sort of divination. The connection alone puts this beyond a doubt. In the Pentateuch, the Vulgate had rendered the word observing dreams, and in the three prophetic passages, by taking auguries or divinations. Our translators substantially followed it in the latter, but adopted in the historical passages the explanation of some of the rabbins—observing, or observers of times. It was applied to such as said, To-day it is auspicious to set out, to-morrow to make merchandize; thus observing times and appointing seasons. No doubt soothsaying has often, in ancient as well as modern times, taken this direction; but whether it is indicated in the form of expression now under consideration must remain altogether doubtful. And if possible still more doubtful is the reference which some perceive in it to the evil eye. This would ally it to spells and fascinations; and the remark of Gesenius, in his Thea., seems to be well grounded, that the word relates to divining and soothsaying, rather than to these. It may have had respect to observations taken from the appearances and motions of the clouds, but just as probably (as Gesenius supposes) to the occult and magic arts by which soothsayers often pretended to divine the approaching future.

5. Belomantia, or divining by means of arrows, is expressly mentioned as a mode of divination, in use at least among the Chaldeans. The king of Babylon, says Ezekiel, ch. xxi. 21, "stood at the parting, at the head of the two ways, to use divination; he shakes the arrows," &c. The action is represented as proceeding at the moment; the king with his war-equipment is on his way southward, and when he reaches the point where the roads diverge, the one toward Rabbah of Ammon, the other toward Jerusalem, he pauses for a little, to inquire by augury in which of the two directions fortune was awaiting him. Three several forms of divination are brought into play, and of these the first is by means of some action with arrows, no further described here than with respect to the shaking of them, which seems to have formed a prominent part of the ceremony. Jerome, in his comment on the passage, says of it, that what the king did was "to put a certain number of arrows into a quiver, each having a particular name inscribed on it, and then mixed them together, that he might see whose arrow should come out, and which city he should first attack. And this (he adds) the Greeks call belomantia or rabdomantia." The account is probably correct, and, at all events, no researches of later times have added anything to it. Pictures have been found on the Assyrian tablets, which are supposed to represent the king in a divining chamber, with arrows as well as other instruments of divination in his presence; but this is by no means certain (Boncompagni's Nineveh, p. 263-265). Some authorities, however, speak of sacred arrows being kept at Mecca, and used by the Arabs for similar purposes, though contrary to the spirit and precepts of the Koran. (See Preface by Sale.)

6. In addition to the arrows, the king of Babylon is described by the prophet Ezekiel, in the passage referred to above, as also consulting or inquiring at the teraphim—for so the word is, and not generally idols, as in the English Bible. For these, see under TERAPHIM. It is enough to say at present, that they appear to have been a kind of household idols used for help to devotion, and for direction in perplexities; and, far from being confined to heathen worshippers, traces of them are found among the covenant-people, both in earlier and later times, Ge. xxxi. 19; Ju. xvii. 6; 1 Sa. xv. 23; Ho. iii. 4; Zec. x. 2.

7. Forming prognostications from the inspection of entrails, and in particular of the livers of newly-slain animals, may also be noticed, although there is no evidence of its having been practised among the Jews. The only instance that occurs of it in Scripture is found in the passage of Ezekiel already referred to, where the king of Babylon completes his series of auguries by inspecting the liver. No more in this case than in the employment of the arrows, is any indication given as to the mode adopted for reading out of the liver the signs of coming good or evil. But we know from other sources, that it was by applying certain rules to the colour and appearances presented by the liver; and according to the data furnished by these, favourable or adverse results were anticipated.

In addition to the preceding special forms of divination, there were others of a more general kind, which it is enough to mention; consulting oracles, not unknown among the Israelites in the more corrupt periods of their history, 2 Ki. i. 2; seeking to false prophets or dreamers (see under DREAMS); listening to the prognostications of star-gazers or astrologers. In later times this last class had a great name, and were frequently resorted to, not only in their native seat in Chaldea, but in many other countries also, over which they spread themselves in quest of gain. The superstitious at Rome are represented by Juvenal as hunting generally after fortune-tellers, but preferring Chaldean astrologers to all other professors of the art: "Chaldaei sed major erit fiducia; quiquid dixerit astrologus, credent a fonte relatum Hammonis" (Greater confidence will be placed in the Chaldeans; whatever an astrologer utters, they will believe to proceed from the oracle of Ammon). And, notwithstanding the strong and frequent denunciation in the law and the prophets of all sorts of divination, there can be no doubt, that in the times prior and subsequent to the gospel era, the baser part of the Jewish people were grievously addicted to the arts of soothsaying and magic. Evidences of this are not wanting in New Testament scripture, Ac. xiii. 6; xix. 19; and the sarcastic allusions of Juvenal furnish additional and striking illustrations (iii. 13; vi. 643, &c.) It could only be, however, the more depraved and reprobate portion of the Jews who gave themselves to such arts; the men of enlightened minds and good conscience must have stood entirely aloof from them, and even derided them as of demoniacal character and origin. A good example of the anti-divining spirit of this better portion is given, out of Hecateus, by Josephus, in the case of a man who put to shame the pretensions of a soothsayer, by shooting with his arrow the bird, on which the soothsayer was beginning to announce his auguries respecting the good or ill fortune of the journey which the Jew and his party were pursuing. "How," said the sagacious Jew, "could that poor wretched creature pretend to foreshow us our fortune, that knew nothing of its own? If it could have foretold good or evil to come, it would not have come to this place, but would have been afraid lest Mosallam the Jew would shoot at it and kill it" (Cont. Ap. 1. 22).

We cannot wonder at the stringent laws enacted in Scripture against divination, and its repudiation in every form. In its very nature it implies distrust in the providence of God, and a desire to obtain knowledge unsuited to one's circumstances in life—knowledge, which might partly enable some to get undue advantages over others, and partly divert the movements of Providence out of their proper channels. Such knowledge is wisely withheld; it cannot be obtained by legitimate means; and, as a necessary consequence, the attempt to impart it must always proceed on false grounds; it is a pretension based on hypocrisy and deceit. Diviners, therefore, is but another word for deceivers; and dupes of fraud and imposture must be all who listen to their divinations. Hence the art so readily allied itself to idolatry; rejected by the true religion, it became a fitting accompaniment and handmaid of the false; and has ever shown the same tendency to hang on the progress of a corrupt Christianity, that it did to associate itself with the corruptions of Judaism.

DIVORCE. By this is understood a legal separation between man and wife, by means of a formal process of some sort, on the one side or the other. The subject is very briefly treated in Scripture (being there regarded as an abnormal thing, a deviation from rectitude, which should have no place among those who know God); but the treatment being somewhat diverse in the New as compared with the Old Testament scriptures, has given rise to some difference of opinion among commentators, and even to charges of inconsistency in respect to the pure morality of the Bible. Down to the period of the Mosaic legislation there is no authoritative prescription on the married relation beyond that connected with its original institution, in which there was the distinct recognition of one man and one woman, as constituting the parties proper to be united together, and then the enunciation of the great principle, that by the union they became, out of two persons, one flesh, one complex humanity; so that, in order to its establishment, a man should need to leave father and mother, and cleave to his wife, Ge. ii. 24. As the sacred history proceeds it notes occasional deviations from this divinely established order, and obviously with the view of marking them as improper deviations, which could not fail to bring along with them, as a just rebuke from Heaven, various social and domestic evils, Ge. iv. 19-24; xvi. 3; xvii. 1-21; xxvi. 34; xxix. 24, &c., but it was simply in the way of adding (on the part of the husband) fresh matrimonial connections to the primary and proper one, not by repudiating such as already existed. It was impossible, however, long to keep the one form of evil apart from the other; the matrimonial bond was necessarily weakened by polygamy, which, in proportion as it prevailed, obscured the fundamental principle of marriage constituting two of different sexes into one flesh, and gave to the female member the aspect, not of the other half, or converse side of the male, but of his property, which he might multiply at his pleasure or convenience, or again diminish. In such a state of things the relation of the wife naturally sunk very much to the position of a concubine, and according to the facility practised in forming the connection a like facility in dissolving it was sure to creep in. Hence, in the only part of the Mosaic legislation which distinctly refers to the subject of divorce, it is plainly enough implied that the practice was already a prevailing one, such as might confidently be expected to arise among the covenant-people, and could only be restrained within certain limits, but could not be totally prevented. The lawgiver might do something to check an extreme license or arbitrary freakishness in the matter; he could not venture on altogether cancelling the supposed right. The prescription is as follows: "When a man hath taken a wife, and married her, and it come to pass, that she find no favour in his eyes, because he hath found some uncleanness in her (literally, a matter of nakedness); then let him write her a bill of divorcement (literally, a deed of cutting off or separation), and give it in her hand, and send her out of his house. And when she is departed out of his house, she may go and be another man's [wife]. And if the latter husband hate her, and write her a bill of divorcement, and giveth it in her hand, and sendeth her out of his house; or if the latter husband die, which took her to be his wife, her former husband, which sent her away, may not take her again to be his wife, after that she is defiled; for that is abomination before the Lord: and thou shalt not cause the land to sin, which the Lord thy God giveth thee for an inheritance," De. xxiv. 1-4.

This piece of ancient legislation, which probably was found definite enough at the time, has proved somewhat ambiguous, as regards the proper grounds of divorce, from the different meanings that have come to be attached to the phrase "found some uncleanness in her"—strictly, matter of nakedness or shame. In later times, it is well known, two very different interpretations among the Jews prevailed regarding it—a more stringent one maintained by the school of Shammai, and one of great laxity patronized by the school of Hillel. The former held the uncleanness meant in the law to be that simply of adultery; and many, not formally belonging to the school of Shammai, allowed this in regard to a first wife, but not in regard to those which a man might take over and above. Indeed, the views of such were founded less upon the passage in Deuteronomy, than upon what is said in Mal. ii. 15 respecting the wife of one's youth, by which they understood the first wife. But the school of Hillel allowed the slightest occasions of offence to come within the scope of the law of divorce. They even said, "If the wife cook her husband's food badly by over-salting or over-roasting it, she is to be put away." Yes, "If by any stroke from the hand of God she become dumb or sottish," &c. (Lightfoot and Witstein at Mat. v. 32). Both schools, apparently, went to an extreme in opposite directions respecting the real import of the expression of Moses. That more than unfaithfulness to the marriage-vow must have been comprehended in the matter of nakedness or shame, which a man might find in his wife, is evident from what our Lord said concerning it, when, being interrogated by the Pharisees upon the subject, he admitted that a certain liberty of divorce was granted by Moses on account of the hardness of the people's hearts—a liberty, therefore, extending beyond occasions of actual infidelity, because this was sanctioned by our Lord himself as a legitimate ground of divorce, Mat. xix. 8, 9. It is necessary, therefore, to understand by the phrase in question something beside actual adultery—something perhaps tending in that direction, something fitted to raise not unreasonable jealousy or disgust in the mind of the husband, and destroy the prospect of true conjugal affection and harmony between him and his wife. Still, a good deal was left to the discretion, and it might be the foolish caprice, of the husband; and so far from justifying it, on abstract principles of rectitude, our Lord rather admitted its imperfection, and threw upon the defective moral condition of the people the blame of a legislation so unsatisfactory in itself, and so evidently liable to abuse. But was not this to bend the moral to the merely conventional? Was it not to make the prescriptions of God's will dependent, in a measure, on the state and inclinations of men? Can we justly say, that he, who conceded such an accommodation to the will of man, was guided by the inspiration of Heaven?

In reply to such questions, it should, in the first instance, be borne in mind what precisely was the point at issue. It was not, as the Pharisees put it to our Lord, whether they had by the law of Moses a right or liberty to give at pleasure a bill of divorce, and put away a wife. It was a tolerance, rather than a right. Moses did not command, he merely suffered them (as Jesus said) to put away their wives; and commanded, if they did so, that they should give a regularly executed deed of separation: he interposed this obstacle against the impetuosity of temper, or the lawlessness of capricious feeling in the matter—only he carried it no further; for all besides he threw the responsibility on the parties immediately concerned. It is clear, however, that the enforced writing of a bill of divorce was of the nature of an obstacle interposed. It obliged the man to go somewhat leisurely about the business; to bring his procedure into the court of reason, if not of conscience; to make others cognizant of his intentions, and of the grounds on which he was proceeding; and to take his fellowmen to witness in respect to the course he had deemed it proper to adopt. So far as it went, this was plainly a judicial restraint in the right direction, and could scarcely fail to work upon thoughtful minds an impression of the solemnity of the marriage-relationship, and a conviction that only grave faults should be allowed to interfere with its claims. That the matter was not carried further arose from the provisional nature of the old dispensation, and the lower level, as to spiritual attainments, on which its members stood, as compared with gospel times. A greater degree of stringency in the legal code might but have led to an aggravation of the evil, especially to harsher treatment of the female sex—to looser behaviour with them as unmarried, or when married, to the infliction of more frequent acts of violence to get rid of them. So that the limited restriction imposed by the law, and the consequently defective morale it tolerated, virtually resolves itself into the larger question, which respects the imperfect nature generally of the old economy. Being confessedly of such a nature, the discipline sanctioned and enforced by law necessarily corresponded in character. Both were marred with imperfections when brought into comparison with the higher order of things introduced by the gospel; as this again, doubtless, bears in many respects imperfections in form, and faults in administration, which shall have no place in the future kingdom of glory. But that no one in former times might think himself entitled to take advantage of what appeared legally imperfect in the prescriptions laid down respecting the marriage relationship, the proper ideal was set up before all in the record of its original institution. They saw there, if they had but a mind to look for it, what God from the first designed and aimed at by the institution; and were distinctly taught to regard everything at variance with the life-union of a married pair, as a declension from the right path, a violation of the happy order and constitution appointed by God. Thus, properly considered, the difference between the old and the new here is substantially what it is in other things—a difference in degree only, not in kind. Both pointed attention to one and the same standard of matrimonial unity, as the beau-ideal that should be maintained; the superiority on the part of the gospel merely consists in pressing a closer practical conformity to the standard, and, as a matter of course, disowning all grounds of divorce but such as involve an actual violation of the marriage-vow.

The Romish church has sought to carry the matter a stage further on the side of Christianity. Converting the marriage-ceremony, as celebrated between baptized parties, into a sacrament of the church, it stamps the union thereby formed as indissoluble, even after the proved adultery of one of the parties—unless severed by special dispensation through the proper ecclesiastical authorities. This is an apparent rigour, which is well known to have led, in practice, to the greatest laxity, and to a disgraceful prostitution of the authority of the church in the interest of the rich and powerful. As regards scriptural grounds, it rests chiefly on the dignity attributed to Christian marriage as being an emblem of the union—the perpetual union—between Christ and his church, Ep. v. 23-32, and on the omission of any exception, even of fornication, as a valid ground for the dissolution of the union, in the report given of our Lord's words in Mar. x. 5-12; where it is simply stated, in explanation of the original design of marriage as instituted at the beginning, that the parties are no more twain, but one flesh, are not to be put asunder by man, since they have been joined by God, and that whosoever puts away his wife and marries another commits adultery against her. In such passages, however, there is nothing to justify the views of the Romanists. The passages make no distinction between marriage as celebrated between parties within, and parties without, the pale of the Christian church; it is uniformly treated in Scripture as an ordinance of a natural kind, instituted not only before the existence of the Christian church, but before the introduction either of sin or of grace into the world; and what it is declared to be for the Christian is expressly based on what it was for primeval man. The union it establishes should indeed be held indissoluble for life by the contracting parties—on God's part it is meant to be so; but as facts are stronger than words, practice more than profession, so the adulterous connection of either with a third party must be taken for a virtual dissolution of the marriage-bond—a matter-of-fact separation from the proper spouse by becoming one flesh with another. So the matter is distinctly explained by the apostle, 1 Co. vi. 15, 16; and once and again our Lord, in delivering his mind upon the subject, expressly allows adultery in either of the parties to be a valid ground of divorce, Mat. v. 32; xix. 9. To understand by this divorces separation merely from bed and board, is entirely arbitrary; a separation of that sort was quite unknown alike to Jewish law and practice. The omission of the exception in question in Mar. x. 5-12, as also in Lu. xvi. 18, is to be explained from the obviously abbreviated form of the statements there made, coupled with the consideration, that from the very nature of the marriage union it might be understood of itself, that an adulterous connection was a virtual rending of it asunder. The spouse who voluntarily becomes one flesh with a third party cannot, in any proper sense, remain one flesh with the party espoused in the conjugal bond; and in reason as well as law, it must be competent for the one who has been renounced and injured by the sinful act to take whatever steps may be needed for the formal dissolution of the union. Competent, yet not necessary; for the execution of a divorce in the circumstances supposed is conceded by our Lord as a right, but by no means enjoined as a duty. In many cases the right may, and perhaps ought to, be waived.

DODANIM are mentioned as the descendants of the fourth son of Javan, Ge. x. 4. Their future settlement has not been definitely ascertained. As the letters d and r were frequently interchanged, traces of the name have been supposed by some to be found in the river Rhodanus; by some again in Rhodes; and some also have thought of Dodona in Epirus. There is no certainty; but the probability is that the tribe took a western direction, and formed part of the stock out of which the Greek races sprung.

DODO [belonging to love or friendship]. 1. A man of Bethlehem, father of one of David's thirty captains. 2. Another, called Dodo the Ahoite, father of Eleazar, who was the second of three mighty men of David, 2Sa. xxiii. 9, 24. 3. A man of Issachar, and forefather of Tola the judge, Ju. x. 1.

DOEG [fearful], an Edomite herdsman of Saul, who has acquired a bad notoriety from the part he acted in respect to Ahimelech and the priests of Nob. When David in his hasty escape from Saul presented himself there, and obtained from Ahimelech, under false pretences, the shewbread and Goliath's sword, Doeg was present—"detained," it is said, "before the Lord," 1Sa. xxi. 7. The expression is peculiar, and it is matter of doubt what sort of detention it might be that kept such a man there. The word properly means shut up or hindered, but as there could be nothing like forcible restraint or imprisonment at such a place as the tabernacle, the expression must be understood in the milder sense of detained, on account of some vow or religious service he had to perform. Having seen, while thus detained, the reception which David met with from Ahimelech, he was able, and apparently as willing as able, to minister to the morbid jealousy of Saul, by giving information of the circumstances. And when Saul, acting upon this specific information, charged Ahimelech and the priests of Nob with being accomplices in David's rebellion, and ordered their summary execution, while the members of his body-guard with a feeling of sacred awe shrunk from putting the horrible decree in force, Doeg with hearty good-will supplied their lack of service. At Saul's order, "he turned and fell upon the priests, and slew on that day fourscore and five persons that did wear a linen ephod." That he was known to be quite capable of such truculent service to his master, is evident from the exclamation of David, when he heard of what had taken place, "I knew it," said he, "that day, when Doeg the Edomite was there." The stress laid each time that his name is mentioned on his being an Edomite, shows that he was regarded as still retaining the Edomite spirit of envious and bitter spite, even though he outwardly conformed to the customs and service of Israel. There is no reason, however, for supposing that he took generally an active part in the persecution against David, or held more than a subordinate place in the reign of Saul. And Psalm lii., which was composed by David in reference to the occasion of Doeg's informing Saul of what happened at Nob, must be understood as speaking of Saul rather than Doeg, under the mighty hero who devised mischief, loved lies, and strengthened himself in his wickedness. Saul was the real prompter of the evil, and it is of him especially the psalmist thinks when thus writing. Although he doubtless regarded Doeg as the fitting accomplice of such a man, it still was Saul's spirit and Saul's cause which were chiefly characterized and denounced.

DOG (כֶּלֶב, keleb). Frequent allusions to the dog occur in the sacred Scriptures, from which we gather that, though it was domesticated in very early times, and employed, as now, in the care of flocks, Job xxx. 1, and as the guardian of the house, 1a. i. 10, 11, it was generally held in little estimation, its uncleanness, clamour, voracity, and blood-thirstiness, being the points of its character most prominently noticed, so that "dog" became a term of contempt, involving an intensity of abhorrence which an European who has not travelled can scarcely apprehend, but which he finds still attached to it with unabated force in the East.

The condition of things in which the dog was the humble friend and servant of man, recognized by Job when he speaks of the dogs of his flock, existed in Egypt at a period coeval with or anterior to the exodus. We still see depicted on the monuments numerous graphic representations of dogs of various breeds, several of which can with ease be identified with those of present times. Some of these are hounds similar to our harrier or fox-hound, evidently of cultivated breed and high blood; and these are repeatedly depicted as engaged in the chase, sometimes pursuing the herds of antelopes and other game, sometimes led in leash, as the hunter carries home his quarry. Grayhounds were also used in coursing, of form much purer and more resembling our own than those which are now used for the chase in Arabia Petrea. Besides these there are several races of curs, and one curiously like our turnspit, with very short legs.

The Israelites, however, appear to have carried little of this kindly association of the dog with man into Canaan. The allusion to "the price of a dog," De. xxiii. 18, in the law—Solomon's preference of a living dog to a dead lion, Ec. ix. 4 (this, however, may mean, not that the living dog is more valuable to man, but that he is better in himself and for himself—there is more power in him, or he is better off)—and the prophet Isaiah's comparison of the vile rulers of Israel to dumb and greedy dogs, Is. lvi. 10, 11—are few and remote examples of appreciation of this animal's value. The esteem in which it was held appears to have been much the same as that which attaches to it in the same country to this day. The Moslems do use dogs in hunting, and the express words of Mahomet permit them to eat without scruple the prey which the hounds have killed, provided that they had not devoured any portion of it (see Ex. xxii. 31). The words of the Lord Jesus to the Syrophenician woman, and her answer, Mat. xv. 26, 27, certainly imply a domestication and domiciliation of dogs; but simple toleration of their presence is all that can be gathered. They lived on what they could get. Among the Moors of North Africa a similar position of the dog is occasionally seen. They "grant him, indeed, a corner of their tent, but this is all; they never caress him, never throw him anything to eat" (Poiret's Barbary, i. 253).

For the most part, however, the dog is ownerless in the East. Inhabiting every town in vast numbers, they constitute a separate and independent community, tolerating man and tolerated by him to a certain extent, but ever ready to assert their prescriptive rights, and to defend them in concert; living in the streets, they quarter the towns among themselves, and maintain with jealous pertinacity the rights of residence. A dog intruding into a street to which he does not belong, except for the purpose of joining his fellows against a common enemy, would be instantly attacked and driven back by the united force of the dogs whose region he had invaded.

As these street dogs have no masters, they are compelled to prowl about for their sustenance, feeding on carrion, and even on the dead bodies from the burying-places. Byron's vivid but horrid picture of the dogs at the siege of Corinth is drawn from the life:—

"He saw the lean dogs, beneath the wall,
Hold o'er the dead their carnival;
Gorging and growling o'er carcase and limb,
They were too busy to bark at him."

The fate of Jezebel might be repeated on any day beneath the walls of any oriental city. "They found no more of her than the skull and the feet, and the palms of her hands. And he said, This is the word of the Lord which he spake by his servant Elijah the Tishbite, saying, In the portion of Jezreel shall dogs eat the flesh of Jezebel," 2 Ki. ix. 35, 36. Bruce witnessed a scene somewhat similar to this at Gondar. "The bodies of those killed by the sword were hewn to pieces and scattered about the streets, being denied burial. I was miserable, and almost driven to despair, at seeing my hunting dogs, twice let loose by the carelessness of my servants, bringing into the courtyard the heads and arms of slaughtered men, and which I could no way prevent but by the destruction of the dogs themselves" (Travels, iv. 81).

During the night, which is the season of their activity, the dogs howl around the towns and in the streets in the most dismal manner. This hideous noise is generally heard with aversion, but in the East this feeling amounts to positive horror, for, common as it is, it is popularly believed to be ominous of death. In the Parascha Bo it is written: "Our rabbins of blessed memory have said, that when the dogs do howl then cometh the angel of death into the city; and I have seen it written by one of the disciples of Rabbi Judah the just, that upon a time a dog did howl, and clapped his tail between his legs, and went aside for fear of the angel of death; but somebody coming and kicking the dog to the place from which he had fled, the dog presently died." What part the kicking may have played in the dog's death, the writer does not seem to have inquired. The prevalence of the animal habit, and the revulsion with which it is heard, bring to remembrance David's words when the assassins of Saul watched his house to kill him—"They return at evening: they make a noise like a dog, and go round about the city. Let them wander up and down for meat, and grudge if they be not satisfied," Ps. li. 6, 14, 15.

[203.] Eastern Street or Bazaar Dog.—Laborde's Syria.

In Ps. xxii., in which "the Spirit of Christ which was in" David, "testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow," allusions to the ferocity of the dog occur. "For dogs have compassed me;" "deliver my darling from the power of the dog," ver. 16, 20. A passage in Denon will illustrate this:—"It was eleven at night when I came on shore, and I was half a league from my quarters. I was obliged to go through a city taken only that morning by storm, and in which I did not know a street. No reward could induce a man to quit his boat and accompany me. I undertook the journey alone, and went over the burying-ground in spite of the manes, as I was best acquainted with this road. At the first habitations of the living I was attacked by whole troops of furious dogs, who made their attacks from the doors, from the streets, and the roofs; and the barking resounded from house to house, from one family to another. I soon, however, observed that the war declared against me was not grounded on any coalition, for as soon as I had quitted the territory of the attackers they were driven away by the others, who received me on their frontiers. The darkness was only lightened by the stars, and by the constant glimmer of the nights in this climate. Not to lose this advantage, to avoid the barking of the dogs, and to take a road which I knew could not lead me astray, I left the streets, and resolved to go along the beach; but walls and timber-yards, which extended to the sea, blocked up the way. After having waded through the water to escape from the dogs, and climbed over the walls where the sea was too deep, exhausted by anxiety and fatigue, and quite wet, I reached one of our sentinels about midnight, in the conviction that the dog is the most dreadful among the Egyptian plagues" (Travels in Egypt, 32).

Although, by the Mosaic law, no greater degree of uncleanness was ascribed to the dog than to any other animal whose flesh might not be eaten, since it was not expressed by name at all, yet conventionally it seems, conjointly with the swine, of which the same may be predicated, to have concentrated in itself the sense of abomination among the Jews. The camel, the horse, and the ass were ceremonially unclean in the very same degree, yet no revulsion of feeling accompanied the presence of these animals. So it is with the Moslems still. The touch of the camel and of the horse involves no defilement, but so hateful is the contact of the dog that the animals have become perfectly aware that it would in no wise be tolerated. "They know that they are not to come in contact with the clothes of persons in the street, and the careful attention with which they avoid doing this, even in the most crowded streets, is truly admirable. Through this mutual avoidance the defiling contact occurs too rarely to occasion much annoyance to the inhabitants from the abounding presence in their streets of animals which they consider unclean" (Kitto's Phys. Hist. Palest. cccxi.) [F. H. G.]

DOOR. See HOUSE.

DOOR-KEEPER is once mentioned in our English Bibles as an humble officer connected with the house of God: "I would rather be a door-keeper in the house of my God, than dwell in tents of wickedness," Pa. lxxxiv. 10. Mr. Roberts, in his Oriental Illustrations of Scripture, in proof that this could not be the correct meaning of the original, drew attention to the fact that in ancient temples the door-keepers usually were persons of great honour and dignity, and that the office could not convey the idea of that humble and lowly attitude which the psalmist seemed to have in view. The correct translation is certainly somewhat different; it is, "I would rather lie at the threshold in the house of my God," rather take the attitude of a Lazarus at the door of the rich man—in other words, occupy the meanest place in the divine kingdom, than have a dwelling in the tents of wickedness; so that the post or office of door-keeper, in the modern sense, does not strictly come into consideration here.

DOR [habitation], an ancient town on the Mediterranean, one of the royal cities of the ancient Canaanites, Jos. xi. 2, and a part of the heritage assigned to Manasseh, Jos. xvii. 11. It was situated, according to Jerome, about nine miles to the north of Cæsarea, on the road to Tyre. Josephus refers to it under the name Dora (Ant. xvii. 1. 4). A place still exists about the same spot bearing the name Tortura, which is supposed to be the modern representative of the ancient town. It is a poor village, containing about four or five hundred inhabitants.

DORCAS. See TABITHA.

DOTHAN [two wells], Greek Δωθαίμ, the name of a region not very exactly defined, but lying somewhere on the north of Samaria, not far from Shechem, and in the line of the caravan-track from Northern Syria to Egypt. It was there that the sons of Jacob were depasturing their flocks when Joseph was sent to visit them; and the well-pit, into which he was put before they sold him to the Ishmaelites, was probably one of those from which the district derived its name, Ge. xxxvii. 17. It was there also, at a much later time, that the Syrians were smitten with blindness at the word of Elisha, 2 Ki. vi. 13.

DOVE (דור, yonah; περιστέρη). Two species of Columba find a conspicuous place in the Levitical law—the turtle-dove (see TURTLE), and the pigeon. Both of these were appointed to be offered in the burnt-offering, Le. i. 14, the trespass-offering, ver. 7, and the sin-offering, ch. xii. 6, &c. These (or a choice of them) were the alternative permitted to those worshippers who were so poor as to be unable to present a more costly sacrifice; and it is one proof of the humiliation of our adorable Lord, that his incarnation was in circumstances of poverty so great that his mother, unable to afford a lamb at her purification, was compelled to avail herself of this substitute. To meet the constant occurrence of similar cases, the flexible righteousness of the scribes—flexible in everything in which the honour of God and not their own was concerned—had permitted the sellers of doves to hold their market in the temple; a profanation which educed the holy indignation of the Lord Jesus, and his consuming zeal for his Father's house, Jn. ii. 13-17.

The dove is the divine symbol of peace. When the waves of the flood had thoroughly done their work of judgment upon sin, the dove with an olive-leaf plucked off was the announcer of a cleansed world and a new dispensation, Ge. viii. 11; and when the waters of Jordan had flowed over Israel confessing sin, and over Jesus, the Holy Ghost descending upon him in bodily shape like a dove, and abiding upon him, Lu. iii. 22, was the sign of God's satisfaction in the work of his beloved Son, who was come to be our peace, putting away sin by the sacrifice of himself.

It is observable that, like as the lamb, which represents the Lord Jesus, is endowed with what may be termed moral qualities, as meekness, harmlessness, and spotlessness, which fit it to be a symbol of him who was "meek and lowly," "holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners," so the Holy Spirit, who is the Spirit of grace and the comforter, is represented by a bird of remarkable gentleness, tenderness, purity, and love. The dove is the frequent and favourite emblem of the bride in the Song of Songs, and the praise, "Thou hast dove's eyes," will be appreciated by every one who has marked the gentle expression, the soft, full, liquid beauty of the eye of the dove. The voice of the dove has a tender, mournful cadence—which, heard in solitude and sadness, cannot fail to be heard with sympathy—as if it were the expression of real sorrow. "We mourn sore like doves," 1a. ii. 11; Esa. vii. 16; Na. ii. 7.

There is no doubt that the particular species so often mentioned under the title of dove or pigeon is the one which is known to us by the same appellations, the rock-dove (Columba livia). It is recognized both in its wild and domesticated state. The bride, in the Song of Songs, ch. ii. 14, is addressed as, "My dove, that art in the clefts of the rock;" and the prophet Jeremiah exhorts the dwellers in Moab to "dwell in the rock, like the dove that maketh her nest in the sides of the hole's mouth," ch. xlviii. 28. These are the habits of the wild dove, which is found nesting in the clefts and holes of the inaccessible seaward precipices that gird our islands. In the rocks and promontories of the west of England and Wales, of the Hebrides, of the Orkneys and Shetlands, this pretty dove is numerous, breeding in the crevices of the rocks and in the sides of the caverns the mouths of which are open to the sea. In the east of the Mediterranean, wherever the coast is rocky, the rock-dove abounds, and manifeats the same habits; as also in the isles of Greece, the cliffs of the Tyrian coast, the bold headland of Carmel, and the abrupt precipices, hollowed in a thousand caves, that stretch on either side of Joppa.

But from immemorial and pre-historical antiquity

the dove has been maintained by the orientals in the domesticated condition, and has been used for the conveyance of letters, the sender taking advantage of the known habit of the bird to fly in a direct line to its home from incredible distances, and with great rapidity. It is on record that a carrier-pigeon will carry a letter from Babylon to Aleppo, an ordinary thirty days' journey, in forty-eight hours. In Europe it has been known to accomplish a flight of 300 miles in little more than two hours. "The carrier-birds are represented in Egyptian bas-reliefs, where priests are shown letting them fly on a message."

The prophet Isaiah alludes to the numbers and rapid flight of these birds to their cotes, in describing the final restoration of Israel after their long exile: "Who are these that fly as a cloud, and as the doves to their windows?" ch. lx. 8. Morier illustrates this comparison from what he observed in Persia. "In the environs of the city, to the westward, near the Zainderood, are many pigeon-houses, erected at a distance from habitations, for the sole purpose of collecting pigeons' dung for manure. They are long round towers, rather broader at the bottom than the top, and crowned by conical spiracles, through which the pigeons descend. Their interior resembles a honey-comb, pierced with a thousand holes, each of which forms a snug retreat for a nest. More care appears to have been bestowed upon their outside than upon that of the generality of the dwelling-houses, for they are pointed and ornamented. The extraordinary flights of pigeons which I have seen alight upon one of these buildings afford, perhaps, a good illustration of that passage in Is. lx. 8. Their great numbers, and the compactness of their mass, literally look like a cloud at a distance, and obscure the sun in their passage" (Second Journey through Persia, 140).

DOVE'S DUNG, occurring in 2 Ki. vi. 2, has caused some trouble to commentators. The intensity of the famine during the siege of Samaria by Benhadad is thus described—"Behold, they besieged it until an ass's head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cab of doves' dung for five pieces of silver." Two or three interpretations are given of the phrase. Some have supposed that the actual excrement of the bird was eaten, or that it was used for fuel, or that salt was extracted from it. The latter two suppositions are irrelevant to the famine; the first is simply absurd. Others, receiving, with the rabbinical writers, the same sense of the word, explain it by the value set upon this substance as manure. Thus, Porter and Morier both assure us it is used in Persia. According to the latter, "the dung of pigeons is the dearest manure that the Persians use; and as they apply it almost entirely for the rearing of melons, it is probably on that account that the melons of Ispahan are so much finer than those of other cities. The revenue of a pigeon-house is about a hundred tomauns per annum" (Second Journey, 141.) Porter says "two hundred tomauns" (Travels, 1. 451.)

Now, though the orientals consume an enormous quantity of these fruits, the doves' dung in the text could hardly have been used thus. The want of food was imminent, and we cannot conceive either of doves being still kept in the city to yield manure (for surely if they were there, they would have been themselves eaten), or of people coolly setting to work to cultivate melons, as if they had plenty of time before them.

Another supposition has been that the craw of the pigeon, filled with macerated and partly digested grain or pulse, is intended. This is plausible; for the birds might easily have flown over the investing army, and fed daily in the country beyond, returning to their homes in the besieged city. But the same objection lies against this supposition. Whatever tame pigeons had been in the city, must have been killed long before the famine reached its utmost extremity; nor would any fortunate possessor of such birds have allowed them to fly at liberty through a starving garrison. Moreover, as the quantity mentioned was an English pint (the cab being about half a gallon), a number of doves must have been killed to furnish this amount of half-digested food, which would imply plenty rather than scarcity. Whence came the doves? This interpretation, therefore, is manifestly untenable.

It has, however, been shown from certain ancient authorities, that there was some inferior kind of grain or pulse, called, perhaps in contempt, or perhaps from some fancied resemblance in form or colour, "doves' dung." Bochart identifies this with the seeds of the chick-vetch, great quantities of which are dried, parched, and stored in magazines at Cairo and Damascus, for use on long journeys. If this is correct, we may well understand how secret stores of this poor grain may have been turned to advantage in the famine. Linnaeus, and Sprengel following him, have identified the Ornithogalum umbellatum, or common star-of-Bethlehem, as the doves' dung of Scripture. The latter says—"Among the Hebrews there was a plant called doves' dung on account of the colour of the flowers—white mixed with greenish, a mixture which is observed in the dung of many herbivorous birds. For this is the Ornithogalum umbellatum which occurs throughout the East, and has eatable bulbs, though they are sought for only by the poor" (In Dioscor. II. 471). If it be objected that the besieged could not get out into the fields to search for these roots, we might remind the objector that in many oriental cities there is a large portion of the land not built upon, sometimes amounting to one-fourth, or even one-third of the entire area inclosed, but forming fields and gardens. In these spots, in the angles of the walls and under the fences, a supply of such roots might still reward the unwearied search of a starving population.

The name of the prophet Jonah is identical with that of the dove.

DOWRY, in its general acceptance, is the money which is settled, or given, in connection with a marriage contract, on behalf of one of the parties. According to the customs of modern civilized communities the dowry is settled upon the female, and is given or promised by her father, or contracting spouse. But in Old Testament scripture, and in the usage generally of the East, the dowry is what the husband pays to the father in order to obtain his daughter for wife—a sort of purchase-money, which he gives in lieu of her. Thus Jacob gave his seven years' service as dowry for his wife; Shechem offered to give to the family of Jacob "never so much dowry and gift," if he might be permitted to retain Dinah as his wife; and David, in like manner, instead of dowry, was allowed to win his title to Saul's daughter by an hundred foreskins of the Philistines. See also Ho. iii. 2, where the common practice in this respect is taken for granted, as the basis of the prophetic representation. The practice undoubtedly indicated an imperfect civilization, and never can exist where woman occupies the place she does in European society.

DRAGON (תַּנִּינִים, tannoth, תַּנִּיִּם, tannim, תַּנְּיָן, tannin; δράκων). These words seem always to have reference to some animal of serpentine character and large size, an object of mystic terror, inhabiting desolate places, and having also aquatic habits. Perhaps no known species of animal could be named to which all the characters attributed to the scriptural תַּנְּיָן belong.

The word in its various forms was probably used with a certain measure of vagueness, especially when the creature alluded to is presented to us as an element in a general description, or as a symbol of some other being, human or spiritual.

In the former of these categories may be included all such passages as those in which Babylon, Is. xlii., Idumea, Is. xxxiv. 13, Jerusalem, Je. li., Hazor, Je. xlii. 23, &c., are described as "a habitation of dragons;" and such as employ the word as a simile of desolation, as Job xxx. 29; Je. xiv. 6; Mi. i. 8, &c. In the latter sense we find it as the symbol of Pharaoh, Eze. xxxi. 3; xxxii. 2; Ps. lxxiv. 13; Is. li. 9; and apparently of Satan, as the master-spirit of Rome, in Is. xxvii. 1; Re. xii. et seq. passim, and in his own personality in Re. xx. 2.

It is in these images that we shall find whatever of zoological incongruity attaches to the appellation dragon. In some of the passages wherein the word is used to represent the Egyptian despot, a huge monster, with feet and scales, inhabiting the Nile, is depicted, which can leave us in no doubt that the crocodile is intended. In those in which Satan is represented, the word used is interchangeable with serpent, and a form decidedly ophidian, though with mystic adjuncts, is presented to the mind. The fondness of serpents—some of which are fatally venomous ("the poison of dragons," Da. xlii. 33)—for ruined and desolate places will account for the employment of the image in the first-named sense. The ruins of ancient cities swarm with venomous snakes to such a degree that it is necessary to use the utmost caution in exploring them.

Sometimes an actual creature is intended by the word, as when the rod of Moses and those of the magicians were changed into serpents (tanninim). As these must have been of no more than a few feet in length, they may afford us some light by which to judge of the more indefinite use of the word. Perhaps it has been too hastily assumed that great constricting serpents, as the pythons, are always intended. The dragons of ruined cities are in general of comparatively small size; the pythons do not, so far as we are aware, frequent such situations, nor are any species now found in Western Asia or North Africa. Abundant evidence, however, exists, that great constricting serpents were familiar to the ancients. Figures of such, of enormous size, are depicted on the Egyptian monuments. The picture so elegantly drawn by Theocritus (Idyl. xiv.), of the serpents which were strangled by the infant Hercules, and the well-known story of Laocoon, undoubtedly refer to reptiles of this nature. Moreover, in sober narrative, Aristotle tells (viii. 28) of serpents of monstrous size on the coast of Libya, and relates that certain voyagers were pursued by some of them so large that their weight overset one of the galleys. And the Roman historians (Val. Max. I. 8, 8, 10, &c.) have perpetuated, not without admiration, the memory of a serpent slain by Regulus near Carthage, the skin of which, preserved at Rome till the Numantine war, measured, on the authority of the writers themselves who declare that they had seen it, 120 feet. Perhaps the length was exaggerated, and the skin was doubtless much stretched; but after making every allowance, we cannot refuse assent to the fact that a serpent of enormous size had been so exhibited. Diodorus Siculus mentions a serpent which was captured, not without loss of human life, in Egypt, and which was taken to Alexandria; it measured 30 cubits, or about 45 feet in length. And Suetonius says that one was exhibited in front of the Comitium at Rome which was 50 cubits, or 75 feet in length (In Octav. 43). Colonel Hamilton Smith refers (Cyclop. Bib. Lit. art. Dragon) to the skeleton of a serpent above 100 feet in length, found recently in India, but gives no other particulars, which, considering the great interest of the subject, is remarkable.

The word תַּנְּיָן (tannin) is occasionally rendered whale in the English Bible, as in Ge. i. 21 and Job vii. 12. On one occasion, La. iv. 3, our translators have given sea-monsters in the text, and put sea-calves, as an optional rendering, in the margin. As in this last passage the animals are said to "draw out the breast and give suck to their young ones," the usual signification of serpent, or crocodile, or any other reptile, is perfectly inapplicable, since none of these suckle their young. The rendering "whale" may probably be the correct one here, either signifying some one of the huge cetacea which occasionally penetrate both the Mediterranean and Red Sea, or that species of dugong (Halichore), one of the aquatic pachydermata, called cow-whales, which inhabits the latter gulf. Several of the passages in which the word has received its more ordinary rendering, have more or less obvious allusion to the sea as the habitat of the monster in question; and when Jeremiah, personating Jerusalem, Je. ii. 34, says of the king of Babylon, "He hath swallowed me up like a dragon, . . . he hath cast me out," there may be a reference to the swallowing and regurgitation of Jonah by the "great fish." The snuffing up of the wind, Je. xiv. 6, and the wailing of dragons, Mt. i. 8, are inexplicable as referring to any of the animals we have mentioned. [P. H. G.]

DREAMS. Considered simply as natural phenomena, dreams have much the same character ascribed to them in Scripture that they are wont to bear in common discourse. Airy and capricious in their movements, coming and going without any control of the will or reason, and as in wild and freakish humour confounding together the true and the false, the real and the fictitious, they are the natural antithesis of what is solid and lasting—the fit emblems of a frothy, unstable, fleeting existence. Hence the wicked are spoken of as flying away like a dream, Job xx. 8, disappearing after a short season like an unsubstantial fabric; or, as it is again, they are as a dream when one awaketh, no sooner searched for than gone, Pt. lxxiii. 20. To have multitudes of dreams is represented as having also to do with vanities, Ec. v. 7; and to scare one with dreams is all one with conjuring up and attempting to frighten one with imaginary fears and unreal dangers, Job vii. 14.

One can easily understand, however, that the state of mind which gives rise to the phenomena of dreaming might with peculiar facility be rendered subservient to the purpose of divine communications. For, it has this in common with states of rapt thought or spiritual elevation, that through the perfect repose of the bodily senses direct intercourse with the external world is suspended; the soul is withdrawn within itself, and is susceptible only of the influences which affect the inner organs of thought and emotional feeling. Such influences may come—in all ordinary cases of dreaming they do come—from the play of nervous excitation, stirring into exercise the memory, the fancy, and the affections; and so to a large extent they take the hue of the natural temper and the experience of every-day life. But they may also come from a higher source—from the Father of spirits, seeking to convey impressions of his mind and will to men. Then, the two points in which dreams differ most characteristically from one's waking thoughts—their ideal character, and their independence of the will of him that is conscious of them—are points of assimilation between the subject of dreams and the recipient of a divine communication: both alike may be said to be borne out of themselves, and to have thoughts presented to their minds, or visions spread before their mental eye, which they have not themselves bidden into existence, and are incapable of controlling. There is thus a certain natural affinity between the state and operations of the soul in dreaming, and its state and operations when acted on by the impulse of a higher power, so as to be made to hear the words and see the vision of the Almighty. Hence, we may account for the readiness which has ever appeared among men to ascribe their dreams to God, whenever these have been of a more remarkable character than usual, and have left a deep impression upon their minds. It has seemed to them, in such cases, as if they had been in the hands of a supernatural agency, bringing them into immediate contact with things lying beyond the reach of human discernment, and most commonly causing events of weal or woe to cast their shadows before. In ancient heathendom the traces of this belief were both of early origin and widely diffused. That a dream also is of Jove, appears in Homer as an accredited maxim (καὶ γὰρ τὸ θεῶν ἐκ Διὸς ἐστὶν, Il. i. 63); and Juvenal, speaking (though ironically) of the religious devotee, represents nocturnal revelations as the proper complement and reward of the devotion—"En animam et mentem, cum qua Di nocte loquantur" (vt. 631. See Westein on Mat. i. 20.)

But what the ignorant and superstitious in heathendom only imagined, was often found to be a reality where the knowledge of God prevailed. Among the "divers manners" in which from ancient times God made known his mind to men, dreams had a recognized place, and played frequently an important part. It is remarkable of them, however, that they were not confined to prophets strictly so called, but were occasionally given to persons who came only into incidental contact with the covenant-people; and sometimes were so given, that not so much the dream itself, as the capacity of interpreting the dream, was what bespoke the intervention of Heaven, and the possession of a supernatural insight. On this account the Jewish doctors were wont to distinguish between heaven-sent dreams and prophetic visions, and even between one kind of dreams and another, calling some "true" dreams only, and others "prophetic" dreams. So Maimonides in his More Nev. p. ii. c. 41, "When it is said in holy Writ that God came to such a man in a dream of the night, that cannot be called a prophecy, nor such a man a prophet; for the meaning is no more than this, that some admonition or instruction was given by God to such a man, and that it was in a dream." Of this sort were reckoned the dreams given to Abimelech, Laban, Pharaoh, Nebuchadnezzar, which were either of a simply admonitory nature, or required the aid of a strictly inspired man to turn them to account, and render them predictions of the approaching future. How early, and how commonly also, in regard to such dreams the belief had established itself, that they were of divine origin and of prophetic import, appears both from the reverent regard paid to them, when they were distinctly understood, as in the cases of Abimelech and Laban, Ge. xx. 4; xxx. 24; and from the ancient practice, carried on apparently by a professional class, of interpreting dreams. When Pharaoh awoke from the dream respecting the fat and the lean kine, the plump and the thin ears of corn, and was pressed with anxiety about its meaning, he sent for the magicians and wise men of Egypt, as if he had a right to expect from them a solution of the mystery that would relieve him of his trouble, Ge. xli. 8. The same thing, indeed, had substantially come out previously in the case of the chief butler and the chief baker of Pharaoh, who, after having had their respective dreams, bewailed their condition, that they were where they could have no access to an interpreter of dreams, Ge. xl. 8. So that even at that early period the interpretation of dreams must have existed in Egypt as a kind of recognized profession; and in later times the oneirocritics (as they were called), interpreters of dreams, formed a sort of regular guild among the learned of Egypt, or certain of these cultivated the art as a distinct department of their mystic lore (Warburton's Legation of Moses, b. 4, s. 4). And that it was not otherwise at Babylon is evident from the imperative demand made by Nebuchadnezzar of the wise men of his court to interpret his dreams, and even communicate to him the matter of his dreams, Da. ii. 5, 6; iv. 7. How vain the art was in such hands, and how utterly ineffective it proved in real emergencies, the Lord took occasion to show by means of the transactions which occurred in the histories of Joseph and Daniel.

But that dreams of the higher class—dreams of a strictly prophetic character, and given to prophetic men—were among the regular modes of divine revelation in ancient times, appears alone from what may be regarded as the fundamental passage regarding prophetic agency in Israel, Nu. xii. 6. In that passage the Lord intimated, that he would raise up prophets, through whom he would make direct communications of his will, and that when he did so he would "make himself known to them in a vision, and speak to them in a dream." Here also the Jewish doctors were wont to distinguish, and to assert for the mode of revelation by vision a higher place than belonged to the dream. But there seems no proper ground for the distinction, more especially for saying, that the one (vision) usually seized the prophet while he was awake, but that he was susceptible of the other only when asleep. In reality they seem to have been generally combined together—as in the case of Jacob on the plains of Bethel, when in a sleep that was ennobled, if any other was, with prophetic elevation, he at once saw the vision and in a dream heard the words of God. The dream, it is to be understood, as well as the vision, in all cases of real intercourse with Heaven, had marked peculiarities, which stamped it upon the prophet's own mind as the effect of a strictly divine agency. And the Jewish writers seem to have judged rightly in supposing, that while the imaginative faculty was set forth as a stage, on which certain appearances and images were represented to the understandings of the prophets, as they are in ordinary dreams, yet in divine dreams the understanding was always kept awake, and strongly acted on by God in the midst of those apparitions, that it might discern the intelligible mysteries in them (Smith of Cambridge's Discourse on Prophecy, c. 2). In this undoubtedly was implied an ecstatic elevation of spirit—the being, as it is sometimes called, in a trance—and a remarkable distinctness in the objects presented to the internal eye and ear of the prophet, such as other men had not, nor the prophet himself in his ordinary state. Yet it was an imperfect mode of revelation, and was accompanied with a measure of darkness in regard to the substance of the divine communications, which was wanting in the highest mode of revelation. In this respect it is expressly distinguished from that given to Moses in the Old Testament, with whom God spake not by dream or vision, but face to face, Nu. xii. 7. And in New Testament times (with one exception in the case of Peter, Ac. x., one in Paul's, 2 Co. xii. 1, and again in the Apocalyptic communications of John) the mode of revelation by dream or vision was superseded by the open and direct announcements of our Lord and his apostolic delegates. When it was spoken by Joel of these times, that then, through the copious outpouring of God's Spirit, even "young men should see visions, and old men should dream dreams," it is to be understood as uttered from the Old Testament point of view, when such were the distinctive modes of the Spirit's more peculiar working among men: and hence it is applied by the apostle Peter to the manifestations of spiritual agency on the day of Pentecost, when there were indeed marvellous displays of the Spirit's power, such as amply realized the prophetic anticipation, and not the less, rather all the more, that they were without the ancient accompaniments of vision or dream. The men of God now became directly conversant with divine realities, and in their waking state could both receive and give forth their impressions of them.

It only remains to notice, that during the periods when revelation by dream or vision was the ordinary mode of conveying special communications to men, there were not wanting counterfeit appearances of this description, occasionally intermingling with, and claiming to possess, the character of the true. Such especially was the case amid the troubles and excitements that prevailed toward the close of the theocracy in its regal form. "I have heard," says Jeremiah, ch. xxiii. 25, "what the prophets said that prophesy lies in my name, I have dreamed, I have dreamed"—implying, in the very form of their announcement, what was the usual mode of receiving prophetic revelations, but betraying at the same time the hypocritical or deluded spirit under which they laboured. To the like effect also he speaks in other passages—Je. xlii. 28; xlvii. 9; xxxii. 1; also Eze. xlii. 2-7, where false visions, rather than false dreams, are ascribed to them. These lying pretences doubtless began in hypocrisy, but maintained, as they were, in the face of so much danger, and with such strange persistence, it would seem that the persons making claim to them had become to a large extent the victims of their own delusions.

DRESS. The notices we have of the clothing of the covenant-people, whether in Old or New Testament times, are chiefly of an incidental kind, and could not of themselves suffice for anything like a minute or even definite description of them. But in Palestine, and in eastern countries generally, the dress of the people, like their common usages, continues from age to age with little change; foreign immigrants or invaders, such as the Turks, have brought along with them a certain amount of foreign costume; but the people who may be regarded as the more proper representatives of the region appear to have preserved, with no material deviation, the kinds and modes of apparel which were in use thousands of years ago. In giving a brief outline of the information that is accessible upon the subject, we shall treat first of the kinds of garments worn, and then of the materials and arts employed in the fabrication of them.

I. In regard to the garments themselves, those worn on the person were formerly, as they still are, of a loose and flowing description. Hence, they did not admit of that sharp and easily recognized distinction between male and female attire, which prevails in the civilized countries of the West. There still were, however, characteristic differences, which the law, for obvious reasons of propriety and decorum, ordered to be maintained: "The woman shall not wear that which pertaineth unto a man, neither shall a man put on a woman's garment; for all that do so are abomination to the Lord," De. xxii. 5. The difference appeared chiefly in the use of veils by the women, and the attire generally of the head, together with articles of ornament which were reckoned proper for the one sex, but not for the other. (1.) There was, first of all, and common to both sexes, the covering by way of eminence—the under-garment, which protected the body from utter nudity. It was named in Heb. kutoneth (קִטְוֹנֶת), from an obsolete root to cover, and in Greek χιτών, tunic. The rendering of coats, which is that commonly adopted for both the Hebrew and the Greek terms in the English Scriptures, is fitted to suggest a wrong idea of its nature; for it was not a closely fitted garment, though closer than what was worn above it, reaching to the knees or under, and with sleeves to the elbow, sometimes even to the wrists. It came nearer, therefore, to an ordinary shirt or night-gown than any other garment we are accustomed to wear. And when our Lord, on first sending out his disciples, told them not to take two tunics with them, Mat. x. 10, it came much to the same thing as saying, in plain English, that they should take but one shirt with them. This article of dress was most probably very similar to one worn in Egypt at the present day, and shown in the illustration

No. 206, fig. 1 having a girdle round his waist, and fig. 2 being without one. But it afforded so partial a covering, that persons who had nothing besides upon them were not unusually spoken of as stripped or naked. Thus Saul, it is said, stripped off his clothes, and prophesied, and lay down naked, 1 Sa. xix. 24; and as this was done in some sort of imitation of the prophets, it is scarcely possible to understand it of anything but such a partial undressing as we have supposed—with nothing left but what was required by considerations of decency. And the same doubtless must be supposed in such cases as David's, 2 Sa. vi. 20, and Peter's, Jn. xxi. 7. (2.) Immediately above this tunic was worn, at least by persons in better circumstances, what was sometimes called by the same name, but more usually bore the epithet meil (מֵיִל). This was a looser and longer sort of tunic, reaching to near the ankles, but without sleeves. It was worn by women, also by the priests, Ex. xxviii. 31, and by persons in the higher ranks of life, 1 Sa. xv. 27; xviii. 4; Job i. 20. It is commonly rendered mantle or robe in the English version. The meil appears to be indicated in the engraving No. 207, from an Assyrian bas-relief in the British Museum, from Kouyunjik, showing Sennacherib before the town of Lachish; the figures are intended for Jewish captives, the men wearing the sleeveless meil, the women having a veil, probably the mitpahath, over the former article of dress. In the second illustration (No. 208) from same bas-relief, there are other Jewish captives having very short garments, perhaps intended to represent the kutoneth, but confined round the waist by a broad girdle with a fringed end; or else it is to show the kutoneth and drawers worn under it. The turban-like head-dresses of these figures are very remarkable; and similarly dressed men occur in another bas-relief, where several files of men are employed in dragging a colossal sculpture, a human-headed bull, to its destined site; and these doubtless are meant for Jewish captives working under their Assyrian conquerors. (3.) Then there was the mantle, properly so called, frequently termed cloak in our version, the ῥάδιον of the Greeks, and the salmah (סלמה), or, as it more commonly is, simlah, of the Hebrews. This was simply a piece of square cloth, a sort of large blanket or plaid, which is now, and probably was also in former times, thrown around the shoulders so as to leave the right arm free—the one end of the garment being put a little over the left shoulder, whence it is taken behind under the right arm, and after being drawn across the chest, is thrown again over the left side, and hangs down behind. The figures in woodcut No. 209, representing two Syrians and an Egyptian gentleman, show the article and the mode of wearing it. The modern Bedouins (No. 210) use instead of this a sort of square cloak, with an opening in front, and slits in the sides to let out the arms; but it may be doubted if this form of the garment was in use among the covenant-people. For we read of their sometimes drawing their cloak or mantle over their heads, which agrees better with the other form, 1 Sa. xv. 30; 1 Ki. xix. 13. And so also does the circumstance that the poor are known to have used it as a blanket by night. Hence the merciful prescription in Ex. xxii. 26, "If thou at all take thy neighbour's raiment (salmah) to pledge, thou shalt deliver it unto him by that the sun goeth down; for that is his covering only; it is his raiment for his skin; wherein shall he sleep!" It is apparently the same sort of garment which is occasionally called mitpahath (מִטְפָּאֶת), which Ruth, for example, had about her when she lay down on the barn-floor of Boaz, and which was so spacious and firm of texture that it could contain six measures of barley, Ruth iii. 15. Though called a veil in our version, it was manifestly a sort of blanket or sheet, which during the day had been laid over the head and shoulders, and at night was probably thrown as a covering around the person. This large veil is well illustrated by one worn by Egyptian women at the present day, called the milayah, as the annexed figure shows (No. 211); and the similarity of this to the veil indicated in the Assyrian sculpture already referred to, is very striking—although it is necessary to make some allowance for the archaic style of the sculpture. It does not seem to have been properly a different garment, but the same in a more expanded and imposing form, which was called adereth (literally, wide or expanded)—the name given to Elijah's mantle, 1 Ki. xix. 13, 19; 2 Ki. ii. 13, and to the Babylonian garment which attracted the covetousness of Achan, Jos. vii. 21. That the name could be applied to two pieces of raiment so different in point of quality, shows that it had reference to the form and use of the article, not to the kind of cloth from which it was prepared; and the derivation of the word clearly points to the amplitude of the article as its distinguishing characteristic. (4.) The loose and cumbersome nature of these garments, especially of the longer tunic or meil, naturally led to the use of another article—the girdle or belt around the waist, necessary for the purpose of drawing the garments close to the person, and tucking them up when one was going about any active employment. To put on one's girdle, or gird one's self up, was simply to prepare for action, as to undo it was to give way to repose. It was also, however, used as a convenient part of the dress for placing the daggers in, and such things as the purse, scrip, handkerchief, or other small appendages. The sword was more commonly suspended from a belt passing over the right shoulder, and the weapon hung on the left side in a nearly horizontal position, as in the figure from an Assyrian bas-relief in the British Museum (No. 212). The incident described in 2 Sa. xx. 8, could thus easily have occurred, from the sword having somehow been put out of its slightly pendent position.

These were the principal and ordinary parts of dress worn upon the person by the Israelitish people—certain things besides, such as drawers and an ephod, which were appointed to be worn by the priests, appear to have been confined to them, though it is possible short drawers reaching to the middle of the thigh may have been commonly worn in ancient times, as they are now. Various figurative modes of expression were derived from those articles of dress by the sacred writers, but from none so much as from the girdle. With reference to its use in fitting the body for active service, we have, in 1 Pe. i. 13, the exhortation to “gird up the loins of our mind.” Its adhesive property, not only itself cleaving to the person, but bringing the other garments also into closer contact with it, supplies the prophet Jeremiah with an image of the binding attachment of the converted Israel to God: “As the girdle cleaveth to the loins of a man, so have I caused to cleave unto me the whole house of Israel,” ch. xlii. 11. And not very different is the use made of it by Isaiah, when, pointing to the coming Messiah, he said, “And righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins,” xi. 6—meaning that these qualities should have that kind of controlling and binding influence over all his purposes and actions which the girdle has in respect to the bodily attire. The completeness of the covering afforded by the meil or outer garment is referred to by the same prophet, when he speaks of the Lord clothing himself with zeal as with a cloak, ch. lix. 17, having his being, as it were, all enveloped in this fiery element. In another aspect of the same thing, it is taken as a symbol of the covering or pretexts which transgressors seek to obtain from the charge of sin, such as, “having no cloak for their sin,” or “using liberty for a cloak of maliciousness,” Ja. xv. 23; 1 Pe. ii. 16. But as the meil formed the most conspicuous part of the attire, and in persons of quality was doubtless made of fine material and variously ornamented, so it is sometimes employed as the peculiar emblem of what is graceful and becoming in appearance; as when Job speaks of his judgment being like a robe (a meil) and a diadem, and the Messiah himself is prophetically represented as being covered with a robe of righteousness, Job xxix. 14; Is. lxi. 10. Even in later times it would appear that significance was attached to the amplitude of this outer garment, since the scribes are charged by our Lord with loving to walk in long robes, Lu. xx. 44, manifestly for the purpose of presenting before men a majestic and imposing appearance. It was this part of the dress also which, in times of grief and mourning, was rent at the bottom—whence the rending of the garments was regarded as a common symbol of mourning, Joel ii. 13.

In addition to the more essential and common dresses already mentioned, a great many articles are known to have been used of an ornamental kind, chiefly by women of gay and luxurious manners. The fullest and most elaborate specification of these on record is that given by the prophet Isaiah in ch. iii. 18–23, when speaking of the sad reverse that was going to befall them, and the desolation and sorrow that were soon to take the place of all their finery. There is some doubt about the precise meaning of some of the words employed in the description, and little comparatively can now be known of the exact shape and form of several of the things mentioned; but we shall give the description itself, accompanied with the explanations that are now commonly adopted respecting them. “In that day the Lord will take away the bravery of their tinkling ornaments about their feet (ankle-bands), and the cauls (caps of net-work), and the round tires like the moon (metallic crescents for the head); the chains (ear-rings, pendants), and the bracelets (for the arm or neck), and the mufflers (veils); the bonnets (some sort of head-dress), and the ornaments of the legs (some sort of ankle-chains for the purpose, it is supposed, of regulating the step), and the head-bands and the tablets (or girdles and houses, receptacles of the breath or soul, probably smelling-boxes), and the ear-rings (amulets); the rings and the nose-jewels; the changeable suits of apparel (holiday-dresses), and the mantles, and the wimples, and the crimping-pins (or, more probably, robes and purses); the glasses and the fine linen (tunics made of such), and the hoods (turbans), and the veils.” The cauls, or caps of network, in the accompanying woodcut (No. 213), are from a relief in the British Museum, representing singers and harpists welcoming

Sennacherib on his return from conquest. Fig. 1 has the hair curiously arranged, but perhaps not in a caul. There is also in the British Museum a real cap of net-work for the hair, from Thebes, the meshes of which are very fine. The "round tires like the moon," probably similar to an article of head-dress of the modern Egyptians, the ckumarah, or moon (represented by No. 214), and made of thin plates of gold. The headbands exhibited (No. 215), are all, excepting one, from Egyptian paintings; and probably indicate jewelled dresses for the head; fig. 1 is the head-band of the queen of Sardanapalus III., from a bas-relief found at Kouyunjik. In the group of necklaces (No. 216), fig. 2 represents the necklace of Sardanapalus III., from the bas-relief just referred to, and appears there hanging to the couch, on which the monarch sits, while feasting with his queen. The necklaces at 3 are also from the Assyrian sculptures. But those under 1 are Egyptian, and are fine examples of goldsmiths' work; they belong to an early period, and are now in the British Museum. The beads are of gold, and the pendants are richly enamelled.

The common attire for the feet was sandals, not shoes in the ordinary sense of the term; but as this was connected with customs and allusions peculiar to itself, we reserve it for separate consideration under SANDALS. Many of the other articles also, incidentally noticed, such as rings, nose-jewels, amulets, veils, fringes or girdles, will be found treated separately under their own names.

II. In regard now to the preparation of the different articles of clothing, with the mode and materials employed in their manufacture, it is clear from various allusions in Scripture that the matter was very much in the hands of females. This was inevitable from the Israelites being chiefly an agricultural and pastoral people, on which account arts and manufactures of a public description were scarcely known, and their place, so far as domestic fabrics were concerned, was chiefly supplied by the skill and industry of the women. The spinning of the yarn was one of their principal employments, so that the prudent housewife is celebrated for taking hold of the distaff, and laying her hands to the spindle. Pr. xxxi. 19. The weaving, too, in all probability was chiefly conducted by females, as in early times it was among the Greeks, and still is among the Arabs, with whom, to use the words of Burckhardt, "the loom is placed before the harem or women's apartment, and worked by the mother and her daughters." The woodcut No. 217, representing two female weavers at work, is taken from the Egyptian monuments. The garments being of a kind that required little skill in shaping, they would naturally be fashioned and sewed by the female domestics of each dwelling. For workmanship of the higher kinds, such as was required for the more ornamental dresses and articles of embroidery, regularly trained and skilled craftsmen must have been required—to which class belonged, at the period of the exodus, Bezaleel and Aholiab, and others with them, of whom it is said that the Lord "had filled them with wisdom of heart, to work all manner of work of the engraver, and of the cunning workman, and of the embroiderer, in blue, and in purple, in scarlet, and in fine linen, and of the weaver," Ex. xxxv. 36. It is probable that after the children of Israel were settled in Canaan the greater part of the articles which they got of this finer and more ornate description, were purchased from the travelling merchants, who carried on the inland trade between Palestine and the rich manufacturing or importing districts of Egypt, Babylon, Tyre, and Sidon. The Babylonish garment found by Achan at the plunder of Jericho is a proof how early this trade had extended itself through the region afterwards occupied by the Israelites. (See EMBROIDERY.)

As to the making of the garments, there are only two specifications given in Scripture, leaving it to be inferred that in other respects the people might conform to the customs prevalent around them. One of these was that they were not to wear a garment of divers sorts, of woollen and linen together, De. xxii. 11. This instruction comes in along with some others, forbidding similar unnatural combinations—sowing a vineyard with diverse seeds, ploughing with an ox and an ass together. The object aimed at was undoubtedly of a moral kind, because defilement is mentioned as the consequence of using such intermixtures; and the direction must therefore proceed on the same principle as that on which the regulations about food were based—the principle of making the outward and ordinary transactions of life serve as the reflex of what they were called to be and do in the things of God. The Jehovah whom Israel was pledged in covenant to serve was the God of nature as well as of holiness; he had appointed certain distinctions in the one, and these he would have to be observed, not only on their own account, but also because they were fitted to remind his people of like distinctions in the other, which it was their special calling as his people to preserve. And so, the wearing of garments free from the mixing of diverse kinds, perpetually admonished them that their God was the God of order—of order even in the lower concerns of the material world, and how much more in the all-important interests of truth and righteousness! Here, above all, they must keep to the eternal landmarks which he has fixed. Of course the prohibition, like all others of a like kind, ceased with the introduction of a state of things which no longer required such imperfect modes of instruction and discipline. The other specification had respect to the putting of fringes of blue upon the four wings or corners of their raiment, Nu. xv. 28; De. xxii. 12. The particular part of the raiment on which these blue fringes were to be fixed is not stated; but as they were intended to catch the eye of the wearer, they must have been put upon the meil or the simlah, the outer tunic or the mantle—most naturally, indeed, upon the latter, which was also the only one that had four distinct corners. And the object of this, like the former peculiarity, was entirely moral; it was to serve the purpose of a sacred monitor, that when they looked upon the sky-blue on their garments they might lift their souls heavenwards, “and remember all the commandments of the Lord and do them, and might not seek after their own heart and their own eyes.” It may seem to us a very artificial mode of conveying such an admonition; but it would appear quite otherwise to the covenant-people, who were taught by the whole character of their institutions to see the spiritual and heavenly imaged in the earthly relations they filled, and the carnal services required at their hands. (See FRINGES.)

There can be no doubt that a large proportion of the garments anciently worn by the descendants of Abraham were of woollen material, as still is the case with the mass of the people in and around Palestine. The familiar allusion of our Lord in his parable respecting the old garment and the new patch, the one not fitly agreeing with the other, and certain also to make the rent worse, is alone a proof of this. For he speaks of a garment generally; and yet, what he says strictly holds only of woollen garments—the old threadbare and thin, the new unfulled, and ready, when exposed to the atmosphere, to contract and tear the feebler portions next it. Cotton and linen however were also in use, if, as is now generally supposed, what was called shesh or bys, and is always rendered linen in our version, comprised cotton as well. In this article great skill was displayed from very early times in regard to the fineness of the fabric and the workmanship; and in this respect alone abundance of scope would be afforded for those who sought to distinguish themselves by the expensiveness of their attire. The richness and variety of the colours employed, to which reference is often made in Scripture, afforded other opportunities for gaiety and expense. Hence, in our Lord's graphic portraiture of the rich and luxurious worldling, we find both these marks of superiority in dress distinctly indicated—“clothed in purple and fine linen,” Lu. xvi. 19; and the coat of many colours which Jacob gave to his son Joseph shows how early the taste in this direction had begun to manifest itself. Along with the fineness of the quality, and the richness of the colours employed, there was also from early times a disposition to indulge in varieties of suites of apparel, as appears alone from the five changes of raiment which Joseph gave to his brother Benjamin, Ge. xiv. 22. In after times indications frequently discover themselves of the same tendency, Ja. v. 30; xiv. 13; 2 Kl. v. 5; and the richer families seem to have prided themselves on having a store of fine dresses for any occasion that might arise, Is. iii. 6; Job xxvii. 16; Lu. xv. 22.

It is quite uncertain how far the ancient Israelites were acquainted with silk as an article of dress, or, if they were, when it was introduced. The word is occasionally used in our English Bibles, but the corresponding word in the original is not always the same, nor is it certain whether the terms were applied to what is strictly called silk, or to a soft and fine texture of linen or cotton stuffs. (See SILK.)

DRINK, STRONG. See under WINE.

DROMEDARY. See CAMEL.

DRUSILLA, the youngest daughter of that Herod who is mentioned in Acts xii. She was celebrated for her beauty, but was of loose character, having been married to the king of Emesa (Azizus), and afterwards abandoned him in order to live with the procurator Felix, Ac. xxiv. 24. She bore a son to this worthless paramour, who was named Agrippa, and both mother and son perished in an eruption of Mount Vesuvius, which took place in the days of Titus Cæsar (Jos. Ant. xx. 7, 2).

DUKE, a title applied in Ge. xxxvi. to the heads or leaders of the different families of the Edomites. The word in the original (אֲדָמָה, alluph, leader, from the root to lead or guide) exactly corresponds to our duke in its primary import, which is from the Latin dux, leader, and this again from duco, I lead. This primary import, however, has been very much lost sight of, in consequence of the application of the term to the highest class of our nobility; and it had been better if the simple rendering of leader or chieftain had been adopted for the heads of the Edomite families.

DULCIMER. See under MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

DUMAH [silence]. 1. The name of Ishmael's sixth son, Ge. xxv. 14, and probably on this account the name also of a district, with its inhabitants, in the confines of Syria and Arabia. The Arabs still call a place in that region by the name of Dumah-el-Jendel, i. e. the rocky Dumah. As an inhabited district it is the subject of a very enigmatical prophecy in Isaiah, ch. xli. 11, 12, and is there viewed in connection with Seir.—2. There was another Dumah, a town belonging to the tribe of Judah, Jos. xv. 52, but of which nothing is known except that it is placed by Eusebius at the distance of 17 miles from Eleutheropolis, in Daromas.

DUR'A, a Babylonian plain, in which Nebuchadnezzar set up his golden image, and assembled people from the greatest distances to worship it, Da. iii. No certain traces have been found of its precise locality, but it is with probability supposed to have been either the plain in which Babylon itself stood, or some other at no great distance from it.

DUST is often used figuratively in Scripture as an image of what is low, mean, and impure. Hence Abraham calls himself but “dust and ashes,” Ge. xviii. 27; and the prevailing custom in the East from the earliest times has been, in seasons of grief and distress, to sit down in the dust, and even to cover the person with it. Many allusions to this custom appear in Scripture. (See under MOURNING.) Throwing dust on one has also in all ages been a mode of showing indignation and contempt; thus Shimei, among other acts of outrageous behaviour, cast dust at David, and the Jews, when enraged at Paul, threw dust in the air, 2 Sa. xvi. 13; Acts xlii. 23. The shaking off the dust from one's feet against a person or people has a somewhat different import; it is not an action of contempt, but of solemn witness-bearing, in respect to the treatment that provoked it, implying that the person who did so regarded those toward whom it was done as heinous offenders, and refusing, as it were, to carry away the very dust of their ground, but leaving it behind as a testimony against them, Mar. vi. 11.

Dust, as a merely natural phenomenon, often plays a part in the East to which the inhabitants of cooler and moister climes are comparative strangers. It was one of the threatenings uttered by Moses in respect to the contemplated apostasy and rebelliousness of the people, "The Lord shall make the rain of thy land powder and dust; from heaven shall it come down upon thee, till thou be destroyed," De. xviii. 24. The deserts which lie partly within the territory of Judea and partly in its vicinity, contain an accumulation of dust or fine sand, which, when agitated and raised by the wind, sometimes assumes the aspect of a cloud, and is fraught with annoyance and danger. In seasons of drought it is capable of spreading sterility and desolation to a degree that could scarcely be imagined; and in its more violent forms it involves those who come within its sweep in an atmosphere of suffocation. The crusaders occasionally suffered considerably from this cause, as is reported by their ancient historian Vinisau, quoted by Harmer (Observations, iii. 458)—"Journeying, they were thrown into great perturbation by the air's being thickened with dust, as well as by the heat of the season." It is rather, however, beyond the confines of Palestine, and in the more strictly desert regions, that this evil reaches its most formidable height. Travellers in these regions have frequently given accounts of them, of which the following from Buckingham may be taken as a specimen—The morning, he says, had been fine, but the "light airs from the south soon increased into a gale; the sun became obscure; and as every hour brought us into a looser sand, it flew around us in such whirlwinds with the sudden gusts that blew, that it was impossible to proceed. We halted therefore for an hour, and took shelter under the lee of our beasts, who were themselves so terrified as to need fastening by the knees, and uttered in their wailings but a melancholy symphony. I know not," he continues, "whether it was the novelty of the situation that gave it additional horrors, or whether the habit of magnifying evils to which we are unaccustomed, had increased its effect, but certain it is, that fifty gales of wind at sea appear to me more easy to be encountered than one amongst the sands. It is impossible to imagine desolation more complete; we could see neither sun, earth, nor sky; the plain at ten paces' distance was absolutely imperceptible; our beasts, as well as ourselves, were so covered as to render breathing very difficult; they hid their faces in the ground, and we could only uncover our own for a moment to behold this chaos of mid-day darkness, and wait impatiently for its abatement." Such scenes, however, as we have said, belong rather to other regions of the East than to Palestine; it is too variegated by hill and dale, and too limited in extent, even in the portions that may be called desert, to admit of dust-storms of so severe and protracted a kind.

EAGLE (אֶשְׁתִּי, neshet, Chald. אֶשְׁתִּי, n'shar, derbs).

The magnificent birds of prey included under this generic title are spread over the whole world. Several species occur in Palestine and the surrounding regions, as the imperial eagle (Aquila imperialis), the golden eagle (A. chrysaetos), the spotted eagle (A. nevia), and probably the white-tailed eagle (H. albicilla). Perhaps the term, as is often the case, may be understood generically, without any minute discrimination of species; and certainly in one passage where the neshet is mentioned, a vulture, and not an eagle, is intended. "Make thee bald, . . . enlarge thy baldness as the neshet," Mi. i. 16. No true eagle is bald, whereas this is a conspicuous characteristic of all the Vulturidæ, and specially of the griffon-vulture (Vultur fulvus), which has much of the aspect and habits of the eagles.

Both the imperial and golden eagles are sufficiently common in Western Asia; and as these are both noble birds, of commanding size and power, with habits almost quite identical, we shall take for granted that both of these species are included in the neshet.

Many points in the history and economy of the eagle are used allusively in holy Scripture. It was forbidden as food, in common with other carnivorous fowls, La. xi. 13; De. xiv. 12. A fine description, embracing in few words the leading characters of the tribe, occurs in Jehovah's appeal to Job, ch. xxxix. 27-30: "Doth the eagle mount up at thy command, and make her nest on high! She dwelleth and abideth on the rock, upon the crag of the rock, and the strong place. From thence she seeketh the prey, and her eyes behold afar off. Her young ones also suck up blood, and where the slain are, there is she."

The overbearing power and fierce rapacity of this bird make it a fit emblem of those scourges of mankind called "great" conquerors; and hence the eagle has been the favourite standard of nations in all ages; witness Russia, Prussia, Austria, France, and the United States in our own time. In that wondrously minute prophecy, wherein Moses depicts the history of Israel through thousands of years, De. xviii., the Roman invasion and siege are alluded to under their national emblem—a "nation from the end of the earth, as the eagle flieth." The Chaldean armies are repeatedly compared to the eagle for their swiftness and rapacious cruelty, Je. iv. 13; xviii. 40; xlii. 22; La. iv. 19; Ho. i. 8; Hab. i. 8; and the kings of Babylon and of Egypt are both, in the same parable, likened to "great eagles, with great wings, long-winged, full of feathers," Eze. xvii. 3, 7.

The rock-dwelling habits of the Edomites are finely compared to those of the eagle, which "maketh her nest on high," Je. xlii. 16; Ob. 4; and they are reminded that the impregnable and inaccessible heights to which they resort will be no defence against Jehovah, though they set their nest among the stars.

The words used by the Lord Jesus, "Wheresoever the carcase is, there will the eagles be gathered together," Mat. xxiv. 28, &c., have been by some commentators referred to the vulture, on the assumed ground that the eagle never feeds on carrion, but confines itself to that prey which it has killed by its own prowess. This, however, is a mistake; no such chivalrous feeling exists in either eagle or lion; both will feed ignominiously on a body found dead. Any of our readers may see in the zoological gardens that the habit imputed is at least not invariable. Aquila bifasciata, of India, was shot by Col. Sykes at the carcase of a tiger; and A. rapax, of South Africa, is "frequently one of the first birds that approaches a dead animal."

Some miraculous power has been attributed to this bird of becoming young again—Medea-like—when old, founded on such passages as these—"Thy youth is renewed like the eagle's," Ps. ciii. 5; "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength, . . . they shall mount up with wings as eagles," Is. xl. 31. But these cannot be understood otherwise than as poetical allusions, founded doubtless on the great longevity of this bird, and its power, in common with other birds, of moulting its plumage periodically. An eagle that died at Vienna had been kept in captivity upwards of a hundred years.

The eagle has a vast power of wing, the whole structure being adapted for strong and rapid flight. It soars to an immense height in the air, remains on the wing with unwearied energy, and swoops on its prey like the falling of a thunderbolt.

In most countries the eagle's acuteness of sight has become proverbial. "Her eyes behold afar off." Mr. Yarrell observes that "the power of vision in birds is very extraordinary, and in none is it more conspicuous than in the eagles." "Their destination, elevating themselves, as they do, into the highest regions, and the power required of perceiving objects at very different distances, and in various directions, as well as the rapidity of their flight, seem to render such a provision necessary." "It has been stated that probably, in the whole range of anatomical structure, no more perfect or more conclusive proofs of design could be adduced, than are to be found in the numerous and beautiful modifications in the form of various parts of the eyes of different animals, destined to exercise vision in media of various degrees of transparency as well as density." The eyes of birds are much larger in proportion than those of quadrupeds, and exhibit also two other peculiarities, one of which—a kind of hoop of bony plates—appears to be intended to compress in various degrees the lens of the eye, and thus adapt it for sight at various distances; the proportions of the lens itself are made ancillary to the same requirements.

But the most interesting allusions to the eagle in holy Writ are those in which Jehovah sets forth his paternal care and tenderness over Israel. "I bare you on eagles' wings, and brought you unto myself," Ex. xix. 4. "As an eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over her young, spreadeth abroad her wings, taketh them, beareth them on her wings; so the LORD alone did lead him, and there was no strange god with him," De. xxxii. 12. Of the fact that the raptorial birds do thus support their young in their first essays at flight, the writer of this article takes the liberty of quoting some evidence from one of his own works on natural history. The bird alluded to is the red-tailed buzzard, which is very closely allied to the eagles. "I have never met with the nest of this hawk, but a young friend, very conversant with natural history [and who was not at all likely to have ever heard of those texts, or of the popular notions on the subject], informs me that he knew of one near the top of an immense cotton-tree. . . . At length he witnessed the emergence of two young ones, and their first essay at flight. He assured me he distinctly saw the parent bird, after the first young one had flown a little way, and was beginning to flutter downward—he saw the mother, for the mother surely it was—fly beneath it, and present her back and wings for its support. He cannot say that the young actually rested on or even touched the parent; perhaps its confidence returned on seeing support so near, so that it managed to reach a dry tree, when the other little one, invited by the parent, tried its infant wings in like manner" (Birds of Jamaica, p. 14). [P. H. G.]

EAR, as a verb, and EARING, as a noun, though now obsolete terms, have been retained in a few passages in the authorized version of Scripture, Ge. xlv. 6; Ex. xxxiv. 21; De. xxi. 4; Is. xxx. 24. They were from the Anglo-Saxon crian, to plough; so that to say, there should be "neither earing nor harvest," was much the same as to say, there should be neither sowing nor reaping. What is now called arable land, appears to have been anciently termed earable land—that is, land subject to the plough. Saxon and Latin, however, come here into close affinity, since arare is to plough in Latin, and arabilis also occurs for land subject to the plough; so that the word might be derived either from the Latin or the Saxon.

EARNEST, like the preceding, while derived from an Anglo-Saxon word, gyn-an, to run, to pursue, stands in close affinity with a word of Hebrew origin, עָרֵבָן; Gr. ἀρραβών; Lat. arrhabo, contr. arrha; Fr. arrhes; Eng. carles or earnest. The expression, to give or pay earnest, "seems to be merely to give or pay as a pledge or proof of being in earnest—of seriously intending to fulfil or perform the bargain or promise; to put down a gage or payment beforehand" (Richardson). It is used thus by the apostle Paul of the gift of the Holy Spirit to believers, in 2 Cor. i. 22; in v. 5, he employs the expression, "the earnest of the Spirit;" and more fully in Ep. i. 14, the sealing with the Spirit is designated "the earnest of our inheritance." The expression indicates that the indwelling grace and working of the Spirit is a fulfilment in part of the promise, which contains the assurance to believers of an eternal heritage of all life and blessing. It is the beginning of that which is to be perfected in glory, and so brings with it the assurance that all shall in due time be made good.

EAR-RING. This word is somewhat too precise for the corresponding term in the Hebrew, עָרֵךְ (nezem).

Derived from a root which signifies to pierce or bore, it denotes properly a pendent ring, such as orientals have been wont to wear alike from the nose and the ear (by means of a hole bored through the parts), and sometimes also suspended from the forehead, so as to fall down upon the face. The servant of Abraham presented Rebekah with an article of this sort; he is said, in our English Bible, to have put "an ear-ring upon her face," Ge. xxiv. 47, which must obviously have been either a nose-jewel or a ring to be hung from her forehead, otherwise it could with no propriety have been represented as put upon her face. That rings were quite commonly worn, however, in those early times, as ear-rings in the stricter sense, is evident from what is recorded of the family of Jacob, who are said, among other articles more or less connected with idolatry, to have given him "the ear-rings which were in their ears." Ge. xxxv. 4. At a later period in the early portion of the wilderness-sojourn, they are again connected with the ears of the wearers, Ex. xxxii. 2. Occasionally another term is employed (אָגִיל, agil), which appears to have indicated the same kind of articles, only with a more distinct reference to the circular form in which they were usually cast. It was the very general custom among ancient oriental nations for such ornaments to be worn by men as well as women, and the Egyptian and Assyrian monuments furnish not a few examples of this description. But there is nothing in the notices of Old or New Testament scripture to indicate that such a practice prevailed among the Hebrews. Indeed, the passage in Ju. viii. 24, which so expressly connects the wearing of golden ear-rings on the part of men with the manners of the Ishmaelites, seems not doubtfully to imply that the practice was at least unusual, if it existed at all among the male portion of the covenant-people. Rings are never distinctly associated with any but females. With these, however, they are sometimes associated in a manner which bespeaks them to have been occasionally used, not for ornament merely, but for purposes of superstition and idolatry. (See under AMULET.)

EARTH. This is the common equivalent in the English Bible to the Heb. עֵרֶץ (eretz), and to the Greek

γῆ; and as these words signify land, as well as earth—a specific territory of the globe, as well as its entire compass—it is necessary to look at the connection, to see whether the word is to be taken in the more restricted or the larger sense. Generally speaking, our translators have observed the distinction; but they have not been quite uniform in their renderings, and in a few passages they have used earth, where undoubtedly land had been the fitting term. Thus in Ja. v. 17, referring to the drought in the time of Elias, it is said, "it rained not on the earth by the space of three years and six months;" while in Lu. iv. 25, with reference to the same event, we read, "the heaven was shut up three years and six months, when great famine was throughout all the land." As the drought in question came specially as a judgment upon the land of Israel, the more general term should have been avoided. Our translators have fallen into the same inconsistency in rendering two passages respecting our Lord's crucifixion, in which the original almost exactly accords. In Mat. xxvii. 45, we read, "and there was darkness over all the land unto the ninth hour;" but in Lu. xxiii. 44, "and there was darkness over all the earth until the ninth hour." It should undoubtedly have been the same in both cases; and as there is no historical ground for supposing that the darkness was more than local, it had been better if in each case "all the land" had been the rendering adopted. Indeed, in old English, earth seems to have been occasionally interchanged with land, as an equivalent: thus Lady Capulet is made to say of her daughter Juliet, "She is the hopeful lady of my earth" (Romeo and Juliet, act I. scene 2). And fille de terre is the old French term for heirress. In such expressions, however, as "all the earth came," or "all the earth heard," even though nothing more than a limited universality could be intended, it is best to retain the expression in its most general form; for in such popular forms of speech every one instinctively supplies the necessary limitation. [ADAM, CREATION.]

EARTHQUAKE, a tremulous motion or shaking of the earth, caused by volcanic agency, or the violent action of subterraneous heat and vapours. Whether such commotions can be precisely identified with volcanic agency or not, it is certain that they have occurred most frequently in those regions of the earth where that agency either still is, or in former times has been, in most active operation. That Palestine has been subject both to volcanic agency, and to the occasional occurrence of earthquakes, admits of no doubt. "The volcanic phenomena of Palestine," says Stanley (p. 124), "open a question of which the data are, in a scientific point of view, too imperfect to be discussed; but there is enough in the history and literature of the people to show, that there was an agency of this kind at work. The valley of the Jordan, both in its desolation and vegetation, was one continued portent; and from its crevices ramified even into the interior of Judea the startling appearances, if not of the volcano, at least of the earthquake." He goes on to state, that the writings of the psalmists and prophets abound with indications of the feelings produced by such phenomena; such as the following: "He looketh on the earth, and it trembleth;" "He toucheth the mountains, and they smoke;" "The mountains quake at him, and the hills melt, and the earth is burned at his presence;" "The earth shall reel to and fro, like a drunkard, and shall be removed like a cottage." Volney, in his Travels, had long ago drawn attention to this character of the country. "The south of Syria," he had said (vol. i. p. 28), "that is, the hollow through which the Jordan flows, is a country of volcanoes; the bituminous and sulphureous sources of the lake Asphaltitis, the lava, the pumice-stone thrown upon its banks, and the hot baths of Tabaria, demonstrate that this valley has been the seat of a subterraneous fire, which is not yet extinguished." And a recent German traveller, Russeger, quoted in Smith's Dictionary of Ancient Geography, under "Palestine," thus writes: "It is in the northern part of this country alone, that volcanic formations are found in considerable quantities. Nevertheless, much of the land in which volcanic rocks are not found, bears evident marks of frequent volcanic action—such as hot springs, the crater-like depressions (such as the basin of Tiberias, and that of the Dead Sea, with its basaltic rocks), the frequent and visible disturbances of the strata of the normal rocks, the numerous crevices, and especially the frequent and violent earthquakes. The line of earthquakes in Syria includes Hebron, Jerusalem, Nablûs, Tiberias, Safed, Baalbek, Aleppo, from thence takes a direction from south-west to north-east, follows the direction of the central chain of Syria, runs parallel to that of the valley of the Jordan, and has its termination northwards in the volcanic country on the slope of Taurus, and southwards in the mountain-land of Arabia Petrea."

Many similar testimonies are given by Dr. Kitto in his Physical History of Palestine (ch. iv.), where also may be seen a detailed account of the earthquakes that are known to have visited Palestine, about and since the Christian era. The more remarkable are the following: one mentioned by Josephus (Ant. xvi. 7; Wars, i. 14), which occurred in B.C. 31, and which is said to have shaken the whole land of Judea, destroying many thousands of persons; another, described by William of Tyre, in A.D. 1170, which laid several cities on the coast in ruins, but does not appear to have penetrated far into Palestine; another, in 1759, mentioned by Volney, which is said to have caused great damage, and destroyed in Baalbek alone 20,000 persons; another, in 1822, which spread much devastation around the lake of Galilee, and which was ascertained by two missionaries (Mr. Calman and Mr. Thompson) to have been felt in a line of 500 miles in length by 90 in breadth, Vol. I.

but which spent its violence about half way between Beyrout and Jerusalem, where whole villages were turned into heaps of rubbish; and still another in 1837, in which no fewer than thirty-six towns and villages suffered partial or complete destruction, and in Safed alone, which seems to have been the centre of the calamity, upwards of 5000 persons are reported to have perished. There can be no doubt therefore, from known facts in the physical history of Palestine, that it has been repeatedly subject to the phenomena of earthquakes; and it is only what might have been expected, that there should be, beside occasional references in the language of Scripture to events of that description, distinct notices of their actual occurrence at certain periods in the history of the past. In reality, however, there are not many notices of this sort. Only one stands prominently out in Old Testament history—the earthquake, as it is called by way of eminence by the prophet Amos, ch. i. 1. He announces his vision as having been granted to him "two years before the earthquake," implying this to have been a most memorable visitation, a kind of epoch in history. The same also appears from the allusion made to it by the later prophet Zechariah, who seeks to impress the minds of impenitent sinners with the dread of coming vengeance by telling them, that "they should flee like as they fled from before the earthquake in the days of Uzziah, king of Judah," ch. xiv. 5. It is rather singular that no notice should have been taken of it in the history of Uzziah's reign. Josephus has endeavoured to supply the deficiency, but in a manner which forbids our reposing any confidence in his accuracy. He says that the earthquake "shook the ground, so that a rent was made in the temple, and the rays of the sun shone through it, which, falling upon the king's face, struck him with the leprosy" (Ant. ix. 10, 4). The account in 2 Ch. xxvi. 19, of the leprosy of Uzziah, ascribes it to the direct interposition of Heaven, as a divine judgment on his presumption for persisting in his purpose to perform a strictly priestly act—the offering of incense. It is incredible, that if this infliction had been instrumentally connected with the earthquake, the history should have been entirely silent upon the subject. Of the extent of that earthquake, therefore, which took place in the latter part of Uzziah's reign, of the precise localities affected by it, or of the desolations it may have produced—of anything, in short, but the general alarm and consternation occasioned by it, we know absolutely nothing.

Not uncommonly the appearances that presented themselves to Elijah at Horeb, when first a great and strong wind rent the mountain, and brake in pieces the rocks before the Lord, then an earthquake, then a fire, and finally a still small voice, 1 Ki. xix., are classed among the phenomena of ordinary earthquakes; but the natural impression produced by the narrative rather favours the idea that the whole scene was of a special and supernatural description. In New Testament scripture mention is made of two earthquakes—one in connection with the last stage of our Lord's earthly history, and another with the imprisonment of Paul and Silas at Philippi. The former of these is by St. Matthew first connected with the death of Christ, and then again with the resurrection; according to him there was what he calls a σεισμός, or shaking, in both cases, Mat. xxvii. 51-53; xxviii. 2. But it may well be doubted whether, in either case, it was an earthquake in the ordinary sense that is meant; it would rather seem to be some special and supernatural operation of God, in attestation of the marvellous work that was in progress, producing a tremulous motion in the immediate locality, and in connection therewith a sensible consternation in the minds of the immediate actors. If it had been an earthquake in the ordinary sense, we can scarcely suppose it would have been unnoticed by the other evangelists. And this view is confirmed by its being in the second case connected with the angel's descent: "There was a great shaking, or earthquake, for the angel of the Lord descended," comp. 1 Sa. xiv. 15. So that it seems out of place with some to regard the supernatural obscuration of the sun at the time of the crucifixion as caused by the commotion of the earthquake (Kitto's Cyclopaedia, art. Earthquake). And both that particular earthquake, and the one that occurred at Philippi, are probably to be regarded as somewhat exceptional phenomena, wrought for a specific purpose, and consequently very limited as to their sphere of action. In short, it does not appear from any notices of Scripture that the phenomena of earthquakes, in the ordinary sense of the term, played more than a very occasional and subordinate part in the scenes and transactions of sacred history.

EAST, as the designation of a certain quarter or region of the earth, is used somewhat loosely in Scripture. It denoted not only the countries which lay directly east of Palestine, but those also which stretched toward the north and east—Armenia, Assyria, Babylonia, Parthia, as well as the territories of Moab, Ammon, and Arabia Deserta. When Jacob reached Mesopotamia, he is said to have come "into the land of the children of the east," Ge. xxxi. 1, although it lay very nearly due north from Palestine. The magi, or wise men from the east, who came to hail the infant Saviour, were in all probability from Chaldea; and if not Chaldeans, we can scarcely think of any other countries than Persia and Parthia, for in these regions the magi formed the learned and priestly caste. Balaam, who belonged to Mesopotamia, says that he had been brought "out of Aram, out of the mountains of the east," Nu. xxiii. 7. Again, the Midianites and Amalekites, whose land lay directly to the east of Palestine, are called "the children of the east," Ju. vi. 3; viii. 10. It was one of the charges brought against ancient Israel, that they were replenished from the east—meaning, that they were much given to the astrological and magic arts, which might be said to have their seat among the Chaldeans; and hence, it is added, partly by way of explanation, that they were "soothsayers like the Philistines," 1s. ii. 6. In the varied use and application of the term, therefore, it is necessary to consider the connection in which it stands, in order to obtain any distinct idea of the region more particularly indicated by it.

EASTER, the name properly of a Christian festival, but used once in the authorized version, though improperly, to designate the Jewish passover, Ac. xii. 4. The words should be, "intending after the Passover," not "after Easter;" for it is the Jewish observance alone that was in question.

EAST SEA is an epithet used in two passages, Joel ii. 20; Eze. xlvii. 18, of the Dead Sea, because it lay on the eastern side of the Holy Land. The Mediterranean Sea, because lying in the opposite direction, was on a like account called the WEST SEA, or the sea on the west border, Nu. xxxiv. 6; Jos. xv. 12, &c.

EAST WIND is in Scripture frequently referred to as a wind of considerable strength, and also of a peculiarly dry, parching, and blighting nature. In Pharaoh's dream the thin ears of corn are represented as being blasted by an east wind, as, in a later age, Jonah's gourd was withered and himself scorched by "a vehement east wind," Ge. xii. 6; Jonah iv. 8; and often in the prophets, when a blighting desolation is spoken of, it is associated with the east wind, either as the instrumental cause or as a lively image of the evil, Eze. xvii. 10; xix. 12; Ho. xiii. 15; Hab. i. 9, &c. This arose from the fact, that in Egypt, Palestine, and the lands of the Bible generally, the east wind, or a wind with more or less in it of an eastern direction, blows over burning deserts, and consequently is destitute of the moisture which is necessary to promote vegetation. In Egypt it is rather a south-east than an east wind, which is commonly found most injurious to health and fruitfulness; but this also is familiarly called an east wind, and it often increases to great violence. Ukert, a German writer, quoted by Hengstenberg in his Egypt and the Books of Moses, thus sums up the accounts of modern travellers on the subject: "In the spring the south wind oftentimes springs up towards the south-east, increasing to a whirlwind. The heat then seems insupportable, although the thermometer does not always rise very high. As long as the south-east wind continues, doors and windows are closed, but the fine dust penetrates everywhere; everything dries up; wooden vessels warp and crack. The thermometer rises suddenly from 16-20° up to 30-36°, and even 38° of Reaumur. This wind works destruction upon everything. The grass withers, so that it entirely perishes if this wind blows long." It is stated by another traveller, Wanaleb, quoted by the same authority, and with special reference to the strong east wind employed on the occasion of the passage of the Israelites through the Red Sea, which took place shortly after Easter: "From Easter to Pentecost is the most stormy part of the year, for the wind commonly blows during this time from the Red Sea, from the east." There is nothing, therefore, in the scriptural allusions to this wind, which is not fully borne out by the reports of modern travellers; alike by sea and by land it is now, as it has ever been, an unwelcome visitant, and carries along with it many disagreeable effects.

EBAL AND GERIZIM, the names of two hills which, from the peculiar distinction conferred on them, as the scenes respectively from which the blessing and the curse were to be pronounced on Israel, have acquired a kind of singular interest. Moses declared before his death that he had set before Israel a blessing and a curse—a blessing, if they obeyed God's commandments—a curse, if they disobeyed; and he charged them to put the blessing, after they got possession of Canaan, upon Mount Gerizim, and the curse upon Mount Ebal. "Are they not," he added, "on the other side Jordan, by the way where the sun goeth down, in the land of the Canaanites, which dwell in the champaign over against Gilgal, beside the plains of Moreh?" De. xi. 30. This description of the locality of the two mounts is certainly somewhat indefinite; and different views have been, and still are, taken of the precise hills indicated by them; but we have the testimony of a uniform tradition, that they are the two hills which form the opposite sides of the valley wherein lay the ancient Shechem or Sichem, supplanted by the modern Nablous. Many descriptions have been given of the two elevations, slightly differing in the views presented of their respective natures, but chiefly, it would appear, from the descriptions being given from different points of view. Robinson, who surveyed them a little to the west, from the village of Nablous itself, says of them: "Mounts Gerizim and Ebal rise in steep, rocky precipices, immediately from the valley on each side, apparently some 800 feet in height. The sides of both these mountains as here seen (namely, from Nablous), were, to our eyes, equally naked and sterile, although some travellers have chosen to describe Gerizim as fertile, and confine the sterility to Ebal. The only exception in favour of the former, as far as we could perceive, is a small ravine coming down opposite to the west end of the town, which indeed is full of fountains and trees; in other respects, both mountains, as here seen, are desolate, except that a few olive-trees are scattered upon them" (Researches, iii. p. 96). A late traveller (Dr. Buchanan, in his Notes of a Clerical Furlough spent chiefly in the Holy Land, p. 324), so far differs from this view, that he says, on approaching the mountains from the east, where alone the specific heights are found, to which the names of Ebal and Gerizim were given, "the contrast between them is obvious and strong. Ebal is much steeper, more destitute of soil, and altogether greatly more rocky and barren than Gerizim, whose sides are more sloping, and clothed with a much richer and more abundant vegetation." He therefore thinks that the two mounts were considerably chosen—the one as the scene of blessing, and the other as that of cursing, since there is something in the very aspect of Gerizim that tends to suggest the idea of blessing, and of cursing in that of Ebal. The same, indeed, substantially had been said long ago by Maundrell: "Though neither of the mountains has much to boast of as to their pleasantness, yet, as one passes between them, Gerizim seems to discover a somewhat more verdant, fruitful aspect than Ebal."

Admitting this, however, something further must evidently be taken into account, in order to explain why these two mountains should have been chosen for such a purpose; why, of all the mountains in Canaan, these should have been selected as the scene of so remarkable and solemn a transaction. If we can so far distinguish between the two, as to be able to say, that the one, from its more sterile and rugged aspect, was the fitter for being associated with the curse, and the other, as the milder and more genial in appearance, for having the blessing pronounced on it; we still need some additional reason to account for these mountains being so definitely fixed on as the scenes respectively of blessing and cursing, while many others in Palestine might (so far as natural appearance is concerned) have equally served the purpose. The region of Shechem, in which the mountains stood, had this advantage above most others, that they were very nearly in the centre of the land. But besides that, it was hallowed by some of the most sacred recollections connected with the history of their patriarchal fathers. "The place of Shechem (as it is called) in the plain of Moreh," was the first spot in the land of Canaan at which Abraham rested, and where, after receiving a fresh revelation from heaven, "he built an altar unto the Lord, who appeared unto him," Ge. xii. 6, 7. It was before Shechem, also, which was no longer designated a place, but a city, that Jacob, on his return from Mesopotamia, took up his abode, and "bought a parcel of a field, where he had spread his tent, at the hand of the children of Hamor, the father of Shechem," Ge. xxxiii. 19. There, too, did he erect his first altar to God, and "called it El-Elohe-Israel." It is possible, as Stanley suggests, that there may have been other associations of a sacred nature connected with this locality; and in particular, that it, and not Jerusalem, may have been "the scene of Abraham's encounter with Melchizedek, and the sacrifice of Isaac" (Sinai and Palestine, p. 236). But whether this may have been the case or not, we have enough in those other scriptural transactions which are expressly identified with this region, to account for the selection of its two most prominent mountain-peaks, whence to read forth, in the hearing of assembled Israel, the blessing and the curse, as recorded by the pen of Moses. When assembled there, the people stood, not only in the centre of the whole land, but on ground that had been hallowed in former times by solemn communications between heaven and earth, and where in spirit they were again brought into contact with their godly ancestors; and no spot could be conceived better fitted for their hearing with solemnized minds the words which were intended on the one side to encourage their obedience, and on the other to warn them of the fearful consequences of unfaithfulness to their covenant obligations. (See SHECHEM.)

Of the two mountains, Gerizim is not only the more pleasant and fertile in its aspect, but also rises to a higher elevation, though the difference in height is not very great. The remains still exist of the road by which the people used to ascend to the temple which the Samaritans built on the top of it, in rivalry of the temple at Jerusalem. There are also the remains of an ancient fortress, which stood on the table-land of the summit; but nothing particular is known concerning it.

EBED [slave, servant], the father of Gaal, who headed the conspiracy of the Shechemites against Abimelech, Ju. i. 28. He appears to have been a descendant of the original inhabitants of the land, and hence did not belong to any of the tribes of Israel. (See GAAL.)

EBED-MELECH [king's slave or servant], an Ethiopian eunuch in the employment of Zedekiah king of Judah. We know of him simply in relation to Jeremiah, to whom he showed much kindness in a time of sore affliction, and whose life he even saved from destruction. His righteousness was recompensed to him again; for he obtained a special promise of protection and safety, amid the destruction which was to be brought upon Jerusalem by the king of Babylon, Je. xxxviii. 7, seq.; xxxix.

EBEN-E'ZEL [stone of departure], a memorial stone mentioned in 1 Sa. xx. 19; or possibly a stone of direction indicating two diverse routes.

EBEN-E'ZER [stone of help], a memorial stone set up by Samuel between Mizpeh and Shen, in commemoration of a signal deliverance obtained from the oppression of the Philistines. The precise locality is not known, nor even the sites of the two places between which it was erected. On setting it up Samuel used the explanatory words, "Hitherto hath the Lord helped us," 1 Sa. vii. 5-12.

EBER, the great-grandson of Shem, and one of the ancestors of Abraham. (See HEBREWS.)

EBONY (עֵבֶר, ibevos), is only once mentioned in the Bible: "The men of Dedan were thy merchants; they brought thee for a present horns of ivory and ebony," Eze. xxvii. 16; nor can there be any contrast more complete than white ivory and black ebony, although the one is derived from the animal kingdom and the other from the vegetable. Indeed, with its great density and stony hardness, it is not surprising that some of the earlier writers doubted whether it were a vegetable production at all; and Pausanias states that he had it on good authority that in its origin it is entirely subterranean! "I have been told by a man of Cyprus, wonderfully well informed regarding medicinal plants, that ebony yields neither leaves nor fruit, nor indeed has it any stem above ground. It is merely a root buried in the soil, which the Ethiopians dig out, some of whom are very skilful in detecting its localities." To this darksome derivation Southey alludes in his description of Shedad's palace:—

"The Ethiop, keen of scent, Detects the ebony,
That deep in earth'd, and hating light,
A leafless tree, and barren of all fruit,
With darkness feeds its boughs of raven grain."

We need not say that Pausanias was misinformed.

True ebony, the wood with which the ancients were acquainted, is obtained from one or other of the species of Diospyros, most of which—for example, D. ebenaster, D. melanocorylon, D. Roylei—are natives of the East Indies: so that Virgil is still substantially correct:—

"Divisæ arboribus patriæ: sola India nigrum Fert ebenum."—Gorg. ii. 116.

One of the noblest species is the D. reticulata of Ceylon. "The densely black portion occupies the centre of the tree; and in order to reach it, the whiter wood that surrounds it is carefully cut away." But, even when thus reduced, logs two feet in diameter, and in length from ten to fifteen feet, are conveyed to the coast (Sir J. E. Tennent's Ceylon, vol. i. 117; ii. 491). With the fact that the dark portion is the interior of the trunk, the Arabs were so far acquainted, that Sir J. E. Tennent quotes a passage from Albyrouni, in which ebony is called "the black marrow of a tree, divested of its outer integuments." The wood of the D. virginiana, a lofty tree frequent in the southern states of America, is white.

Mahogany and many other competitors have gone far to displace ebony from the pre-eminence which it enjoyed in the cabinet work of the ancients. Not only was it imported to Tyre by "the men of Dedan," as mentioned by Ezekiel, but Pliny records how it was carried in Pompey's triumphal procession as one of the spoils of victory in the war with Mithridates. In his description of the abode of Somnus, Ovid appropriately specifies the ebony couch:—

"At medio torus est, ebano sublimis in atra, Plumeus, unicolor, pullo valamine tectus.
Quo cubat ipse deus, membris languore solutis."

M. tan. xi. 610.

If not exactly "ebony thrones," it is by no means unusual to find in ancient houses of our own land ebony chairs, ebony bedsteads, and ebony cabinets, elaborately carved and inlaid. [J. H.]

ECCLESIASTES (עֵקֶשֶׁת אֵסֶר; LXX. Ἐκκλησιαστής; Vulg. Ecclesiastes, qui ab Hebræis Koheleth appellatur; Targum, The words of the prophecy which Koheleth, i.e. Solomon, son of David, king in Jerusalem, prophesied; Syriac, The book of Koheleth, i.e. Solomon, son of David, king of Israel.)

In treating of this unique portion of the Old Testament scriptures, we shall arrange our remarks under the following heads:—

- I. Title.
- II. Age and Authorship.
- III. Subject-matter.
- IV. Form and Arrangement.
- V. Canonical Authority.

I. Title.—The Hebrew title is translated with sufficient accuracy in our English version, "The words of the Preacher, the son of David, king of (or rather, in) Jerusalem." The only difficulty arises from the use of the Heb. word Koheleth, freely rendered The Preacher, which is found only in this book, though the root (kahal) from which it comes is met with frequently, and has a definite and well-ascertained signification. It is as a noun that this root appears in its simplest form, the verbal root not being in use in what is called by Heb. grammarians the kal conjugation. From this noun kāhāl, assembly, ἐκκλησία, is derived the verb hikkil (הִקְלִיל), to assemble, and the participle kohele, assembling; just as from קָבַר, word, are derived the verb קָבַר, to speaking, and the participle דַּבֵּר, speaking. The form koheleth, however, is not in use in the masculine gender, and its feminine, koheleth, appears only in this book, where it is evidently used as a proper name. Still its signification is not doubtful. It denotes one who convokes, and, as a fitting consequence, addresses, an assembly; and the feminine form, under which the noun appears, may be explained in one or other of two ways—either by supposing wisdom to be understood (חֵכְמָה קֹהֵלֶתָהּ = חֵכְמָה קֹהֵלָהּ, Pr. i. 20, or by appealing to the common usage of designating an individual occupying a post of honour, by a name descriptive of the functions he discharges or the dignity he enjoys. Of this usage we have several examples in the Semitic languages. Thus, in Arabic, chaliph, which is properly a feminine abstract noun, denoting succession, is employed emphatically as the title of the successors of Mohammed. And in Hebrew we have examples of the same usage in the word פַּתָּר, governor, and סֹפֵרֵת, Ne. vii. 57. The last example, סֹפֵרֵת, which is written also רִמְסֹפֵרֵת, in Ezr. ii. 55, and also פַּתָּרֵת הַרְבֵּיבַיִם, in Ezr. ii. 57, and Ne. vii. 59, are names of individuals, and therefore quite parallel to קֹהֵלָהּ, also employed to designate an individual. This latter explanation appears to be the preferable one; especially on comparing such passages as Ec. xii. 9, where it is said that Koheleth was wise, and taught the people knowledge, a form of expression which would scarcely have been employed, were koheleth only another name for wisdom itself.

Who then is the individual designated by the name Koheleth in this passage, and throughout the book? It is agreed on all sides that Solomon is meant. This is evident, not only from ch. i. 1-12, where we are informed that Koheleth was the son of David, king over Israel, in Jerusalem, but from the whole account which he gives of himself, and of his pursuits and experiences, comp. ch. i. 16, ii. 4, &c., xii. 9 with 1 Ki. iv. 29-34; x. 3, 23, &c. It is possible that in the name Koheleth, by which Solomon is here designated, there is a reference to the occasion on which he assembled (הִקְהִילָהּ) the whole congregation (קָהָל) of Israel for the dedication of the temple, 1 Ki. viii. 1, 14, 22, 55; or, it may be, to the daily assembling of his servants, and of strangers from distant parts, around his throne, to listen to the wisdom which flowed from his lips, 1 Ki. x. 1, 6, 8, 24.

II. Age and Authorship.—But though it is certain that this book contains what professes to be a record of the experience and reflections of king Solomon, it is by no means so certain that Solomon himself was the author of the book. Indeed, Hebrew scholars, of every variety of theological opinion, are now almost at one in assigning to it a place among the very latest books of Scripture.¹ This critical conclusion rests on various grounds; but the principal ground is the language and style of composition, which is distinguished in a very marked manner from that of Proverbs, or any of the books of Scripture which belong to the age of Solomon. This is a point, indeed, on which we should be very careful not to come to a hasty conclusion. The occurrence of Chaldee words and forms in any Hebrew document is by no means a certain and invariable indication of lateness of composition. We must be careful to distinguish archaisms and words and forms peculiar to the poetic style, from Chaldeisms of the later period. Moreover, the Hebrew writings which have been transmitted to us being so few in number, it is of course much more difficult decisively to determine the period to which any of these writings belongs by the peculiar form of language which it presents, than it would have been had there been preserved to us a larger number of documents of different ages to assist us in forming our decision. Still, from the materials within our reach, scanty though they are, we may draw a conclusion as to the age of the book of Ecclesiastes, perhaps not altogether certain, nevertheless bearing with it a high degree of probability. For it needs but a cursory survey of the book to convince us that in language and style it not only differs widely from the writings of the age of Solomon, but bears a very marked resemblance to the latest books of the Old Testament. It is impossible to impart to any one ignorant of the Hebrew language a complete view of the evidence on which the statement just made is based; still, as the statement is one which comes into collision with common opinion and traditional belief, and has never received from our theologians the attention which it deserves, it may not be improper, without going into too minute detail, to specify some particulars of the evidence. 1. One class of words employed by the writer of Ecclesiastes we find rarely employed in the earlier books of scripture, frequently in the later, i.e. in those written during or after the Babylonish captivity. Thus, שָׁלַט (shalat), he ruled, Ec. ii. 19; v. 18; vi. 2; viii. 2, is found elsewhere only in Nehemiah and Esther. The derived noun שִׁלְטוֹן (shiltôn), rule, ch. vii. 4, 8, is found only in the Chaldee of Daniel; but שָׁלִיט (shallit), ruler, appears once in the earlier Scriptures, Ge. xlii. 6. Under this head may also be mentioned מַלְכוּת (malchuth), kingdom, ch. iv. 14, rare in the earlier Scriptures, but found above forty times in Esther and Daniel; and מְדִינָה (medina), province, ch. ii. 8; v. 7, which appears also in Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, Lamentations, Ezekiel, and likewise in 1 Ki. xx. 14-19, where "princes of the provinces" are mentioned among the officers of king Ahab; but in none of the earlier Scriptures. 2. A second class includes those words which are never found in any Hebrew writing of earlier date than the Babylonish captivity, but are found in the later books:—as זְמַן (z'mân), set time, ch. iii. 1 (= זְמַנְךָ), which we meet with in Hebrew only in Ne. ii. 6 and Es. ix. 27, 31; but in the biblical Chaldee and in the Targums frequently; פְּתִיגָמָה (piithgâm), sentence, ch. vii. 11 (E.V.), which appears in Hebrew only in Es. i. 20; but in Chaldee frequently. (If this word be, as is commonly supposed, of Persian origin, its appearance only in the later Jewish writings is at once accounted for, Rüdiger's Additions to Gesenius' Thesaurus.) דָּרַע, ch. x. 20, a derivation of דָּרַע, to know, found only in 2 Ch. and Daniel, and also in Chaldee; and the particles אִף, if, ch. vi. 6, and כֵּן, then, so, ch. viii. 10, found in no earlier Hebrew book than Esther. From the foregoing enumeration it appears that the book of Ec-clesiastes resembles the book of Esther in some of the most distinctive peculiarities of its language. 3. A third class embraces those words which are not found even in the Hebrew writings of the latest period, but only in the Chaldee of Daniel and Ezra, or in the Targums, as יִשְׁרֹן (yishrōn, profit), which is used nine times in Ecclesiastes, never in any other scriptural writing, but frequently in the Targums, under the slightly modified form (yuthrān); so also כְּבָר (k'bhār), already, long ago, which recurs eight times in this book; תָּקַן (takan, ch. i. 15; vii. 13; xii. 9, found also in Chaldee, Da. iv. 33, &c.; רָצוּהוּ (r'uth), desire, recurring five times, and also in the Chaldee portions of Ezra; יָצַח, ch. i. 17, &c. יָצַח, ch. i. 13, &c.

יָצַח, ch. x. 8. 4. Other peculiarities, such as the frequent use of the participle, the rare appearance of the van consecutive, the various uses of the relative particle, concur with the characteristics already noted, in affixing to the language and style of this book the stamp of that transition period when the Hebrew language, soon about to give place to the Chaldee, had already lost its ancient purity, and become debased by the absorption of many Chaldee elements.

But does not the book itself claim to be the production of the son of David, king over Israel, in Jerusalem? And do we not, by assigning it to a later age, virtually charge its author, whoever he was, with appearing under false colours, and resorting to unworthy means to attract attention, and add authority to the sentiments which he expresses? To some it has appeared so. The learned Witsius gave it as his opinion that the author of Ecclesiastes, if not Solomon, must have been the greatest liar who ever lived (omnium mortalium mendacissimus). And even recent writers on this book have expressed themselves in language scarcely less emphatic. Yet it has been by no means uncommon for public teachers, without any fraudulent intention, to present the truths and lessons they were anxious to inculcate, not in their own name, but in the name of some venerated sage of earlier times; in order that by this voluntary retirement of the author to the back ground, all personal and local associations might be kept out of view, and attention fixed not upon the writer, but upon the written words. Thus we may suppose, without attributing to the writer of Ecclesiastes any unworthy motive, that, for a time, in order to give more weighty utterance to his thoughts, he identifies himself in spirit with Solomon, whose wisdom and manifold experiences had long been proverbial, he sees, as it were, with his eyes, and speaks in his name. The book is not historical, but poetical. It does not contain a statement of facts, or alleged facts, the truth or falsehood of which must be determined by the authority on which the statement is made; it is occupied with high and difficult questions relating to the divine providence and the destiny of man, which cannot be solved by an appeal to any human authority, however venerable. And if the author speaks in the name of Solomon, it is not that the statements to which he gives expression may, by that means, meet with more unhesitating and unquestioned acceptance, but because of the very large and peculiar experience which rendered Solomon the fittest expositor of the theme he had chosen.

However, strictly speaking, it is not the fact that the writer assumes the name of Solomon. The name Solomon is not found in any part of the treatise. Instead of it, the designation Koheleth is uniformly employed. And this change of name has been supposed to contain an intimation that it is not the actual historical Solomon who speaks;¹ for, on the common hypothesis that the book was written by Solomon, and contains the penitent confessions of his old age, there does not appear to be any good reason, but rather the contrary, for the record of such confessions being given to the world under an assumed name. It is an idealized Solomon who speaks. Or, as some have chosen to represent it, it is the spirit of Solomon, which now, freed from the chains of the flesh, and recalling all he had seen and felt "in the days of his vanity," ch. vii. 13, now come to an end, pours forth, for the instruction of mankind, the lessons of wisdom, gathered from the review of a life of such manifold and diverse experiences.

Possibly, the results of criticism admit of being reconciled with the testimony of tradition on the ground of a middle hypothesis: viz. that, though the treatise is the production of a later writer, the text with which it begins and ends, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity," was a real saying of king Solomon, handed down by tradition. This view is suggested by the form of expression "vanity of vanities, said Koheleth," in which the writer seems to appeal to a well-known saying of Koheleth, on which he may found his discourse. No writer of Scripture ever speaks thus in his own name.

It is well, however, that the book may be understood, and made practically useful, even though the questions of its age and authorship are not determined to the satisfaction of all. There is no ground for the assertion that "the book is unintelligible except on the historical presupposition that the people of God were in a very miserable condition at the time of its composition"² (Hengst. p. 44, Clark's Transl.); still less for the statement that "there runs through the entire book the conviction that a terrible catastrophe was shortly to befall the Persian empire" (ibid. p. 10). We must confess to a feeling of profound astonishment at the confidence with which such statements as the last are made by some of the German writers. But this introduces another branch of our subject.

III. Theme.—The theme of the book is stated at the commencement, Vanity of vanities, saith Koheleth, all is vanity: what profit hath a man of all his labour which he taketh under the sun? and again, towards the close, ch. xii. 8, Vanity of vanities, all is vanity. The utterance of a spirit, we are ready, at first glance, to exclaim, sunk in the abyss of despair. Yet looking into the treatise more narrowly, we find that we have misapprehended its true character—that a principal aim of its author is evidently to inculcate contentment and the quiet enjoyment of the blessings which God has bestowed—that throughout the whole are scattered precepts and exhortations which are by no means in harmony with the dark meaning we have attached to the opening words, ch. vii. 9, 14; ix. 7-10; xi. 1, &c.—and that the conclusion in which the author gives us the results of his inquiries is in perfect consistency with the hopeful teaching of the other Scriptures, ch. xii. 13-14. Taking a superficial survey of the book, we are not surprised that some difficulty should have been felt even in early times in admitting it to be of canonical authority, seeing that some of the leading statements it contains appear to be at variance with one another, and with the other recognized Scriptures. But these difficulties in a great measure disappear on a closer examination.

Vanity of vanities! i.e. utter emptiness and vanity, פִּרְוֹןָה אֵלֶּיךָ, Job vii. 16, all is vanity! It is evident that the author has in his mind limitations, to which, in the intensity of his feeling, he cannot give expression. He is assuredly not thinking of God, or of God's work, when he exclaims all is vanity. We must therefore endeavour to ascertain the range of observation which lay under his eye when he gave utterance to that despairing cry. And this we are enabled to do by an attentive study of the words which immediately follow, ch. i. 3, every one of which deserves to be carefully weighed. What profit, what real and permanent advantage, to man, אִישׁ, אִישׁ. This word "man," אִישׁ (not אִישׁ), is found no fewer than forty-seven times in this short treatise; and the reason is, that it is the term which most accurately represents the aspect in which man is viewed by the writer, denoting, as it does, man, as man, in his frailty and mortality, comp. ch. vi. 10.

It is not of man redeemed, of God's people of Israel, that the author writes. This special relation is kept out of view, and the general relation of man to God is that which is prominent throughout. Hence there is no mention of Israel; the name indeed occurs once, ch. i. 12, but altogether in a worldly and not in a spiritual sense.

Corresponding to the view of man on which the treatise is based, is the view of God which it presents. It is well known that in Scripture the Divine Being is spoken of under various names, according to the aspect of his nature and character which is at the time present to the mind of the writer. Of these, the two most frequently in use are Elohim and Jehovah—the former, the more general, and large in its import, and denoting God as God, in the fulness of his infinite and adorable perfections; the latter, the more special and definite, and presenting the everlasting God in intimate union with his redeemed people. The former name, accordingly, denoting God as God, corresponds to אֱלֹהִים, which denotes man as man, and is the only name of God which appears in this treatise. The name Jehovah, so frequent in the prophetic writings, is not met with once here. And this constant use of the correlative God and Man, and careful avoidance of the names Jehovah and Israel, throws much light upon the nature of the treatise, and determines the point of view from which the great questions which form the subject of inquiry are regarded.

In all his labour, or in return for all his labour, אִישׁ, אִישׁ. Here we meet with another characteristic term, אִישׁ, āmal, which, with its cognates, recurs no fewer than thirty-six times, and the exact meaning of which it is therefore necessary to ascertain and carry along with us. It properly signifies fatiguing toil, which no one would voluntarily submit to without the prospect of some resulting advantage. In ch. iv. 6 it is opposed to rest, and in ch. iv. 8 it is followed and explained by the words "bereaving the soul of good." It is important to remark that throughout the treatise the "fatiguing toil" of man is contrasted with the work of God (אֱלֹהִים, אֱלֹהִים). The mind of the writer is anxiously directed to the contemplation of these two works. The one, the work of God, he attempts to trace in its manifoldness and onward progress; but he finds his powers quite unequal to the task. "No man can find out the work that God maketh from the beginning to the end," ch. iii. 11. Yet what he does discover of it serves to awaken awe and admiration. He describes it as irresistible, no power being able to stop or retard its onward progress, ch. vii. 13; as altogether excellent, ch. iii. 11; complete and everlasting, "nothing can be put to it, nor anything taken from it," ch. iii. 14. With this most perfect work of God he contrasts the work of man. The one goes silently and irresistibly on without any effort on the part of the great Worker. The other is a toilsome and fatiguing work; weak man puts forth upon it all his strength; yet with what result? Does his labour issue in the acquisition of any real and permanent good? So far from this, he finds to his bitter disappointment that he has wearied himself in vain, and, as he sinks exhausted, he is compelled to cry out, "Vanity of vanities! all is vanity."

Now, by attending to this contrast, which is constantly present to the mind of the writer, between the "work of man" and the "work of God," very great light is thrown upon the design and scope of the entire treatise. We discover at once what is the ALL, to which the stamp of vanity and emptiness is affixed. It includes every work of man which he undertakes as man, and which does not harmonize and fit in with the irresistible work of God. Man's work necessarily issues in vanity and disappointment in all cases in which it is not subordinated to, and made to form part of, God's work. When man's work comes into collision with God's work, it is inevitably dashed to pieces. And it is because man, partly from ignorance and partly from subjection to the sinful tendencies of his nature, does not usually work along with but against, though not always consciously against, God, that his most anxious toil issues in the attainment of no permanent good. But what then? Does the sacred writer stop here? By no means. There is a positive as well as a negative element in his teaching. His view of the contrasted works of God and man not only discloses the source of man's failures and disappointments, but likewise suggests the course which man must take in order that failure may as far as possible be avoided and success attained. He must renounce the independency to which he aspires, and be content to subordinate his own work to God's work. He must become a God-fearing man: that is the necessary condition of the attainment of permanent good. "Fear God and keep his commandments;" all labour, disjoined from the fear of God, is utter vanity, and however successful it may for a time appear, will be seen to be vanity in the end: "for God will bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or bad."

In the fear of God which the sacred writer thus inculcates, there is an active and a passive element. The work of God is partly known, partly unknown. Hence the duty of the God-fearing man is twofold: active concurrence in God's work so far as known and understood; patient acquiescence and cheerful contentment under all God's arrangements, even the darkest and most mysterious. The value of the latter of these two elements is most largely insisted on throughout the treatise, and constitutes one of its most marked characteristics, ch. ii. 24; iii. 12, 13, 22; v. 17 (18); viii. 15; ix. 7. The language employed by the sacred writer in these passages has been often misunderstood; and was in very early times the occasion of doubt being expressed as to the canonical authority of the book.¹ "That a man eat and drink and enjoy good in his labour," this is surely strange language, it has been said, for a sacred writer to make use of in conveying his idea of happiness, and certainly it sounds not unlike the language of the sensualist who says, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." But two things may be very like and yet be essentially different, even opposite in their nature. The same language, spoken by two different persons, may have two different meanings. An advice may be very excellent when addressed to one class of persons, which it would be most imprudent, nay, highly culpable to address to another class: according to the proverb, "what is one man's meat is another man's poison." With regard to the language just quoted, there can be no doubt that "to eat and to drink," or as it is given in ch. ix. 7, "to eat bread and to drink wine," means "to feast." Compare Ex. xxxii. 5, 6, "The people sat down to eat and to drink;" 1 Sa. xxx. 16; 1 Ki. i. 25; Je. xvi. 8. It is opposed to fasting, Is. xlii. 13; Zec. vii. 6. It is conjoined with שמחה, rejoicing, to describe the happy state of the people of Israel under the government of Solomon: "Judah and Israel were many as the sand which is by the sea in multitude, eating and drinking, and making merry," 1 Ki. iv. 20. Moreover, as feasting frequently formed part of the religious services of the Israelites, as of other ancient nations, we find the expression "eating and drinking" employed to describe not worldly joy merely, but also joy in God: "Go your way, eat the fat and drink the sweet, . . . for this day is holy unto the Lord, neither be ye sorry, for the joy of the Lord is your strength," Ne. viii. 10-12. It is also most important to notice that the same phrase, "to eat and to drink," is employed to describe the opposite of a rapacious, covetous spirit and conduct: "Did not thy father eat and drink, and do judgment and justice, then it was well with him (אָז נָחַם לֵב)?"

But thine eyes and heart are not but for thy covetousness (אֲכִלָּה), and to shed innocent blood," Je. xxii. 15.

From these passages it is clear that there is an "eating and drinking" which is quite consistent with piety, and which a sacred writer may commend without forfeiting his sacred character. It is not the feast of indolence which is commended; for the attentive reader will observe that in all the passages above quoted in which happiness is associated with eating and drinking, labour also is introduced as a necessary element. Still less is it the feast of impiety and sensuality; for it is associated throughout with well-doing and the fear of God. Labour and the fear of God are pre-supposed. It is the feast of quiet contentment, of sober enjoyment; the opposite at once of a life of indolence, and of a life of covetousness and grasping ambition: it is a life such as that which St. Paul commends when he says, "Be careful for nothing, but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God. And the peace of God which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus," Phi. iv. 6, 7. Comp. Mat. vi. 24-34.

That this passive element of the fear of God should so predominate throughout the book, seems to mark it out as the production of one of those dark periods in the history of the church, when patient submission under persecution, and contentment amid privations, were the duties most necessary to be inculcated and practised.

There is yet one other expression in ch. i. 3, which must not be overlooked, as it is one which will help us still further in coming to a right decision as to the true character and design of the whole treatise. I refer to the words, "under the sun," which recur no fewer than thirty times, chiefly in the earlier chapters. In ch. i. 13, we also find "under the heavens." The meaning of both expressions is the same, viz. in the land of the living. "Under the sun," is quite equivalent to "among those who see the sun," ch. vii. 11; xi. 7; xii. 2, i.e. among the living, ch. ii. 3, 17. Compare De. xxv. 19, and other passages, in which we meet with the phrase, "to destroy from under heaven," i.e. from among the living. In these words "under the sun," there is therefore implied a reference to the condition of man after life's close, when he has ceased to see the sun and has gone into darkness. The question with which this treatise commences, thus bears a close resemblance to that of our Lord: "What shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" Compare also the parable of the rich man and Lazarus.

There can be no doubt that the thought of death is that which presses most heavily upon the mind of the writer of this book. It is death which more than anything else stamps "vanity" upon all sublunary things. "One generation goeth and another cometh," ch. i. 4. Through the fear of death man is all his lifetime subject to bondage. It is a thunder-cloud which throws its dark shadow over the whole of his earthly existence. Man lives but to die, and, which is worse, over death he has no control, ch. viii. 8. He is the creature of an irresistible and inflexible law; in this not differing from the brutes, ch. iii. 19; nay, not differing from the material world in which he dwells, ch. i. 5-7. It seems to be with man just as with the rising and setting sun, the winds, the streams: constant flow, ceaseless motion, yet ever returning to the same point again: "all things continue as they were since the beginning of creation." Millions of toiling, scheming, restless men, live and die and are forgotten, followed by others who live, labour, die, and are forgotten, just as those who have gone before. Despite all this unceasing labour there is nothing new, ch. i. 9-11; the old is ever reproduced; so that human affairs seem to revolve in an endless round, and man, with all his high thoughts of himself, is but the creature of an all-governing law, which he is powerless to resist.

Now, in all this there is, as we have already seen, an implied contrast between the labour of man and the work of God (מְעֵשֵׂה הָאֱלֹהִים). Despite all man's labour, there is nothing new: it is the prerogative of God to create a new thing. And all hope for man lies in the promise of God that he will put forth this reserved power. "Remember ye not the former things, neither consider the things of old; behold! I will do a new thing," Is. xliii. 18, 19. He has promised to make with man a new covenant, Je. xxxi. 31; to give to him a new name, Is. lvi. 2; to put within him a new heart, Eze. xi. 19; xviii. 31; even to create new heavens and a new earth, so glorious that the former shall not be remembered nor come to mind, Is. lvi. 17. There is no doubt that it is some such radical change in man and man's condition as is described in these passages, that the Preacher has in view when he says, "There is nothing new under the sun." And thus we are again led to that which is the conclusion of the whole matter, "Fear God; remember God thy CREATOR," ch. xii. 1, 13: He alone can give thee a new heart, a new life, delivering thee from the bondage of sin and from the dread of death.

So again, where it is said, "there is no remembrance of former generations," ch. i. 11 (זְכוֹרָתָם, memorial), there is also an implied contrast. For, however it may be with man, with God the righteous is had in continual remembrance (לְיָמֵי עוֹלָם), Ps. cxli. a. By one of the prophets, He is described as causing to be written before him a book of remembrance (סֵפֶר זְכוֹרָתָם) for them that fear the Lord, and that think upon his name, Mal. iii. 16. And thus, the conclusion again returns, "Fear God, and keep his commandments:" though with man thou hast no memorial, thou shalt have a memorial with God; for "he shall bring into judgment every work, with every secret thing, whether it be good or bad."

It is, however, an exaggeration of the truth to affirm, as some have done, that the main design of the treatise is to establish the doctrines of the soul's immortality and of a future judgment. In this, as in the other Old Testament books, we find the doctrine of immortality still in the germ. In ch. iii. 21, indeed, it is either expressly affirmed or implied that there is a difference between the destiny of the spirit of man and the spirit of the brute. In ch. xii. 7, it is said that the "spirit of man returns to God who gave it." This of course points back to Ge. ii. 7, where we are taught that God formed man out of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life (נִשְׁמַת חַיִּים), and he became a נִפְשׁ חַיִּים. The Preacher teaches us that at death God takes back to himself the spirit which he gave, but this he says of all men alike, and it is evident he has as yet no joy in anticipating this return to God, for he immediately adds, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity," ch. xii. 8. We hear from him no such utterance as that of Paul—"to depart and be with Christ is far better:" for as yet life and immortality have not been brought to light. The silent gloom of death has not yet been broken by the voice of the Son of God. Compare ch. ix. 5, 9, 10.

It is only in its germ that immortality is here revealed. Its germ is faith and the fear of God. This is the scriptural order; the fear of God first, then eternal life. It is an error to reverse this order, and make the revelation of eternal life the foundation of the fear of God. The Old Testament saints, therefore, amid all their darkness, had firmly in their grasp that which is the root of immortality—faith, union with God. In this how different from the heathen poets and philosophers! The latter talk far more about the future life of the soul than the former; yet they know nothing of the true immortality, because they have not its foundation—the knowledge of God, union with God. Compare Mat. xxiii. 31, 32.

The fear of God is therefore to be regarded as the positive element in the teaching of Ecclesiastes, rather than the doctrine of immortality. Yet the latter, though not so prominent as some would represent it, is by no means kept altogether out of view. For the fear of God rests in great part upon the conviction that God is righteous, and that God's righteousness must sooner or later be manifested; and from such a conviction the doctrine of a future retribution cannot long be dissociated, ch. iii. 17; xii. 13, 14.

IV. Form and Arrangement.—Ecclesiastes stands alone among the Hebrew writings. The books to which it bears the closest relationship are Proverbs and Job: but in form it is distinguished in a very marked manner from both of these, as well as from the other scriptural books. It contains not a few proverbs, but it is not a collection of proverbs: it is a continuous composition, having one theme from beginning to end. It is, moreover, a book of argument, appealing not to authority but to reason and experience. It contains no "Thus saith the Lord," like the writings of the prophets: the author takes lower ground, he makes no claim to prophetic powers; he reasons with men on their own level, and builds his argument on what lies under the observation of every one. The book is also remarkable for the copious induction of particulars by which the general theme is illustrated and the final conclusion established. It is the production of a philosophic observer and reasoner, rather than of one endowed with prophetic intuition and enthusiasm, ch. i. 13, &c. And the whole course of observation and reasoning by which the author is led on to the conviction in which his mind ultimately rests, is laid bare before us. He makes his readers his confidants: he does not conceal the difficulties he had felt and the doubts that had risen in his mind: he even sometimes takes up what might be considered a sceptical position, giving free utterance to thoughts which some might have thought it more prudent to suppress, in order to show us how he found his way out of darkness into the light of faith. In some of these particulars Ecclesiastes bears a striking resemblance to Job, as well as in its general theme: yet in style of composition scarcely any two books can be more dissimilar, the one being as plain and homely (though not less forcible on that account) as the other is singularly elevated in thought and language.

With respect to arrangement of materials and train of thought and argument, we cannot of course expect in a treatise of eastern origin, written between two and three thousand years ago, the same regularity and logical sequence as would be demanded in any similar production of the modern European mind. It is a mistake, therefore, to map out Ecclesiastes into chapters and sections, as has frequently been done. At the same time there is an obvious advance, and a marked distinction between the close of the treatise and the commencement. There is an introduction, in which the theme is announced and the problem stated, ch. i. 1-11; and there is a conclusion, in which the result of the argument is most distinctly enunciated, ch. xii. 8-14. The intermediate chapters, i. 12-xii. 7, form the body of the treatise, in which by reflection, by argument, by a large induction of particulars, the way is prepared for the solution, so far as a solution is possible, of the problem stated at the commencement. This principal portion of the treatise has been variously divided; recently several writers of reputation have concurred in recommending the following fourfold division:—

- A. i. 12—ii. 26.
- B. iii. 1—v. 19 (20).
- C. vi. 1—viii. 15.
- D. viii. 16—xii. 8.

The first of these divisions (A, ch. i. 12—ii. 26) is very distinctly marked off from the others; but between B, C, and D the lines of separation are not very clearly traceable, unless we are to regard the recurrence of a leading thought as evidence sufficient that the argument has advanced another stage, and come to a pause. The primary division therefore is twofold:—

- α. i. 12—ii. 26.
- β. iii. 1—xii. 8.

In the former the experience of Solomon predominates; the author, if not Solomon himself, maintains throughout the assumed character of the wise and splendid king of Israel: in the latter this assumed character is almost entirely dropped, and the author appeals to the common experience of mankind. In the former the picture is dark in every part; vanity of vanities is stamped on every line: in the latter the darkness of the picture begins to be relieved by streaks of light, becoming gradually more and more distinct and cheering. In the former the vanity of man's labour is the theme throughout: in the latter the work of God, who hath made everything beautiful in its season, and the peace arising from the fear of God, are ever more and more largely dwelt on. In the second division (β, ch. iii. 1—xii. 8), viewed by itself, there is also a perceptible advance. The writer commences with a striking description of the work of God, as distinguished from the labour of man, "To every thing there is a season," &c. ch. iii. 1. In the system of divine providence each event has its place, its time, its cause, its consequences, all definitely arranged. Notwithstanding the infinite multiplicity of its parts, the work of God is one, and well ordered; and it is irresistible. If, therefore, man's work stands in the way of God's, there is but one possible result—man's work must perish. Hence the unprofitableness and vanity of man's work as man, ch. iii. 9. Man cannot follow the intricate windings of providence, ch. iii. 11, so as to adapt to them his own petty plans; neither is it possible for him, do what he may, to rule the course of events so as to command success independently of God, ch. iii. 14. The only resource is in faith, and the fear of God, ch. iii. 14.

The greater part of this, which is by far the largest division of the book, ch. iii. 1—xii. 8, is but an unfolding of the roll and record of human labours, on each and all of which the Preacher stamps "vanity of vanities." But as he advances, and at ever shortening intervals, the dreary catalogue of vanities is interrupted, and the Preacher gives utterance to some cheering certainty, on which his soul may rest as on a firm foundation (as, "God hath made every thing beautiful in its season," ch. iii. 11; "God shall judge the righteous and the wicked," ch. iii. 17; "In the multitude of dreams, &c., but fear thou God," ch. v. 7; "God made man upright," ch. vii. 29; "Though a sinner do evil an hundred times and his days be prolonged, yet surely I know that it shall be well with them that fear God," ch. viii. 12); or to some sentiment or admonition naturally arising from the course of reflection he is pursuing. These last are too numerous to specify; they embrace those portions of the book which bear the closest resemblance to the book of Proverbs, as ch. iv. 6, 9-12; v. 1, &c. The duty, to the commendation of which, as already remarked, the Preacher most frequently reverts, as one specially seasonable in the troublous times in which probably he lived, is that of contentment, quiet acquiescence in the decrease and cheerful enjoyment of the gifts of God, ch. iii. 12, 22; v. 18; viii. 15; ix. 7-10. The practical aim of the treatise is most fully and unambiguously brought out towards the close, ch. xi. 1-12. 7, from which it plainly appears that the author is not, as some have imagined, a gloomy misanthrope, who looks on everything with a jaundiced eye; but a believer in God, who strives even when his spirit is most sad and overwhelmed, to behold everything in the light of God, and seeks to lead men to the true good by leading them to a life of faith in God. "Remember THY CREATOR in the days of thy youth." The treatise concludes with a special appeal to the young to make choice of that true peace which flows from piety and the fear of God, and not allow themselves to be deluded by the glitter of worldly joys, ch. xi. 9—xii. 2; an appeal enforced by the striking picture of old age feeble and tremulous, by which the record of the vanity of human labour is so fittingly closed.

V. Canonical Authority.—The doubts on this subject, which occasionally even in early times found expression within the synagogue and the church, were never able to shake the dominant sentiment and belief, that the author of Ecclesiastes was one of the favoured few who wrote "as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." And the authoritative decision of the church-teachers is amply confirmed by the internal character of the book. Nowhere even in the sacred Scriptures is the vanity of all sublunary things depicted so overpoweringly. The utterances of the book, indeed, by their boldness often startle and surprise. The tongue of scepticism appears to be allowed an excess of license. But this is no indication of the absence of inspiration; rather the reverse. Shrinking timidity and smooth propriety characterize the words of man; but the words of the Spirit of God are ever characterized by bold and fearless honesty. Who does not feel that the absence of Ecclesiastes from the Old Testament would create a blank which no skill of man could fill up! Moreover, in the pages of the New Testament, we frequently catch the echo of Ecclesiastes. And no wonder. For no teaching could form a more fitting preparation for the full revelation of the world to come than the teaching of this book, in which the vanity of the world that now is so impressively displayed. Mat. v. 3, 4 (Ec. vi. 2)—Mat. vi. 7 (Ec. v. 2)—Mat. vi. 19, 20, 24-34; xi. 19; Mar. viii. 36; Lu. xii. 20 (Ec. vi. 2)—Jn. iii. 8 (Ec. xi. 6)—Jn. ix. 4 (Ec. ix. 10)—Rom. x. 2; 1 Co. i. 20; 2 Co. v. 10; Col. iv. 6 (Ec. x. 12)—1 Th. iv. 3, 4; vi. 6, 17; 1 Jn. ii. 17; Ja. i. 19 (Ec. iv. 17; v. 1 [v. 1, 2]).

[In the critical study of Ecclesiastes, as indeed of most of the Hebrew writings, the most valuable aid is derived from the Hebrew Concordance. Of the numerous commentaries on Ecclesiastes, a most elaborate account is given by Mr. Ginsburg (Ekklesieth, or the Book of Ecclesiastes, Translated, &c., by Christian D. Ginsburg, 1861). To the English student, the Messrs. Clark have rendered the Commentary of Hengstenberg easily accessible. The Expositions of Holden, Noyes, and Moses Stuart, are held in estimation. Practical Lectures on Ecclesiastes are numerous; such as the volumes of the late Dr. Wardlaw, and more recently those of Dr. Buchanan and Mr. Bridges.]

[D. H. W.]

ECCLESIASTICUS, one of the books which compose the Apocrypha, has often been ascribed to Solomon, and by many Roman Catholic authorities is called the fifth book of Solomon, but without any foundation. The fifth council of Carthage unfortunately gave the first wrong decision on this point, and Rome can hence claim for it a certain amount of patristic authority. That the book may embody many wise sayings, which obtained currency from the time of Solomon, and which may therefore, in a qualified sense, be ascribed to him, no one will doubt. But as the book itself contains indubitable evidence of being the production of a later age (for example, refers to the captivity, ch. xiv. 24, 25), and professes, in the preface, to be nothing more than the collected wisdom of a learned scribe who lived subsequent to the times of the law and the prophets—there is no ground whatever for assigning it a higher origin, or investing it with a strictly canonical authority. It professes, in its existing form, to be a Greek translation, by Jesus the son of Sirach, of a Hebrew production left by his grandfather, also a Jesus, son of Sirach. What authority should be attached to such a statement it is difficult to say; it is received by many and disputed by some; certainly nothing has ever been seen by any public authorities of a Hebrew original, and in the Greek form alone is it known to the church. The Jesus who presented it to the public is supposed to have lived in the second century before Christ, and to have issued this work about B.C. 130. Though an uninspired production, and therefore not entitled to a place in the Scriptures of the Old Testament, it is undoubtedly by much the best of its class. (See APOCRYPHA.)

EDEN [pleasure or delight], the original residence of the first human pair. It also bears, in all modern European languages, the name of Paradise, from the translations given by the Septuagint and Vulgate to גן (gan), garden. This, in the Septuagint, is παράδεισος, in the Latin, paradisus, or in English, paradise. Instead of God being said to plant a garden in Eden, according to the Septuagint it is, he planted a paradise in Eden; and the Vulgate, by giving the sense of Eden, makes it a paradise of pleasure (paradisus voluptatis). Paradise, however, is simply another and later Hebrew term for garden, and occurs in three passages of the Old Testament, Cant. iv. 13; Ec. ii. 5, where it is rendered orchard, and Na. ii. 8, in which forest has been adopted as the equivalent. The word is properly pardes, and is supposed to have been imported into the Hebrew from the Armenian or Persian. Like gan, it denotes garden in the wider sense—a large inclosure or park, planted with trees for use and ornament, and so approaching more nearly to the nature of an orchard than to that of a forest.

The account given in Genesis of the garden of Eden is not such as to enable us to identify its place with any existing locality. "And the Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden; and there he put the man he had formed. And out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight, and good for food; the tree of life also in the midst of the garden, and the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. And a river went out of Eden to water the garden; and from thence it was parted, and became into four heads. The name of the first is Pison; it is that which compasseth the whole land of Havilah, where there is gold; and the gold of that land is good; there is bdellium (bedolach), and the onyx-stone (shoham). And the name of the second river is Gihon. It is the same that compasseth the whole land of Ethiopia (Cush). And the name of the third river is Hiddekel; it is that which goeth toward the east of (or rather eastward to) Assyria. And the fourth river is the Euphrates (Phrat)," Ge. ii. 8-14. Some parts of this description seem to be intelligible enough to those who know only the post-diluvian world, and this has led many eminent scholars into the belief that the whole, by dint of learned inquiry, or etymological and geographical explanations, could be made fully out. There can be no doubt that the river called Phrat in the original is the same with the Euphrates, and that Hiddekel appears elsewhere to be applied in Scripture to the river Tigris, Da. x. 5. Assyria also is a well-known region, and has the Tigris as one of its great rivers. But what precisely is the land of Cush or Ethiopia—a term that is known to be variously used in Scripture? What or where is the land of Havilah? or the rivers Pison and Gihon? Of these we have no certain information whatever; and after centuries of research and speculation we are not one whit farther advanced, nor have inquiries been able to come nearer to an agreement, than when the matter was first broached. Even if we could, with some measure of certainty, learn what particular countries and rivers were here meant by the names of Havilah, Cush, Pison, Gihon, it would help us very little to a satisfactory conclusion, for the statement in respect to the site of the garden of Eden plainly is, not only that it was somehow connected with four rivers, but that these four rivers had their origin in the garden, flowed through the garden as an undivided copious stream, and afterwards fell into the fourfold division mentioned under the names Pison, Gihon, Hiddekel, and Euphrates. This seems the clear meaning of the words; and to explain them, as Bochart and others have done, by supposing that the river was one indeed, while passing through the region which formed the garden, but that the four heads, or principal divisions, consisted of two (the Tigris and Euphrates), flowing into it and coalescing as they entered the territory of Eden, and again, after leaving it, dividing into two, and forming the main streams by which the river reached the Caspian Sea, is entirely arbitrary. The river, it is expressly said, went out of Eden, had its source there, and from thence—that is, on its leaving Eden—it became parted into four heads or leading divisions. Now, nothing can be more certain than that there is no region in the known habitable world in which these conditions meet. And on the supposition that the statement is of a strictly historical nature (which we have no reason to doubt), there is room for but one conclusion, namely, that the description, whether written immediately by the pen of Moses, or handed down to him from primeval times, has respect to a state of things which, to a considerable extent, was broken up and changed by the deluge. It is impossible that, after such a catastrophe, the outward aspect of the world could have remained altogether what it formerly was; and it is not improbable that, in the regions over which it more especially prevailed, alterations took place in the relative heights of districts, and consequently in the direction of rivers. Indeed, to elevations and depressions in the earth's surface, caused by volcanic agencies, the catastrophe, in its physical character, may probably be in great part ascribed. Hence, while the general features of the region may have continued after the flood much as before, and some of the names of rivers and districts that had prevailed in the old world would naturally be retained in the new, it was not to be expected that the precise position of matters in the original garden of Eden should be found any longer to exist.

The circumstance that the description does not suit any actual locality in the post-diluvian world, and that some of the names employed—Pison, Gihon, Havilah—are left altogether indefinite in the records of Old Testament history, render it probable that the account was simply adopted by Moses as one of the accredited memorials of an earlier age. It is hardly to be supposed that, if for the first time communicated to the world by the handwriting of Moses, there should have been no indication of the change of circumstances which hindered the applicability of the description to any known locality. This is the more probable, as in other parts of the Mosaic writings, in which reference is made to things of the olden time, explanations are often thrown in to make the historical statements properly intelligible; for example, Ge. xiv. 8; xxviii. 19; De. ii. 10-12, 20-23. We are therefore inclined to regard the description of paradise in the second chapter of Genesis as a primeval record, in form as well as in substance, and on this account especially incapable of being identified with any particular region with which we have the means of making ourselves acquainted; for the relative position and external aspect of things had become too much changed by the action of the deluge to admit of it.

Delitzsch, one of the latest and ablest commentators on Genesis, differs in respect to this view of the record. He thinks that, according to the author's mode of contemplation, "paradise had, when he wrote, been obliterated from the earth; and this he certainly did not conceive of without a violent disturbance in the relation of the rivers to the land of Eden." But he entirely concurs (as does also Richers, Die Schöpfung Paradieses und Sündfluthgeschichte, p. 228, seq.) in the view we have given of the subject itself. "It is impossible," he says, "to reconcile the geographical statements of the author, regarding the rivers of paradise, with our knowledge of the present form of the earth's surface, in a satisfactory manner." He then refers to the explanatory schemes of various writers, in particular of Von Raumer, Buttman, and Bertheau, which, however, he admits, yield no certain result, and expresses his belief in the probability of changes having taken place in the relative altitudes of districts and the courses of rivers in that part of the world. "It is therefore unnecessary," he concludes, "in order to establish the geographical statements of the sacred writer, that we should be able still to point to four distinct streams (the Tigris and Euphrates among them), proceeding from a single source, which is plainly impossible. The original oneness of the four streams is, in the sense of the author, as certainly at an end as that paradise is lost." He adds—"Pison, Gihon, Tigris, and Euphrates, are only the remains of those four streams into which the paradise-river originally divided itself, and which bore the blessings of paradise into all the world." But this is advancing somewhat into the regions of fancy, as it still remains matter of doubtful speculation what existing rivers are to be identified with, or approach nearest to, Pison and Gihon.

Baumgarten, in his Theological Commentary on the Pentateuch, had already propounded substantially the same view of the subject as has now been given, with no further difference than that he makes it somewhat more specific. While he regards the deluge as having necessarily disfigured and changed to a considerable extent the earth's surface, he still thinks a general similarity remained; and we may hence conceive "that from the region of Armenia a river flowed, and then divided itself into four branches, of which the two eastern corresponded to the rivers afterwards denominated [and why not also denominated in primeval times?] the Euphrates and the Tigris; and the two western had their course through Arabia, which, by a subsequent elevation, rose somewhat above the original river-bed." That he is right in indicating Armenia as the region within which lay the site of the garden of Eden, is highly probable from the notices themselves we have upon the subject, and also from the general current of tradition, which pointed to that quarter as the original seat of the human family.

Those who wish to see a detailed account of the different schemes that have been framed to explain the narrative in Genesis in conformity with existing geographical knowledge, may consult Morini Dissert. de Paradis. Terres. in Bochartii Opp.; Marckii Hist. Parad. Illustrata; Schulthees, das Paradies; Faber's Archaeology; or Rosenmüller's Biblical Geography, vol. i., as given in Clark's Biblical Cabinet, No. xi. p. 46-97. The difficulties connected with a real geographical solution have given rise in Germany to several mythical explanations, in which the biblical narrative of the garden of Eden is treated much as modern scholars treat the ancient classical tradition of the gardens of the Hesperides. Some account is given of these arbitrary schemes in Winer's Real. Wörterbuch, article "Eden," to which we simply refer, as we deem them of no value in respect to the object for which they are more immediately produced.

In respect to the garden itself, there can be no doubt that it is presented to our view as the region of complete earthly satisfaction—of life in its immortal freshness and beauty. It was the earth's centre, as the habitation of rational and perfect humanity—the seat of that dominion which was given to man as the deputy and image of God, and from which he was gradually—had he stood in his original position—to extend his sway, and the blessings of his ample heritage, over the other regions of the habitable globe. There, as our great poet has sung in immortal verse, nature concentrated her whole wealth, so as to make—

"A heaven on earth,
A happy rural seat of various view;
Groves, whose rich trees wept odorous gums and balm;
Others, whose fruit, burnished with golden rind, Hung amiable—Hesperian fables true—
If true, here only, and of delicious taste.

Betwixt them lawns, or level downs, and flocks
Grazing the tender herb, were interposed.
The birds their quire apply; airs, vernal airs,
Breathing the smell of field and grove, attune
The trembling leaves, while universal Pan,
Knit with the graces and the hours in dance,
Led on eternal spring."—Paradise Lost, iv.

Happy, indeed, if it could but have continued, and Adam, faithful to his trust, had preserved for himself and his offspring such a dowry of life and blessing. But here, as in everything that concerns the more peculiar glory of God, the moral was made to rule the natural; and as our first parents failed to abide in the holy obedience on which the whole was suspended, it fell from their grasp, and thenceforth stood related to them and their posterity as a forfeited inheritance. But the spiritual aspects of the matter are discussed elsewhere. (See ADAM.)

EDOM [redness], a name given, from a characteristic incident in his life, to the elder-born of Isaac's sons, and afterwards to his land and people, Ge. xiv. 30. (See ESHAU, IDUMEA.)

EDREI [strong], the name of a fortified city; and indeed, 1. First and chiefly of the capital of the ancient Batanea, and if not the capital, at least one of the chief cities, of the still more ancient kingdom of Baahna, Nu. xxi. 33; De. i. 4; III. 10; Joa. xii. 4. It is only mentioned in Scripture as the place at, or near which, Og the king of Baahna resided, and in the neighbourhood of which the Israelites completely routed his forces; after which, of course, it became part of the Israelitish territory, and was included in the portion assigned to the half-tribe of Manasseh. Its precise position, however, is still a matter of some uncertainty. In the Onomasticon of Eusebius it bears the name of Adraa, and is placed at the distance of 25 Roman miles from Bosra, and 6 from Astaroth. In modern times it has commonly been identified with Der'a, but Mr. Porter (Handbook of Syria and Palestine, p. 632) prefers the ruins of a place some miles farther south, bearing the name of Edr'a. Both sites are in the Hauran, in that division of it which is called the Lejah; and whichever of the two is adopted, the position of the place must have been very nearly straight east from the southern extremity of the Sea of Tiberias, and at a distance of from 25 to 30 miles. The ruins at both the sites are pretty extensive, covering a space of nearly three miles in circumference, and possessing much of the same character. They are of the Greek order, and belong to Christian times. The chief reason why Mr. Porter prefers the site of the modern Edr'a to that of the ancient Edrei is its stronger position, being situated on a rocky promontory, which rises from 20 to 30 feet above the surrounding plain, and being inaccessible except through narrow defiles and precipitous rocks. Some Arab families still occupy the few houses which remain.

2. Another Edrei belonged to the tribe of Naphtali, Joa. xii. 37; but nothing certain is known of it.

EGLAH [heifer], one of David's wives, the last mentioned in two lists, and the mother of one son, Ithream, 2Sa. iii. 5; 1 Ch. iii. 3. Each time the name is given with the emphatic addition "his wife," which has led some to suppose that Eglah might be but another name of Michal, David's original and proper wife. But this is not likely.

EGLAIM, Is. xv. 8, probably the same as EN-EGLAIM (which see).

EGLON [ca/king]. A king of Moab, who, after the disasters that had befallen the Moabite race under the hand of Moses, rallied its scattered forces, and made severe reprisals upon the Israelites. In connection with the Amalekites and Ammonites, he brought the people on the further side of Jordan into subjection, and even carried his conquests into the interior of the land of Canaan, so far at least as to get possession of Jericho, and to make it one of his headquarters, Ju. iii. 13. It was probably in that city that he was slain by Ehud; but while the sacred record relates various particulars regarding the manner of his death, it does not distinctly mention the place where the blow was struck. Eglon held the eastern portion of the Israelites in bondage for eighteen years.

EGLON, the name also of an ancient city in Canaan, whose king, Debir, formed one of the five Amorite kings that laid siege to Gibeon, and were overthrown by Joshua, Joa. x. 3. The city itself was taken by Joshua, and all its inhabitants destroyed, Joa. x. 36. Its site is still matter of dispute (Robinson, Researches, ii. 392; Porter, Handbook, p. 202).

EGYPT (Greek, Αἴγυπτος: Hebrew, Misr or Misraim, from the son of Ham; in the language of the country in hieroglyphics,  Chem or Chemi—which signifies the black land; and by the Arabs of the present day,  Misr); a country in the north-eastern part of  Africa, latitude at Assouan, 24° 6', and at Bourlos, 31° 36" N.; longitude at Akabah-el-Solourn, 25° E.; and river El Ariah, 84° E.; and bounded on the north by the Mediterranean Sea, on the east by the Isthmus of Suez and the Red Sea, on the south by Nubia, and on the west by the Libyan Desert. The greatest breadth of Egypt is about 250 miles, comprehending the Greater Oasis, the Lesser Oasis, and the Oasis of Ammon; but inhabited Egypt is confined to the valley of the Nile, which in the widest part does not exceed 80 miles, while for its general length the width is only from 10 to 15 miles, decreasing at the southern boundary to 2 miles. Throughout the entire length of the country run two ranges of lofty mountains, the Arabian Hills on the east, and the Libyan on the west, and through the centre of the valley thus formed runs the Nile, called in the translation of the Bible the great river of Egypt, for the name does not appear, though it occurs in the original text. Of the sources of the Nile, all that we know is that, about 7° south of Assouan, three rivers unite to form the waters of the Nile—1st, the White river, flowing from snowy mountains south of the equator; 2d, the Blue river, rising in Abyssinia; and 3d, the Tacaze or Abara, the Astaboras of Strabo, the eastern source. From the cataracts at Assouan, the Nile flows northward through Upper Egypt, until it reaches lat. 30° 15', where it divides into two main streams, the Heracleotic (now the Rosetta) mouth to the west; and the Phatnitic (now the Damietta) mouth to the east, the other five mouths which formerly existed being now silted up. These two streams, conjoined with a third springing a little higher up, inclose that portion of land known as the Delta, from its resemblance to the Greek letter Δ, and which owes its existence to the deposits of alluvial matter brought down the stream. The Nile has no tides, but a current at the rate of two and a half or three miles an hour constantly running towards the sea, and the stream is always deep enough for navigation. The water is usually of a blue colour, but it becomes a reddish brown during the overflow: it is esteemed highly salubrious. The most remarkable phenomenon connected with the river is its annual regular increase, arising from the periodical rains which fall within the tropics. As rain rarely falls in Egypt, the prosperity of the country entirely depends upon this overflowing of the river, for on the subsiding of the water the land is found to be covered with a brown slimy deposit, which so fertilizes the otherwise barren soil that it produces two crops a year, while beyond the limits of the inundation there is no cultivation whatsoever. The Nile begins to rise in June, and continues to increase until September, overflowing the low lands along its course, the waters being conveyed by canals where natural channels fail. The Delta then looks like an immense marsh interspersed with islands, villages, towns, and plantations, just above the level of the water. The water remains stationary for a few days, when it gradually begins to subside, until about the end of October the land is left dry again. The seed is then sown, and an artificial irrigation is continued in two different ways, viz. by means of the water-wheel, or by the instrument called e'shadouf. The first consists of a horizontal wheel turned by one or two oxen, which sets in motion a vertical drum, over which is slung a chaplet of earthen jars, which scoop up the water and bring it to a trough on a level with the drum. Into this trough each jar empties itself in succession, and the water is conducted by an inclined channel into the plantation, which had been previously divided into compartments of one or two yards square, by raising the mould into walls or ridges of five or six inches in height. Into these compartments the cultivator forms an entrance for the water, by depressing a little space in the ridge or wall with the sole of his foot; and this overlooking of the channels of irrigation, and adjustment of the openings from one compartment to the other with the foot, is continued till the cultivator is assured by the growth of the plants that each compartment is daily and duly supplied with its proper quantity of water. To this peculiarity in the cultivation of the soil of Egypt, whether for corn or other production, allusion is made in De. xi. 10.

The second means of raising water, namely, the shadouf, consists of a leathern bucket slung at one end of a pole, which has a weight at the other, a contrivance by which the cultivator is enabled to scoop up the water considerably below his feet, and raise it with comparative ease to the mouth of a channel on a level with his breast. This last mode of raising water is depicted on the walls of the ancient tombs of Egypt, and also in the sculptures from Nineveh, by which we learn that the "hanging gardens," or those plantations on the artificial mounds of that celebrated city, were irrigated. The land is soon covered with green crops, which last till February, and the harvest is in March. An elevation of the river of 16 cubits, or about 26 feet, is essential to secure the prosperity of the country; and as that elevation subsides, the chaplet of buckets is lengthened, or the number of shadoufs are increased. Should the Nile rise above this height, it does great damage, and involves the population in distress; while if it should not attain the ordinary height, there is deficiency of crops and famine; but so regular are the operations of nature that, with rare exceptions, the inundations are nearly uniform. The rate of the deposit of mud is supposed to be about 6 inches in a century.

Ancient Egypt was divided into three parts—1st, the Thebaid, and 2d, the Heptanomos, which together were called Upper Egypt—3d, the Delta, or Lower Egypt, where the Nile divides and reached the Mediterranean by eight natural and two false mouths: these were, beginning on the west, the Canopic, the Heracleotic, the Bolbitine; the Sebennytic, the Pineptime false mouth, the Diolcos false mouth, the Phatnitic, the Mendesian (Menzelah), the Tanitic (Moes), and the Pelusiatic mouth. Egypt was also divided into forty-nine provinces or nomes, each with a chief city; but these were not always the same, nor had they always the same boundaries, as the country round a great city was occasionally called its nome.

Climate.—The atmosphere in Egypt is extremely clear and dry, the temperature regular and exceedingly hot, though the heat is tempered during the daytime for nine months of the year by the strong wind which blows from the north, and which enables vessels to ascend the river against the stream. The winter months are the most delightful part of the year, the air being cool and balmy, and the ground covered with verdure; later, the ground becomes parched and dry; and in May the suffocating khamseen, or simoom, begins to blow into the valley from the desert plains on each side of it, raising clouds of fine sand, and causing various diseases, until the rising of the river again comes to bless the land. It rains but rarely, except near the seaboard. At Memphis the rain falls perhaps three or four times in the course of a year, and in Upper Egypt only once or twice, if at all; but at night the dews are heavy and the air cool and refreshing: showers of hail sometimes reach the borders of Egypt, but the formation of ice is very uncommon. Earthquakes are occasionally felt, and thunder and lightning are neither frequent nor violent. Egypt is not remarkably healthy, as in addition to visitations of plague and cholera, ophthalmia, diarrhoea, dysentery, and boils are very prevalent.

Geology and Mineralogy.—The hilly region which separates Egypt from Nubia is composed of granitic rocks, which terminate at Assouan (Syene), and extend up the shore of the Red Sea to near the Gulf of Suez. The Arabian and Libyan hills are both composed of cretaceous strata, the predominant rock being limestone. This sandstone extends from Assouan to Esmé, about 85 miles, where it is covered by a limestone of the upper chalk series. From thence for 130 miles the valley is bounded with a tertiary nummulite limestone. Over a great extent of Egypt the rocks are covered with moving sands, and in the lands bordering on the Nile by the alluvium deposited during the inundations, and which consists of an argillaceous earth or loam, more or less mixed with sand and quartzose sand. The sedimentary deposit has no traces of stratification. The minerals used in buildings, sculpture, vases, &c., were found in the rock formations of the country. Granite, syenite, and basalt were obtained from Assouan, sandstone from Silsilis, alabaster from Tel-el-Amarna, limestone from Beni-hassan and from Toora, breccia from the Cousseir Road, porphyry from the quarries of Gebel-Dohan, emeralds from the mines of Gebel-Zabara, gold from the mines in Upper Egypt, and iron from the desert plains of Nubia, natron from the lakes in the Oasis of Ammon, hence called sal-ammoniac. Bitumen, salt, and sulphur are also among the other minerals of Egypt.

Botany.—It would appear that, anciently as now,

Egypt did not produce timber; the only trees, besides the palm and tamarisk, being the sycamore, fig, and acacia or gum-arabic tree, which last does not attain to any size north of Wady Halfa. The papyrus plant, once so important, is now nowhere to be found in the country. Of it was manufactured a paper, which was supplied to all the ancient world. Boats, baskets, cords, and shoes were also made of it. The disappearance of this important plant seems to have been prophetically announced in Is. xix. 7. Besides the lotus or water-lily of the Nile, Egypt has always been celebrated for its production of corn, barley, a great variety of the bean class, leeks, garlic, onions, flax, and for plants of the cucumber tribe, as we learn from the sculptures and from several passages in holy Writ, and they are still abundant as ever. To the products of ancient times have been added the sugar-cane, cotton plant, indigo, and tobacco. Wine was abundantly produced in Egypt, and the sculptures bear ample testimony to the extent to which the ancient Egyptians indulged in intoxicating draughts.

Zoology.—Egyptian oxen were celebrated in the ancient world. The camel was introduced by the Ptolemies: horses and asses abounded. The giraffe is found on the southern borders; the hyæna, jackal, ichneumon, and jerboa are common; and the hippopotamus and crocodile formerly reached the Delta, but they are now seldom seen below Lycopolis (E'siout). Water-fowl were plentiful, and were anciently prepared and salted like the fish of the Nile, as we learn from the sculptures, and must have been a great source of wealth; representations are found of such birds as the ostrich, the vulture, the hawk, the heron, &c. The crocodile, serpents, the asp, and other reptiles are common. The Nile abounds in fish, and the trionyx or soft tortoise is not infrequent. Among the countless insects are the sacred beetle (Scarabæus sacer), the locust, and mosquito. The ibis, formerly so common, is now extinct. Many of the animals, birds, and reptiles were held sacred by the people: whoever killed a sacred animal, an ibis, or a hawk, was put to death. If a cat died a natural death, every person in the house shaved his eyebrows; if a dog died, the whole body and the head were shaved. The cats were buried at Bubastis—the dogs in the vaults of their own cities; field-mice and hawks at Buto; the ibis at Hermopolis; and other animals where they were found lying. Of all animals the sacred calf Apis was the most revered. The chief temple of this god was at Memphis. The females being sacred to Isis were thrown into the Nile, which was considered sacred, and the males were buried at Sakkara, where their tombs have lately been discovered by M. Mariette.

Religion.—The two main principles on which the religion of Egypt was based appear to have been the existence of an omnipotent Being, whose various attributes being deified, formed a series of divinities; and the deification of the sun and moon. Not only was every attribute of the Divinity made into a separate deity, but imaginary gods were invented to assume some office relating either to the duties or future state of mankind. Even the imaginary genii of the nomes, cities, or rivers, were worshipped as gods, and each month and day were consecrated to a deity (Herod. ii. 82). Each divinity formed a triad with a wife and sister, and a son. The great triads were composed of the principal divinities, the first two members being frequently of equal rank, and the third subordinate, as in the case of Osiris, Isis, and Horus, or Amun, Maut, and Khonso. Other triads are formed of deities of an inferior class; and occasionally a sort of triad was composed of two deities and the king. While the worship of some of the triads was peculiar to particular places, the worship of others was universal—that of Osiris, Isis, and Horus, for example, having prevailed all over Egypt. The eight great gods of the first order are stated to be Neph, Amun-Re, Pthah, Khem, Sâté, Maut, Bubastis (?), Neith. The most important of those of the second order are Re (the sun), Atmoo, Thoth (the moon), Athor, Amunta, Maudoo, Seb, Netpe, Ranno. The Egyptians believed in an author of evil, who was called Typhon; and the antagonism of good and evil is shown by the opposition of the solar gods and the dragon Apophis, and the hostility between Osiris and Typhon. The Egyptians believed in the transmigration of souls, and in the existence of a future state, in which mankind would be rewarded or punished according to their actions while on earth. There is also a distinct allusion to a resuscitation of the body, as we gather from the many representations of the soul returning to animate it, and likewise a curious picture bearing a strong allusion to the resurrection, and the two natures of man, the earthy and the spiritual. (Triple Mummy Case of Aroeri-ro, by Sharpe and Bonomi.) Copious details and illustrations of the religion of the Egyptians will be found in Jablonaki's Pantheon, Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt., &c.; and for the impurities connected with it, see article CALF-WORSHIP.

History.—The Egyptians are the earliest people known to us as a nation. When Abraham entered the Delta from Canaan, they had been long enjoying the advantages of a settled government and established laws. They had already built cities, practised agriculture, and parcelled out their valley into farms. They revered a landmark as a god, while their neighbours knew of no property but herds and moveables. They had invented hieroglyphics, and improved them into syllabic writing, and almost into an alphabet. They had invented records, and wrote their kings' names and actions on the massive temples which they raised. As we have no means authentic of counting the ages during which this civilization was progressing, we shall overlook those years when the gods were said to have reigned on the earth, and the times of Menes, the fabulous founder of the monarchy, and regard history as beginning with the earliest remaining records, namely, the temple at Karnak and the obelisk at Heliopolis, both raised by Osirtisen I. of Thebes; the great pyramids built by Suphis and Sensuphis, kings of Memphis; with the tablets in the copper mines near Sinai, which record the conquest of that country by Suphis, and prove that those mines had been already worked by the Egyptians. Such, then, was the state of Egypt in the time of Abraham, about 1600 or 1700 B.C. The country was divided into several little kingdoms, whose boundaries cannot now be exactly known. In the valley to the south of Silsilis was the kingdom of Elephantine; next was the kingdom of Thebes, which perhaps included all the valley to the east of the Nile, for it had a port at Ænum on the Red Sea, and thus traded with Arabia. On the west of the river was the kingdom of This or Abydos, which had some trade with the Great Oasis and the kingdom of Heracleopolis. Embracing the western half of the Delta was the kingdom of Memphis, which in the reign of Suphis had been strong enough to conquer Thebes and the peninsula of Sinai. In the east of the Delta were the kingdoms of Bubastis and Tanis.

It was in the time of these petty monarchies that the Chaldean and Phœnician herdsmen were moving westward and settling quietly in the Delta, till after a few generations they took possession of some of the cities and levied a tribute from the Egyptians. Their sovereigns, called the Hyksos or shepherd-kings, dwelt at Abaris—probably the city afterwards called Heliopolis—and they held their ground in Egypt for about six reigns. The tyranny of the Hyksos led the states of Egypt to unite against them; and Amasis, king of Thebes, making common cause with the kings of the other parts of Egypt, the hateful Phœnicians were defeated and driven from the country, probably about 1450 B.C., and 200 years after the reign of Osirtisen I. With Amasis and the expulsion of the Hyksos began the reigns of those great Theban kings, whose temples, and statues, and obelisks, and tombs, have for more than 3000 years made the valley of the Nile a place of interest. The kings of the other parts of Egypt sank to the rank of sovereign priests. Amunothph I. gained Ethiopia by marriage. Thothmosis II. added Memphis to his dominions by his marriage with Queen Nitocris, the builder of the third pyramid. Thothmosis IV. built the temple between the fore paws of the great Sphinx. Amunothph III. set up his two gigantic statues in the plain of Thebes, one of which uttered its musical notes every morning at sunrise. Oimenephthah I. added to the temples of Thebes and of Abydos. Rameses II. (Sesostris) covered Egypt and Ethiopia, and the coasts of the Red Sea, with his temples, obelisks, and statues. He was successful against the neighbouring Arabs, and marched through Palestine to the shores of the Black Sea. Rameses III. still further adorned Thebes with his architecture. It was at the beginning of this period, before Memphis was united to Thebes, that the Israelites settled in the Delta, and that Joseph, as chief minister of the king of Memphis, changed the laws of Lower Egypt. It was after Thebes and Memphis were united, when Joseph's services had been forgotten, that Moses led his countrymen out of Egypt to escape the tyranny of their masters. The wealth of the Egyptians at this time was proverbial, and the still existing monuments of their magnificence prove the high civilization of the country. The Jewish nation was weak and struggling with difficulties before the reign of David; the history of Greece begins with the Trojan war; but before the time of David and the Trojan war, the power and glory of Thebes had passed away. Upper Egypt sank under the rising power of the Delta. Theban prosperity had lasted for about 500 years.

B.C. 990.—On the fall of Thebes, Shishank of Bubastis, the conqueror of Rehoboam, governed all Egypt, and recorded on the walls of the great Theban temple his victories over the Jews. After his death Egypt was torn to pieces by civil wars, and Zerah king of Ethiopia was able to march through the whole length of the land. For a few reigns the kingdom was governed by kings of Tanis. Then the kings of Ethiopia ruled in Thebes, and led the armies of Egypt to aid the Israelites against their Assyrian oppressors. This unsettled state of affairs lasted nearly 300 years, during which, as the prophet Isaiah had foretold, Egyptians fought against Egyptians, every one against his brother and against his neighbour; city against city, and kingdom against kingdom. The city of Sais at length obtained the mastery by the aid of the number of Greeks that had settled there, and of the skill in arms of the Greek mercenaries whom the kings of Sais took into their pay. The kings of Sais were more despotic than the kings of Thebes, but under their rule Egypt again enjoyed a high degree of prosperity. They struggled with the Babylonians for the dominion of Judea—Psammeticus conquered Ethiopia—Necho began the canal from the Nile to the Red Sea. His sailors circumnavigated Africa; he conquered Jerusalem; and when the Chaldees afterwards drove back the Egyptian army, the remnant of Judah, with the prophet Jeremiah, retreated into Egypt, to seek a refuge with king Hophra. The colony of Greeks at Naucratis, a little below Sais, now became of importance. The Greek philosophers, Thales and Solon, visited the country. Hecataeus of Miletus went up as high as Thebes, and Pythagoras dwelt many years among the priests. But Egyptian greatness rested on a weak foundation; jealousy increased between the native soldiers and the Greek mercenaries; the armies had to encounter the powerful and ambitious monarchies of Asia, and, as foretold especially by Ezekiel, ch. xxix. xxi., were put to the worse. Cyrus reconquered the island of Cyprus, and finally Cambyses overran Egypt and reduced it to the rank of a Persian province, B.C. 523. During 200 years Egypt suffered severely under its Persian rulers, or else from its own struggles for freedom. Cambyses plundered the tombs and temples, broke the statues, and scourged the priests. Darius governed more mildly by native satraps; but after his defeat at Marathon, the Egyptians rose and made themselves independent for a brief period. Afterwards, when Bactria rebelled against Artaxerxes, they again rose and made Inarus and Amyrtæus kings. Then for a few years Hellenicus and Herodotus, and other inquiring Greeks, were able to enter the country, and study the customs of this remarkable people. When the Egyptians were again conquered, Darius Nothus attempted to alter the religion of the country: but when the civil war broke out between Artaxerxes Mnemon and the younger Cyrus, the Egyptians rebelled a third time against the Persians, and with the help of the Greeks, were again an independent monarchy. Plato and Eudoxus then visited the country. The fourth conquest by the Persians was the last, and Egypt was governed by a Persian satrap till Persia itself was conquered by Alexander the Great, B.C. 332. When Alexander's army occupied Memphis, the numerous Greeks who had settled in Lower Egypt found themselves the ruling class. Egypt became at once a Greek kingdom, and Alexander showed his wisdom in the regulations by which he guarded the prejudices and religion of the Egyptians, who were henceforth to be treated as inferiors, and forbidden to carry arms. He founded Alexandria as the Greek capital. On his death, his lieutenant Ptolemy made himself king of Egypt, being the first of a race of monarchs who governed for 300 years, and made it the second chief kingdom in the world, till it sunk under its own luxuries and vices and the rising power of Rome. The Ptolemies founded a large public library and a museum of learned men. Under their patronage, Theocritus, Callimachus, Lycophron, and Apollonius Rhodius wrote their poems; Euclid composed his Elements of Geometry; Apollonius of Perga invented conic sections; Hipparchus made a catalogue of the stars; Eratosthenes measured the size of the earth; the Bible was translated into Greek; several of the Apocryphal books were written; Homer was edited; anatomy was studied. Poetry soon sunk under the despotism, and the writers were then content to clothe science in verse. Aratus wrote an astronomical poem; Manetho an astrological poem; Nicander a medical poem; and afterwards, Dionysius a geographical poem. Under these Alexandrian kings the native Egyptians still continued building their grand and massive temples, nearly in the style of those built by the kings of Thebes and Sais. The temples in the island of Philæ, in the Great Oasis, at Latopolis, at Ombos, at Dendera, and at Thebes, prove that the Ptolemies had not wholly crushed the zeal and energy of the Egyptians. An Egyptian phalanx had been formed, armed and disciplined like the Greeks. These soldiers rebelled unsuccessfully against Epiphanes, and then Thebes rebelled against Soter II., but was so crushed that it never again held rank among cities.

[222.] Façade of a Temple, time of the Pharaohs.

But while the Alexandrians were keeping down the Egyptians, they were themselves sinking under the Romans. Epiphanes asked for Roman help; his two sons appealed to the senate to settle their quarrels and guard the kingdom from Syrian invasion. Alexander II. was placed on the throne by the Romans, and Auletes went to Rome to ask for help against his subjects. Lastly, the beautiful Cleopatra, the disgrace of her country and the firebrand of the republic, maintained her power by surrendering her person, first to Julius Cæsar, and then to Mark Antony. On the defeat of Mark Antony by Augustus, B.C. 30, Egypt became a province of Rome, and was governed by the emperors with jealous suspicion. It was still a Greek state, and Alexandria was the chief seat of Greek learning and science. Its library, which had been burned by Cæsar's soldiers, had been replaced by that from Pergamus. The Egyptians yet continued building temples and covering them with hieroglyphics as of old; but on the spread of Christianity, the old superstitions lost their sway; the animals were no longer worshipped; and we find few hieroglyphical inscriptions after the reign of Commodus. Now arose in Alexandria the Christian catechetical school, which produced Clemens and Origen. The sects of Gnostics united astrology and magic with religion. The school of Alexandrian Platonics produced Plotinus and Proclus. Monasteries were built all over Egypt; Christian monks took the place of the pagan hermits, and the Bible was translated into Coptic. On the division of the Roman empire, A.D. 337, Egypt fell to the lot of Constantinople. On the rise of the Arian controversy the Egyptians belonged to the Athanasian party, while the Greeks of Alexandria were chiefly Arians. Hence a new cause of weakness to the government under Theodosius, Paganism and Arianism were forbidden by law—the library was burned by the Athanasians, and the last traces of science retreated from Alexandria before ignorance and bigotry. The country sunk year by year in civilization, in population, and in strength; and when the Arabs, animated by religion and with all the vigour of a new people, burst forth upon their neighbours, Egypt was conquered by the followers of Mahomet, A.D. 640, six hundred years after it had been conquered by the Romans. So true has proved the prediction of Ezekiel, that Egypt should be a base kingdom, ch. xxix. 14.

The population of Egypt must have been very large in the earliest times. It has been placed at 7,000,000 under the Pharaohs — at 7,500,000 (exclusive of Alexandria) in the time of Nero — Volney gave the number 2,300,000—Bowring's report on Egypt at 3,200,000. At the present time it is above 3,000,000 — population of Cairo, 300,000.

Architecture and Sculptures.—The monuments we have left to us in Egypt are of two periods—those built in the times of the Pharaohs, and those built during the rule of the Greek and Roman kings of the country. Although the temples of the two periods differ considerably in plan and in other particulars; there is yet sound reason for believing that those built under the Greeks and Romans were constructed after designs, as they certainly occupy the sites, of Pharaonic temples still more ancient than any now existing; that they were, in fact, mere restorations of temples built by the earlier Pharaohs.

[224.] Figure of Ramses II. From the Memnonium.

The leading features of the now existing temples of the time of the Pharaohs are these: First, a gateway or pylon, flanked by two truncated pyramids, shown in elevation No. 222, and marked a and bb on the plan No. 223. These occupy the entire width of the building, and form the entrance to a square court c, surrounded by a portico supported by a double or single row of columns. Crossing this court c, the visitor passes through a second pylon into the inner court d, which was likewise surrounded by a portico supported either by columns or by piers, against which were figures of the king (No. 224). Beyond this second court, it would appear, the public were not admitted, for the spaces between the front row of columns or piers facing the gateway, are occupied by a dwarf wall, which effectually barred entrance excepting at either one or three points where there were gates. This inner court d led immediately into the largest chamber of the temple e, called the "Hall of Columns" (No. 225), the roof of which was always supported by columns, representing a grove of papyrus. The centre avenue was higher than the rest of the hall, and consisted usually of twelve columns, the capitals being imitated from the full-blown expanded papyrus (No. 228); while the columns which sustained the lower roof were in the form of a bud of the same plant (No. 226). To the Hall of Columns succeeded a series of smaller chambers, the roofs of which were generally supported by six or four columns, imitating the bud of the papyrus, either as a single plant, or as several bound together (No. 227); or else by square piers, or columns with eight, twelve, or sixteen faces (No. 229). These apartments frequently surrounded a dark chamber—the most sacred in the temple—the holy of holies. Whether the roof of the portico which surrounded the court was supported by piers or columns, the structural arrangements were always precisely the same. There roof stones which rested upon the architrave (No. 230). The bulk of the column, in proportion to the weight it had to sustain, was extremely ample; and the pressure being always perpendicular, these ancient structures have come down to us with their roofs sound, while arched buildings of much less antiquity have been entirely ruined by the lateral pressure which that mode of construction exerts on the walls.

The Egyptian gate was peculiarly simple, with its undisguised lintel and door-posts, all so vividly reminding us of the memorable night on which so many door-posts and lintels in Egypt were marked with the blood of the passover, Ex. xii. 7. The lintel was always of one stone, and the door-posts also were very frequently of only one block, while each of the three portions had its appropriate decoration. In the smaller doorways, where no cavetto and torus were super-added, the lintel bore the winged globe or protecting divinity of entrances, and was besides decorated with the names of the divinities to whom the temple was dedicated, and of the Pharaoh who built it. The door-posts also bore the name and title of the builder.

In the larger gates, such as the propylon of Luxor, the globe was sculptured in the cavetto, and the posts with figures of the king making offerings to the different divinities.

The surface of each architectural feature was engraved with its particular ornament appropriately coloured. In the cavetto of the cornice it was customary to place the name and titles of the Pharaoh or king, with the other significant decorations peculiar to that member of the entablature. The next member, the torus or bead, had its special decoration; and the architrave stone was likewise symbolically ornamented with the names of the divinities to whom the temple was dedicated, and of the sovereign in whose time it was built. The abacus of the column was invariably decorated with the royal titles. The capitals were painted in accordance with the intention of the form; if, for instance, the expanded papyrus (No. 228), the leaves of the calyx would be yellow, and the filaments green. Beneath were five horizontal divisions, which probably represented the blue and white bands with which the columns of the primitive temples were adorned on festive occasions. To these succeeded a representation of the king offering gifts to the gods of the temple; and lastly, the yellow and red lines at the base of the shaft signified the brown leaves that envelope the base of the stalk of the natural plant. was first the pier or column, ordinarily made of several pieces of stone solidly united by mortar and wooden cramps; then came the architrave or frieze, of one block, stretching from column to column; and lastly, the blocks forming the cornice, concealing the ends of the of the origin of this order of Egyptian column is the presence of three ridges extending up the shaft to the bands of the neck of the capital, by which the triangular form of the stalk of the plant was intended to be signified (see sections at No. 228).

No. 231 represents a restoration of the propylon or gate of the temple of Luxor, a ruin which is in excellent preservation, though the lower portion is buried in the accumulated rubbish of the modern village. In the illustration the rubbish is removed from the base of the towers, and also from the sphinxes of the great avenue, which extends from the front of this temple to the side entrance of the temple of Karnak. We know from representations upon the walls that flag-staffs were inserted into those grooves, which are invariably found in all the towers of the propyla that flank the entrances to the temples of Egypt of whatever period. Over these grooves are holes and small chambers, in which were contrivances for affixing these staffs to the towers. On each side of the gate is seated a colossal statue of the Pharaoh who built this entrance to the temple, and in front of each tower is a similar statue.

In no instance does a statue of a king occur except by the side of a gate, Ge. xviii 1, 2; and xxii 17.

[233.] Side-elevation of Ptolemaic Temple at Edfou.

The foregoing is a general description of the ordinary form of the temples of the age of the Pharaohs, but there are no two specimens now remaining which agree in all particulars.

[234.] From Colonnade, Philae.

First, the propylon, with its truncated pyramidal towers, which were sometimes adorned with narrow flags on tall poles; then a court surrounded on three sides with a colonnade. At the extremity of the court, and facing the gateway, was an elevated portico of six columns in line, and three or four deep. The uninitiated obviously were not permitted to enter beyond the court, for the first row of columns of the portico are invariably joined by a dwarf wall, the only opening being between the centre intercolumniation, to which were attached the valves of the gate. To the portico succeeded a series of small chambers, the roofs of which were supported by four or by two columns. The centre chambers were lighted by small square openings in the roof, and those at the side by small openings in the walls; but in no example is there that kind of clere-story perforated with large openings, that occurs in the Hall of Columns of the Pharaonic temples. Besides the foregoing characteristics, there is an elaborate form of capital, representing the papyrus in three stages of growth, in one capital (No. 235), or sometimes a collection of lotus flowers (No. 234), or the full-blown papyrus alone (No. 228); but in no instance do we find the pier with the attached figure (No. 224), nor the single bud of the papyrus (No. 226), nor that form of column which represents several buds of the plant joined together (No. 227). The palm-tree capital (No. 236), however, belongs to both periods.

Another distinguishing feature of the Ptolemaic temples is, that the masonry is even more perfect than that of the time of the Pharaohs, if we except the pyramids and the granite temples of Lower Egypt.

The temples of the Roman period are usually inferior in extent to the Ptolemaic buildings; they are also remarkable for a yet more elaborate form of capital, more salient and curvilinear forms in the sculpture and architectural decorations, and a still more perfect masonry. Granite seems rarely to have been employed for architectural purposes in any part of Egypt excepting the Delta. In the Thebaid it was used chiefly for sculpture, the ordinary building material being the limestone of the district, or the fine sandstone of the quarries of Silsilis.

The most usual kind of mural sculpture, and entirely peculiar to the Egyptians, seems to have been designed to endure to the latest time. The outline of the object intended to be represented is cut into the smooth surface of the wall, while at the same time the minor forms and rotundity are represented within the incised outline. By this contrivance the general outline is the last part to suffer injury, for to obliterate it the whole surface of the wall must first be destroyed. Sometimes the outline is excessively deep, at others the surface of the figures is altogether much lower than the general surface of the wall, and in others the outline is but slightly incised with a corresponding flatness within. The Egyptians rarely practised the true basso-relievo, but wherever they did so the sculpture is almost invariably in very low relief. The back view of the human figure is never represented in the bas-reliefs excepting in the case of an enemy, and then rarely; the figure is generally represented in profile, and there are but few attempts at delineating the front view of the foot or of the face; however, whether the face be represented in front or side view, a profile eye is never found. The figures of the king in battle-pieces, and of the landed proprietor in domestic scenes, are always on a much larger scale than the other actors in the piece, from whence we may infer that superior size typified persons of sovereign power, men of renown, or of official or domestic importance. In Egyptian sculpture the erect figure in the round invariably has the left leg advanced, as if about to march; another peculiarity of the round figures is that the limbs are never entirely detached from the body of the stone, the portion of the work thus left being always painted white.

In addition to the foregoing special characteristics, are certain conventionalities of colour worth noting. The Egyptians are represented with red and yellow complexions, red ochre for the men and yellow for the women. The hair of the king is frequently painted blue, but that of ordinary men black. In representing the various nations with whom they had intercourse; they seem to have endeavoured to imitate the complexions peculiar to each. Amun Ra, the chief divinity of Thebes, is always painted blue, and he is further distinguished by two high feathers which he wears in his cap. The inferior divinities are not uncommonly of the complexions of mortals. The sky or heavens are invariably indicated by a strip of blue coming downwards at the lower side of each extremity (No. 237), and occasionally having upon it a row of five-pointed stars. Water, seas, and rivers are represented by a series of zig-zag lines of a blue or green colour. Mountains have a yellow colour, with red spots upon it. (For the peculiar manners and customs illustrated by the monuments, see FOOD, BEARD, BRICKS, CHARIOTS, MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, SHEPHERDS, WEAVING, &c.)

Arts and Manufactures.—The civilization and customs of the Egyptians at the time of the erection of the pyramids differed in no important points from those of their descendants. The masonry of the passages in the great pyramid has not been surpassed at any age; while the pile is so accurately placed north and south, that the variation of the compass may be ascertained from the direction of its sides. More than 2000 B.C. the Egyptians had duodecimal as well as decimal numbers; weights and measures adjusted to a pound of 1400 grains. The geographical division of the country; the division of the year into twelve months of thirty days, the year being divided into three periods of four months each—the period of inundation, the period of vegetation, and the period of harvest; ornaments of gold and silver; musical instruments; and with the exception of horses and chariots, the paintings represent the usual industrial pursuits of after times. The statues of the most ancient times were worked to a fixed canon. Bronze statues cast from moulds and having a core of earth were first made in Egypt and introduced thence into Greece by Rhossus. Painting in tempera appeared at the same age, but encaustic not till the Greek and Roman periods. Their musical instruments were harps, lyres, guitars, drums, tambourines, clappers, double and single pipes, flutes, cymbals, the astring, and a few others of less common occurrence. Their amusements were various, including dancing of almeah, juggling, tumbling, mummery, ball, draughts, dice, mora, single-stick, quarter-staff, wrestling, bull-fights, &c. (Ancient Egypt, vol. i. p. 189-211.) In mechanical arts, the carpenter, boat-builder, potter, leather-cutter, glass-blower, and others, are frequently represented; and we see the blow-pipe, bellows, and syphons; the press, balance, lever; the saw, the adze, the chisel, the forceps, the syringe, harpoon, razors; we have also glazed pottery, the potter's wheel, and the kiln; and dated specimen of glass of the time of Thothmes III., 1445 B.C. In metallurgy, gold-beating, damascening, engraving, casting, inlaying, wire-drawing, and other processes. Tin and zinc, as well as iron and steel, are either proved by discoveries or inferred from the monuments. In agriculture, are the plough, hoe, sickle, and other implements. In warfare, shields, cuirasses of quilted leather, helmets, spears, clubs, maces, daggers, bows, battle-axes, pole-axes, hatchets, and falchions; for sieges the testudo, ladders, torches, and lanterns. The processes of growing and preparing flax, and making into thread, string, ropes, and cloth, as well as the looms employed, are all depicted. Mats and baskets were beautifully made either of the halfah grass or palm-leaves, or of the outer rind of the papyrus plant, the pith of which was used in making paper. Coffins or wooden sarcophagi were chiefly of sycamore deal or cedar, covered with stucco and richly painted. The ordinary boats of the Nile were of planks of the acacia, and had two rudders or large oars, and the sail of cloth frequently painted or worked in coloured patterns. Many of the vessels of burden were of great size. The boats made of papyrus were mostly punts for fishing, or for gliding through the canals of the Delta. Implements for painting, ladles, bells, crucibles, and surgical instruments have all been found, and are preserved in various museums. The commerce of the Egyptians with neighbouring nations enriched the country with slaves, cattle, gems, metals, rare animals, and objects of curiosity. The Egyptians expended enormous wealth on the tombs and furniture of the dead, and the paintings acquaint us fully with the ceremonies followed from the embalming to the final judgment.

Hieroglyphics.—The inscribed slab of black basalt now in the British Museum, and known as the Rosetta Stone, was accidentally discovered by the French among the ruins of Fort St. Julien, near the Rosetta mouth of the Nile, and handed over to the English according to the terms of the treaty of Alexandria. This stone furnished the clue to the knowledge of hieroglyphics which we at present possess. Prior to its discovery, the only helps to our study of hieroglyphics were a treatise of little value by Horapollon, a few lines by Chæremon, and a few more by Clemens. The hieroglyphical writing went out of use on the spread of Christianity, and the very language itself, the Coptic, became a dead language, so that after a time the Bible and services of the church were written with a translation, that they might be understood in Arabic by the vulgar, while read in Coptic by the priest. The Rosetta Stone contains an inscription in three characters. One is in hieroglyphics; a second in what we now call enchorial or common Egyptian letters; and the third in Greek. This last could, of course, be read. It is a decree by the priests in honour of Ptolemy Epiphanes; and it ends with the important information that it was to be written in three characters. The Greek was clearly seen to be a translation, by which the other two inscriptions might be understood. It is to the sagacity of Dr. Thomas Young, and through his comparison of the several inscriptions on the Rosetta Stone, that we owe our first knowledge of this mode of writing. He determined the meaning of all the sentences, of many of the words, and of several of the letters. This knowledge was enlarged and corrected by Champollion, Mr. Salt, Sir Gardner Wilkinson, Mr. Sharpe, Mr. Birch, and other students both at home and abroad, who have made further additions; and the result is some definite information belonging to the three sciences of history, mythology, and language. In history we have obtained a pretty correct series of the kings' names; and dates approaching the truth have been assigned to the existing works of art. In mythology we have learned the names of the gods, the ages in which some rose into importance and others fell, the groups into which they were arranged, many of their attributes, and their union of several characters in one person. In the department of language we have learned the origin of writing and the system pursued (Sharpe's Egyptian Hieroglyphics, 1861). The language of Egypt, as it was spoken in the first centuries of our era, is preserved in the Coptic Bible, the lives of some Egyptian saints, and a few other books. By these, since the discovery of the phonetic value of so many of the hieroglyphics on the walls of the temples, and of the hieratic writings of the papyri, it has been abundantly proved that the Coptic is the legitimate descendant of the language of the Pharaohs. All that is wanted for the more complete decipherment of these ancient texts is a larger collection of Coptic words than the known works in that language supply; and a larger and more accurate collection of copies of the texts furnished by the monuments in a form convenient for study. It is not our province to enter into an analysis of the language of the hieroglyphics, and therefore it will be sufficient to remark that there appears to be but a slight affinity between the Hebrew and the hieroglyphics, except in the grammatical structure of the language, and the pronouns, which are identical with those of the Hebrew and the cognate dialects.

[It is impossible to enumerate here more than a few of the works which now exist on the history, antiquities, and manners of Egypt. EHUD [etymological import unknown], one of the persons who was raised up to deliver Israel in the time of the judges, and to vindicate their cause. He was of the tribe of Benjamin, and the son of Gera. While he was evidently a man of valour, and had doubtless at heart the best interests of his people, the mode he took to accomplish the object he had in view was certainly liable to reprehension, and allowance requires to be made for the circumstances of the time. It had too much the character of meeting the adversary with his own weapons. Ehud went at the head of a deputation which had been sent to offer a present, or possibly to pay a tribute under that form, from the portions of Canaan that had fallen under the sway of Eglon. And after the gift had been presented, and the company of deputies had got as far as what is called the quarries on their way back, Ehud returned, and on the professed ground of having some important message to deliver to Eglon, was allowed to enter with him into a private chamber, where he suddenly stabbed him. His being left-handed gave him an opportunity of more easily accomplishing his purpose, as the action of his hand was not perceived by the adversary, till too late to save himself from the stroke. And Ehud having taken the precaution of locking the door behind him, found time to make his escape before any alarm was raised regarding the deed he had committed. He hurried on to acquaint his countrymen with the fact; and having blown the trumpet in Mount Ephraim, he assembled a band of valiant men, who fell upon the Moabites before they had time to recover from their consternation, and broke their yoke from the neck of Israel. Undoubtedly that yoke had been unrighteously imposed, and the Israelites were at liberty to resort to all lawful means to obtain deliverance from its burden. At the same time, it behoved them to remember that it had come upon them as a chastisement from God for their sins, and that, in the very payment of an offering or tribute, they made a formal acknowledgment of their actual subjection to the supremacy of Moab. However justly therefore Eglon may have fallen under the fatal stroke of Ehud, one cannot justify, on abstract principles of righteousness, the inflicting of such a stroke under a profession of friendship and by an artifice of deceit. But in saying this we do not impugn the reality of his faith, or the honesty of his zeal in the cause of God.

EK'RON [apparently from עקר, to root or pluck up, Sept. Ἀκκρόν, Accaron], one of the five chief cities of the Philistines. In common with the other cities it was assigned to the tribe of Judah, Jos. xiii. 45; but afterwards it appears among the cities of Dan, Jos. xix. 43, which may perhaps be explained from its having been a border city, Jos. xv. 11, so that it might have been appropriated by either tribe that could gain possession of it. According to Ju. i. 18, it was actually taken at an early period by Judah; but it must soon again have reverted into the hands of its original occupants; for in the first book of Samuel, and also in the later Scriptures, it always appears as a strictly Philistine city, 1 Sa. v.; Am. i. 8; Zep. ii. 4; Zec. ix. 5. It stood upon the north-east boundary of Philistia, and hence came into nearest contact with the occupied portion of the Israelitish territory. From this alone one may infer it to have been a place of considerable strength; since, while in so exposed a situation, it could still maintain its ground against the tide of Israelitish conquest for so many generations. Its site is now occupied by a small village of unburned bricks, and one may also say its name still survives; as Akri, the name of the latter, is evidently but another form of the ancient Ekron. (Robinson's Researches, iii. p. 24.)

EL, one of the Hebrew names for God, and often found in composition as part of the appropriate names given to persons and objects. (See God.)

ELAH [terebinth], a common name, Ge. xxxvi. 4; 1 Kl. iv. 18; 1 Ch. iv. 15; but chiefly known as the name of Baasha's son and successor on the throne of Israel. He was cut off in the second year of his reign by Zimri, "the captain of half his chariots," in the midst of a drunken revel. With him the line of Baasha became extinct, 1 Kl. xvi. 8-14.

ELAH, the name of a valley which formed the scene of David's memorable conflict with the giant Goliath, 1 Sa. xvii. 19—most probably so named from the terebinth-trees which grew in it. It is described as lying "between Shochoh and Azekah;" but there is some doubt as to the exact position of these places, and authorities consequently differ as to the locality of the valley of Elah. But the opinion of Dr. Robinson is now generally followed, who identifies it with the Wady es Sunt, or Valley of Acacias, which lies about 11 miles south-west from Jerusalem, on the way toward Gaza. The largest terebinth he saw in Palestine stood in the vicinity of this valley. (Researches, vol. iii. p. 350.)

ELAM, EL'YMAIS, a province of the ancient Persian and Babylonian empires, and understood to be the same with the region called Susiana by the Greek geographers, having Susa for its capital. In Scripture, however, it occurs first as the name of one of Shem's sons, the head doubtless of a distinct tribe, Ge. x. 22; and by the time of Abraham, Chedorlamer the king of Elam appears in connection with the king of Shinar or Babylonia, as taking part in the descent that was made upon the cities of the plain, Ge. xiv. 1. By the prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah Elam is associated with Media, much as elsewhere Persia is, Is. xli. 2; Je. xxv. 25; and in the latest writings of the Old Testament the Elamites rank among the nations of the Persian empire, Ezr. iv. 2. By Daniel also Susa is placed in the province of Elam on the banks of the Ulai or Eulsus, and Elam itself included as one of the divisions of the Babylonian empire, Da. viii. 2. It would seem, therefore, that strictly speaking Elam was no more than a province, though an extensive province, of Persia; but from the Elamites having been among the original inhabitants of that part of the world, and having for a considerable time maintained an independent position, Elam came to be not unfrequently employed as a name for the whole of Persia. Hence, not only do we find mention made of a king of Elam so early as the time of Abraham, but Elam is represented by Ezekiel as among the nations that had been the terror of the world, Eze. xxxii. 24; and, like the Persians generally, its people are spoken of as excelling in the use of the quiver and bow, Is. xxii. 6; Je. xlii. 36. Elamites are mentioned among the representatives of the different nations that heard the word of God in their own tongues on the day of Pentecost; but this must be understood of Jews residing in that part of the world, and speaking the Elamitic dialect, Ac. ii. 8. (See PERSIA.)

ELAM, the name, 1. of a Levite, a Korhite, who in the time of David had a subordinate charge about the house of God, 1 Ch. xxv. 3; 2. of a chief man of the tribe of Benjamin, 1 Ch. viii. 24; 3. of some person, otherwise unknown, who gave his name to a large party who accompanied Zerubbabel from Babylon, Ezr. ii. 7; 4. of apparently another person, called "the other Elam," from whom a company of precisely the same number, 1254, derived their designation, Ezr. ii. 31; Na. vii. 34; 5. of a priest who took part with Nehemiah at the dedication of the second temple.

ELA'SAH, sometimes also in English Bible ELASAH, but the same in the original [God-made]; 1. a man of the tribe of Judah, son of Helez, 1 Ch. ii. 39; 2. a man of the family of Saul, by the line of Jonathan, 1 Ch. viii. 37; ix. 43; 3. one of the family of Pashur, who had married a Gentile wife, Ezr. x. 22; 4. a son of Shaphan, who, along with another person, carried a letter from Zedekiah king of Judah to the king of Babylon, and took charge also of Jeremiah's letter to the captives in Babylon, Je. xxxix. 3.

ELATHI, the name of an Idumean city. The Hebrew is עֲלָתַי, which seems to have been variously supplied with vowels, and to have assumed a diversity of forms; commonly Elath, but sometimes also Eloth; in Jerome it is Ailath, in the Sept. Ἀιλῶν, in Josephus Ἀιλῶν, and the Greeks and Romans called it Elana. It is written Elath in Scripture, with one exception, which has Eloth, 1 Kl. ix. 21. The place stood on the shore of the Red Sea, not very far from Ezion-geber, as stated in the passage last referred to, and appears to have been the older and better known place, as Ezion-geber is there designated from it "Ezion-geber, which is beside Elath." Being one of the oldest and most important seaports on the north side of the Elamitic Gulf, Elath naturally became an object for the parties who strove for the ascendancy in that part of the world, especially for those who applied themselves to the interests of commerce. It was only from the time of Solomon that the Israelites turned their attention in that direction; and accordingly, while Elath was undoubtedly brought into subjection by David, and garrisoned with Israelitish forces, like other cities in Edom, no special mention is made of it till we reach the age of Solomon, and hear of his commercial preparations and enterprises on the Red Sea. Subsequently the Edomites revolted from under the power of Judah, in Joram's time, and chose a king of their own, 2 Kt. viii. 20; when Elath was no doubt withdrawn from the dominion of Judah. It was again, however, recovered by Uzziah, 2 Kt. xiv. 22, but afterwards was successively taken by the king of Damascus and by the king of Assyria, 2 Kt. xvi. 6-9. Subsequently it fell into the hands of the Romans, and became the seat of a Christian bishop; a bishop of Elath was present at the council of Chalcedon in A.D. 451, and also at that of Constantinople in 536. Jerome and Theodoret both speak of it as a place of considerable trade, whence ships sailed to India. In later times it fell under the sway of the Mahometans, and like many other cities in the East was taken, and again lost, by the Crusaders. Abulfeda speaks of it as in his day (A.D. 1300) a deserted place, with little more than a fortress, which was held by a governor from Egypt. 'Akabah now occupies the site of Elath. And such, says Robinson, "as Elath was in the days of Abulfeda is 'Akabah now. Mounds of rubbish alone mark the site of the town; while a fortress, occupied by a governor and a small garrison under the pasha of Egypt, serves to keep the neighbouring tribes of the desert in awe, and to minister to the wants and protection of the annual Egyptian Haj." (Researches, i. p. 250).

EL-BETH-EL [God of Bethel, or God of house of God], the name subsequently given by Jacob to the place where God appeared to him when he fled from his brother Esau; but the common name still was simply Bethel, Ge. xxxv. 7, 15.

EL/DAD [loved of God], one of the seventy elders

who had been appointed under Moses to assist in the administration of justice among the people. He is mentioned along with Medad, another elder, as having on a particular occasion received the gift of prophecy, which came upon them in the camp, while Moses and the rest of the elders were assembled around the door of the tabernacle. The spirit of prophecy was upon them all; and the simple peculiarity in the case of Eldad and Medad was, that they did not lose their share in the gift, though they abode in the camp, but they prophesied there. It appeared, however, an irregularity to Joshua the son of Nun, and seems to have suggested the idea that they were using the gift with a view to their own aggrandisement. He therefore entreated Moses to forbid them. But Moses nobly replied, "Enviest thou for my sake? Would God that all the Lord's people were prophets, and that the Lord would put his Spirit upon them," Nu. xi. 24-27.

ELDERS [Heb. זְבִינִים; Greek πρεσβύτεροι, English presbyters or elders]. The word is occasionally used both in the singular and the plural, with respect simply to the age of the party spoken of; as when Joseph is said to have gone up to bury his father "with the servants of Pharaoh, the elders of his house, and all the elders of the land of Egypt," Ge. 17; or when Timothy is instructed to "rebuke not an elder (i.e. a man in advanced life, an elderly person), but entreat him as a father, and the younger men as brethren," 1 Ti. v. 1. But most commonly the word is used in an official sense, to designate individuals invested with a certain degree of authority, the recognized heads and rulers of the community to which they belonged. The name was doubtless appropriated originally to this use, because, from the patriarchal manners of the ancient people of God, the persons raised to such official prominence commonly were those of riper age and experience. It would seem that even in Egypt a kind of government was maintained among them by means of such a body; for on first receiving his commission Moses is instructed to go and intimate its purport to the elders of his people, and these as a known and recognized class he is said to have actually assembled, and to have made them acquainted with the message and instructions he had received, Ex. iii. 16; iv. 29. At later periods we find a selection made from these elders for special purposes; as when Moses was called up to Mount Sinai to converse with God, seventy of the elders were appointed to go so far with him, and were privileged to have a near view of the divine glory, Ex. xxiv.; and again, on the occasion of a tumult among the people, Moses was ordered to gather together "seventy men of the elders of Israel, whom he knew to be the elders of the people, and officers over them," Nu. xi. 16—evidently indicating their known official position. It was upon these elders, as the official heads and representatives of the people, that the Spirit of prophecy at that time rested—for the occasion they were made to share in the distinguishing honour of Moses. And as in the legislation of Moses certain things were committed to the charge of the elders of each particular city, De. xix. 12; xxi. 3, &c., it was clearly implied, that the people, on their settlement in the land of Canaan, were expected to appoint persons in the several districts, who, under the name of elders, should look after the administration of justice and the execution of the divine regulations. Hence, in the history we read of transactions occasionally taking place which were managed by, or in the presence of, the elders of particular cities, Jos. xx. 4; Ju. viii. 16; Ru. iv. 2, &c. In the Psalms also, and the prophets, the elders are frequently spoken of as a distinct class, bearing an official character, and occupying to some extent a separate position, Ps. cvii. 32; La. ii. 10; Eze. xiv. 1; xx. 1, &c. So that there is reason to believe, the local government by elders, as it was originally recognized in the constitution brought in by Moses, so it never wholly fell into abeyance throughout all the changes that ensued, down to the period of the Babylonish exile.

After the return from that exile, it is well known the office of the eldership, instead of losing ground, rose into higher significance and fuller organization. The synagogal institution, whether it then for the first time came into existence, or received only a fresh impulse and expansion, undoubtedly at no distant period became widely diffused, and attained to an important place in the Jewish discipline and worship. By and by every town and even village had its synagogue; while in the larger cities synagogues existed in considerable numbers. But with every synagogue there was connected a government of elders, who varied in number according to the population attached to it, but who always had the chief management of its concerns, and the power of exercising discipline upon its members. The rulers of the synagogue, and the elders of the people, of whom we so constantly read in the Gospels, were substantially one; and the highest council of the nation in the gospel age, the Sanhedrim, was composed of a certain number of those elders, along with a priest from each of the twenty-four courses into which the whole priesthood was divided. From the very nature of things, ruling was the chief part of the duty connected with the office of elder among the Jews, but it also involved a certain measure of teaching; as the ruling necessarily carried along with it a knowledge and application of the law of God. (See SYNAGOGUE.)

Considering that Christianity sprang out of Judaism, and that the first Christian communities were composed entirely, or in great part, of converts from the Jewish faith, it was natural that the governing body in the new should be fashioned after the model of that of the old. The apostles, who in an official respect stood at the head of the church of the New Testament, were not attached to any particular portion of it; they were Christ's authorized ambassadors generally to found churches in different parts of the world; and in doing so it was manifestly the part of wisdom to avail themselves, as far as they well could, of the kind of organization that the providence and Spirit of God had furnished to their hand. Cases might, and doubtless sometimes did occur, in which a whole synagogue, or decidedly the major part of it, went over to the faith of Christ; and then, as a Jewish synagogue was turned into a Christian church, the elders and ministers of the one would, as a matter of course, continue to hold the same relative position in the other: hence, presently, we find elders associated with every Christian community. It was some time before they came into formal existence in Jerusalem, as the presence of the apostles there at the first rendered them for a time less necessary; but even there they are not long in making their appearance as a recognized class. The pecuniary support raised at Antioch in behalf of the poor saints in Judea, is sent to the elders at Jerusalem by the hands of Barnabas and Paul, Ac. xi. 30; and in the discussion and settlement of the question respecting circumcision, it is "the apostles and elders" who are expressly said to have come together to consider the matter, Ac. xv. 6. Elsewhere, the appointment of elders as the presiding body, appears to have been coeval with the very formation of the Christian communities. In even his first missionary tour Paul ordained elders in every church, Ac. xiv. 23; and in his letter to Titus respecting the organization of matters in Crete, the most prominent instruction given him is, that he should ordain elders in every city, Tit. i. 5. That these were the highest officers in the communities over which they were placed, is evident from their being alone mentioned. But in Titus the Jewish term elder is exchanged with the Greek term ἐπίσκοπος, overseer or bishop, Tit. i. 6, 7; as it is also in St. Paul's address to the elders of Ephesus—those being designated elders in one verse, who are addressed as bishops or overseers in another, Ac. xx. 17, 28. In like manner, in the first epistle to Timothy, while bishop is used as the prevailing designation, elder is also employed to denote the higher functionaries of the church, 1 Ti. iii. 1, 2; v. 17, 19. Hence also, in the Apocalypse, where the entire church, the old and the new together, is represented by a competent number of official heads, the representation takes the form of four and twenty elders, Re. iv. 4; and as the church appears there in a reigning and triumphant state, sharing with Christ in his judicial authority and all-subduing power, the elders who represent her are seen sitting on thrones, and having crowns of gold on their heads.

A distinction is made by St. Paul between elders who simply rule, and elders who, beside ruling, labour in word and doctrine, 1 Ti. v. 17; and it has been questioned whether this is to be understood of a difference in the original destination, or of one that existed merely as matter of fact. The words themselves cannot fairly be regarded as decisive either way. It may reasonably be supposed, that in the circumstances of the primitive church, when considerable difficulty must have been experienced in getting persons properly qualified for the work of teaching, distinctions of the kind referred to would not be very sharply drawn; and that it would often be left to the determination of experience, whether some appointed to the eldership should confine themselves to ruling, or should take part also in teaching. But as no blame is imputed to such as merely ruled, nay, as special honour is claimed for them, if only they ruled well; it is clear that the apostle recognized the propriety of a ruling eldership apart from teaching as an actual institution; while he asserted a title to higher consideration for those in the eldership who combined the two kinds of service together. On this subject no further light is given in the notices of the New Testament; but there can be no doubt, as a matter of fact, that the distinction between simply ruling and ruling along with teaching, soon developed itself in the church as one of real practical importance; that a single individual of more eminent gifts in each Christian community, came to be constituted its presiding presbyter or bishop, and to be more especially charged with the oversight of its members and the conducting of its public assemblies. In process of time still further developments took place, but these belong to the province of church history rather than to that of biblical literature.

ELEALEH [God goes up], a town of the Moabites, which, after the conquest of the country by the Israelites, was assigned to the tribe of Reuben, Nu. xxxi. 3, 37. The children of Reuben are said in the passage referred to to have rebuilt it, along with certain other cities in the district. But in process of time it appears to have reverted to its original owners, as in some of the prophets it is named among cities of Moab which were doomed to desolation, Is. xv. 4; xvi. 9; Je. xlviii. 34. It is commonly named along with Heshbon, as if the two stood near each other; and accordingly travellers have discovered the ruins of a place not far from Heshbon, which the Arabs call El-Aal. The ruins are on an elevated situation; and if the ancient city stood there, it must have commanded the whole of an extensive plain.

ELEA'SA. See ELASA.

ELEAZAR [whom God helps], appears to have been a very common name among the covenant-people, and was borne by several persons mentioned in sacred history. 1. The most distinguished, as well as the earliest of these, was the son of Aaron, who, after his father, became the head of the tribe of Levi, and succeeded him in the high-priesthood, Ex. vi. 23-25; Nu. xi. 25, seq. Nadab and Abihu appear to have been the two eldest sons of Aaron, as they stand first in the genealogy of Aaron's house, as given in the sixth chapter of Exodus. Eleazar was the next eldest, and on their death stepped into the room of the first-born. Of Eleazar himself very little is said in the history, except with reference to his official position and duties. He seems to have maintained a good understanding both with Moses and with Joshua. On the solemn and affecting occasion, when his father Aaron went up to Mount Hor to die, Eleazar was ordered to accompany him, and the priestly robes that had been so long worn by the father himself, now ready to be offered, were, before the fatal moment arrived, taken by Moses from off him, and placed upon the person of his son, Nu. xi. 26-28. The high-priesthood continued long in his line, and seems, indeed, generally to have been filled by one of that line. For a short period—though we have no information how it came about—the offspring of Ithamar attained to the highest place, in the person of Eli and his immediate successors; but it presently again reverted to the older branch; Zadok was of Eleazar's line. When he died, he was buried in "the hill of Phinehas" his son, Jos. xiv. 1.

2. ELEAZAR, who was appointed to take charge of the ark while it remained in the house of Abinadab, 1 Sa. vii. 1.

3. ELEAZAR. One of David's heroes also bore this name—ode, it is said, "of the three mighties." He valiantly withstood the Philistines in a great emergency, and drove them back; also along with two others broke through the host of the Philistines, at the hazard of life, to fetch David a draught of water from the well of Bethlehem, 1 Ch. xi. 11-18; 2 Sa. xxiii. 9.

4. ELEAZAR. Various persons of the same name are also mentioned in later Jewish history, 1 Ch. xiii. 21; xiv. 28; Ne. xii. 43; Est. viii. 33; 1 Mac. ii. 5; vi. 43, seq.

ELECT, ELECTION. The terms are variously used in Scripture. They denote designation of persons to office, Ac. ix. 15; Jn. vi. 70; 1 Sa. x. 24; of people or nations to the enjoyment of peculiar privileges, as in the case of the Jews, De. vii. 6-8; Ia. lxx. 9-22; and finally, of a definite number of persons to eternal life, 2 Th. ii. 13. This last is the theological sense, and the only one which here calls for explanation or defence. The subject is doubtless one that belongs to the deep things of God, and therefore the clearest possible statement of it must leave an impenetrable veil resting on some portions of the theme, and afford room for that exclamation of Paul, "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God; how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!" It is therefore much to be lamented that to the difficulties which belong to the subject itself, there should so very often have been superadded difficulties of another kind, springing from a misconception of what the doctrine really is, or from bold and injudicious statements of it. When we look into sacred Scripture, we are struck with the fact, that the doctrine is almost uniformly presented in some practical connection, and in such a way that the very statement of it contains an answer to the more common and plausible objections.

Statement of the doctrine.—As presented in Scripture, election has respect to persons, as contradistinguished from election of nations or communities, and also from election merely of character, e.g. of such as shall believe and obey, Lu. x. 20; Phi. iv. 3; Jn. vi. 37, 40. According to these passages the elect are a definite number of persons, said to be given to the Son by the Father, and to have their very names recorded in heaven. This election to eternal life is an election of persons out of a race universally guilty and condemned, none of whom have therefore any claim whatever on the divine favour, Ro. iii. 19, whence, fairly considered, it is not liable to any charge of injustice on the part of God. Further, this decree of election, like all the divine decrees, is eternal and immutable. In point of fact God does save a certain number of the human family; and it is against all right views of God to suppose, that he should have acted without a plan or purpose so to do; and as little can we suppose that having once formed such a plan he should ever change it. Hence believers are said in Scripture to be "chosen before the foundation of the world," and their salvation is "according to his own purpose and grace, which was given in Christ Jesus before the world began," Ep. i. 4; 2 Ti. i. 9. Their election has its source in free grace and love. It is "according to the good pleasure of his will," and not for anything good in the creature whatever, Ep. i. 5; Ro. ix. 11, 13; xi. 5. It includes all the means and constituent parts of salvation, as well as salvation itself in the sense of the ultimate and crowning gift of eternal life. We are not "chosen to salvation" without faith and holiness, but "through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth," 2 Th. ii. 13; Ep. i. 4. Moreover, election does not proceed on the redemption of Christ as the ground or cause of it, but includes that redemption as the grand means through which the purpose to save is accomplished. Hence we are said to be "chosen in Him." Such we believe to be the election of Scripture, and by the mere statement of it, most, if not all the false theories on the subject, as well as the more common and imposing objections, are at once met and refuted.

Analogical considerations.—These, before proceeding further, it may not be unnecessary to advert to; for analogy, even when it does not convince, is well fitted to silence, and prompt to more careful inquiry. In many cases it will pave the way for a more ready reception of, and more devout acquiescence in, what was erroneously supposed to be a severe and repulsive dogma. Now, the principle involved in the doctrine of election, as above given, and its attendant difficulties, are not confined to the region of Scripture or revelation, but meet us everywhere, so that if any will war against this point of Scripture doctrine, he must carry that war into other regions also; yea, wage it in every province of the divine administration. In God's ordinary providence how diversely does he deal with men, and in how many ways does his preconceived plan and purpose affect their history in this life! They are far from being placed by God on a footing of equality in this world. One is born in rank and opulence; another in obscurity and poverty. One is born in a Christian family, amid all the healthful influences that surround it; another in an infidel home, exposed to the pestilential atmosphere that belongs to it from the beginning of his existence. One is endowed with great physical strength; another pines under sickness, and drags along to the grave a weak and weary frame, the prey of constitutional maladies, which embitter life and bring on premature decay and death. Some, like Newton and Bacon, are endowed with extraordinary mental gifts, and are thus marked out and equipped by God for distinction in the world; others are but slenderly endowed with intellectual gifts, or are denied them entirely. And so throughout the numberless diversities of gifts and social condition which prevail in the world. It is manifestly God that makes to differ; and the true source of the difference is to be found in his scheme of providential government. If, therefore, we perceive the state and destiny of men in this life to be so largely influenced by the plan or purpose of God, why should we hesitate in recognizing the operation of the same principle in regard to their future state and destiny? Should we not rather expect to find here, as elsewhere, a close and beautiful analogy between the economy of grace and the constitution of nature and providence? If, on the other hand, an election of grace independent of the will or merit of man had not been found in the Bible, would not our minds have been justly stumbled at the difference in the mode of the divine operation in the constitution of nature and that of grace; or would we not have missed that unity of plan which shows that it is one God who works in the one sphere and in the other?

Nor is it only when we thus contemplate what may be called the more direct or immediate agency of God in his providence that this principle meets us. We find it again in the influence which the plans and purposes of men, altogether irrespective of any volition of ours, exercises over us. The purpose of the head of a family to reside in a certain country or locality; his preference of one school or college to another, or of one church or minister to another, may, so to speak, be the turning point in the future fortunes of his family. "The parent's plan," says Albert Barnes, in his introductory essay to Butler's Analogy, "may fix the very college where he shall study, the companions he shall choose, the law-office or the seminary where he shall prepare for professional life, and finally everything which may establish his son in the world. So the plan of the infidel is successful in corrupting thousands of the young; the purpose of Howard secured the welfare of thousands of prisoners; the determination of Washington resulted in the independence of his country. In all these and ten thousand other cases there is a plan formed by other beings in respect of us, which finally enters as a controlling element into our destiny" (p. 47).

Scriptural argument.—In advancing to this, we proceed from presumption to proof. But if fully gone into, this would necessarily involve the particular examination of a considerable number of passages, and require more space than can here be given to it. We shall therefore simply subjoin the following list of texts, which in their plain and natural import express the doctrine, and are those on which it is more especially rested by theologians, Mat. xx. 23; xxi. 22-24; Jn. xvii. 9; Ac. xiii. 48; Ro. viii. 28-30; 1x. 23; xl.; Ep. i. 4, 5; 1 Th. i. 4; v. 9; 2 Th. ii. 13; 2 Th. i. 9; ii. 10; 1 Pe. i. 2; 2 Pe. i. 10. Their general meaning will be sufficiently brought out by a reference to the counter-theories of exposition.

Counter-theories.—The first theory by which it is attempted to set aside the obvious interpretation of these passages, is that which admits an election merely to outward gospel privileges. As the Jews, it is asserted, were elected to certain national and special privileges, and to the inheritance of the land of Canaan, the New Testament election must be interpreted in the light of that fact, and applied to the enjoyment of the external privileges of the gospel. That the ancient Jewish people were the subjects of such an election as that now specified we have already admitted. "The Lord chose them to be a special people unto himself above all the people that are on the face of the earth," and his "elect" did "inherit" the land. But the conclusion that is drawn from this treatment of the Jewish people to the prejudice of the personal election of the people of God to eternal life by no means follows. Both elections may be true. Because a national election is asserted in the Scriptures, it is surely strange logic to affirm there can be no election of particular persons. It is a sufficient answer to this theory perhaps to say, that there is scarcely one of the above passages which can be interpreted by it; and our Lord has expressly asserted that "many are called" under the external privilege of gospel ministration, "but few are chosen." Christians are said to be "predestinated to the adoption of children," to be "chosen to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth," to be "ordained unto eternal life;" all which is very different from being elected merely to a gospel state and the external privileges belonging to it.

It is to be observed, moreover, that this interpretation proceeds on a want of understanding of the typical relation between the elect or covenant-people of old, and the church of true believers under the gospel. No one can fail to perceive the folly of keeping both the type and antitype here on the same level of external privilege. The type of course deals with the external and temporal; the antitype with the spiritual and invisible. But this theory, in violation of the plainest rules of typical interpretation, detains the antitype on the same platform with the type, and makes what was outward in the one equally outward in the other. Hence, to adopt the application already made by another, "the election of the Jewish people, as a nation, to outward privileges and a temporal inheritance, was rather a reason why election in the Christian sense must go further and deeper. For the proper counterpart, under the gospel, to those external relations of Judaism, is the gift of grace and the heirship of glory—the lower in the one case shadowing the higher in the other—the outward and temporal representing the spiritual and eternal. Even M'Knight, who cannot certainly be charged with any excess of the spiritual element in his interpretations, perceived the necessity of making, as he expresses it, 'the natural seed the type of the spiritual, and the temporal blessings the emblems of the eternal.' Hence he justly regards the outward professing church in the one case, with its election to the earthly Canaan, as answering in the other to the invisible church, consisting of believers of all nations, who, partaking the nature of God by faith and holiness, are truly the sons of God, and have the inheritance of his blessing" (Fairbairn's Typology, p. 102). To the same effect substantially it is said by Mr. Litton, in his book on the Church of Christ (p. 204)—"Eternal rewards did not belong to the Jewish nation as such, but to the pious members of it. The corresponding fact under the Christian economy is not national, but individual election; and election, not merely to external connection with a visible church, or access to the means of grace (what is to prevent any heathen from placing himself under the preaching of the Word?), but to the effectual grace of the Holy Spirit renewing the heart. Election to the mere possibility, apart from the actual foretaste of salvation, is an idea unknown to the New Testament scriptures. Living, sanctifying union is everywhere pre-supposed in those who are called the elect of God, as when St. Paul connects election and calling directly with justification, with the foretaste of glory, with adoption, &c."

Besides all this, the theory in question relieves us from none of the difficulties that surround our subject. For in point of principle where is the difference between election to personal salvation and eternal life, and election to the "privileges of a gospel condition?" If this last be essential, as all admit, to the ultimate enjoyment of eternal life, surely the great difficulty still presses, viz. —why some are thus favoured, while others are not? why a state of things out of which ultimate salvation may result, and out of which alone it can result, is granted to some and denied to others? Thus, while violence is done to Scripture, the mystery is left very much as it was. The truth is obscured or lost, but the error, however plausible, leaves all our perplexities as it found them. The loss on the one side is without any compensating gain on the other.

Theory of election of characters.—Another theory of the subject is that of an election of characters, as contradistinguished from persons; i.e. an election of such as believe and obey, or such as God foresees shall believe and obey. A very few sentences will suffice to show that this kind of election has no place in the Word of God, and is moreover inconsistent with much that has an important place there. Faith and obedience are never set forth in Scripture as the ground of the decree of election, but, on the other hand, are themselves included in it and secured by it. We are elected not because we believe and obey, but to believe and obey. The faith and obedience, and all the worth and work of man, are the effect of election, and not its cause, 2 Th. ii. 13; 1 Pe. i. 2. It is, moreover, a grave objection to this theory that it gives the glory of salvation to the creature rather than to the Creator; that it gives man whereof to boast, and runs directly in the face of Paul's irresistible argument in Ro. xi, where he declares that "election" is entirely "of grace," and argues, "if by grace, then it is no more of works; otherwise grace is no more of grace. But if it be of works, then is it no more of grace, otherwise work is no more work." Nor is this view of election less inconsistent with the Scripture doctrine of the covenant of grace, under which Christ has a people given him of the Father in consequence of his obedience unto death, Ia. lili. 10; Ja. vi. 38-40. For it leaves the matter altogether uncertain whether there shall be any such people. It leaves it dependent, that is to say, on the will and works of man, and brings in the divine purpose only as based upon these! Surely it is more philosophical, as well as more scriptural, to place the divine purpose first in order, and represent it as involving and securing all the means of its accomplishment.

The relation of the subject to the divine perfections.—We can only glance at this. But it surely were derogatory to God's wisdom to suppose that in any region of his working he works without a previous plan or purpose, or to suppose that the salvation of his people is the only work which he accomplishes without such plan. As a matter of fact, whatever view may be taken of election, a certain number of the human race only are saved, and it is a manifest absurdity to suppose that God has saved them without having determined so to do.

Again, the divine foreknowledge necessarily implies that the events foreknown entered into a purpose or plan. A contingent or uncertain event cannot be foreknown. "There must," says Edwards, "be a certainty in things themselves before they are certainly known, or (which is the same thing) known to be certain." And what is it that makes them thus certain but the divine purpose or decree? The application of this to the doctrine of election is too obvious to be stated. If God knew from eternity who should be saved, it must have been because of his eternal decree to save them. This argument we know is sometimes met by boldly denying the divine foreknowledge of the acts of moral agents. This, it is said, is no more derogatory to God than to say that there are things which even Omnipotence cannot achieve. But these things are such as involve a contradiction in their very statement, as that "God cannot inclose a triangle within two straight lines, and cannot make two parallel lines meet, and cannot make twice two equal five. These are manifestly inherent impossibilities, and imply no defect of power on the part of God. We cannot conceive them to be done. But it is not so in regard to a knowledge of future moral acts. It is conceivable. There is nothing in their nature which renders them inherently unknowable; and ignorance of them implies a defect of knowledge inconsistent with our idea of an omniscient God" (Bibliotheca Sacra, April, 1862). Others admit foreknowledge, but deny that it is associated necessarily with decree. God foreknows, they say, the actions of free agents, but we cannot tell, and need not inquire how. This is not the place, however, for a more extended discussion of these points. (See FOREKNOWLEDGE AND PREDESTINATION.)

As to the doctrine being, as has sometimes been alleged, a "purely speculative dogma, barren of all practical results, exercising no influence on our conduct whatever, and consequently not to be taught as a revealed truth," we simply ask, Is it nothing to have a settled conviction that the entire glory of our salvation, from first to last, belongs to God? Is such a conviction barren? Is it not fitted to awaken gratitude and love? And are not these the great moral forces by which obedience to God is secured and maintained? Undoubtedly, too, that profound humility and sense of human littleness, which spring from a just contemplation of this doctrine, are no mean practical results, and are at the same time causes, in their turn, of the highest forms of devotedness to God which the church or the world has ever seen.

[R. F.]

EL-ELOHE-ISRAEL [God-God of Israel], a compound epithet applied by Jacob to the altar which he erected to God on his return to the land of Canaan, and shortly after he had received the name of Israel, Ge. xxxiii. 20. The El at the beginning designates God as the strong and mighty one, who can do whatever seems good to him, and who, in the recent experience of Jacob, had peculiarly manifested his power in overcoming the deep-rooted enmity of Esau, and thereby averting the most alarming evil which Jacob had ever been called to encounter. In memory of this signal deliverance, and of the goodness of God he had experienced in connection with it, Jacob imposed the significant name of El-Elohe-Israel on the altar he had erected, q. d. To the Mighty One, the God of Israel.

ELEMENTS, in the primary sense of the term, are the component parts of the physical universe; and these, according to the ancients, are fire, air, earth, and water. In this sense the term is used in the last chapter of 2 Peter, where, in reference to the final close of things, it is said, that "the elements shall melt with fervent heat." All shall be, as it were, resolved again into its first principles. The term is also used figuratively of the more elementary parts of religion. Thus, in He. v. 12, it is stated as a matter of reproach against the Jewish believers, that they had need "to be taught again which be the first principles (or elements, στοιχεια) of the oracles of God"—the things which are properly for beginners—the rudiments of the system. It is also applied to the religion of the Old Testament in contradistinction to the New: in former times believers were "in bondage to the elements of the world," Ga. iv. 6; or, as it is again put, though the word is the same in the original, they were under "the rudiments of the world," from which believers are now delivered by the grace of Christ, Col. ii. 20. In both passages the apostle means to designate the religion of the old covenant as of a more elementary and imperfect kind than that of the gospel. It was adapted to the state of those who, as to spiritual things, were in comparative childhood, dealing, as it did, so much in symbol, and with the forms rather than the realities of things. All the fundamental ideas and principles of the gospel were there—only they were exhibited by means of carnal ordinances, which, from their very nature, were incapable of yielding more than an inadequate manifestation of the truth. And now that the truth itself had appeared in its reality and fulness, to revert to the old and cling to it with passionate fondness, but too clearly showed that the gospel of Christ was but imperfectly apprehended.

ELHANAN [God-endowed]. It is generally agreed that some corruption has crept into the text of Scripture in connection with this name, though critics differ as to the precise nature of it, and how the correction ought to be made. In 2 Sa. xxi. 19 it is said, among the exploits of David's heroes, that "Elhanan, the son of Jaare-oregim, a Bethlehemite, slew Goliath the Gittite, the staff of whose spear was like a weaver's beam." The authorized version inserts "brother of"

before Goliath, in order to make the statement correspond with the supposed facts of the case, and with a sort of parallel statement in 1 Ch. xx. 5. In this latter passage we read, that "Elhanan, son of Jair, slew Lahmi, the brother of Goliath the Gittite, the staff of whose spear," &c. Again, we find an "Elhanan, son of Dodo of Bethlehem," among the thirty distinguished heroes of David's time, 2 Sa. xxiii. 24. Some, among others Gesenius, suppose this Elhanan, the son of Dodo, to be the same with the Elhanan previously mentioned at ch. xxi. 19, and that Jaare-oregim there is a corruption. As the name of a man it certainly looks suspicious; though to substitute Dodo for it can only rank as a conjectural emendation. It is quite improbable, however, that there should have been two renowned heroes of Bethlehem in David's time both of the name of Elhanan; and we must suppose that either Jaare-oregim is a corruption of the text, or that the father, Dodo, had two names. Then, as regards the giant killed by this Elhanan in single combat, as it seems quite clear, from the notices both in Samuel and in Chronicles, that the action took place not only after David became king, but in the latter half of his reign, we must either suppose that there was a second Goliath of Gath, who was conquered by Elhanan, as the former one had been by David, or that, according to the text in Chronicles, the reading in Samuel should be, not Goliath, but "the brother of Goliath." Distinguished scholars are found on both sides, and nothing decisive can be urged for either.

ELI [Heb. אֵלִי , probably ascension, height], a priest and judge in Israel; in the latter respect, the immediate predecessor of Samuel. We learn from the genealogical tables, especially that given in 1 Ch. xxiv. 3, seq., that Eli and his family were of the line of Ithamar, the younger of the two sons of Aaron. This line, however, was the smaller and less influential, as well as younger of the two, for when examination was made in David's time into the affairs of the priesthood, with a view to the proper distribution of its families and offices, it was found that there were sixteen heads of distinct families in Eleazar's line, and only eight in that of Ithamar. It seems, therefore, somewhat strange that the head of a family in that younger and weaker line should so early have attained to the high-priesthood. No explanation is given of it in the history; we are simply told that toward the close of the period of the judges, Eli was the priest in the more peculiar sense—that is, the high-priest, 1 Sa. i. He was probably the first in that line who held the office, and may have been elevated to it mainly on account of the qualities which fitted him for discharging the duties of a judge. In this latter respect he was had in high reputation, and judged Israel, it is said, forty years, 1 Sa. iv. 18. The more distinctive honours of the priesthood did not continue long in his family, for in Zadok the elder line again rose to the ascendant, and apparently retained it to the close of the Old Testament history. In regard to Eli himself, his character is presented to us as one of mingled excellences and weaknesses. Personally, he appears to have been a man of unaffected piety and genuine worth. This is evident from the general recognition of his title to the place of a judge in Israel, and also from the deep concern he manifested in his old age for the ark of God, trembling for it in the first instance, and then, when he heard of its surrender into the hands of the enemy, falling paralyzed from the chair on which he sat, and breaking his neck. In such things we plainly see the man of God, profoundly moved by whatever touches the glory of his name and the interests of his kingdom. But this earnest and high-toned piety was conjoined with a melancholy and most culpable slackness in the management of his own family, practises being systematically carried on by his two sons, Hophni and Phinehas, within the very precincts of the sanctuary, which ought to have been instantly, and with the firmest determination, repressed. Instead of exercising this severe but salutary discipline, Eli contented himself with administering a gentle reproof to his sons; told them it was no good report he heard of them; and reminded them of the aggravation their sins derived from the sacred province within which the evil was done. "Ye make the Lord's people to transgress; if one man sin against another, the judge shall judge him; but if a man sin against the Lord, who shall entreat for him?" 1 Sa. ii. 23, seq. But that was all; the sensual and depraved sons were still permitted to retain their office, and they pursued in it, as before, their course of iniquity. Even after the most solemn reproofs and warnings had been administered to Eli, first by a man of God (whose name is concealed), and then through a vision and dream communicated to the child Samuel, he appears to have taken no effective measures against the evil. No doubt the languor and feebleness incident to his advanced age may partly account for his soft and apathetic behaviour; but it was not sufficient to excuse him, since, if he felt inadequate to the task of reforming what was amiss, he should have resigned his office into the hands of one more capable of administering it aright. Accordingly, the long-threatened judgment of God at last burst like a storm on him and his family. The Philistines marched up in battle array against the land, and, amid the disasters that ensued, both Eli himself, and his two profligate sons, fell victims to the wrath of Heaven.

Eli was ninety-eight years old when he died, and his eyes were dim that he could not see, 1 Sa. iv. 15; too old and feeble, doubtless, for the responsible position he occupied. And in this alone his case forms a warning to the servants of God in future times; showing, as it so palpably did, that to cling to office when the natural decay and infirmities of life incapacitate one for its proper and efficient discharge, is itself a serious failing of duty. But most of all does his case provide a testimony and a warning against the undue relaxation of parental discipline and authority. To allow sin to proceed unchecked, or remain unpunished in the family, is in any case an unwise as well as unrighteous procedure—a cruelty to the children, not less than an unfaithfulness to God. But when such procedure comes to be practised by one holding a high and responsible office in the household of faith, the evil is immensely aggravated, since those who should be lights and examples to others thereby become ringleaders in corruption. It was expressly on this account that judgment fell so heavily on the house of Eli.

ELI'AB [Heb. אֱלִיָּאב, God for father]. 1. A leader of the tribe of Zebulun, Nu. i. 9; 2. a Reubenite, an ancestor of Dathan and Abiram, Nu. xxvi. 8, 9; 3. an ancestor of Samuel the prophet, 1 Ch. vi. 21; 4. and, to say nothing of one or two others, of whom no more than the names are known, 1 Ch. xii. 9; xvi. 6, David's eldest brother, 1 Sa. xvii. 13, 28. Even of him we know nothing, except that he seems to have looked with a kind of envious eye toward David, and sought rather to check than to encourage him in his enterprise against Goliath.

ELI'ADA [whom God cares for]. 1. A son of David; the last but one born to him in Jerusalem, 2 Sa. v. 16; 1 Ch. iii. 8. In another passage the name is changed into Beeliada (whom Baal cares for), 1 Ch. xiv. 7—an important and somewhat melancholy change, but why adopted is unknown. 2. The father of Rezon the Syrian, 1 Ki. xi. 23. 3. A Benjamite, a mighty man of war, who led an immense force from his tribe to assist Jehoshaphat in his wars, 2 Ch. xvii. 17.

ELIAH'BA [whom God hides, i.e. keeps in safety amid perils]. One of David's thirty heroes, 2 Sa. xxiii. 32.

ELIA'KIM [set or appointed by God]. 1. An officer in the household of Hezekiah, and a man apparently of faith and probity, as he was one of the commissioners sent by the king to treat with the messengers of Sennacherib, 2 Ki. xviii. 18, seq., and is also referred to with honour by Isaiah as a kind of typical servant of God, ch. xxii. 20.

2. ELIAKIM. A king of Judah, son and successor of Josiah, whom Pharaoh-Nechoh made king after the death of his father. Pharaoh, at the same time, changed his name to Jehoiakim, which simply substitutes the J, contraction for Jehovah, for El, God, and means set by Jehovah. As it is by this latter name that he is chiefly known in history, the reader is referred to it for a notice of the facts of his reign.

3. ELIAKIM. A priest in the days of Nehemiah, who took part in the dedication of the new wall of Jerusalem, Ne. xii. 41.

4. ELIAKIM. The original name of the king of Judah, who is better known by that of Zedekiah.

ELI'AM [God's people]. 1. The father of Bathsheba, but called Ammiel in Chronicles, 2 Sa. xi. 3. 2. Son of Ahithophel, and one of David's thirty warriors, 2 Sa. xxiii. 34.

ELI'AS. See ELIJAH.

ELI'SHIB [whom God restored]. 1. A priest in David's time, and one of the governors of the sanctuary, 1 Ch. xxiv. 10. 2. A high-priest in the time of Nehemiah, who had also formed some alliance with Tobiah the Ammonite, and given him a chamber in the temple-courts, for which the wrath of Nehemiah was called forth, Ne. iii. 1, 20; xiii. 4, 7. 3. Various others of this name are mentioned, Est. i. 24, 27, 32.

ELI'EL [whose strength is God]. A common name among the Hebrews, but nothing of any note is preserved of any one bearing it, 1 Ch. viii. 20; xi. 46; xii. 11; xv. 9, 11; 2 Ch. xxxi. 13.

ELIE'ZER [whom God helps]; substantially the same with ELEAZAR, though the names are not interchanged in Scripture. 1. ELIEZER first appears as the name of one in the household of Abraham; he is called Eliezer of Damascus, Ge. xv. 5. It has been supposed by some, from the expression rendered "steward of my house," being literally "son of possession of my house," that he was probably a relative of Abraham, and his heir-at-law. This, it is thought, receives confirmation from what follows, in which Abraham says, "Lo! one born in my house (literally and properly, the son of my house) is mine heir," as if pointing to a relative in his family. Undoubtedly there appears to have been some bond between Abraham and this man superior to that of an ordinary servant, but we want the means of determining what it actually was. As Scripture is altogether silent of any blood relationship, or of any branch of Abraham's kindred being about Damascus, the probability rather is that Eliezer, though he may also have been a distant relative, was something like an adopted son of Abraham, and that as such the main part of Abraham's possessions should have fallen to him if Abraham himself died childless.

2. ELIEZER. The second son of Moses and Zipporah, to whom Moses gave the name Eliezer as a memorial of the help granted to him by God, Ex. xviii. 4.

3. ELIEZER. Various persons, besides those above noticed, bore this name, but none of them rose to any distinction, excepting a prophet, the son of Dodavah, who rebuked Jehoshaphat because of his wicked alliance with Ahaziah, king of Israel, 2 Ch. xx. 37; 1 Ch. vii. 8; xv. 24; xxvii. 16; Esr. viii. 16; x. 18, 23, 31.

ELIHU [whose God is He]. 1. One of the interlocutors in the book of Job. He stands in some sense apart from the three friends of Job, betwixt whom and himself the chief part of the dialogue was carried on; and without any previous notice even of his presence, we are told at a certain point that "wrath was kindled in Elihu the son of Barachel the Buzite, of the kindred of Ram," Job xxxii. 2. The designation of the Buzite has been thought to indicate his relationship to Buz, one of the sons of Nahor by Milcah, Ge. xxi. 21. This is certainly possible, but the description is of too brief and general a kind to warrant any definite conclusions of such a nature. Elihu represents himself as by much the youngest person in the party, and it may have been on that account that his name was omitted at the outset; he may have been regarded as a kind of minister or attendant of the three friends, rather than one of themselves. He tells us that his youth kept him silent so long as the more aged men had anything to say; and when at last he does open his mouth, he enters into a formal apology and defence of himself for presuming to speak in such presence. What he said, however, came nearer to the point than many things which had been uttered by those who preceded him; and in token of his comparative superiority, he is not included with the three friends in the sacrifices and intercessions that were to be presented by Job in their behalf, Job xlii. 7-9. (See JOB.)

2. ELIHU. A forefather of Samuel the prophet, the son of Tohu, 1 Sa. i. 1. In 1 Ch. vi. 34, however, Eliel is the name that stands in the same position—Eliel the son of Toah; probably mere accidental or linguistic variations.

3. ELIHU. A Korhite Levite, one of the door-keepers of the house of the Lord in the time of David, and of the family of Obed-edom, 1 Ch. xxvi. 7.

4. ELIHU. Also one of the captains of thousands who, from the tribe of Manasseh, followed David to Ziklag before the battle of Gilboa, 1 Ch. xii. 20.

ELIJAH (Heb. אֵלִיָּהוּ and אֵלִיָּהוּ, Eliahu, God-Jah, i.e. God-Jehovah), in the Septuagint and the New Testament ELIAS—a great Israelitish prophet. On his first appearance he is simply denominated "Elijah the Tishbite, of the inhabitants of Gilead," 1 Ki. xvii. 1. This has been commonly understood to represent him as a native of some Israelitish town called Tishbe or Tisbe; and so undoubtedly the ancients understood it, only some of them appear to have placed Tishbe, not in Gilead, but in Galilee. Tobit speaks of himself as a "captive from Tishbe, which is at the right hand of that city which is called properly Nephthali, in Galilee above Aser" (1. 2). But Josephus says of Elijah that he was of "a town Thebone, in the country of Gilead" (ἐκ πόλεως Θεσβώνης τῆς Γαλααδίτιδος χώρας, Ant. viii. 13, 2). It must be admitted that nothing certain is known of either of these places; and though the opinion has generally prevailed that a Tishbe in Galilee was the birth-place of Elijah, it cannot be said to rest on any valid authority. Several continental writers have not only disparaged this opinion, but have gone to the extreme of holding that he was not a native of Palestine at all; that he was not even of the stock of Israel, but a native probably of some place in Arabia, and a mere resident, by which they understand a temporary resident, or sojourner in the land of Gilead (Kali on 1 Ki. xvii., and the authorities there cited). This appears a very improbable view, and destitute of any proper support in the notices of Scripture. Whether there might be such a place as Tishbe in Gilead or not, still, when Elijah is made known as "of the inhabitants of Gilead," the natural import of the expression unquestionably is, that he belonged to that section of Israel who inhabited the extensive district on the farther side of Jordan, known by the name of Gilead. Even thus interpreted the designation is somewhat vague; for anything it tells us, Elijah may have had his residence in the territories of Reuben, of Gad, or Manasseh; he may have been himself a member of one of those tribes, or he may have belonged to the tribe of Levi, possibly even to the narrower circle of the Aaronic priesthood. Such points are left altogether indeterminate; and were so probably for the purpose of rendering more markedly prominent his distinctive character and calling—that he might be known and thought of simply as the great prophet reformer. In this light alone is he presented to our view in the sacred history. His whole mission and striving were embodied in his name. His one grand object was to awaken Israel to the conviction that Jehovah, Jehovah alone is God. Hence it is important, for bringing out the precise import and bearing of his utterances, to keep up the name JEHOVAH wherever it occurs in the original.

The period of Israelitish history at which Elijah appeared was one that emphatically called for the living exhibition of this great truth. It was the period of Ahab's apostasy, when, through the influence and example of his wife Jezebel, he formally introduced the worship of other gods into Israel. In the language of the sacred historian, "it seemed a light thing for him to walk in the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat; and he took to wife Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Zidonians, and went and served Baal, and worshipped him. And he reared up an altar for Baal in the house of Baal, which he had built in Samaria," &c., 1 Ki. xvi. 31. In other words, he did not rest, like his predecessors, with the corrupt worship of Jehovah under the symbol of a calf, but brought in the worship of the Tyrian Baal, with its usual accompaniment of the Asherah pollutions—the rites of the Syrian Venus. It may readily be conceived that, to reconcile the people to so fundamental a change, sophistical arts of various kinds would need to be resorted to; and it would seem, from several indications in the history—in particular from the interchange that was kept up between the names of Jehovah and Baal, Ho. ii. 16, and from the terms in which Elijah put the question for decision on Mount Carmel, 1 Ki. xviii. 21—that pains were taken to mediate between the rival services, and to make it appear that there was no essential difference between Jehovah and Baal. Elijah was raised up for the more immediate purpose of dissipating these vain sophistications, and showing, by terrible things in righteousness, that there was a real and irreconcilable difference between the rival deities—that Jehovah was the one living and true God, and Baal but a dumb and senseless idol. Hence he enters on the work assigned him as the special servant or messenger of Jehovah, and in his name announces absolutely what shall come to pass, confident that there is no power in heaven or earth capable of reversing the word. "And Elijah said unto Ahab, As Jehovah God of Israel liveth, before whom I stand, there shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word," 1 KI. xvii. 1. By the introduction of the worship of Baal, Ahab had in a manner displaced Jehovah from his acknowledged supremacy in Israel, and the prophet, as his accredited representative, solemnly protests against the impiety, proclaims Jehovah still to be the God of Israel, and vindicates the claim by shutting up heaven for a time over the territory of Israel.

In his mode of doing this, it will be observed, Elijah assumed the attitude of a priest or Levite, whose special business it was "to stand before the Lord to minister unto him," De. x. 8. This does not prove that he in reality was so—though, as has been already intimated, he may have been—but it shows the kind of priestly position which the prophets deemed it necessary to take up in the kingdom of Israel, on account of the dislocated state into which matters had been brought. They assumed no such position in the kingdom of Judah, where the theocratic constitution, with its Aaronic priesthood, continued in a measure to subsist. But in Israel, especially during the reign of Ahab, when the very foundations were out of course, and there was neither king nor priest to do the part assigned them by the theocracy, the prophetic agency required to rise with the occasion, and, as under a special commission from above, had both to make known God's will and to do before him priestly service.

After the utterance of a word, by which the genial influences of heaven were to be laid under arrest for a series of years, it obviously became necessary that a hiding-place should be provided for Elijah, that he might escape as well from the violence of those in high places, as from the importunities of others, who might endeavour to prevail upon his pity. Such a hiding-place was found for him to the east—probably beyond the limits of the kingdom of Israel—beside the brook Cherith, that flowed into the Jordan. (See CHERITH.) There he not only found water from the brook, but also supplies of bread and flesh, morning and evening, ministered at God's command by ravens. This mode of furnishing the prophet with food has appeared too marvellous for many commentators, and various devices have been resorted to in order to lighten the difficulty. By some the orebin (ravens) was changed into arebin (Arabians); by others it was understood to indicate the inhabitants of the city Orbo, or the rock Oreb; and others still again, by ascribing to it an altogether unsupported meaning, have substituted merchants for ravens. These explanations may be summarily dismissed as at once grammatically untenable, and unsatisfactory in the sense yielded by them; for how unlikely was it that such parties should carry any supplies of food to Elijah so circumstanced? especially that they should do so morning and evening! Nor is the solution of Michaelis much better, that the retreat of Elijah lay near to a great raven-haunt, and that he took advantage of the young hares, wild fowl, &c., which those voracious creatures brought within his reach. Provisions of this sort could never be turned into "bread and flesh in the morning, and bread and flesh in the evening." The words plainly express a supernatural employment of the ravens for the purpose—wonderful, indeed, as everything supernatural is, but surely not more wonderful than the infliction at Elijah's word of the long-continued drought which occasioned it, or the fetching down, at a later stage of the prophet's history, of two successive streams of fire to consume the forces sent against him. Any birds might have served the purpose in question, but the ravenous nature of those actually employed undoubtedly heightened the evidence afforded by the transaction of the overruling power and providence of God.

The brook Cherith, however, in course of time dried up, and another place of refuge had to be provided for the prophet. This was found in a most unlikely quarter, in the house of a widow—a poor widow, as she proved to be, with an only son—and she, not in the land of Israel, but at Zarephath, in the territory of Zidon—the native region of the infamous Jezebel, 1 KI. xvii. 9. Notwithstanding the Lord tells Elijah that he has commanded this widow to sustain him; and being perfectly assured that God's word could not fail, he proceeded without delay to prove it. Brought by divine direction to the place, and to the woman, he found her near the gate of the city gathering a few sticks to prepare her last meal, that she and her son might thereafter die. In the unswerving confidence of faith he bids her go and bake the bread as she intended, but in the first instance to bring a portion of it with a little water to him—demanding such faith from her as he himself exercised toward God. And he added, as the ground both of her belief and of his own demand, "For thus saith Jehovah God of Israel, the barrel of meal shall not waste, neither shall the cruse of oil fail, till the day that Jehovah sendeth rain on the earth." Strange as the whole must have seemed, the Zidonian widow made no scruple about complying with the word spoken; and in accordance with the assurance given her, the miraculous supply of meal and oil continued as long as it was needed. She was blessed because she believed; and from her believing conduct, with its present recompense of good, the heart of the prophet also could not fail to draw encouragement and strength. But her faith was by and by put to a fresh trial, and in that trial discovered a certain measure of imperfection in respect to spiritual insight or desire. On the occasion of a severe illness befalling her son, which soon reached a fatal termination, she said to Elijah in what appears a somewhat petulant tone, "What have I to do with thee, O thou man of God? Art thou come unto me to call my sin to remembrance, and to slay my son?" A proper feeling probably lay at the bottom of the address. The devout and holy life of Elijah had enlightened her conscience, and impressed her with convictions of sin, such as she had not previously known. Possibly also she may have felt that she had profited less than she ought to have done by the residence of such a man in her house, and may, in consequence, have become more liable to chastisement. So far, the feelings working in her bosom may have been reasonable and proper; but they still hardly account for the peculiar form of her address to the prophet. This seems to imply that she looked upon him as, in a sense, the occasion of her calamity, and that it had been better for her not to have known him, than to have become the subject of such a discipline. What might be wrong in it, however, was graciously overlooked; as matters stood, the calamity proved a heavy trial to Elijah as well as to the widow; and with holy freedom and earnestness he laid it before the Lord. "He cried unto Jehovah and said, O Jehovah my God, hast thou also brought evil upon the widow with whom I sojourn, by slaying her son?" The cry was heard; and after stretching himself three times upon the child—thereby presenting, as it were, a channel of communication for the divine power to pass into the lifeless body—and crying, while he did so, "O Jehovah my God, I pray thee, let this child's soul come into him again"—the child began to breathe again, and was presently delivered alive to his mother. On receiving him, she said, "Now by this I know that thou art a man of God, and that the word of Jehovah in thy mouth is truth;" that is, she knew it now in a manner she had not done before; the truth burst upon her mind with a power which had all the freshness of novelty.

It was in the third year, as it would seem, of Elijah's sojourn with the widow of Zarephath, that the word of the Lord came to him, announcing the near prospect of rain, and bidding him go and show himself to Ahab, 1 KI. xviii. 1. Some would understand the expression "in the third year" from the commencement of the drought, but this would restrict too much the whole period; as in two passages of the New Testament, Lu. iv. 25; Ja. v. 17, the drought is expressly said to have lasted three years and a half. If, as is probable, Elijah spent nearly one year beside the brook Cherith, it would leave two years and some months for his residence at Zarephath, and hence he might be said to leave it in the third year. When going forth on this new and more active part of his mission, he was met with a striking evidence of the extent to which the famine prevailed in Samaria; having fallen in with Obadiah, the chamberlain of Ahab, on a search throughout the land for fountains and brooks of water, that all the cattle might not perish. The prophet was recognized by Obadiah, and was treated by him with respectful obeisance. But on being charged to go and tell his master Ahab, that Elijah was there, he began to imagine that the prophet had some design upon his life, and asked if Elijah did not know how he feared God, and hid so many as fifty prophets in a cave, and fed them with bread and water, to protect them from the fury of Jezebel! He also mentioned, as the ground of his apprehensions in the present case, that the most rigorous search had been made for Elijah throughout the land of Israel and the neighbouring kingdoms, evidently for the purpose of laying violent hands on him; and he could not suppose that Elijah would now expose himself to the risk of meeting Ahab, in the defenceless state in which he appeared. In this, however, he was mistaken, and having been solemnly assured of Elijah's determination to show himself to Ahab, he went to his master with the tidings. On meeting Elijah the king addressed him with the reproachful charge, "Art thou he that troubleth Israel?" but was answered with the indignant reply, "I have not troubled Israel, but thou and thy father's house, in that ye have forsaken the commandments of Jehovah, and thou hast followed Baalim." And he added a request—for the purpose of bringing the controversy to an issue, and ascertaining where the source of the evil actually lay—that Ahab would cause Israel to assemble on Carmel, to witness between him on the one side, and the prophets of Baal and Asherah on the other. (The latter are called in the authorized version prophets of the groves—improperly, see under ASHTAROTH.) Of these prophets there are said to have been 450 of the former class, and 400 of the latter; and the latter, the prophets of Asherah, it is stated, ate at the queen's table; meaning probably that they were maintained at her expense, as being the servants of her own Syrian goddess. No mention is made of them in the memorable transactions that presently took place on Carmel; so that they must either have declined the contest, or it must have been deemed prudent to withhold them from being present on the occasion. But the 450 prophets of Baal appeared, and along with them Ahab himself, and a vast multitude of the people. All Israel, in a sense, were there to be spectators of the contest.

If looked at in an external point of view, never did combatants seem more unequally matched. In the interest of Baal there stood the 450 prophets, with the king, and doubtless many also of the leading men in the kingdom, at their back; while Elijah alone ventured openly to espouse the cause of Jehovah. When he put the question to the assembled people, "How long halt ye between two opinions? If Jehovah be God, follow him; but if Baal, follow him," there was no response; "the people answered him not a word." They were not prepared to take up and avow the position, that there was such a distinction between Jehovah and Baal, as rendered their claims of service properly antagonistic, and necessitated a choice between the two. The matter must, therefore, be submitted to a palpable and decisive test. Let each party take an offering, cut it in pieces, lay it on wood as ready to be consumed in sacrifice; and let the one who answers by fire be the God. This proposal at once commended itself to the people. It would do so, we may conceive, the more readily, because it was by fire that Jehovah had revealed himself to their fathers, when the Levitical service was originally set up, Le. ix. 24; and also because, if it gave any advantage to either party, this manifestly lay on the side of the numerous retinue that represented the interest of Baal. Elijah even conceded to them a further advantage, in allowing them the right, on account of their number, to kill their victim first, and so giving them the opportunity of obtaining a prior decision in their behalf, if it was in the power of their god to bestow it. In such circumstances it was impossible for them to decline the trial. They prepared their bullock and dressed it, but put no fire under, and with earnest importunity began to cry, O Baal, hear us. So they continued, it is said, from morning until noon, when Elijah in mockery bade them cry aloud, in case their god might be asleep, or engaged in some busy and interesting occupation, from which he needed to be somewhat forcibly recalled. Then they redoubled their vehemence, and, after the manner of the Syrian devotees, cut themselves with knives and lancets, till the blood gushed out.

were wont to be made by the worshippers of the Syrian goddess: "A discordant howling opens the scene. Then they fly wildly through one another, with the head sunk down to the ground, but turning round in circles, so that the loose-flowing hair drags through the mire; thereupon they first bite themselves on the arms, and at last cut themselves with two-edged swords, which they are wont to carry. Then begins a new scene: one of them who surpasses all the rest in frenzy begins to prophesy with sighs and groans, openly accuses himself of his past sins, which he now wishes to punish by the mortifying of the flesh, takes the knotted whip, which the galls are wont to bear, lashes his back, cuts himself with swords, until the blood trickles down from his mangled body," 1 p. 682, quoted by Keil on 1 KI. xviii. 26-29.]

But all was to no purpose; "there was no voice, nor any to answer, nor any that regarded." Then, about the time of the evening sacrifice (that is, about three o'clock in the afternoon), Elijah stepped forward to do his part—repaired an altar that had fallen down, with twelve stones, corresponding to the twelve tribes of Israel—the ideal number of the covenant-people, whose God Jehovah was—and, having arranged his bullock and the wood, caused a trench to be dug around, and barrels of water to be poured on the altar, till not only the wood was thoroughly wetted, but the trench also was filled with the overflow. Then with sublime simplicity he came near and said, "Jehovah, God of Abraham, Isaac, and of Israel, let it be known this day, that THOU art God in Israel, and that I am thy servant, and that I have done all these things at thy word. Hear me, O Lord, hear me, that this people may know that thou Jehovah art God, and that thou hast turned their heart back again." No sooner had he spoken, than the fire fell from heaven and consumed the sacrifice, and even licked up the water that was in the trench. The effect was electrifying; the people in one mass fell on their faces, and shouted, "Jehovah, he is the God, Jehovah, he is the God."

Elijah, however, was not content to let the matter rest there; he called upon the people instantly to carry out their convictions of truth, by enforcing the penalty of the law upon those who had been labouring to subvert its fundamental principles. "Take the prophets of Baal," said he; "let not one of them escape." The advice was promptly followed; for the whole 450 were brought down to the brook Kishon and slain there. The treatment has often been characterized as harsh, but unjustly, when contemplated, as it ought to be, from the Old Testament point of view. The commonwealth of Israel being a theocracy, in which all was professedly held of Jehovah as its one living and supreme head, idolatry was therefore condemned as treason; the promoter of idolatrous worship, or the false prophet, who spake in the name of another god than Jehovah, was to be summarily put to death, De. xiii. xviii.; so that Elijah and the people now only did what Ahab as the visible head of the commonwealth should already have done. If Ahab himself had fallen in the carnage as the active abettor of Baal-worship, it would have been no breach of constitutional principle.

The crisis seemed now past; the decision of assembled Israel had been given, and Jehovah was once more publicly acknowledged as the one living and true God. "The heavens heard the earth," and forthwith began to temper their fiery glow. "Get thee up," exclaimed Elijah, decrying the change, "eat and drink, for there is a sound of abundance of rain." The prophet himself went up to Carmel to pray, and look for the refreshing shower, Ja. v. 17; and the moment the little cloud was discerned in the horizon, though not bigger than a man's hand, he hastened back to Ahab to tell him to speed forward his journey, while himself, as if inspired with the energy of a new life, girt up his loins, and ran before Ahab to the entrance of Jezreel—a distance of about fifteen miles—amid torrents of rain. It was a day of triumph to the noble-hearted prophet, and he probably thought that the victory was now finally won—that his person would be as safe, and his name as honoured at Jezreel as in any other part of the land!

But his ardent hopes in this respect soon met with a mortifying reverse. So far from being humbled and subdued by the news of the terrible scene on Carmel, Jezebel seemed only roused into greater fury, and sent a message to Elijah, accompanied with an oath, that by to-morrow she would have him made like one of the slain prophets. If she really wished to kill Elijah, she betrayed a foolish impetuosity of temper in sending such a message. But it is possible, after what had happened, that she scarcely desired to have the opportunity of putting her own threat in execution; and she may have uttered it more for the purpose of ridding Jezreel of his presence, than of committing herself to the destruction of his life. Anyhow, the determination avowed was, in the circumstances, indicative of a most impious and hardened state of mind. It appalled for the moment the lion-hearted prophet; his courage sank at the tidings; and he arose and went for his life, taking his servant with him as far as Beersheba, but himself pressing on a whole day's journey into the wilderness. There he found a juniper-tree under which he sat down, and requested for himself that he might die. "It is enough," he said, "now, Jehovah, take away my life; for I am not better than my fathers," 1 KI. xix. 4. It was the language of fainting and despondency: he had done his best; mighty forces had been operating through his hand, and he had been enabled to do great things by them; but it was a hopeless struggle; the throne of iniquity still held its place; he was no more able to prevail than his fathers; why should his life any longer be prolonged? Such, apparently, was the feeling that wrought in his bosom—not altogether to be justified, but, at the same time, so natural in the circumstances, so difficult to be repressed, that his case called for pity and support, rather than rebuke. And he got what he needed; for his work was by no means done yet, as he had too hastily supposed. He was first thrown into a profound sleep, and when he awoke he found at his side, brought by an angel's hand, a cake baked on the coals, and a cruse of water. Of these he partook and refreshed himself, and again laid himself down to rest. But he was admonished a second time by the angel to arise and eat, as a great journey was before him; and in the strength of the food then received, it is said, he went forty days and forty nights. A supernatural result, doubtless! for no merely natural supply of food could have sustained his animal frame for such a length of time; but this does not hinder, that the natural in the present case, as in so many others, formed the ground on which the supernatural raised itself, and that a certain measure of the one might be required for the fitting development of the other.

The support of the bodily frame in undecayed freshness for forty days, and that in connection with a sojourn in Horeb, whither Elijah was now borne by the Spirit of God, plainly brings this prophet into a certain relationship to Moses. The wonder of Moses, as a man capable of dwelling on the mount of God, and holding a face-to-face communion with Heaven, again in a measure repeats itself. There is a manifest resemblance, though with a difference suited to the altered circumstances of the time; and so in what follows. At Horeb the prophet takes up his abode in a cave; and when there the word of Jehovah came to him saying, "What doest thou here, Elijah?" To which he replied in a somewhat querulous and disaffected tone, "I have been very jealous for Jehovah, God of hosts; for the children of Israel have forsaken thy covenant, thrown down thine altars, and slain thy prophets with the sword; and I, I only, am left, and they seek my life to take it away." The state of feeling was much akin to that of Moses, when, descending from the mount, he found the people wholly given to idolatry, and in the vehemence of a righteous indignation broke the tables of the law, and called upon every man to unsheath his sword against his fellow. This severe and stormy mood soon passed away, and he presently became the earnest intercessor of his people. Elijah, too, subsequently came into a like tender and more subdued frame, but it was the other which held possession of his soul at the cave in Horeb. He spake as if he had been more jealous for the interest of God, than God had been for it himself; as if when so many altars had been thrown down, so many prophets slain, and an all but universal apostasy prevailed, it was just matter of complaint that no greater judgments from Heaven had been inflicted on the evil-doers, and no more adequate help given to second his endeavours. To correct his judgment in this respect, and bring him to a better mind, he has presented to his view a series of symbols, in which the Lord appeared as the direct agent. First, a great and strong wind rent the mountains, and brake in pieces the rocks before the Lord; then an earthquake; and after the earthquake a fire. It is said that Jehovah was not in any of these—meaning, not that they were caused otherwise than by his immediate working, or were not symbols of certain operations of his hand, but that at this particular time he did not reveal himself in one or other of these to Elijah. They were rather the symbols of that vehemence and angry frame of mind, which prevailed in the prophet himself, than of any feeling or purpose now cherished in the heart of God. But after them all there came a still small voice, a soft and gentle breathing, as it were, which when the prophet heard, he wrapped his face in his mantle and went to the mouth of the cave, where he heard the voice of Jehovah again asking him what he was doing there. Jehovah would now manifest himself, not in the terrific emblems of power, such as were fitted to appal and terrify men's minds, but in the still small voice, which might win its way into their better feelings, and with quiet energy prompt and persuade them to wiser counsels. This was the kind of agency which the Lord would now have Elijah to understand still remained to be plied in Israel: Enough, it virtually said, of overawing displays from the secret place of thunder; gentler and more persuasive measures must now be pursued; nor has the effect produced by the former been in vain, it has thrown the way open for more peaceful action.

Such was the main purport of the instruction conveyed on this occasion to Elijah. It was followed up however by certain communications of a more explicit kind. In these he was directed to return, not precisely to the land of Israel, but to the wilderness of Damascus, where he might find a comparatively safe retreat; and thereafter—not perhaps immediately, but as opportunity might offer, or the course of Providence might open the way, to anoint Hazael king over Syria, Jehu king over Israel, and Elisha to be prophet in his own room. He was also informed, that in connection with these appointments there were to be severe visitations of judgment; some were to be slain by Hazael, some by Jehu, and some still again at the instance of Elisha. At the same time he was given to understand, that matters were not so bad in Israel as he had imagined, and that beside himself, there remained 7000 who had not yet bowed the knee, or by kissing done obeisance to the image of Baal. There was, therefore, room for fresh operations, and some ground to hope that a revived interest might yet be awakened in the worship and service of Jehovah. Elijah was doubtless cheered to learn that such was the case, and set forth, we may well conceive, with a lightened heart on his new commission. The first part of it that he was enabled to execute is what was mentioned last in the divine communication—the calling of Elisha to succeed him in the prophetic office. This, it would appear from the narrative, took place very shortly after his return to the Syrian region, probably when on his way to the wilderness of Damascus; for it is mentioned in immediate succession to what took place at Horeb, and Abel-meholah, where Elisha resided, lay in the valley of the Jordan, not far from the route of Elijah toward the place of his immediate sojourn.

We hear nothing of the operations of these servants of God in the wilderness of Damascus, nor are we told how long they sojourned there. A war with Syria meanwhile sprung up, in which Ahab and Israel came off victorious, 1 KI. XX. The success could scarcely fail to inflame the pride of Ahab and Jezebel, and was probably among the causes that contributed to the atrocious procedure, which issued in the deliberate murder of Naboth, and the appropriation of his vineyard. It was this wicked conduct which again drew Elijah from his lurking-place. In obedience to the word of the Lord he went to meet Ahab, when he came to take possession of his ill-gotten property; and as if an apparition had suddenly presented itself before him, the guilty monarch exclaimed, "Hast thou found me, O mine enemy?" "I have found thee," was the prompt reply; and then followed a terrible denunciation of the iniquity that had been committed, and of the sweeping desolation and ruin that were destined to befall Ahab and his house. In respect to Ahab himself the threatening took effect without any further intervention on Elijah's part, and in connection with a fresh Syrian war, which cost the king of Israel his life. We first meet with our prophet again in the time of his successor Ahaziah, who in the second year of his reign fell through a lattice in his upper chamber, and presently after sent messengers to inquire of Baal-zebub the god of Ekron, whether he should recover of his disease. Elijah was admonished by the word of the Lord to go and meet them, and to ask, whether it was because there was no God in Israel that they went to inquire of the god of Ekron, 2 KI. I. 3. This reproachful interrogation was accompanied with a solemn message in the name of Jehovah, that the king should not come down from the bed on which he was laid, but should surely die. The messengers, on receiving such a message, naturally turned back; and then ensued a memorable scene in Elijah's history. The enraged monarch despatched a company of fifty soldiers to apprehend him; and when these through their captain delivered to him the message, "Thou man of God, the king hath said, Come down," they were greeted by the stern reply, "If I be a man of God, then let fire come down from heaven, and consume thee and thy fifty." Presently, fire did come down and consume them. The same scene was enacted over again with another fifty; and only when the captain of the third implored that his life and the life of his men might be spared, did Elijah, at the divine suggestion, go down and present himself before the king. But it was only to repeat anew, beside the bed of the now humbled monarch, the same awful words which he had originally addressed to the persons commissioned to inquire at Ekron.

The conduct of Elijah on this occasion has often been objected to as harsh and intemperate. But if it actually had been so, the charge would not so much lie against the prophet, as against God, who formally sanctioned the procedure of his servant by sending the fire from heaven that had been sought. It were folly, in such a case, to restrict the charge of blame to the conduct of the inferior agent in the transaction. But what room could there be in such a case for any charge of undue severity? After the most extraordinary visitations of providence, and threatenings of coming judgment still more appalling, the Israelitish court continued wedded as much as ever to its idolatry—practically defying Heaven to its face. Therefore, instead of denouncing it as harsh, that some of the more active participants in the royal measures were killed, one should rather speak of the forbearance and mercy which suffered any of them to escape; for by the constitution under which they lived, all had become liable to utter excision. It is true, that our Lord condemned two of his disciples for seeking to call down fire from heaven on a village of the Samaritans, after the manner of Elias, Lu. ix. 55. But the circumstances were by no means parallel. Jesus had not manifested himself to the Samaritans as Jehovah had done through Elijah to the Israelites; nor was his life exposed at all to such peril by the conduct of the Samaritans, as that which hung around Elijah at the time of his evoking fire from heaven. Besides, the old things were now passing away; and the executions of corporeal evil and temporal judgment, which guarded the ancient economy, would have been entirely out of place, if brought into connection with a state of things essentially different.

It comes plainly enough out in some of the notices relating to the immediately preceding transactions, and also in other incidental notices of the same period, that considerable progress had been made to the better in Israel since the destruction of the false prophets at Carmel, and that the true prophetic agency had become both freer in its scope, and more active in its movements. Elijah himself was allowed without molestation to meet Ahab on the vineyard of Naboth, and proclaim the Lord's message. Even in his transactions with Ahaziah, it was rather the nature of the word spoken, than the fact of his going at large and engaging in prophetic work, which provoked the wrath of the king. Then, in Ahab's first Syrian war we read of one of the sons of the prophets meeting him, and freely administering to him a rebuke, 1 Ki. xx. 35, seq. Also in the second Syrian war, in which Ahab lost his life, the prophet Micaiah appeared openly before Ahab, and delivered his mind upon the subject—with the king's displeasure, no doubt, yet as one who was in the habit of declaring boldly the Lord's counsel. Such things indicated a mighty advance since the time that Elijah complained of all the Lord's prophets but himself having been slain, and of his having had to flee for his own life. It is evident, that during the interval there had been great prophetic activity on the part of Elijah and his fellow-labourer Elisha; and that their quiet, peaceful ministrations, imaged in the still small voice at Horeb, had accomplished far more than the giant energy and convulsive action that preceded it. Hence also in the next and closing scene of Elijah's history, that of his translation to glory, we find sons of the prophets in considerable numbers (fifty men of strength among them are expressly mentioned), moving around the scene; and of these, some appear to have had their settled abode even in Bethel, one of the chief seats of idolatry, 2 Ki. ii. 3, 16. The schools of the prophets had now again manifestly been revived, and, with divisions of their members located in diverse places, they were kept in regular organization and efficient working by the great prophet, whom they all acknowledged as their earthly head.

But at length the time set by God came for removing this head to a higher sphere. The purpose had been communicated to himself, and the mode also, in so far as it was to be by a whirlwind, that he should be carried up from the earth. It had been revealed at the same time to Elisha; so that he would on no account leave his master—though the latter repeatedly sought to be left alone, that his departure might take place in the privacy which was most congenial to his own feelings. The two started from Gilgal, then they went to Bethel, from this they came back to Jericho; and as Elijah said the Lord had sent him to these places, the probability is, that he wished to give some parting counsel to the prophetic institutions there. Leaving Jericho they came to the Jordan—and, as if the spirit of a higher sphere had already caught hold of Elijah, he took his mantle and smote the waters, so that they parted asunder, and made a passage for the two to pass over. When on the further side he asked Elisha if there was anything he could do for him before he was taken away from him; on which Elisha said, "Let a double portion, I pray thee, of thy spirit be on me"—literally, let there be a mouthful or ration of two (אֶתְּנֵהוּ) with thy spirit to me. The expression is peculiar, and is the same that is used in De. xxi. 17, in respect to the inheritance of the first-born, who, simply as the first-born, was to have a double portion, or the ration of two among his brethren. It was this which Elisha sought—not, as many commentators have supposed, and as Krummacher in his Elijah also maintains, a gift of the spirit of prophecy twice as large as Elijah himself possessed. This carries improbability on the very face of it; for with what propriety could a man be asked to leave as an inheritance to another double of what he himself possessed? Nor did Elisha get any such superlative endowment; his position as a prophet was altogether of a dependent and secondary nature as compared with Elijah's; and the attempts that have been made to invert the relation of the one to the other, proceed upon arbitrary and superficial considerations. (See ELISHA.) Not less arbitrary is the view of Ewald, that the request of Elisha must be understood as indicating a wish for two-thirds only of Elijah's spirit (Geschichte, III p. 507)—a view that requires no refutation. The proper explanation is, that Elisha here regarded Elijah as the head of a great spiritual household, which included himself as the first-born and all who had since been added to the fraternity under the name of "the sons of the prophets;" and what he now sought was, that he might be constituted Elijah's heir in the spiritual vineyard, by getting the first-born's double portion, and therewith authority to continue the work. Elijah gave answer to the request, by saying it was an hard thing he had sought; meaning that as circumstances then stood—with so much done on the part of God to bring things to a better footing in Israel, and so little actually accomplished—it was more than could justly be expected, that God should continue the gifts of grace for prosecuting the work in the manner anticipated by Elisha. Nevertheless, it was added, if Elisha saw his spiritual father at the moment of his ascension, it would be a sign that his request should be granted. And he did so; for while they thus talked together, there appeared a chariot of fire, and horses of fire, which parted between them, and carried Elijah in a whirlwind to heaven. Elisha looked on with saddening astonishment, and exclaimed, "My father, my father, the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof"—as if with Elijah's departure not only he had been deprived of a venerated parent, but Israel also had lost the chief means of its defence and glory. The prophet's mantle, however, had fallen while he ascended; and with this, the symbol of the continuation of his office, Elisha returned to Jordan, and smote the waters as Elijah himself had previously done. These immediately parted asunder, showing that Jehovah, who had been so wonderfully with Elijah, was now in like manner with Elisha, and giving to the sons of the prophets, who stood to view at Jericho, undoubted evidence of the fact, that "the spirit of Elijah rested on Elisha."

Thus gloriously ended the career of trial and conflict pursued by Elijah. Why it should have had such a termination—why he alone of all the prophets who spake and witnessed for the truth of God during the continuance of the old covenant, should have been taken to heaven without tasting of death, must remain for us in a great degree involved in mystery. We can without difficulty perceive in it a certain assimilation to the exit of Moses—first of all, in the locality, the scene of both being in some part of the mountainous region over against Jericho; and then in the extraordinary circumstances connected with the departure of each; for though Moses actually died, yet the death took place, it would seem, in the immediate presence of the Lord, and by a higher than an earthly ministry was his body committed to its proper resting-place (De xxxiv. 6, 7; Jude 9); it was a death which most nearly resembled a translation to glory. That it was something more in Elijah's case—that he should have passed into heaven by an actual and visible translation, must be mainly accounted for by the peculiar circumstances of the time, viewed in connection with his special agency as a prophet. His work had been one of mercy and judgment—of judgment, indeed, more prominently than mercy, but still judgment of a merely provisional kind, and intended ever to return again to mercy. The aim and object of his striving was to have Israel raised to the full enjoyment of covenant-blessings, and that by a return on their part to the true covenant-standing, secured for them in the constitution brought in by Moses. He looked no higher than this; it formed no part of his mission to give fresh revelations to Israel of God's purposes of grace, or point their expectations to another covenant, founded on better promises; his object was gained if his countrymen could but be brought to stand on the foundation laid by Moses, and thereby escape the doom that was threatening to avenge their apostasy. In this, however, as he comparatively failed—for the revival effected by his supernatural and energetic striving was partial and incomplete—there was granted at the close the sign of his miraculous translation in a whirlwind and chariot of fire—a sign for those who received his testimony and trod in his footsteps, of Heaven's acceptance of his work; and for those who had rejected the counsel of God against themselves, a sign of that coming whirlwind of wrath and fiery indignation, which was sure one day to vindicate the insulted truth and majesty of Heaven.

It is also from Elijah's peculiar position and striving as a prophet, that we are to explain his appearance, along with Moses, on the mount of transfiguration, to do homage to the Son of man. This did not arise, as is very commonly represented, from his being the greatest of the prophets, and as such, appropriately taken to personate the whole prophetic order; for in the higher department of prophetic agency, especially in its relation to the appearance and kingdom of Christ, he was far outshone by Isaiah and several of the later prophets. It was his relation to Moses rather than to Christ, which fitted Elijah for taking the place he did on the mount of transfiguration. The peculiar testimony to be there given to Jesus was that of the old to the new—of the old as then ready to vanish away, in order that the new might come in with its plenitude of grace and truth. And the proper representatives of the old were Moses, its mediator, and Elijah, its strenuous advocate and reformer—the giant wrestler, who hazarded his life and spent his noblest endeavours to drive back its corrupters, and preserve for posterity its heritage of blessing. When these, therefore, appeared to do homage to Jesus, and then retired before his surpassing glory, in obedience to the word, "This is my beloved Son, hear him," it virtually proclaimed that all was now to become new, and that even the best and greatest in the past was not to be compared with what was going to be established through Jesus for the kingdom of God.

In another connection, but still with reference to his peculiar calling and work as the prophet-reformer, the name of Elijah occurs in the transactions of gospel history. It had been foretold by Malachi that the Lord would send Elijah the prophet before the great and dreadful day of the Lord, that he might turn the heart of the children to the fathers, and the heart of the fathers to the children, ch. iv. 5; that is, might do an Elijah-work of reformation—bring back degenerate children to the state of their pious ancestors, so that parent and son might have, as it were, a common standing, and be of one mind in respect to the service of God. Partly in interpretation of this prophecy, and partly to indicate how it was to meet with its fulfilment, the angel

Gabriel, in announcing the birth of John the Baptist, said, "Many of the children of Israel shall be turned to the Lord their God; and he shall go before him in the spirit and power of Elias, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just; to make ready a people prepared for the Lord," Lu. i. 17. There can be no doubt that the Jews generally of our Lord's time expected a re-appearance of the literal Elijah; in that respect falling much into the same error as they did in the carnal views they formed of the person and kingdom of Messiah. He who came in the spirit and power of Elias was the Elias of gospel times, precisely as he who came to save and reign over God's heritage was the David promised to be raised up, and to bring in a better era for the Israel of God, Esa. xxxiv. 24. Hence our Lord, in the later stages of his ministry, first told his disciples that, if they would receive it, John was "the Elias which was for to come," and then that in him "Elias had indeed come, though they knew him not, and did to him whatsoever they listed," Mat. xi. 14; xvii. 12. Elijah, in short, from the work he did, and the place he occupied in Israelitish history, became, like Abraham, Israel, or David, a representative man, and his name was used, like theirs, in the ideal language of prophecy, to indicate the recurrence of something similar in kind, though differing in form, from what had manifested itself in him.

It is probably in the same way that an explanation is to be found of a somewhat peculiar notice given respecting a letter or writing of Elijah in 2 Ch., which has occasioned much perplexity to commentators. Speaking of the times of Jehoram, the unworthy son of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, the sacred historian says—"And there came a writing to him from Elijah the prophet, saying, Thus saith the Lord God of David thy father, Because thou hast not walked in the ways of Jehoshaphat thy father, nor in the ways of Asa, king of Judah, but hast walked in the way of the kings of Israel, and hast made Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem to go a whoring, like to the whoredoms of the house of Ahab, and also hast slain thy brethren of thy father's house, which were better than thyself; behold, with a great plague will the Lord smite thy people, and thy children, and thy wives, and all thy goods: and thou shalt have great sickness by disease of thy bowels, until thy bowels fall by reason of the sickness day by day," ch. xxi. 12-16. There can be no doubt that Elijah's translation took place in the reign of Jehoshaphat, and a considerable time before Jehoram came to the possession of the throne; hence various suppositions have been made to account for this writing. Josephus appears to have regarded it as a letter sent from the glorified Elijah (Ant. ix. 6, 9), and Grotius took the same view of it. It has been more commonly supposed that it was either written by anticipation before Elijah left the world, or that, by some verbal mistake, Elijah's name has been substituted for Elisha's. Both suppositions are arbitrary, and have no proper foundation to rest upon. It is more probable that, as Elijah had been known as the head of that kind of prophetic agency from which words or writings of such a description proceeded; that as the spirit of Elijah rested upon Elisha to carry forward what still remained of the work to be done; and that as certain things expressly committed to Elijah, in particular the anointing of Hazael over Syria and Jehu over Israel, had to be left to Elisha; so this writing, which breathed so peculiarly the spirit and manner of Elijah, though not actually indited by him, is associated with his name. It proceeded from the Elijah-school of prophecy, of which he still was regarded as the ideal head (see Hengstenberg's Christology, at Mal. iv. 5).

ELIM [strong trees], the name of the second station of the Israelites after crossing the Red Sea, Ex. xv. 27. It was distinguished for its copious fountains and luxuriant trees, having had twelve springs of water and seventy palms growing at their side. Authorities still differ as to the precise spot where this delightful encampment is to be sought. It must have been, says Stanley, in one of three wadys, "Ghüründel, Useit, or Taiyibeh" (p. 37). Both he and Robinson are inclined to give the preference to the first of the three, and Stanley thinks that both possibly may have been included, as they are much of the same character, and lie comparatively near to one another. The water seemed less plentiful than of old; but here are first "the wild palms, successors of the 'threescore and ten.'" Not like those of Egypt or of pictures, but either dwarf—that is, trunkless—or else with savage hairy trunks and branches, all dishevelled. Then there are the feathery tamarisks, here assuming gnarled boughs and hoary heads, worthy of their venerable situation, on whose leaves is found what the Arabs call mannä. Thirdly, there is the wild acacia, the same as we had often seen in Egypt, but this also tangled by its desert growth into a thicket" (Stanley, p. 68).

ELIM'ELECH [whose God is king], a Bethlehemite, the husband of Naomi, by whom he had two sons, Mahlon and Chilion. In a season of scarcity, which appears to have happened some time in the latter part of the period of the judges, the whole family passed over into the land of Moab, where both the father and the two sons died. Nothing further is told of them; but the future fortunes of Naomi, and her daughter-in-law Ruth, are interestingly detailed in the book of Ruth.

ELIOENAI [towards Jehovah my eyes, i. e. are turned.] 1. The head of a family in Benjamin, 1 Ch. vii. 8. 2. The head of a family in Simeon, 1 Ch. iv. 36. 3. A Korhite Levite, one of the door-keepers in the house of God, 1 Ch. xxvi. 3. 4. A priest of the sons of Pashur, a contemporary of Ezra, and one of those who married strange wives, Esr. i. 22. 5. An Israelite of the sons of Zattu, who had also married a strange woman, Esr. x. 9; Ne. vii. 13.

ELIPH'ALET, or ELIPH'ELET [God for safety]. 1. A son of David, the last born to him in Jerusalem, 2 Sa. v. 16. 2. One of David's thirty heroes, 2 Sa. xxiii. 34. 3. A Benjamite, and two companions of Ezra, 1 Ch. viii. 39; Esr. viii. 18; x. 33.

ELIPH'AZ [God for strength]. 1. One of the sons of Esau, the father of Teman, Ge. xxxvi. 10. 2. One of the three friends of Job; the chief, indeed, of the three. He is simply described as "Eliphaz the Temanite," Job ii. 11, and he must consequently be regarded as a representative of the family descended from the preceding Eliphaz. The most prominent part of the discussions which took place between Job and his friends is ascribed to Eliphaz, but to obtain a proper view of its tenor the whole must be taken in connection. (See JOB.)

ELIPH'ELET. See ELIPH'ALET.

ELIS'ABETH [who swears by God]. The Greek form of Elisheba, Ex. vi. 23, but in the English Bible occurs only as the name of the wife of Zacharias and mother of John the Baptist. She was, like her husband, of the family of Aaron. The only description given of her character is in connection with that of her husband; both are said to have been "righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless," Lu. 1.5. Her history is inseparably intertwined with that of her husband. (See ZACHARIAS.)

ELI'SHA [God for salvation], in the New Testament, ELISEUS, son of Shaphat, and a native of Abel-Meholah, which lay near the Jordan, and belonged to the tribe of Issachar, 1 Ki. xix. 16; Ju. vii. 22. When at Horeb Elijah was expressly directed to anoint this man prophet in his room. The direction implied designation to an office, for such only as were set apart to a sacred office were anointed, and it was an act more peculiarly appropriated to kings and priests. The act itself was symbolical of the Spirit's grace, as qualifying for the discharge of the office; and since prophecy in the true sense was always the special gift of the Spirit, those who possessed the gift might be said to be anointed, whether they received any outward consecration or not. (See ANOINTING.) In the case even of Elisha, it may be questioned whether the anointing involved an application of oil, for in the narrative of the transaction we read only of Elijah throwing his mantle over him, which was plainly meant on the one side, and understood on the other, to be a call to the prophetic office. It may, however, have been succeeded by a special act of consecration, both here and in the case of such as had a distinct sphere of prophetic agency to fill, but we want materials for determining how far, or with what particular forms of the prophetic calling, actual anointing was connected.

That Elisha was in circumstances of external comfort is evident from his being found by Elijah ploughing with twelve yoke of oxen, himself personally engaged with the twelfth, 1 Ki. xix. 19. Hengstenberg (Pent. 1. p. 144; Eng. trans. p. 184) sees in the twelve a symbolical reference to the twelve tribes of Israel, and in the circumstance an indication that Elisha was to be a prophet, not for the ten tribes alone, but for the whole covenant-people. If the number twelve had been employed by him in an action formally connected with his entrance on the prophetic office, or with the public discharge of its duties, we could have seen the force of this application of the historical notice; but occurring, as it does, in connection with Elisha's earlier and common occupations, it appears to seek for a symbolism where none could naturally be thought of. The first action too of Elisha in his new calling destroys its fitness for such a purpose, as one pair out of the twelve he presently killed and made a feast with them—a parting entertainment on taking leave of his former associates and quitting his old employment, that he might henceforth give himself to the ministry of a higher service.

How long Elisha accompanied with Elijah, and assisted him in the revival of the schools of the prophets, and the other forms of prophetic agency which occupied the latter years of Elijah's career, is not absolutely certain, but according to the common reckoning it fills a space of ten or twelve years. From the public events that are known to have taken place in the interval it could not well have been less. Even the state of comparative fullness and efficiency to which the prophetic associations had been raised, and their distribution throughout the land, must have required the active co-operation of the two men for a variety of years.

During the continuance of the period of their joint action, Elisha occupied but a subordinate place; he "ministered to Elijah;" and when Elijah was going to be taken up, it was represented by the sons of the prophets as the "taking away of his master from his head," 2 Ki. ii. 3—literally, from over his head. He had hitherto stood, as it were, at Elisha's head, counselling, directing, ordering, as the Spirit prompted him; but now he was to be lifted up over it—removed to a higher sphere. The relation, as of greater and less, father and son, continued to hold in respect to the prophetic agency of each after the translation of Elijah; and the request of Elisha to obtain a double portion of his master's spirit, which was granted, referred, as stated in a previous article (see ELIJAH), to the higher position henceforth to be occupied by Elisha, as compared, not with what Elijah had been, but with what any in the schools of the prophets were to be; Elisha, as the first-born, with a double share in the spiritual inheritance, was to stand in the room of Elijah and be the head over the brethren.

It may, however, be admitted, as no way inconsistent with this relative inferiority, that there was a certain advance intended by the ministry of Elisha; the work begun by Elijah was not only to be continued, but also carried forward. The name of the successor might be said to indicate this; for in the name of both prophets the distinctive striving of each had its expression. To establish the truth that Jehovah alone was the El or God whom the Israelites ought to worship, was the great object of Elijah's activity, and from this, as from a position already won, it was Elisha's more especial calling to manifest that, if but rightly acknowledged as the El, Jehovah should also prove the salvation of his people. Hence, while the agency of the latter prophet was altogether of a less elevated, more quiet, and subdued description than that of Elijah's, it certainly partook more of beneficent working, and was more palpably distinguished by the bestowal of blessing. With this indeed it commenced; for immediately after he had assumed the part of Elijah's successor, and in the parting asunder of the waters of the Jordan, while he smote them with Elijah's mantle, had received the seal of Heaven on his commission—the people of Jericho sought and obtained through him an important boon. Having tarried there for a little, they came and said to him, "Behold, I pray thee, the situation of the city is pleasant, but the water is naught, and the ground barren." This can scarcely be understood to refer to the only, or even to the chief, source of the water that supplied the inhabitants of Jericho, for it had been from early times a flourishing city; and having been designated the city of palm-trees from the abundance of these in the neighbourhood, there must have been fertility, as well as barrenness, in the adjoining territory. But at the time in question the defect as to water, and the evil effects flowing from it, must have been conspicuous, otherwise neither would the people have asked, nor would Elisha have undertaken to work, a miraculous change to the better. The mode of his doing this by salt may seem strange, since the intermixture of saline matter in springs spoils instead of improving the quality of the water, but it is to be explained by the symbolical use of salt in things spiritual and divine. Being in respect to substances of a fleshly kind the great preservative of nature, it became an emblem of what is pure and incorruptible—of life itself in a state of incorruption, or of the means which minister to its support and comfort. (See SALT.) Its application therefore, on the present occasion, to the waters of an unsavoury spring, simply denoted that the healing power of the Lord was applied to them, so as to render them capable of ministering to the refreshment and healthfulness of life. How actually the change was effected we cannot tell; but one can easily conceive that, as the unwholesome ingredient must have been contracted by the waters passing through some beds of rock or earth that furnished it, so, by turning the subterraneous currents in another direction, they may have either avoided the pollution or again become purged from it. This is at least one perfectly conceivable mode of accomplishing a permanent change, and one which, while requiring a miraculous interposition at first, might afterwards proceed in harmony with the ordinary powers and properties of nature.

The next recorded act of Elisha was of a different kind, and was doubtless intended to show that, whatever diversity of gifts or operations might belong to him as compared with his great predecessor, he also stood officially connected with the authority and the honour of Heaven. It took place when on a visit to Bethel, which had been, since Jeroboam's time, one of the great seats of corruption, but which had latterly enjoyed the privilege of having one of the schools of the prophets established within its gates. On approaching it certain "little children," as they are called in the English version, though it should rather be "young lads," mocked Elisha and called him by the contemptuous epithet of bald head. To be actually bald on the back part of the head was reckoned a blemish among the Israelites as well as among the Romans, and hence the priests were forbidden to shave themselves bald, Le. xxi. 5; 1a. iii. 17, 24. It must be understood that the epithet, whether literally applicable to Elisha or not, was used in a slighting manner toward him, not simply as a man, but as a prophet of the Lord, and used by persons who, though young, were still sufficiently grown to be the proper subjects of moral treatment; for no otherwise could he have turned round as he did and cursed them in the name of the Lord. In treating him with contempt they contemned the Lord, and at the same time ridiculed the attempts at reformation which he and the sons of the prophets had been making at Bethel. Therefore in the Lord's name he pronounced on them an anathema, which so far took present effect that they were attacked by two she-bears out of the wood, which tare forty-two of them. It is not said that they were actually killed. This fate may indeed have befallen some of the party, but is by no means probable in regard to the greater number.

A more public occasion soon called for the exercise of Elisha's prophetic gifts. Moab had rebelled against Israel after the death of Ahab, and Ahaziah, the son and immediate successor of Ahab, had, it would seem, been able to do nothing during his brief reign to regain the lost dominion. But Jehoram, the next son, who presently succeeded to the throne, set about preparations for war; and the more effectually to secure his purpose, he entered into an offensive alliance with Jehoshaphat the king of Judah, and also with the reigning king of Edom. Jehoshaphat was no doubt tempted to join in the alliance, from his territories having been attacked by the king of Moab, who had stirred up (though with loss only to himself and his allies) a somewhat formidable conspiracy against him, 2 Ch. xx. The army of the three kings, in executing their projected campaign against Moab, came into a valley where they expected to find water; but experiencing disappointment, the fear became prevalent that the whole should fall a helpless prey into the hands of the adversary. In this extremity Jehoshaphat began to ask if there was no prophet of Jehovah to be had, at whom they might make inquiry. He was informed that Elisha was there; and on going down to him with Jehoram the king of Israel, the prophet immediately broke out in an expostulation with the latter, and said, "What have I to do with thee? Get thee to the prophets of thy father and of thy mother." Jehoshaphat however interposed, and referred the present difficulties to the counsel of Jehovah, as if he had brought together the confederate forces for the purpose only of consigning them to destruction. "Nay," he said, don't speak of merely repairing to those false prophets, "for Jehovah hath called these three kings together to deliver them into the hand of Moab." On this Elisha repressed his indignation, and consented, for the sake of Jehoshaphat, but on this account alone, to inquire of the Lord. Preparatory to his doing so, he asked for a minstrel, that his disturbed and ruffled spirit might be soothed, and might rise into that equable and placid frame, without which it was not in a fit state for receiving the more special communications from above. He ere long reached the proper state, and obtained from the Lord a message, calling upon them to fill the valley with trenches, to hold the water which the Lord was going to provide for them, and also assuring them that the Lord would deliver the Moabites into their hand. The event proved as the prophet had announced, for in the course of the following night the trenches were filled with water, though no rain had fallen in the immediate neighbourhood; and the Moabites, seeing from a distance the fiery glitter of the sun on the water, and mistaking it for blood, which they supposed the confederate forces had shed in mutual slaughter, hastened forward to the prey, and thereby exposed themselves to an attack which ended in their complete discomfiture.

This gracious interposition in a time of peculiar urgency and peril was fitted to leave a favourable impression upon the mind of Jehoram; and so it appears to have done. He stood in a very different relation to Elisha from that which his father had maintained toward Elijah; and though he did not cease to follow the sins of Jeroboam, and appears in many respects to have profited little by the judgments that had been executed upon transgression in Israel, yet he kept aloof from the more offensive rites of Baal, and the grosser corruptions practised by his parents. After the deliverance on the plains of Moab, Elisha seems commonly to have been treated by him with marked respect, as appears from the other incidental notices given of the miracles wrought by his hand. These notices are not arranged in perfect chronological order; for they seem to proceed on the principle of relating first the acts done in behalf of individuals, and then those which concerned the king and people of Israel. If one admits the miraculous element in the acts referred to, as called for by the adverse circumstances of the time, needed to revive the languishing faith of the people, and if possible arrest the work of judgment, none of them will occasion any peculiar difficulty, and, as a whole, they afford a remarkable exhibition of the forbearance and merciful consideration of God.

The first of the instances recorded has respect to a poor woman, a widow of one of the sons of the prophets, who came crying to Elisha for help, because she had fallen into debt, and the creditor was ready to take her two sons for bondmen in payment. The law authorized this, limiting however the period of service to the year of jubilee, Le. xiv. 22; but in her circumstances the enforcement of the law even for a limited period could not but be felt as a grievous calamity. To Elisha also it appeared a case warranting the divine interposition; and in the mode of administering relief he took what she actually had as the ground and occasion of providing what besides she required to obtain. Finding she still had a pot of oil, he told her to go and borrow vessels from her neighbours and pour out as much as would flow. She did so, and found that the oil continued to stream forth till every vessel was filled. Herself astonished at the result, she went and told the prophet; and was directed by him to sell what was needed to discharge the debt and apply the remainder to her own use.

The more direct object of the next wonder wrought by Elisha was also a woman, but one in affluent, not in depressed circumstances. She belonged to the pious remnant that still survived in different parts of the land of Israel, dwelling at Shunem in the tribe of Issachar. This place lay on the route from Gilgal to Carmel, which was frequently travelled by Elisha; and the pious Shunammite, not only on a certain occasion pressed him to go in and take some refreshment, but obtained the consent of her husband to have a little chamber added to one of the sides of the house, for the purpose of affording a convenient lodging-room for Elisha as often as he might pass that way. He gladly availed himself, it would seem, of the pleasant welcome it offered, as he could not but be refreshed in spirit with the indications which there from time to time met him of an humble and loving faith. He wished, therefore, to give some mark of his grateful feeling to the woman; and, finding that she sought for herself and her husband no boon of a worldly kind, that she was content with her place and condition in life, but being reminded by Gehazi that she had no child, he made promise to her that she should next year embrace a son. The promise was fulfilled; at the proper time she became the mother of a son. And the child grew, and doubtless gathered around him many fond hopes and tender affections—till one day, when with his father on the harvest-field he was visited by a stroke of the sun, or some similar affection, and began to cry in agony, "My head, my head;" he was carried home and in a few hours expired in his mother's arms. If the child had come to this Shunammite woman in an ordinary manner, she would probably have felt that she had no reason to look for any singular interposition, and that, however sore the visitation, she must bow her heart, like other bereaved mothers in Israel, to the hand of her heavenly Father. But coming, as this child had done, in the form of an unsought and special boon, she could not bring herself to believe that it was to be thus hopelessly wrenched from her grasp; her faith rose with the occasion, strengthened probably and encouraged by the knowledge of what had been done through Elijah to the widow's son at Zarephath. Therefore she ordered the servant instantly to saddle an ass, and repaired without delay to the prophet at Carmel, where she knew he was at the time sojourning. The interview that took place between them is given only in fragments, but it came out that the child was, if not absolutely gone, on the very eve of being so, and that nothing would satisfy the mother, but that Elisha should go with her, and exercise his supernatural gifts in her behalf. The moment he heard of it he despatched Gehazi, with instructions to lose no time by the way, and when he reached the place, to lay Elisha's staff on the face of the child, apparently in the hope that this might be sufficient for its revival, and probably under the impression that the child was in a swoon, rather than actually dead. But the matter turned out to be of a more serious description; for no response came from the application of the prophet's staff by the hand of Gehazi, and he hastened back to meet his master with the tidings that the child had not awaked. When Elisha was come to the house, it is mentioned as matter of surprise, that "behold, the child was dead and laid upon his bed;" as if it was only now he saw the full extent of the calamity. Hence, he no longer thought of any secondary applications by means of his staff, but addressed himself in earnest prayer to God, and then, after the example of Elijah, he stretched himself upon the child, that the divine virtue in the one might by such personal contact pass the more readily into the other. The Lord responded to the faith and prayer of his servant, and after a second stretching on the child, life in its full vigour again returned, and the boy was delivered safe and sound to its mother.

The prevalence of a general dearth gave occasion to another, though somewhat less remarkable, operation of the healing power possessed by Elisha. The sons of the prophets at Gilgal had difficulty in obtaining supplies of food; and in gathering for a common repast there was brought, among other productions of the field, what is called in the English version "a wild vine," on which grew "wild gourds," that were shred into the pot of herbs, and when tasted, told with such an effect on the company, that they cried out, "There is death in the pot." It is not agreed among commentators what the production here referred to might be; it could not properly be a wild vine, but must rather have been some plant having wild runners similar to the wild vine, since it yielded गुग्गुलु, pakkāoth—which some take to be wild cucumbers (Genestus, Winer, &c.), and others coloquintida (Michaëlis, Oedmann, Kati). Both of these indeed belong to the general family of cucumbers, and bear fruit that is of a caustic bitter taste, and in its effects far from wholesome. It matters little, therefore, which of the two it might be, as indeed we want the means for properly deciding; but by throwing in a quantity of meal, as the symbol perhaps, rather than the cause, of a wholesome and nutritive diet, an effect was produced of a counteractive nature—the pottage was found to be divested of its noxious qualities.

It was probably about the same time, and in connection with the same dearth, that a supernatural effect was produced, not by undoing an evil in articles of food, but by greatly extending their sustaining virtue. A person came from Baal-shalisha bringing bread of the first-fruits, and some full ears of corn—the first-fruits of harvest. Offerings of this description properly belonged to the priests and Levites, De. xviii. 1-6; and that they should have been given to the sons of the prophets, was a proof of the peculiar place they had come to occupy in Israel, and how the God-fearing in the land tendered to them what they refused to the priests of the calves. The offering actually brought, however, on the present occasion, was a very inadequate supply for the large company that were in want of provisions; inasmuch that the servant scrupled about obeying the command of Elisha to set it before them. "What," said he, "should I set this before an hundred men?" He was again ordered to do so, with the assurance that they should not only all eat, but have somewhat also to leave. How the scanty provision was made sufficient—whether by some secret enlargement of the cakes of bread, or by rendering the little that existed of these supernaturally efficacious in relieving the hunger of those who partook of them—we are not informed. The prophet merely announced the result, and left it to the God whose will he had intimated in the matter, to effect it in whatever manner he pleased. The action itself, as well as the one that immediately preceded it, was intended to show the special interest which the Lord took in the prophetic institutions of the time, and to strengthen the faith of those who belonged to them for the arduous and trying work in which they were engaged. The same view is also to be taken of another transaction—the only additional one on record which immediately concerns the sons of the prophets—the recovery of an axe they had borrowed, and which accidentally fell into a pool in the Jordan, by causing it miraculously to rise to the surface, 2 KI. vi. 1-7. The axe might possibly have been recovered in some other way; or, if that had been impracticable, the cost of such an instrument could not have been so large but that funds might have been obtained to replace it by another; but the loss was repaired by a special interposition of divine power and goodness, for the purpose of assuring and sustaining the hearts of men struggling with great trials and temptations.

The fame of such wonderful deeds—spread as they were over a variety of years, and exhibited in different parts of the country—could not fail to be widely diffused. In process of time, and by one of those remarkable turns in providence which sometimes lead to very singular and unexpected results, it reached the court of the king of Syria. In one of their hostile excursions into the land of Israel the Syrian forces had carried off among the captives a little maid, who came to have a place in the household of Naaman, the great Syrian general: she became a waiting-maid to his wife. The report of Elisha's wonderful deeds was well known to her, perhaps she had even been an eye-witness of one or more of them; and when her master fell under the loathsome disease of the leprosy, and knowing that greater things than recovery from such a disease had been accomplished by the hand of Elisha, she said one day to her mistress, "Would God, my lord were with the prophet that is in Samaria; for he would recover him of his leprosy." The word, though dropped from the lips of a little captive, was like the breaking forth of light from the midst of profound gloom; the tidings came to the ear of the king, and he instantly despatched Naaman with costly presents, and a letter to Jehoram the king of Israel, requesting that he would cause him to be healed of his leprosy. Benhadad had never apparently doubted that if there was such a person in Samaria as the Israelitish maid had spoken of, the king of Israel must be perfectly cognizant of his existence, and able also to command his services. Jehoram, however, viewed the matter differently, and from the seeming extravagance and unreasonableness of the request, he rent his clothes, and called his nobles to witness how bent the king of Syria manifestly was on having a quarrel with him. "Am I God," said he, "that this man doth send to me, to recover a man of his leprosy!" 2 KI. v. 7. Undoubtedly in the form in which the matter came before the king of Israel, there was what might not unnaturally be regarded as the indication of an unreasonable and quarrelsome humour; but if Jehoram had been as familiar as he should have been with the life and labours of Elisha, he would have been less astounded and perplexed than he really was with the request of Benhadad; and the knowledge that seemed to prevail in Syria of the wonderful things that had been proceeding in Israel, was certainly meant to be a rebuke in providence for the comparative ignorance that still reigned in Samaria. Heathen at a distance, it seemed, knew more of God's working in Israel, than the very heads of the Israelitish people. And on this account Elisha, when he heard of the king's perplexity and distress, sent to him a message of expostulation, "Wherefore hast thou rent thy clothes? Let him come now to me, and he shall know that there is a prophet in Israel." He accordingly came, and was made to know that there was both a God and a prophet in Israel; but it was in a way so different from what Naaman had expected, that he nearly threw up the matter in disdain, and returned as he came to his native land. The account of the transaction belongs rather to the history of Naaman than of Elisha; but the quiet reserve practised by the prophet, and the order for Naaman to go and bathe seven times in Jordan (at which so much offence was taken) were most wisely chosen for the main purpose in view; for they were admirably fitted to impress upon the mind of Naaman the great and salutary truth, that there was an essential difference between the God of Israel and the idols of heathendom, and between the prophet of that God and a Syrian magician. The effect intended was wrought, and a testimony was yielded to the truth by this Syrian general, which we never hear of being paid by the king of Israel or any of his captains.

This action with Naaman had brought Elisha into a certain connection with Jehoram the king of Israel, the latter having been rescued through his miraculous agency from an embarrassing position, and incidentally contributed to the bestowing of an important favour on his most formidable rival and adversary, the king of Syria. Another series of transactions followed, all more or less supernatural, in which still further and more direct services were rendered by the prophet to Jehoram. They were occasioned by the wars that continued to be waged between Syria and Israel. The softening effect which the healing of Naaman may for a time have produced, does not appear to have lasted long: Benhadad was intensely warlike in disposition, and seems to have been incapable of reigning without engaging in military exploits. In those which he directed against Israel, he was to a great extent counterworked by the vigilance and supernatural insight of Elisha, which enabled him to advise the king of Israel of movements, that by being anticipated were defeated of their aim. Benhadad at first suspected his own servants of betraying him; but being informed of the peculiar service rendered to his adversary by Elisha, he resolved on seizing the person of the prophet, and sent a great host to surprise him in Dothan. The servant of Elisha stood aghast at the formidable array; but Elisha himself retained his composure, and assured his servant that there were with them more than were against them. In confirmation of this he prayed to the Lord to open his eyes; and when they were opened he saw the mountain full of chariots of fire and horses of fire—visible impersonations to the spiritual eye of the might and protection of Jehovah—around Elisha. The prophet further prayed that the Syrian host might be smitten with blindness—not apparently with the actual loss of corporeal vision, but a kind of bewilderment, which prevented them from knowing where they really were, and led them to surrender themselves implicitly to his guidance. He conducted them into the midst of Samaria, where their eyes were again opened, and they found themselves at the mercy of their enemies. Jehoram would have instantly fallen upon them, and asked Elisha if he would smite; but Elisha magnanimously repudiated the proposal, and ordered bread and water to be set before them; after which they were dismissed to their master. If Benhadad had been in any degree conscious of the more noble and generous impulses of nature, he would have abated his hostility on hearing of such mercy and forbearance toward his troops, or perhaps have altogether ceased from so unequal a contest. But warlike ambition seemed his only motive, brute force the only power he could estimate or wield; and so the partial defeats he had sustained but served to stimulate his rage, and led him to gather all his strength and implements of war for a desperate assault on Samaria. He succeeded in driving matters to a fearful extremity; so that extravagant prices came to be paid for things which in ordinary circumstances would have been totally rejected as articles of diet, 2 Kt. vi. 27, and some were even beginning to resort to the dreadful expedient of feeding on human flesh. This forced itself on the notice of the king one day as he passed along the wall, when a woman cried out to him against her neighbour, because after having agreed to kill and eat each other's sons, the one whose turn came second resiled from the agreement, and would not suffer her son to be destroyed. On hearing this sad story, the king rent his clothes, from which it was perceived that he wore sackcloth upon his flesh, and was laying to heart more than had been suspected the miseries and distresses of his people.

If we had been simply told that Jehoram thus clad himself in sackcloth and rent his clothes, we should have concluded favourably in regard to his penitent state of mind; but the notice in that respect is followed up by a stern and vehement denunciation against Elisha, in which the king said, "God do so and more also to me, if the head of Elisha the son of Shaphat, shall stand on him this day." It does not appear from the narrative why Jehoram should have so directly connected Elisha's name with the extremities endured, and should have vowed such summary vengeance against him. From the circumstance one of two suppositions is forced upon us—either Elisha had spoken of the assault of Benhadad as a divine judgment for the still prevailing sins, and thus came to be wrongfully identified with the evil; or he had advised Jehoram to reject the terms offered by Benhadad, and was now denounced by the king as one that had given wicked counsel. It is possible, even, that both suppositions may to some extent have come into play. But however it may have been in that respect, there can be no doubt that the resolution of the king to execute death on Elisha indicated a still unsanctified and rebellious mind. It appears, however, to have been rather the sudden outburst of ungoverned passion, than the expression of a deliberately formed purpose. For, after having despatched a messenger to take the life of Elisha—whose approach was descried by the prophet, and the door of the house barred against him—the king himself (his master, as he is called, ch. vi. 32) followed close behind him; and it seems to be to this master, not to the messenger, nor even to Elisha, that the words should be ascribed at the close of ch. vi., "Behold, this evil is of the Lord, what should I wait for the Lord any longer?" q.d. I now admit that the Lord's hand is in this calamity; it is needless for me to contend any longer against it; let me surrender at discretion. If this be the correct view of the matter, then the king's heart must have relented immediately after he gave the order for Elisha's death; and he deemed it better to go himself, and make proposals of a capitulation to the enemy. Hence, seeing the king in this softened mood, brought down to acknowledge the Lord's hand in the calamities experienced, and his own incapacity to struggle any longer against the evil, the prophet, in the Lord's name, gave intimation of an almost instantaneous deliverance. "Then Elisha said, Hear ye the word of Jehovah; thus saith Jehovah, To-morrow, about this time, shall a measure of fine flour be sold for a shekel, and two measures of barley for a shekel, in the gate of Samaria," ch. vii. 1. It seemed absolutely incredible; insomuch that a lord present, on whose hand the king leaned, asked if it were possible by opening the windows of heaven to make such a thing to be. It came to pass, however, precisely as Elisha predicted; for the Lord caused the Syrians to hear a sound as of approaching chariots and horses, on account of which they took fright and fled by night, and left all their baggage and provisions behind them; so that the people in Samaria passed at once from the horrors of famine to the possession of plenty.

The mixture of judgment and mercy on this occasion was so very singular, that it should have produced a deep and lasting impression upon Jehoram and his people; and, coupled with other things that had gone before, should have led them to renounce all their abominations for the pure worship and service of Jehovah. It failed, however, in doing that; the old sins and pollutions were never thoroughly abolished. Elisha, as a man of God, certainly rose in public estimation; even the king came to regard him with profound respect, and is presented on one occasion as inquiring at Gehazi into all the great things he had done, ch. vii. 4; but there was no sincere turning to the Lord, or general reformation of abuses. Judgment, therefore, still hung like a dark cloud on the horizon; and the prophet, who had been the instrument of giving so many wonderful proofs of the divine forbearance and mercy, had to close his more public career by calling into exercise the rod of divine vengeance. For this two special instruments were to be employed—Hazel in Syria, and Jehu in Israel; who had been long before, indeed, indicated by the Lord to Elijah at Horeb, 1 Kt. xix. 15, 16; but the measure of severity was delayed till measures of a gentler kind had been plied, and found insufficient. At last, however, Elisha moved toward Damascus; and when his arrival there was made known to Benhadad, who lay sick at the time, the latter sent Hazael to inquire whether he should recover. Elisha replied, he might certainly recover (that is, so far as the disease itself was concerned, there was nothing deadly in it—for there is no proper ground for making the text, as certain critics would have it read, as if a not were omitted); but he added, how the Lord had showed him that he should surely die, though nothing was said as to the precise mode in which the death should be brought about, and certainly no warrant issued to Hazael to lay violent hands on his master. That the prophet, however, believed him to be perfectly capable of doing this, and of forcing for himself a way to the throne, is evident from the atrocities which he presently and with tears announced Hazael should be the instrument of inflicting on the people of Israel, and which he also declared were to be the consequence of Hazael's becoming king over Syria. Hazael indignantly repudiated the thought of his being capable of committing such atrocities; but the result proved the certainty of the divine foresight regarding him, rather than the correctness of his own self-knowledge. And it was probably owing to the unscrupulous character of the man, and the unprincipled course of procedure he was going to adopt, that, instead of being formally anointed to the throne of Syria (as was originally indicated), the fact alone of his attaining to its possession was announced to him. With Jehu it was otherwise; a more formal appointment to the office in his case was judged proper. Accordingly, Elisha called to him one of the sons of the prophets, and giving him a box of oil, told him to go to Ramoth-gilead, where a considerable part of the army then lay, and there to anoint Jehu king over Israel. The work was promptly done, and a charge at the same time given to Jehu to smite the house of Ahab, and avenge the blood of all the prophets and the servants of the Lord at the hand of Jezebel, ch. ix. 1-10. In the fulfilment of this terrible mission the whole of Ahab's wicked house perished, and along with them a great multitude of priests and servants of Baal, whom Jehu caught with subtilty, and slaughtered in one mass. The fact of such a sacrifice of Baal-worshippers being still possible, showed how far the evil was from being eradicated, and how much of the external respect that was latterly paid by the king and people of Samaria to the Lord's prophet, was but a constrained homage—the offspring of fear rather than of faith and love. It proved the necessity of the milder prophet ending his more public course as his stern predecessor began, by bringing the severity of God to bear upon the deep-rooted corruptions and incorrigible wickedness that prevailed.

Elisha lived a considerable time after this; for he did not die till the reign of Joash, the grandson of Jehu. Jehu reigned twenty-eight years; Jehoahaz, his immediate successor, seventeen—making together a period of forty-five years. During the whole of this time we hear nothing of Elisha; and it is only when we reach the reign of Joash that we have a notice of his last sickness and death. He must by that time have arrived at a very advanced age, and probably had for years previous been in a state of feebleness and decay. Hearing of his illness, Joash came down to see him (the precise place is not given), and perceiving death to be at hand, wept over his face, and said, "O my father, my father, the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof," ch. xiii. 14—the very words of Elisha at the departure of Elijah, and probably in Joash the honest expression of a conviction, that the loss of such a man of God was like losing the right arm of the nation's security and strength. But Joash, like his predecessors, had no faith to follow the Lord fully; and on the occasion of his visit to Elisha, a transaction took place which betrayed his half-heartedness—his want of purpose to serve and trust the Lord fully. The dying prophet first bade Joash take a bow and arrow, and then, placing his own hand on the hands of the king, told him to shoot, and on his doing so, cried, "The arrow of Jehovah's deliverance, and the arrow of deliverance from Syria; for thou shalt smite the Syrians in Aphek, till thou have consumed them." This was properly the prophet's act, and his word of interpretation going along with it. But then, to see how far Joash entered into its import, and was prepared to carry it out, he requested him to take the arrows and smite; and, after smiting or shooting thrice, he stayed. The king could not but know the view with which the action was required to be done; so that the number of times he smote might fairly be regarded as the measure of his faith and zeal in the matter. The prophet was displeased with its smallness, and told Joash he should but smite the Syrians thrice, and should consequently fail to get the full measure of success which the divine goodness had brought within his reach. From his own unfaithfulness the promise held out should be but partially fulfilled. It was Elisha's last word; "he died, and they buried him," ch. xiii. 20—but where we are not told. It is mentioned, however, that shortly after, while some were employed in burying another person in the neighbourhood, they espied at a little distance a band of Moabites, and in their hurry they thrust the corpse they bore into the tomb of Elisha, which, on touching the bones of Elisha, for the moment revived and stood erect. It was, in all probability, with the sons of the prophets that this happened; and it must be regarded as a sign primarily to them, and through them to others, that the God of Elisha still lived, and was ready to do wonders as heretofore for his people, if they would but seek and trust in him.

Elisha had properly no successor. Several prophets followed him in the kingdom of Israel—Jonah, Hoses, Amos—but he was the last great representative of that type of prophetic agency to which he belonged. Miraculous working henceforth ceased, having been plied as long as the order of the divine administration would admit, and plied comparatively in vain. It was by word, rather than by deed, that God still wrought for a time among that section of his ancient people through the instrumentality of prophets. He gave a somewhat fuller insight into his own purposes of judgment and mercy, and the bearing these were destined to have on the tribes of Israel. This was in truth the higher species of prophetic ministration; but, from the false political position of the kingdom of Israel, it could not be so much exercised there, as in connection with the kingdom of Judah. In a great degree, therefore, Elijah and his successor Elisha may be said to have stood alone in the kingdom of Israel; alike in the general nature and aspect of their work, though each with his own characteristic peculiarities, and each suited to his proper time and sphere. So that here also wisdom was justified of her children.

EL'SHAH, the name of one of the sons of Javan, Ge. x. 4, from whom it is supposed "the isles of Elishah" took their designation, which trafficked with Tyre in fabrics of purple and scarlet, Esa. xxvii. 7. Elis is very commonly identified with it, which may have been peopled by the descendants of Elishah. Others understand by it the Æolians. But there is no certainty.

ELISHA'MA [whom God hears]. 1. A prince in Ephraim, Nu. i. 10. 2. A son of David, born to him in Jerusalem, 2 Sa. v. 16. 3. A descendant of Judah, 1 Ch. ii. 21; 2 Ki. xxv. 26. 4. A priest in the time of Jehoshaphat, 2 Ch. xvii. 18.

ELISH'APHAT [whom God judges], a captain of hundreds in the time and service of Jehoiada the priest, 2 Ch. xxiii. 1.

ELISHE'BA [who swears by God], the daughter of Amminadab, of the tribe of Judah, and the wife of Aaron, Ex. vi. 23; Nu. i. 7. So that the descendants of Aaron were closely allied to the tribe of Judah, though they actually belonged to the tribe of Levi.

ELIZ'APHAN [whom God hides]. 1. A Levite, and head of the family of the Kohathites, when the census was taken in the wilderness, Nu. iii. 30. 2. A leading person of the tribe of Zebulun, who took part in the distribution of the land of Canaan, Nu. xxxiv. 25.

ELKA'NAH [whom God provided]. 1. One of the sons of Korah, Ex. vi. 24. The family of Korah did not perish with himself, Nu. xxvi. 11. 2. Several other descendants of Korah bore this name, 1 Ch. vi. 26, 27, 34; ix. 16; xii. 6; but the only one known to history was the father of Samuel; and of him we know nothing more than that he lived at Ramathaim-Zophim in Mount Ephraim, had two wives—Hannah and Peninnah, and by the former became the father of Samuel the prophet, 1 Sa. i. 11.

EL'KOSHITE, applied as a designation to the prophet Nahum, ch. i. 1, and apparently describing him as a native of Elkosh. There was a place of that name in Assyria, near Mosul; and some have contended for this as at once the birth-place and the grave of the prophet. The modern Jews are of this opinion. But it is not generally acquiesced in. The more probable opinion is, that Elkosh was a town in some part of Palestine. Jerome, in his comment on the prophet, assigns it to Galilee, and says it was pointed out to himself. No further reliance, however, can be placed on this testimony, than as affording evidence of the prevailing belief in Jerome's time of the region where the Elkosh of Nahum was to be sought. (See NAHUM.)

ELLA'SAR, the country and kingdom of Arioch, one of the four kings who invaded Canaan in the days of Abraham, Ge. xiv. 1. Nothing certain is known of it; but being associated with Elam and Shinar, there can be no doubt that it indicated an Asiatic region, somewhere in the same neighbourhood. It is very commonly identified with THELASSAR.

ELM, the translation given us in Hos. iv. 13 of alah (אלה), which everywhere else is rendered oak (which see).

ELNATHAN [whom God gave]. 1. Maternal grandfather of Jehoiachin, and probably the same with the son of Achbor, who lived in Jehoiakim's time, 2 Ki. xxiv. 8; Je. xxv. 22. 2. Certain Levites in Ezra's time, Est. viii. 16.

ELOHIM, God, or gods. See GOD.

ELON [oak]. 1. A Zebulonite, who judged Israel ten years, Ju. xii. 11; but of the distinctive character of his administration, or how he attained to the authority implied in it, Scripture is entirely silent. 2. A Hittite chief, the father of one of Esau's wives, Ge. xxvi. 34. 3. One of the wives of Zebulun, Ge. xvi. 14.

ELON, a border town of the tribe of Dan, whose site has not been identified, Jos. xix. 43.

ELOTH. See ELATH.

EL/PAAL [whose reward is God], the founder of a family among the Benjamites, 1 Ch. viii. 12, 13.

ELUL, the sixth Hebrew month. See MONTH.

EL'YMAS, a derivative of the Arabic dlm, wise, and hence corresponding to ὁ μάγος, the emphatically wise man, the man skilled in mystic lore, the magician. So it is explained in Ac. xiii. 8, where it is applied to Bar-jesus, a magician of the lower caste, who by his arts withstood the apostle Paul, and sought to turn away the proconsul from the faith.

ELYMEANS. See ELAM.

EL'ZAPHAN, a contraction of ELIZAPHAN.

EMBALMING the dead appears to have had its origin in Egypt, and comes into consideration here only as having been practised upon the bodies of some of the covenant-people during their sojourn in that country. We have no specific notice of its having been employed in any case but that of Jacob, their common father, and Joseph—although it is highly probable that the like practice was followed with the whole of the twelve patriarchs, whose bodies are reported to have been carried into Canaan, and buried in the field Jacob bought of Shechem, Ac. vii. 12. The simple fact of Joseph's embalming is mentioned, Ge. i. 2; but of Jacob it is said with more particularity, that "Joseph commanded his servants the physicians to embalm his father; and forty days were fulfilled for him; for so are fulfilled the days of those who are embalmed; and the Egyptians mourned for him three score and ten days." Ge. i. 2, 3. There are several things remarkable in this statement; and the first is, the mention it makes of physicians as being in the service of Joseph, and having it as a part of their proper employment to look after the embalming of the dead. We know of no other country of antiquity in which such a state of things existed; but there can be no doubt of its existence at a very remote period in Egypt. Herodotus expressly testifies of the Egypt of his day, that there "every distinct distemper has its own physician, who confines himself to the study and cure of that alone; so that all places are crowded with physicians." Hence, as Warburton has remarked (Div. Leg. b. iv. 3), a body of these domestics, however extravagant it might appear now, even in a minister of state, was unavoidable then, when each distemper had its proper physician. So great a name had the Egyptian physicians, that both Cyrus and Darius are reported by Herodotus to have had them always in their service (iii. 1, 129).

Understanding this, however, it may still appear somewhat strange, that the physicians should have had to do with the embalming of the dead, as well as with the cure of the living body. The physicians in the two cases, however, would not be of the same class. The subdivision generally that was made of the medical art in Egypt would certainly lead to the appropriation of the process of embalming by a separate class of practitioners; and as the process required both a knowledge of the human frame, and an application of proper medicaments to its several parts, the persons who pursued this employment might quite naturally be called by the general name of physicians. But the probability is, that at the early period of Jacob's death, the subdivision referred to had scarcely if at all been established, and that the process of embalming was under the direction of the ordinary physicians. Ultimately, the embalmers became a distinct and regularly organized class, with their own separate departments of the work. But as, according to Pliny (xix. 6), certain examinations took place during the process, which enabled them to study the disease of which the deceased had died, they must still either themselves have been proficient in the medical art, or have been under the direction of those who were such.

In regard to the process of embalming itself, according to the accounts both of Herodotus and Diodorus, there were three different forms of it, varying in regard to the extent of the operations performed, and the relative expenditure incurred. When the highest scale was chosen by the relatives of the deceased, the embalmers commenced by extracting the brain through the nostrils by means of a curved iron probe, after which they poured in certain drugs. For the purpose, in like manner, of extracting the intestines, they made an incision in the side with a sharp Ethiopian stone; and having thus drawn them out, the intestines were properly cleansed, then enveloped in spices of different sorts, and at last deposited in vases (not thrown into the river, as Porphyry and Plutarch relate). The cavity of the belly was filled with powder of pure myrrh, cassia, and other fragrant substances. After these processes were finished, the body was salted, being kept in natron, Diodorus says, for upwards of thirty days (i. 91), but Herodotus for seventy (ii. 86). By the seventy days of Herodotus, it is now generally agreed, is to be understood the whole period of mourning, or the time during which the body was in the hands of the embalmers; while the thirty and upwards of Diodorus relate only to the period during which the application of spices was made to the body, which, in the stricter sense, constituted the embalming. This view perfectly accords with the account of Moses, which assigns forty days to the embalming, and seventy to the entire period of mourning. When the embalming was completed, the body was washed, wrapped up in bands of fine linen, which, on the interior, were plastered with gum, and which sometimes extended to the enormous length of 1000 yards. After all this, the body was delivered over to the relatives, who placed it in a stone or wooden coffin.

Such was the nature of the higher and more expensive style of embalming, which, according to Diodorus, cost a talent of silver (£250); and it was, no doubt, the form of it applied to Jacob's body, and the bodies of the other patriarchs in Egypt. The second style left the intestines in the body, but by injecting a strong oil of cedar, and letting it remain for a certain time, the bowels became dissolved, and ran out along with the oil. Natron and spices were then applied to the body. This process cost about twenty-two mins (£60).

By a third mode, which cost comparatively little, and was adopted by the poor, the body was merely cleansed by an injection of symæa, and salted for the same period as in the other cases.

Wilkinson (Ancient Egyptians, v. p. 456, seq.) states that from an examination of the mummies, the gradations, as to elaboration and expense, must have been much more varied than the above account from ancient writers would lead one to suppose, and also, that the incision into the side for the purpose of extracting the bowels, was not always confined to those of the first class, but that some of a comparatively inferior class appear to have been subjected to that species of operation. It would seem, too, that the features of the face, as well as the other parts of the body, were covered over with the bandage, and that it was only through this, and latterly through the coffin, which commonly took the form of the features, that these could be recognized. The innermost coffin or covering, the same writer tells us (p. 477), of the first quality of mummies, was a cartonage, a pasteboard case, damped, and fitted exactly to the shape of the body. It was then taken off again, and made to retain that shape till dry, when it was again applied to the bandaged body, and sewed up at the back. After this it was painted and ornamented with figures and numerous objects, the face also made to imitate that of the deceased, and frequently gilded.

The reasons which may have led the Egyptians to resort to all this care for the preservation of the dead body, have never been conclusively ascertained. Several have been assigned, which are altogether conjectural and improbable. With the greatest appearance of probability it has been ascribed to a distinctive aspect of the doctrine of the soul's transmigration current in Egypt. "There is reason," says Sir G. Wilkinson, "to believe that the Egyptians preserved the body in order to keep it in a fit state to receive the soul which once inhabited it, after the lapse of a certain number of years; and the various occupations followed by the Egyptians during the lifetime of the deceased, which were represented in the sculptures, as well as his arms, the implements he used, or whatever was most precious to him, which were deposited in the tomb with his coffin, might be intended for his benefit at the time of this reunion—which at the least possible period was fixed at 3000 years." What chiefly serves to throw some doubt upon this solution of the problem, is the fact of the process of embalming having been applied also to certain animals; so that possibly after all, as the same author suggests, it may have been mainly attributable to a feeling of respect for the dead.

EMBROIDERY. This word does not occur in the English Bible; but we have the verb embroider once used, Ex. xxviii. 39; and embroiderer twice, Ex. xxxv. 36; xxxviii. 23; so that, if these passages are correctly rendered, the Israelites must have known the art of embroidery. In several passages also an equivalent expression is used—needle-work—and used so as to imply, that not plain sewing, but ornamental work, was evidently meant, Ex. xxvi. 38; Ju. v. 30; Pa. xiv. 14, &c. In all the passages the Hebrew word is the same—rokem (רָקַם) for the artificer, and rikmah (רִקְמָה) for the workmanship produced. Another word frequently used in connection with it, and so much of the same general import that there is some difficulty in distinguishing exactly between them, is chosheb (חָשַׁב), for which the rendering in the English Bible is "cunning workman." The explanation of the rabbins is, that the work of the rokem was embroidery or needle-work, hence appearing only on one side, perhaps sewed on to the cloth; while the work of the chosheb was textile, a sort of tapestry, presenting a face on each side. Gesenius (Thes.) concurs in this view, and thinks, that while the embroidery of flowers and figures was of two sorts—the one woven, the other performed by the needle—the latter sort is the one to be understood as that done by the rokem, and the other by the chosheb. Whether this distribution may be admitted or not, and there is still room perhaps for dispute, there can be no reasonable doubt, that embroidery of both sorts was practised among the Israelites in pretty remote antiquity, though that done by the loom was probably both the more ancient and the more common. It was in Egypt that they first learned the art; and, whether in connection with the bond-service they had to perform there, or of their own choice, certain families, it would appear, at the time of the exodus, had risen to distinction in the arts of weaving and embroidery; some, especially, in the tribes of Judah and Dan, Ex. xxxv. 30-35; 1 Ch. iv. 21. These were exhorted to turn their acquired skill in this department of handicraft to a sacred use, and to prepare ornamented fabrics, in tapestry and needle-work, variegated also with diverse colours, for the curtains of the tabernacle and the robes of the priesthood.

The notices of Egyptian history, confirmed by the monumental remains, give reason for believing that at a comparatively early period they had made wonderful attainments in this line. For example, a corset is mentioned by Herodotus as having been presented by Amasis, king of Egypt, to the Lacedemonians, which was of linen, each thread composed of 360 finer threads, and ornamented with numerous figures of animals, worked in gold and cotton, Herod. iii. 47. This was many centuries indeed after the exodus; but its testimony reaches back to a much earlier time, as such a beautiful and elaborate piece of workmanship could not have been produced without ages of study and application to the art. Wilkinson says, "Many of the Egyptian stuffs presented various patterns worked in colours by the loom, independent of those produced by the dyeing or printing process, and so richly composed that they vied with cloths embroidered by the needle. The art of embroidery," he adds, "was commonly practised in Egypt" (iii. 128)—referring in proof, however, simply to passages in Scripture, and taking them in the sense put upon them in the authorized version, sanctioned (as we have seen) by Gesenius and the rabbins. The authority of Pliny has sometimes been appealed to against such early employment of the needle in embroidering; for he says that the Phrygians (of comparatively late origin as a people) were the inventors of needle embroideries, which were thence called phrygiones (xxxiii. 5). But how little dependence can be placed on Pliny's authority in such a case may be inferred from another thing he states in the same connection, viz.—that Attalus of Pergamus, a great encourager of the arts, was the first who invented the weaving of cloth with a gold thread, while a finely wrought specimen of such weaving is mentioned by Herodotus in the fact just noticed respecting the Egyptian corset of Amasis, fully 300 years before the time of Attalus (the one having lived in the sixth and the other only in the second and third before Christ). In No. 242, an illustration is given from Champollion of the Egyptian embroidered dresses. They are all evidently the production of the loom, and exhibit patterns of the kind called by the Latins scutulata—diamond or lozenge-shaped, chequered. We also give (No. 243) an engraving of the dress of a lady, in which the embroidery is of a more varied and ornate character than usual.

In regard to the Assyrian region, with its centres of trade as well as dominion in Nineveh and Babylon, we have now also the undoubted evidence of their having cultivated with great success, even in early times, the art of producing embroidered as well as richly coloured clothing. The Babylonians certainly were most noted for their skill in weaving cloths distinguished for their colours; and the Babylonish garment which attracted the eye of Achan, and drew after it such disastrous results, Jos. vii 21, was in all probability of that description. Its beauty must have been of a kind that was fitted to dazzle and catch the eye. But it is scarcely to be supposed that an art which flourished at Nineveh should have been unknown in the not very distant Babylon; and we are now in possession of specimens of beautifully-embroidered dresses from the remains of Nineveh. That seen in cut No. 244 is the upper portion of the dress of Sardanapalus III.—evidently a highly ornamented piece of workmanship; and if in its main parts the production of the loom, there are individual ornaments which have all the appearance of having been superadded by the needle, or done apart and then sewed on. Beside the star-like ornaments covering the body of the dress, the sleeves and neck of the dress have broad borders of narrow fillets, with buds and blossoms of lotus-flowers, circles, and a peculiar zigzag pattern alternating. As given here, the dress appears as worn by the king in a warlike attitude riding in a chariot; but in a sculpture of the same king in the British Museum, where he appears feasting with his queen, he is seen in much the same costume. The other illustration, from the same quarter, also presents one attired in a very ornate dress, covered with various yet regularly alternating figures, and tastefully fringed down the side. It has also a broad border of embroidered work, consisting of a pattern of lotus and honeysuckle flowers, or of symbolical figures. The person wearing the dress is uncertain; but being found among the sculptures of Nineveh, the fabric represented is of unquestionable antiquity. The specimens before us clearly show that embroidery as practised among the Assyrians was of a more elaborate character, and in its patterns much richer, than any we are acquainted with from Egypt.

How far the Israelites might cultivate such arts after they were settled in Canaan, we have no means of properly ascertaining. But as their general habits were such as grew out of the possession and cultivation of land, the probability is that they knew little or nothing practically of at least the higher kinds of this skilled handicraft. They would perceive it to be hopeless to compete with their more artistic and commercial neighbours, whether in Assyria or in Egypt; and to the marts of these neighbours they would naturally repair when they sought the materials of finely woven and curiously figured or richly coloured garments. Hence, in Ezekiel's enumeration of the manifold traffic of Tyre, while furnishings of brodered work are twice mentioned, in neither case are they associated with the people of Israel, but merely with the old centres of such productions—Egypt and Assyria; the latter, however, coupled with some related cities, Eze. xxvii. 7, 23, 24. The peculiarity too is noticed in regard to Egypt, of extending this taste for ornamental work to sails, which we know from other sources to have been their custom (Wilkinson, iii. 210).

EMERALD is the equivalent in the English version for nopak (נָפֶק), one of the gems in the high-priest's breastplate, and one also of the articles of Tyre's extensive traffic, Ex. xxviii. 16; Eze. xxvii. 16. But there is no certainty that this was the gem actually meant. Josephus and the Septuagint understood by it the ἀσθαλίς, the carbuncle or Indian ruby—a gem of a fiery red colour. The emerald, on the contrary, is of a bright green, and was well known to the ancients. Gesenius expresses himself as unable to define anything respecting the precise import of the original.

EMERODS, understood to have been some sort of tumours with which the Lord visited the Philistines, on account of their indignity toward the ark of the covenant, 1 Sa. v. 6. Such, undoubtedly, was the ancient Jewish opinion; and modern conjectures on the subject deserve no attention.

EMMIM, a race of people distinguished for their gigantic stature and warlike propensities, who originally occupied a portion of the territory to the east of Jordan, which afterwards fell into the hands of the Moabites; they were in existence so early as the time of Abraham, Ge. xiv. 5; De. ii. 10. (See GIANTS.)

EMMAN'UEL. See IMMANUEL.

EMMA'US, the name of a place, distant from Jerusalem about 60 stadia or $7\frac{1}{2}$ Roman miles. It is mentioned only once, and in connection with the interview held by our Lord and two of the disciples on the day of the resurrection, Lu. xxiv. 13. But nothing is said as to the direction in which it lay, nor for what purpose the two disciples were journeying toward it. That there was a place of that name, and at the distance of 60 stadia from Jerusalem, is also noticed incidentally by Josephus (Wars, vii. 6. 9). The monks identified it with El Kubeibeh, but without any valid ground; and notwithstanding that it lies at too great a distance, Jerome and Eusebius mistook it for the Emmaus, called also Nicopolis, which stood half-way between Jerusalem and Ramleh, on the Philistine border, but which is 20 Roman miles from Jerusalem—a proof at how early a period all certain trace was lost of the Emmaus of St. Luke. Robinson has attempted to revive this view (Researches, III. 65, 66).

EMMOR. See HAMOR.

EN, or AIN, the Hebrew term for fountain, and occurring frequently in compound names. The word also signifies eye, and when applied to springs of water, was doubtless meant to denote these as the open, living eyes of the landscape. (See AIN.)

ENCAMPMENT. The word corresponding to this in Hebrew, mahaneh (מַחֲנֶה), is from a root that signifies to sit down, to pitch a tent, and is hence applied to any band or company presenting a regular and settled aspect—for example, to a nomade party at rest, Ge. xxxii. 21, or even to angelic bands, as seen by Jacob, who therefore called the name of the place where such appeared to him Mahanaim, Ge. xxxii. 2. But in by far the most frequent use of the term it denotes the encampment of Israel as a body, or of its armed host when assembled for military purposes. Our word camp, which is the rendering usually adopted in the English Bible, corresponds to it in all those cases where the host assembled was a strictly military one, but is stretched beyond its usual meaning when applied to the encampments of the congregated host of Israel. Yet it is of these latter alone that we have any detailed account in Scripture; of military encampments nothing but incidental and partial notices are given. During the sojourn in the wilderness, when the entire people had to be kept for many years together within a comparatively narrow space, it was necessary, for the sake of order and propriety as well as safety, that the several tribes and families should have their respective positions assigned them, and that as little as possible should be left to personal rivalry or individual caprice. As the tabernacle of the Lord, with its consecrated ministry and instruments of service, formed incomparably the most important part of the whole establishment, so these had fitly appropriated to them the central place. The tabernacle itself opened toward the east, not without reference probably to the east as the quarter of sunrise, the region whence light perpetually breaks in upon the brooding darkness of the world; and hence the east naturally came to be regarded as the position of highest honour—those who occupied the first rank, both in the narrower and the wider circle, were stationed on the east. Such was the position of Aaron and the priests (including also Moses) in the narrower circle—after whom were the Kohathites on the south, the Gershonites on the west, and the Merarites on the north, the other stem-divisions of the tribe of Levi, Nu. iii. 11. Outside this interior circle, at a considerable distance from the tabernacle, but still looking toward it, and having it in front (for they were to be all round about it) lay the other tribes in order:—First, on the east Judah, having associated with him Issachar and Zebulun; on the south Reuben, with his associates Simeon and Gad; on the west Ephraim, with his associates Manasseh and Benjamin; on the north Dan, with his associates Asher and Naphtali, Nu. ii. 10. Nothing is said as to the relative positions of the three tribes which severally occupied these four sides, as to nearness to the tabernacle, or juxtaposition to the division coming next in order. But the probability is, that as the particular tribe under which the other two were ranged, was to form the kind of advanced guard in marching, it would also, in ordinary circumstances, have the place of priority, both with reference to the tabernacle and to the line of march. Everything of this sort, however, must be in great measure conjectural; as is also the very common idea that the camp as a whole took the form of a square. It may possibly have done so; but there is nothing in the descriptions given which distinctly implies that, and the oval or circular form may just as readily be assigned to it. The more probable supposition is, that the actual positions would vary according to the nature of the locality on which the encampments were made; as this must usually have had a regulating influence on the subordinate arrangements. (For the specific change in respect to the furniture of the tabernacle, and its distribution among the families of Kohath, Gershon, and Merari, see under the several names.)

In its ordinary and habitual state, the encampment of the children of Israel, being that of the Lord's host, and with the Lord himself symbolically resident among them, was ordered not merely, nor even most directly and prominently, with a view to the preservation of health, but for the sake of keeping up the impression of that sanctity, which it most especially behoved the people in all their relations to cherish and manifest. Some of the things prescribed were undoubtedly of a healthful tendency, such as the order to bury the dead outside the camp, Le. x. 4; and the carrying out thither all the refuse connected with sacrifice, and whatever was fitted to create offensive effluvia and odious uncleanness, Le. vi. 11; De. xliii. 12, 13. But it is the incongruity of such things, in their symbolical and moral aspect, with the character of a region which ought in all respects to have reflected the purity and incorruption of Jehovah, which is assigned as the reason for the prescriptions in question, De. xliii. 14. Hence not the dead merely had to be carried out of the camp, but even those who had come in contact with the dead, or had incidentally touched a dead bone, must for a time also take their place outside, till they had undergone the requisite purifications, Nu. v. 2; xxi. 19. In like manner those who were afflicted with any issue, and persons smitten by the leprosy, were obliged to remove out of the camp, not from there being anything infectious in such disorders (for they were not properly of that nature), nor from regard to the general healthfulness of the congregation, but because of the defilement which they (symbolically) imparted to a region wherein nothing that defiled should have been found, Nu. v. 3; Le. xliii. 44. God was to be known by his people, and again made known through them, as emphatically the Living One, who could have no fellowship with death, which is the expression of his curse, or with the things which might more peculiarly be regarded as its signs and forerunners. He must be known also and manifested as the Holy One, who cannot look on sin but with abhorrence, and in whose presence nothing should be permitted that bore on it the impress or image of corruption. And on these accounts especially it was necessary that the occasions and sources of defilement referred to should be excluded from the sphere which was hallowed by his own habitation, and the habitations of the people on whom he had put his name. (See under CLEAN, HEIFER (RED), ISSUE, LEPROSY, &c.)

The burning of the carcass of certain kinds of sin-offering—those, namely, for the high-priest or for the whole congregation—without the camp, Le. iv. 12, 21; He. xiii. 12, had its reason in considerations essentially different, connected with the ritual of sacrifice. (See SIX-OFFERING.) And it was by no means, as very often stated, because of some special defilement attaching, or supposed to attach, to offerings of that description.

In regard to the military encampments of Israel in later times, as already intimated, we are without any definite information. Formed merely for the occasion, and as circumstances might admit, they could scarcely be brought under very precise or stringent regulations. They were pitched, as appears from the history, in any suitable or convenient situation that presented itself—sometimes on a height, Ju. vii. 18; 1 Sa. xliii. 2; sometimes in a valley, 1 Sa. xvii. 3; and no doubt very frequently beside some copious spring or running stream, without easy access to which no force could have long subsisted in so hot a clime, Ju. vii. 1; 1 Sa. xvii. 1; xxx. 9. That some sort of entrenchments or external defences would be thrown around the extremities of the camp, when it was expected to be located for a considerable time in one place, or was in danger of a hostile attack, may be inferred from the nature of the case, and also from certain incidental notices, 1 Sa. xvii. 20; xxvi. 5, 7. But on these and other points connected with camping operations in Israel, our information is extremely scanty, and nothing of any moment depends on them for the elucidation of the historical portions of Old Testament scripture.

VOL. I

EN'DOR [fountain of Dor or house], a town of Manasseh, though within the territory of Issachar, and situated at a short distance from Mount Tabor, and on the south, Jos. xvii. 11. It is chiefly memorable as the place where Saul in his distress went to consult the female necromancer, immediately before the disastrous battle of Gilboa; but is also mentioned in connection with the victory of Barak and Deborah over Sisera, 1 Sa. xxviii. 7; Ps. lxxxiii. 10. It existed as a considerable village in the time of Eusebius and Jerome, but has long since disappeared.

EN-EGLA'IM [fountain of two calves], a town in Moab, supposed to have been toward the north of the Dead Sea—site not known, Eze. xlvii. 10.

EN-GAN'NIM [fountain of gardens]. The name of several places in Palestine. 1. A town of Judah, of which nothing is known, Jos. xv. 34. 2. A town in Issachar, appropriated to the Levites, Jos. xix. 21, generally supposed to be perpetuated in the modern Jenin, which lies about fifteen miles south of Mount Tabor, and which still has a fine stream of pure water running through it, and excellent gardens in its neighbourhood. 3. And a town of the same name is mentioned by Jerome on the east of Jordan, near Gerass.

EN-GEDI [fountain of the kid]. A place on the western shore of the Dead Sea, and about midway between its north and south extremities. Its earlier name was HAZAZON-TAMAR, Ge. xiv. 7; 2 Ch. xx. 2, which means the "felling of palm-trees," and doubtless arose from the number of such trees which on some particular occasion had been cut down in its neighbourhood. It was quite natural, when the place ceased to be so peculiarly distinguished by its palms, that another name should be substituted for the original designation; and as it stood near a remarkably copious and sparkling spring of water, the resort of the wild goats on the surrounding cliffs, none was more natural than Engedi. This is still preserved in 'Ain Jiddy, the name given to the spot by the modern Arabs. The spring, says Robinson, "bursts forth upon a sort of narrow terrace or shelf of the mountain (which overhangs the lake), still more than 400 feet above the level of the sea. The stream rushes down the steep descent of the mountain below, and its course is hidden by a luxuriant thicket of trees and shrubs belonging to a more southern clime." Among these he mentions particularly the semr, the thorny nubk (lote-tree) of Egypt, the oesher, and a tree the Arabs called fustak, but not a palm was to be seen, though the place had once been famous for trees of that order. Nor is there now any town or village near the fountain, but there are the evident remains of one. Descending by the thicket, which clothes the banks of the stream, Dr. Robinson says—"The whole of the descent was apparently once terraced for tillage and gardens; and on the right, near the foot, are the ruins of a town exhibiting nothing of particular interest. Few of the stones appear to have been hewn" (Researches, iii. p. 208, seq.).

Such is all that now appears of the ancient En-gedi, which was a place of some note even when Sodom and Gomorrah were cities of the plain, and the gardens of which were so famous at a later period as to have been thought deserving of celebration in sacred song, Ca. i. 14. It gave its name to the wilderness toward the south and west, which was one of the favourite haunts of David, 1 Sa. xxiv. 1. The deep ravines and caverns with which the district abounds peculiarly fitted it for servicing as a hiding-place to David and his men, when pursued by the hot rage and vengeful malice of Saul. Caverns are still found there which have side-recesses that are capable of holding in the closest secrecy hundreds of men; and from cliffs, separated by intervening gulfs, men to this day hold such converse with each other, as David did with Abner in the ancient times, 1 Sa. xxvi. 14. Speaking of what occurred in this same region, a recent traveller writes—"As we were riding cautiously along the face of the hill, our attention was suddenly arrested by the voice of a shepherd, who was evidently calling to some one whom we could not see, but whose answer we distinctly heard. The dialogue went on. Another and another sentence was slowly and sonorously uttered by the shepherd near us, and as often the response was distinctly given. At length, guided by the sound, we descried far up the confronting hill, the source of the second voice in the person of another shepherd, and learned from our Arab attendants that they were talking to each other about their flocks. Between these two men was the deep crevasse formed by the valley of the Kidron, walled in by lofty precipices which no human foot could scale. It would probably have taken a full hour for one, even as fleet and as strong-winded as an Asahel, to pass from the standing-place of the one speaker to that of the other, and yet they were exchanging words with perfect ease" (Dr. Buchanan's Clerical Furlough, p. 257).

In times considerably later still than those of Saul and David, the primary hermits of Palestine, the Essenes, had their chief seat at En-gedi; and at no great distance from it stood the earliest Christian monastery of Palestine—that of Mar-Saba. But no mention is made of it in the history of the crusades. Only in recent times has attention been again drawn to the place and its remarkable spring.

ENGINES OF WAR. See FORTIFICATION.

EN-HAD'DAH [swift fountain]. A town on the border of Issachar, which has never been identified, Jos. xix. 21.

EN-HAKKORE [fountain of the crier]. A name given by Samson to a place where a spring burst forth in answer to his cry, Ju. xv. 19.

EN-HAZOR [fountain of the village]. A fenced city in Naphtali, but site unknown, Jos. xix. 37.

ENMISHPAT. Another name for KADESH, Ge. xiv. 7 (which see).

ENOCH [dedicated] occurs first as the name given to Cain's eldest son, Ge. iv. 17, but it is chiefly associated with the son of Jared. He was the seventh in the chosen line from Adam, and his history is thus briefly recorded by the sacred writer—"And Enoch lived sixty and five years and begat Methuselah: and Enoch walked with God, after he begat Methuselah, three hundred years, and begat sons and daughters; and all the days of Enoch were three hundred and sixty-five years; and Enoch walked with God, and he was not, for God took him," Ge. v. 22-24. The expression used to characterize the life of Enoch, "he walked with God," indicates the closest fellowship, and is applied only to another son of Adam, and he also an antediluvian patriarch—Noah, Ge. vi. 9. Later saints are often spoken of as "walking before God," or "walking in the ways of the Lord," but never explicitly as walking with himself. It is properly a paradisiacal expression, and points to that state of primeval blessedness and purity when man could look unabashed on the appearance of God, and hear his Creator's voice as he walked amid the trees of the garden. Not that Enoch actually attained to the same intimate communion with heaven, but he nearly approached it; and as already in a sense with God, so God took him; it is not said where, but the natural inference is, to the more immediate presence of God—to where the communion Enoch sought after and delighted in might be more fully enjoyed and more uninterruptedly maintained. Such a taking could not be a passing by death into another world, for it is expressly contradistinguished from the case of all the other believing patriarchs, who, after enjoying God's favour during an extended life, finished it by dying. Enoch, on the contrary, was taken by God as a living saint; he "was translated, that he should not see death," and this expressly because, in his walk with God, he had already obtained "the testimony that he pleased God," He. xi. 5. Various ends were doubtless to be accomplished by this suspension of death in the case of Enoch. Taking place, as it did, in the comparative infancy of the world, when all revelation was embodied in the facts of history, it taught, by means of a palpable proof, the important truth that while, by reason of sin, God has subjected mankind to the law of mortality, he has not bound himself in every case to execute the law, that unbroken continuity of life may be occasionally granted as the reward of distinguished grace. It set, too, in the most emphatic manner, the seal of Heaven's confirmation and approval upon the faith Enoch had exhibited, and the kind of life he had maintained. And finally, viewed in connection with the growing wickedness of the world, against which Enoch had by his life protested, and the coming judgment of which he had prophetically announced, it proclaimed, as with a voice from heaven, the greatness of the evil that was proceeding amongst men, and the fearfulness of the gathering storm that was preparing to break forth on the world. It was already, in God's judgment, better to be taken from the world than to be continued in it as matters then stood, and still more as they threatened to become. Such considerations lighten the mystery of Enoch's translation, though they cannot be said altogether to dispel it.

No notice is taken in the history of any prophecy of Enoch; the only record that is found of it in Scripture is in one of the latest books of the New Testament—the epistle of Jude. There, speaking of the evil characters that were rising up in his day, and in their depravity and wickedness assimilating themselves to those of antediluvian times, St. Jude says, "Enoch, also, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of these, saying, Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints, to execute judgment upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds that they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him." It has been a question where this prophecy was obtained, or how it was preserved? Had it been handed down by tradition? Or did it exist in some ancient, though uninspired, apocryphal production? It is one of the questions connected with the history of the remote past, which cannot be quite satisfactorily answered. The words substantially exist in a writing of some antiquity which goes by the name of the Book of Enoch, and professes to have proceeded from that holy patriarch, but which is certainly apocryphal in character. A passage occurs in this book, ch. ii., which so nearly resembles the one found in the epistle of Jude that there can be no doubt that, if the two writers had not a common authority before them, the one must have borrowed from the other. It runs thus—"Behold, he [the Lord] cometh with ten thousand of his saints, to execute judgment upon them, and destroy the wicked, and reprove all the carnal for everything which the sinful and ungodly have done, and committed against him." It is possible that some common authority containing the words was in the hands of both—a writing of much higher antiquity than either the epistle of Jude or the Book of Enoch—in which the prophecy of that patriarch, though omitted in the genealogical abstract of Genesis, had found a veritable record. It is also possible that, however the knowledge of the prophecy may have been preserved, Jude did not borrow from the Book of Enoch, but rather that the author of the Book of Enoch may have borrowed from Jude. For whether this author was a Christian or not, there is good reason in the book itself to believe that the author was at least acquainted with the character and pretensions of Christ, and spake of the Messiah in a way which no simply Jewish writings of the apostolic or immediately subsequent ages ever did. This view has been well exhibited by Moses Stuart in his Commentary on the Apocalypse (vol. i. sec. 6). It is not, however, concurred in by the two chief editors of the Book of Enoch, viz. Dr. Laurence in this country, and A. G. Hoffman on the Continent. These writers both contend for the priority of the Book of Enoch to that of the epistle of Jude, as is done also by Dr. S. Davidson (art. Enoch, Kitto's Cyclopaedia), and by several late German writers. But Prof. Volkmar of Zürich has lately (Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenl. Gesellschaft, for 1860) urged strong reasons for ascribing it to the period of the Jewish impostor Barchochbas, whose sedition took place about A. D. 132, with whom Alford concurs. The first writer who refers to the book by name is Tertullian, at the beginning of the third century; in Irenæus and Justin Martyr there are apparent allusions to some things in it. There is no real evidence of its existence prior to the Christian era; and that St. Jude derived from it the prophecy of Enoch is an assertion which is quite incapable of proof. (See JUDE; also the Book of Enoch the Prophet, by Dr. Laurence, third ed. 1838; Das Buch Henoch in vollständiger Uebersetzung mit fortlaufendem Commentar, &c., von Andr. G. Hoffmann, 1833 and 1838.)

ENOCH was also the name of a son of Midian, and of the eldest son of Reuben, Ge. xxv. 4; xlv. 9.

ENON, or ENON [springs]. A place on the west side of the Jordan, near Salim, not far also from Bethshean and Shechem, where John for a time baptized, Jn. iii. 23, and probably so called from the copious streams it possessed. (See SALIM.)

EN-ROGEL [fountain of foot], called by the rabbins Fuller's fountain, because fullers who trod the cloth with their feet used to frequent this fountain. The name first occurs in the description given in Joshua of the boundary line between the territories of Benjamin and Judah. Starting from the north-west border of the Dead Sea, this line went up through the mountains of En-Shemesh, thence to En-rogel, and up the valley of Hinnom, on the south side of the Jebusites, ch. xv. 7. It is again noticed in connection with the rebellion of Absalom, as the place adjacent to the city where Jonathan and Ahimaaz waited to hear tidings of what passed within, 2 Sa. xviii. 16, 17; also as the place near which Adonijah, when going to have himself proclaimed king, assembled his friends and made a feast, described by Josephus as being "without the city, at the fountain which is in the king's garden (1 Ki. i. 9; Jos. Ant. vii. 14, 4). The situation of En-rogel is thus plainly enough fixed to be in the precincts of Jerusalem, and somewhere about the southern extremity of the valley of Hinnom. And there precisely is the site of what is now called by the Franks the well of Nehemiah, and by the natives that of Job (Bir-Eyâb). Robinson describes it as "a deep well situated just below the junction of the valley of Hinnom with that of Jehoshaphat. The small oblong plain there formed is covered with an olive-grove, and with the traces of former gardens extending down the valley from the present gardens of Siloam. Indeed this whole spot is the prettiest and most fertile around Jerusalem. The well is very deep, of an irregular quadrilateral form, walled up with large squared stones, terminating above in an arch on one side, and apparently of great antiquity. There is a small rude building over it, furnished with one or two large troughs or reservoirs of stone, which are kept partially filled for the convenience of the people. The well measures 125 feet in depth, 50 feet of which was now full of water. The water is sweet, but not very cold, and is at the present day drawn up by the hand" (Researches, i. 490). In winter it is usually full, and sometimes overflows.

EN-SHE'MESH [fountain of the sun], a spring which lay on the border between Judah and Benjamin, and apparently between Adummim and En-rogel, Jos. xv. 7. It is usually identified with Ain-Haud, a spring lying on the road from Jerusalem to Jericho, about a mile from Bethany.

ENSIGN. See BANNER.

EPAENETUS, a Christian, residing at Rome when the epistle to the Romans was written, and designated by the apostle "the first-fruits of Asia," ch. xvi. 5—for so the best authorities have it, and not, as in the received text, "first-fruits of Achaia." We may hold it for certain, therefore, that Epænetus belonged to some part of Asia Minor, the first in that part to embrace the gospel on the testimony of Paul; but the precise place where his conversion took place is not more nearly defined.

EPAPH'RAS, probably a member and original office-bearer in the church of Colossæ, mentioned by the apostle Paul in his epistle to the Colossians as "his dear fellow-servant and a faithful minister of Christ," one also that laboured in prayer for them even when with the apostle in Rome, ch. i. 7; iv. 12. He is again mentioned in the epistle to Philemon, and is there characterized by the apostle as his "fellow-prisoner in Christ Jesus," ver. 23. On what special grounds he suffered imprisonment is left altogether unnoticed; it may have been simply from his connection with St. Paul, but may also have been on the score of his own active exertions in behalf of the propagation of the gospel.

EPAPHRODITUS, an officer in the church at Philippi, and the messenger whom the church deputed to go to Rome with certain contributions to the apostle Paul for his support during the time of his imprisonment. While fulfilling this ministry he was seized with a dangerous illness, which for a time awakened the deepest concern in the apostle's mind. But he was again restored, and bore with him, on his return to Philippi, the precious epistle which the apostle addressed to that church. That Epaphroditus was a person of high Christian worth, and of singular self-denial in the labours of the gospel, is evident from the epithets Paul applies to him, and the whole tone and current of his remarks regarding him, Phi. ii. 25, seq.; iv. 18.

EPHAH, a dry measure containing about seven gallons and a half, or nearly a bushel. (See MEASURES.)

EPHAH. 1. A grandson of Abraham, whose posterity settled in Arabia, and bore the name of their progenitor, Ge. xxv. 4; Is. lx. 6. 2. A concubine of Caleb, of the tribe of Judah, 1 Ch. ii. 46. A male of the house of Judah, son of Jahdai, 1 Ch. ii. 47.

EPHES-DAMMIM [cessation of blood], a place in the tribe of Judah, no further defined than that it lay between Shochoh and Azekah, 1 Sa. xvii. 1—the place of the Philistine encampment at the time when the encounter took place between Goliath and David. It occurs again under the abbreviated form of Pas-Jammim, 1 Ch. xi. 13. (See ELAH, VALLEY OF.)

EPHESIANS, EPISTLE TO THE. One of the epistles written by St. Paul during his captivity at Rome (or at Cæsarea), to the flourishing church founded by himself in the commercial metropolis of Asia Minor. The others are the epistles to the Colossians, to the Philippians, and to Philemon.

Genuineness.—If the question is to be decided by the unanimous testimony of Christian antiquity, no doubt can be entertained as to the authorship of this epistle. Reminiscences of it occur in the Pastor of Hermas (Simpl. 9. 13; Mand. iii. 10, 11), and in the epistle of Polycarp (cc. 1, 12); and when Ignatius, writing to the Ephesians, addresses them as “co-religionists of Paul, the martyred and the blessed, who throughout the epistle makes mention of you in Christ Jesus” (Ad Ephes. c. 19), the allusion to our epistle is manifest. Irenæus (A. D. 170) is the first writer who expressly names Paul as the author:—“As the blessed Paul,” he writes, “says in the epistle to the Ephesians, ‘since we are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones,’ Ep. v. 30” (Adv. Hæres. l. v. c. 2, a. 3). And again, in the same work (l. v. c. 14, a. 3), “As Paul tells the Ephesians, ‘In whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins,’ Ep. i. 7; and again to the same, ‘You who were sometime far off have been made nigh by the blood of Christ;’ and again, ‘Abolishing in his flesh the enmity, the law of commandments in ordinances,’ ch. ii. 11-15.” After this date, the epistle becomes subject of frequent allusion:—it will be sufficient to cite Tertullian and Origen, the former of whom (Adv. Marcion, l. v. c. 11) says, “I pass over the other epistle, which we hold to have been written to the Ephesians, but the heretics to the Laodiceans;” while the latter cites Ep. i. 4, with the observation, “Thus the apostle in the epistle to the Ephesians uses the same language” (De Princ. l. iii.)

Notwithstanding this absence of doubt on the part of ancient writers, the modern critical school of Germany has included the epistle to the Ephesians in the number of those whose genuineness is open to suspicion. Schleiermacher led the way in calling in question the received opinion, and he has been followed by De Wette and Baur. The objections of the Tübingen theologian are chiefly philosophical; he thinks that certain Gnostic ideas and expressions betray a later age: but it is hardly worth while to follow this writer into the regions of unreasoning scepticism which seem his natural element. In fact Baur considers the epistles to the Romans, Corinthians, and Galatians, to be the only alleged writings of St. Paul whose genuineness is certain. De Wette's exceptions are of a more specific character, and may deserve a passing notice; the English reader will hardly think that they deserve more. They are principally three in number;—first, De Wette finds in the epistle “a good deal both in the language and the ideas that is inconsistent with a Pauline origin.” With respect to the former, it is now established as a rule of sound criticism that no argument can be drawn from the employment of words not used elsewhere by a writer (ἀραιὰ λεγόμενα), unless they are manifestly inconsistent either with the writer's style as gathered from his other works, or with the dialect of the age to which he belongs. So far, in the present instance, from their appearance exciting suspicion, the scanty number of St. Paul's epistles, compared with the intellectual affluence of the writer and the variety of subjects upon which he treats, renders it quite natural that in each of these compositions some such words should be found; as indeed is the case. And De Wette has not attempted to prove that those occurring in this epistle (such as ἐξαπίσωτες, ch. i. 4 and ἐξισχύθητε, ch. iii. 18), are in themselves expressions which the apostle would not be likely to use. Under the head of “ideas foreign to the apostle” De Wette specifies the “demonology” of ch. ii. 2, and especially ch. vi. 12; the expressions, “foundation of the apostles and prophets,” ch. ii. 20, “holy apostles,” ch. iii. 5, and “my knowledge in the mystery of Christ,” ch. iii. 4, as inconsistent with a proper spirit of humility; the “allegorical application” of Pa. lxxviii. 18 in ch. iv. 8; the “allegory” of the marriage bond as illustrative of the union betwixt Christ and the church, ch. v. 23-32; the “harshness” of such admonitions as “Let him that stole steal no more,” ch. iv. 28, and “Be not drunk with wine,” ch. v. 18; with other instances of similar character. Objections resting merely upon the individual taste or private impressions of the objector it is impossible and needless to refute; and of this description are those just mentioned. To the “ideas” excepted against, corresponding or analogous ones may be found in the other writings of St. Paul; and if such could not be found, it would, as Olahausen justly remarks (vol. iv. p. 127), be simply a case of singular conceptions (ἀραιὰ νοήματα), which in themselves have no greater weight than singular words (ἀραιὰ λεγόμενα). The second ground of doubt in De Wette's mind is the alleged “verbosity” of the epistle, coupled with “great poverty of thought.” In this common readers are not likely to concur with him. The fulness of the sentences and the complexity of the construction have indeed from the first been subject of remark with commentators; but this oratorical swell of composition, and these grammatical difficulties, proceed, as in the parallel case of Thucydides, from the conglomeration, not the poverty, of thought; the writer seeming to labour under the vastness of his conceptions, and heaping idea upon idea in his attempt to describe the blessings of the gospel. Thirdly, it is alleged that this epistle “presents nothing peculiar,” and is little more than “a diffuse expansion of that to the Colossians.” That, as compared with most of the other epistles of Paul, the epistle to the Ephesians is remarkable for the absence of local allusion or polemical discussion is true; and the reason of this peculiarity will demand our attention in the proper place. But the peculiarity itself imparts an air of originality to the epistle. Specific errors introduced by heretical teachers occupy a large portion of the epistle to the Colossians; of such errors that to the Ephesians contains no trace. Yet since spurious compositions are usually composed with a polemical view, and assume the authority of an apostolic name in order to crush opponents, it is incredible that any individual, or party, should have taken the trouble to elaborate so perfect an imitation of St. Paul's style with, as far as appears, no ulterior purpose of gaining a controversial advantage. Moreover, a careful examination of the contents of both epistles proves that, though there exists a general resemblance between them, easily accounted for by the fact of their having been written nearly at the same time, the epistle to the Ephesians is pervaded by a course of thought of its own, and even in the parallel passages contains important additions. Harless, in the introduction to his valuable commentary, has abundantly shown this. The leading topic, he observes, of the epistle to the Colossians is the glory of the person of Christ, in whom believers are complete, and need no supplementary additions either from Jewish ritualism or Gentile philosophy; while the epistle to the Ephesians enlarges rather upon the great facts of redemption in the electing, redeeming, and sanctifying grace of God. The same commentator exhibits in parallel columns the corresponding passages of either epistle, an inspection of which will convince the reader that the one is no mere repetition of the other; e.g. the important passages respecting the symbolical nature of marriage, and the Christian armour, in our epistle have nothing corresponding in the other, nor are they such as would be likely to occur to a forger. Finally, De Wette's arguments tend to destroy each other; the greater the number of ἀναξ λεγόμενα, or unusual ideas, which he discovers in the epistle to the Ephesians, the less probable, of course, it is that it is a mere imitation of that to the Colossians.

The persons to whom it was addressed.—Upon this subject a well-known controversy exists. Both on internal and external grounds critics have been led to question the correctness of the common tradition that this epistle was addressed specially to the Ephesians. With the single exception of the allusion to the writer's captivity, ch. iii. 1, it contains nothing of a personal or of a local character. Now when we recollect the length of time which St. Paul spent at Ephesus, the great success of his preaching in that city, and the trials and dangers which he there underwent, it seems strange that he should not take occasion to remind those to whom he wrote of what had passed before their eyes, as he does in the epistles to the Thessalonians. To this must be added that expressions occur in the epistle which, at first sight, seem to imply that the writer was not personally acquainted with his correspondents. Such are, "wherefore I also, after I heard of your faith in the Lord Jesus," &c., ch. i. 15; "since ye heard of the dispensation of the grace of God, which is given me to youward," ch. iii. 2; "as I wrote afore in few words, whereby when ye read ye may understand my knowledge in the mystery of Christ," ch. iii. 4. (Did the Ephesians then need a written epistle to acquaint them with St. Paul's knowledge of the gospel?) So strongly was the discrepancy between the inscription and the contents of the epistle felt by some ancient writers, that the totally groundless supposition was advanced, that it was written by St. Paul before his first visit to Ephesus (Syn. Scrip. Sec. in the Works of Athanasius).

The doubts thus suggested by the structure of our epistle might be dismissed, or regarded as of little importance, were the external testimony wholly without a flaw. This however is not the case. The Cod. B (the Vatican MS.) relegates the words "at Ephesus," ch. i. 1, to the margin, though it must be added that they are from the same hand as the rest of the MS.; and Cod. 67 omits them, though only ex emendatione. These circumstances might be thought of little weight, did not passages occur in some of the early fathers which prove that in some of the MSS. which they inspected, the words in question were not found. Marcion, it appears from a passage in Tertullian (Adv. Mar. v. 11), considered the epistle as addressed to the Laodiceans; and though the African father charges his opponent with systematic depravation of the sacred text, it does not appear what dogmatical advantage the latter could have gained by the mere substitution of Laodicea for Ephesus: it is more probable that he actually possessed MSS. in which, to say the least, the words "at Ephesus" were omitted. That in the fourth century such MSS. existed is placed beyond doubt by an observation of Basil the Great, who, in his controversy with Eunomius (vol. i. p. 264, Garnier), founds a dogmatical argument upon the absence of the words aforesaid:—Christians, he says, are in the epistle to the Ephesians called "the saints which are" (τοῖς ἁγίοις τοῖς ὄντι καὶ πιστοῖς ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ), i. e. who derive substantial existence from their union with Christ the eternally existing Son; "for so," he continues, "the ancients have handed it down to us, and we ourselves have thus found it in the ancient MSS."

It has been remarked, finally, as singular circumstances, that the name of Timothy, which is joined with that of the apostle in the greeting to the Colossians, ch. i. 1, does not occur in the corresponding passage in the epistle before us, and that it contains no salutations to individuals at the close.

Various hypotheses have accordingly been framed respecting the original destination of the epistle. Of these that which regards it as the "epistle from Laodicea" mentioned in Col. iv. 16 (Grot. Hammond, Mill, Wetstein, and others), is encumbered with insuperable difficulties. With the exception of the two MSS. above mentioned, all our existing ones have the words "at Ephesus," and ecclesiastical tradition is equally unanimous to the effect that the epistle was addressed to the Ephesians, for even Basil entertains no doubt upon this point:—how could the real destination have been so completely lost sight of? or is it likely that it was preserved by the heretic Marcion alone and his followers? Nor does this hypothesis lessen the difficulty arising from the perfectly general character of the epistle. St. Paul, as appears from Col. ii. 1; iv. 15, felt a deep interest in the Laodicean church; he must have gained an accurate knowledge of its state from Epaphras, Col. iv. 13; that no allusion therefore to local circumstances should occur in an epistle to that church is nearly as strange as that none should be found in one addressed to the Ephesians. The apostle's direction, moreover, to the Colossians, to "salute the brethren which are in Laodicea," Col. iv. 15, seems incompatible with the notion of his having written an epistle to the latter at the same time, or nearly so; for why should he not have saluted them with his own pen? We must conclude then that "the epistle from Laodicea" was one of the many that doubtless St. Paul wrote during his ministry, but which were not intended to form part of the canon, and therefore were permitted to sink out of sight. (See the remarks on the lost epistle to the Corinthians, in the article on the EPISTLES TO CORINTHIANS.)

More plausible is the theory first suggested by Usher, that our epistle was a circular addressed to the churches of Asia Minor, but to none of them in particular. The proposers of it rely mainly upon the fact of some ancient MSS. having omitted the words "at Ephesus," and suppose that a gap was purposely left by the apostle after the words τοῖς ἀδελφοῖς, to be filled up either by himself or Tychicus, according as each church received a copy. Or it is conceived that some copies were provided with names of places, while others, without such specification, were given to Tychicus, to be distributed at his discretion (Hansen, Paulus, p. 611). But the solution is too ingenious to be substantial. If the epistle was to be merely encyclical, how can we suppose the author to have intended to alter its character by the insertion of particular names? or given Tychicus permission to do so? Or how can we suppose that the apostle would have extolled the faith and love of his readers, ch. i. 15, without knowing who the particular readers would be? or affirm that he had "heard" of them, ch. i. 15, without having in his mind a specific society of believers? Moreover, it is against the analogy of the other epistles of St. Paul, that the word ἀδελφοῖς should stand without the name of a place or a province following it.

Nothing remains but, deferring to ancient tradition and to the reading of existing MSS., to admit the correctness of the common designation of this epistle. At the same time, there can be no question of its encyclical character. Under these circumstances, the most probable hypothesis is that the epistle was indeed inscribed to the Ephesians, but that it was intended for a larger circle of readers, and therefore purposely contained nothing but what was common and interesting to all. What this larger circle consisted of, whether the sister churches of Laodicea, Hierapolis, and Colossæ, or the smaller bodies of Christians in the immediate vicinity of Ephesus, it is impossible to say; but the latter seems the more probable supposition. And thus Beza's observation, quoted by Harless (Einleit. p. 56), "Suspicio non tam ad Ephesios ipsos proprie missam epistolam quam Ephesum, ut ad cæteras ecclesias Asiaticas transmittetur," may—if we somewhat limit the meaning of the word Asiaticas, i. e. to the daughter communities which had sprung up around Ephesus itself—conduct us to the right solution. At all events, the consentient tradition of the church must outweigh internal difficulties. These latter, too, have been somewhat exaggerated. About six years had elapsed since St. Paul's sojourn at Ephesus; time enough to bring about considerable changes both in the number of those to whom he had been personally known, and in the extension of the church beyond the limits of the city. It might well be therefore, or the apostle might not unnaturally suppose it to be so, that many of the existing Christian community were strangers to him personally, under which impression he might be induced to use the expressions which have appeared somewhat strange, ch. i. 15; iii. 2, 4. As regards the omitted salutations at the end, it is by no means the universal practice of St. Paul to append such to his epistles, as will be seen from the instances of the epistles to the Galatians and Thessalonians. The absence of Timothy's name at the commencement of the epistle may be accounted for either by his not having, at the time it was written, any special connection with its circle of readers, or by his absence from Rome on a temporary mission.

Time and place of writing.—The remarks which, under this head, have been made upon the epistle to the Colossians (see article), belong equally to that to the Ephesians, since the two epistles were manifestly written from the same place, and within a short time of each other. The arguments adduced for preferring the imprisonment at Rome, A. C. xxviii. 30, to that at Cæsarea, A. C. xxiv. 27, as the period during which both epistles, together with those to the Philippians and to Philemon, were written, it is unnecessary to repeat: for them the reader is referred to the article just mentioned. The question which of the epistles was prior in point of time has been happily set at rest by Harless, who, in his commentary upon ch. vi. 21, "But that ye also may know my affairs," &c., has shown that this expression can only be explained by a reference to Col. iv. 7, "All my state shall Tychicus declare unto you;" "But that ye also [ye Ephesians as well as the Colossians] may know my affairs, &c., Tychicus, a beloved brother, &c., shall make known unto you all things;" whence it follows that our epistle was written after, but very shortly after, that to the Colossians. The most probable date for both is A. D. 62.

Contents.—The topics upon which the apostle enlarges prove at a glance that the epistle was primarily intended for Christians of heathen origin, yet so as to lead believing Jews to an insight into the spiritual meaning of the Mosaic polity and ordinances. It consists of two main divisions—one dogmatical, ch. i.—iii., the other practical, ch. iv.—vi.

The apostle commences his doctrinal exposition with an enumeration of the spiritual blessings—election from all eternity in Christ, redemption through his blood, and adoption into the family of God confirmed by the sealing of the Spirit—which the gospel reveals for man's acceptance, ch. i. 3-14. Passing then to the case of his readers, he thanks God for their Christian fruitfulness, and prays for their growth in spiritual understanding and experience of the quickening power of Christ's Spirit, ch. i. 15-23. By way of enhancing the mercies they had received, he proceeds to point out the deplorable state in which they, in common with all men, were by nature, ch. ii. 1-3; a state from which nothing but the unmerited grace of God could have delivered them, ch. ii. 4-10. They were formerly outside the circle of God's covenanted mercies, and lived without hope: now in Christ Jesus Jew and Gentile enjoyed the same privileges; the distinctions of the theocracy had given place to the unity of the Spirit; while that temporary structure itself had merged in its antitype, the spiritual temple composed of living stones, built upon the foundation of the doctrine taught by apostles and prophets, "Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone," ch. ii. 11-22. To him (the apostle) had the special commission been assigned of announcing the admission of the Gentiles to every blessing of the promised salvation; let not then his present bonds discourage them, while he, for his part, would fervently supplicate God to strengthen and deepen the work of grace begun in their hearts, ch. iii.

The practical portion of the epistle opens with an admonition to Christian unity, grounded upon the great common facts of the Christian life, ch. iv. 1-6, and the divine intention that the existing multiplicity of spiritual gifts should nevertheless minister to the edification of the one indivisible body of which Christ is the head, ch. iv. 7-16. The moral duties of the second table follow, with a special reference to the gross neglect of them which marked their heathen state, ch. iv. 17-21. Upon the social relations the apostle speaks at length, especially upon that of the married state, and, by an application of it hitherto unthought of (μυστήριον), he employs it to shadow forth the union between Christ and the church, ch. v. 22-33; vi. 1-10. After an animated description of the Christian warfare, in which the weapons, defensive and offensive, then in use serve to illustrate the various graces of the Christian character, ch. vi. 10-20, the apostle refers them for more minute information respecting himself and his work to Tychicus, the bearer of the epistle, and concludes with the customary apostolic salutation, ch. vi. 10-24.

[Like the other epistles from Rome, that to the Ephesians has not been frequently commented upon. Perhaps the difficulties of construction and thought which it contains have been uninviting. De Wette's commentary is not up to his usual level. The best contribution from Germany is the work of Harless (Erlangen), a second edition of which has appeared. The commentary of Alford (The Greek Testament, vol. iii. Rivington's), also the separate commentaries of Ellicott, Eadie, and Hodge, are well known.]

EPHESUS. The principal city of the Ionian confederacy, on the western coast of Asia Minor, nearly opposite the island of Samos. Besides the name by which it is best known, it bore successively those of Samorna, Trachea, Ortygia, and Ptelea. Its origin reaches back to a remote antiquity, until it becomes lost in legend. By some writers the Amazons are said to have been its founders, at which time it was called Smyrna. According to Strabo (xiv. p. 640) the first inhabitants were the Leleges and Carians, who were driven out by the Ionian colony led by Androclus, son of Codrus (see Cramer's Asia Minor, i. p. 303). In the New Testament it is remarkable as one of the principal scenes of St. Paul's labours, and as occupying a conspicuous place among the churches mentioned in the Apocalypse, Ra. i. 11; ii. 1.

Situation.—Two large rivers, the Hermus and the Mæander, flowing from east to west, intersect the central portion of Asia Minor. The space thus inclosed contains two mountain ranges, following the direction of the rivers, Tmolus on the north, and Messogis on the south, at an average distance from each other of about thirty miles. Between these ranges lies the basin of a third smaller river, the Cayster, which, after watering an elevated region called the Caystrian Meadows, passes through a gorge formed by the hills Galesus and Pactyas, enters an alluvial plain of about five miles in breadth, of which the sea is the western boundary. Ephesus was situated in this plain, on the south side of the Cayster.

The city stood partly upon the level ground, and partly upon gentle eminences, of which the most important were Prion or Pion and Coressus, the former lying to the north-east and the latter to the south of the plain. The ancient town seems to have been confined to the northern slope of Coressus, for Herodotus (i. 26) tells us that on the invasion of Croesus (B.C. 560) the Ephesians placed themselves under the protection of Diana, by fastening a rope from their walls to her temple, which at that time was seven stadia distant, and lay nearer the sea, or rather the sacred port called Panormus, which was connected with the sea by means of a canal, and which is now filled up (see Falkener's Plan of Ephesus). In the lapse of time the inhabitants advanced farther into the plain, and built around the temple, and in this manner a new town sprang up, which subsisted until the time of Alexander the Great (Strabo, xiv. p. 640).

After the time of Alexander Ephesus fell under the rule of Lysimachus (B.C. 281), who surrounded the city with a wall surmounting the ridge of Coressus, and inclosing that of Prion, the remains of which still exist. The port of Ephesus was called Panormus, and the site is still marked by a swamp formed by the alluvial deposit of the river Cayster (Hamilton's Asia Minor, ii. 26). From an early period it seems to have laboured under disadvantages from this source, and Attalus Philadelphus, who succeeded to the rule of Lysimachus and his successors, endeavoured by narrowing the entrance to remedy the evil; but his measures being injudiciously planned failed of success. Such, however, were the natural advantages of the site, that Ephesus rapidly grew in commercial importance, and in the time of Augustus it was the chief emporium of Asia on this side the Taurus. Here the Roman proconsuls usually landed on their progress to their eastern provinces; and by this route the trade from Greece and Italy passed into the interior. Convenient roads connected Ephesus with the more remote districts (τὰ ἀποτετακμένα μέρη, Ac. xix. 1). One led through the passes of Tmolus to Sardis, and thence to the north-east parts of Asia; and another to the south passed through the Magnesian territory, and after taking Colossæ and Iconium in its way through the valley of the Mæander, opened a communication with Syria and the Euphrates. Other roads ran along the sea coast, on the north to Lebedos, Teos, and Smyrna, and on the south to Miletus (see Kloppe's Hellas, xix.) A district covered with pine groves, called Ortygia, skirted the shore to the south of the Cayster; and in the plain to the north of that river were several lakes, still existing, called Selinusia. These lakes abounded with excellent fish.

History.—The history of Ephesus presents little that is remarkable. Being founded by Androclus the legitimate son of Codrus, it enjoyed a pre-eminence over the other members of the Ionian confederacy, and was denominated the royal city of Ionia. The climate and country which the colonists from Attica had selected as their future abode surpassed, according to Herodotus (i. 142), all others in beauty and fertility; and had the martial spirit of the Ionians corresponded to their natural advantages, they might have grown into a powerful independent nation. The softness however of the climate, and the ease with which the necessaries of life could be procured, transformed the hardy inhabitants of the rugged Attica into an indolent and voluptuous race: hence they fell successively under the power of the Lydians (B.C. 560) and the Persians (B.C. 557); and though the revolt of Histieus and Aristagoras against the Persian power was for a time successful, the contest at length terminated in favour of the latter (Herod. vi. 7-2). The defeat of the Persians by the Greeks gave a temporary liberty to the Ionian cities; but the battle of Mycale transferred the virtual dominion of the country to Athens. During the Peloponnesian war they paid tribute indifferently to either party, and the treaty of Antalcidas (B.C. 387) once more restored them to their old masters the Persians. They beheld with indifference the exploits of Alexander and the disputes of his captains; and resigned themselves without a struggle to successive conquerors. Ephesus was included in the dominions of Lysimachus; but after the defeat of Antiochus (B.C. 190), it was given by the Romans to the kings of Pergamum. In the year B.C. 129 the Romans formed their province of Asia. The fickle Ephesians took part with Mithridates against the Romans, and massacred the garrison: they had reason to be grateful for the unusual clemency of L. Cornelius Sulla, who merely inflicted heavy fines upon the inhabitants. Thenceforward the city formed part of the Roman empire. Towards the end of the eleventh century Ephesus experienced the same fate as Smyrna; and after a brief occupation by the Greeks it surrendered in 1308 to Sultan Saysan, who, to prevent future insurrections, removed most of the inhabitants to Tyriæum, where they were massacred. It is supposed that the modern Turkish village Aiasaluk (by some thought to be a corruption of ὁ ἅγιος Θεολόγος, the designation of the beloved apostle) marks the site of the ancient city; but the recent researches of Mr. Falkener place it more to the south-west, in the valley between Mounts Prion and Coressus.

Municipal government.—Asia was a proconsular province, under the rule of an ἀρχαῖρος (translated in Ac. xix. 38 a “deputy.” The plural is in this passage probably used for the singular). The proconsul was accustomed to make a circuit of the chief towns of his province, for the purpose of holding assizes in each. It so happened that at the time of Demetrius’ tumult the assizes were being held at Ephesus (ἀγοραῖοι ἐγούρηται, Ac. xix. 38). The city seems to have enjoyed municipal government under the rule of a γερονσία or βουλή, i.e. a senate, and a δήμος, or popular assembly. It was the latter that, at the instigation of Demetrius, assembled so tumultuously in the theatre. The γραμματεῦς, or “town-clerk,” of whom mention is made on that occasion, was an officer of considerable dignity, to whose custody the public records were committed, and whose duty it was to open and read state letters, and to take notes of what passed in the assembly. The asiarchs, likewise mentioned in Ac. xix. 31, were not local magistrates, but presidents of the games instituted in honour of Diana (the Artemisia), which were celebrated in the month of May. They were officers chosen annually from that part of the province of which Ephesus was the metropolis, from the wealthiest citizens, and they had the charge of the religious spectacles, the expenses of which they bore. To these annual games the population from all parts of Ionia flocked, with their wives and children. Wordsworth (on Ac. xix. 31) observes that it is a remarkable circumstance, as illustrative of the influence which St. Paul had gained at Ephesus, that some of these asiarchs sent a friendly caution to the apostle not to trust himself to the enraged multitude in the theatre. On the coins of Ephesus the γραμματεῦς, ἀρχαῖρος, and Ἀσιάρχαι, frequently appear. (See Akerman, Num. III. p. 47-65.)

Arts and sciences.—In an intellectual point of view, Ephesus has but few claims to consideration. The two great painters, Apelles and Parrhasius, were natives of this city; and among philosophers there occur the names of Heraclitus, surnamed the Obscure, and Hermodorus, from whom the Romans borrowed a part of their code. Antiquity makes mention of the poet Hipponax, the geographer Artemidorus, and Lychneus, an orator and historian. Ephesus, however, was one of the principal seats of those occult sciences of which Asia Minor, and especially Phrygia in after times, was the fruitful parent. The Ἐφέσια γράμματα, supposed to have been incantations written on pieces of parchment and worn as amulets, are frequently mentioned by ancient authors. To what an extent these pursuits, always the characteristic of a depraved age, prevailed at Ephesus, may be gathered from Ac. xix. 19; from which also we learn the fictitious value at which the books containing the principles of the magical art were estimated. The first effect of a reception of the gospel was the renunciation of all such forbidden practices.

Religion.—The religion of Ephesus centres in the worship of “the great goddess Diana.” The worship of Artemis, or Diana, as practised at Ephesus, was evidently of eastern, and not of Greek origin. Greek polytheism never would have conceived a representation of the goddess, “the image that fell from heaven,” such as was enshrined in the temple at Ephesus. Instead of the superb Diana of the chase, this idol consisted of an image of wood, sometimes, as in the statue in the museum of Naples, with handsome features; it had many breasts, and was in shape like a mummy, terminating in a point which rested upon a rude block, and covered with mystic symbols. Upon the head was a mural crown, and each hand held a bar of metal. (See Ak. Num. III. p. 65.) The whole was evidently symbolical of the productive powers of nature. Like the old statue of Minerva Polias in the Acropolis, the Ephesian image was an object of profound veneration.

This image was lodged in the most magnificent temple of the ancient world. According to Pliny (H. N. xvi. 79), the temple of the Ephesian Diana was burned and rebuilt no less than seven times, the structure which he describes being the eighth. But since the three last temples occupied the same foundations, at the head of the Sacred Port, it is probable that the injury occasioned by the latter conflagrations was but partial, and that the temple was repaired after each, rather than rebuilt. These foundations were laid by Theodorus, about 500 B.C., on marshy ground, to obviate the effect of earthquakes: they consisted of immense masses of stone from Mount Prion, over which was laid a deep bed of charcoal and wool, well rammed down. The first temple on the new site was commenced about 460 B.C. by the architects Ctesiphon and Metagenes. It was burned down in the year 400 B.C. The second temple (seventh of the whole series) rose upon the ruins with such magnificence as to inspire a fanatic named Herostratus with the idea of perpetuating his name by destroying it; which accordingly he effected by fire in the year B.C. 356, the same night on which Alexander the Great was born. The inhabitants exerted themselves to the utmost to restore the principal ornament of their city on a still more enlarged scale. The Ephesian women are said to have freely given their gold and jewels, and the inhabitants of Asia were summoned to render aid; a call to which they enthusiastically responded. This last, and most celebrated temple, is said by Pliny to have occupied 220 years in building; but this probably includes the whole period, from the laying of the foundations to the completion, the date of which would thus be about 280

B.C. It was justly accounted one of the wonders of the world. It exhibited the most perfect example of the graceful Ionic style. In length it was 425 feet, and in breadth 220, so that it was the largest of known Greek temples. The columns, according to Pliny, were 127 in number, but as Leake (Asia Minor, p. 347) observes, this is probably an error, as the number could not have been odd. The words of Pliny are, "Columnæ centum viginti septem a singulis regibus factæ." Mr. Falkener (Ephesus, p. 243) adopts the reading of those who place a comma after viginti, thus making Pliny say, "The columns are 120, seven of them the gifts of kings," which, besides rendering the number even, removes the improbability of the whole 127 having been royal offerings. Each column was sixty feet high, and thirty-six were cælatæ, i.e. ornamented with inlaid metals.

The religious services of the temple were conducted by a hierarchy of eunuchs and virgin priestesses, the former of whom were called Megabyzæ, and the latter Melissæ, literally a swarm of bees, either from their number, or because the bee was sacred to Diana. A high-priest, who bore the title of Essen, and sometimes Rex, presided over the eunuchs, and the priestesses in like manner served under a superior. No arms were permitted to be worn within the precincts, and no bloody sacrifices were offered. In the decoration of the edifice the most celebrated artists were employed, and no expense was spared. The gates were of cypress, highly polished, and the roof of cedar; the steps leading up to it of vine. The altar was almost entirely the work of Praxiteles, and the sculptors Thraso and Scopas lent their aid in embellishing other parts of the building. Perhaps the most precious of these monuments of art was the picture of Apelles, representing Alexander wielding a thunder-bolt, for which the painter is said to have received the large sum of twenty talents of gold, or about £3875 of our money. An ample revenue from endowments supported the splendour of the establishment; and so great was the security which it derived from its reputed sanctity, that both by the state and by individuals it was used as a bank for the safe custody of treasure. Of more questionable character was the privilege which, in common with some other Greek temples, it enjoyed of an asylum, within the limits of which criminals were safe from arrest. By Alexander this asylum was extended to a stadium, and by Mithridates somewhat further; Mark Antony nearly doubled the distance; but the abuses hence arising became so mischievous, that Augustus was compelled to abolish the privilege, or at least restrict it to its ancient boundary.

With such attractions, it is no wonder that the Ephesian temple became one of the chief centres of ancient polytheism. The Ephesians might without exaggeration boast that the worship of their goddess was celebrated throughout the world, Ac. xix. 27; and for their city no title was more eagerly coveted than that of Neocorus, or Apparitor of Diana; a title which, originally denoting the menials who swept the temple, afterwards became applicable to communities, and was adopted by such as desired to place themselves under the patronage of a particular deity. The celebrity of the temple, and the vast concourse of devotees which thronged its courts at the annual festival, gave rise to a flourishing and lucrative trade in the manufacture of portable shrines, models of that in which the idol was enthroned; worshippers would naturally wish to carry away with them a memorial of their visit to so celebrated a spot. These shrines were made of wood, gold, or silver—most commonly of the latter material, Ac. xix. 24, and a large body of workmen was supported by the manufacture. It was easy therefore for Demetrius, by representing to these men that the preaching of Paul was injuring their craft, to raise the violent tumult which compelled the apostle to quit Ephesus.

The worship of Diana did not long survive the introduction of the gospel into Ephesus; as the purer faith prevailed, the former naturally sank into insignificance.

Nero is said to have plundered the temple of many of its treasures; yet in the second century it must have remained entire, since it then received some additions from Damianus, a celebrated benefactor of his native city. At a later period it was ravaged by the Goths and other barbarians; and so complete has been the devastation that no traces of the fabric have been ascertained with certainty. The stones were probably carried away to serve as materials for the rising city of Constantinople.

Remains, &c.—Of Ephesus it may emphatically be said that “the candlestick has been removed from its place.” Of few ancient cities, of equal size and importance, do scantier remains exist; and these it is by no means easy to identify. Of the existing ruins, the most detailed accounts are given by Chandler, who visited the place in 1764, and by Falkener, in his recent work,

Ephesus and the Temple of Diana. Entering Ephesus from Aiasaluk, the former writer discovered on Mount Prion the remains of a stadium, resting on one side on the slope of the hill, and on the other, next the plain, on vaults of stone faced by a strong wall. This stadium is 687 feet long. The seats, which were arranged in numerous rows one above another, have all been removed; and of the front only a few marbles remain, with an arch which terminates the left wing, and was one of the avenues provided for the spectators. Upon the key-stone of the back front is a small mutilated figure. This part of the fabric was restored, or repaired, when the city had declined in splendour and was partly ruinous; for it is composed of marbles which have belonged to other buildings. A bas-relief, rudely carved, is inserted in it, together with several inscriptions, effaced or too high up to be read; besides, fragments some with Roman letters. Farther on the side of the same mountain are the vestiges of the theatre. This building, the largest one of its kind ever constructed, measured in diameter 660 feet, and could accommodate 56,700 spectators. The seats and the ruins of the front are removed, but the pedestals and bases of the columns which once supported the portico still stretch along the hillside. Proceeding still in the same direction, the traveller arrives at a narrow valley formed by Mounts Prion and Coressus; and here on the slope of Prion broken columns and pieces of marble indicate the site of an odeum or music-hall. This, which was not a large structure, is stripped of the seats and naked. Beyond the odeum, the remains of a large edifice, one of the gymnasia of the city, are visible. Opposite the portico of the theatre lies a vacant quadrangular space, with many bases of columns and marble fragments scattered along the edges—here probably was the Agora Civilis, or forum, round which were placed the courts of law and other public buildings. To the south of this Agora lies a mass of ruins, which Falkener conjectures to belong to the Agora Venalis, or market-place of the city. A gymnasium appears to have been attached to each of the principal public buildings: the remains of the largest, long mistaken for those of the temple, lie at the head of the inner or city port, an oblong basin of water formerly connected with the Panormus by the stream Selinus, but now a marsh. The best-preserved portion of the ancient city is the boundary wall of Lysimachus, which may be traced from behind the stadium, over the valley and along the heights of Coressus, almost perfect, until it ceases at a precipice formed by the abrupt termination of one of the roots of the mountain, on which stands a square tower, which tradition assigns as the prison of St. Paul. The quarries on Mount Prion, whence the white marble used in the construction of the public buildings was extracted, still exhibit chippings and marks of the tools. (Chandler, l. c. 35. Compare Falkener's Plans of Ephesus.)

The site of the great temple of Diana was for a long time a matter of controversy. "To our great regret," says Chandler, "we searched for the site of this fabric to as little purpose as the travellers that have preceded us" (Chandler, l. c. xxxviii.) Arundell (Visit to the Seven Churches of Asia Minor, p. 50) suggests that the entire remains of the temple are buried under the accumulation of soil brought down by the Cayster; an opinion combated by Hamilton (Asia Minor, ii. p. 24), who justly urges against it the facts that other ruins remain unburied, and that the soil in the vicinity is but little above the level of the sea. The latter traveller considers the massive ruins near the western extremity of the town, overlooking the swamp, to indicate the site; but Mr. Falkener has adduced weighty arguments for regarding these as the remains of a gymnasium. He places the temple at the head of the Port Panormus, a situation which on the whole accords best with the statements of ancient writers, who speak of it as nearly a mile distant from the city, between two rivers flowing from different parts, but both bearing the name of Selinus. In Falkener's plan, both streams are represented, the upper one flowing from the Cayster into a marsh on the north-west of the city, the lower connecting the city port and the Panormus. The question, however, can hardly be considered as definitively settled. (See Falkener's plan.) Nothing can exceed the desolation of the place. "A few unintelligible heaps of stones," writes Mr. Arundell

(p. 27), "with some mud cottages untenanted, are all that remains of the great city of the Ephesians. Even the sea has retired from the scene of desolation, and a pestilential morass, covered with mud and rushes, has succeeded to the waters which brought ships laden with merchandise from every country."

Introduction of the gospel at Ephesus.—It was in the course of his second missionary circuit that Paul first visited Ephesus. After his lengthened sojourn at Corinth, on his way to Antioch, he stopped at Ephesus, and, as was his wont, commenced teaching in the Jewish synagogue. He appears to have experienced a more than usually favourable reception from his countrymen, for they requested him to prolong his stay; a request which, wishing to be at Jerusalem for the feast of Pentecost, he was compelled to decline, promising, however, to return should his life be spared, Ac. xviii. 18-21. After a brief interval of repose, the apostle commenced his third missionary journey, and after traversing the interior parts of Asia Minor (ἡ ἀνωρεπὴ μέση) in the year 55, or, as some think, the autumn of 56, he once more arrived at Ephesus, Ac. xix. 1. The first thing that engaged his attention was the reception of certain of John's disciples into the church. These disciples of the Baptist, who seem to have admitted the claim of Jesus to be the Messiah, but were satisfied with "the baptism of water unto repentance," formed a considerable body at that time, and were only gradually absorbed in the Christian community. About twelve of them on this occasion encountered Paul, who, discovering that they were wholly ignorant of the doctrine of the Holy Spirit, and that the cause of their ignorance was that they had received John's baptism only, administered to them the Christian rite, which was followed by the imposition of his hands, and its usual accompaniment, the miraculous gifts of the apostolic age. The attention both of Jews and Gentiles must have been attracted by this occurrence, and for three months Paul was permitted to preach Christ openly in the synagogue, as it should seem with considerable success. At length the fanatical spirit of the unbelieving Jews threw such obstacles in his way that he was compelled to withdraw from them, and forming the disciples into a separate community, transferred his labours to a building belonging to one Tyrannus. For two years he taught here unmolested, and since Ephesus was the great place of resort to strangers from all parts of Asia, the gospel became known throughout the province, Ac. xix. 10. Remarkable manifestations of miraculous power accompanied the apostle's preaching; even articles of dress which had been in contact with his person proved efficacious to heal diseases and expel evil spirits. The celebrity of these miracles induced certain Jewish exorcists, who, like modern fortune-tellers, travelled from place to place exercising their pretended art, to make use of the sacred name of Jesus in cases of demoniacal possession, expecting that results similar to those which followed from the apostle's invocation of it would ensue; but they met with a signal discomfiture. The unhappy subject upon whom they made the experiment, endued with supernatural strength, assaulted them with such violence that they were glad to escape out of the house where the scene took place, "naked and wounded," Ac. xix. 16. As might be expected, this produced a great sensation: the professors of magic and astrology, among whom, curious to say, there were some believers, Ac. xix. 18, felt themselves in presence of a superior power; and stricken with remorse, publicly confessed their guilt, and gave the best evidence of their sincerity by committing the volumes containing their occult lore, valued at 50,000 pieces of silver, to the flames. And now the growing influence of the gospel began to excite opposition from a different quarter, and the storm, which doubtless had been long gathering, at length burst. Christianity, not less than Judaism, is the stern foe of idol-worship under every form; and it could not be extensively embraced without proportionally diminishing the number of the votaries of heathen gods. Christ or Diana, one must prevail, to the destruction of the other. The ancient superstition did not yield without a severe struggle: in the first instance, however, the opposition arose from interested motives. Demetrius, a silversmith, who employed a number of operatives in the manufacture of the silver shrines before mentioned, began to feel, in the diminution of his profits, the effect of the new religion. Summoning his workmen together, he first explained how the preaching of Paul was injuriously affecting their temporal interests, and then artfully appealing to their national pride, expatiated upon the contempt into which the worship of their patron goddess was likely to be brought. It needed only this spark to ignite the train. The workmen sallied forth, and filled the city with the well-known cry, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." The contagion spread; the whole city was in an uproar; a tumultuous assemblage crowded into the theatre; the presence of a Jew (Alexander) who wished to address the people, increased their rage, and for two hours a cry of frantic voices shouting, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians," rent the air. At length the town-clerk for the time being, a man of judgment and courage, succeeded in gaining a hearing. He reminded his audience that no one could dispute their intense veneration for Diana, and that in point of fact neither Paul nor his companions had directly spoken against the popular idol—a remarkable testimony to the admirable discretion with which the apostle pursued his labours. If Demetrius or his followers had any complaint to make, it so happened that the pro-consular assizes were then being held; let an information be lodged in due form. They had better disperse as speedily as possible, for the Roman government, always suspicious of breaches of the peace, was not unlikely to investigate the cause of the tumult, and to visit it, if proved groundless, severely. Reason prevailed, and the town became quiet. The apostle, who had desired to confront the danger in person, but had been dissuaded from doing so by the disciples, now seized the opportunity of carrying out his previously formed purpose, and bidding farewell to the brethren, took his departure for Macedonia. As far as appears from the inspired record, Paul never visited Ephesus again. That he had intended to do so may be gathered from Ac. xx. 16; but the journey through Macedonia had been so prolonged that, if he was to accomplish his purpose of being at Jerusalem at the approaching feast of Pentecost, it was necessary to forego the intention. Passing therefore by Ephesus, on his voyage down the coast of Asia Minor, he stopped at Miletus, and from thence summoned the elders of the Ephesian church to a farewell conference. He reminded them of the trials and the labours which he had undergone during his residence amongst them, and foretold impending dangers of a still more formidable kind, "bonds and afflictions abiding" him. He could call God to witness that he was free from the blood of all men, having both in doctrine and practice set them an example of holy faithfulness. They had need to bear his counsels in mind, for after his departure heresiarchs would make their appearance, "drawing away disciples after them." Let them especially watch against the sin of covetousness, and remember that though, as a preacher of the gospel, he could claim a maintenance from the church, his own hands had ministered to his wants and to those of his associates. He then commended them to God in prayer, and amidst the tears of the whole company, he embarked in the ship which waited upon him, and proceeded on his voyage, Ac. xx. 17-38.

According to a widely spread, and apparently well grounded, tradition, the apostle John, after the captivity or death of Paul, took up his abode at Ephesus, from which as a centre he exercised an apostolic superintendence over the surrounding churches (τὰς ἀντιόχου διαίτες ἐκκλησίας, Euseb. III. 23). It is added that he was buried there, beside Mary the mother of Jesus, from whom, in obedience to his Lord's dying command, he was never separated, Jn. xix. 25. Among the seven churches of the Apocalypse, that of Ephesus is mentioned in terms of general commendation, though the severity of the divine inspection already marked a departure from the purity and zeal of an earlier time, Re. II. 1-4.

[Ephesus has been frequently visited, and its ruins described. The descriptions of Chandler, Hamilton, Leake, and Arundell, will be found in the volumes of those authors respectively. The latest and most elaborate work upon the subject is that of Mr. Falkener (Day & Son, London, 1862), who spent a fortnight upon the spot, and whose researches, if not in all points satisfactory, may be said to have superseded those of his predecessors.]

EPHOD, part of the high-priest's dress. (See PRIESTHOOD, DRESS OF.)

EPHRAIM [fruitful], the name of Joseph's second son; for God, said he, "hath caused me to be fruitful in the land of my affliction," Ge. xli. 52. The name proved to have a significance for the future, as well as for the past; for in a double sense fruitfulness was granted to this son of Joseph. He was, first of all, along with his elder brother Manasseh, adopted into the family of Jacob, and placed on a footing with Jacob's own sons as the head of a tribal section of the covenant-people. Of both these sons of Joseph the aged patriarch said, when in his last sickness they were presented to him by their father, "They are mine; as Reuben and Simeon they shall be mine." But besides being elevated to this position of patriarchal headship, Ephraim had prophetically assigned to him a higher place even than his brother; the younger here, as in Jacob's own case, was preferred before the elder. When the two were placed before Jacob for his last blessing, the elder on the right hand, and the younger on the left, he guided his hands wittingly, it is said, crossing them, so as to place his right hand on the head of Ephraim, and the left on the head of Manasseh. Joseph thought that in the dimness of his vision Jacob had mistaken the one for the other, and sought to correct him. But Jacob refused, and said, "I know it, my son, I know it; he also shall become a people, and he also shall be great; but truly his younger brother shall be greater than he, and his seed shall become a multitude of nations" (peoples), Ge. xlviii.

Of Ephraim as an individual we know nothing more; but the history of the covenant-people remarkably confirms the view thus given at the outset of his tribal ascendancy—though not without such occasional variations as might seem to bring it for a time into doubt. At the period of the exodus Ephraim numbered 40,500 men capable of bearing arms, while Manasseh had only 32,200. But at the close of the wilderness-sojourn the proportions were reversed: Ephraim then mustered but 32,500, while Manasseh had risen to 52,700; the one having decreased by 8000, while the other gained upwards of 20,000. This argues ill for the spirit and behaviour of the tribe of Ephraim during that trying period, as it must have been their singular share in the judgments sent to chastise iniquity which reduced them so low. At the time of the conquest of Canaan they were the smallest of the tribes excepting Simeon. Yet even then nothing was abated of the high anticipations formed of the future greatness of Ephraim; for in the blessing of Moses upon the tribes, pronounced immediately before the conquest, while Manasseh is coupled with Ephraim as together destined to share in the rich heritage of good settled on the house of Joseph, it still is with a marked indication of superiority on the part of Ephraim. After enumerating all the precious things which were in store for them—those of the heaven above and the earth beneath, of the sun and moon, of the everlasting hills and the mighty deep—it is added, "His glory is like the firstling of his bullock, and his horns are like the horns of unicorns: with them he shall push the people together to the ends of the earth: and they are the ten thousands of Ephraim, and they are the thousands of Manasseh," De. xxxiii. 17.

Ephraim as a tribe showed no lack of faith in these prognostications of its relative greatness; indeed, the predominant sin of the members of the tribe lay in building too confidently on the prospects of material power and prosperity before them, as if these were to be realized apart from any moral qualities cultivated among themselves, and, as if by a kind of hereditary right, they might claim a certain superiority over their brethren. The history of the tribe, therefore, is marked fully as much by its overweening pride, its offensive arrogance, and disappointed ambition, as by the greatness of its achievements and the fertility of its resources. At the very first they got a degree of consideration beyond what their numbers might have warranted them to expect from Joshua, the commander of the entire host, having been of their number. But even he failed to satisfy their ambition; for after their inheritance had been assigned them, which possessed several mountain-ridges covered with forests, they came to him (apparently in company with the half tribe of Manasseh), and said, "Why hast thou given me but one lot and one portion to inherit, seeing I am a great people, forasmuch as the Lord has blessed me hitherto?" They had been able, it would seem, to get possession of little more than the hill portion of their territory, while the rich plains of the district remained still in the hands of the Canaanites. Joshua, therefore, told them that they should set about the conquest of the whole. He answered them, "saying, Thou art a great people, and hast great power: thou shalt not have one lot only; but the mountain shall be thine; for it is a wood (or forest), and thou shalt cut it down: and the outgoings of it shall be thine: for thou shalt drive out the Canaanites, though they have iron chariots, and though they be strong," Jos. xvii. 14-18. What he meant to tell them was, that in having got possession of the mountainous parts of their territory, they had obtained a secure and strong position, from which, if but rightly used by the clearing away of the forests, and issuing in well-concerted sallies against the adversaries, would form a vantage ground from which to subdue the whole surrounding country. So it proved in reality; the mountains of Ephraim continued for many a day to be the stronghold and rallying place of the people against the common enemy. Ehud, the Benjamite, when he sought to rouse his countrymen against Moab, "blew a trumpet in the mountain of Ephraim, and the children of Israel went down with him from the mount," and utterly discomfited Moab, Ja. iii. 27. Deborah, who next acted as a judge, established her seat in Mount Ephraim, between Ramah and Bethel, Ja. iv. 5; and within that hilly region the army was mustered with which Barak sallied forth and defeated the host of Sisera. Tola, at a later period, judged Israel in the same region; and Samuel, though of Levite parentage, was both in the place of his birth, and in his settled residence, an Ephraimite, Ja. x. 1; 1Sa. i. 2.

During that earlier period of Israelitish history the religious distinction of Ephraim kept pace with his political ascendancy. Shiloh, which at the period of the conquest, was chosen for the seat of the tabernacle, was within the bounds of this tribe; chosen apparently more from its central situation, and perhaps from the security connected with the mountains of Ephraim, than from beauty of situation or associations of a more sacred kind. But for nearly four hundred years it continued to be the religious centre of the covenant-people, where they met to celebrate the stated feasts and perform their vows to the Lord. The privilege, however, appears to have been little prized by the Ephraimites, who were rather prone to be proud of the distinction, than disposed to turn to proper account the spiritual advantages it afforded. Shiloh itself became a place notorious for its shameless depravity and corruption, and could not fail to spread a contaminating influence to the surrounding country. The natural fertility also of the region (when it came fully into the possession of the tribe), comprehending the fine plain of Eadraalon, and some of the most select portions of Palestine, tended to foster the carnal spirit of the people, and gave rapid development to the worst features of their character. The result was that "God refused the tabernacle of Joseph, and chose not the tribe of Ephraim; but chose the tribe of Judah, and the Mount Zion which he loved," Pa. lxxviii. 67, 68. Clear as the indications were, that this selection of the tribe of Judah, and the sanctuary of Zion, was the determined purpose of the Lord, it seems never to have been properly acquiesced in by the house of Joseph, and in particular by the tribe of Ephraim. The haughty spirit of the people could not brook the personal rejection implied in the proceeding, and the consequent elevation of a rival tribe to the distinction so long held by them. That spirit had even broken out in jealous humours and contentious strivings against the kindred tribe of Manasseh, when this tribe rose to a temporary supremacy under the prowess first of Gideon, and again of Jephthah, Ja. viii. 1, seq.; xii. 1, seq.; much more may we conceive it to have chafed under the growing, and at length somewhat oppressive dominion of the house of David. Jeroboam, who headed the opposition that arose against that house in the time of Rehoboam, was himself an Ephrathite, who had been raised by Solomon to be "ruler over all the charge (or revenues) of the house of Joseph," 1KI. xi. 28-29. And we can have no doubt, that what gave such force to his future opposition, and tended most materially to perpetuate the discord it occasioned, was the opportunity thereby presented of evoking the old spirit of rivalry and inordinate self-elation, which had rooted itself in the tribe of Ephraim, and to some extent pervaded the whole house of Joseph. It would now be satisfied with nothing less than the establishment of an independent kingdom, which unfortunately came to be settled on principles that rendered it, not only a blunder in government, but an apostasy in religion. Ephraim's envy toward Judah grew into rebellion against God, bringing in its train manifold disorders in the moral and spiritual, as well as the political spheres; and as the final upshot the curse of Heaven came down, smiting the "crown of the pride of Ephraim," turning his "fat valleys" into desolation, and scattering the thousands in which he trusted to the ends of the earth. Instead of making good the ascendancy it coveted, the tribe lost even the secondary place which would readily have been accorded to it.

EPHRAIM, WOOD OR FOREST OF. Mention has been made in the preceding article both of the mountains of Ephraim, and the forests upon them. But what bears in Scripture the name of the Wood of Ephraim, a place rendered memorable from being the scene of Absalom's defeat and death, 2Sa. xviii. 6, must have been in a quite different region, on the east of Jordan, and not far from Mahanaim. David and his party are expressly said to have crossed the Jordan, to have pitched in the land of Gilead, and made Mahanaim their head-quarters, 2Sa. xvii. 24, 26; xviii. 3. In that neighbourhood, therefore, must the field of battle have been, and consequently the wood in which Absalom met his death. Why a wood in that direction should have obtained the name of Ephraim is a matter of uncertainty. The idea has been suggested that it may have arisen from the slaughter of the Ephraimites by Jephthah, which took place somewhere in that direction (Stanley, p. 329); a not improbable conjecture, but incapable of being sustained by any historical evidence.

EPHRAIM, by or beside which Absalom had his sheep-shearing, and one may naturally suppose his sheep-pastures, 2Sa. xiii. 23, must have been some place at no great distance from Jerusalem: otherwise an invitation to David and all the royal family to go and attend the sheep-shearing feast must have appeared either supremely ridiculous, or justly fitted to excite suspicion. Nothing certain however is known about it; but it has been, with some probability, supposed to be the same with that Ephraim to which our Lord withdrew when threatened with violence by the Jews, after the resurrection of Lazarus, Jn. xi. 54. And this again has been supposed to be the same with the ancient Ophrah of Benjamin, 1Sa. xiii. 17—a place about twenty miles north from Jerusalem, and perched on a conical hill. It goes now by the name of et Taiyibeh (Robinson, i. 444; Stanley, p. 214). On the east, between it and the Jordan, lay the upper part of the Wilderness of Judah; and hence the evangelist John speaks of it being in "a country near to the wilderness." This is what seems to have been called in earlier times the Wilderness of Bethaven, Jos. xviii. 12.

EPH'RAIN, 2 Ch. xiii. 19 (for so it should be read, not EPHRAIM, as it is in some English Bibles), according to the Keri, or marginal reading, EPHROS, a town said to have been taken by Abijah from Jeroboam, and mentioned along with Bethel and Jeshanah. It is commonly supposed to be but another form of the Ephraim last mentioned.

EPHRA'TAH [fruitful field]. 1. The ancient name of Bethlehem; for the sake of emphasis and distinctness of meaning both are coupled together by the prophet Micah, ch. v. 2. (See BETHLEHEM.) 2. The name of the second wife of Caleb, and mother of Hur, 1 Ch. ii. 12.

EPHRON [belonging to a calf]. The son of Zohar, a Hittite, the owner of the field at Mamre which Abraham bought for a burying-ground, Ge. xliii. 8. Josephus calls him Ephraim.

EPISTLES. The term that has been employed to designate a large portion of the writings of the New Testament—including twenty-one out of the twenty-seven separate productions of which it is composed. Two even out of the few not included in this designation also bear somewhat of the form of epistolary writings; for both the Gospel of Luke and the Acts of the Apostles are prefaced by an epistle to Theophilus, a personal friend of the evangelist. But as the epistolary part is confined to the preface, and the body of the two productions is altogether historical, they are wisely separated from the epistles strictly so called. Of these epistles fourteen (if we include Hebrews) were indited by the apostle Paul; three by the apostle John; two by Peter; one by James; and one by Jude. The epistles of Paul are distinguished from the others as being addressed to particular individuals or churches; while the rest have received the name of general or catholic epistles. The division does not strictly hold; for the second and third of John had each a specific destination; and the first epistle of Peter, which was addressed to the Jewish Christian communities of Asia Minor, is even less obviously general in its character than the epistle to the Hebrews, which has respect to the state and prospects of Jewish Christians, without specification as to local residence. But though not strictly accurate, the division has a sufficient basis to rest upon for general reference; for the first epistle of Peter, and the second and third of John, while formally addressed to particular persons, have little in them that is properly local and personal.

The several epistles are treated under their respective heads; so that any remarks here on their individual character would be out of place. Viewing them, however, collectively, it may justly be regarded as a striking proof of the divine wisdom and goodness, in so ordering the affairs of the early church, that the last revelation of God should have been made to assume so much this interesting and instructive form. This is important even in its bearing on the external relations of Christianity; for as it is itself based on the facts of history, so the unfolding of its truths and obligations in a permanent shape to the church, thus became entwined with the historical characters and circumstances of the time, and so provided a manifold evidence and sure guarantee of the reality of the things believed and taught. But it is still more important, from the influence it is fitted to have upon the minds and hearts of believers. The freedom of epistolary writing—the room it affords for the intermingling of personal feeling and affection with the varied exhibition of Christian doctrine—the freshness, the point, the fulness of instruction, consolation, and comfort, which the actual circumstances of the sacred penmen naturally imparted to their epistolary communications—all contribute to invest the epistles of the New Testament with a charm, and endow them with a value, which they could never have possessed if thrown into a more abstract and didactic form. Thus, finally, writings so originating and so constructed suited best the character of Christianity as a grand historical development; for we thus see how the seed of the gospel took root in the world, and how the mode of its distribution by the ambassadors of Christ, and the fruits it bore among men, acted and reacted on each other. The epistles of the New Testament are in this respect the fitting complement of its historical books, that together they form the life-portraiture of the gradual and progressive evolution of Christian faith, worship, and polity.

ER [watcher]. 1. The eldest son of Judah, who, for his extreme wickedness, was visited with condign punishment, Ge. xxxviii. 3-7. 2. A descendant of Shelah, another son of Judah, 1 Ch. iv. 21.

ERASTUS, the chamberlain of the city of Corinth, and one of St. Paul's converts there, Ro. xvi. 23. The office he held was one of great dignity and importance; so that the conversion of such a man to the faith of the gospel was itself a proof of the wonderful success of the apostle's labours in that city. Erastus not only received the gospel, but became one of its most devoted adherents; he is mentioned as, along with Timothy, ministering to Paul, and accompanying him in some of his visits to other places, Ac. xix. 22. The last notice we have of him represents him as abiding at Corinth, which probably continued to be his settled home, 2 Ti. iv. 20.

ERECH, a city in the land of Shinar, and so ancient as to be connected with the name of Nimrod, Ge. x. 10. By Jerome and the Targumists this place was identified with Edessa, in the north-west of Mesopotamia; but recent inquiry has taken a different direction. Colonel Taylor, formerly British resident at Bagdad, "who devoted great skill and distinguished abilities to the geography of the Babylonian region, satisfied himself that the place formerly called Orchoe by the Greeks, and now known as Werka, is the true site of the ancient city. Werka is situated on the Euphrates, 82 miles south, 43 east from Babylon, and is celebrated for its immense mounds, which are believed to be the ruins of Erech" (Bonomi's Nineveh, p. 40).

ESAIAS. See ISALAH.

ESARHAD'DON, a king of Assyria, son and successor of Sennacherib, the same probably with the Sargon of Isaiah, and, as is supposed, with the Sardapalus of profane history, 2 Kl. xix. 27; Is. xx. 1. (See ASSYRIA.)

ESAU, E'DOM, the first-born of Rebekah's twin-children. The account given of his birth is, "And the first came out red, all over like a hairy garment, and they called his name Esau," Ge. xxv. 25. From the special attention drawn to his hairy appearance, one would suppose that the name Esau (עֵשָׂו), or Esav, was intended to give expression to that quality. And so many learned men in recent, as well as former times, have held, though they are obliged to resort to the Arabic for the etymological explanation; a word very similar in Arabic, signifying hairy. The older Hebrew commentators, however, derived it from the verb עָשָׂה, to make, and explained the word as signifying "made," "complete," "full-grown"—viewing the hair as an indication of premature manly vigour. But the Jews of the present day seem more disposed to fall in with the other derivation (for example, Raphall in loco). The unusual covering of hair, which not only distinguished Esau as a child, but kept pace with his growth, and in mature life gave his skin a kind of goat-like appearance (Ge. xxvii. 16), was undoubtedly meant to be indicative of the man; it was a natural sign, coeval with his very birth, by which his parents might descry the future man—as one in whom the animal, should greatly preponderate over the moral and spiritual, qualities of nature—a character of rough, self-willed, and untamed energy. From the word designating his hairy aspect, עָשָׂה (עֵשָׂו), it is not improbable, that the mountain-range, which became the possession of his descendants, was called Mount Seir, though it is also possible that the rough, wooded appearance of the mountain itself may have been the occasion of the name.

It was not long till Esau gave proof of the characteristic tendencies which were so remarkably to distinguish him from his brother: "The boys grew, and Esau was a cunning hunter, a man of the field"—"of a roving and restless disposition, whom the fulness of animal spirits, as Abarbanel justly remarks, impelled to seek excitement in change of scene and hazardous pursuits" (Raphall). One would have thought this was not the disposition or the manner of life that would have most commended itself to the peaceful, contemplative, and God-fearing Isaac; they were certainly very different from his own, and, if viewed by themselves, would probably have occasioned dissatisfaction rather than delight. But Isaac in his old age appears to have fallen into a kind of soft and luxurious repose, and Esau knew how to minister to this infirmity of his aged parent by supplying him with delicate and savoury food. He therefore loved Esau, it is said—loved him in comparison of Jacob—"because he did eat of his venison." What, however, Isaac had as an infirmity of his latter days, belonged to Esau as a predominant characteristic; animal pleasure, sensual enjoyment, were with him the very cream of life; he neither knew nor cared for anything better. His brother Jacob perceived this, and certainly took an ungenerous advantage of it. On returning one day from the field faint and hungry Esau found Jacob busy with a mess of pottage—a sort of dish prepared by boiling, and of much about the consistence of gruel. It is made of various kinds of grain, which are first beaten in a mortar. In the present case this was lentiles, or small beans, which, Robinson tells us, are common in Egypt and Syria under the name of 'adas. He adds that he found them "very palatable, and could well conceive, that to a weary hunter, faint with hunger, they might be quite a dainty" (Researches, l. p. 246). They were certainly esteemed such by Esau; and he said with eager desire "Let me taste of that red"—dish, understood, pottage made of lentiles having a reddish colour—but Esau used no more words than were absolutely necessary, for he was faint, as he himself added, and on this account was impatient to be satisfied. Jacob then urged that he would sell him his birthright—he did not say for what consideration, but it was plainly with respect to the pottage, then in the power of his hand to give or withhold. This was so small a boon compared with what he sought that it seems strange at first sight how Jacob should have thought of proposing such an offer. But it is this very discrepancy between the price and the purchase, which, as proposed by Jacob, discovers the insight he had obtained into Esau's character, and, as accepted by Esau, shows the predominance that sense with him had acquired over faith, the present over the future. Esau said, "Lo, I am at the point to die, and what profit shall this birthright do for me?" He felt as if his very life depended on the dish, as if he should presently die did he not get refreshment, and he might therefore throw the prospective advantages of his birthright to the winds. This seems plainly the meaning, and not, as some Jewish and also Christian authorities would put it, "I am ever exposed to death from my precarious mode of life, and must soon die anyhow, so that I need not set so much by this birthright." Such a line of thought was quite alien to Esau's character, and implied too reflective a cast of mind. He looked simply to what was before him, cared for nothing but the removing of a present trouble and the enjoying of a pleasant entertainment. So much was this his temper, that Jacob could not be satisfied with his mere word, but insisted on having also his oath. "Swear to me," he said, "this day; and he swore to him; and he sold his birthright unto Jacob. Then Jacob gave Esau bread and pottage of lentiles; and he did eat and drink, and rose up and went his way: thus Esau despised his birthright."

Whatever may have been included in the birthright here spoken of, the despite shown toward it by Esau was evidently meant to be characterized as the evidence of a light and reckless spirit, which brooked only of present things and corporeal delights. So it is interpreted by the author of the epistle to the Hebrews, who warns the churches against harbouring profane persons like Esau, who for one morsel of meat sold his birthright, He. xii. 16. And the same thing appears from the proverbial use to which the incident came to be applied in the current language of the East. "When a man," says Roberts in his Illustrations of Scripture, "has sold his fields or his gardens for an insignificant sum, the people say, 'The fellow has sold his land for pottage.' Does a father give his daughter to a low caste man, it is observed, 'He has given her for pottage.' Does a person by base means seek for some paltry enjoyment, it is said, 'For one leaf (leaf-ful) of pottage he will do nine days' work.' Has a learned man stooped to anything which was not expected from him, it is said, 'The learned man has fallen into the pottage pot.'" The very name given to Esau—the nickname, as it must be reckoned—on account of the part he acted in this memorable transaction, is also a conclusive proof of the light in which it was regarded by the ancients. "Therefore was his name called Edom"—edom being the Hebrew for red, which as embodied in the pottage he so emphatically pronounced and so earnestly desired. It was fixed on him, Mendelssohn justly notes, "as a term of reproach for his folly and sensuality." And because it was of such a nature, the designation Edom was applied chiefly to his posterity and land, while Esau was still regarded and used as his proper name.

In respect to the birthright itself, and what the two brothers conceived to be involved in it, it is impossible to speak very definitely. In the earlier history of the covenant-people nothing specific is connected with it, but the double portion in the father's inheritance, De. xxi. 17. And in respect to Jacob's own family it is testified that his eldest son Reuben for his incontinence lost the birthright, which was given to the sons of Joseph, 1 Ch. v. 1; that is, the double portion in the inheritance of Israel, which is here resolved into the birthright, was on spiritual grounds taken from the eldest, and given to a younger son. But while this is all that seems to have been specifically connected with the birthright in patriarchal times, we cannot doubt that it would be associated, especially in Jacob's mind, with the more distinctive covenant-blessing. He who had the birthright would naturally be regarded as stepping more peculiarly into the room of Isaac, and standing in a closer relationship to the higher designs and purposes of God. So that to despise a birthright which linked its possessor in some special manner to interests and prospects of so lofty a nature, was a manifest indication of a profane and grovelling disposition.

The brief notices that are given of Esau's subsequent history only serve to confirm the impression which this first recorded act gives of his character. At the age of forty he took to him wives of the daughters of Canaan, "which were a grief of mind to Isaac and Rebecca," Ge. xxvi. 34, 35; in this again showing his disregard of the higher considerations which should have been uppermost in a child of the covenant, and seeking only the gratification of his own carnal propensities. Such things should have awakened his father Isaac to the conviction that the more special blessing of the covenant could not be destined for Esau, and should have enabled him to read aright the oracle that had been pronounced respecting him before his birth, that "the elder should serve the younger." But Isaac was himself blinded and misled by a carnal partiality, and so he fell into the grievous error of resolving to bestow on Esau the distinctive blessing—to assign him the higher place and destination that belonged to the person who stood first in the household of faith. The providence of God defeated the purpose, and brought Isaac himself to see that he had been culpably blind to the intimations of God's will in the matter. It was forced on him indeed, by a course of procedure that, from its foul deceit, must have greatly aggravated the pain of the discovery. But of the fact itself, that he had purposed to bestow the peculiar blessing upon one who, by his whole life and behaviour, had clearly shown that he was not the proper subject of it, Isaac could not entertain the shadow of a doubt, and therefore the blessing pronounced unwittingly upon Jacob was irrevocably settled as his proper inheritance. Esau found no place for repentance (i.e. for producing a change in his father's mind), though he sought it carefully with tears; his own measure in divine things was now meted back to him, He. xii. 17.

We cannot wonder that Esau should have felt irritated at the part acted by Jacob in the matter of the blessing, but he should, like his father Isaac, have seen the hand of God in the turn things took; and knowing that there is no unrighteousness in God, he should have charged upon himself whatever grieved him in the actual result. Instead of this, however, he gave way to the bitterness of wounded pride, and vowed vengeance against the brother who had supplanted him, by determining, after their father's death, to take away his life. This led to the exile of Jacob to Mesopotamia, and his abode there for upwards of twenty years. Still, at the close of that long period Esau's revenge continued as strong as ever; and when he heard of his brother's approach to the family home he sallied forth with an armed band of 600 men, manifestly for the purpose of falling upon him and destroying him. But the earnest prayer of Jacob, followed as it was by the tokens of love to his brother, which he sent on before in drove after drove of flocks and herds, fairly overcame the lion-hearted Esau; his rough but impulsive and impressive nature melted to tenderness under such touching manifestations of a brother's regard; and by the grace of God the two men met now again as in their youth they had often met in their father's tent; they fell on each other's neck and terminated their long quarrel in the embrace of brotherly affection, Ge. xxxiii.

The reconciliation then effected appears to have been lasting so far as the two brothers personally were concerned. They are only once again mentioned as in actual intercourse, namely, on the occasion of their father's death. Isaac lingered on till he reached the extreme age of 180 years, "and his sons Esau and Jacob buried him," themselves at the time about 120 years old, Ge. xxxv. 29. Before this, however, though it occurs later in the history, Esau had withdrawn to some distance from the district, which was occupied by Jacob after his return from Padan-Aram; "he went into the country from the face of his brother Jacob, for their riches were more than that they might dwell together; and the land wherein they were strangers could not bear them because of their cattle," Ge. xxxvi. 4, 7. The country to which Esau, with his immense family and flocks retired, was the tract of Mount Seir, from which they gradually dispossessed the thinly scattered population that preceded them in its occupancy, and which they continued to hold for many generations. It was a region entirely suited to the nomadic and roving character of the race. But in regard to the relationship between them and the seed of Israel, the remote descendants of Esau proved less pliant or generous than their progenitor; for from the time that Israel left the land of Egypt, when the two families again came into contact, the posterity of Esau seemed to remember only the old quarrel between the respective heads of the races, and to forget the brotherly reconciliation. A spirit of keenest rivalry and spite characterized their procedure toward Israel; through many a bloody conflict they strove to regain the ascendancy which the decree of Heaven had destined in the other direction; and in the times of Israel's backsliding and weakness, they showed themselves ever ready, according to the prophetic word of Isaac, "to break his yoke from off their neck," and to drive the evil to the uttermost. But it was a fruitless struggle; the purpose of Heaven stood fast; the dominion remained with the house of Jacob; and in the course of the Maccabean wars the children of Esau finally lost their independent existence, and became substantially merged in the house of Israel. The decree of Heaven, as we have said, had so fixed it; but that decree did not realize itself arbitrarily; the preference for Israel and his seed was no senseless favoritism; from the first the qualities were there which inevitably carried along with them the superiority in might and blessing; while, on the other hand, in Esau's carnalism, sensuality, godlessness, the destiny of his race was already indicated.

ES'DRAS. See EZRA.

ESSEK [strife], the name given by Isaac's men to a well, dug by them, which the men of Gerar strove to obtain, Ge. xxvi. 20.

ESH-BA'AL [Baal's man], the name of Saul's youngest son, according to the list given in 1 Ch. viii. 33; ix. 39. It is another form of Iahbosheth, which means man of shame. Besheth or Bosbeth is used for an idol, as a thing that causes shame, Is. xliii. 17; xlv. 9, &c.

ESH'COL [cluster]. An Amorite chief, brother of Mamre, who stood on friendly terms with Abraham, and accompanied him in his warlike expedition against Chedorlaomer and his confederate kings, Ge. xiv. 13, 24.

ESH'COL, VALLEY OF. A valley or wady in the south of Canaan, and the neighbourhood of Hebron, so called from the rich cluster of grapes which the Israelitish spies carried away from it, Nu. xiii. 24. But as the name existed in the neighbourhood so early as the time of Abraham, it is probable that the same reason which led the Israelites to apply to the valley such a designation, had operated also among the original possessors of the soil. It is to this day full of vineyards, and the grapes produced in it retain their ancient character. They are the finest and largest in the country (Robinson's Researches, i. 317).

ESH'TA'OL [probably a retreat], a town, along with Zorah, allotted to Dan out of the territory of Judah, Jos. xv. 33. It was on the borders of the Philistine country, and was placed by Eusebius and Jerome between Azotus and Askelon. It has long since vanished; but it was anciently noted as the place where Samson spent his youth, and the burying-place of Manoah his father, Ju. xiii. 25; xvi. 31, &c.

ESHTEMOH [obedience]—read also ESHTEMOA, a city in the hill-country of Judah, Jos. xv. 50. It was included among the towns to which David sent presents, and must therefore have been a place frequented by him, 1 Sa. xxx. 28. Robinson has identified it with a village, Semu'a, about seven miles south of Hebron (i. 494). In 1 Ch. iv. 17 it is connected with a person, Iahbah, as its father or founder.

ESSENES [etymology unknown]. The name of a Jewish sect that arose nearly 200 years before the Christian era. Though they are never noticed in the writings of the New Testament, yet it is necessary to present some account of them here, as their views and practices are constantly referred to by writers who treat of the commencement of Christianity and the character of the gospel age. Some have even gone so far as to identify John the Baptist with the party, although the idea is without any real foundation, and is likely to meet with few advocates in the present day.

The information that has come down to us upon this peculiar sect is of a somewhat fragmentary character, and not perfectly consistent with itself. What is stated respecting the party by one writer does not entirely harmonize with what is stated by another. Pliny, indeed, one of those writers, could hardly be expected to be very minutely acquainted with the fraternity, and accordingly his brief account of their peculiarities must be taken with some qualification. Speaking of the Dead Sea he takes occasion to say, "On its western shore dwell the Essenes, at a sufficient distance to escape what is noxious in its vapours. They are a solitary class, and indeed the most wonderful people in the world—without wives, abstaining from sexual intercourse, without money, associating only with palm-trees. Their numbers are replenished by fresh accessions daily, many repairing to their settlements whom the reverses of fortune have rendered weary of life, and inclined to their manners. Thus it comes to pass, what might seem incredible, that a community in which no one is born, yet continues to subsist for centuries" (Nat. Hist. 1. v. c. 15). Comparing this with the fuller account of Josephus, we find that what is said respecting marriage held only of a portion, not of the whole of the Essenes; the stricter part alone abstained from it. He says expressly that there was an order among them who "agreed with the rest as to their way of living, and customs and laws, but differed from them in the point of marriage." They did so, he adds, because to abjure marriage were to cut off the principal part of human life, and, if all were to follow the same course, the whole race of mankind should fail" (Wars II. 8. 13). The practice of celibacy was so alien to the spirit of the Hebrew polity, that it is matter of surprise any party, or even section of a party, should have arisen within its pale who embraced that form of asceticism, and constituted it a special ground of merit. It plainly indicated the influence of a foreign teaching upon their mind, commingling with that of Moses, and leading them to entertain ideas of perfection which found no countenance in the law and the prophets. That influence, there can be no doubt, was derived from the oriental philosophy, which with its fundamental doctrine respecting the inherent evil of matter, led men, wherever its spirit prevailed, to aspire after an ethereal virtue by working themselves free from corporeal affections, rising above the lawful wants of nature, and the ordinary relations of life. Hence, in their religious belief, the body was regarded as the prison-house, rather than the temple and instrument of the soul (Jos. Wars, II. 8. 11).

This spirit, however, though it had its share in moulding the views and practices of the Essenic fraternity, was kept in check by another—their reverence for the teaching of Moses. He was their paramount authority; "what they most of all honoured," says Josephus, "after God himself, is the name of their legislator, whom if any one blaspheme, he is punished capitally." Yet, like mystics generally, they used great freedoms with the prescriptions of the authority they professed so rigidly to follow; and, if viewed with respect to the letter of the command, their mode of life seemed to be as remarkable for its disregard of some of the institutions of Moses, as for its compliance with others. Their system was a compound of the mystic and ceremonial elements, jumbled together in a manner that appears arbitrary and inexplicable. If any part of the Mosaic legislation might be regarded as more explicit and binding than another, it is what it enjoins respecting attendance at the stated feasts and the presentation of sacrifices at the temple. Yet the Essenes took no part in these. They sent offerings to the temple, for the purpose probably of discharging their stated and hereditary obligations as Jews, but not, as Josephus expressly states (Ant. XIII. 1. 5.), "for the presentation of sacrifices, because they have (i.e. think they have) purer lustrations of their own; on which account (he adds) they are excluded from the common court of the temple, but offer their sacrifices themselves." The passage of Philo, in which he represents them as not sacrificing animals, but deeming it incumbent to present their minds as holy offerings (ὅτι ἴδρα καταθύοντες ἀλλ' ἑπορρωπεῖς τὰς ἐαυτῶν διαβολὰς κατακευξέω ἀξιοῦντες, Quod omnis probus liber, § 12), must either have proceeded on a mistake, or, as Neander thinks (Hist. I. p. 66), merely imports that they laid the chief stress upon the spiritual element in sacred worship—accounted the outward service nothing apart from the preparation and service of the heart. They still therefore offered the legal sacrifices, but not after the legal manner—not in the place which God had chosen; from this they stood aloof on account of the defilement which they conceived it to be ever contracting from the multitude of impure worshippers who trod its courts. They deemed it better, more in accordance with the spirit of the Mosaic legislation, to remain by themselves, and sacrifice within the holier sanctuary of their own dwellings. How, indeed, could the stricter Essenes mingle in the common crowd of the temple-worshippers, when they looked upon even the juniors in their own select fraternity as so far beneath them, that if they accidentally came into contact with these, they thought it needful to wash themselves, as if they had been defiled by the touch of a foreigner? (Jos. Wars, II. 8. 10).

But while thus in one direction spurning the restraints of ceremonialism, and in many of their regulations freely chalking out a path for themselves, the Essenes in other things belonged to the strictest sect of ceremonialists. They knew nothing of the liberty of the gospel, nor had ever penetrated through the shell into the spirit of the Mosaic legislation. They adhered, for example, so rigidly to the letter of the law of the Sabbath, that they would kindle no fire, nor allow any food to be prepared on it; they would never partake of victuals except such as had been cooked by the hands of their own fraternity; nay, counted it such a pollution to do so, that death was to be preferred instead; they religiously abstained from spitting, especially on the right side; they betook to corporeal ablutions whenever they happened to receive the touch of an uncircumcised person, or even (as has just been stated) of one belonging to an inferior grade in their own party: such slaves were they to form, and so much did externalism encircle and overlay their mysticism!

There were, however, amid all these peculiarities, traits of excellence in the Essenes as a body, which honourably distinguished them from the mass of their countrymen, and must have greatly tended to win for them the esteem and admiration of thoughtful minds. Notwithstanding their formal separation from the temple, they were most regular and frequent in their exercises of devotion; every day was begun before sunrise with prayer and praise; every meal was hallowed with grace before and after meat; and so religiously did they adhere to the truth, that they disallowed the use of oaths; "for they say, that he who cannot be believed without swearing by God, is already condemned." They were also distinguished for their temperance in food, having only one dish set before them at each meal; for their habits of industry, spending the hours of the day (except in so far as required for devotion, bathings, and refreshment) in some kinds of handicraft and labour; for their unselfish and brotherly spirit, having all things in common, and making it a part of their stated employment to relieve the wants of the distressed. They were not only lovers of peace, but were on principle opposed to war, and abstained from any of the arts that ministered to its use. Great strictness was observed in admitting members. The applicant was obliged to live one whole year outside the community, but practising its rules, and receiving as badges, an axe, an apron, and a white garment. On the finishing of one year well, he was permitted to share in the ablutions, but not in the common repasts and meals. And after another probation of two years, he was admitted as a full member, and being so was taken solemnly bound to exercise piety toward God, to observe justice toward men, to hate the wicked and assist the righteous, himself to injure no one, to speak the truth, avoid theft and robbery, and keep the rules and secrets of the society. If any of their members fell into flagrant sin, they were expelled from the community, and sometimes were allowed to perish for want, or, if received back, it was only when they were suffering the last extremities of hunger. By their general spirit and behaviour, they certainly were witnesses against many of the more crying iniquities and corruptions of the time; but they had neither depth of discernment nor largeness of view to work out anything like a thorough practical reformation, or bring in a spiritual religion.

Their numbers have been variously estimated. Both Philo and Josephus speak of four thousand of them being in Syria and Palestine; but this number seems only to include the stricter portion of the sect. Engedi appears to have been the centre of their settlements; but they were also scattered through some of the more desert parts of Palestine, and occasionally appeared in its cities. For the most part, however, they were to be found in solitudes; and by the very nature of their asceticism they were excluded from the haunts and intercourse of ordinary society. This sufficiently explains the absence of all notice of them in New Testament scripture; and it shows, at the same time, how far the spirit, not only of Jesus Christ, but even of John the Baptist, was removed from that of the Essenes. In his disregard of the world, his stern discipline, his simple manners, his severe denunciation of the corruptions of the times, John might be said to have something in common with them. But in his insight into the mind of God, his elevation above the letter of a rigid ceremonialism, his free and energetic working upon the masses around him, he stood on a greatly higher level than the Essenes, and belonged indeed to an entirely different school—the school of men who receive their teaching direct from heaven.

Some of the Essenes, it is understood, embraced Christianity; and the Ossenes mentioned by Epiphanius (HER. XIX.) was probably but another form of Essenes.

ESTHER, BOOK OF. This is the shortest of the historical books in the Old Testament, with the exception of the book of Ruth, from which however it differs, as having reference to more than a mere family history, being, in truth, the account of the preservation of the whole Jewish nation from destruction.

The scene of the principal transactions is "Shushan the palace," namely, the royal city of Susa; the date is the reign of Ahasuerus, king of Persia. Without encroaching upon the article AHASUERUS unduly, it is necessary to speak of the different opinions which have prevailed as to the individual monarch designated by this name. A very wide difference of opinion has existed; but now the probability is admitted, almost if not absolutely with unanimity, to be that either Artaxerxes Longimanus, who reigned from B.C. 464 to B.C. 424, or his father Xerxes, who reigned from B.C. 485 to B.C. 464, must be the person meant. The chronology of our English Bible indeed adopts the opinion that he is the father of Xerxes, Darius I., who ascended the throne in B.C. 521. But Darius has in Scripture a well-established name of his own; and to apply the title Ahasuerus to him is only to bring confusion into the history; whereas the Hebrew form of the name Ahashverosh answers to the form in the old Persian inscriptions which has been deciphered by modern scholars, and identified with the name which the Greeks softened into Xerxes; of which, again, it is no violent supposition to regard Artaxerxes as a modification or amplification. Those who make Darius to be this king Ahasuerus consider his favour for the Jews on account of his wife Esther to be the explanation of his friendly interference in the matters of the Jews, as related in the book of Ezra. But precisely the same use may be made of the friendly interference of Artaxerxes (in Hebrew, Artachashasta), as related in the seventh chapter of that book, who is identified with Artaxerxes Longimanus by most critics, though by some identified with Xerxes; so that we should be brought back to the very two monarchs, one or other of whom has been generally, and by almost all important authorities, esteemed the Ahasuerus of Esther. Possibly the chronology of our English Bible may seem to suit best with the statement, Es. II. 6-7, "In Shushan the palace there was a certain Jew whose name was Mordecai, the son of Jair, the son of Shimei, the son of Kiah, a Benjamite, who had been carried away from Jerusalem, with the captivity which had been carried away with Jeconiah king of Judah, whom Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon had carried away. And he brought up Hadassah, that is, Esther, his uncle's daughter." Jeconiah's captivity took place about B.C. 599 or 597; and if Mordecai was then carried captive, the earliest date which can be assigned is the most natural. But the language is ambiguous according to the Hebrew idiom, quite as much as the English, and may be understood to assert either that Mordecai, or that his great-grandfather, was the person carried away; and other cases of analogous ambiguity occur in Scripture. Hence no weight is to be given to this passage as if it determined the chronology.

Modern critics have in general inclined to think that Xerxes was the Ahasuerus of this book; and such eminent men of the last and the present generation as Jahn, Gesenius, Winer, Hävernich, Baumgarten, and Keil, are witnesses to the agreement in this point of different schools of thinking. There is much in the character of the monarch described in Grecian history which tallies well with the description in this book of Ahasuerus, as vain, imperious, sensual, cruel, thoughtless, and under the influence of favourites, yet not incapable of feelings of compunction and sympathy for his subjects, whom he had been the instrument of oppressing or otherwise injuring. The notices of time, such as they are, may also be easily adjusted to the known course of events in Xerxes' reign. The most memorable event in it was his expedition into Greece, with an armament of such magnitude that the details presented by historians would be rejected as incredible but for the overwhelming strength of evidence in their favour. This expedition is plainly indicated in the prophecies of Daniel, ch. xi. 2. And though it is not spoken of directly in this book—whose narrative is strictly confined to the one great subject of which it treats—yet the enormous feasting “to all his princes and his servants, the power of Persia and Media, the nobles and princes of the provinces, being before him; when he showed the riches of his glorious kingdom, and the honour of his excellent majesty,” during an entire half year, in the third year of his reign, ch. i. 3, 4, would be the natural prelude to his vast expedition, as it would be in exact conformity with the account which Herodotus gives of feasting during the course of it. Again, Vashti the queen was divorced at this time; but Esther was not made queen till the tenth month of the seventh year of his reign, ch. ii. 16. This delay might surprise us, did we not know that during a great deal of the intermediate period Xerxes had been absent on the Grecian expedition, on returning from which, we also know that he plunged into every excess of voluptuousness, on purpose to bury his disgrace in oblivion. Moreover, the attempt has been often made since the time of Scaliger, to identify Esther with his queen Amestris, on account of a certain similarity of the names, and also on account of a presumed similarity of characters. But we reject the imagination that Esther was cruel and vindictive, as Amestris notoriously was; and since the characters are so opposite, the likeness of the names is not evidence on which to rest. And, moreover, the supposed identity is negated by the express testimony of common history, that the father of Amestris was Otanes, a Persian, not a Jew; and that she was married to Xerxes so long before the Grecian expedition, as to have a son by that time of marriageable age, and therefore born years before Xerxes ascended the throne.

While the prevailing opinion is thus in favour of Xerxes, even without straining the evidence by such weak arguments as the name of his wife, there are still critics of good authority who prefer to believe that the monarch in this book is Artaxerxes. They have certainly the advantage of early tradition on their side, namely, the authority of the Septuagint, and of the writer or writers of the apocryphal additions to the book, and of Josephus.

The age in which this book was written would be determined more easily if we had the least trace of the authorship. But this we have not. The only testimony of a very direct kind on either of these points, is at the end of the apocryphal edition, that it was brought into Egypt by Dositheus in the fourth year of Ptolemy (generally supposed to be Philometer) and Cleopatra, or about B.C. 165. But we do not know how much credit is to be attached to declarations in these concluding notices; nor, granting the accuracy of this one, does it appear to apply to our canonical book of Esther; nor yet, though it should apply to that, would it point to anything more than the date of the Greek translation. Some writers indeed have inferred that no other than Mordecai was the author, and in proof of this have appealed to the language of the book itself, ch. ix. 20, 23, 32; while others have alleged that a connected reading of this passage furnishes internal evidence that Mordecai was not the author. For this latter assertion we see no warrant whatever; but we also maintain that the other is at least not decisively supported by the verses quoted. The Talmud asserts that Ezekiel, the twelve (minor) prophets, Daniel, and Esther, were written by the men of the great synagogue. But if we are to attach any weight to this testimony, as we are willing to do, it is difficult to take the words in any other sense than that for which Hävernick contends, that these men “wrote it” into the canon. And as the last of these, Simon the Just, was high-priest about B.C. 310–291, this tradition would imply that at the very latest it was received into the canon by that time, but without giving even a hint how much earlier, far less a hint of its date of composition. There would be little advantage gained by detailing the conflicting statements of the Christian fathers and the Jews of the middle ages.

As for internal evidence, this is a very uncertain guide. On the strength of it Jahn asserts that the book must have been written before the fall of the Persian monarchy, B.C. 330, and probably soon after the facts which it records. De Wette, again, assigns it to the period of the Greek monarchy in Syria, which was not founded till B.C. 312, and continued till about half a century before the birth of Christ. There can be no question that the writer either actually lived during the Persian monarchy, or else, if he lived later, had made that period the subject of very careful study; for the most microscopic investigation has resulted in the assured conviction of his intimate knowledge and accurate description of Persian life, both in its domestic features and in its political aspects. In choosing between these two opinions, again, it is undeniably simpler to suppose that he lived in the period which he has described with such accuracy, especially as he has referred to the registers or chronicles of the kings of Media and Persia in such a manner, ch. x. 2, as implies that they were well known and commonly accessible to his readers, which they were less likely to be after the Persian monarchy had been overthrown by that of Alexander and his successors. There are only two considerations which seem to have any weight in favour of a later age, though neither of them is really of importance. The one is connected with the language, as it is said to bear the marks of a period of greater corruption and decay than that in which Ezra and Nehemiah were written. To this the simple reply is, that there has been a great deal of rashness displayed in drawing inferences with much confidence from such extremely narrow premises; but that a candid examination gives evidence of a style of language not seriously differing from that of these two books. In some respects we might say that it is purer and better; in others, in which it is worse, this deterioration might be a proof, not that the writer lived in a later age, but that he lived among the Persians, whose language belonged to a totally different class from the Shemitic, which includes both the Hebrew and the Chaldee, as these appear mingled in Ezra and Daniel. The other consideration is, that Persian customs are explained, as a writer might be expected to explain them, not while they were in use, but after they had passed away and become forgotten. Yet the instances of this are few and uncertain, namely, ch. i. 1; viii. 9, about the king reigning from India to Ethiopia over a hundred and twenty-seven provinces, no very great explanation, and necessary perhaps to distinguish this Ahasuerus from another and earlier one, the father of “Darius the Median,” with whom, in spite of this distinctive characteristic, he has been confounded; and, ch. i. 13, 14, “Then the king said to the wise men which knew the times (for so was the king's manner towards all that knew time and judgment; and the next unto him was Carshena, &c., the seven princes of Persia and Media, which saw the king's face, and which sat the first in the kingdom);" words that are chiefly descriptive of a habit of this individual king, and which, in so far as they speak of the seven princes who saw the king's face, certainly do not speak of this in order to explain a fact that was familiarly known to everybody. Should the traces of explanation prove even more distinct than they seem to be, it is easy to see how natural this would be in a writer who composed his book for the use of the covenant-people scattered throughout regions in the remotest parts of the Persian empire, and even beyond its limits.

There have been objections made to the canonical authority of this book, but without substantial reason. Modern critics, at least in Germany, may have been influenced by some depreciatory remarks of Luther. But some of these are incorrectly quoted or misunderstood, as has been shown by Hare; and in respect of one passage, where he seems to say that it is more worthy of being excluded from the canon than the two (apocryphal) books of Esdras, Judith, Susannah, and the Dragon, granting that this cannot be explained, we should still have to say that it deserved no more deference than the rash depreciation of the epistle of James to which at another time he gave utterance. Of ancient authority for its exclusion from the canon, there is nothing worthy of notice. The fact of its not being mentioned by the Jewish writer Philo, would be an equally strong argument against eight or nine other books of the Old Testament; and an argument from the silence of the New Testament admits of a similar reply. There is not a shadow of proof that it was absent from the canon acknowledged by the Jewish church in the time of our Lord, and accepted by him and his apostles. The only early Christian writer whose silence might cast a doubt on its reception by the church, is Melito, Bishop of Sardis, A.D. 170, in whose list it does not occur. But there are grounds for thinking that, under the name of Ezra, he included our three books of Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther. The fact in reference to the Jews is, that they esteem this book of Esther next to the law of Moses, on account of the description which it gives of the signal vengeance taken on their enemies, and the favour which was lavished on Mordecai and Esther, and through them on the whole people of the Jews. They could not entertain the notion that this unexampled train of events could be ascribed to anything else than the special providence of God watching over his own people according to his promises, and making men feel that those who touched them touched the apple of his eye, comp. Is. vi. 13; lxx. 8; Ja. xxx. 10, 11; Zec. ii. 8, 9; and those who will not receive such a doctrine are driven, like De Wette, especially in his earlier writings, Bleek, Ewald, and some others, to take refuge in an assertion from which others of a kindred sceptical tendency have shrunk, to assert that the book is a fictitious narrative. But this is a monstrous supposition, since the great event, and that which chiefly might occasion difficulty, is abundantly confirmed by the observance of the feast of Purim, with especial honour, by all Jews throughout the world. It would be an unparalleled event if this feast originated in and rested on a mere fable, all the more so as it is well known that serious difficulties were felt and expressed by many Jews at the introduction of a feast which was unknown to the law of their fathers; these scruples can have been overborne by nothing less than the marvellous nature of the deliverance experienced. And we know from 2 Mac. xv. 36, that "the day of Mordecai" was already a feast observed on the fourteenth day of the month Adar, in the time of Judas Maccabeus; and we may contrast the early form and lasting hold which this feast of Purim has had upon the Jewish people, with the entire oblivion of the festival in memory of the death of Nicanor on the previous day, though so holy and so popular a hero of the faith as Judas Maccabeus established it by a common decree of the people who supported him. No other instance can be produced of a sacred feast being established among the Jews posterior to the age of Moses, when they conquered the land of Canaan; and it is inconceivable how this could have been universally received by them after their dispersion, unless there had been a felt unquestionable divine authority for its institution. Ewald's supposition, that it came instead of the passover, is as arbitrary and unsupported as many of his other hypotheses.

The objections that have been felt by some minds to the canonical authority of the book have had their rise in either its matter or its form. As for the matter, some have spoken of the importance attached to such outward things as the refusal of Mordecai to bow and do reverence to Haman, and the three days' fasting before Esther would go into the presence of the king; but objections of this kind are surely too trifling to deserve refutation. Others, with much more reason, have spoken of the bloodiness of the decree for the destruction of the enemies of the Jews, consummated as this was in the death of 75,000 persons, and accompanied by the public hanging of Haman's ten sons upon their father's gallows. It is not necessary to attempt a vindication of all this, any more than of some cruel actions of David in his wars, and other things recorded in Scripture without any comment, and which are by no means to be justified on account of the holiness really belonging to those who acted so; rather we might draw an argument from this in regard to the truthfulness of the Word of God in the pictures which it gives of his best saints. Nevertheless we are to judge these men leniently while as yet there had appeared no living embodiment of the law of God; our circumstances are very different from theirs, seeing that we have the record of the life of our Lord. Particularly we know that the Persian punishments were fearfully strict and sanguinary, and we need not doubt that the Jews suffered from the habits of the age in which they lived. Yet, as we read the history of this seemingly merciless slaughter, we must take into account the great self-restraint (for there was nothing externally to restrain them) which prevented the Jews from laying their hands on any of the spoil: the frightful provocation under which they acted, when for months the same fate had been hanging over themselves without the slightest cause, except the refusal of Mordecai to bow to Haman; the hereditary hatred between two races, connected with the curse of God which doomed the Amalekites to destruction, on the supposition that Haman the Agagite was of the blood-royal of that nation, a supposition which has strong probability in its favour, and nothing whatever against it; the absurd and clumsy arrangements of the Persian jurisprudence, which plunged the empire into something like a state of civil war, while "the city Shushan was perplexed," in order that the king might have a resemblance to the divine perfections, "without variableness or shadow of turning," instead of simply repealing the foolish edict; and the distinct statement that the Jews acted wholly on the defensive, which is emphatically declared both in the decree and in the history of the actual event, ch. viii. 11; ix. 2, 16. Even the hanging of Haman's sons is probably to be explained, as in one or two parallel cases, by the consideration that they were partners in their father's guilt: and this view is confirmed by the fact that the gallows was prepared for Mordecai at the instigation of Haman's wife, and "all his friends" assembled at his house, ch. v. 14.

In respect of the form of the book, it is impossible to conceal or overlook its peculiarity, inasmuch as the name of God never occurs in it, nor any express reference to anything supernatural. Yet there are parallels to it in other books of both the Old and the New Testament, namely, the Song of Solomon and the third epistle of John. The peculiarity here consists in the extreme prominence which is given to the facts of the history, fully charged as these are with evidence of God's overruling special providence toward his church and people, while not one statement is made in all this respecting his presence and working. We need not pledge ourselves to any explanation of the phenomenon, which is startling to most readers, whatever theory of the object of the book be adopted by them; whether to give an account of the origin of the feast of Purim, or to demonstrate the special Providence which watched over the Jewish people. Some have explained the matter as if this book were very much an extract from "the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Media and Persia," to which express reference is made, ch. x. 2; and it is said that the argument for God's gracious guidance and defence of his church is thus presented in the most emphatic form, when it comes out of the mouth of unbelievers, or men at least ignorant of him. Others prefer to say that the writer, though an Israelite and a believer, well acquainted with God's character and promises, did not wish to set forth the occurrences "in a point of view which would have seemed strange to his contemporaries, and foreign to the subject itself, inasmuch as Jehovah, the God of Israel, had not revealed himself among the people." There is no ground for positively rejecting this as unsatisfactory, though Dr. Davidson has done so: for the theocracy was now past and gone, in that outward shape which had made the kingdom of Israel a wonder to the world, but in its essence and inward spirit it remained as much as ever; and by such events as those recorded in this book of Esther it was silently forcing itself on the attention of all nations, and calling them to notice the fulfilment of Nebuchadnezzar's dream of the little stone which broke the image. Certainly the difficulties are increased considerably if we transfer the date of composition to a later period, under the Greek kings of Syria, as Dr. Davidson is disposed to do; for the outward opposition of Judaism to everything Grecian became more and more strongly marked, and found means continually to give articulate expression to itself. Accordingly, in the apocryphal additions to the book of Esther, which are preserved in the Septuagint, the name of God occurs frequently; and it is inserted several times in that translation of the genuine book; it is so at least twice or thrice where it might seem to us very appropriate. Thus, ch. ii. 23, Mordecai's charge to Esther includes this, "to fear God and keep his commandments." In ch. iv. 8 he bids her call on the Lord as well as speak unto the king. And in ch. vi. 13 Zeresh tells her husband why he must fall before Mordecai, "because the living God is with him." Also, Haman is transformed into a Macedonian, and it is alleged that his purpose was to transfer the sovereignty to the Macedonians from the Persians who were favourable to the Jews. But these apocryphal additions certainly have conclusive internal evidence against them; and they are destitute of external authority, for the Septuagint version of the book is plainly careless in many passages. These additions are chiefly a dream of Mordecai with which the book opens, and at the end an explanation of this dream as applying to himself and Haman: the two edicts of the king, first for the destruction of the Jews, and next for their deliverance; the prayer of Mordecai, and that of Esther; and the account of the appearance and conduct of Esther, when she first came into the presence of the king. The Council of Trent however has pronounced all these to be of canonical authority.

[A fair arrangement of the materials connected with the discussions on this book is given in Keil's Introduction to the Old Testament. A view from the sceptical side is given in the introductions of De Wette and Bleek. Two learned works have been published in the present century whose very object has been to search out everything connected with the assaults on the historical truth of the book, and to defend it against them; one by Kelle, Findicia Esther (Frib. 1820); and another by Baumgarten, De Fide Libri Esther (Halle, 1830). Expositions of the book have repeatedly been published; none better, on account of comprehensiveness, brevity, and readiness, than that of the late Dr. M'Crie.] [a. c. m. d.]

ESTHER, the queen of Ahasuerus, whose history is given in the book which bears her name. Referring for other matters to the preceding article, it is enough here to mention the leading actions of her life, as exhibited in that history. She was a Jewess, of the tribe of Benjamin, of that part of the captivity which had been carried away by Nebuchadnezzar along with king Jeconiah: but plainly she herself was born in captivity; and probably her family was one of those which preferred to remain in their adopted country, as we find her at Shushan the royal city of the Persians. Here she lived under the care of Mordecai, her father's nephew, who had taken her under his protection and training when she was an orphan. At that time her name was Hadassah, which signifies a myrtle; but on some occasion unknown to us she received that name which alone is familiar to us, Esther, a Persian word according to Gesenius, of the same form and meaning as the Greek Ἔσθηρ and the English star. In this view he says he is supported by the second Targum on Esther: and perhaps the name in Persian indicated good fortune, as Venus did in Greek, and it might be given to her in consequence of her aspiring to the throne or her success in the competition. The divorce of queen Vashti, and the gathering of the most beautiful maidens throughout the empire, were the two prominent events which led to her elevation: and whatever disgust and reprobation may be felt or expressed in reference to these so far as the king was concerned in them, Esther has no blame chargeable upon her. Far from this, it would seem that she was passive in the whole matter, and that all around her were delighted with her on account of her simplicity and superiority to artificial advantages. Her character also makes another good impression on us, on account of the respectful attention which she continued to give to Mordecai, just as she had obeyed him during her earlier years spent in a humbler station. In the absence of anything to the contrary, we are entitled to argue from this that his training had been solid, wise, and godly: and our favourable opinion is confirmed by the readiness with which she exposed herself on behalf of her people, though at the peril of her life. For she did not run this risk in a fool-hardy spirit, but only after careful deliberation and conviction that she might have come to the kingdom for this very service at such a crisis; and she actually ventured on it, only after preparing herself by three days' fasting on her own part and that of her maidens, while a similar course of humiliation on her behalf was undergone by Mordecai and all the Jews assembled in Shushan. Her patriotic feelings continued until her object was fully accomplished, when, at a later time, she fell down at the king's feet, and besought him with tears to put away the mischief of Haman. Other good qualities are to be observed in her conduct towards the royal favourite Haman, whom she must have hated and despised, and yet dreaded, but to whom she showed the utmost prudent forbearance, until such time as he himself discovered his worthlessness to the king: and in the modesty with which she reported Mordecai's service in frustrating the treason of the eunuchs, without asking or obtaining any reward for her cousin's service. On the other hand, there is a certain vindictiveness which shocks us in a woman, as we read of her asking the king to hang the dead bodies of Haman's sons upon the gallows on which their father was hanging; and still more, her asking that the Jews in Shushan should be permitted to carry on the civil war for a second day, when 500 of their enemies had fallen the first day. The article on the book of Esther, however, presents some considerations fitted to modify our unfavourable estimate. The last circumstance related of her is, that she co-operated with Mordecai in writing to her people the history of these transactions, and interposing her authority to confirm the resolution which the Jews had imposed upon themselves to keep the feast of Purim. [G. C. M. D.]

ETAM [place of rareous beasts]. 1. A town or village of Judah, apparently not very far from Bethlehem, in connection with which it is mentioned as a place that was built or repaired by Rehoboam, 2 Ch. xi. 6; compare 1 Ch. iv. 32. Josephus represents it as a favourite resort of Solomon as well as Rehoboam, and states that the former used often to take a morning drive to it, that he also adorned it with fountains and gardens (Ant. viii. 7. 3). The rabbins have a tradition, that water was even brought from it by aqueducts to Jerusalem; but this can scarcely be reckoned sufficient testimony. Williams, however, in his Holy City (vol. ii. p. 500), fully accredits it, and also states that the old name is still perpetuated in a Wady Etam, which is on the way to Hebron from Jerusalem, and that there are still connected with it the largest and most luxuriant gardens to be met with in the hilly region of Judea.

2 ETAM, the rock to which Samson on one occasion withdrew, Ju. xv. 8, 11, though often connected with the Etam above noticed, is quite uncertain as to its locality. Modern research has failed as yet to obtain any definite clue to it.

ETHAM, one of the early stations mentioned in the sojournings of the wilderness, and from which a portion of the wilderness derived its name, Nu. xxxiii. 6, 8. It could be at no great distance from the Red Sea; but its exact site is unknown.

ETHAN [perennial, constant], the name of a person to whom Ps. lxxxix. is ascribed. He is called in the title to the psalm "Ethan the Ezrahite." And the immediately preceding psalm, of which Ps. lxxxix may be regarded as the complement, is designated a Maschil of Heman the Ezrahite. Heman is often mentioned in connection with the psalms, and the sacred music of the temple, but Ethan's name only occurs here. It occurs, however, in a very honourable connection at 1 Ki. iv. 31, where, speaking of Solomon's pre-eminent wisdom, it is said, that "he was wiser than all men; than Ethan the Ezrahite, and Heman, and Chalcol, and Darda, the sons of Mahol." But the same names, with only an insignificant variation in the case of one of them, are found elsewhere, and coupled apparently, with a different parentage. In 1 Ch. ii. 6, Ethan, and Heman, and Calcol, and Dara are called the sons of Zerah, the grandson of Judah. We know for certain of Heman, that he belonged to the Kohathite branch of the Levites, 1 Ch. vi. 33; and Ethan also is expressly said to have been a Levite of the family of the Merarites, 1 Ch. vi. 14. The probability is, that these Levites were associated as citizens with the house of Zerah, or dwelt in it as sojourners. Levites in this way were not unfrequently assigned to the tribe or family wherein they resided; as Samuel's father is called an Ephraimite, and a priest in the book of Judges is said to have been of the family of Judah, 1 Sa. i. 1; Ju. xviii. 7. Ethan the Ezrahite is all one with Ethan of the house or family of Zerah (see Hengsten. Com. on Ps. lxxxviii. Introd.) Though little is said of this Ethan in sacred Scripture, yet that his name should be connected with such a Psalm as the lxxxixth, and especially that it should have been thought worthy of characterizing Solomon's wisdom as greater than his, are clear proofs of his distinguished excellence as a man, and of the superior gifts which distinguished him.

ETHBA'AL [with Baal, i. e. having Baal for guide and protector], the father of Jezebel, and king of the Sidonians. Probably the same with the Eithobalus of Menander.

ETHIOPIA [Heb. עִשְׂיָא]. With only one exception, Is. xl. 11, the Hebrew word Cush, when used of a country, has been rendered in the English Bible Ethiopia; and the rendering undoubtedly should have been uniform; if Ethiopia was commonly preferred, as it is that of the ancient versions, it should have been so always. But Cush having been once employed, the question has been discussed under that term, what is its proper application? whether there is an Asiatic, as well as an African country, that goes by that name in Scripture? and the decision there given was, with the great majority of biblical critics, in the affirmative. It is admitted, however, that in by much the greater number of cases, the Ethiopia of Scripture is that also of the Greeks and Romans, namely, the country that stretches southwards above the cataracts of the Nile, comprising the modern Nubia, Senaar, and Northern Abyssinia. The word is too frequently coupled with Egypt to admit of any reasonable doubt of this; it sometimes even appears in such close conjunction with Egypt that one might almost think the one name was interchanged with the other, or at least that the relations and interests of the two were inseparably connected together, Is. xx. 3, 6; xliii. 3; Eze. xxx. 4. The Ethiopia in question included the river-land Meroë, one of the most remarkable regions in that part of Africa, to which, according to the traditions of the Egyptian priesthood, the most ancient states of Egypt owed their foundation, and the monumental remains of which have excited the curiosity and wonder of modern travellers. It has even for some time been a question with antiquarians whether civilization ascended from Egypt to Meroë, and Ethiopia in general, or did not descend from this higher region to the valley of the Nile. Latterly, the course of investigation has put this question to rest, but so as at the same time to establish, in conformity with the occasional notices and allusions of Scripture, that Ethiopia stood in very close connection with Egypt in its history as well as its geographical position. "We have," says Heeren (Ethiopiens, ch. ii.), "historical evidence that rulers of Meroë were at certain periods likewise rulers of Egypt, at least of Upper Egypt; and, on the other hand, that many of the Pharaohs extended their dominion over Ethiopia." His conclusion from this, and from the character of the monuments, is, that it was rather the occasional dominion and policy of the Pharaohs which left its impress on Ethiopia, than the civilization of Ethiopia which became the parent of art and science in Egypt. Such also is the judgment of Wilkinson, who may be said to give the general opinion of the most competent inquirers, when he affirms not Ethiopia, but the Thebaid, or Upper Egypt, to have been the parent of Egyptian science, which was peopled and cultivated when the greater part of Lower Egypt was a marsh; and also when he says that the word Ethiopia, as used by ancient authors, appears to have been intended to designate the Thebaid, or that the one was confounded by them with the other. "The expression of Pliny," he adds, "Ethiopia was evidently renowned and powerful, even to the time of the Trojan war, and extended its empire over Syria" (ch. vi. 35), though he is speaking of Ethiopia proper, can only have been borrowed from a tradition relating to the Thebaid, since the Diospolite (Theban) monarchs ruled and received tribute from Ethiopia, and actually did extend their dominion over Syria, which the Ethiopians could not have done without first obtaining possession of Egypt, and that too at a period when the Pharaohs were in the zenith of their power. Nor is the assertion of the prophet Nahum, that Ethiopia and Egypt were the strength of No, less remarkable—No, or as the Hebrew gives it, Na-Amûm, being the name of Thebes" (Ancient Egyptians, i. p. 5, 11).

The connection which thus appears to have existed, both in respect to position and government, between Upper Egypt and Ethiopia, sufficiently accounts for the close relationship in which they are sometimes represented in Scripture as standing to each other. It also explains, what might otherwise have appeared strange or incredible, how kings of Ethiopia, of a more adventurous and warlike turn, should have penetrated into Syria, and even come into contact with the affairs of the covenant-people. Two occasions of this sort are mentioned in Scripture, one in the reign of Asa (about 955 B.C.), when Zerah the Ethiopian came against him with a mighty host, and was defeated and driven back at Maresah, in the extreme south of Palestine, where it lies nearest to Egypt; and another in the time of Hezekiah, when Tirhakah, or Tirhaco, having come forth to war against Sennacherib king of Assyria, helped to divert the attention of the Assyrian monarch from the little kingdom of Judah, and even gained, it is supposed, some advantages over him. (See TIRHAKAH.) These Ethiopian incursions in the Syrian direction are to be understood of Upper Egypt and Ethiopia combined, and of periods when probably Upper and Lower Egypt were presided over by distinct rulers; and it is hence thought to be accounted for that the name of Tirhakah is found on the walls only of a Theban temple (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, i. p. 140). Not a few also of the monuments in Ethiopia are ascribed to him, so that his connection with both regions may be regarded as certain.

Almost the only other allusions made in Scripture to Ethiopia have respect to the natural characteristics of the country, and the commerce in which its people engaged. The prophet Isaiah, for example, refers to its well-watered condition; he speaks of "the waters of Ethiopia" as familiarly known to people at a distance, ch. xviii. 1; and the slightest glance at the map will show how justly it was so characterized, that part of it especially which composed the ancient Meroë, and which was surrounded by the branches of the Nile, while the district farther south was intersected by several tributaries. That the climate was hot, and the country inhabited by a population of dark colour, is implied by the allusion of Jeremiah, "Can the Ethiopian change his skin?" ch. xiii. 23; a fact which receives ample confirmation from other sources, and in particular by the representations on the monuments. Thus the Ethiopian figures in No. 253, distinctly exhibit the African or negro cast of features, and that in No. 254 also the colour. It was, too, a characteristic mode, we are told by Wilkinson, of representing Ethiopians and other blacks by showing them with a tail projecting from the girdle, and their chiefs decked with ostrich feathers, clad in garments of fine linen, with highly ornamented girdles, and a leopard's skin occasionally thrown over the shoulder. Further, that Ethiopia was a country which carried on a valuable and extensive commerce, is implied in the promise given in Is. xlv. 14—"The merchandise of Ethiopia shall come to thee." Abundant evidence exists of this, and of the articles traded in being chiefly of the more precious commodities. Thus, among the parties which appeared in the stately procession that took place at the accession of Ptolemy Philadelphus to the throne, we are told of a "host of Ethiopians armed with lances, one band of which bore 600 elephants' teeth, another 2000 pieces of ebony, and another sixty vessels of gold, silver, and gold dust" (Athen. p. 200). Herodotus also (iii. 114) speaks of Ethiopia, notwithstanding its being the most distant region of the earth, bringing forth plenty of gold, and ivory, and ebony, and various other kinds of wood. Frankincense, and spices of several kinds, there is also reason to believe, formed part of the Ethiopian merchandise, the nomade tribes in the interior bringing these, and the other articles mentioned, to Meroë, which was the centre of the whole Ethiopian trade, and in which alone the merchants, properly speaking, had their abode (Hæren, Ethiopians, ch. iii.) After collecting the various notices to be found in ancient writers on the subject, and comparing them with the accounts of later times, the author just referred to thus sums up—"It appears, therefore, that the districts of Gherri and Shendy, that is, of the ancient Meroë, was, and still continues to be, the place where the caravans are formed which trade between Egypt and Ethiopia, or the point at which they touch in passing to and fro. But a commercial connection being established between Egypt and Meroë, it scarcely needs to be mentioned that the trade of the latter must necessarily have stretched much farther into the south of Africa. Meroë was the emporium where the produce of the distant southern lands was collected together in order to be transported, either on the Nile or by caravans, into North Africa. The great end of this commerce was the rich gold countries, much farther to the south." A trade of this sort could not fail to bring along with it many of the arts and advantages of civilized life; and among other things of this description we find the early and extensive use of writing ascribed to the Ethiopians (Diod. i. p. 176), namely, hieroglyphic or picture writing, the invention of which has even been ascribed to them, but this probably from confounding, as in other respects, Ethiopia with the Thebaid.

EUNICE, the mother of Timothy, and a pious Jewess, though married to an uncircumcised Greek. She became a believer in Christ, and is spoken of with commendation as a faithful monitor and guide to her son, 2 Ti. i. 5.

EUNUCH, the English form of the Greek εὐνοῦχος, which simply means bed-keeper. Eunuchs therefore, in the strict and proper sense, were the persons who had charge of the bed-chambers in palaces and larger houses. But as the jealous and dissolute temperament of the East required this charge to be in the hands of persons who had been deprived of their virility, the word eunuch naturally came in common usage to denote persons generally of that "artificial sex." But as it was not unusual in eastern countries for eunuchs to rise to high consideration and influence about the court, to become confidential advisers of their royal masters or mistresses, so the word appears to have been occasionally employed to denote persons in such a position, without indicating anything as to their proper manhood. Thus Potiphar to whom Joseph was sold, is designated "a eunuch of Pharaoh's captain (translated officer in the English version) of the guard," Ge. xxxvii. 36; while, from what is afterwards stated, there can be no doubt that he was a married man. It is hence quite possible that by the name eunuch in Ac. viii. 27, applied to one "of great authority under Candace queen of the Ethiopians," should, as many suppose, be understood simply a person high in the confidence and employment of the queen; and it had, perhaps, been better if the word had been rendered chamberlain, so as to indicate nothing definite respecting virility. Eunuchs in the stricter sense were frequently employed in later times about the kings of Israel and Judah, but they were probably of foreign birth, 1 Ki. xx. 9; 2 Ki. ix. 32; Je. xxxviii. 7, &c. The term is employed figuratively by our Lord in Mat. xix. 12, with reference to the power, whether possessed as a natural disposition, or acquired as a property of grace, of maintaining an attitude of indifference toward the solicitations of fleshly desire.

EUODIAS [good or prosperous way], the name of a female member of the church at Philippi, mentioned with commendation by St. Paul as one who had "laboured much with him in the gospel," Phi. iv. 2.

EUPHRATES [Heb. פְּרָת, P'rath, Greek Εὐφράτης, modern name Frat], a well-known river in Western Asia, both in volume of water and in commercial importance, surpassing all others in that part of the world. The name occurs first in Ge. ii. 14, as that of one of the four rivers which had their common origin in Eden; but as this notice has respect to the primeval earth, which subsequently underwent considerable change by the action of the deluge, nothing very definite can be inferred from it respecting the Euphrates of postdiluvian times. (See EDEN.) The river in this latter respect finds its earliest notice in the promise made to Abraham, which assured him of an inheritance for his seed, that should reach from Canaan to Euphrates, Ge. xv. 18. And in the same connection it frequently occurs again. (See CANAAN.) But the references to it in Scripture are greatly more numerous than might be supposed, if one were to judge by the simple occurrence of the name; for it is not unfrequently styled merely "the river," by way of eminence, or "the great river," being so much the largest with which the Israelites were acquainted, that in certain connections it was indicated with sufficient definiteness by such a general designation, Ex. iv. 10, 16; Ps. lxxii. 8; lxxx. 11; Is. viii. 7; xl. 15, &c. In the prophetic writings particularly it is often thus named, whether the reference be to it in its simply natural aspect, or as employed in a symbolical sense.

The river itself, though confined throughout to Asiatic soil, yet in the earlier part of its course takes so much of a westerly direction, and approaches so near to the shores of the Mediterranean, that it served from remote times an important purpose in connecting the commerce of Asia with that of Europe. Its entire course is about 1780 miles, calculating from the most easterly of its two sources. These both lie in the mountains of Armenia—the one in the Anti-Taurus, 25 miles north-east from Erzeroum, which alone at first bears the name of Frat, the other, called Murad Chai, more easterly and also more remote, in the range called Ala Tâgh, not far from Ararat. These streams unite, after receiving various smaller tributaries, at a ferry called Kebban-Maden, which is 270 miles from the one source, and 400 from the other. The united streams now form a considerable river, and it is only here that the Euphrates properly begins. A little below the point of junction it measures 120 yards wide and is very deep; the direction it takes is about south-west, or sometimes W.S.W.; but as it has to force its way through mountain chains and rugged passes, it has many windings in its course, and not a few rapids. It only becomes properly navigable at Sumeisat (the ancient Samosata), and continues to be so till it reaches the Persian Gulf, a distance of very nearly 1200 miles. After passing what is called the Zeugma of Sumeisat it changes from a south-west into a south direction; by and by it turns a little to the east of south, and when nearly opposite the mouth of the Orontes, distant at this point only 133 miles from the Mediterranean, it finally quits the direction of the Mediterranean, and makes in a north-easterly course for the Persian Gulf.

At the ancient Carchemish, or Circesium, it is joined by a large tributary, the Khabôr, the ancient Chaboras (or Chebar), where it comes to possess an average breadth of 400 yards, and an ordinary depth of 18 feet. After reaching Werdî, a distance of 75½ miles by the course of the river, it contracts into a width of about 350 yards; and farther down still, about 70 miles in a direct line, though twice as much by the river, at the island of Hadsâh, it becomes only 300 yards, and has a depth of still only 18 feet. By the time it reaches the site of ancient Babylon it has decreased to 200 yards, with a depth of 15 feet; and at old Lamlum, 56 miles in a straight line lower still, it measures only 120 yards wide, and 12 feet in depth. Below this it divides into two branches, and appears for a time as if it were to be lost amid the marshes it forms, and the canals that are taken from it for purposes of irrigation; but the main stream again collects its resources, and about 40 miles below Lamlum increases to 200 yards in breadth, which by and by become 250; and when, lower still, the river is joined by the Tigris, the united stream swells out to near half a mile in width; and at 40 miles above where it empties itself into the Persian Gulf it has become 1200 yards broad and 30 feet deep. The remarkable circumstance of so great a diminution in the stream of the Euphrates from a considerable space above the site of ancient Babylon till near its junction with the Tigris, was not unnoticed by ancient writers; but we owe our most exact knowledge of it, and of the course of the river generally, to modern research, and in particular to the accurate details given by Col. Chesney, in his Expedition for the Survey of the Rivers Euphrates and Tigris, 1850, from which the preceding outline has been taken. The explanation of the decrease of volume arises from the comparatively flat and arid nature of the country which it for a time traverses. During that part of its course the river receives no tributaries worth naming, and is subject to a constant drain from evaporation, and still more from the swamps and canals it has to feed. The tendency in this direction is greatly increased by the negligence of the Turkish government, which has allowed the embankments to fall into decay; and in the existing state of matters it is doubtful if even the smallest steamer, that might be available for purposes of commerce, could make its way through the marshes which extend for 200 miles above its confluence with the Tigris. (Layard's Babylon and Nineveh, p. 478.)

The river is subject to periodical floods, which chiefly proceed from the melting of the snows on the mountains along the upper part of its course. The rise usually commences about the beginning of March, and reaches its height toward the end of May. For thirty or forty days the flood is deep and rapid; after which it gradually subsides, till in the months of September and October its waters are about their lowest. There is an occasional increase subsequently from the rains that fall at the close of autumn and during the winter months; but no regular floods. There can be no doubt that in the more flourishing periods of the Assyrian and Babylonian empires, advantage was taken of the periodical rise, in order to feed canals, and thereby fertilize the country. Mechanical appliances for this purpose are among the works ascribed to Nebuchadnezzar; but no specific information concerning them has reached us. And it may perhaps be doubted if for any length of time the course of the river between

Babylon and the junction with the Tigris was kept in a properly navigable state. Herodotus has given us a description from his own observation of the kind of navigation that was carried on in the parts above the great city. A sort of boats, he tells us (i. 104), were used by the people, of a circular form, made of comparatively slender materials—the ribs consisting of willows, the external covering of hides of leather, and there was an internal lining of reeds. In these frail barks, some of them, however, carrying a burden of 5000 talents worth of goods, they sailed with their merchandise as far as Babylon, always carrying an ass with them, and the larger boats, more than one, for the purpose of conveying back the hides of which the boats were made. These were stripped off at Babylon, and the willows and reeds that formed the remaining part of the materials were parted asunder, and sold for what they would bring. This was done as the cheapest and readiest way of getting home; since they found it impossible to sail up to Armenia against the stream. It was certainly a very simple style of navigation; but probably it is to be understood, not of the entire traffic on the Euphrates above Babylon, but only of that which was connected with the higher and more distant regions. It is certain, from other ancient notices, that a traffic was conveyed up as well as down, from the Persian Gulf to Babylon, whence the city received a constant supply of Arabian and Indian productions; and we have the testimony of Strabo, that of these productions a surplus portion was regularly conveyed by the river from Babylon as far as Thapsacus, nearly 400 miles up, whence the goods were distributed over the surrounding countries. This renders it probable that the transmission of merchandise upwards from the Persian Gulf to Babylon was, in part at least, conducted on the river, though there is reason to believe that caravans were also employed (see Heeren's Ancient Babylonians, ch. II. and the authorities there cited). On the whole, therefore, and considered in a commercial respect as well as with a regard to its uses in agriculture, the Euphrates manifestly stood somewhat in the same relation to Babylon and the surrounding region that the Nile did to Egypt; it was the source, to a large extent, of its prosperity, and the most important element of its greatness.

It is on this relation that the symbolical use of the Euphrates in Scripture proceeds, and by keeping it in view the several passages will be found to admit of an easy explanation. Contributing so materially to the resources and wealth of Babylon, the river was naturally taken for an emblem or representative of the city itself, and of the empire of which it was the capital. In this respect a striking application is made of it by the prophet Isaiah, ch. viii. 5-8—where the little kingdom of Judah, with its circumscribed territory and its few earthly resources, on the one hand, is seen imaged in the tiny brook of Shiloah; while, on the other, the rising power of Babylon is spoken of under the emblem of "the waters of the river, strong and many, even the king of Assyria and all his glory." And he goes on to expose the folly of Israel's trusting in this foreign power, on account of its material greatness, by declaring that in consequence of this mistaken trust, and in chastisement of it, the mighty stream would, as it were, desert its proper channel, and turn its waters in a sweeping and desolating flood over the holy land. In like manner the symbolical action of Jeremiah, ch. xiii. 4, going to hide his girdle in a cavern by the river

Euphrates, points to the evil that was destined to come upon the covenant-people from the power which had its representation in that river. But when Babylon's own doom comes to be the theme of prophetic discourse, then quite naturally, and by a simple reversing of the figure, the waters of the river are spoken of as suffering under a perpetual drought, and being even dried up, Ja. i. 12; Zec. x. 11; so also, Is. xlix. 5, of the Nile; but one should no more think, in this case, of a decay of the natural stream, than in the other of its overflow; in both cases alike it is the kingdom imaged by the river, which is really the subject of discourse. In the book of Revelation, where Babylon is employed as a symbolical designation of the corrupt system which stands opposed to the pure church and kingdom of Christ, the Euphrates also comes into view as an emblematic representative of the powers or agencies from which the mystery of iniquity should derive its principal support, and which are there explained to mean "peoples and multitudes, and nations, and tongues," Re. xvii. 15; so that to make account, in such a connection, of the literal Euphrates, or of the countries which it waters, were as much beside the purpose as it would be to understand by Babylon the ancient city and kingdom which bore the name. For, in interpreting such language, a due regard to the relations of things, and a consistent use of the terms employed, is indispensable to our arriving at a satisfactory result. Hence, as in the case of the literal Babylon, the drying up of the waters of the Euphrates signified, in prophetic language, the diminution or failure of the city's resources; the same expression, when applied to modern relations, Re. xvi. 12, can be understood of nothing but a similar diminution or failure of the support which mystical Babylon was to derive from the nations and kingdoms of the earth.

Considered simply in its natural relation to Palestine, the river Euphrates had no other significance than that of the extreme boundary of territorial dominion on the north-east. It was mentioned, as already noticed, in that connection in the promise to Abraham; was repeated in De. i. 7; Jos. i. 4; possessions to that extent are reported to have been actually held by the tribe of Reuben, namely, from Gilead onwards to Euphrates, 1 Ch. v. 9; and to the same extent both David and Solomon appear to have claimed dominion, 2 Sa. viii. 3-8; 1 Kl. iv. 21; 2 Ch. ix. 25. But the claim was manifestly of a much looser kind than that by which they held the land of Canaan; it was a claim of superiority merely over petty states or wandering tribes, which were too small and divided to form properly independent kingdoms, not of tribal occupation, which for the higher ends of the theocracy would have been a loss rather than a gain. A right of pasturage through the vast desert lands, or an annual tribute from subject tribes, was all that was sought; and the land of the covenant, strictly so called, was still that which was comprised within the bounds of Canaan and the conquered regions to the east of Jordan. (See CANAAN.)

EUROCLYDON, a tempestuous wind, anciently well known in the Ægean Sea, and the occasion of the disastrous voyage and shipwreck of the vessel in which Paul sailed, Ac. xxvii. 14. The term is made up of the two words which signify east and wave; so that, as applied to a wind, it must have been in the active sense of an east-wave, a wind that raises such waves as come from the east. One, however, of the more ancient MSS., viz. the Alexandrian, read Εὐρακ- λων, and the Vulgate has the corresponding Latin term Euroaquilo (indeed the second part of the word is Latin), that is, north-east; and though this is not admitted into the text by the best critical authorities, it is preferred by some writers on the subject (Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck of Paul, App.) It was thought that another MS., viz. B, had the same reading; but this is now ascertained to be a mistake, it has Eurakudon (Εὐρακῦδων). The writer just referred to has demonstrated that the particular wind which then blew must have been from a little to the north of north-east; so that it might fitly have been designated a north-easter. On the other hand, if the wind had been simply a north-east one, we should hardly have expected the peculiar expression, "a tempestuous wind, which is called north-east," especially as it is known that typhonic or tempestuous winds from the east generally, and from the south, as well as north-east, agitated the Mediterranean, as they still do (see examples in Wetstein). It is best, therefore, to retain the common reading, and to suppose that the term Euroclydon was a local or corrupt designation used by persons navigating the Ægean, but not recognized by classical writers as a proper Greek word.

EUTYCHUS, a young disciple at Troas, who fell asleep while Paul continued his discourse far into the night, and having fallen over into the pavement below, "was taken up dead." There seems no reason to doubt that actual death, and not a mere swoon, befell him; and Paul consequently did with him, as in certain cases of death had been done by Elijah and Elisha of old, fell upon him, to see if the Lord through this instrumentality would restore the suspended animation. The desired result was attained, and the apostle restored the young man alive to his friends, Ac. xx. 8-12. That some degree of blame attached to the latter for having gone to sleep under such preaching as Paul's must have been, there can be little doubt. At the same time, the length of the service, and the lateness of the hour, to say nothing of other possible contingencies, afforded some excuse. And the granting of a special exercise of power for his restoration to life would come as a merciful interposition to Paul himself and the church at Troas, as well as to the sufferer.

EVANGELIST, the English form of the Greek εὐαγγελιστής, which means bearer of glad tidings, a messenger of good. In a general sense the term might be applied to any one who made proclamation of the mercy and grace of God, especially as unfolded in the person and work of Christ—therefore pre-eminently to Christ himself, and to the apostles whom he commissioned to preach his truth and establish his kingdom. But in reality it came to be employed as the designation of a distinctive class in the early church, as in the following enumeration of St. Paul: "And he (i.e. Christ) gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers," Ep. iv. 11. It is nowhere stated what was the exact province of an evangelist, or wherein precisely his calling and office differed from those, for example, of a pastor or a teacher. We are left to infer them from the nature of the word, and from the instances to which it is applied. The word itself implies, that those who bore it as a term of office, must have had to do especially with the facts of redemption, with the announcement of things already accomplished or provided, and capable of being made known as tidings of good to men. Hence, in their work they would naturally approach nearer to missionaries than to stated labourers in a particular place, or overseers of a fixed congregation: they would find their more specific employment in spreading abroad the good news of the kingdom. In short, the evangelist might be regarded as the pioneer of the apostle, who was to plant the church in any locality, or of the settled pastor, who was to preside over and feed it. And this is borne out by the application made of the term to particular individuals. Philip, one of the original seven at Jerusalem, who were appointed to fill the office of deacon, is the first who is called an evangelist; and he appears to have derived the name from his wonderful fitness for proclaiming in an impressive and convincing manner the great truths of redemption—first in Samaria, and then in other and more distant places, Ac. viii.; xxi. 8. Timothy, in like manner, and Titus, had much of the same kind of work to do, and are commonly called evangelists, only they stood in a somewhat closer connection with the apostolate; and the one at Ephesus, the other in Crete, had to do, as regards the execution of that commission, the part of apostolical delegates. This, however, was still doing what the apostle called the work of an evangelist, 2Ti. iv. 5; and both the two in their ordinary ministrations appear to have been his assistants and fellow-labourers in the general dissemination of the gospel. Luke, Silas, Mark, Apollos, and several others, are to be assigned to the same class. So that, from the various notices which occur respecting the evangelists, the description of Schaff (Apostolic Church, i. p. 202) may be taken as substantially correct: "They were not congregational officers, nor stationed like the presbyters and later bishops at particular posts, but travelled about freely wherever their services were needed. The apostles employed them as messengers for various purposes to all points of their vast field; sending them, now for the further propagation of the gospel, now to carry letters, now to visit, inspect, and strengthen congregations already established; so that the evangelist also, like the apostles themselves, served as living bonds of union, and promoters of fraternal harmony, among the different sections of the church. In short, they were in some sense the vicegerents [or pioneers] of the apostles, acting under their direction and by their authority."

From the general nature of the function of an evangelist, one can easily understand why the name should have been peculiarly appropriated to the four inspired writers of the gospel history. These were for the church of all times the publishers of the facts which constituted the ground and basis of blessing to the people of God. In that respect they all did the part of evangelists, although only two of them stood in the rank indicated by the name, and the other two occupied the higher position of apostles. But the work itself of an evangelist, and the relation which it held to the apostolate, rendered it quite fitting, that one or more of those called to it should be endowed with supernatural gifts for preparing an inspired record of the great facts of gospel history. This higher part of their work, however, might with equal propriety be assigned to the prophetic office; since the gifts which qualified them to narrate aright those all-important facts, so as to render their record an infallible and trustworthy guide to the church, were essentially the same with those of a prophet. In doing it the evangelists acted as divinely taught and authorized revealers of the mind of God; and in the statement of St. Paul respecting the New Testament church, that it is "built upon the foundation of apostles and prophets," Ep. ii. 20, this prophetic agency of the evangelists is undoubtedly to be included.

EVENING. See DAY.

EVENINGS. The phrase between the two evenings is a peculiar expression in the Pentateuch, used chiefly with reference to the slaying of the paschal lamb, although it is given only on the margin of the English Bible. The lamb was to be killed between the two evenings, Ex. xiii. 6; Nu. ix. 3; xxviii. 4. From an early period it has been a question, between what points these two evenings were to be made to lie. The Caraites, with whom also Abenezra agrees, and the Samaritans, held it to be the interval between the sun's setting and the entrance of total darkness; i.e. between about six o'clock and seven or half-past seven, by our reckoning. But the Pharisees of the apostolic age (Jos. War., vi. 2. 3), and the Talmudists, understood the first evening to be when the sun began visibly to decline, and the second when he actually sunk under the horizon—or from about three in the afternoon till six, or a little after it, in the evening. The former explanation certainly seems to be the more natural of the two, and most in accordance with the intimations of Scripture upon the subject. For the expression between the two evenings is once and again interchanged with that of in the evening, Ex. xvi. 12, 13; De. xvi. 4; and in De. xvi. 6 an explanatory clause is added, "in the evening as soon as the sun goes down." It would seem, therefore, that the general notification of time was in the evening, and the more specific one in the evening between its actual commencement by the sun going down and its termination by the entrance of night. This view also is confirmed by the consideration of Israel's position at the first institution of the passover; for, situated as they were, they could scarcely have gone about the service till the sun had either actually set, or was on the point of doing so. But there can be no doubt that the Pharisæal view prevailed in apostolic times; and it may be held for certain that the current practice was in this, as in other things respecting the Jewish feasts, followed by our Lord and his disciples. The precise meaning, therefore, of the original phrase determines nothing as to the exact time of their last passover.

EVIL-MER'ODACH [etymology unknown, but Merodach was the name of a Babylonian deity], the son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. On his accession he released the captive king of Judah, Jehoiachin, treated him with marked respect, and set his throne above the thrones of the other subjugated monarchs, 2 KI. xxv. 27; Je. lli. 31-34. The fact alone is recorded, and we have no reliable account of the motives that may have induced the king of Babylon to make such a distinction in his favour. A Jewish tradition ascribes it to a prison-acquaintanceship acquired with Jehoiachin, when Evil-Merodach was put in confinement by his father, on recovery from the temporary insanity which came upon him. He took offence at something that had been done by his son in the administration of affairs during Nebuchadnezzar's incapacity, and threw him into Jehoiachin's ward. The tradition, though noticed by Jerome (on Is. xiv. 20), had probably no other origin than a desire to provide some explanation of the fact respecting the favour shown to the captive king of Judah. But whatever may have been the immediate human occasion of it, when viewed in respect to God, it was certainly to be regarded as an indication of that mercy and loving-kindness toward his covenant-people which had not altogether failed, and a premonitory sign of that coming enlargement which was still in reserve for them.

EXODUS, THE. That providence which, by a remarkable combination of causes variously operating, now on a nomad family in Canaan, and again through the slumbers of an Egyptian monarch, is seen at the close of Genesis conducting the Hebrews to Egypt, appears at the opening of the history of Exodus no less clearly preparing for their restoration to the land of their fathers' sojourning. This restoration had been a subject of promise as early as the time of Abraham, Ge. xv. 14, subsequently and more expressly renewed to Jacob at Beersheba, on his way to Egypt, God giving him this assurance, "Fear not to go down into Egypt, for I will make of thee a great nation. I will go down with thee into Egypt, and I will also surely bring thee up again," Ge. xl. 1. 3, 4. In the full hope of this promise, Jacob and his son Joseph died in the land of Egypt, the latter in particular taking an oath of his brethren that on their departure hence they should carry up with them his bones, Ge. 1. 25.

The first part of the promise made to Jacob had, even prior to the birth of Moses, fully eighty years before the exodus, been receiving such a remarkable fulfilment as to arrest the attention of the Egyptian government, which was naturally alarmed at the great increase of this alien population within their dominions. Hence the various but ineffectual means resorted to for repressing this rapid growth, Ex. 1. 12, 17. The edict which directed that the Hebrew male infants should be cast into the river must have been issued shortly before the birth of Moses, as there is no reference to any trouble on this account at the birth of Aaron, who was three years older than Moses, Ex. vii. 7, and it was probably of short duration. However, this tyrannical decree was not without its fruits, were it only for the training which it was instrumental in securing for Israel's future leader; while at the same time it served, with the other severe trials to which the people were exposed, to wean them from their attachment to the land of their sojourning. How much this was needed appears from their subsequent history, particularly their murmurings in the wilderness; and indeed the hold which it is thus seen Egypt had on their affections, owing partly to the facilities with which their animal wants were there supplied, Nu. xi. 4, fully accords with what is still witnessed among such of the inhabitants of the desert as are led to settle in the valley of the Nile (Robinson, Biblical Researches, 2d ed. vol. i. p. 63). Moses, when he first tried to arouse his brethren to a sense of their high destiny, found them quite unprepared for his friendly overtures, and a further period of trial was necessary for the discipline not only of the people, but of the deliverer himself. However, the time did at length arrive for the fulfilling of the divine promises, but it found the destined leader of Israel more reluctant, than he had previously shown himself eager, to engage in this enterprise, though now expressly summoned to it by God. The change which in the interval had come over the spirit and aspirations of Moses admits of easy explanation, and is itself an important confirmation of the truthfulness of this portion of the history. He however, after much natural, but, from the extent to which it was carried, sinful opposition, Ex. iv. 14, undertook the duty committed to him, and leaving the Arabian desert, long the scene of his solitary, again to become that of his public, life and labours as the leader of his people, he returned to Egypt, accompanied by his brother Aaron, who by divine appointment met him on the way, Ex. iv. 27.

Moses first made known his mission as directed to the elders, or representatives of Israel according to the patriarchal form of government still subsisting among them, and having shown the signs which accredited his divine commission, he found a favourable reception—"the people believed," Ex. iv. 29-31. The brothers, for Aaron was associated throughout as "the prophet" or spokesman of Moses, next addressed themselves to Pharaoh, and although the request was at first of the most moderate kind, being only leave for a journey of three days into the wilderness to sacrifice to the God of the Hebrews, it need excite no surprise that it was peremptorily refused, and only led to the imposition of additional burdens upon the enalaved people. The appearance of these commissioners of Jehovah, it may readily be supposed, was not such as to inspire with feelings other than of contempt a haughty Egyptian ruler, particularly one of the character represented in this history; while their request, moreover, if at all deemed worthy of a moment's consideration, may have been thought to cover some ulterior design; just as a former Pharaoh feared the contingency of the Israelites leaving Egypt, Ex. i. 10. At all events the labour of these bondsmen was of too great value to the crown to make Pharaoh favourably disposed to any proposals which involved its intermission. Hence the reply, defiant alike of Moses and Aaron, and of Him whose representatives they professed to be—"Who is Jehovah, that I should obey his voice to let Israel go? I know not Jehovah, neither will I let Israel go," Ex. v. 2.

And now commenced that series of wonders by which Moses extorted a reluctant assent from Pharaoh to demands, which in the course of the negotiations were presented in their utmost extent, having ceased to be, what they were at the outset, a conditional request for a journey into the wilderness for the purpose of sacrificing. The object of Moses was now most explicitly declared to be the absolute manumission of the people from bondage, and their departure out of the land. It is of importance to bear in view this change in the relation of affairs, as a great complaint is sometimes made by parties unfriendly to the Bible, that Moses in his first request to Pharaoh practised a deception, and that in leaving Egypt with the Israelites as he did, he was guilty of a breach of faith. There is, however, nothing in the history of these transactions to warrant such charges. Pharaoh's refusal to entertain the first proposal led to its being withdrawn. It answered the only purpose therein contemplated—the manifestation of the man with whom Moses had to deal. It was made, too, with a pre-intimation to Moses that it would be rejected by Pharaoh, Ex. iii. 19, who should however in the end be brought to an absolute submission. Indeed this change in the position of affairs was fully understood by Pharaoh himself and his people, Ex. xii. 31-33; though afterwards "the heart of Pharaoh and of his servants was turned against the Israelites," a circumstance which led to the pursuit of the fugitives

In estimating the character of those powers which Moses employed in enforcing his demands, and which ultimately overcame the various obstacles which, as might easily be shown, an undertaking of this kind necessarily presented, it would be well to ask how the case really stands when the miraculous character of the Mosaic acts is called in question? Reduce the authenticity of the Pentateuch to the lowest degree, still the fact of the exodus remains, and along with it a period of sojourning in the wilderness previous to the entrance into Canaan, and other facts which are so impressed on the language, institutions, and in short the whole public and private life of the Israelites, that they can only be denied by rejecting all historical evidence, and the question is, How was this deliverance effected? The account given in the Pentateuch is at least simple and consistent. No doubt, it introduces a divine agency; but deny such, and in vain is a cause sought for adequate to the results produced. A shepherd long exiled in Midian presents himself at the Pharaonic court, without armies or alliances, and yet at length he overcomes the obstinacy of the most obdurate of monarchs. The pastoral staff which he carries in his hand must certainly have been made "the rod of God" when it is capable of working such wonders. But, on the other hand, it may be objected, if Moses was really armed with such power, why brook those repeated refusals and delays, and what need of ten plagues, when one stroke of the Almighty would have sufficiently answered the purpose by overcoming all opposition? Objections of this kind have their origin in ignorance or misconception of the purposes which this controversy with Pharaoh was designed to serve in the scheme of divine revelation.

Had the deliverance of Israel, considered in itself, been the only object contemplated in the mission of Moses, it might have been summarily effected through divine interposition. But the great object aimed at, as repeatedly stated in the narrative itself, was the revelation of Jehovah both to friends and to foes—to the Israelites and to the Egyptians—though in different aspects. To the former it was declared: "Ye shall know that I am Jehovah your God, who bringeth you out from under the burdens of the Egyptians," Ex. vi. 7; and with respect to the latter it was said, "The Egyptians shall know that I am Jehovah, when I stretch forth mine hand upon Egypt, and bring out the children of Israel from among them," Ex. vii. 6. Pharaoh's refusal of Moses' request was accompanied, as already remarked, with a defiance of Jehovah. He knew and revered his country's gods, but he knew not or cared for the God of the Hebrews—"Who is Jehovah, that I should obey his voice?" Accordingly, Pharaoh, on witnessing the first sign which Moses was directed to perform in his presence in answer to this question, called in "the wise men and the sorcerers of Egypt." These representatives of the powers of heathenism imitated to a certain extent not only the sign but also the first two plagues. At the third, however, their power failed; they acknowledged themselves foiled, and at length were forced to relinquish the contest, Ex. viii. 18, 19; ix. 11. This was an important point achieved, though it had little effect as yet upon Pharaoh. But even as it was, the power put forth in opposition to Moses had been exercised only in aggravating the evils brought upon the land: for their removal or mitigation the magicians were altogether powerless. Any relief obtained was avowed by the monarch himself to be from Jehovah through the intercession of Moses, Ex. viii. 8—an avowal which went on increasing, and accompanied with various though frequently retracted concessions by Pharaoh, as the inflictions grew in severity or were temporarily intermitted. The plague of frogs induced Pharaoh to implore through Moses the aid of Jehovah, Ex. viii. 8; the fourth plague—the flies—extorted a permission for Israel to sacrifice in Egypt, and then, though afterwards revoked, to proceed a short distance thence, Ex. viii. 25, 26. The hail-storm—the seventh plague—drew forth the confession: “I have sinned this time: Jehovah is righteous, and I and my people are wicked,” Ex. ix. 27; and again, under the eighth visitation, “I have sinned against Jehovah your God, and against you,” Ex. x. 16; the announcement of this plague having drawn forth a permission for the adult males to go away to sacrifice, Ex. x. 11; while the ninth plague secured a further permission for the whole of the people to go, provided their flocks and herds were left behind, Ex. x. 21—conditions, however, to which Moses refused to accede. And now followed a judgment which brought matters to a crisis, and led even to the expulsion of the Israelites, Ex. xii. 31-33. Although the result was only a temporary and forced submission on the part of Pharaoh, the effects on the Egyptians were otherwise: some of them practically acknowledged the power of Jehovah, for on the announcement of the hail-storm a number took advantage of the warning to house their servants and cattle; and afterwards, on the announcement of the locusts, the very courtiers urged the king to submit in this now evidently unequal contest, Ex. x. 7.

The impression thus made upon the Egyptians is further discernible in the notice—“And the Lord gave the people favour in the sight of the Egyptians. Moreover, the man Moses was very great in the land of Egypt, in the sight of Pharaoh’s servants, and in the sight of the people,” Ex. xii. 3. This, coupled with the anxiety felt for the Israelites’ speedy departure, Ex. xii. 33, fully explains the readiness with which, on request, the latter were furnished with raiment and other articles of value, Ex. xii. 35, 36. This transaction has been placed in an unfavourable light by the unfortunate rendering of שָׁאָל (shaal), and its hiphil form שָׁאָלוּ (hish'il), by “borrowing” and “lending” respectively, the latter after the LXX., καὶ ἔχρησαν αὐτοῖς, and Vulg. “ut commodarent eis,” Ex. xii. 36; whereas the simple meaning is, in the one case “to ask” or “request” (see Ps. ii. 8), and in the other, “to cause or induce to ask,” that is, to comply with the request, or to give freely and gladly; as when Hannah dedicates the infant Samuel to the Lord, 1Sa. i. 28, where the same term is also improperly rendered “lent.” It was not surely for the mere purpose of enriching the Israelites, and by any means however questionable, that an arrangement so important that it is three times noticed in this record, and was also pre-intimated in the patriarchal history, was had recourse to, but rather for the elucidation of the principle exemplified in the exodus itself, and in all the acts which conduced to it. What now occurred in Egypt was a type of all the future contests of Israel with heathenism: “And they shall spoil those that spoiled them, and rob them that robbed them, saith the Lord God,” Eze. xxxix. 10. See also Zec. xiv. 14.

The effect on the Israelites themselves of these interpositions “designed to vindicate the personality and holiness of God, as well as the distinctness of his chosen people” (Hardwick, Christ and other Masters, pt. iv. p. 88), appears in their response to Moses’ song of deliverance: “I will sing unto Jehovah, for he hath triumphed gloriously, . . . Jehovah is my strength and song, and he is become my salvation: he is my God, and I will prepare him an habitation; my father’s God, and I will exalt him,” Ex. xv. 1, 2. The divine purpose intimated to Israel at the outset of these proceedings—“Ye shall know that I am Jehovah your God,” Ex. vi. 7—is here seen to be realized; Jehovah is acknowledged to be Israel’s God and the God of their fathers, to whom however he was known rather as EL SHADDAI, the Almighty, than as JEHOVAH, the deep import of which name was not fully comprehended by them, Ex. vi. 3, although in common use. It is worthy however of note, that prior to the exodus the name Jehovah entered into the composition of proper names, as in the case of Jochebed, the mother of Moses, Ex. vi. 12, and Bithiah, a daughter of Pharaoh, who married Mered of the tribe of Judah, 1Ch. iv. 18. This last instance is remarkable, the assumption of this peculiarly Hebrew name must have been on her marriage with the Israelite, and if so, here is an Egyptian Ruth declaring “Thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God.” (See Kurtz, Geschichte des Alten Bundes, ii. p. 32.)

Having this definite object—the revelation of Jehovah—the plagues inflicted on the Egyptians will be found in striking correspondence with its specific aim. They were not mere prodigies or arbitrary displays of power, but were directed to the promotion of particular truths and the subversion of the opposite errors. In particular they are found to bear a special relation to Egypt in respect both to the physical characteristics of that land, and to the kind of idolatrous worship there practised—two things more or less related in all forms of heathenism.

The connection of the Mosaic plagues with certain physical characteristics and phenomena of Egypt did not escape the notice of some of the English deistical writers of the last century and others, who at once fancied that this circumstance sufficiently disposed of everything miraculous in their character. They maintained that the biblical narrative was only an exaggerated account of events frequently witnessed in Egypt, though on this particular occasion some of them, it might be admitted, may have been of more than usual force. These views, it is thought by many, have received further confirmation from the more intimate acquaintance formed by recent researches with the land of the Pharaohs. It admits indeed of no question that there is, in various points, a close connection between the physical characteristics of Egypt and the visitations which, as recorded in the Mosaic narrative, preceded the exodus; and this connection has an importance, were it only as a testimony to the minute acquaintance of the author of the Pentateuch with the land which forms the scene of his history, in the events of which he presents himself as personally participating. But with respect to the rationalistic argument deduced from this connection of the natural with the supernatural, let it be noticed, as remarked by Hengstenberg, that “the supernatural presents generally in the Scriptures no violent opposition to the natural, but rather unites in a friendly alliance with it,” and that there were besides, in the nature of the present controversy, special reasons why the natural basis should be brought prominently into view. The object to which, as already remarked, all these occurrences were directed, was the revelation of Jehovah as God, not merely of the oppressed and despised Hebrews, but also as God over Pharaoh and over Egypt—"Jehovah in the midst of the earth," Ex. viii. 22, and over all its lands, ver. 12. "Well-grounded proof of this could not have been produced by bringing suddenly upon Egypt a succession of strange terrors. From these it would only have followed that Jehovah had received a momentary and external power over Egypt. On the contrary, if the events which annually returned were placed under the immediate control of Jehovah, it would be appropriately shown that he was God in the midst of the land, and the doom of the false gods which had been placed in his stead would go forth, and they would be entirely driven out of the jurisdiction which was considered as belonging to them" (Hengstenberg, Egypt and the Books of Moses, p. 97, Edin. 1845).

To these concessions of Hengstenberg as to the extent of the natural in the plagues of the exodus, exception will not be taken by the objectors just adverted to, and in the case as thus presented their objections at least are fully disposed of, while enough still remains to evince the miraculous character of the transactions. Hengstenberg, indeed, and also Osburn (Israel in Egypt, 2d edit. Lond. 1850), extend this natural basis to an unwarrantable degree; for in order to find in the phenomena of Egypt something corresponding to the several plagues, they protract the time over which these events extended to a length not supported by any statement in the history. But however this may be, the supernatural is distinctly visible throughout. It is not at all a question of degrees or of fortunate concurrences. Had there been anything of this kind, it certainly would not have been lost on Pharaoh or on his advisers, whose interests it would have been, equally at least with the most sceptical of modern times, to resort for an explanation, if possible, to second causes. The great distinguishing fact however was, that these visitations were under the control so far of Moses, the avowed messenger of Jehovah, that they followed upon his announcement, and were removed at his request; and further, that a line of demarcation was drawn between the Israelites in the district of Goshen and the Egyptians, and this more particularly in the case of so remarkable a phenomenon as the three days' darkness. Let the foundation in nature for this plague be as the writers last named, though with great improbability, maintain, the chamsin, or hot wind of the desert, or whatever else it may, entire immunity from its effects by the Israelites in the immediate neighbourhood, or, in other words, thick darkness overshadowing Egypt, with light shining upon the Israelitish dwellings, is a phenomenon inexplicable on any principles of meteorology or other science. (See Hawks' Monuments of Egypt, p. 266, N. York, 1854.)

The nature of these plagues is still further illustrated, and their adaptation to the object they were designed to accomplish, when they are viewed in relation to the various forms of Egyptian idolatry. Although this matter has been pushed to an extravagant length by Bryant (Observations on the Plagues inflicted upon the Egyptians, 2d ed. Lond. 1810), there is undoubtedly much truth in his theory. His error lies chiefly in the specification of the several deities against which the plagues were directed. It is expressly stated that the controversy was with the gods of Egypt. "Against all the gods of Egypt I will execute judgment: I am Jehovah," Ex. xii. 12; and the way in which it was decided is strikingly testified, apart from other considerations, in the impression which the events of the exodus produced on the priest of Midian. "Now know I that Jehovah is greater than all gods: for in the thing wherein they dealt proudly he was above them," Ex. xviii. 11. But it is not only this general bearing of the plagues that is apparent; the specific application of several of them at least can be distinctly discerned. The object of the first two—the changing of the Nile water into blood and the production of frogs by the river—is exceedingly significant. The Nile was to the Egyptians a special object of regard, and even of worship. Being almost the only potable water in Egypt, and besides being of a most pleasant description, the intimation, "the Egyptians shall loathe to drink of the water of the river," Ex. vii. 18, had a peculiar force. The worship of the Nile reached back to the earliest period. The monuments show the kings presenting oblations and paying divine honours to the river. A reference to this worship is contained in the directions given to Moses to meet Pharaoh as he went out in the morning to the water, Ex. vii. 15; viii. 22. The message of Jehovah was thus brought before him as he was preparing to bring his daily offerings to his false gods. In the second plague again, which was closely connected with the first, the river, which was looked on by the Egyptians as the source of all their blessings, was converted into a fruitful parent of the most loathsome creatures; and never was the impotency of their goddess Heki, whose office it was to drive away the frogs, which were exceedingly annoying even in ordinary years (Osburn, Israel in Egypt, p. 263), more apparent than on this occasion, when her interposition was more than ever required. Of the other plagues it need only be remarked that they were productive of much personal suffering to the Egyptians, and of destruction to their property—against which calamities they were accustomed to confide in the protection of one or other of their innumerable deities. As Jehovah had manifested his absolute power over the river, the land, and the elements, he in due time laid his commands upon the sun, "the father-god of the whole mythology, the dread protector of the oldest and most venerated of the cities of Egypt" (Osburn, p. 290), and discharged it from shining for three days upon the land. This completed the preliminaries to the last great event—the death of the first-born—a judgment in which all the preceding inflictions culminated.

Enriched with the spoil of their oppressors, now glad to be rid of them on any terms, Pa. cv. 28, the Israelites commenced their journey under the special protection and guidance of God, the historian particularly noticing the circumstance of Moses taking the bones of Joseph with him, Ex. xiii. 19, which thus served throughout their wanderings as an additional pledge of their being put into possession of the land through the promises, in the faith of which Joseph gave such instructions concerning the disposal of his bones. The direct road to Palestine would have led the Israelites through the territories of the Philistines; but their divine Guide, in order to spare them the perils of war, for which they were at this time utterly unprepared, "led them about the way of the wilderness of the Red Sea," ver. 17, 18. The geography of the exodus is too complicated and extensive a subject to be considered here. It may be necessary however to remark, that notwithstanding the distinct specification of localities, which at the time must doubtless have been amply sufficient to identify their position, and which even now, in the estimate of such as are acquainted with the region, are indubitable proofs of the accuracy of the narrative, the line of march cannot be determined with any certainty. This arises in part from the absence of any definite information regarding the situation of Goehen, where the Israelites dwell, or of Rameses, whence they took their departure, Ex. xii. 37, and partly from the want of any note of the time occupied on their journey, when Pharaoh overtook them encamped by the Red Sea. It is of the more importance to advert to the absence of any indications of time in connection with this part of the journey, as Robinson (Biblical Researches, i. 61), assuming that "three days is the longest interval which the language of the narrative allows," makes this an argument in support of his hypothesis as to the direction of the journey, and consequently as to the locality of the passage of the Red Sea. Into the minute consideration of this latter much-agitated question, it is unnecessary to enter. There are not, in fact, sufficient materials to settle it one way or another. That the Israelites crossed in the neighbourhood of Suez is the view held by Robinson (Bib. Res. i. 51-59), but he has found an able opponent in Wilson (Lands of the Bible, i. p. 149-160, Edin. 1847). But indeed the question would have been of little importance, save for the attempts of some writers to divert it to the purpose of reducing the miracle as much as possible to a natural level, by eliminating such difficulties of the case as necessitated recourse to other than second causes, as the agency of the wind and an ebb tide. These considerations unquestionably have a great influence in recommending the neighbourhood of Suez as the scene of the passage, rather than any more southern point, where the greater depths of the sea did not so easily admit of their being dried up by natural causes. Should the passage however really have taken place at Suez, the locality must have undergone great geological changes since that remarkable occurrence, for at present the Red Sea at this point does not at all conform to the conditions of the case as laid down in the history. Robinson indeed allows that anciently this arm of the gulf was both wider and deeper; but when a width and depth are found which will correspond with the biblical narrative, the question may be regarded as settled so far as concerns the miraculous character of the transaction.

The passage of the Red Sea by the Israelites, with the destruction of their pursuers, completed the victory of Jehovah, which was celebrated in Moses' song of thanksgiving and triumph, Ex. xv. The more immediate result with respect to the Israelites themselves was, that "Israel saw that great work which the Lord did upon the Egyptians, and the people feared the Lord, and believed the Lord and his servant Moses," Ex. xiv. 31. It was not, as already observed, to secure any mere secular deliverance or political privileges for the enthralled seed of Abraham, that Jehovah engaged in that struggle with Pharaoh, the conclusion of which is here recorded. Its object was more in accordance with the nature of the covenant in which it was first announced, Ge. xv. 14, and of the whole volume in which it is recorded, Ex. ix. 16; Ro. ix. 17. Nor was it with Pharaoh in his individual capacity, or yet as simply ruler of Egypt, but rather as the representative of the world-power, or heathenism, that this controversy was waged, and for the express purpose of morally and spiritually emancipating the covenant-people from that heathenism into which they had so deeply sunk in the land of their sojourning. The form which the controversy assumed was determined by the circumstances of that particular epoch in the evolution of the divine scheme. But while it had thus a special aspect as regards the time and the conditions then present, it had still an aspect to the future; and so it was that the last of this great and significant series of plagues—the death of the first-born of the Egyptians—led to the institution of the passover and the dedication of the first-born of the Israelites, as representing the whole community, to the Lord their Redeemer, Nu. iii. 13. [D. M.]

EXODUS, THE BOOK OF. I. Name and Contents.—The second book of the Pentateuch is in Hebrew named as usual from its first terms, שְׁמוֹת (We-Elle Shemoth), or simply שְׁמוֹת (Shemoth)—"And these are the names," or "Names;" but by the LXX. Ἐξοδος, or departure, viz. from Egypt, because of the principal event with which it is occupied, and which constituted the very birth of the Israelitish nation as the chosen covenant-people of Jehovah.

The contents of Exodus, though not embracing such a variety of incidents as Genesis, are of a more diversified character, being not merely historical, but also and in a greater part legislative, or concerned with instructions having all the authority of law, for the erection and arrangements of the Levitical tabernacle or sanctuary—the visible centre of the theocratic life. The subject-matter arranged according to historical order forms three divisions, marked by the change of scene in and from Egypt through the Arabian desert to Mount Sinai.

1. The condition of Israel in Egypt, and the preparations for their departure thence, ch. i.—xii. 36; viz. The rapid increase of Jacob's descendants gave occasion to their oppression by the Egyptian government, ch. i.; the birth and remarkable preservation of Moses, ch. ii. 1-10; his flight to and settlement in Arabia, ch. ii. 11-22; his divine commission to liberate his brethren, ch. iii. 1-14; his journey to Egypt, and the infliction of the first nine plagues, ch. iv. 29-x. 29; preparation for the exodus; institution of the passover, and the conclusion of the plagues, ch. xi.—xii. 36.

2. Israel's march from Rameses to Mount Sinai, ch. xii. 37-xix. 2; viz. The exodus, ch. xii. 37-42; specific directions regarding the passover and the consecration of the Israelitish first-born to Jehovah, ch. xiii. 43-xiii. 16; the line of march; the pursuit by the Egyptians and their destruction, ch. xiii. 17-xiv.; Moses' song of thanksgiving for deliverance from the Egyptians, ch. xv. 1-21; continuation of the journey from the Red Sea to Sinai, ch. xv. 22-xix. 2.

3. Israel's abode in the desert, and the promulgation of the Sinaitic law, ch. xix. 3-xi.; viz. Preparations for the establishment of the theocratic covenant by the designation of Israel to be a peculiar possession of Jehovah and a kingdom of priests, ch. xix. 3-25; promulgation of the moral law, ch. xx.; other fundamental ordinances chiefly of a judicial character, ch. xxi.—xxiii.; ratification of the covenant, xxiv. 1-11; directions for the construction of a sanctuary on Moses receiving the tables of the law, ch. xxiv. 12-xxxv. 18; Israel's apostasy and their restoration to divine favour through Moses' intercession, ch. xxxii.—xxxiv.; the people's offerings for and the construction of the sanctuary, ch. xxxv.—xl.

II. Relation of the History to that of Genesis.—The close literary connection between the books of Genesis and Exodus is clearly marked by the Hebrew conjunctive particle , (and), "and," with which the latter begins, and still more by the recapitulation of the names of Jacob's sons who accompanied him to Egypt, abridged from the fuller account in Ge. xli. 8–17. Still the book of Exodus is not a continuation in strict chronological sequence of the preceding history; for a very considerable interval is passed over in silence, saving only the remark: "And the children of Israel were fruitful and increased abundantly, and multiplied, and waxed exceeding mighty; and the land was filled with them," Ex. i. 7. The pretermission of all that concerned Israel during this period and their intercourse with the Egyptians, instead of being an indication, as rationalists allege, of the fragmentary character of the Pentateuch, only shows the sacred purpose of the history, and that in the plan of the writer, considerations of a merely political interest were entirely subordinate to the divine intentions already partially unfolded in Genesis, and to be still further developed in the course of the present narrative, regarding the national constitution of the seed of Abraham. The importance of the solitary remark introduced relative to the extraordinary increase of the Israelites, arises from its being viewed as the first step towards the realization of the promises made to Abraham of a numerous progeny and of territorial possessions for his seed, Ge. xii. 15–17. The observation was also necessary as explanatory of the oppressive measures resorted to by the Egyptian monarch for checking Israel's rapid increase, but which, by a remarkable providence, secured a fitting education for the future deliverer and lawgiver of this oppressed people, Ex. ii. 10; comp. Ac. vii. 21, 22.

The formal diversity of the subject, arising from the gradual and at this stage distinctly marked evolution of the divine purposes concerning Israel, gives to the book of Exodus a distinct character from Genesis. The deliverance from Egypt was the commencement of Israel's political existence, and this constituted the first important epoch in the history of Abraham's seed as distinct from that of the individual patriarchs, and the merely personal and family relation. In the history of Jacob the individual had as regards the promises been developed into the family. There was no longer that excision from the stem of blessing so noticeable hitherto in the case of the immediate offspring both of Abraham and Isaac. And the family again in time grew into a population in Egypt possessed of some measure of independence and self-government, as appears from the mention, even after their sorest oppression, of "elders" of Israel, Ex. iii. 16; iv. 29; the heads and representatives of tribes and families. While then the history of Genesis is chiefly personal history or biographic sketches, that of Exodus, on the contrary, is almost entirely of a public or national character, the only exception being with regard to the deliverer himself, whom God so remarkably raised up and endowed for the work intrusted to him; but even his personal history is introduced only so far as it served to illustrate that providence which watched over Israel, Ex. ii. 1–22; iii. 1. The genealogy, too, of Moses and Aaron is subsequently introduced, ch. vi. 16–26; and inasmuch as the brothers belonged to the tribe of Levi, the third son of Jacob, this is preceded by a succinct genealogy of the two elder sons, Reuben and Simeon, ver. 14, 15. This genealogy of Moses and Aaron had, however, chiefly in view the prospective establishment of the priesthood in the family of the latter.

The circumstance adverted to, however, gives to the book of Exodus seemingly a more exclusive character as occupied with the interests of one community, and with external matters of a social and political character which many deem unworthy of divine revelation. Objections of this kind overlook the special points of relation between this book and Genesis; one in particular of which is, that its history is a record of the accomplishment to a certain extent of the promises and predictions contained in Genesis. This has been already noticed with respect to the opening statement of Exodus as to the multiplication of the people in Egypt; but the same principle may be seen to pervade the whole book, giving a particular form or complexion as well to its legislative enactments as to its historical narration. Besides the intimations to Abraham of a numerous posterity, it was announced to him that they should be afflicted in a strange country, whence they should be delivered in the fourth generation with great substance—the effect of a divine judgment upon their oppressors, Ge. xv. 13–16. This was realized at the exodus, when "all the hosts of the Lord went out from the land of Egypt," Ex. xii. 41; even the very time of the deliverance corresponding, as the historian's remark bears, to the prophetic announcement. A land also had been prophetically assigned to the ransomed nation, and accordingly that part of the history immediately following their deliverance from Egypt shows them on their march towards it. But the multiplication of Israel in Egypt, their deliverance thence, and their being put into possession of the Promised Land, were only means to the end expressed in the intimation that they should be blessed in themselves and prove a blessing to others, Ge. xii. 2, 3. Their deliverance from Egypt was in order to their entrance upon the service of the Lord, Ex. iv. 23; they were his "hosts," ch. xii. 41; called to some specific work or warfare in connection with the divine purposes, the nature of which had been already declared in the call of Abraham and the covenant made with that patriarch, and to be more fully intimated in the Sinaitic covenant.

Two conditions indispensable to Israel's fulfilling the purposes involved in their calling, were, first, that as a people they should be sufficiently numerous to occupy the land provided for them; and, secondly, that they should be possessed of a character fitting them for the discharge of the offices arising from this occupancy. For securing the first of these conditions there was required time, during which Israel should be kept in a state of isolation from the nations of the earth, among whom, without some extraordinary protection, they would certainly be lost, either by commingling or through violence—a fate which Jacob greatly feared after the massacre of the Shechemite, Ge. xxxiv. 26. Watched over however by a divine providence, the seventy souls which went down with Jacob into Egypt soon increased to such a multitude as to occasion apprehensions to the government under which they lived; the effect of which was that measures were resorted to which served to unite more strongly their family and national associations, and wean them from the land of their sojourning, while this numerical increase more directly fitted them for taking possession of their own land. The multiplication of Israel, and their preservation as a distinct and separate people, were admirably secured by their removal to Egypt under the circumstances attendant on their migration thither, and by their seclusion in the land of Goshen. The haughtiness which in general distinguished the natives of Egypt, and particularly the contempt with which they regarded foreigners, especially those engaged like the Israelites in pastoral avocations, Ge. xlv. 34, must have acted as a social hedge about the covenant-people. So great was the estrangement between the Israelites and the Egyptians, induced by these and other causes, that in two distinct passages in the Psalms, Ps. lxxxv. 6; cxlv. 1, the language of Egypt is represented, notwithstanding their long residence in that country, as unintelligible to the Israelites. But another condition in this case was that Israel must acquire a suitable moral character. However adapted Egypt may have been as a nursery for the multiplication of the seed of Abraham, or the physical and intellectual growth of any ordinary community, it was unquestionably a very inadequate school for moral and spiritual discipline and for advancement in theocratic principles. So far from supplying incentives to such training, the very prosperity which attended the early part of their sojourn in Egypt under the protection of Joseph, may have served to make the Israelites almost forget the Land of Promise, and caused a contentment with their condition which it required severe oppression to overcome, while no doubt the sensuous worship around them would well nigh obliterate the faith and practice of their pilgrim fathers. Hence obviously the necessity for their subjection to the coercive measures exercised over them, though with quite another view, by the Egyptian government, the result of which however was, that they were made to cry to the Lord by reason of their bondage, Ex. ii. 23, and rendered favourably disposed to the message brought to them by Moses from the Lord God of their fathers, Ex. iii. 15; comp. ch. iv. 2. The earlier proffered interposition of Moses on their behalf was found to be premature; neither the people nor their self-constituted leader was yet sufficiently trained for the service to which they were respectively to be called. And even when, after a long course of discipline, they left Egypt, there was still much needed for preparing the Israelites for their vocation. The wilderness, where Moses himself had been trained for his work, ch. iii. 12, must furnish also to the people the discipline so inadequately provided in Egypt. Accordingly arrangements were made from the very first for their temporary sojourn there, ch. iii. 12; xiii. 17; while through their obstinacy and unbelief there was subsequently occasion for its being greatly protracted. The preparation of Israel in the wilderness must be more however than a merely negative one; and hence the peculiar institutions under which they were now to be brought.

The ends to be answered by the sojourn of the Israelites in Egypt and in the wilderness, may thus be seen to be in fulfilment of the promises made to the fathers—arrangements, moreover, betokening the nicest adaptation of means to ends. Read with the commentary furnished by the history of Exodus, the book of Genesis acquires a new light; a special providence is seen holding all the threads of primeval and patriarchal life and weaving them into one grand tissue. Even matters which, at the time of their occurrence, appeared only as calamities, giving rise to such painful feelings as once found utterance in the complaint of Jacob, Ge. xlii. 34, are seen to be parts of a gracious administration. Jacob no doubt, like his son Joseph, was brought to discern this; but the divine purposes which the latter discovered in his own eventful experience, Ge. xlv. 7, are, by the further history of Exodus, placed in a still more striking light. And on the other hand, the history of Exodus, when taken along with the great principles announced in Genesis, assumes at once its true character and importance. It no longer appears confined to the manumission of an enslaved people and their formation into a free community, or to their civil and other temporal concerns, but is seen to embrace the spiritual interests, not simply of that community, but of mankind through them. Even more expressly than that of Genesis is the history of Exodus typical of the future.

III. Character of its Legislation.—The purposes for which Israel were set apart are stated in Ex. xix. 4-6. They were intended to constitute unto God "a peculiar treasure above (out of or from among) all people," which is explained by their forming to him "a kingdom of priests and a holy nation." A kingdom implies a king; this must be Jehovah himself; for as all the subjects are priests, the king can only be God, who assumes over Israel sovereign rights and duties, including the supreme legislation, the ordinances which govern the community and regulate their foreign connections. The object of this arrangement appears from the nature of the kingdom—"a kingdom of priests"—sustaining a mediatorial relation between God and the nations of the earth, as declared already in the promises to Abraham. For this purpose Israel is and must be "a holy nation"—set apart from the world to God, who is the absolute Holy One. Holiness was a primary requisite in the covenant-people, Le. xix. 2, and to secure it was the great end of all the theocratic ordinances and arrangements. It is this which imparts its peculiar character to the Sinaitic legislation.

This legislation, which included civil as well as religious ordinances, opened with the promulgation of the moral law comprised in the decalogue, which was thus made the basis of Israel's peculiar constitution and polity. This fact clearly intimated that the civil and political exigencies of the people were not the only or even the chief object aimed at by the theocratic constitution. The Sinaitic legislation, though primarily intended to carry out the external separation of Israel, already to a certain extent effected by the providential arrangements of their history, and to be further completed by their subsequent location in Canaan, and also to secure their national existence through the operation of social and civil ordinances of an equitable and conservative character, ultimately aimed at their moral and spiritual training as the covenant-people, and also served to exhibit the truths implied in that peculiar relation of a people to Jehovah.

There was this remarkable peculiarity in the Mosaic legislation, that the religious enactments had a civil or judicial sanction, while the civil bore also a religious character. Transgression of a religious command was an offence against the state, and contempt of a civil ordinance came under the character of sin. This arose from the circumstance that the proper Head of the community was God and King in one person; God revealing himself and acting as Israel's king, and the king revealing himself and acting as God. This principle, however strange to, and indeed incompatible with, ordinary legislation, was indispensable to the purposes of the theocracy, immediately and directly intended as it was to build up a community, numerous indeed, but of recent growth, and which, instead of enjoying the blessings of freedom, had been long subjected to all the deteriorating influences of a crushing slavery—a community that was to be at once peculiarly blessed itself, and made the channel of exercising a blessed influence on mankind. But while the civil laws and ordinances, as well as those of a more religious character, given to Israel, were immediately intended for the condition of things attendant on the present wants of the people, they had still a typical or spiritual aspect and a reference to the future. Several of these enactments exhibited in practice great principles of government, which, however they may vary in form according to the peculiar circumstances of a people, are essentially of universal application in promoting the great end of God with respect to man. It is because all these ordinances were variously operating for the same ends, that it is difficult to draw a rigid distinction between what is strictly civil and the sacred or ceremonial in the Mosaic system. Even the properly moral, though essentially distinct, does not occupy a place apart from and independent of the rest. On the contrary, the various enactments form one complex whole, having one basis—the covenant into which God entered with his people, and one object—the realizing of the provisions of the covenant; and hence the terms in which the law is spoken of in the New Testament, so various and apparently contradictory, but only so from disregarding the aspect in which it is viewed.

These considerations serve to vindicate the large space and the great importance given, in what purports to be a revelation from God, to matters of a direct civil character, and seemingly to such unimportant details as the specifications for the structure and furnishings of the tabernacle; all of which in other circumstances, and with no ulterior object beyond the mere regulation of the affairs of a community, might have been left to be supplied by the ordinary methods of administration, without requiring to be established under divine sanction. The whole matter, however, assumes a different aspect when the ordinances, even the most seemingly trivial, are found to be, like the history in which they are inclosed, fraught with great principles of eternal truth.

IV. Genuineness and Credibility.—The “document-hypothesis,” which with the view of disproving the unity, and consequently the genuineness, of the Pentateuch, has been so largely applied to the book of Genesis, is, on the admission of these critics themselves, incapable of producing such decided results in the case of Exodus, inasmuch as the distinguishing mark of the theory—the interchange of the divine names—ceases to be such after Ex. iii., when it is alleged the name Jehovah was first introduced. However, from some supposed diversities in the character of the legislation, some places indicating a priestly bias, and others more the features of the prophetic order, and from various alleged contradictions in the narrative, some substitute is found in support of the disintegrating criticism. Some particulars, for instance, in the account of the commission given to Moses for the deliverance of his brethren, present to Knobel—a quite recent writer on this book—such discrepancies as should have led him to suspect the soundness of his own theory, rather than refer them to the contradictory accounts of writers so related as his scheme assumes. A bare statement of some of these discrepancies will show that they have no reality, and serve as a sufficient refutation of the theory to which they owe their origin. Thus it is alleged that the place, according to the original narrative, where God first appeared to Moses was Egypt; God making himself known as Jehovah, that being the first intimation of the name, Ex. vi. 2. Another account, it is further alleged, places the scene at Horeb, ch. iii. 2, God appearing as the God of the patriarchs, ver. 4, and declaring his name Jehovah, ver. 14; while a third makes Midian the scene of the interview, ch. iv. 10. These assumptions require no refutation. It need only be remarked that the name Jehovah in ch. vi. 2 necessarily presupposes the explanation given of it in ch. iii. 14. Further, Moses' abode in Midian, and connection with Jethro, were matters, Knobel affirms, quite unknown to the older writer, while his statement that Moses was eighty years old when he appeared before Pharaoh, ch. vii. 7, is declared irreconcilable with the supplementary narrative which represents him as a young man at the time of his flight from Egypt, ch. ii. 11, and a son by Zipporah, whom he married probably on his arrival in Midian, is still young when he returned to Egypt, ch. iv. 20, 25; xviii. 2. There can be no question that from Moses' leaving Egypt till his return thither a considerable time elapsed. It is stated in Ex. ii. 23 as “many days,” and by Stephen, Ac. vii. 30, as forty years. But it is not necessary to suppose that his abode in Midian extended over the whole of that period. The expression שָׁבַט (savyeshev), “he sat down,” or settled, Ex. ii. 15, may only point to Midian as the end of his wanderings; or if otherwise, his marriage need not have followed immediately on his arrival, or there may have been a considerable interval between the birth of his two sons. The silence indeed of this part of the narrative regarding the birth of the second son may possibly be referable to this circumstance, more probably indicated however by the different feelings of the father as expressed in the names Gershom and Eliezer, ch. ii. 22; xviii. 4. The order of these names is perplexing to expositors who conceive that the first thoughts of the fugitive would have been thankfulness for his safety, and that only afterwards would spring up the feelings of exile. But if the name Eliezer was bestowed in connection with the preparation to return to Egypt, and particularly with the intimation “all the men are dead which sought thy life,” ch. iv. 10, the whole is strikingly consistent. Another instance of the alleged discrepancies is that, according to one account, Moses' reception from his brethren was very discouraging, ch. vi. 9; whereas the other narrative describes it as quite the reverse, ch. iv. 31. De Wette calls this a striking contradiction; but it is only such when the intermediate section, ch. v. 10-23, which shows the change that in the interval had occurred in the prospects of the Israelites, is violently ejected from the narrative—a process fitted to produce contradictions in any composition.

The only alleged anachronism of importance in this book is the remark relative to the continuance of the manna, ch. xvi. 35, which would seem to extend it beyond the time of Moses, particularly when compared with Jos. v. 11, 12, according to which the manna ceased not until after the passage of the Jordan. But, as remarked by Hengstenberg, it is not of the cessation of the manna that the historian here writes, but of its continuance. Besides, "forty years" must be taken as a round number: for the manna, strictly speaking, lasted about one month less, ch. xvi. 1. On the other hand, so far from furnishing evidence of a later date, this and the later books of the Pentateuch exhibit even more than Genesis the most marked traces of having been written in the wilderness after the departure from Egypt, and by one who was an eye-witness of, and a chief agent in the matters recorded; in other words, no other than the lawgiver himself. (See PENTATEUCH.) Further, there are in these circumstances, as indicating a case of contemporaneous history, additional evidences of the credibility of the narrative. As in the book of Genesis, there is the same intimate acquaintance with Egypt, where the scene of the history opens, and not less so with the Arabian desert, to which it is afterwards transferred. But a more direct testimony than the monuments of Egypt are the Hebrew monuments themselves, commemorative of the exodus and its concomitants. These monuments, though not of a material character, were as permanent as, and still more expressive than, some of the most solid structures erected to commemorate the great events in a nation's history. The regular observance of commemorative ordinances by the whole Israelitish community, particularly when conjoined with the oral instruction which parents were directed to impart on such occasions to their children, De. vi. 20, &c. was pre-eminently of this description. Of these standing ordinances the most important was unquestionably the passover, instituted as a memorial of the exodus, and the very birth of the nation, Ex. xii. 23, 27. There were other commemorative ordinances, but the next perhaps in importance to the passover was the feast of tabernacles, a memorial of the sojourn in the wilderness, La. xliii. 42, 43. Could any monuments better subservise the purpose contemplated than these annual celebrations and reunions of tribes and families at the national sanctuary—the centre of all authority, civil and sacred? Nothing indeed could have been better adapted for the conservation of the national unity and traditions, and for perpetuating the remembrance of the great incidents in the nation's history.

V. Chronology.—The chief point of difficulty in connection with the notes of time contained in this book is the period assigned, Ex. xii. 40, as that of the sojourn of Israel in Egypt; but with regard to this, see the article CHRONOLOGY. The whole period embraced in the book itself can only be approximately determined. On the supposition made in the article referred to, that Levi was three years older than Joseph, he must have outlived the latter 24 years, Ge. i. 22, 24, comp. with Ex. vi. 16, and that Jochebed was 45 at the birth of Moses, and supposing she had been born even in the last year of her father Levi, the utmost limit between the death of Joseph and Moses' birth would thus be 69 years. From the birth of Moses to the departure from Egypt there were 80 years, with the additional time spent in treating with Pharaoh; and from the exodus to the erection of the tabernacle 1 year, in all about 150 years as the period comprised in this book.

Literature.—In addition to the works embracing the whole or greater part of the Pentateuch, the following are the more important on Exodus:—Lippmannus, Catena in Exodum ex autoribus ecclesiasticis (Paris, 1550; Lugd. 1657); Pererius (Soc. Jes.), Disputationes in Exodum (Ingolst. 1601); Willet, Hexapla, or Sixfold Commentarie upon Exodus (Lond. 1608); Rivet, Commentarii in Exodum, opera i. (Rotterd. 1651); Hartama, Commentarius in sacrum librum Exodum (Franc. 1771); Bush, Notes, Critical and Practical, on the Book of Exodus (New York, 1841); Kalisch, Historical and Critical Commentary on the Old Testament—Exodus (Lond. 1855); Knobel, Die Bücher Exodus und Leviticus erklärt (Leip. 1857).] [D. M.]

EXORCISM, the formal ejection of evil spirits from the subjects possessed by them; and the persons who claimed or exercised the power of doing so were called EXORCISTS. Among the heathen the professed exercise of such a power was connected with incantations and magical arts of various kinds; and it would appear that among the Jews of the apostolic age, it was sometimes found in a similar connection. The Jewish exorcists mentioned in Ac. xix. 13, were evidently pretenders of that description—"vagabond Jews," as they are called, "who took upon them to call over those who had evil spirits, the name of the Lord Jesus"—trading upon a profession they had no right to make, and receiving the due reward of their hypocrisy. Josephus records instances of a similar kind, and speaks of the roots and names used for expelling the evil spirits (Ant. viii. 2, 5; Wars, vii. 4, 3). Other cases, however, are noticed, in which the power of exorcising seems to have been more legitimately put forth, and to have been attended with the desired result. When charged by the Pharisees with casting out devils by Beelzebub, our Lord asked them, by whom, then, did their own sons cast them out? Mat. xii. 27—implying that such a power, though probably restrained within very narrow limits, and dependent on special acts of fasting and prayer, was in actual operation. A case is also mentioned in which Christ granted it to a person, who, for some reason unexplained, stood aloof from the company of his disciples, La. ix. 49. But such were to be regarded as somewhat exceptional and peculiar cases; and it is only in Christ himself, and his immediate disciples, that the power discovered itself in its proper vigour. (See DEMONIACS.)

In process of time (towards the end of the third century) an order of exorcists was established in the Christian church, which contributed materially to promote the growth of superstition, and led to much fraud and imposture. The practice also of a form of exorcism was introduced into the administration of baptism, on the ground, that as every one previous to baptism was in bondage to the devil, so he must at baptism be formally released from the evil spirit, and be made to receive the good. The priest therefore was instructed to breathe thrice upon the face of the subject of baptism, and to say, Depart from him, foul spirit, and give place to the Holy Spirit, the Paraclete. Then followed another breathing upon the face, with the words, Receive the Holy Spirit through this same breathing and the blessing of God. The order still stands so in the Latin ritual. The Lutherans adopted substantially the same practice, and it continued for long to be a characteristic badge of the Lutheran, as contradistinguished from the Calvinistic or Reformed church. But eminent Lutheran theologians began to treat it as a matter of indifference, and it ultimately fell into general disuse.

EYES, OR EYELIDS, PAINTING OF THE. This is an ancient oriental practice, which was known to the Hebrews, and is occasionally referred to in Scripture. Jezebel is spoken of as "painting her eyes" (not face, as in the English version) before she presented herself in public, 2 Ki. ix. 30; and the painting of the eyes, or, as Jeremiah puts it, renting the eyes with painting, is mentioned among the things by which women sought to win admiration of their persons, Je. iv. 30; Eze. xxiii. 40. It is one of those practices which, however peculiar and confined to particular localities, have yet succeeded in maintaining through all vicissitudes their hold to the present time. The modern Egyptian females still retain the use of dyeing materials for their eyes. Speaking of the general beauty of their eyes, Mr. Lane says, "Their charming effect is much heightened by the concealment of the other features (however pleasing the latter may be), and is rendered still more striking by a practice, universal among the females of the higher and middle classes, and very common among those of the lower orders, which is blackening the edge of the eyelids, both above and below the eyes, with a black powder called kohl. This is a collyrium, commonly composed of the smoke-black which is produced by burning a kind of liban—an aromatic resin—a species of frankincense, used, I am told, in preference to the better kind of frankincense, as being cheaper and equally good for this purpose.

the edges of the eyelids. The kohl is applied with a small probe of wood, ivory, or silver, tapering towards the end but blunt: this is moistened sometimes with rose-water, then dipped in the powder, and drawn along the edges of the eyelids; it is called mirwed, and the glass vessel in which the kohl is kept mut-huak.

"The custom of thus ornamenting the eyes prevailed among both sexes in Egypt in very ancient times: this is shown by the sculptures and paintings in the temples and tombs of this country; and kohl-vessels, with the probes, and even with the remains of the black powder, have often been found in the ancient tombs.

"But in many cases the ancient mode of ornamenting with the kohl was a little different from the modern, as shown by the subjoined sketch; I have, however, seen this ancient mode practised in the present day in the neighbourhood of Cairo, though I only remember to have noticed it in two instances. The same custom," he adds, "existed among the ancient Greek ladies, and among the Jewish women in early times" (Modern Egyptians, vol. i. ch. 1; see also Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, vol. iii. p. 382).

EZEKIEL [God shall strengthen], one of the three greater Jewish prophets, and the prophet more especially of the captivity. We know nothing of him except in connection with his prophetic agency—the only scriptural notices of his life, and the only certain information respecting it, which we possess, being found in the different headings of his own prophecies. From these we learn that he was a priest, the son of Buzi, and that he entered on his calling as a prophet by the river Chebar, or Chaboras, in the fifth year of Jehoiachin's captivity, ch. i. 1, which, by comparing another passage, we perceive to have been that also of his own, ch. xxxiii. 21. Josephus furnishes the additional testimony from tradition, that he was a young man at the period of his captivity. What his precise age may have been, however, cannot be certainly determined—unless another date given for the commencement of his prophetic career be understood of his own period of life. He says it was "in the thirtieth year" that the word of the Lord first came to him; and if by this were meant the thirtieth year of his life, then having been already five years a captive, his captivity must have commenced when he was twenty-five years of age. But it has been doubted, and indeed by later commentators most commonly disbelieved, that the date in question refers to his age as a man, on the ground, more especially, of its being unusual for the prophets to connect their predictions with the time of life at which they were uttered, and of the quite general manner in which the year in question is mentioned. This last reason, however, seems to apply equally to any other era that can be thought of, as is evident from the diversity that appears among commentators in regard to the one that should be preferred. Some would date the thirty years from the eighteenth of Josiah, when with the finding of the book of the law in the temple a kind of public reformation began; so the Chaldee, Jerome, Theodoret, Grotius, Hävernick, &c. Others would connect it with the Nabopolassarian era, which was coeval with the reign of Nebuchadnezzar's father, or the Chaldean dynasty; so Pradus, Scaliger, Peri-

Kohl is also prepared of the smoke-black produced by burning the shells of almonds. These two kinds, though believed to be beneficial to the eyes, are used merely for ornament; but there are several kinds used for their real or supposed medical properties; particularly the powder of several kinds of lead-ore; to which are often

zonius, Michaelis, Rosenmüller, Ewald. But neither of these events stands out so prominently, or had so distinct a bearing on God's future communications to his people, than on the bare mention in them of a certain year any one should have thought of specifically connecting it with the one or the other. Nothing similar to this can be pointed to in any of the other prophetic writings. And though it be true that it was not usual to mention the particular year of a prophet's life when he received divine communications, yet it is not quite unusual to connect them with the relative age of the prophet; as in the case of the young child Samuel, the stripling Daniel, the aged Simeon and Anna, 1 Sa. iii.; Da. ii.; Lu. ii. 25-33. If Ezekiel, therefore, had here indicated the precise period of his life at which he entered on his prophetic calling, it would only have been going a little farther in the same direction, than was followed in other instances.

Besides, the case of Ezekiel was somewhat peculiar; and in that peculiarity we may perhaps find an intelligible reason why he should have notified the thirtieth year, as that on which he began to see the visions of God. It is as "Ezekiel the priest," ch. i. 3, that he reports himself to have seen these; and as the Levites, so by inference the priests, were wont to enter on their duty of service at the temple in their thirtieth year. Now, as in the absence of the temple at Jerusalem, the Lord promised that he should himself be a sanctuary to the believing portion of the exiles on the banks of the Chebar, ch. xi. 16, so Ezekiel, by means of his supernatural revelations, was to be in the room of the ministering priesthood. At his mouth they were to seek the law of the Lord; and if they did so, would find God even nearer to them, than they should have done amid the corruptions of the temple-service at Jerusalem. "It seems, therefore, to have been the intention of the prophet, by designating himself so expressly a priest, and a priest that had reached his thirtieth year, to represent his prophetic agency to his exiled countrymen as a kind of priestly service, to which he was divinely called at the usual period of life. And then the opening vision, which revealed a present God enthroned above the cherubim, came as the formal institution of that ideal temple, in connection with which he was to minister in things pertaining to the kingdom of God. It seems chiefly from overlooking this distinctive character and design of Ezekiel's agency as a prophet, that the difficulty respecting the thirtieth year has been experienced. The prophet wished to mark at the outset the priestly relation in which he stood both to God and to the people. And thus also the end corresponds with the beginning; for it is as a priest delineating the rise of a new and more glorious temple, that he chiefly unfolds the prospect of a revived and flourishing condition to the remnant of spiritual worshippers among whom he laboured" (Fairbairn's Ezekiel, p. 26; see also Hengstenberg's Christology, iii. p. 1).

It seems, then, every way probable, that Ezekiel was twenty-five years old when he was carried captive, along with Jehoiachin and multitudes of his countrymen, to the territory of Babylon, and that at the age of thirty he was by the call and revelations of God raised from a priest to a prophet, but a prophet that he might thereby do priestly service. How long he continued in the discharge of this high service we cannot precisely tell; but one of his later prophecies is dated in the twenty-seventh year of his captivity, ch. xxx. 17, which presents him to our view as active in the discharge of his prophetic function when turned of fifty. But this was probably not the latest of his communications; several prophecies, at least, are given after it, and probably in part came later, containing the messages of comfort and consolation he had to address to the covenant-people after the desolation of Jerusalem. Over how many years these later revelations may have been spread we cannot tell; nor is the interval varied by the relation of any incidents in his history. So that the later as well as the earlier period of his career is alike shrouded in obscurity.

Far removed as Ezekiel was from the land of his birth, and plying in his new sphere of action a kind of independent agency, he yet stood in a close relation to the remnant that was still left in Judea, and even to the prophetic ministry exercised there by Jeremiah. Portions of his writings cannot be properly understood without bearing this in mind. One of the reigning delusions about the time when Ezekiel began his public ministry, both at Jerusalem and on the banks of the Chebar, was that the calamities which had come upon the house of David and the people of Judah would soon come to an end, and that not only would Jerusalem be spared, but that those who had already gone from it into captivity should shortly be allowed to return. False prophets encouraged this delusion in Judea, and they did not want their associates among the exiled community on the Chebar. Jeremiah strove to dissipate it; and in doing so, is particularly noticed as having sent a letter to the exiles in Babylonia, in which he warned them against believing the false prophets who held out flattering hopes of their speedy and certain return to Judea, assured them that there should be no return till the period of seventy years had been accomplished in their captivity, and exhorted them to submit themselves to the hand of God, and to seek him with all their hearts, ch. xxx. It was in the fourth year of Zedekiah's reign, which coincided with that of Jehoiachin's captivity, that this letter was sent; and so contrary was its tenor to the spirit of the captives who received it, that one of them wrote back to the high-priest in Jerusalem, complaining in the strongest terms of its statements, and even that such an one as Jeremiah should be allowed to go at large, Je. xxx. 21-23. It was this state of things, and these transactions in particular, which formed the immediate occasion of Ezekiel's call to the prophetic office. Hence it took place very shortly after, in the fifth year of the captivity, and the record of it commences somewhat after the fashion of an interrupted narrative, with the historical formula, "And it came to pass," &c. On this account, also, the whole of the earlier part of his prophecies, to the close of ch. xxiv., is predominantly of a severe, criminal, and threatening character, having for its main object the exposure of the hypocrisies and delusions which reigned alike in Jerusalem and Chaldea, and the announcement of the yet greater judgments and desolations which were to be sent upon the land of the covenant, and through which alone the path lay to a brighter future.

In this part of his prophetic writings and labours Ezekiel appears as an energetic, earnest, spiritually-devoted man, wrestling with the evils of the time, and more intent on vindicating the righteousness of God than hopeful of meanwhile prevailing against the tide of human apostasy. A darker night, he well foresaw, must come before the break of a new day. But such a day he also from the first descried, and frequently, throughout this gloomier portion of his writings, gives distinct intimation of the good that was in store for the covenant-people, for example, ch. i. 26; xi. 16, seq.; xvii. 22-24, &c. When the worst actually came, and everything in which they trusted was at last laid in ruin, with equal earnestness Ezekiel turned his energies into the new direction in which they were now required, and by his nobly-reliant faith, and life-like exhibitions of the mercy and grace yet to be revealed, he rallied the scattered forces of the covenant, and mightily strengthened them to encourage themselves in God. In both respects he proved a true Ezekiel, himself strengthened by God, and in turn strengthening others; "a man," as justly described by Hengstenberg, "who lifted up his voice like a trumpet, and declared to Israel their sins; whose word fell like a hammer upon all the pleasant dreams and projects in which they had indulged, and ground them to powder; whose whole appearance furnished the strongest proof that the Lord was still among his people; who was himself a temple of the Lord, before whom the so-called temple at Jerusalem, which was still allowed to stand for a season, sunk into its proper nonentity—a spiritual Samson, who grasped with his powerful arm the pillars of the idol temple and cast them to the ground—a strong gigantic nature, fitted on that very account to struggle successfully against the Babylonish spirit of the age, which revelled in such things as were strong, gigantic, and grotesque—standing alone, yet equal to a hundred pupils from the schools of the prophets" (Christology, ii. 3).

The writings of Ezekiel contain undoubted evidence that his spiritual labours were not in vain. The people who had the more immediate benefit of them were indeed in a degenerate state; they are described as a rebellious people, among whom he should have to dwell as among thorns and scorpions, ch. ii. 6, 7; yet there were better elements intermixing with the evil, and a pointed contrast is even drawn by Jeremiah between them and those who still remained in Jerusalem, ch. xxiv. In proof of this the elders of the community often appear before Ezekiel, waiting to hear what communication he had received from the Lord, ch. viii. 1; xx. 1. And by the time of the release from Babylon, which could scarcely be more than twenty-five or thirty years after the close of his labours, and no doubt in a good degree owing to the character and success of these, a greatly improved spirit discovered itself in the remnant that came back, and the Jews generally of the dispersion now took a marked rise in their spiritual position. From that time they became less dependent upon the ceremonialism of the temple and its ritual services, and approached nearer to the condition of a people worshipping God in spirit. The conviction grew upon their minds that God could be acceptably served in any land, and that his law could be maintained in its substance while many of its forms had to fall into abeyance. This freer spirit, forming, as it did, an internal development of Judaism, and an important preparation for the dispensation of the gospel, required the impulse and sanction of divinely inspired men for its commencement. It found such partly in Daniel and his circle, who, in the very midst of heathen abominations, adhered steadfastly to the belief and worship of Jehovah; but in Ezekiel, at once a priest and a prophet, it had its more distinct institution as a new phase in the kingdom of God. More than any other individual he may be regarded as the founder of the synagogal worship, which so materially modified that of the temple, and proved of incalculable moment in respect to the maintenance and propagation of the true knowledge of God.

The writings of Ezekiel fall quite naturally into two great divisions, the first being chiefly conversant with sin and judgment, primarily as connected with the covenant-people, but including also, in several most characteristic discourses, the state and doom of the surrounding nations, ch. i.—xxxii.; the second disclosing in a series of revelations the purpose of mercy, which was yet destined to be fulfilled in behalf of the people of God, and the state of ultimate perfection to which the divine kingdom should be raised, ch. xxxiii.—xlvi. When looked into more closely, they fall into various smaller divisions, which are most naturally formed by the headings written by the prophet himself, and indicating the respective periods of the successive revelations. These are altogether eight, and they appear for the most part to have been arranged in the order of time. The closing series, however, occupying the last nine chapters, and embracing the vision of the temple, was in point of time earlier than at least one of the preceding revelations—that recorded in ch. xxix. 17, seq., the former belonging to the twenty-fifth, the latter to the twenty-seventh year of the captivity; and it is quite probable that the temple-vision was put last, both from its own peculiar character, and as forming by itself a complete whole, though several of the communications placed before it may actually have been imparted at a later period.

There is a striking individuality in Ezekiel's writings, the reflex of his native cast of mind, as operated on by the adverse circumstances of the time, and the high calling he had to fulfil. In his case, as in that of other inspired men, the Spirit of God did not violently control, but graciously adapted itself to the mental peculiarities of the prophet, and gave these such an impulse and direction as was needed for the work he had to do. Here there were peculiarities greater than usual, both in the work to be done and in the man who had to do it. He was like one standing in the midst of falling pillars, shaking foundations, and ultimately smoking ruins, and had to summon all his strength to prevent the evil from reaching a hopeless consummation. Impression, therefore, was what he most of all sought to produce; his aim was to awaken, to arouse, to give life and reality to the great objects of faith, and clothe them to men's view, as it were, with the attributes of flesh and blood. To this end the distinctive properties of his mind were rendered by the Spirit of God eminently subservient: for his vivid imagination, his realistic nature, his enthusiastic temperament, resolute and active energy, when baptized with heavenly fire and made conversant with the visions of God, gave a wonderful force and vividness to the things he delineated, and pressed on the consciences of men. The ideal in his hands became like the real; prophecy took the form of history; the symbols of things pertaining to the kingdom of God seemed to merge into the things themselves. These peculiarities in the writings of Ezekiel, which only rendered them the more adapted to their immediate purpose, necessarily give rise to certain difficulties of interpretation, which led the rabbins to issue the foolish prohibition, that no one should read them till he had passed his thirtieth year, but which undoubtedly require to be handled with much care and discrimination.

In regard to commentaries, one of the earliest, and certainly the most voluminous, is that of the two Spanish Jesuits, Pradus and Villalpandus, 1596, which however, as a commentary, is not complete, by much the greater part being occupied with interminable discussions in regard to the measurements and construction of the temple. Even in the exegetical part it is chiefly valuable as a repertory of the opinions of the fathers (who could not find their way to much that is peculiar in Ezekiel), and to laud it still, as is very often done in catalogues, as "the best commentary on Ezekiel that was ever written," is simply absurd. It is no doubt an old Jesuit eulogium, first pronounced probably two centuries ago or more, which continues to be repeated by interested booksellers, and such critics as are more conversant with catalogues than books. Calvin's commentary, though it extends only to the first twenty chapters, and is not by any means the happiest specimen of his exegetical powers, is yet of more value, as far as it goes, than the more laboured tomes of Pradus and Villalpandus. The commentary of Greenhill, like many of the Puritan expositions, is tedious and prolix, and is rather a collection of common-places on the prophet than a serviceable exposition. Newcome's translation and notes proceed too much on the principle of altering the text and received meanings of words in difficult passages; so also do the productions of Ewald and Hitzig, though on many points they may both be consulted with advantage. By much the best foreign commentator on Ezekiel is undoubtedly Hävernick (1843); and the latest English commentaries are those of Dr. E. Henderson and of Dr. Fairbairn (3d ed. 1862).

EZION-GE'BER [probably, a man's backbone], a very ancient town on the eastern arm of the Red Sea. The Israelites made it one of their halting-places, Nu. xxiii. 28; and in much later times, when Solomon turned his attention to commerce, it was from that port that he sent his fleet to Ophir, 1 KI. ix. 26. It seems to have remained for a considerable time in the hands of the kings of Judah, or at least accessible to them, for Jehoshaphat also used it as a port, 1 KI. xxii. 47; but from his improper alliance with the house of Ahab he met with disaster in his commercial enterprise. Josephus states that the place afterwards received the name of Berenice (Ant. viii. 6, 4). No modern travellers have found any traces of the city, and as it lay near to Elath, some have supposed that it may have been its seaport.

EZ'NITE, THE [probably the spear], an epithet given to Adino, one of David's chief captains, in 2 Sa. xxiii. 8; but the passage is a very obscure one, and probably to some extent corrupted. (See Gen. Thea. [179].)

EZRA, BOOK OF. This contains the account of the return of the Jews from Babylon, after that city had been taken by Cyrus king of Persia; and it touches on the difficulties which the people had to encounter under succeeding Persian monarchs, until the temple was completely rebuilt in the sixth year of Darius. From this event a sudden transition is made to the seventh year of king Artaxerxes, when Ezra the scribe was commissioned by the king to go up to Jerusalem and restore the framework of the Jewish polity—an undertaking which he accomplished even to the extent of restoring the original Mosaic law of marriage; and the book concludes with a list of those who put away their heathen wives of forbidden nations. The belief of the Jewish authorities, without any known exception or hesitation, was that Ezra himself composed the book which bears his name. And there is no sufficient reason for questioning this traditional belief, since it is scarcely denied by any one that Ezra wrote a part, nor is there any evidence against the unity of the composition, or any difficulty which stands in the way of assigning it to the age of Ezra. Both of these statements will be more fully explained in the course of this article. But the unity and the completeness of the book have been alike assailed, on certain internal grounds, which have not appeared satisfactory to those who are accustomed to treat the Scriptures with proper reverence, or even impartiality. By taking a view of the subjects treated in the book, we may easily observe the plan of it, and arrive at the conclusion that it is one whole; that is to say, it is neither a fragment of a larger historical work, as some writers affirm, nor a collection of unconnected fragments, according to the assertion of others. It is not indeed a connected history, such as classical or modern historians might have given; but the same may be said of the history in the Pentateuch, the books of Joshua, Judges, &c., whose unity has been denied for equally inadequate reasons. But, like them, it is the record of God's dealing with the Israelites as his church and people, so that many civil and political details are passed over in silence, while the writer dwells on other points which might seem of subsidiary importance according to a mere earthly standard. The course of events recorded in these ten chapters appears to be as follows: First, the decree of king Cyrus, putting an end to the Babylonish captivity, and instructing the returning Israelites to rebuild the temple and restore the worship of Jehovah, ch. i. Second, the consequent proceedings of the people, ch. ii. iii. Third, the hinderances to which they were exposed by the jealousy of the Persian government, stimulated as this was by the hatred of the neighbours of the Jews, until Darius discovered the original decree of Cyrus, and confirmed and extended it, so that the temple was fully rebuilt, and the worship restored according to the law, ch. iv. v. vi. Fourth, the mission of Ezra, who was both a priest and a scribe, who was empowered by king Artaxerxes not only to maintain the prescribed worship, but, greatly more than that, to restore the entire theocratic administration, only reserving the temporal supremacy of the Persian monarchy, ch. vii. viii. And, lastly, the reconstruction of this theocratic state, which Ezra effected so completely, that he carried the people with him in remodelling the family relations by the law against intermarriage with certain races, ch. ix. x.

This is a complete narrative in itself; and there is no room for the hypothesis that Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah, taken together, form one great historical work. Three arguments for this hypothesis are of no weight in themselves for establishing the conclusion; and in so far as they are fair statements of fact, they are willingly put forward by us as circumstances worthy of consideration in themselves, and apart from the illogical purpose to which they have been applied. 1. The three books have a large number of words and phrases in common, which are not met with at all, or at least frequently, in other parts of Scripture. This agrees well with their composition at a new epoch in the history of the Hebrew nation and its literature, by men who had been brought up in the land of Assyria or Babylon, perhaps brought up together at the same Persian court; Ezra and Nehemiah being also most intimate friends and fellow-workers. The opinion is also probable that the Chronicles were compiled by Ezra, as well as the book to which his own name has been given. 2. There is a predilection for genealogical details running through all these books. This seems to have been characteristic of the age; and it was probably necessary, considering the efforts to restore the old arrangements as to the holding of property, the administration of government, and the preservation of ancient national feeling, all of which objects were likely to force genealogical questions upon the notice of men. 3. There is a similar prominence given to details about the priests and Levites. This is unavoidable in any treatment of the people of Israel, unless their character as the church of God is to be overlooked. And especially, in whatever proportion there were difficulties felt as to the revival of the more political aspects of the theocracy, in that same proportion must the greater attention have been given to its ecclesiastical arrangements. But those who are ready to suspect that all these accounts are to be treated by the true critic as if they really formed one single book of history, shut their eyes to the positive and unmistakable evidences of their existence in independent integrity. For, whereas the rash assertion has been made that Chronicles and Ezra at first formed one book, because Chronicles end with the two verses with which Ezra begins; the contrary inference would really be more fairly deducible from the facts of the case. How else do we account for the words occurring in both these books, and in each of them appropriately, so that they cannot be wanting in either without disadvantage? How should the Chronicles end with a word which is in the middle of a sentence in Ezra? And how came it that there are variations of a word or two between the passages, if we venture on the hypothetical allegation that some transcriber was so intent upon his work as to write on under Chronicles, from an undivided copy, the sentences which he was going to put at the head of what he called the book of Ezra, according to the innovation which was coming into favour in his time? Again, as the commencement of the book of Ezra is thus marked off quite distinctly from the termination of the books of Chronicles, so also the termination of the book of Ezra is distinctly marked by the accomplishment of his spiritual and moral reforms, which were achieved when the people had "made an end," ch. x. 17, of the terrible act of self-sacrifice implied in their divorces. We might even conjecture that there was some revulsion of feeling after this strongest of all possible acts in the direction of reviving the theocracy; and that from that time forward Ezra would have been less suitable as the chief instrument for carrying out the purposes of God. His moral and spiritual worth was approved to the utmost; but in order to lead on the people with effect, a new and popular agent was raised up in the person of Israel's great political benefactor, Nehemiah. And while he secured the co-operation of Ezra in all things belonging to the domain of the Word of God, Ne. viii., he himself, in his official capacity as civil governor, and with his personal influence as at once the favourite of the king and the wealthy friend of the people, was designated as the fitting person for completing the work of restoration, by rebuilding the walls of the city, and by actually executing those political improvements for which the pre-requisite of liberty had been granted when Ezra was sent to his countrymen. Accordingly, the book of Nehemiah has a title of its own, "The words of Nehemiah the son of Hachaliah," by which its independent character is asserted. And the fact placed in opposition to this, that the Jews reckoned Ezra and Nehemiah to be but a single book, is not to be put on an equality with the testimony of the Scripture itself, especially as the Jews seem to have thrown certain books into one in other cases besides this (the minor prophets, and not improbably the two of Samuel, the two of Kings, the two of Chronicles, and Judges with Ruth), where the similarity of the subject admitted, so as to reduce the number of books in their canon to twenty-two, answering to the number of letters in their alphabet.

We therefore reject the fancied want of completeness, as if Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah were three fragments of one great historical work, though we make no secret of the intimate relation in which they stand to one another; so intimate, that if any choose to assert that they might have eventually been blended into one by succeeding inspired writers, had any such arisen, in the same way as writings of earlier men of God were blended into the present books of Kings, we shall not quarrel with such a hypothetical statement.

But we equally reject the fancy that there is a want of unity, and that the book is a cluster of fragments. Two reasons have been alleged for this fancy, on account of the style. The one of these is the occurrence of two portions in the Chaldee language, ch. iv. 8-vi. 18; and ch. vii. 12-28. The other is a variation in the use of the first and the third person in speaking of Ezra. The first person is used in a long passage, ch. vii. 27-ix. 15, and on the strength of this fact, these verses are allowed by all to have proceeded from the pen of Ezra; whereas the rest of the book is attributed to other writers, because the first person is not used in them when speaking of him. But though these two facts are curious, they have no force to prove that there were more authors than one. Probably the Jewish language had sunk into partial disuse and decay among the captives at Babylon, and among their descendants who remained out of Palestine for eighty years more, until the time of Ezra. He was therefore equally ready in using the Chaldee spoken in the land of his captivity, and the Hebrew of his forefathers; yet in that Hebrew there are variations of spelling within the book itself, arguing the decayed and unsettled state of the language. And on this account he was all the more likely to preserve the Chaldee in those portions in which he embodied extracts from state documents, or the very documents themselves, which he found in that language. This is precisely the character of the two Chaldee passages; and as the second is attributed to Ezra by able men who are sceptical in their view of the book as a whole, we may the more positively assert, without listening to petty reasonings, that the first of these passages is also his composition. Some indeed have alleged that this first passage is written by an eye-witness of the building, probably a Jew who took part in it, on account of the expression, ch. v. 4, "Then said we unto them after this manner, What are the names of the men that make this building?" But this is a narrow basis on which to rest their opinion. And the peculiarity of the first person "we," instead of the third person "they," is not unlike another case in the same passage, ch. vi. 4

"Now therefore, Tatnai, governor beyond the river, Shethar-boznai, and their companions, &c., be ye far from thence;" where we might expect, instead of the third person "their," the second "your"—a change which has actually been made by our translators. If we are to have recourse to speculations, it would not be a violent supposition that either the Chaldee permitted such irregularities of construction, or that it was a peculiarity in Ezra's own style of writing, in that unsteady age of Hebrew literature; and either form of this supposition would go so far to account for that variation of writing, which is the only plausible indication of a want of unity in the book, namely, the use, in one connection, of the first person, and in another connection of the third person, in speaking of Ezra himself. Yet the importance of this variation has been much exaggerated. The first six chapters refer to a period before Ezra's age, in which he could not be mentioned at all. The seventh chapter, proceeding in the same historical style as the foregoing chapters, names him for the first time in the third person. But after the decree of Artaxerxes has been given, in full form and in the original language, Ezra returns to his own Hebrew, and here betakes himself to the first person in his ascription of praise to God for thus directing the king's inclinations and resolutions. From this time he preserves the first person, in the passage admitted by every one to be his own composition, and which describes his own great actions, until the tenth chapter, in which the third person is perhaps intentionally resumed, to indicate that it is now less a narrative of personal actings than a history of a national proceeding, in which he merely took his position alongside of others who were aiming at a great revival. Parallel passages have been given from sacred writers who at one time narrate events and mention themselves in the third person, but who pass into the use of the first person, as their own feelings and actings become more prominent. Objection has been indeed taken to some of these, as if the freeness of prophetic style could be no rule for a prose work such as this; but these objections, at the very utmost, cannot destroy the value of such parallels as Is. vii. 1-16 and ch. viii. 1, &c.; or Je. xx. 1-6 and ver. 7, &c.; or Je. xxviii. 1, &c., and ver. 5, &c. To this argumentation Keil properly adds, that the acknowledged writing of Ezra, ch. vii. 27-ix. 15, would be an unmeaning fragment unless preceded by something such as ch. vii. 1-11, and followed by something such as ch. x. Perhaps we ought to say that this varying use of the first and third person, which we find in Daniel, Ezra, and Nehemiah, is a usage which all these writers adopted, following the example of Moses, who puts his own personality forward only in the recapitulations of Deuteronomy.

Of course there is a subordinate question which may be discussed among those who hold the unity of the book as proceeding from the pen of Ezra, namely this, whether or not he made use of previously existing written documents, and wrought them up into his own book. This must be supposed in the instance of the list of persons who returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel, ch. ii.; a list which we find also in Nehemiah, and which he expressly declares to be a register that he found and incorporated with his own memoirs, Ne. vii. 5. This is also the case with the edict of Artaxerxes, the second Chaldee portion, ch. vii. 12-26; and with the letters and royal decrees in the first Chaldee portion, ch. iv. 8-

vi. 18. Some believing critics take this entire Chaldee section to be a document of the age of Zerubbabel inserted by Ezra. If so, we must assume that he altered it so far to suit his own purpose, since he inserts the name of king Artaxerxes after the other kings who had been benefactors to the builders of the temple, ch. vi. 14, though Artaxerxes did not begin to reign till fifty years after the temple was completed. But probably this king's name was here mentioned by him so as to show the connection between the first six chapters of the book, which relate the building of the temple under Cyrus and Darius, with the continued and increasing welfare of the colony under Artaxerxes, at that later time to which he passed immediately in the seventh chapter; his own thanksgiving, "Blessed be the Lord God of our fathers, which hath put such a thing as this in the king's heart, to beautify the house of the Lord which is in Jerusalem," &c., ch. vii. 27, is proof of the close connection which he recognized between the policy of this king and that of his predecessors. And in like manner, when he says, ch. ix. 9, "For we were bondmen, yet our God hath not forsaken us in our bondage, but hath extended mercy unto us in the sight of the kings of Persia, to give us a reviving, to set up the house of our God, and to repair the desolations thereof, and to give us a wall in Judah and in Jerusalem," he seems to allude to what was still needful to the fulfilment of God's revealed purpose of mercy, that building of the wall which Nehemiah was to effect.

There are one or two differences of style alleged to exist between the earlier and the later chapters, and these are cited as proofs of different authorship. But they are microscopical; and explanations of them, such as they are, have been presented; and they are fully counterbalanced in the opinion of men who appreciate this line of argument, by other instances of peculiarity of language running through the entire book. Yet we would appeal with more confidence to the oneness of sentiment from first to last. Such are the similarity between the great return of exiles at the first, as given in ch. i. ii., and the return of the small body under Ezra in ch. viii., both in respect of genealogies, and in the care of the sacred vessels, whose materials, weight, and number are carefully specified. And the great self-sacrificing act of separation from forbidden wives, as recorded in ch. ix. x., has its counterpart on a smaller scale, in the anxiety of those who returned at the first, to keep the pure descent of Israel uninjured by the contact with the heathen to which they had been subjected, especially in the case of the priests, ch. ii. 56-63.

The chief reason for supposing that there have been different authors, has probably been the fragmentary appearance of the history to a superficial observer. The real unity of historical plan, seizing on the epochs which were of importance to Israel as the church of God, has been already explained. And in confirmation of this we may see that these two epochs are tacitly compared or expressly mentioned together in the book of Nehemiah, Ne. vii. 73; viii. 1; with Ezr. ii. 70; iii. 1; Ne. vi. 8; xii. 1, 23, 47.

The reckless assertions of some writers that its composition as a whole must be referred to a period about a century later than Ezra, or more, need not be noticed, because they have not even a pretence of argument in their favour. One writer, Zunz, has indeed alleged that there has been some exaggeration about the sacred vessels said to have been restored by Cyrus; but his fellow-unbelievers have refused to agree with him, and have defended the historical credibility of the book throughout. Another critic, Bertheau, sees an evidence of the composition of ch. vi. 22, under the Greek successors of Alexander, because the king of Persia is called the king of Assyria, an argument which might have been left to its own weakness, even though we had been unable to give the parallels 2 Ki. xxiii. 29, La. v. 6, as Keil has done.

On the contrary, critics who rely upon their internal arguments might have seen evidence in favour of its early composition, in the fact that its chronology is clear and exact; while the accounts of Jewish affairs under the Persian monarchy, as given by Josephus from apocryphal writers and other sources unknown to us, present extreme confusion and some palpable mistakes. The book begins with the decree of Cyrus after he had taken Babylon, by which the Jews were sent home to Jerusalem and directed to rebuild the temple, B.C. 536. It narrates the difficulties and hindrances before this was accomplished in the sixth year of Darius the son of Hystaspes, about B.C. 516. It passes in silence over the rest of his reign, 31 years, and the whole of the reign of Xerxes, 21 years, proceeding direct to the work of Ezra, who received his commission in the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, B.C. 458-57. If the whole of the events narrated in the closing chapter took place almost immediately, as is understood, we believe, by all commentators, then the extreme length of time embraced in the narrative is not above 80 years: and the order is strictly chronological, though it is not continuous, but leaves a blank of almost sixty years.

Two exceptions have to be made to these statements in the opinion of some writers, in which however they have not been generally followed. First, Jahn holds with many of the most competent judges that the Ahasuerus of the book of Esther is Xerxes: and moreover he holds that it is the same monarch who is here called Artaxerxes. He thinks that the favour shown to the Jews by Ahasuerus and Artaxerxes, as related in the books of Esther and Ezra, is so peculiar, that it is best to assume the monarch to be the same in both cases. In confirmation of this, he points to the facts that it was in the seventh year of the king's reign that Esther was brought into the palace as queen, and that in the seventh year also Ezra was sent by the king to Jerusalem. But this is a mere incidental resemblance: Esther could not have been the cause of Ezra being sent to Jerusalem with the royal favour, since Esther became queen in the tenth month, and Ezra had set out on the first day of the first month. And this difficulty is not removed, even if we admit Jahn's hypothesis that there is a difference of six months between the two books as to the beginning of the year, in spring and in autumn. Secondly, whereas Ahasuerus and Artaxerxes are mentioned as two kings of Persia during whose reigns remonstrances were made against the Jews by their neighbours, Est. iv. 6, 7; it has been generally supposed that these kings are Cambyses and the usurper Smerdis, who came between Cyrus and Darius, so that here we have the explanation of the interruption to the building of the temple from B.C. 536 till B.C. 519. But Keil and others say that this is mentioned briefly in verse 5; and that verses 6 and 7 proceed to mention similar cases of interruption and calumnious annoyance under the kings who succeeded

Darius. There is confirmation of this view in the letter to Artaxerxes, which refers to the building not at all of the temple, but of the walls of the city. In spite of the awkwardness of so long a parenthetical statement, there is a good deal to be said for this arrangement. And it has the vast advantage of bringing the nomenclature of the Persian kings into simple uniformity throughout the books of the Bible; Ahasuerus being always Xerxes, as these two names are in fact generally reckoned to be mere varieties of pronunciation, and Artaxerxes being one and the same person throughout the book of Ezra, as also in Nehemiah. On this supposition the king had been stirred up by the Samaritans to forbid the building of the city walls at the beginning of his reign: and yet in that extremity there was found God's opportunity, as the king's heart was turned, and Ezra was sent to Jerusalem with full powers to restore everything according to the law of Moses; and this within six years. A table of the Persian kings, with their names in the Bible, is given in the article NEHEMIAH. [G. C. M. D.]

EZRA. There are several individuals mentioned in Scripture who bear this name; but only one of them has more than a passing notice, the person whose history is presented in the book which bears his name, and also partially in the book of Nehemiah. Many respectable writers suppose that he is the Ezra who went up with Zerubbabel, No. xii. 1; but there are strong reasons for rejecting this opinion on account of the chronology, besides that person seems to have been dead in the following generation, see ver. 13. From his own account, Est. vii. 1-12, we learn that he was a priest, indeed descended from the line of high-priests, the nearest of his ancestors named in the list being Seraiah, who is, almost beyond the possibility of doubt, not his own father, but the father of that high-priest who went into captivity in the time of Nebuchadnezzar. (Compare the genealogy in 1 Ch. vi. 4-14.) Besides being a priest in virtue of his descent, Ezra had devoted himself to the study of the Word of God, and seems to have been much employed in writing out copies of it for general use, so that he is frequently designated "the scribe," "the scribe of the law of the God of heaven," &c. The Jewish traditions are full of accounts of his services to the church in all the departments of sacred literature; so much so, that even the most cautious and the most sceptical critics agree that he must have done important work in preserving and circulating the sacred books, whether we admit or not that he was concerned in closing the Old Testament canon. There are two books bearing his name (Esdras) in the Apocrypha. The second of these represents him as a prophet who had apocalyptic visions, but it is universally held to be a very late production, later than the Christian era, and perhaps the work of a professing Christian. The first book of Esdras is chiefly a plain narrative of the restoration of the temple and city after its ruin, drawn from the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, though with one long idle legend interpolated. It also begins at an earlier point than the canonical book, namely at Josiah's passover.

It is impossible to speak with any confidence of his position and proceedings except as these are recorded in Scripture. We know that he enjoyed the favour of king Artaxerxes and his councillors, and that he received a commission, in the seventh year of that monarch's reign, B.C. 458 or 457, to go up to Jerusalem and complete the work of restoration there, even to the extent of putting in force the entire law of Moses, including penalties upon the disobedient, not excepting capital punishments. And while of course the royal supremacy was maintained in matters belonging to the kingdom, perfect freedom was granted to the Jewish people to act according to their own law in their corporate as well as their individual capacity, and the priests, Levites, and inferior persons connected with the temple were exempted from every kind of toll, tribute, and custom. But we do not know what led the king to take such a favourable view of the case, nor how Ezra possessed such influence as to be the individual intrusted with the king's decree, except in so far as his own statement goes, that it was a request on his part which was conceded by the king, and that the concession was so liberal that he could explain it to himself only by the direct interposition of God, Ezr. vii. 9, 27. When he had been clothed with this authority, it was his object to secure the co-operation of his people, and he "gathered together chief men out of Israel to go up with" him. He had greatest difficulty with the common Levites, whose office was perhaps too humble, and their means of support too precarious, to tempt them readily to abandon their settlements in the East in exchange for a share in colonizing Judea; but yet in the end he secured some of them and of the inferior servants of the temple. In order to have the gold and silver offerings for the worship of God conveyed as safely and becomingly as he could, he committed them to a body of men, twelve priests and twelve Levites, according to a translation of ch. viii. 24, which seems more accurate than that in our version, "Then I separated twelve of the chief of the priests, in addition to Sherebiah, Hashabiah, and ten of their brethren with them." (Compare ver. 18, 19.) And this committee took the exclusive charge, and delivered up the gifts to the ecclesiastical authorities on their arrival at Jerusalem. The whole account bears testimony to the wisdom, firmness, and faith of Ezra; especially this arrangement, and the touching statement that he was ashamed to ask a guard from the king after having told him of the protecting care of God, on account of which the company spent three days in humbling themselves before God and seeking his guidance. It is no wonder that a person whose conduct was so blameless and holy, and whose enterprises were crowned with entire success, should be made the confidant of the people who feared God and trembled at the disregard manifested toward his commandments by marriage with forbidden races; and that the princes themselves should confess their powerlessness, and urge him to take the lead in the necessary reforms, Ezr. ix. 1; x. 4. The remedy was very severe; but in that crisis such a decisive measure was probably necessary, if the moral and spiritual character of the colony was not to be blighted. And the fact that seventeen priests, ten common Levites, and eighty-six individuals of other tribes put away their wives, is evidence at once of the wide-spread mischief, and of the spirit of revival by which the nation was animated. It was an act, too, of great importance for the outward interests of the colony, as it was the first exercise of those powers of self-government, according to the law of Moses, and within that limit under the protection of civil authority, Ezr. x. 7, 8, 16, which Artaxerxes had granted to them; after they had been used in so extreme a case as this, a precedent was established which could never be called in question without flagrant injustice.

Whether this was so peculiar an act, necessarily involving a certain amount of odium, so that Ezra thought it becoming to retire from public life, or whether things went so well or so ill with the colony as to prevent his active interference in its affairs, or whether he was called away from Jerusalem, it is certain that his book closes at this point, and that we hear no more of him for about thirteen years. But in the book of Nehemiah, ch. viii., we meet with him once more, associated with this patriot; Ezra the scribe taking the charge of spiritual concerns, as Nehemiah the governor did of things temporal, yet both acting in perfect concert. As "the days of Nehemiah the governor, and of Ezra the priest, the scribe," are mentioned as a marked period of religious life, Ne. xii. 26, it is in the highest degree probable that they acted together for some time, so as to leave a joint impress upon the people. But he is not mentioned any more in Scripture, and the Jewish traditions vary irreconcilably. Josephus relates that he died soon after that great feast of tabernacles at which he officiated in reading the law to the assembled people. Others represent him as returning to Babylon and dying there at a very advanced age. And a tomb bearing his name is still shown on the banks of the Tigris, about twenty miles above its place of meeting with the Euphrates.

The work of Ezra on occasion of that feast of tabernacles may have given rise to the belief of the Jews that he organized the synagogue service. Or, in a preferable way of looking at the matter, it may be considered an inspired voucher for the substantial truth of what is ascribed to him. For even if he did not formally institute the worship of the synagogue, at the least he left a pattern which had merely to be copied and to be separated from accidental circumstances. Here, accordingly, we read for the first time of a "pulpit," and of a body of Levites devoted to the work of "causing the people to understand the law" and "the reading," that is, a body of preachers and expositors of the Word of God. F.

FACE. There is nothing peculiar in the use of this word in Scripture, except with reference to God. In all languages it is customary to apply the term as denoting the most conspicuous part of the human body, and that which is most peculiarly indicative of the whole person, to what relatively holds somewhat of the same place in other objects: as the "face of a house," "the face of the country," &c. There is also the same general application of the word in the sense of favour, it being natural for men to turn away their face from those whom they dislike or shun, and to direct it towards their companions and friends. In that sense, it is said in Pr. xix. 6: "Many will entreat the face of the prince," meaning thereby his favour; which is the rendering adopted in the English version. As applied to God it is an anthropomorphic expression, denoting either his manifested presence or his experienced favour. In such phrases as "seeing the face of the Lord," "the cry came before the face of the Lord," "the face of the Lord is set against them that do evil," it is evidently all one with God's manifested presence; God as appearing or acting in any particular time and way. The manifestations he actually gives of himself are very various, both in kind and degree; and, according as they are more or less full, so also may the effect of them be represented to be upon those who witness them. No one can see God's face and live, it was expressly said by God himself to Moses, Ex. xxxiii. 20; and yet Jacob at an earlier period had declared of himself, though with a feeling of astonishment, that he had seen God's face and yet lived, Ge. xxxii. 30. The apparent discrepancy is to be explained by the different respects in which the expression is used in the two cases. The face of God, as involving the full blaze of his manifested glory, no mortal man can see and live; the sight would overpower and shatter his frame. But when veiled in the attractive form, and appearing with the softened radiance of the human countenance, for the purpose of inspiring confidence and hope, as in the case of Jacob, then not only life, but revived and quickened life, was the natural result.

It was Jacob who first spake of God's face. He did it on the memorable occasion when he was going to meet his brother Esau, who had come forth with an armed band to destroy him, and when in deep anxiety of soul he cast himself upon the mercy and faithfulness of God. During the agony of that spiritual conflict the Lord, or the angel of the Lord, appeared and wrestled with him; and he called the name of the place Peniel, God's face. In doing so, he no doubt had respect to the manifested favour, as well as presence of God; for what had impressed his mind was not simply that the presence, but that the gracious presence of God had been vouchsafed to him. And in another series of passages this idea of God's manifested grace or favour is what is chiefly indicated; as in the expressions "seek my face," "lift up us the light of thy face," or countenance, &c. In all such passages what is said of God's face may be understood of his loving-kindness as actually sought after or experienced by those who believe in his name.

FAIR HAVENS [Gr. καλοὶ λιμένες], the name of a harbour in Crete, on the south shore, into which the vessel that carried Paul on his way to Rome put in, but which was again abandoned, as too exposed for wintering in, Ac. xxvii. 8-12. The name still remains in modern Greek, Kalos Limenas; so that there is no doubt of the particular place meant by it (Smith's Voyage and Ship. of Paul, p. 80).

FAITH. The peculiar importance attached to faith in Scripture, and its relative position in Christian doctrine, become evident when it is viewed as that mental act upon which the whole application of redemption, on man's side, depends. The term (πίστις) properly means TRUST on a personal Saviour, as opposed to man's native self-reliance; and the object of faith is not Christ's doctrine, nor his historic life as a mere pattern, but his glorified person, with whom the closest relation is formed by an act which is simply receptive, and raising the mind above the seen and temporal. That this is the proper meaning of the term faith, may be proved from the uniform usage of Scripture. Some have thought indeed that, in a considerable number of passages, e.g. Ga. 1. 23; 1 Th. iv. 1; Jude 3, it must be taken in an objective sense, denoting the doctrine of the gospel. The best modern expositors, however, take all these passages in the ordinary sense, as containing the idea of trust; from which indeed we are not necessitated to depart in a single instance.

As to the position and importance of faith, it may be described as the organ or means by which redemption is appropriated. It thus presupposes Christ's finished work, of which it is simply receptive; and it is so closely connected with repentance that the one is never found without the other, and can never be in exercise without the other. The most essential light in which the subject can be placed then is, that faith is receptive and saves, not as involving obedience, but as receiving a gift.

The phrase, "obedience of faith," occurring in certain passages, Ro. i. 5; Ac. vi. 7, implies indeed an obediential element in the first act of faith, or a compliance with divine authority, even in the reception of the gift; for we are not, with some, to take the term "faith" in these passages as equivalent to the "doctrine" of the gospel, nor to view the obedience as that which faith produces. But while the gospel is a gift, there is a divine injunction to embrace it, 1 Ja. iii. 22, involving in one and the same act the reception of a gift and the compliance with a divine command. While faith saves then, not as it contains an obediential element, but simply as it is receptive, there is an obedience of faith even in receiving the gift of righteousness.

That faith is simply receptive, may be evinced by all the passages where it is described in exercise, by the prepositions used with the verb or noun (as ἐν and ἐς), and by the sensible representations under which it is set forth, such as "a coming," Mat. xi. 23; "a fleeing," He. vi. 18; "a drinking" of the water of life, Ja. vii. 37.

We have first to consider faith in connection with the Pauline doctrine of justification. To show that everything is repudiated but faith alone, the apostle makes use of various forms of exclusion, such as (1) "freely," Ro. III. 24; (2) "without works," Ro. IV. 6; (3) "without the deeds of the law," Ro. III. 28; (4) "by his grace," Ro. III. 24; (5) "by grace through faith," Ep. II. 8. Grace being represented as the exclusive source of justification, and the death of Christ as its material cause, faith is in this matter merely instrumental and receptive of the righteousness of God, Ro. III. 24. Nor has faith any other value beyond that of uniting us to its object, that we may be justified IN him, Ga. II. 17.

But when the apostle Paul gives all prominence to faith in justification, must he be understood as also excluding works done after faith by those who are in a state of grace? That these works are all excluded from the justification of their persons is evident, because they follow justification; because the apostle repudiates every ground of glorying, Ro. IV. 2; and because their justifying title is not only beyond themselves in Christ, but admits no addition of any kind. Carrying out the same mode of exclusion therefore as is set forth in Scripture, it may be affirmed (1) that it is faith that justifies, not repentance; (2) that it is faith, not love; (3) that it is faith, not works; (4) that it is faith, not holiness; (5) that it is faith merely as apprehending Christ, not as a grace of the Spirit.

Here it is necessary to explain how faith "is imputed for," or rather "unto righteousness" (eis, Ro. IV. 3; Ga. II. 6). That this does not result from the intrinsic quality of faith is self-evident. Just as little can it arise from any acceptance whereby an imperfect title is accepted for a perfect one; a supposition which the inflexible law and the character of the Judge forbid. What then is imputed unto righteousness? Grammatically construing the words, it is undoubtedly true that the act of believing stands as the nominative or subject of the affirmation. But then in that connection, and wherever we are said to be justified by faith, it must be added that, theologically, faith stands by metonymy for its object; that is, for the Lord our Righteousness, whom faith apprehends, and to whom it unites us. Thus the party imputing is God, the ground of the imputation is the obedience of Christ, and the end contemplated is "unto (eis) righteousness." Faith then is not accepted as an imperfect substitute. The gospel has been widely corrupted by the supposition that in this imputation the act of faith is held sufficient for righteousness, and accounted to be what it is not. From the explanation just given it follows that the common phrase, "the righteousness of Christ is imputed," is the exact equivalent of that Scripture phrase.

While it thus appears that justification is by faith without the deeds of the law, Ro. III. 28, and that works or moral character neither constitute qualifications nor pave the way as preparations, it remains that we determine the character of justifying faith. This leads us to explain the seeming discrepancy between Paul and James. Paul affirms that it justifies without works, but presupposes that it is living faith. James, not calling in question the Pauline doctrine, repudiates a dead faith as devoid of justifying efficacy. The same subject is surveyed by both, without any contradiction, from a different point of view. But the truth in which they agree is, that faith is not a dead assent, but the act of a quickened soul, which possesses, like seed-corn, a germinating power. Originated by the Spirit of faith, 2 Co. IV. 13, and overcoming the world by its very action, 1 Ja. V. 4, true faith is always living; but it justifies neither on account of the life nor of the fruits which are associated with it, but as it apprehends Christ. It must be added, in reference to the cause of faith, that it is itself the fruit of Christ's mediation, Phil. I. 22. Hence it is never represented as a legal condition on which men are thrown back, and which they are required to produce in their own strength, but as given to us, like every other blessing, by Christ.

It must be further observed, that while the sacred writers describe faith as a reliance on the personal Redeemer, they never fail to bring prominently into view that it is accompanied by a fellowship in CHRIST'S LIFE. The apostle John exhibits this most vividly. Though none of the aspects of the subject can be said to be wanting in any of the apostles, it is John that specially dwells on the thought that they who believe not only have fellowship in Christ's life, but receive Him for this end. Paul, in like manner, is wont to pass from a description of justification by faith to the new life which is given IN and WITH this faith, Ro. VI. 1-11; Ga. II. 20; a life unfolding itself in LOVE and HOPE, and ever advancing to larger measures of holiness. Nay, Paul is never content till he makes it plain, that the Redeemer whom faith embraces is himself the principle of all this new life living in the disciple by faith, Ga. II. 20.

Neither must it be omitted, that the apostles exhibit faith as implying a CHANGE OF NATURE, and as having its root in the contrite heart, that is, the opposite of the life of sin. As that which constitutes the life of sin is in its deepest ground a course of self-reliance and self-contentment, the language of the sacred writers implies that faith is in its very nature a breaking with this life of sin—a renunciation of self-reliance for an objective propitiation, as Paul usually puts it—a longing for the divine or a new divine knowledge different from that of nature, as John puts it—but always involving a moral change.

It only remains that we advert to what has been termed the form of faith, which may be said to consist in KNOWLEDGE, ASSENT, and TRUST. There must be necessary knowledge to apprehend correctly what Scripture reveals as to the way of salvation, and assent, whereby we accept as true what is announced, but ending in a TRUST, whereby the heavy-laden rest their weary souls on Christ. It is a reliance upon a person with a measure of confidence, not on a mere proposition, Ep. III. 12; He. X. 22; Ja. VI. 33.

But in connection with the trust which is the form of faith, the inquiry arises, Is assurance of the essence of faith in such a sense that a high degree of it is inseparable from its exercise? This requires to be touched with the utmost delicacy and caution. That a certain measure of assurance goes along with lively faith may be affirmed, but not in every case to the exclusion of all dubiety. Escaping from the doubting faith of Rome, the divines of the Reformation-period gave utterance to statements on the subject of assurance stronger than can well be vindicated; and many of the confessions of Protestantism partake of a similar character. But it is always safer to distinguish between faith and assurance, and to regard the latter as a reflex act, or the conclusion of an easy syllogism, as follows:—He that believes on Christ is justified and saved; but I believe; therefore, I am justified and saved. While care is taken to foster and not to discourage that personal appropriation of salvation which forms such a characteristic lineament of the Protestant church, yet it is always perilous to construct such a definition of faith as implies that its opposite consists in admitting a doubt of our personal salvation, for by such views the faithful are perplexed, and the formalist made more secure. [G. S.]

FALLOW-DEER [אֲנָנִי, yachmoor]. Among the ruminants permitted by the law of Moses to be used as food, De. xiv. 6, this animal is mentioned. Its name occurs again in 1 Ki. iv. 23, in the account of the daily consumption of food by king Solomon's household. In both cases it is associated with deer or antelopes; and as from the latter passage the supply seems to have been irregular, and therefore accidental, we are permitted to conclude that the animal in question was not kept in parks, but was wild, and taken only by the chase. The LXX. give us no light on the identification, for the word is absolutely omitted by them in both passages.

The fallow-deer does not now exist in Palestine, or in any neighbouring country, so far as we know. It is, however, included in the animals of Greece, of Persia, and of Abyssinia; and therefore may have inhabited the wooded parts of Palestine in ancient days. It is however difficult to suppose that Jerusalem could have received any appreciable amount of flesh-meat from such a source, remote as it is from a forest country.

In all probability the word yachmoor indicates some species of the antelope family—possibly the animal known to the ancient Greeks under the title of addax (Oryx addax, Lieht.), which has been recognized as a beast of chase in the old Egyptian sculptures. It is widely spread over Central Africa, extending to the borders of the Nile in Nubia, and is well known to the Arabs, who still distinguish it by its ancient name, with the familiar prefix of Abou, or father—Father Addax.

The addax is a coarse and heavy antelope, three feet high at the withers, with a large clumsy head, and stout legs. The horns exist in both sexes, are long, twisted outwards, covered with rings nearly to the points, which are sharp; the tail is long and tufted. The head and neck are of a deep reddish brown colour, with a band of white across the face; the forehead and throat are clothed with coarse black hair, and all the rest of the body and limbs is of a whitish-gray hue. It is one of that group of antelopes in which we may clearly discern an approach to the bovine race. [P. H. G.]

FAMINE occupies a prominent place in Scripture among the troubles with which at different times God's people have had to contend, and the scourges which he has frequently sent to chastise the wickedness and corruption of the world. In the history of the patriarchs the equable stream of their quiet and sequestered life, appears from time to time interrupted by the recurrence of famine, Ge. xii. 10; xvi. 1; xii. seq., although in none of them is the calamity explicitly connected with the state and conduct of the patriarchs themselves. We cannot doubt, however, that there was a certain moral connection; and particularly in the greatest of them all, that which in the first instance, and as an event still in prospect, was overruled to bring about the elevation of Joseph in Egypt, and afterwards became the means of humbling the brethren of Joseph, and reconciling them to him. At a later period, when the children of Israel were settled in the land of Canaan, various famines are represented to have come upon them; one, for example, in the days of Ruth; another of three years' continuance in the time of David; another as long, and greatly more severe, in the reign of Ahab, &c.; some of which were expressly sent as rebukes for abounding iniquity, Ra. i. 1; 2Sa. xxi. 1; 1 Ki. xvii. In the prophetic writings famine is reckoned among the special instruments of the Lord which he employed, as occasion required, to chastise men for their misdeeds, and in this connection is not infrequently associated with sword and pestilence, Is. ii. 19; Je. xiv. 16; xv. 2; Eza. v. 12, &c.

It may be said of the ancient world generally, that it was subject to periodical returns of dearth, often amounting in particular districts to famine, greatly beyond what is usually experienced in modern times. Various causes of a merely natural and economical kind contributed to this, apart from strictly moral considerations. Among these causes may more especially be mentioned the imperfect knowledge of agriculture which prevailed, in consequence of which men had few resources to stimulate, or in unfavourable seasons and localities to aid, the productive powers of nature; the defective means of transit, rendering it often impossible to relieve the wants of one region, even when plenty existed at no great distance in another; the despotic governments, which to so great an extent checked the free development of human energy and skill; and the frequent wars and desolations, in a great degree also the result of those despotic governments, which both interrupted the labours of the field and afterwards wasted its fruits. Depending, as every returning harvest does, upon the meeting of many conditions in the soil and climate, which necessarily vary from season to season, it was inevitable but that times of scarcity should be ever and anon occurring in particular regions of the world; and from the disadvantages now referred to, under which the world in more remote times laboured, it was equally inevitable, that such times should often aggravate into all the horrors of famine. But when, in addition to the natural and economical, we take into account also the moral state of the ancient world, and, in particular, the ever recurring backslidings of the covenant-people, we can easily understand how visitations of famine should have been as frequent as they are represented to have been. It was one of the promised blessings of the covenant, that if the people remained steadfast to it, the Lord would bless them in their basket and in their store—in other words, would give them fruitful seasons; and as, to secure this, the constant vigilance and care of a special providence were needed, it was fitting, that when the interests of righteousness called for it, there should be from time to time a partial suspension of the beneficent agency of Heaven. Famines are still among the evils to which the world is subject, although, from the indefinite extension of the arable portion of the globe, and the ready command that is now held over the means of supply and communication, it is a form of evil which has undergone, and still is undergoing, important modifications.

FAN [the Greek πρόον, Latin ventilabrum]; a sort of wooden spade, with a long handle, used in ancient times, in Greece and the East still used, for the purpose of throwing up the corn in a current of air, that the chaff may be separated from the wheat. The more exact translation of the original term would undoubtedly be "winnowing-shovel." (See AGRICULTURE.)

FARTHING. Two words in Greek are rendered farthing in the English Bible, κοδράντης, Mat. v. 26; Mar. xii. 42, and δραχμίου, Mat. x. 29; Lu. xii. 6. The latter, however, was just the Roman as, equal in the gospel age to a farthing and three-fourths, or 1.875 farthing. The other, the Latin quadrans, was the fourth part of this, and consequently not quite equal to half a farthing of English money. If the relative difference, however, in the value of money is taken into account, the one coin may be regarded as nearly equivalent to the other. But formally considered, the assarion came as near the farthing as the quadrans.

FAST, FASTING. It is somewhat singular, considering the ceremonial character of the Jewish religion, and the respect had in many of its ordinances to food, that it contained no injunction about fasting; nor does the verb to fast (צָוַם) once occur in the whole range of the Pentateuch. This is a very significant omission as regards the nature of the Old Testament religion, and shows, along with other things belonging to it, how free it was from the false asceticism and corporeal mortifications, which from the most remote periods had established themselves in the East. Even in the case of the Nazarite vow, the only thing in the old religion that approached to the character of an ascetic institution, merely the use of wine and things related to it fell under the prohibition of the lawgiver; and the vow itself was voluntary; no one, except in a few peculiar cases, was obliged to take it. There was, however, an occasion, recurring once a year, on which the people were called to do what came to be regarded as equivalent to fasting; so that the occasion itself was in process of time familiarly designated the fast, Ac. xxvii. 9. This was the day of yearly atonement, appointed to take place on the tenth day of the seventh month, and on which, while the high-priest performed the oblations for himself and for the people in all their sins, the people themselves were commanded to "afflict their souls," Le. xvi. 29. What particularly was implied in this afflicting of their souls, is not described—further than that they were "to do no work at all," and were to make it "a Sabbath of rest;" and for this special reason, that "on that day the priest should make an atonement for them to cleanse them, that they might be clean from all their sins before the Lord." Being a day specially set apart for calling sins to remembrance, it was also a day meet for afflicting their souls; it became them then to cease from the gratification of fleshly desire, "not doing their own works, or finding their own pleasure," and with fitting exercises of humiliation and godly sorrow to recall to mind the backslidings and transgressions with which they had dishonoured the living God.

It would be quite natural for those who were accustomed to so much that was symbolical in religion, to embody the affliction they were required to inflict upon their souls in an actual fast. It is certain, that in the later periods of the Jewish commonwealth this was practised; yet it is not less certain, that the practice afforded no indication of a pure and proper observance; nay, the regard that was had to the corporeal abstinence was sharply reproved as a hypocritical and shallow counterfeit. "Is it such a fast that I have chosen? a day for a man to afflict his soul? Is it to bow down the head as a bulrush, and to spread sackcloth and ashes under him? wilt thou call this a fast, and an acceptable day to the Lord?" Is. lviii. 5. It was not that such external signs of penitence and sadness were in themselves improper, or undeserving of divine recognition, when they really were the signs of a corresponding inward affection. The favourable notice taken of them in various cases of Old Testament history is proof enough to the contrary. But it was the state of soul itself, as indicated by the abstinence from food and the clothing of sackcloth, which in such cases met with the approval of God; without that the other would have been but a show and a mockery; and it was doubtless for the purpose of fixing the thoughts of the people more intently upon the proper state of mind, as the great thing desired, that so little was said, in the original ordinance regarding the day of atonement, as to what outward expressions of a contrite and penitent spirit might be suitable for the occasion. Had simply fasting been ordained, the greater part would have deemed the service duly performed by abstaining a certain time from their ordinary refreshments. Even as matters stood, this tendency but too palpably discovered itself, and drew forth the indignant reproof of the prophet already quoted. Something certainly was due to external propriety. A spare diet, the absence of all luxuries, a marked reserve in regard to every kind of fleshly pleasure or indulgence, even a partial abstinence from food, would naturally be felt by the pious portion of the community to be proper accompaniments of the service. But serious and heartfelt sorrow for sin, with earnest strivings to be delivered from it, would still be regarded as the chief thing; as is finely expressed by the prophet: "Is not this the fast that I have chosen? to loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke? Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, and that thou bring the poor that are cast out to thy house? when thou seest the naked, that thou cover him; and that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh?"

it, "It ought to have been a day of denial, of seriousness, of humiliation, and in so far also of repentance. But the matter is carried to excess when, as is not unfrequently done, the day is represented as one of formal mourning in order to be spent in fasting. For, according to the view of the Mosaic religion, holiness and mourning are always contrasts, and the day emphatically of sanctifying could not on this account alone wear formally the aspect of mourning" (Symbolik, II. p. 674).

Notwithstanding the absence of any prescription in the law respecting fasting, we have abundant evidence of fasts having been observed from time to time by the covenant people when anything called for special humiliation and grief. David fasted when he lay under the judgment of God on account of his adultery, and would taste nothing till the child was dead, 2 Sa. xii. 21; Ahab also fasted when he heard the doom pronounced on him by Elijah for the murder of Naboth, and got in consequence a temporary suspension of its evils, 1 Ki. xxi. 27; and on distressing occasions the people generally, in token of their distress, voluntarily fasted for a day, and clothed themselves in mourning attire, Ju. xx. 23, 26; 1 Sa. vii. 6; 2 Ch. xx. 3, &c. In the last days of the kingdom we read of a whole series of fasts connected with special days, which had been rendered memorable and mournful by the calamities suffered on them. They are enumerated by the prophet Zechariah, when pointing to the better times in prospect, which should change the sorrow into joy: "Thus saith the Lord of hosts, The fast of the fourth month, and the fast of the fifth, and the fast of the seventh, and the fast of the tenth, shall be to the house of Judah joy and gladness, and cheerful feasts," Zec. viii. 19; that of the fourth was in commemoration of the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar; the fifth in commemoration of the burning of the temple and the chief houses in the city; the seventh had respect to the murder of Gedaliah; and the tenth, though the last as to its periodical observance, appears to have been connected with the first event in the series—the laying siege to Jerusalem by the Chaldean army, Je. iii. 6, 7; xli. 1; 2 Ki. xxv. 1, 8, &c. But these fasts were only of a temporary nature, and were probably altogether discontinued soon after the return from Babylon.

What the Jews sometimes called fasting, however, was not a total abstinence from food, but only a spare diet, and a renunciation of everything like feasting and jollity. Thus Daniel speaks of fasting or mourning three whole weeks, and defines his behaviour more exactly by saying that he ate no pleasant bread, neither did flesh or wine come into his mouth, Da. x. 2. Judith is represented in the book that bears her name as fasting all the days of her widowhood, excepting on the eves of Sabbaths and holidays, ch. viii. 6. But as the spirit of ceremonialism proceeded, the rigour and frequency of fasting would naturally become more marked. Hence, in the gospel age, the Pharisees are said to have "fasted oft," and the living representative of them exhibited in one of our Lord's parables says of himself, "I fast twice in the week."

Our Lord gave no countenance to this undue regard to fasting, and the prizing of it as a thing praiseworthy in itself. He even plainly disparaged it; and in consequence incurred the reproach of being less rigid in his manners, more given to eating and drinking, than the Pharisees, and even his own forerunner, Lu.

v. 33. This, however, did not move him from his course; and in the reply he gave to the question put to him on the subject, he excused himself from imposing any ordinance of fasting on his disciples while he was with them, as a thing altogether unsuited to their circumstances; but, at the same time, he gave intimation of troubles and distresses which should arise after his departure from them, and which would certainly cause them to fast. In other words, he would lay down no injunction to fast, or give it any countenance as a practice which was to be observed for its own sake; it was to depend upon the circumstances of the time, and to be left to the feelings of those who were in a condition to profit by it. So far from encouraging the practice as in itself a proof of sublime ascetic piety, or marking high proficiency in the divine life, he denounced the men who made much of it as hypocrites, and exhorted such as might at any time engage in it to anoint their head and wash their faces, so as not to appear unto men to fast, Mat. vi. 17; if practised at all, it should be only as a part of personal godliness, and with a view to the soul's improvement in the life of faith. His own example in entering upon his high undertaking with a period of fasting, although it was certainly an extraordinary occasion, and one during which till near its close he was even unconscious of hunger, may yet be justly taken as a proof, that at special seasons and emergencies the total or partial abstinence from food may be practised with advantage by believers. But to institute periodical times for doing so, or to connect peculiar privileges and hopes with any amount of simple abstinence, is entirely alien to the spirit of the gospel; nor can it ever be done, without the greatest danger of fostering the spirit of self-righteousness. It may be proper to add, that the passage, 1 Co. vii. 5, where fasting is coupled with prayer as alike necessary to progress in the divine life, has been improperly admitted into the received text. According to the best authorities the reading should be, "that ye may give yourselves to prayer." The apostles themselves, however, to some extent kept up the practice of occasional fasting, to which they had been accustomed, Ac. xiii. 2; xiv. 23; 2 Co. xi. 27.

FAT, according to the sacrificial ritual of the Old Testament, stood in a close relation to blood; both alike were solemnly set apart to the Lord, and were looked upon as so peculiarly his, that they were prohibited from ordinary use. "It shall be a perpetual statute for your generations, throughout all your dwellings, that ye eat neither fat nor blood," Le. xiii. 17. What is meant here by fat, appears from the connection to be fat in a lumpy or separate state, not as intermingled with the fleshy parts of the animal. For in the prescriptions going before respecting the peace or thank offerings, it was not absolutely every particle of fat which required to be burned on the altar, but the fat that covers the inwards, that in which the kidneys are imbedded, that also upon the flanks, and, when the offering was of the flock, the entire rump, which is one mass of fat in Syrian sheep. It was the fat in so far as it existed in a separate form, and could be without difficulty taken from the carcass and consumed—this simply which was devoted to the altar, and forbidden as ordinary food. The restriction did not prevent the feeding or fattening of sheep and cattle for the table, Lu. xv. 23; 1 Ki. iv. 23.

fat of slain victims to the altar, and its prohibition for food, there has been considerable diversity of opinion. A class of writers would find the ground of it in simply dietary or economical considerations—as, that it was designed to discourage a mere fleshly luxury, or to prevent indulgence in what may be fitted, in warm climates, to cause indigestion, to render the blood cold and heavy, perhaps to nourish a tendency to cutaneous diseases (Maimonides, Kitto's Cyclopaedia); and Michaelis thought it was to be explained from a desire to form the taste of the Hebrews to oil rather than to fat, and so to induce them to give themselves to the cultivation of the olive and other productions of the field, and proportionately abandon their old nomade habits. Considerations like these, however, partly conjectural, and all inferior in their nature, could have nothing more than a secondary place, if they could even have that, in the prescriptions of a ritual which throughout was based on the moral aspects and relations of things. If it was not primarily because blood is difficult of digestion, or because of any relation it occupies to the food and habits of mankind, that it was consecrated to the altar and interdicted from the table, the same undoubtedly must be held respecting the fat, which is classed along with it. That place was assigned to the blood, because it was the bearer of the life, Le. xvii. 14; and as such represented the rational and spiritual attributes of man's nature—the principle of his higher life. But next to the blood in that respect stood the fat, which might be called the efflorescence of the animal life—the sign of its greatest healthfulness and vigour, and hence usually clustering in greatest fullness around the more inward and vital parts of the system. On this account the term fat was commonly applied to everything that was best and most excellent of its kind. The fat of the earth, the fat of the wheat, of the oil and the vine, even the fat of the mighty, though to our view somewhat peculiar expressions, were familiar to the Hebrews, as indicating the choicest specimens or examples of the several objects in question, Ge. xiv. 18; De. xxxii. 14; Nu. xviii. 12; 2 Sa. i. 22. In this, therefore, we have an adequate and perfectly natural reason for the fat being taken as “the food of the offering made by fire.” It stood in a close connection with the life, and of the eatable portion of the animal was the richest, the best. But the best and first, to use the words of Bähr (Symbolik, ii. p. 38), “belong in all cases to Jehovah, and may be said also in a sense to represent the whole, of which it is the best and first. As of all produce, the first and best, representing the entire harvest-yield, was to be presented to the Lord, so of the sacrificial victim, when it was not, as in the case of the burnt-offering, wholly consumed upon the altar, its first and best, namely all its fat, must in like manner be burned.”

If this fundamental ground is borne in mind, one may easily know what to make of the old typical explanations—such as this, “the burning of the fat to the Lord typified the inexpressible trouble of Christ's soul amidst the flames of his Father's wrath; and that we ought to devote ourselves to God's service with a heart all inflamed with love; and ought to have our most inward and beloved lusts destroyed by the spirit of judgment and of burning” (Brown's Dictionary). It is impossible, in any case, that one and the same action could typically represent things so very diverse in their nature as those here strung together, and which can have nothing more than a formal agreement. But since the fat went along with the blood as together constituting the being and worth of the living creature, so, when transferred to the spiritual realities of the new covenant, the burning of the fat is undoubtedly to be explained, primarily, of the offering of what was best and loftiest in Christ's pure humanity, and subordinately of what, through the operation of his grace, may be so regarded in his people. In him alone was there anything strictly good to offer; and what is such in them is only from the working of his grace in their experience; but this also must be offered as a spiritual sacrifice to the Lord, Ro. xii. 1.

FAT, in the authorized version, is sometimes used for VAT or WINE-PRESS (which see).

FATHER. This term is very variously applied in Scripture, and occurs in modes of expression which are not quite usual in European languages. For, beside the uses of it common to all languages (1), of the immediate male parent; (2) of the more remote parents or ancestors; (3) of one occupying somewhat of the position and exercising to some extent the authority of a father, as Joseph to Pharaoh, Ge. xiv. 8, or Naaman to his servants, 2 Ki. v. 13; it is also extended (4) to all, who in any respect might be said to originate or have power over any object or persons. For example, the inventor of an art was called its father, or the father of those who practised it; Jubal was “the father of all such as handle the harp and organ,” and Jabel “the father of such as dwell in tents,” Ge. iv. 20, 21. So in regard to cities, Salma is represented as the father of Bethlehem, Hareph of Beth-gader, &c., 1 Ch. ii. 51; iv. 14; ix. 35.

The place and authority of the father stood very high in patriarchal times, and they were substantially embodied in the legislation of Moses. While the father lived he continued to represent the whole family, the property was held in his name, and all was under his superintendence and control. His power, however, was by no means unlimited or arbitrary; and if any occasion arose for severe discipline or capital punishment in his family, he was not himself to inflict it, but to bring the matter before the constituted authorities, De. xxi. 18-21. But these authorities were charged to repress all filial insubordination, and with summary judgment put an end to its more lawless outbreaks. On the other hand, the father, as the head of the household, had the obligation imposed upon him of bringing up his children in the fear of God, making them well acquainted with the precepts of his law, and generally acting as their instructor and guide, De. vi. 20; Ex. xii. 26, &c. So that, if fathers were, in the first instance, faithful to their trust, it could not very frequently happen that the severities in question would need to be exercised upon the children.

For the more peculiar use of the word father, in reference to God, and the relations implied in it, see under ABBA, and SONS OF GOD.

FEASTS, or sacred festivals—which held an important place in the Jewish religion—are what alone require to be treated here under the name of feasts. For of feasts, in the ordinary sense, there was nothing peculiar to the Jews, or which requires explanation to intelligent readers of the Bible. The occasions of making feasts among the Jews and other people of the East were much the same with those which give rise to them elsewhere—the meeting of friends, the making of public compacts or treaties, prosperous events, marriages, and such like. Whatever was peculiar in the mode of conducting their entertainments on such occasions, will be found noticed in connection with the occasions themselves. (See FOOD, HOSPITALITY, DINNER, SUPPER.)

The English term feasts very inadequately expresses (in a religious respect) what is meant by the corresponding expressions in Hebrew, and indeed is apt to convey an impression somewhat at variance with the more fundamental idea. There are two words in Hebrew for which it is used as an equivalent, and to one of them only does it approximate in meaning. This is hag (חַג), derived from the verb which signifies to dance, and, when applied to religious institutions or services, indicating them, originally at least, as solemnities accompanied with demonstrations of joy and gladness. But this term is scarcely ever applied excepting to two of the stated solemnities of the old covenant—the passover and the feast of tabernacles, Ex. xii. 14; Le. xxiii. 39; Nu. xxi. 13; De. xvi. 13—which were both celebrated with rejoicings, and rejoicings that were connected with the participation of food as an essential part of the service. Indeed, latterly the term appears to have been chiefly appropriated to the feast of tabernacles, which the rabbins therefore call emphatically the hag, as being from its very nature the one that partook most of the character of a joyous feast. But the term that most fitly designated, and that alone actually comprehended all the sacred feasts, was mo'ed (מוֹעֵד); and where the stated solemnities in their proper nature and entire compass are treated of, as they are in Le. xxiii., this is the term that is applied to them all; they are the mo'edim of Jehovah; and of the feast of tabernacles alone is hag used as an interchangeable term, ver. 39. Now, mo'edim must mean either assemblies or places of assembly; it is used frequently in both senses; but here it is, beyond doubt, to be understood in the former. Indeed the language of the sacred writer explains itself: "And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, The mo'edim (feasts) of Jehovah, on which ye shall call holy convocations, these are the mo'edim." What was meant by this name, therefore, was the stated solemnities of the people—the occasions fixed by divine appointment for their being called and meeting together in holy fellowship; meeting, that is, for acts and purposes of sacred worship. Holy convocations, or calling of assemblies, could have had no other object than the celebration in some way of divine worship, or the promotion of the spiritual interests of the community. Any other ends that may have been served by them must have been quite incidental and subordinate. And hence alone appears the utterly groundless nature of the idea set forth respecting those sacred festivals, especially by writers in Germany, as if they had a political and social much more than a religious bearing, and were chiefly valuable on account of the good fellowship they promoted between the different members of the community, the opportunities they afforded for merchandise, and the hilarity and good cheer which prevailed at them (Herder, Ebr. Poësie, i. p. 116; Michaelis, Comm. on Laws of Moses, art. 194). There might, doubtless, have accrued from the three larger and more prolonged feasts some advantages of the kind now referred to; seeing that at these the people met from all parts of the land, and were together for a whole week, portions only of which could be spent in religious exercises. A communal and brotherly spirit could not fail to be fostered by such ever-recurring assemblages at one place and centre of worship. But still they could never be regarded as the more proper and direct object of those feasts, any more than of the others; for all had primarily a religious aim, and were pre-eminently designed to maintain and promote the people's fellowship with God. It was before Him, not simply with one another, that they were to meet; not in assemblies merely, but in holy assemblies that they were to congregate; so that, as Bähr justly on this point states, "it was not politics and commerce that had here to do, but the soul of the Mosaic dispensation—the foundation of the religious and political existence of Israel, the covenant with Jehovah" (Symbolik, ii. p. 543).

Another thing is quite clear from this characteristic definition of all the mo'edim or feasts, and one that also meets a related and too prevalent error; it is, that the law plainly contemplated stated and regular meetings for worship, some of a smaller and frequently-recurring nature, as well as others at greater intervals, and attended with more of the circumstantial of worship. For among the sacred seasons, which were to derive their common distinction from the calling of holy assemblies, and at the head of the whole, stood the weekly Sabbath; to which also there were added, as single days, the new moon of the seventh month, and the tenth of that month, on one and all of which there were to be holy convocations, as well as at the three great festivals of the Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles. It is obvious that the holy assemblies by which those other days—the individual Sabbaths—were to be distinguished, must have been quite local; families or townships meeting together in their several districts, and under the guidance of the Levites or elders among them, engaging in some common acts of devotion. Nothing was prescribed as to the particular form and manner; this was left (as it has been very much in every age of the church) to the direction of the constituted authorities, acting in accordance with the great truths and principles of the law. In later times the provision was carried into effect by the erection of synagogues, and the organization of a regular system of discipline and worship connected with them. It was a mode perfectly authorized by the legislation respecting the stated assemblies, and might from the first have been adopted; but there is no evidence that things took so orderly and systematic a shape in this respect during the earlier and brighter periods of the commonwealth. This, however, does not invalidate the fact, that on all the days specified in the law as Sabbaths, there should have been, and among the better portions of the community actually were, holy assemblies; and it is only on the supposition of there having been such, that we can account for the allusions occasionally made in the writings of the Old Testament to "the congregations," "the calling of assemblies," "the solemn meetings," Le. i. 13; Pa. lxxi. 3, &c.; and also to the practice, as one in common use even in the degenerate kingdom of Israel, of the more piously disposed going to attend the meetings of the sons of the prophets on Sabbath-days and new moons, 2 Ki. iv. 23. There is reason to believe that the intention of the lawgiver in this respect was never wholly disregarded; but there can be little doubt that had his intention been more fully carried out in the better days of the commonwealth, the seasons of degeneracy and backsliding would neither have been so frequent nor so great as they actually were. On this part of the subject see Meyer, De Temp. Sac. et Festis diebus Heb. p. ii. c. 9; Fairbairn's Typology, ii. p. 403, seq.; also George, Die ält. Feste Jud. p. 161, 202, where the correct view is maintained, though in the midst of much that is unsound.

Keeping in view, then, the fundamental idea of the feasts—or, as it should rather be, the sacred seasons and solemnities—of the old covenant, namely, that they were appointed for the special purpose of cultivating, by means of religious meetings and appropriate acts, the holiness of the covenant, we shall take a survey of them individually, and in the order in which they are presented in the chapter, Le. xxiii., which formally treats of them.

I. The Feast of the Weekly Sabbath.—The institution of the weekly Sabbath has so much that was peculiar to it, and stands connected with so many questions of importance respecting its origin, distinctive character, and proper observance, as well as its relation to Christian times, that it will be best treated as a whole by itself. What it had in common with the moadeem respected but one part, though a very important part, of its design; and even this, to be properly understood, requires to be viewed in connection with its entire purport and general bearings. (See SABBATH.)

II. Feast of Unleavened Bread, or the Passover.—This feast is placed next in order to the weekly Sabbath, and formed the first in point of time of all the annual feasts—the first, therefore, of the solemnities that usually went by the name of feasts. It was indifferently called the feast of the Passover, and the feast of Unleavened Bread; but where the object was to mark the distinction between the Passover as a sacrifice, and the Passover as a feast following on the sacrifice, the latter was designated the feast of unleavened bread. Thus, in Le. xxiii. 5, seq., “In the fourteenth day of the first month at even (lit. between the two evenings) is the Lord's Passover. And on the fifteenth day of the same month is the feast of unleavened bread unto the Lord; seven days ye must eat unleavened bread. In the first day ye shall have an holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work.” &c. The Passover, it will be observed, as a sacrifice, was assigned to the very close of the fourteenth day—to the period between sunset and total darkness, as the expression seems strictly to import; but, as the later Jews understood it, between about three in the afternoon and sunset. (See under EVENINGS.) It was fixed so near the close of that day that the victim might be ready to be partaken of at the very commencement of the next day, which took place when night had fairly set in, and so might form the initial and prominent part of the paschal feast. This feast therefore, including the eating of the paschal lamb, began at night, and on what the Jews reckoned the first hours of the fifteenth day of the month.

The animal, which was ordained to be at once the sacrifice that preceded, and the food that introduced, the observances of the feast, was allowed to be chosen either from the goats or the sheep. Custom, however, ultimately narrowed it to the latter; and a lamb of the flock came to be universally regarded as the proper paschal offering. It was ordained to be a lamb of the preceding year, and without blemish. It was to be slain as an offering to the Lord, and was called the sacrifice of the Lord's passover, Ex. xii. 27; xxxiv. 25; in the last of the two passages referred to, and in a corresponding one, Ex. xiii. 18, it is called emphatically by the Lord, my sacrifice; according to the ultimate arrangement it was to be slain at the holy place, De. xvi. 5, seq.; its blood was sprinkled upon the altar, 2Ch. xxx. 16, 17; xxxv. 11, 12; and it was in consideration of its blood, as substituted for the life of the first-born, that the Lord preserved and rescued the children of Israel from the dominion of Egypt. These things conclusively establish its sacrificial character, in which light it was certainly regarded by Philo and Josephus; and the apostle adds his explicit testimony, when he represents the sacrifice of Christ as the sacrifice of our Passover, 1 Co. v. 7. The scriptural evidence, indeed, is so plain that one can scarcely suppose it would ever have been called in question but for some polemical interest. The first who did so were some of the continental, chiefly Lutheran, theologians (Chemnitz, Gerhard, Calov, &c.), who, in opposition to the Catholic argument derived from the Passover being a perpetually repeated sacrifice as well as feast, in favour of the propitiatory character of the Lord's Supper, endeavoured to disprove the sacrificial character of the Passover. This was to meet one false position with another, and, indeed, for the sake of defending the purity of an ordinance, imperilling the doctrine on which it was based; for to eliminate the sacrificial element from the great redemptive act of the old covenant was manifestly to prepare the way for the like attempt being made in respect to that of the new. And so it happened; the persons in later times who have chiefly called in question the sacrificial import of the Passover have been the Socinians and Rationalists, who have sought thereby to strengthen their opposition to the doctrine of Christ's atonement (see Magoe on the Atonement, note 25). There is no real weight in the considerations urged to establish the view in question. They consist merely in certain superficial differences between the Passover and the other sacrifices, but which could never be meant to affect the substantial agreements. Even some of the more obvious differences seem to have been connected only with the first celebration; for the original sprinkling of the blood on the door-posts was afterwards changed to sprinkling on the altar; and the slaying at the door of each man's dwelling to slaying at the tabernacle; and though it is not recorded, yet the probability is, that the usual law respecting the fat of the animal offerings was observed also here. As a sacrifice the Passover occupied a peculiar place, and in consequence had ordinances of its own, which kept it in some degree apart from the others; but there is no reason to doubt that the same fundamental character belonged to it and to them.

By ordaining that the flesh of the paschal lamb should be turned into a meal, the same general truth was exhibited which had its representation in all sacrificial meals; it showed forth the actual fellowship which the partakers of the feast were admitted to hold with God, as the result of the atoning sacrifice. That which, in the merciful arrangement of God, shielded them from destruction, at the same time struck the knell of their deliverance; while they were saved from death, they were also made to enter on a new life; in visible attestation whereof the flesh of the victim, which had been accepted in their behalf, was given them as the food of their redeemed natures, that in the strength of it, and of the conscious enjoyment of God's favour along with it, they might proceed on their course with alacrity and joy. And the era of the institution of the Passover being thus like the birth-time of their existence as a ransomed and peculiar people to the Lord, the commemoration of it in future time was like a perpetual renewal of their youth. They must be ever repeating over again the solemnities, which brought afresh to their view the redemptive act to which they owed their national existence, and the heritage of life and blessing it secured for them.

With this great design of the ordinance, the subordinate arrangements and accompanying provisions entirely accorded. (1.) The season appointed for its celebration was the month Abib—literally, the ear-month, when the corn was coming into the ear, and the spring was now giving promise of the coming harvest—henceforth the first month of the Jewish calendar. As their religious and political existence took its beginning with the event therein commemorated, so their cycle of months must then also begin its annual course—nature also in its vernal freshness of life and beauty beating in unison with the occasion. (2.) Of like propriety were the actions with the lamb; it was to be roasted by fire, not boiled, that there might be the least possible waste of its substance; to be presented entire without a bone being broken, and in all its eatable parts consumed—the company assembled around each table being appointed to be always sufficient to insure that result;—all manifestly designed to keep up the representation of a visible and corporate unity. Itself whole and undivided, the lamb was to be partaken of entire by individual households, and every household was to participate in the common meal, that they might, one and all, realize their calling to the same divine fellowship and life, and might apprehend the oneness as well as completeness of the means by which the good was procured and sustained. Should anything remain over, it must be burned, lest it should corrupt or fall into the rank of ordinary food; God's peculiar table, and the peculiar food he provided for it, must be kept honourably apart from everything common or unclean. (3.) The attitude in which the lamb was to be eaten—with loins girt, shoes on the feet, a staff in the hand—the attitude of persons in travelling attire, and ready to set forth on their course, had respect, apparently, only to the first celebration, and, like the sprinkling of the blood on the door-posts, was discontinued when the feast was converted into a permanent ordinance. In the gospel age the prevailing custom was that of reclining, which the Pharisees justified on the ground that, though a deviation from the original practice, it was a fitting sign of the rest and enlargement which God had given to his people. This, therefore, while most appropriate at the time, may be omitted as temporary. (4.) The next provision regarding it—the appointment to eat it with bitter herbs—might also be assigned to the temporary class of arrangements, if we were sure that it simply pointed, as many commentators understand it to have done, to the hard bondage and affliction which the Israelites endured in Egypt. It may possibly have done so; and the opinion is so far countenanced by the omission of any reference to the bitter herbs in the later passages of the Pentateuch, which treat of the Passover as a stated feast. Yet, as the distress experienced in Egypt, especially that of the closing scene, was no accidental thing, but an inseparable part of the discipline through which they had to pass, the bitter herbs that symbolized it had, on that very account, something of abiding import and instruction. They told of the intermingling of anxiety and trouble, through which the people had the bands of their captivity loosed and were raised into the liberty and blessedness of life. It was even, one might say, through the avenue of death that this life was entered on by the covenant-people; and the bitter herbs might have been retained as a significant emblem of that attendant sorrow or crucifixion of nature. (5.) The prohibition of leavened bread, which formed another and much more prominent characteristic of the feast, there can be no doubt was intended to be a perpetual accompaniment. The alternative name of the feast of unleavened bread was itself a clear proof of this; and as the disuse of leaven was not limited to the eating of the paschal lamb, but continued through an entire week, it was evidently designed from the first to form an essential characteristic. Yet it too had some reference to the troubles and distresses of the moment; for in De. xvi. 3 the unleavened bread is called "bread of affliction;" and it is added by way of explanation, "for thou camest forth out of the land of Egypt in haste." That is, by reason of the terrible agitation and urgency of the moment, they had no time to prepare their customary leavened bread, but had hurriedly to make ready with simple flour and water what they required for the occasion. This, however, had respect simply to the preparation of the bread, not to its distinctive quality, though the latter was plainly the chief thing, and is that most specifically referred to in the passages that dwell upon the subject. Leaven being a piece of sour dough in a state of fermentation (see under LEAVEN), was fitly regarded as an image of corruption in the moral and spiritual sphere—of whatever, by its perverse nature, or vitiating tendencies, disturbs the peace of the soul, and causes it, as it were, to ferment with the elements of impure desire and disorderly affection. Hence, our Lord warned his disciples to beware of the leaven of the scribes and Pharisees, Mat. xvi. 6; which is afterwards explained to mean their corrupt doctrine or teaching; and the apostle identifies unleavened bread with sincerity and truth, hence, by implication, makes leaven in its symbolical aspect synonymous with what is false and impure, 1 Cor. v. 8. The command, therefore, at the feast of the Passover, to put away all leaven from their dwellings, and through one whole week, the primary sabbatical circle, to eat only unleavened bread, was in reality an enforcement of the obligation to purity of heart and behaviour. It taught the people, by a perpetually recurring ordinance, that the kind of life for which they had been redeemed, and which they were bound, not for one brief season merely, but for all coming time, to lead, was such as could be maintained in fellowship with God, and therefore free from the sins and abominations, on which he can never look but with abhorrence. The service was but another form of reiterating the call, Be ye holy, for I am holy. (6.) Closely connected with this, and indeed only the embodiment of one of its more specific and positive aspects, was the presentation to the Lord of a sheaf of barley—an action that was appointed to take place on the second day of the feast, and to be accompanied by a burnt-offering, with its appropriate meat-offering, Lev. xxiii. 12-15—the burnt-offering symbolizing the dedication of their persons to the Lord, and the sheaf of first-fruits that of their substance. It was not accidental, but of set purpose, that the time of the annual celebration of this feast, which commemorated God's act in vindicating for himself the first-fruits of his people Israel, should also have been that at which could be annually gathered the first-fruits of the land's increase. The natural thus fitly corresponded with the spiritual. The presentation of the first ripe grain of the season was like offering the whole crop to God, acknowledging it as his gift, and receiving it as under the signature of his hand, to be used in accordance with his mind and will. All thereby acquired a sacred character; for "if the first-fruits were holy, the lump was also holy." The service carried, besides, a formal respect to the consecration of the first-born at the original institution of the Passover, and was therefore most appropriately connected with this particular ordinance. In the saving and consecration of the first-born, all Israel were, in a manner, saved and consecrated:—this the people were called every succeeding year, when they sacrificed and ate the Passover, to confess before the Lord, and, with their barley-sheaf and its accompanying burnt-offering, to yield themselves and their substance anew to him, to whom they owed whatever they were and had.

Such were the individual and more specific parts of this feast, with the meaning directly involved in them for the people of Israel. It remains however to be noticed, that to give the whole period during which the feast was held a sacred impress, to stamp it and all its services as instituted for holy purposes, both the first and the last days of the feast were to be observed as Sabbaths—days without work and for holy convocations, Le. xiii. 7, 8. And throughout the period there was to be presented daily, in addition to the stated morning and evening sacrifices, a goat for a sin-offering, and two bullocks, one ram, and seven lambs for a burnt-offering, with their respective meat and drink offerings, Nu. xviii. 16-25. These did not convey any lessons different from those taught in other parts of the feast, but they served to bring distinctly into remembrance, at every stage of the solemnity, how much the worshippers needed to be purged from the defilement of sin, and how they were called to give themselves to the service and glory of God.

In these remarks the feast of the Passover has been viewed merely as a commemorative and symbolical ordinance for Israel; but while it commemorated the past, it also typically pointed to the future. It did this partly in common with all other divine acts, which brought judgment upon the adversary and deliverance to God's people. For what Bacon said of history in general—"All history is prophecy"—holds emphatically of such portions of it. In these God more peculiarly displayed his character as the covenant God of his people; and that character being unchangeable in all its essential elements, he cannot but be inclined to repeat substantially for them in the future what he has done in the past. On this ground the inspired writers, in the Psalms and elsewhere, constantly endeavour to reassure their hearts in times of trouble and rebuke by throwing themselves back upon the redemptive acts of God in former times, perceiving therein a pledge of similar acts, as often as they might be needed, in the time to come. But another and still higher prophetic element entered into that singular work of God which had its commemoration in the Passover. For the earthly relations then subsisting, and the manifestations they called forth on the part of God, were purposely designed and ordered to foreshadow corresponding, but immensely higher ones in the future development of the kingdom of God. And as in this greater future all adverse power, though rising to its most desperate and malignant efforts, was destined to be put down by the triumphant energy of Christ, that the salvation of his people might be for ever secured, so the redemption from the land of Egypt, with its ever-recurring memorial, necessarily contained the germ and promise of those better things to come; the lamb perpetually offered to commemorate the past, and partaken of as the sacrament of a redemption already accomplished, spake to the ear of faith of the true Lamb of God that, in the fulness of time, should take away the sins of the world; and only when it could be said, "Christ our passover has been sacrificed for us," did the purpose of God, which lay infolded as an embryo in the paschal institution, receive its proper development. Hence the pregnant utterance of our Lord when sitting down to the celebration of the last Passover, "With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer; for I say unto you, I will not any more eat thereof until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God," Lu. xxi. 14, 16.

In this higher and prospective reference of the paschal institution, the lamb without blemish, with its sprinkled blood, pointed to the sinless Redeemer, come to shed his blood for many for the remission of sins, with which blood applied to their conscience by the Holy Spirit they are consecrated for evermore. Here, too, salvation from destruction is not the only thing aimed at; it is but the means to a further end—the soul's participation in the undying life of Jesus, and acquirement thereby of a personal fitness for the work and service of God. The indispensable condition to this end is the hearty reception of the Saviour in his entire fulness, as the one bread of life for the community of believers, that they may be all one with him as he is one with the Father; for which reason not a bone of him was allowed to be broken on the cross, that his people might have even an external witness of that undivided oneness, and might the more readily discern in the history of the crucified the realization of the promise embodied in the Passover. It virtually declared that a divided or mutilated Christ could only be an insufficient Saviour, because necessarily leaving evils in the soul's condition undressed, wants unsatisfied. Not unless received in his proper completeness can the life that is in him be found also in them. And as this life can never work but unto holiness, so it will inevitably lead to the putting away of the old leaven of a corrupt nature, and walking in the spirit of sincerity and truth; more certainly indeed than of old, for in this respect also all rises to a higher place. As the mercies of God connected with the new Lamb of sacrifice are unspeakably greater, and the fellowship with God into which it brings his people is closer, so the obligation is correspondingly stronger under which they are laid to yield themselves to God, and to prove, by their daily conduct, what is his good, and holy, and acceptable will.

III. The Feast of Weeks—Pentecost.—This feast, which comes next in order, stood in a definite relation to the feast of the Passover, or rather to a particular part of that feast—the presentation to the Lord of the first ripe ears of barley. This service, as already noticed, was appointed to take place on the second day of the paschal solemnity, the day after the Sabbath, which formed its commencement, Le. xxiii. 16; and from that the people were to count seven weeks complete, a week of weeks, at the close of which, on the day following, they were to hold another solemnity, called on that account the feast of weeks. The actual day of the feast formed the fiftieth from the day of presenting the barley-sheaf; and from the Greek word pentecosté, fiftieth, it came to be commonly known under the designation of Pentecost. But the more distinctive name is that of weeks, being determined by the complete cycle of weeks which intervened between it and the second day of the feast of unleavened bread, of which it formed the proper consummation. With reference to this aspect of it, the ancient Jews gave it the name of Aserat (Jos. iii. 10, 6, Asartha), that is, the closing or shutting up.

Two other names, however, are applied to the feast in Scripture. In Ex. xxiii. 16, where mention is first made of it, it is called both the feast of harvest and the feast of first-fruits; also in Nu. xxviii. 26, where the subject is treated of in connection with the offerings, it is simply called the day of first-fruits. It was designated from the harvest, because it was kept at the close of the whole reaping season, when the wheat as well as the barley crop had been cut and gathered. The seven weeks after the commencement of the Passover were always sufficient for that purpose; they embraced the entire circle of harvest operations. It very naturally got the name also of the feast or day of first-fruits, because it formed the occasion on which an offering was to be presented to God of the entire crop, as actually gathered and ready for use. This was done by the high-priest waving two loaves, made of the best of the crop, not of barley-meal, but of fine flour, and baked in the usual manner with leaven; the leaven in this case not being regarded as a separate ingredient, or in its character as leaven, but being simply viewed as an essential part of the concrete result—baked loaves. Nor were they placed upon the altar, to which the prohibition about leaven strictly referred, but waved before the Lord by the priest in the name of the congregation. But in addition to this wave-offering, as the people were enjoined to give "the first of all the fruit of the land to the Lord," De. xvi. 2, since from him the whole had been derived, it was ordered that at this feast they should bring an offering of the first-fruits of their produce, each according to his ability and the purpose of his heart. No definite amount or proportionate contribution was fixed; it was declared to be "a tribute of a free will offering of their hand, which they were to give according as the Lord their God had blessed them," De. xvi. 10. But the offering itself was laid as a matter of obligation upon each man's conscience; hence the exhortation of Solomon, "Honour the Lord with thy substance, and with the first-fruits of all thine increase," Pr. iii. 9. Jewish writers relate that the form of confession and thanksgiving found in De. xxvi. 5, seq., was commonly used on the occasion.

The feast in later times appears to have lasted for some days; probably was continued as long as the Passover; but in the law mention is made only of a single day; and in so far as any additional time may have been spent at it, there was no authoritative enactment enjoining attendance. But the mere rendering of the first-fruits from so many families, accompanied as it was with an injunction to show liberality to the poor, and to give the widow, the orphan, the stranger, as well as their own servants, a share in their bounty, De. xvi. 10, would certainly require a succession of days, though, as to the exact number, determined more perhaps by the convenience of individuals than by any statutory appointment. The one legal day of the feast was a Sabbath, a day of holy convocations; and in addition to the usual Sabbath-day services, there were to be offered on it, precisely as at the feast of the Passover, two young bullocks, one ram, and seven lambs for a burnt-offering, Nu. xviii. 27—a symbol of their personal dedication, along with the first-fruits of their yearly increase, to the Lord. The burnt-offering, as originally prescribed in Le. xxiii. 18, was one young bullock and two rams, instead of two bullocks and one ram, which is either to be understood as an alternative that might at times be preferred, or, as is more probable, a later regulation, which was to be regarded as virtually superseding what had been in existence before. A kid of the goats for a sin-offering was also to be slain, to make atonement for them—bringing to remembrance the sin which cleaved to them in all their services, and which required to be blotted out, that these services might come up with acceptance before God.

This feast has very commonly been considered as intended, partly at least, to commemorate the giving of the law, which certainly took place very nearly at the distance of fifty days from the killing of the Passover, although the time cannot be determined to a day. No indication, however, occurs of this view in Scripture, nor is any trace of it to be found in Philo or Josephus. Maimonides seems to be the first Jewish writer who gave expression to it—"Festum septimanarum est dies ille, quo Lex data fuit" (More Nev. iii. 41); but Abarband rejected it on the ground that the divine law had no need of the sanctification of a day in order to keep alive the memory of its promulgation (In Leg. fol. 282). It seems chiefly to have been from a supposed parallel between the giving of the law and the descent of the Spirit that the view has obtained such extensive currency among Christian divines. Whatever plausibility however may attach to it, and whatever reality in the connection between the two events which it couples together, the view itself rests upon no solid footing. There are simply two points of ascertained and real moment in the scriptural account of the feast. (1.) First, its reference to the second day of the Passover, when the sheaf of barley was presented at the tabernacle, the former day being the commencement, this latter day the completion of the harvest period. Hence, all being now finished which concerned the garnering of the year's provision, the special offering was not of ripe corn, but of loaves, representing the whole staff of bread. (2.) Then, secondly, there was the reference to the intervening weeks—the week of weeks—a complete revolution of time somehow peculiarly connected with God—shut in on each hand by a holy Sabbath and an offering of first-fruits, and thus marked off as the season of the year which, more than any other, was distinguished for the tokens of his presence and working. Why should this season in particular have been so distinguished? Simply because it was the reaping time of the year. Canaan was in a peculiar sense God's land; the covenant-people were guests and sojourners with him upon it, and it was his part, so long as they remained faithful in their allegiance to him, to provide for their wants and satisfy them with good things. The harvest was more especially the season for his doing this; it was the time of his more conspicuous working in their behalf, when he crowned the year with his goodness, and laid up, as it were, in his storehouses what was required to furnish them with supplies till the return of another harvest. It was fitting, therefore, that he should be expressly owned and honoured both at the beginning and the ending of the period—that as the first of the ripening ears of corn, so the first of the baked loaves of bread should be presented to him—and that the people, especially at the close, as guests well cared for and plentifully furnished with the comforts of life, should come before the Lord to praise him for his mercies, and give substantial expression to their gratitude by contributing of the fruits of their increase to those whom he wished to have regarded as the more peculiar objects of his sympathy.

It must be obvious to any reflecting mind that such an order and such arrangements are fraught with important lessons of instruction, even in respect to the sphere of ordinary life. There God still manifests his care and bountifulness in providing, and by acts of reverent homage and gifts of substantial beneficence, he should be continually honoured by those who are the partakers of his bounty. Even in that lower sphere, the great principles on which the feast proceeded, and which it aimed at ever calling forth into living recognition, should be acknowledged and acted on by every husbandman in the field of nature, and every productive labourer in the business of life. But if we look to the higher sphere of things spiritual and divine, which are the only proper antitype of the other, then we are reminded by the arrangements of this feast, first of God's peculiar working season in the matter of redemption, and then of the relation between that and the actual participation and fruit of its purchased benefits. The time of Christ's personal ministry on earth—from the moment that he appeared at the banks of Jordan, making profession of his high purpose to fulfil all righteousness, till he bowed his head on the accursed tree, finishing transgression and making an end of sin by the sacrifice of himself—that was emphatically God's ripening and reaping time in the work of salvation, during which he was bringing into act his eternal purpose of love, and once for all garnered up in his kingdom the inexhaustible riches of his grace and blessing. Of this incomparable harvest Christ was at once the provider and the provision—the first ripe fruits, and the meritorious possessor of all that was needed to bring forth others of a like kind. What, then, was required to complete the process, but such a further movement in the divine economy as would turn the fruits of grace provided into the bread of life received and fed upon by the souls of men? And this was the closing act, which began to take effect on the day of Pentecost; it stood related to the preceding work of Christ, as the Passover with its first-fruits of ripened grain to the feast of weeks with its loaves of prepared food. The Spirit now descended with the things of Christ to show them with power to the souls of men. The riches of the purchased redemption, existing yet but as a treasure provided and laid up by God for them that love him, became an actual heritage of life and blessing, rendering such as were willing to partake of the benefit a kind of first-fruits of his creatures. If a word, the leading characteristic of the divine kingdom before this was the working out of redemption, now it came to be the application of its blessings. Hitherto it was the manifestation of the Son for men, now and henceforth it was to be the operation of the Spirit within them—causing the seed in men's hearts to spring up and germinate and bring forth fruit unto life everlasting. They are emphatically the blessed who thus receive of the good things of the kingdom; and how can they be conscious of the blessedness without inviting others, the spiritually poor and needy, to come and rejoice with them?

IV. The Feast of Trumpets or New Moon.—It was the moon that might be said to rule the year with the Israelites, and by its successive changes and revolutions to determine all the larger divisions of time. The year was made up of so many moons; each month consisted of the period of a single moon's revolution; and the month was again divided into four equal parts, or weeks, to a nearness corresponding with the four successive aspects of the moon. It was therefore quite natural that the new moons should have some mark of distinction connected with them in the Jewish ritual. They were not, however, placed among the feasts or the seasons appointed for Sabbaths and holy convocations—although it would seem, from certain allusions in Scripture (Is. i. 13; 2 Ki. iv. 23), that it was not unusual for the more zealous ceremonialists, or the more piously inclined members of the old covenant, to observe them as a kind of holidays. They were so far distinguished in the law from other days, that the same special offerings were ordered to be presented on them as were assigned to the regular moadeem, Nu. xviii. 11-15; and they were marked by the further distinction of a blowing of trumpets over the burnt-offerings, Nu. x. 10; Ps. lxxxi. 3. These things certainly raised the new moons out of the rank of ordinary days, and made them, one might say, demi-feast days. But it was reserved for only one of them to take rank with the moadeem, as a day of sacred rest and holy convocations; yet it received its more peculiar designation from what it had in common with the other new moons, namely, the blowing of trumpets; it was called the feast of trumpets; on which account, we may suppose, the trumpet-blowing would be both continued longer and raised louder than at other new moons. What belonged to the others as a subsidiary distinction, was for this a leading characteristic. The day thus signalized was the first of the seventh month, which fell somewhere about our October; and though the people were not required to appear at the sanctuary, yet the day was to be observed as a Sabbath, and the regular feast-offerings were to be presented on it, Nu. xxi. 1-6.

There can be no doubt that the sacred use of the trumpet had its reason in the loud and stirring noise it emits. This is described as a cry, Le. xxv. 9—the rendering sound in the English Bible is too feeble—which was to make itself heard throughout the whole land. The references to it in Scripture not unfrequently indicate the same idea, Zep. i. 16; Is. lviii. 3; Hos. viii. 1, &c. And for this reason the sound of the trumpet was familiarly employed as an image of the voice or word of God. The voice of God and the voice of the trumpet on Mount Sinai were heard together—first, the trumpet-sound as the symbol, then the living reality, Ex. xix. 16-19. St. John also speaks of having heard the voice of the Lord as that of a trumpet, Re. i. 10; iv. 1; and the thrilling sound of the trumpet is once and again represented as the immediate harbinger of the Son of Man when coming in power and great glory, to utter the almighty word, which shall quicken the dead to life, and bring to a close the present frame of things, Mat. xxiv. 31; 1 Co. xv. 52; 1 Th. iv. 16. It is clear, therefore, that the blowing of the trumpet was, in certain connections, used as a symbol of the mighty voice of God, which, when uttered, none may venture to disregard; and, subordinately, of course, it may have been used of any stirring agency, even on the part of man, such as was fitted to call forth awakened energy and spirited application to the work and service of God. It was hence peculiarly the war-note—summoning the people to put forth their energies as to a great work of God, and piercing, as it were, the ear of God himself in the heavens, that he might arise to their help against the mighty, Nu. x. 2. Such appears to have been the general import of the blowing of trumpets at the festival of that name on the first day of the seventh month. That month was distinguished above all the other months of the year for the multitude of ordinances connected with it; it was emphatically the sacred month. Its place as the seventh in the Jewish calendar marked it out for this distinction (see NUMBERS, SACRED); it bore on its name the numerical impress of the covenant, and, as such, was to be hallowed above all the months of the year by solemnities which bespoke at once God's singular goodness to his people, and the people's special interest in God. For, not only was its first day consecrated to sacred rest and spiritual employment, but the tenth was the great day of yearly atonement, the one day in the year when the high-priest was permitted to pass within the veil, and sprinkle the mercy-seat with the blood of sacrifice; and then on the fifteenth of the month commenced the feast of tabernacles, which, as a fitting conclusion to the whole festal cycle, called the people to rejoice in the goodness which the Lord had given them to experience, as contrasted with the former periods of trial and humiliation. In perfect accordance with all this, the feast of this new moon is called "a memorial of blowing of trumpets," or rather a bringing to remembrance, putting the people in mind of the great things they were to expect; yea, putting God himself in mind of the great things he had promised to bestow, in connection with the solemnities of that month—precisely as when they went to war against an enemy that oppressed them, they were ordered to blow the trumpet; and, it is added, "Ye shall be remembered before the Lord your God, and ye shall be saved from your enemies," Nu. x. 2.

The principle enshrined in all this avails for New as well as for Old Testament times; the form has passed away, but the spirit remains. There are times when believers need, and when they may warrantably expect, the larger gifts of grace than ordinary, fuller experiences of life and blessing. Let them, as it were, blow the trumpet, if they would obtain these; stir up all their energies and desires, and put God in mind of the promises on which he has caused them to hope. Such is for all times the sure road to success; since the gifts of grace and the actual capacity for serving and enjoying God always exist in a certain correspondence with the state of awakened desire and spiritual application on the part of believers.

V. The Feast of the Day of Atonement.—The services connected with the day of atonement were in themselves so peculiar, and had such a specific bearing on the events of gospel history, that they might, perhaps, have been considered with more advantage in immediate connection with the tabernacle. But as they have had their place assigned them by the lawgiver himself in the category of the moadeem, we shall adhere to the same order. The day for their performance, as already noticed, was the tenth of the seventh month; a strict Sabbath, on which no servile work was to be done, but which was to be for holy convocations, and also—unlike other Sabbaths, which were to be days of refreshment and joy, Le. xviii. 10; Le. xviii. 13—for the people afflicting their souls. So rigidly was this use and aspect of the day to be maintained, that whosoever would not on that day afflict his soul was to be cut off from among his people; he virtually renounced his right to the standing and privileges of the covenant, Le. xxiii. 29-32. The mode of afflicting the soul was not more exactly defined, in order that the people might perceive something more than a merely external deprivation to be meant; but undoubtedly it was also intended to find, and for the most part would actually find, an outward expression in the total or comparative abstinence from food. (See FAST.) The distinctive character and design of the day was to bring sin, the collective sin of the whole year, to remembrance, for the purpose of being earnestly dealt with and atoned; and anything like a light and joyous frame of mind on such an occasion was entirely unsuitable. It is to the penitent and humble alone that God shows mercy and grants forgiveness; no one in another mood had reason to expect that any sacrifice he presented, even on ordinary occasions, would be accepted on his behalf; and on what was emphatically the day of atonements, when the high-priest was to make confession of all the sins of the community, and in their behalf enter with the blood of reconciliation into the most holy place, if the contrite and lowly spirit was awaiting in any of the members of the community, it was but too clear that they had really no part or lot in the matter. In this general aspect of the feast, therefore, it presented itself as an occasion and a call of a peculiarly solemn kind, for the people of the covenant returning through the channel of godly sorrow and atonement for sin into the blessed rest of God's mercy and favour, so that as partakers thereof they might rejoice before him and run the way of his commandments.

The more peculiar interest of the day, however, concentrated itself in the person and actions of the high-priest; and here we have a very remarkable and significant series of operations. (1.) The first thing that required to be attended to was the dress of the high-priest. After the usual morning oblations, at which, if he personally officiated, he was robed in the garments that were made for ornament and beauty, Ex. xxviii. 1-40, he had to strip himself; and, having washed his person, had to put on other garments made of plain linen—a linen tunic, linen breeches, a linen girdle, and the linen mitre—which are called emphatically "garments of holiness," and as soon as the more distinctive service of the day was over, he had again to put them off, and leave them in the sanctuary till another occasion, Le. xvi. 4, 23. These plain linen garments—clean and white as they doubtless were—require no explanation; they were the symbols of that holiness which became one who would enter the immediate presence of the Most High, and mediate with effect between him and sinful men, Re. vii. 13; xix. 8. Hence, the high-priest's investment with them was preceded by the washing of his person; he had first to make himself (symbolically) clean or holy, and then outwardly appear as such. (2.) When thus personally prepared, he had to provide himself with a bullock for a sin-offering, the blood of which was for the atonement of himself and his house; that is, the whole sacerdotal family to which he belonged; and with this blood he had to make his entrance, for the first time on that day within the veil, and sprinkle the mercy-seat, also in front of it sprinkle seven times. This act, however, had to be accompanied with another—perhaps it would be more correct to say, with Winer and Bähr, preceded by another—his bearing a censer with incense, kindled by live coals taken from the brazen altar, that the cloud of incense might, as it were, go before, and cover the mercy-seat ere the act of sprinkling was performed, Le. xvi. 12, 13. As it would not be quite easy to carry the vessel with the blood, along with the censer of smoking incense, the probability is that they were two separate actions, effected by a double entrance. But whether that might be the case or not, there can be no doubt that the action with the incense took precedence of the sprinkling, and made preparation for it. Now, the offering of incense was simply an embodied prayer, Ps. cxli. 2; Lu. l. 9, 10; Re. v. 8; and this action indicated that the entrance of the high-priest into the most holy place, as the head and representative of a sinful community, was no privilege to be claimed as a right, but one that had to be sought by supplication from a merciful and prayer-hearing God. Entering, therefore, as a suppliant, and entering for the purpose of sprinkling the blood that had been shed for the atonement of his personal and family guilt, the high-priest became on this occasion an impressive witness of the humiliating truth, that sin is unspeakably hateful in the sight of God, and is only to be remitted to the prayerful and penitent through the shedding of blood. (3.) All this, however, was but preliminary to the great act of reconciliation, which bore respect to the worshipping community of Israel. For this purpose two goats were selected—which were to be taken from the congregation, as the bullock had been from himself, but which, though two, were still viewed as a formal unity. It was as a sin-offering that they were to be taken, and presented before the Lord at the door of the tabernacle, Le. xvi. 5, 7. One complex act was all that had to be symbolized on the occasion, and two victims were chosen to do it, simply on account of the impossibility of giving otherwise a full representation of what was included in the act—the one being designed to supply the means of atonement, and the other to exhibit its perfected result. If, however, the two goats constituted properly but one offering, and an offering which was presented before the Lord, it is clear that to him alone they both really belonged, and that there can be no ground for dividing (as some have erroneously done) between the two goats, as if the one only were for God, and the other were for Satan. The same conclusion is still further confirmed by the act of casting lots upon them; for this was practised only in regard to what was recognized as peculiarly the Lord's, and with the view of ascertaining his mind in some respect concerning it. The question to be here determined was, not which of the two goats was to be adjudged to the Lord, and which to some other party; but what respectively were the parts to be assigned to each of them, in the complex act of sin-bearing, which was to be effected through their joint instrumentality. In such a case their respective destinations in the matter could not differ at all essentially; the parts to be performed by each could not have been mutually independent, far less formally antagonistic; since it turned simply on the casting of the lot which should be destined to the one part and which to the other. The two parts actually were—one for the Lord, the other for Azazel, or for a scape-goat, as it is rendered in our version. On this expression a considerable diversity of opinion has been entertained, and it will be necessary to consider the point separately. (See SCAPE-GOAT.) But the real import of the transaction connected with this second goat is made so plain otherwise, that nothing material can be said to depend upon the precise term. (4.) The goat on which the Lord's lot fell was forthwith slain as a sin-offering; and with its blood, as before with that of the bullock, the high-priest entered anew (for the second, and probably the third time) within the veil, and sprinkled it upon and before the mercy-seat; then, returning into the sanctuary or holy place, he sprinkled also there, and again at the altar of burnt-offering in the court, Ex. xxx. 10; Le. xvi. 17. For with that blood he had to make atonement, not merely for the congregation directly, but also for "the holy place, because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions in all their sins: and so also for the tabernacle of the congregation (the tent of meeting) that dwelleth amongst them in the midst of their uncleanness." Not, of course, that these things were in themselves capable of contracting guilt; the sins atoned for still were the sins of the congregation; only, with the view of showing more distinctly their hatefulness in God's sight, and their contrariety to his service, they were here contemplated as having come up from all quarters of the land, and imparted defilement to the several apartments and vessels of the house, in which (symbolically) the people were allowed to meet and dwell with God. It was, in another form, but the people's concentrated guilt; and so the blood that sanctified was the blood of the one sin-offering that was to be presented for the congregation of Israel. (5.) Then came the action with the other goat—the still unappropriated part of the sin-offering—which remained standing before the tabernacle or temple, while the high-priest was making atonement for the sins of the people with the blood of the slain goat. Laying his hands on the head of that live goat, the priest had now to confess over it "all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins, putting them upon the head of the goat, and thereafter send him away by the hand of a fit man into the wilderness. And the goat (it is added) shall bear upon him all their iniquities into a land not inhabited; and he shall let go the goat into the wilderness." The iniquities, it must be remembered, had been all previously atoned; everything in God's house, up to the very seat of the divine Majesty, which they had polluted, had been again reconciled; so that when now laid upon the head of the live goat, it must have been as iniquities cancelled in the divine reckoning, and destined to utter oblivion. Hence, no sooner were they transferred to this goat than he was dismissed with them into the wilderness, bearing them to a land not inhabited, where not a being lived that could call them to remembrance, or become a witness of their existence. It was, in short, a symbolical action, indicating to the bodily eye the result of the atonement that had been made, and rendering palpable

to the people the comforting truth, that God had in a manner cast out of his sight their past transgressions, having accepted the atonement. (In the English version there is an unhappy rendering at the first mention of this live goat, which greatly obscures the meaning of the transaction. The words there used regarding the live goat should run, "shall be presented alive before the Lord to cover upon him," or make atonement for him, not "to make an atonement with him." This goat was the representative of the people as first to be atoned for, and then actually participating in the atonement—forgiven; and the action with him took up the history where the death of the other had left it. If the slain goat could have been raised to life again, the continuity of the action would have been more readily perceived; but this not being practicable except by miracle, the action was carried forward to its fitting result by a fresh goat taking the place of the other.) (8.) The remaining parts of the solemnity may be regarded as the natural and appropriate winding up of the service, rather than anything strictly new. The high-priest, after dismissing the goat, had to disrobe himself of the plain linen clothes in which the peculiar work of the day had been performed, and resume his wonted attire. At the same time he had to wash his flesh—a process to be undergone at the beginning and close of all priestly ministrations of a more formal kind, as a witness of the pollutions which intermingled even with these. Then he had to offer two burnt-offerings, one for himself and one for the people; to make an atonement, it is said, for himself and for the people—an atonement even after the special atonement which had already been made in the previous service. It betokened the presence of sin in the very act of getting sin taken away, and the necessity of all throwing themselves on the mercy of God even at the close of transactions which had brought them into most immediate contact with it. Being, however, a burnt-offering, not a sin-offering, that was now presented, this implied, that along with the taking away of the guilt that had been contracted, there was the call to a fresh dedication of soul and body to the service of God. In this case, of course, the entire flesh of the victims was consumed upon the altar; but the flesh of the sin-offerings—the bullock for the high-priest and the goat for the congregation—had to be taken, in accordance with the law regulating such cases, without the camp or city, and burned in a clean place. This burning arose, not from the flesh being polluted—on the contrary, the flesh of all sin-offerings was declared to be most holy, Le. vi. 26-27; but here, where the priesthood and congregation were alike concerned, there was no one who could with propriety eat of it; it had therefore to be burned, but still as a holy thing in a clean place. Yet having had to do with sin, the person who took charge of the burning of the carcase, as also the person who was employed in conducting the live goat into the wilderness, had each to bathe his person, and wash his clothes, before resuming his place in the congregation.

Such was the nature of the day of yearly atonement, and such were the services by which it was distinguished. It was the occasion above all others, on which the ideas of sin and atonement rose to their highest potency in the ritual of the old covenant, and on which also, for the purpose of exhibiting those ideas in their clearest light, the distinction came most prominently out between priest and people—the idea of one ordained from among men, for the purpose of drawing near to God, and mediating in behalf of his fellowmen in things pertaining to sin and salvation. But these ideas after all could only be developed imperfectly under the shadowy and carnal forms of the old covenant; in the new alone do they find their proper realization. And it is the less needful to enlarge upon this view of the matter, as of all the Old Testament services this is the one which has received the fullest explanation from the pen of an inspired writer in the New. In Heb. ix. and x. almost everything of importance connected with the matter has been touched upon, both as regards the correspondences between the new and the old, and the superiority of the one over the other. Here alone, in the new, have we a high-priest who is perfectly fitted, from his own inherent attributes and character, to enter the holiest; who without sin of his own, and consequently without any personal atonement, can make intercession for the guilty; and who, by his one spotless, infinitely precious atonement in their behalf, has for ever laid open the way by which they may draw near and find acceptance in his sight. The veil, therefore, which excluded a free approach into the holiest, while it admitted a single approach by means of a representative once every year, was rent in twain at the death of Christ, to show that what had been imperfectly enjoyed before was now, in a manner, made common to the people of God; that in the name of Christ all who believed might come with boldness to the throne of grace, and deal directly with God. But with these differences there are also fundamental agreements, and the palpable and solemn manner in which, on the day of atonement, the great truths were brought out, of the reality and evil desert of sin, of the necessity of a mediating priest and a prevailing atonement to purge it away, of the complete and total oblivion into which the evil is cast when God's method of reconciliation has been complied with, may be contemplated with much profit still by the people of God. They can thus behold the things which concern their relation to God written as upon tables, and get a clearer apprehension and more realizing conviction of them, than could otherwise be obtained. It is for that purpose partly that the Old Testament pattern of the heavenly things is used in New Testament scripture, and for that purpose it may still with advantage be employed.

VI. The Feast of Tabernacles.—This was the last of the divinely appointed moedtem or sacred festivals, under the old covenant. It was made to commence on the fifteenth of the seventh month, five days after the day of yearly atonement; and, in respect to continuance, was the most protracted of all the festivals. The Passover was to last for seven days; but an eighth was added in the feast of tabernacles; and in this case also, as at the feast of unleavened bread, the first and the last day was to be observed as a Sabbath, a day of holy convocation. In Le. xxiii. 34, it bears the name of the feast of tabernacles, though strictly it should be booths (succoth); but in other passages it has the designation of the feast of ingathering, because it took place "in the end of the year, when they had gathered in their labours out of the field," Ex. xxiii. 16; De. xvi. 13. The meaning is, that the entire circle of the year's husbandry should then have been completed, and its produce garnered; not the crops of the field merely reaped, but the vintage also past, and there remained only such operations as might be needed to prepare for the coming winter. For an agricultural population like the Israelites that might justly be called the end of the year, and it must usually have been also a season of repose. The people would, therefore, have ample time for the celebration of the feast.

The other and more common designation of the feast—that of booths or tabernacles—points to the nature of the feast itself and the mode of its celebration. A booth is not precisely the same as a tent or tabernacle; but is so far alike, that the one as well as the other was a slim and temporary fabric, speedily constructed for the sake of shelter. It was not, however, made of canvas, but of branches and leaves woven together (the root being תָּבֹט, to interweave). Such was the booth of Jonah, ch. iv. 5, and such also the sheds Jacob made for his cattle near Shechem, Ge. xxxiii. 17. But the material of the structure was often not regarded; and hence booths and tents are used interchangeably for the dwellings of the children of Israel in the wilderness. "Ye shall dwell in booths," it is said with reference to this feast, "seven days; all that are Israelites born shall dwell in booths; that your generations may know that I made the children of Israel to dwell in booths, when I brought them out of the land of Egypt," Le. xxiii. 42, 43. In the great majority of passages referring to the wilderness-sojourn, it is tents that the Israelites are said to dwell in—for example, De. i. 27; Nu. xvi. 26; xxiv. 5; De. xi. 4, &c. It was these which in reality were chiefly used, as being the most easily procured and carried about—light and manageable, the proper domiciles of a yet unsettled and wandering population, and as such forming a natural contrast to fixed and stationary dwellings. This contrast is formally brought out in the case of the Rechabites, whose father charged them not to build houses, but to dwell in tents; and by David in respect to the dwelling-place of God, on the memorable occasion when he said to Nathan the prophet, "See now I dwell in an house of cedar, but the ark of God dwelleth within curtains," that is in a tent, 2 Sa. vii. 3; Jo. xiv. 7. There is a pointed reference also to the same contrast in a New Testament passage, in which the apostle finely indicates the superiority of that building of God, the house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens, which awaits the glorified believer, to the earthly house of his tabernacle, which is to be dissolved in death, 2 Co. v. 1—the one a frail, perishable framework, falling to pieces when it has served its purpose, the other a fixed, stable, everlasting habitation.

When the Israelites had established themselves in Canaan, and grown into a numerous people, a practical difficulty might be experienced as to the proper celebration of this feast—the difficulty of getting themselves provided at one central place of meeting with branches of palms and other trees in sufficient abundance for the occasion. It is said, they did so provide themselves in the time of Nehemiah, ch. viii. 16: "The people went forth and brought (i.e. branches of various sorts of trees) and made themselves booths, every one upon the roof of his house, and in their courts, and in the courts of the house of God, and in the street of the water-gate, and in the street of the gate of Ephraim." In all these places they then made booths and sat under them; but, it is added, "since the days of Joshua the son of Nun, unto that day, the children of Israel had not done so." We are not to suppose that they had during that long period allowed the feast of tabernacles to fall into abeyance, or in celebrating it had made no attempt to construct booths with branches of trees. That the feast was kept, and kept so as to exercise an important influence on the national mind, is evident from the fact of Jeroboam having instituted a similar feast in his kingdom, only transferring the time from the seventh to the eighth month, 1 Ki. xii. 32, 33. But the use of branches in celebrating the feast had never been so marked and general. And this might to some extent be accounted for from the much smaller number attending the feast, than would be usual in the brighter periods of the commonwealth. Indeed, as the larger proportion of those who actually assembled to keep the feast were necessarily far from their homes, and were for the time living in public rather than dwelling in families, one might say that the spirit and design of the ordinance would have been maintained, if there were only such an erection of booths in the more public streets and places of general resort, as admitted of the people entering them occasionally and spending a portion of each day in them. With ordinary care and pains there could rarely have been any difficulty in obtaining a supply of branches sufficient for such a purpose, and even for furnishing besides a number of the families residing in the neighbourhood with what might be required for their individual use.

That this booth or tent like appearance which was to characterize the feast had a commemorative bearing, admits of no question. In the passage already quoted from Leviticus it is stated as the reason for their making booths, that succeeding generations might know how they had been made to dwell in booths, when the Lord brought them out of the land of Egypt. It was designed to embody in a perpetually recurring action the historical fact of the unsettled, wandering life of Israel during the wilderness-sojourn, that the memory of it might be ever fresh in the minds of their descendants. And in the commemoration of this fact, as of facts generally which are embalmed in commemorative ordinances, it is to be understood, that the fact itself was of a fundamental character, containing the germ of spiritual truths and principles vitally important for every age of the church. Such undoubtedly was the character of the wilderness-sojourn for the Israelites, though not precisely in the same degree as the deliverance from Egypt which was commemorated in the Passover. It was, however, of fundamental importance in this respect, that it formed in a sense the connecting link between the house of bondage, on the one hand, and the inheritance of life and blessing, on the other. The Lord then in a peculiar manner came near to reveal himself to his people—pitched his tabernacle in the midst of them—communicated to them his law and testimony, and set up the entire polity which was to mould the future generations of Israel, and to be consummated rather than abolished by the incarnation and work of Christ. Hence, the annual celebration of the feast of tabernacles was like a perpetual renewing of their religious youth; it was keeping in lively recollection the time of their espousals, and placing themselves anew amid the scenes and transactions which constituted the formative period of their history. On this account also, it doubtless was that the feast of tabernacles was the time chosen for reading, every seventh year, the whole law in the hearing of the people, De. xxxi. 10-13, and not, as some have thought (in particular Exh. Symbolic, ii. p. 68), because it was the greatest feast, or the one most largely frequented. In this respect the Passover certainly held the foremost place. But it was when sojourning in the wilderness, and dwelling in tents, that the covenant of law, under which they were to go into the land of Canaan and take possession of it for themselves and their posterity, was formally given and ratified. So that nothing could be more appropriate, when re-enacting the scenes of their religious youth, than being called to listen anew to that law, the giving of which formed so distinguishing a feature of the time. This connection of the law, however, with the feast of tabernacles, affords a collateral proof of what was already established—that the feast of Pentecost was no commemoration of the giving of the law; for had it been, the formal reading of the law would certainly have been appointed for the feast of Pentecost, rather than that of tabernacles.

There was, therefore, a much closer connection between the booth-dwelling portion of Israel's history and its future rest in Canaan, than is found in contemplating the one as the mere transition-period that naturally conducted to the other. And it will appear still more so if we look to the personal training through which the Israelites then passed, and the discipline they were made to undergo. If in one respect it was the period of the Lord's manifestation to his people, whereby he sought to make them acquainted with his purposes of love and his principles of government, it was, in another, the period of their trial and humiliation—in which, by hardships tempered with mercies, difficulties, and disappointments, interchanging with wonderful displays of power and glory, the Lord brought out the evil that was in their hearts, and schooled them into subjection to his righteous will. Viewed with reference to its prolonged continuance, as the forty years' sojourn, it was emphatically a period of judgment and discipline. Hence the words of Moses at the close of it: "Thou shalt remember all the way by which the Lord thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldst keep his commandments or not. And he humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna, which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know, that he might make thee know that man liveth not by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord," De. viii. 2-5. This alternating process of want and supply, of great and appalling danger ever ready to be met by seasonable, though unexpected or extraordinary relief, was the grand testing process by which the still existing unbelief and carnalism in their hearts was made manifest, that it might be condemned and purged out, and that they might be formed, as a people, to that humble reliance on God's arm, and single-hearted devotedness to his fear, which alone could prepare them for occupying and permanently retaining the Promised Land. It proved in the issue greatly too severe and searching for the mass of the original congregation; in other words, the evil in their natures was too deeply rooted to be effectually purged out, even by such well-adjusted and skilfully applied means of purification; and, as the result, they were judged incapable of entering the land of Canaan. But for those who were allowed to enter, and their posterity to latest generations, it was of essential moment to have kept alive upon their minds the peculiar training and discipline of the wilderness; in order to their habitually aiming at the high moral condition, the living faith in God, the weanedness of heart, the self-denial, the filial obedience to which it was designed to conduct. In this respect especially it was their duty to be ever connecting the present with the past—to be treading over again the ground on which their fathers had acquired their dear-bought experience; since it was only by voluntarily making its discipline and results their own that they could be warranted to look forward to fresh seasons of prosperity and joy. For this purpose more especially the feast was instituted. And while the fulness of earthly comfort amid which it was held, being brought into contrast with their formerly poor and wandering condition, called them to rejoice, the reminiscence of judgment and trial in the desert taught them to rejoice with trembling—reminded them that their continued possession of the land of Canaan, and the enjoyment in it of fruitful seasons and settled homes, depended on their fidelity to the covenant of God—warned them, that if they turned back in heart to the manners of Egypt, or became lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God, periods of trial and destitution might again be expected. Hence, when such actually came to be the case—when the peculiar lessons of this feast ceased to be regarded—when Israel "knew not that it was the Lord who gave her corn, and wine, and oil, and multiplied her silver and gold," it became needful to send her virtually again through the rough and sifting process of her youth. "Therefore will I return, and take away my corn in the time thereof, and my wine in the season thereof; I will also cause all her mirth to cease, and I will destroy her vines and her fig-trees; and I will allure her, and bring her into the wilderness, and will speak comfortably unto her; and I will give her vineyards from thence, and the valley of Achor for a door of hope," &c., Ho. ii. 8-16; comp. Isa. ii. It was not that the scenes of youth were literally to be enacted over again; but that the kind of dealing involved in them—the fleshly mortifications, the enforced separation from natural delights, the severe trial and discipline which characterized the wilderness-sojourn—must be undergone anew, in order that the spirit of earnest and devoted zeal, in which it had issued, might again become the characteristic of the people of God.

The view now given of the nature and design of the feast—grounded, as it manifestly is, in the representations of Scripture, and the essential relations of things—renders unnecessary any formal exposure of the opinion which has been frequently maintained, that the feast was chiefly an occasion for carnal merriment, dancing, and revelry. When the people themselves became carnal, it would no doubt partake much of the same character; but as instituted by God, it was designed to be otherwise observed. The occasion was certainly meant to be a joyous one. The people were commanded to rejoice over all the goodness and mercy which the Lord had given them to experience; but their joy was to be such as could be indulged in before the Lord, and should have admitted nothing that might interfere with their interest in his favour and fellowship. It was apparently from this relation of the feast to a hallowed cheerfulness and exultation, that the broad-leaved palm-tree was so much used on the occasion. The people were not absolutely shut up to branches of this tree; for, beside palm-trees, willows are also specified in the original institution, Lc. xiii. 4.

and at the feast in Nehemiah's time, olive, myrtle, and pine are mentioned, along with the palm, as having been employed. But as branches of "goodly trees" were required, the palm seems to have been regarded, from its peculiarly rich foliage, as the fittest symbol of the joyful feelings which the feast was intended to call forth; and we are not without other instances in Scripture, which show how readily the palm was associated with exultant occasions, or seasons of rapturous delight, Jn. xii. 13; Ra. vii. 9.

One of the most singular peculiarities of this feast remains yet to be noticed; it consists in the number of victims to be presented for burnt-offerings. There was the same sin-offering as in the other stated feasts—a single goat to be offered each day; but for the burnt-offering, instead of one ram and seven lambs, there were to be two rams and fourteen lambs on each of the seven days, and instead of one bullock, thirteen bullocks at the commencement, diminishing by one each day, till on the seventh there were merely seven. The eighth day, though in one sense belonging to the feast, might also be regarded as in some sort standing by itself, forming the closing solemnity of the whole festival season; and accordingly the special burnt-offerings on that day differed very little from that of other festival-days, and were entirely the same as the new moon and the tenth day of the seventh month—namely, one bullock, one ram, and seven lambs, Nu. xxix. 12-36. The difficulty is to account for the extraordinary number of victims appointed for the seven days of the feast of tabernacles—double the number of rams and lambs that were fixed for all the other solemnities, and the remarkable peculiarity in respect to the bullocks, of beginning with such a number as thirteen and ending with seven. Viewing the matter generally, one may readily perceive a reason for the larger number of the offerings presented, in the occasion of the feast, as appointed at the close of the ingathering of all the fruits of the season, and intended to call forth a grateful sense of the Lord's goodness in bestowing upon his people the gifts of his beneficence. We make no account, as already intimated, of its being called in a passage often quoted from Plutarch (Sympos. i. 4, 5), "the greatest of the Jewish feasts," or of the similar expressions applied to it by Philo, Josephus (Ant. viii. 4, 1), and the rabbins; for in no proper sense could it be called the greatest; in depth of meaning and vital importance it did not equal either the feast of the Passover or that of the day of atonement. Yet, as so specially connected with the Lord's bountifulness in giving, it might most appropriately be marked by a more than common liberality in the number and value of the offerings, especially of such offerings as were from their nature significant of the surrender and dedication of the person of the worshipper. But why precisely double the number of rams and lambs on each of the seven days, and half the number on the eighth; and, especially, why the regular diminution in the number of the bullocks from thirteen to seven, and, on the last day, from seven to one—of this no adequate explanation has yet been given. The opinions of the rabbins are mere conjectures, most of them frivolous and absurd, and deserve no particular notice. To see in it, with Bähr, a reference to the waning moon, is quite fanciful; nor is it less so, to understand it, with the majority of the elder typologists, of the gradual ceasing of animal sacrifice; for the sacred number seven being reserved for the seventh day of the feast, together with the usual feast-offerings on the eighth day, might as well be conceived to point in the opposite direction. Perhaps nothing more was meant by the arrangement than to give an indication of the variety, within certain limits, which the sacrificial system admitted of in the expression of devout and grateful feeling. It was proper, on joyful occasions, to let the overflow of feeling appear in the multiplicity of whole burnt-offerings brought to the altar; while still nothing depended thereon for the virtue and stability of the covenant. The seven bullocks, two rams, and fourteen lambs, on the seventh day of the feast, or the one bullock, one ram, and seven lambs, on the eighth, were sufficient to represent whatever was vital in the covenant, or in the people's connection with it; while yet certain fuller embodiments of spiritual feeling were suitable at peculiar times, and never more than when the solemnities of the great day of atonement were freshest in the recollections of the people. Whether this view may be held to be satisfactory or not, it presents nothing at least that is arbitrary, or that interferes with the general principles of the ancient economy.

In addition to the ceremonies prescribed in the law, the later Jews were wont to observe certain customs at this feast, in particular the custom of drawing water from the well of Siloam, and pouring it, mixed with wine, from a golden pitcher, by the hands of a priest, on the altar at the time of the morning sacrifice. This was done, according to the Jewish authorities, on the seven days of the feast, but not on the eighth, as has often been improperly represented. They are quite express upon that point, for they reckoned only the seven days to belong to the feast proper; the eighth was esteemed a kind of separate and concluding solemnity (see Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. in Ev. Joh. vii. 37; also Winer, Realwör. Leubhüt.) If therefore what is called "the last, the great day of the feast," in Jn. vii. 37, was meant the eighth day, our Lord must have taken occasion, from the absence on that day of the customary libation on the altar, to point to himself as the living fountain that alone could supply what was needed for the wants of the soul. But it is more probable that the seventh day is meant, as the last and great day of the feast in the ordinary Jewish reckoning; so that the water mixed with wine was poured out amid demonstrations of gladness from the people, shouting in the words of Isaiah, "with joy shall ye draw water from the wells of salvation;" and our Lord, seizing the opportunity to draw their thoughts from the shadow to the reality, exclaimed, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink; he that believeth on me, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water."

The bearing of the feast of tabernacles on the realities of the gospel is not difficult to be perceived, and in its leading features may be indicated in comparatively few words. The Israelites in their collective position and history typified the seed of God's elect under the gospel; and therefore, in this feast, which brought together the beginnings and endings of God's dealings with Israel, we have a representation of the spiritual life, as well in its earlier struggles as in its ultimate triumphs. We behold the antitype, first of all, and without imperfection, in the history of Him who was pre-eminently God's elect, the Lord Jesus Christ—led up, after an obscure, and for a season persecuted, youth, into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil; and when for forty days—a day for a year —he had withstood the malice and subtlety of the tempter, he came forth with the full assurance of victory to accomplish the mighty work of man's redemption. In this work, also, the beginning and the end meet together; the one is but the just recompense and full development of the other. The obedience and sufferings go before, and lay the foundation for the final glory. Jesus must personally triumph over sin and death, fulfil in all respects the Father's will, before he can receive a kingdom from the Father, or be prepared to wield the sceptre of its government, and enjoy the riches of its purchased blessings. And so, to render manifest and keep alive in the minds of his people the connection between the beginning and the end, he ever links together the cross and the crown—shows himself in the heavenly places as the Lamb that was slain, and inherits there a name that is above every name, because he took on him the form of a servant, and humbled himself unto the dust of death, for the salvation of men.

With a still closer resemblance to the type, because with a greater similarity of condition in the persons respectively concerned, does the spiritual import of the feast meet with its realization in the case of Christ's genuine followers. Hence the prophet Zechariah, who, more than any of the prophets (except Ezekiel), delights in representing the future under a simple recurrence of the past, when pointing to the result of the church's triumph over her enemies, speaks of it as a going up to Jerusalem to keep the feast of tabernacles, ch. xiv. 16. Then, that is to say, the Lord's redeemed people shall rejoice in the fulness of their portion, and have their experiences of bliss heightened and enhanced by the remembrance of past tribulation and conflict. For the present they are passing through the wilderness; it is their period of trial and probation, and by constant alternations of fear and hope, of danger and deliverance, of difficulties and trials, they must be prepared and ripened for their final destiny. It is through these that they must be kept habitually mindful of their own weakness and insufficiency, their proneness to be overcome of evil, and the dependence necessary to be maintained on the word and promises of God. Through them also, aided by the renewing grace of the Spirit, must the dross be purged out of their corrupt natures, and the old man of corruption itself thrown off, and left, as it were, to perish in the desert, that with the new man of pure and blessed life they may take possession of the heavenly Canaan. Then shall the church of the redeemed hold with her divine Head a perpetual feast of tabernacles—living and reigning with him in his kingdom; and, so far from grudging the trials and difficulties of the way, rejoicing the more on account of them, because seeing in them the needful course of discipline for the place and destiny of the redeemed, and knowing that if there had been no wilderness trials and conflicts on earth, there could have been no meetness for the inheritance of the saints in light. The glorious company in Rev. vii. arrayed in white robes and with palms in their hands—the collective representation of a redeemed and triumphant church—are the proper antitypes of Israel keeping the feast of tabernacles.

Beside the festivals now described, and which alone bear in Scripture the sacred name of moadeem or sacred feasts, there are two others which, though not of divine origin or of religious obligation, went by the same name, and were commonly observed in the gospel age: these were the feast of Dedication and the feast of Purim. (See DEDICATION and PURIM.)

FEASTS OF CHARITY OR LOVE, more commonly called AGAPÆ, or LOVE-FEASTS, differed materially from the institutions designated FEASTS under the Old Testament; they were actual meals, though partaking so far of a religious character, that they were usually celebrated in the same place where the disciples met for worship, and in close connection with religious exercises. They are mentioned only once under that name in New Testament scripture; viz. in Jude 12, where in reference to the false and corrupt professors who were insinuating themselves into the church, it is said, "These are spots in your agapæ." But there can be no doubt that, though the name is not used, it is the same sort of feasts that are mentioned in 1 Co. xi., and which, from being first abused to party purposes, came to be confounded with the solemnities of the Lord's supper. Indeed, the origin of them must be traced still higher, to that outburst of Christian liberality and brotherly affection which manifested itself among the converts at Jerusalem after the day of Pentecost, and which led to a regular ministration of food among the poorer brethren, as well as frequent social meals among all, Ac. ii. 45, 46; iv. 36; vi. 1, &c. The churches generally in early times seem to have regarded the practice thus begun at Jerusalem, as imposing a sort of obligation to similar practices elsewhere, at least as presenting a pattern that it would be well to imitate; and from notices occurring in the writings of the second and third centuries, it would seem that the agapæ very commonly formed a part of the regular observances of the Christian churches. They are so described both by Justin Martyr about the middle of the second century, and by Tertullian about the beginning of the third (Just. Apol. ii.; Tert. Apol. c. 39). The latter says, "Our supper shows its character by its name, which is the Greek word for love. Whatever expense it costs, it is gain to expend money in the cause of piety, since by this refreshment we give aid to all that are poor. Being done as a matter of religion, nothing foul or unbecoming is admitted into it. No one partakes till prayer has been made to God; as much is eaten as is necessary to satisfy the demands of hunger, as much is drunk as consists with sobriety; every one remembering that through the night also God is to be worshipped," &c. As the church grew, however, in numbers and wealth, it became always more difficult to manage such feasts with propriety, and so as not to prevent them from becoming occasions of scandal rather than of edification. Even Tertullian in his latter days complains of a deviation from the original purity, in the custom which was then creeping in, and was afterwards formally sanctioned, of setting double portions before the rulers of the church (De Jejun. c. 17). Distinctions of ranks generally came to be observed at them; excesses were not unfrequently committed; and the rich, by the contributions they made toward the object, sought to gain the praise of liberality; so that the agapæ came by degrees to be discountenanced, and were ultimately forbidden to be held in churches. An order to this effect was issued by the council of Laodicea about the middle of the third century, and by a council at Carthage in A.D. 391. They gradually fell into disuse, and are now observed by some only of the smaller sects.

FELIX, ANTONIUS, a freedman of the emperor Claudius, from whom he was also called Claudius Felix (Seldae), was governor of Judea at the time of St. Paul's seizure and imprisonment in Jerusalem, A.C. xxiii. xxi. The precise period of his appointment to that province is involved in some obscurity (it was probably about the year A.D. 52), as is also the exact footing on which he first entered on the administration of affairs in the East. The accounts of Josephus and Tacitus are somewhat discordant. According to the latter (Ann. xii. 54), Felix was appointed joint-procurator along with Ventidius Cumanus, the one taking the region of Judea, the other of Galilee; and both being guilty of mal-administration, conniving at acts of robbery and violence committed within their respective boundaries, and enriching themselves by the spoils that were brought to them by the successful parties, they were accused to the emperor, and Quadratus was commissioned to investigate into the matter, and act as he saw fit. He condemned only Cumanus, and elevated Felix to the seat of judgment. Josephus, however, represents Felix as coming into the East only after Cumanus had been tried, on account of the disturbances which had prevailed, and deposed for his misconduct; and he speaks of Felix as having been made procurator of Galilee, Samaria, and Peraea, as well as Judea (Ant. xi.; Wars, ii. 12, 8). The probability is, that the account of Josephus approaches nearest to the truth; and it is now generally admitted that the Roman historian has also erred in regard to the wife of Felix, Drusilla, whom he represents as the grand-daughter of Antony and Cleopatra. This was certainly not the case in respect to one Drusilla, whom Felix married; and it is against all probability that he should have had two wives of that name. In regard to the character of the man, both historians present him substantially in the same light. Tacitus, in his graphic style, says of him, that he "exercised the authority of a king with the disposition of a slave (servili ingenio) in all manner of cruelty and lust" (Hist. v. 9); and that he thought he could do anything with impunity, since he had the powerful influence of his brother Pallas at court to protect him (Ann. xii. 54). Josephus so far speaks well of Felix, that he mentions his activity in clearing the country of robbers and plotters of sedition, though in such a manner as to indicate the infliction of fearful barbarities (Wars, ii. 13). Instances are given of his treacherous and cruel procedure, which were carried so far, especially toward the Jews about Caesarea, that at the expiry of his office they sent a deputation to Rome to accuse him before the emperor, but the interest of Pallas proved too powerful for them (Ant. xx. 8, 9). One of the most infamous parts of his conduct was his seduction of Drusilla, the sister of Herod Agrippa, who had been married to Azizus, king of Emesa, after the latter with a view to his marriage had submitted to the rite of circumcision. Felix, on seeing this woman, became enamoured of her beauty, and by the arts of a Jewish magician, of the name of Simon, got her detached from her husband and married to himself. Such was the man before whom Paul had to plead his cause, and with whom he reasoned of "righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come." No wonder that the judge trembled at the pleadings of his prisoner; yet it appears he simply trembled; his convictions on the side of rectitude did not carry him even so far as to induce him to do justice to the injured apostle. "He hoped that money should have been given him of Paul, that he might loose him"—intent mainly on turning the occasion into an opportunity of personal advantage; and because his corrupt love of money was not gratified, after two years' dallying, he had the baseness to leave Paul still bound. We know nothing more of him than that he was recalled to Rome, and succeeded in his government by Festus. But Josephus incidentally notices that Drusilla and the son she bore Felix perished together in an eruption of Mount Vesuvius (Ant. xx. 7, 8).

FENCED CITIES. See FORT, FORTIFICATION.

FERRET [פְּרֵט, anakal]. It is impossible to say with certainty what animal is intended by this word. As an appellation it occurs only in Le. xi. 30; but the same word and its root occur repeatedly elsewhere, and always with the signification of crying, sighing, or groaning. Some animal of minute size, conventionally reckoned among the "creeping things," which has the habit of crying out, must be looked for. Some of the creatures with which the anakal is associated seem to be the smaller Mammalia, and there is no reason why this may not be of the same kind. The LXX. render anakal by μυγδαλη, by which the Greeks understood the field-mouse. As this, however, common as it is in Palestine, may be represented by a different word, and as our house-mouse is equally abundant as with us, and is everywhere known by its shrill squeak, we incline to interpret פְּרֵט by Mus domesticus, the common house-mouse. FESTIVALS. See FEASTS.

FESTUS, PORTIUS, the successor of Felix in the government of Judea. He received his appointment from Nero, probably about the year A.D. 60; and held it for a comparatively short time; for he was not long in the East till he died. In New Testament history he is mentioned only in connection with the case of the apostle Paul, which was brought under his notice shortly after his arrival at Caesarea. He was a man of superior character to Felix, and would in all probability have set him at liberty, if he had understood precisely what the question at issue was, and what were the aims and tactics of Paul's opponents. But being ignorant of these, and having proposed, after a brief and partial hearing of the case, to have the matter transferred for a fuller hearing to Jerusalem, Paul, well foreseeing what advantage would be taken of such a course, appealed to Caesar. This he had a right to do as a Roman citizen, and Festus had no alternative but to sustain the appeal, A.C. xxiv. 27; xxv. The only further notice we have of him is in respect to the visit paid him shortly after by Agrippa and Bernice; during which he took occasion to mention the case of Paul, and finding it would be agreeable to his distinguished guests, he gave the apostle an opportunity of declaring his case in the audience of the whole court. He was himself astonished at what he heard; but conceiving all to proceed from the fervours of a heated imagination, aided by the dreamy speculations of eastern lore, he said to Paul, "Thou art beside thyself; much learning doth make thee mad;" which drew forth the spirited and striking reply, "I am not mad, most noble Festus, but speak forth the words of truth and soberness."

Festus had also to take part, as we learn from Josephus, in ridding the country of the robbers that still infested it, and in repressing the turbulent spirit that was now beginning in various directions to seek vent for itself. He got into a quarrel with the priests at Jerusalem by the construction of a dining-room in the governor's house, which commanded a view of the courts of the temple, and which was met by the erection of a wall intended to intercept his view. The matter was carried to Rome, and through the influence of Poppæa was decided in favour of the priests (Joseph. Ant. x. 8). The impression left by the few notices that have come down to us of Festus is, that he was one of the better specimens of Roman procurators, with Rome's characteristic respect to order and justice, but not without her now prevailing indifference to questions connected with serious and earnest religion. Matters of this sort he regarded as scarcely worthy of his regard.

FIG. In the Jussieuan arrangement of plants, the fig belongs to the Artocarpaceæ, or the bread-fruit order; and this again is treated by many as a section or tribe of the Urticaceæ—a large and miscellaneous family, which would in that case include herbs and trees as dissimilar as the hop and the nettle, the hemp and the mulberry, the nutritious bread-fruit and the deadly upas, the insignificant pellitory which scantily adorns the ruined wall, and the mighty banian covering whole congregations with its impenetrable shadow.

The fig-tree of the Bible is the Ficus carica of Linæus, and derives its trivial name from that maritime province of Asia Minor which in classical times was so famous for this fruit, that we find Ovid and Cicero speaking of "carians" (cariceæ) when they mean figs. We ourselves have the same habit of naming fruits after their most famous localities, till, as not unfrequently happens, the noun is merged in the adjective. Thus the grapes of Corinth have contracted into "currants," and the plums of Damascus are "damsons" (damascenes).

Of eastern origin, the fig has been from time immemorial naturalized over a large extent of Asia, from which it has found its way into Greece, Spain, and nearly all the south of Europe. It ripens its fruit in many places in our own country. Visitors to Brighton and Worthing are well acquainted with the plantation of figs at Tarring, the goal of many a juvenile pilgrimage late in August or early in September. Till lately, perhaps down to the present day, the primate of England could sit under the shadow of fig-trees planted at Lambeth by Cardinal Pole in 1525; and a fig-tree still flourishes at Christchurch, in Oxford, which Dr. Pocock brought from Aleppo in 1648.

The first time that the fig-tree is mentioned in the Bible is Ge. iii. 7, where we are told that Adam and Eve "sewed fig leaves together, and made themselves aprons." These leaves Milton supposes were the foliage of the banian or sacred fig of India (Ficus religiosa, or F. indica), which with wonted learning and grandeur he thus describes:—

"There soon they chose

The fig-tree, not that kind for fruit renowned,
But such as at this day, to Indians known,
In Malabar or Decan spreads her arms,
Branching so broad and long, that in the ground
The bended twigs take root, and daughters grow
About the mother tree, a pillared shade, High overarched, and echoing walls between;
There oft the Indian herdaman, shunning heat,
Shelters in cool, and tends his pasturing herds,
At loop-holes cut through thickest shade: those leaves
They gathered, broad as Amazonian targe,
And, with what skill they had, together sewed."

—Paradise Lost, book ix.

It is difficult to understand how any should have been led to imagine that for this purpose our first parents employed the leaves of the plantain or of the banana (Musa paradisiaca, or M. sapientum). Its enormous leaves, eight or ten feet long and two or three feet broad, would not require to be sewed together; and a single leaf, with its strong refractory mid-rib, is scarcely suitable for a girdle. Besides, the original רִמְמָה evidently indicates some sort of fig; and, however much banian may sound like banana, there is not the slightest resemblance between the fig and the Musa.

With its large and beautiful leaf, and with its free-spreading growth, the fig-tree affords a good shelter from the shower, and a still better shadow from the heat. Like the linden in Germany, like the oak and elm on the village-greens of England, like the rowan-tree and the "bour-tree bush" (the "bower-tree" or elder) at the cottage thresholds and farm-house gables of Scotland, to the inhabitant of Palestine the fig-tree was the symbol of home, and repose, and tranquillity. "Judah and Israel dwelt safely, every man under his vine and under his fig-tree, all the days of Solomon," 1 Ki. iv. 25. "Nation shall not lift up a sword against nation; . . . but they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig-tree; and none shall make them afraid," Mt. iv. 3, 4. Nathanael was resting, perhaps meditating and praying, "under the fig-tree," when he was accosted by an unlooked-for visitant, and in the stranger recognized "the Son of God, the King of Israel."

What is called the fruit of the fig-tree, with which we are all so familiar, is in the eye of the botanist no fruit at all, but only an enlarged "receptacle," which bears on its inner surface the real fruit, those numberless small seeds which we find in the interior. "The flowers of the fig-tree are never apparent to the eye, but are contained in those fruit-like bodies produced in the axils of the leaves, and it is not till one of these is opened that the flowers are visible. What is therefore termed the fruit is merely the receptacle become fleshy, and assuming the form of a hollow body, bearing on its interior wall the flowers or fruit of the fig" (Hogg's Vegetable Kingdom, p. 676).

This fleshy receptacle, when ripe, is remarkably sweet and luscious, and in the countries where it comes to perfection, it is highly prized for qualities at once agreeable and nutritious. On the authority of Cloastius, Macrobius (Saturnal lib. ii. cap. 16) enumerates twenty-three varieties as known to the Greeks; and, if it were not actually indigenous in Palestine, it there found a climate congenial, and was thoroughly naturalized. Moses, describing the "good land," speaks of it as already a land of "vines, and fig-trees, and pomegranates," De. viii. 8; and when the spies returned from their exploration, they brought not only the famous cluster of grapes from Eshcol, but they exhibited also the "pomegranates and the figs," Nu. xiii. 23. According to Lightfoot, Bethphage was so named from its "green figs," and to the present hour the fig-tree grows "here and there" along the road in that same neighbourhood. As Stanley observes, two of the New Testament allusions to this tree are indisputably connected with Mount Olivet. "One is the parable not spoken, but acted, with regard to the fig-tree which, when all others around it were, as they are still, bare at the beginning of April, was alone clothed with its broad green leaves, though without the corresponding fruit. Fig-trees may still be seen overhanging the ordinary road from Jerusalem to Bethany, growing out of the rocks of the solid 'mountain,' Mat. xxi. 21, which might by the prayer of faith be removed, and cast into the distant Mediterranean 'sea.' On Olivet, too, the brief parable in the great prophecy was spoken, when he pointed to the bursting buds of spring in the same trees as they grew around him:—'Behold the fig-tree and all the trees when they now shoot forth; when his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye see and know of your own selves that summer is now nigh at hand,' Lu. xxi. 29, 30; Mat. xxiv. 32" (Stanley's Sinai and Palestine, p. 414).

Considerable difficulty has been expressed as to the fig-tree which Christ cursed on account of its barrenness, Mat. xxi. 19; Mar. xi. 12. We have little doubt that the solution suggested in the foregoing extract is the true explanation, especially if we connect with it the fact that there are varieties which fructify early in the season. "There is a kind," says Dr. W. M. Thomson, "which bears a large green-coloured fig that ripens very early. I have plucked them in May from trees on Lebanon, 150 miles north of Jerusalem, and where the trees are nearly a month later than in the south of Palestine: it does not therefore seem impossible but that the same kind might have had ripe figs at Easter, in the warm, sheltered ravines of Olivet" (The Land and the Book, part 2, chap. 24). This conjecture is borne out in the recent work of Miss Bremer. Visiting the farm of Meschullam, near Bethlehem, on March 2, her attention was attracted by some fig-trees, still leafless, but "full of fruit, which would not require many weeks to ripen. I was told that these are the so-called winter figs, which are formed late in the autumn, remain on the tree during winter, and ripen during the following spring, about Easter—this being the first fig crop of the year. Mrs.

Finn, who has resided in Palestine twelve years, told me further that the second setting of the fig takes place in March; frequently whilst the winter figs are still upon the tree, and before the tree is in leaf. These figs are called boccorre, and are gathered at midsummer. The third and last crop—for the fig-tree in its native land bears three crops in the year—is in the month of August. The August figs—hence called vermouse—are the sweetest and best. Those which next succeed are the figs which remain over the winter and do not ripen till the following spring. A full-foliated fig-tree in the spring, before the time of crop, must then always bear fruit [in some stage or other], so far as it is in good condition. But if it have not set fruit early in the spring, it will then bear none during the whole year" (F. Bremer's Travels in the Holy Land, vol. i. p. 198). Even although none of the fig-trees now found near Jerusalem should yield winter figs, it is surely not unlikely that at that period of high and careful culture, the variety may have grown on Olivet, which Miss Bremer found three years ago at the pools of Solomon. At all events the tree, so to speak, professed to have fruit; for in the case of the fig, the so-called fruit begins to develop earlier than the foliage; and all the rather because the other and ordinary fig-trees were still leafless and bare, this one arrested attention, and awakened expectation by that verdure which made it conspicuous at a distance—μακροθεν. If not one of the precocious kind above-mentioned, it at least proclaimed itself in advance of its ordinary companions, which were still shut up in wintry deadness; and yet, on nearer inspection, it turned out a mere pretender. It was neither a distinct and early variety, nor was it even a fruitful specimen of the common kind. It had no excuse. Its leaves were an invitation to look for fruit, and, if it had none, it could not be alleged that they were already gathered, because it still wanted some time until the regular fig-harvest ("the time of figs was not yet," Mar. xi. 12). It was a mere impostor, and so the withering word was spoken, "No man eat fruit of thee hereafter for ever." "Fit emblem of those who make pretensions to which their conduct does not answer. Especially had it reference to the Jewish nation, who were distinguished from other nations as having leaves, but from which the husbandman in vain looked for fruit. Jesus, in looking round over the nations, saw the rest in such a decidedly barren condition, that he did not expect to discover fruit upon them; but this one, the Israel of the covenants, was singled out from the others, and was distinguished from them, standing apart. When this one had no fruit, it was a worthless tree—worse by far than the others, for with them the time of fruit was not yet. Gentile nations would hereafter, but not at that moment, be asked for fruit." (W. H. Johnstone in the Christian Annotator, vol. i. p. 228.)

Often a month or six weeks before the general crop is gathered, there will be found on the tree some samples of the fruit already matured, and these "first-ripe figs" were highly prized. Soft and sweet, and richly purple, they came readily from the stem, and were deemed a special dainty, Nu. iii. 12; 1s. xxviii. 4. The fig season was July and August. A portion of the fruit was preserved for winter use. One method was to pound it in a mortar, and make it into rectangular masses or cakes. In this form it could be kept for a long period, and was convenient as well as acceptable provender in the soldier's haversack. After the defeat of the Amalekites, when David's men found an Egyptian in the field exhausted, "they gave him a piece of a cake of figs, and two clusters of raisins; and when he had eaten, his spirit came again to him." 1 Sa. xxx. 12. And "two hundred cakes of figs" were part of the present with which the prudent wife of the churlish Nabal propitiated the son of Jesse at Carmel, 1 Sa. xxv. 18.

When Hezekiah was sick unto death, Isaiah the prophet said, "Let them take a lump of figs, and lay it for a plaster upon the boil, and he shall recover," 1a. xxxviii. 21. Possibly figs were already used in Hebrew surgery as cataplasms; but whether they were or not, the cure of the monarch was none the less the act of that supreme Physician who works his wonders through means inadequate, or without any means at all. The fig is emollient and demulcent, and boiled or roasted, and then split open, we believe that it is still used in the minor surgery which has to do with whitlows and gum-boils, and similar slight cases of suppuration. [J. H.]

FIR. Like our own words "fir," "pine," "cedar," which are very loosely used, the likelihood is that the Hebrew berosh (בְּרוֹשׁ) was applied to various trees with evergreen foliage and sectile timber: for, as Gesenius says, the name seems to come from the idea of cutting up into boards and planks, as suggested by the obsolete root בָּרַשׁ (barash), to cut. Of such trees the range of Lebanon supplied a great variety, and magnificent specimens, including the Scotch fir, the cypress, and cedar. (See CEDAR AND CYPRESS.) In 2 Sa. vi. 5, we read, "David and all the house of Israel played before the Lord on all manner of instruments made of fir wood, even on harps, and on psalteries," &c. In connection with this may be quoted a passage in Burney's History of Music (vol. 1. p. 277), where it is stated: "This species of wood, so soft in its nature and sonorous in its effects, seems to have been preferred by the ancients as well as moderns to every other kind for the construction of musical instruments, particularly the bellies of them, on which their tone chiefly depends. Those of the harp, lute, guitar, harpsichord, and violin, in present use, are constantly made of this wood." [J. H.]

FIRE. Of fire as a natural element, or as employed in domestic operations and the processes of art, there is no need for discoursing here. In these respects the student of Scripture has no difficulty to encounter, or any peculiarity to meet. The only thing respecting fire which calls for explanation is its symbolical use. In this we may distinguish a lower and a higher sense: a lower, when the reference is simply to the burning heat of the element, in which respect any vehement affection, such as anger, indignation, shame, love, is wont to be spoken of as a fire in the bosom of the individual affected, Pa. xxxix. 3; Je. xx. 9; and a higher, which is also by much the more common one in Scripture, when it is regarded as imaging the more distinctive properties of the divine nature. In this symbolical use of fire the reference is to its powerful, penetrating agency, and the terrible melting, seemingly resistless effects it is capable of producing. So viewed, fire is the chosen symbol of the holiness of God, which manifests itself in a consuming hatred of sin, and can endure nothing in its presence but what is in accordance with the pure and good. There is a considerable variety in the application of the symbol, but the passages are all explicable by a reference to this fundamental idea. God, for example, is called "a consuming fire," He. xii. 29; to dwell with him is to dwell "with devouring fire," 1a. xxxiii. 14; as manifested even in the glorified Redeemer "his eyes are like a flame of fire," Re. ii. 18; his aspect when coming for judgment is as if a fire went before him, or a scorching flame compassed him about, Pa. xviii. 3; 2 Th. 1. 8.—in these, and many similar representations occurring in Scripture, it is the relation of God to sin that is more especially in view, and the searching, intense, all-consuming operation of his holiness in regard to it. They who are themselves conformed to this holiness have nothing to fear from it; they can dwell amid its light and glory as in their proper element; like Moses, can enter the flame-enveloping cloud of the divine presence, and abide in it unscathed, though it appear in the eyes of others "like devouring fire on the top of the mount," Ex. xxiv. 17, 18. Hence, we can easily explain why in Old Testament times the appearance of fire, and in particular the pillar of fire (enveloped in a cloud, as if to shade and restrain its excessive brightness and power) was taken as the appropriate form of the divine presence and glory; for in those times which were more peculiarly the times of the law, it was the holiness of God which came most prominently into view; it was this which had in every form to be pressed most urgently upon the consciences of men, as a counteractive to the polluting influences of idolatry, and of essential moment to a proper apprehension of the covenant. But in the new, as well as in the old, when the same form of representation is employed, it is the same aspect of the divine character that is meant to be exhibited. Thus, at the commencement of the gospel era, when John the Baptist came forth announcing the advent of the Lord, he spake of him as coming to baptize with fire as well as with the Spirit, not less to burn up the chaff with fire unquenchable than to gather in the wheat into his garner, Mat. iii. 11, 12. The language is substantially that of an Old Testament prophet, Mal. iii. 2; iv. 1; and it points, not as is often represented, to the enlightening, purifying, love-enkindling agency of Christ, but to the severe and retributive effects of his appearance. He was to be set for judgment as well as for mercy; for mercy indeed first, but to those who rejected the mercy, and hardened themselves in sin, also for judgment. To be baptized with the Spirit of light, holiness, and love, is what should ever follow on a due submission to his authority; but a baptism with fire—the fire of divine wrath here, Ja. iii. 26, growing into fire unquenchable hereafter—should be the inevitable portion of such as set themselves in rebellion against him.

It is true that fire in its symbolical use is also spoken of as purifying—the emblem of a healing process effected upon the spiritual natures of persons in covenant with God. We read, not merely of fire, but of refiner's fire, and of a spirit of burning purging away the dross and impurity of Jerusalem, Mal. iii. 2; Is. iv. 4. Still it is a work of severity and judgment that is indicated—only its sphere is, not the unbelieving and corrupt world, but the mixed community of the Lord's people, with many false members to be purged out, and the individual believer himself with an old man of corruption in his members to be mortified and cast off. The Spirit of holiness has a work of judgment to execute also there; and with respect to that it might doubtless be said, that Christ baptizes each one of his people with fire. But in the discourse of the Baptist the reference is rather to different classes of persons than to different kinds of operation in the same person; he points to the partakers of grace on the one side, and to the children of apostasy and perdition on the other. Nor is the reference materially different in the emblem of tongues, like as of fire, which sat on the apostles at Pentecost; and in the fire that is said to go out of the mouth of the symbolical witnesses of the Apocalypse, Ap. ii. 3; Re. xi. 6. In both cases the fire indicated the power of holiness to be connected with the ministrations of Christ's chosen witnesses; a power that should, as it were, burn up the corruptions of the world, consume the enmity of men's hearts, and prove resistless weapons against the power and malice of the adversary.

FIRKIN, used once in New Testament scripture as a synonym for the Greek metretes, Jn. ii. 6; but the latter measure differed very materially in different places; and the term firkis is fitted to suggest a very exaggerated estimate of quantity in the passage referred to. (See MEASURES.)

FIRMAMENT, a word that comes to us through the Latin, and importing by its derivation something of compact and solid structure. In common use, however, it has lost this import, and merely denotes the sky over our heads—the pure and transparent expanse of ether which envelopes the globe, and stretches from the earth's surface toward the upper regions of space. This is precisely what is meant by the Hebrew term rakiah (רָקִיעַ), from the root to stretch, spread out or forth, beat out; hence simply the expanse, what is spread out around and over the earth. This has to the natural eye somewhat of the appearance of a crystal arch, resting upon the boundaries of the earth, and bearing aloft the watery treasures on which the life and fruitfulness of nature so materially depend. On the second creative day, it is said, God made this liquid expanse, for the purpose of dividing the waters on the surface of the earth from the waters above, or the sea from the clouds that rise out of it. In so far as material elements enter into its composition, it consists simply of the atmosphere—a vast body of ether, compounded with infinite skill for the numberless functions it has to discharge in the formation and dispersion of vapours, the transmission of light and heat, the support of animal and vegetable life, and similar operations—but in its structure and appearance related rather to the fluctuating and mutable, than to the more solid parts of the material universe. But as used in the record of creation, the rakiah or firmament includes not merely the lower heavens, or atmospheric sky, with its clouds and vapours, but the whole visible expanse up to the region of the fixed stars. For, on the fourth creative day it is said, that God made in the rakiah sun, moon, and stars, to divide the day from the night, and to be for signs and seasons. This, of course, implies nothing as to the structure and composition of the immense area, as if by being comprised in one name it were all of the same formation. The language is adapted to the apparent aspect of things, and describes the visible expanse above, with its orbs of light, simply in the relation they hold to the earth, and the appearance they present to a spectator on its surface. In this respect we have to distinguish a lower and a higher firmament, just as we do in respect to a lower and a higher heaven.

A controversy has arisen respecting the sense attached by the Hebrew writers to rakiah, chiefly on account of the ancient translations given of it, and the poetical representations found of the upper regions of the visible heavens in some parts of Scripture. The Septuagint translation renders σρεπέσμα—which occurs as well in a passive as an active sense—what is made firm or solid, or what makes such, gives stability and support. The Latin word firmamentum, which was used as an equivalent, more properly bears the latter signification—a prop or support. It has hence been argued, that the Hebrews understood something solid by the rakiah or firmament, capable of bearing up the waters which accumulate in masses above, and even of having the heavenly bodies affixed to it as to a crystalline pavement. (So Gesenius, Theol., and many others.) And such passages as speak of the foundations of heaven shaking, 2Sa. xxii. 8, of its pillars trembling, Job xxvi. 11, of the windows or doors of heaven being opened to give forth rain, or again shut, Ge. vii. 11; Ps. lxxviii. 3; Mal. iii. 10, or of the sky being strong as a molten looking-glass, Job xxxvii. 18, are adduced in proof of the idea. But all these expressions are manifestly of a figurative nature, and to hold them as tantamount to a categorical scientific deliverance on the nature of the heavenly expanse, seems altogether gratuitous. There can be no doubt, that in that same expanse, which the Hebrews contemplated as bearing up the waters that issue from the clouds, they also represented the birds as flying about, hence usually called “fowls of heaven”—and what room was there, in such a case, for material solidity, or actual pillars? The language on this, as on other physical subjects, is simply that suggested by the natural aspects of things, ever varying as these also vary. And so far from the place or region of the fixed stars being always regarded as something solid and crystalline, we find it spoken of sometimes as a curtain (yerihah, Ps. civ. 2), a tent, nay even a thin veil, or fine cloth (dok, Is. xl. 22). In short, we have all the characteristics of a figurative and sensuous imagery, and not matter-of-fact description; and it were as absurd to press the terms in their literal import here, as in the similar expressions, bars of ocean, doors of death, wings of the wind and sun, and such like. (See HEAVEN.)

FIRST-BORN. It is the religious rather than the natural and civil bearing of this term that here calls for explanation; the other has already been considered under the article BIRTHRIGHT. By the first-born, in a religious point of view, seem to have been meant the first of a mother's offspring rather than of a father's; for on the original occasion of the consecration of such to the Lord the order is thus given, “Sanctify unto me all the first-born, whatsoever openeth the womb among the children of Israel, both of man and of beast; it is mine,” Ex. xiii. 2. And again at ver. 12, “Thou shalt set apart unto the Lord all that openeth the matrix, and every firstling that cometh of a beast which thou hast; the males shall be the Lord's.” The historical ground of this religious destination is very distinctly stated in what follows, where it is said, that when the posterity of the Israelites should inquire into the reason of it, they were to be told, “that when Pharaoh would hardly let us go, the Lord slew all the first-born in the land of Egypt, both the first-born of man and the first-born of beast; therefore I sacrifice to the Lord all that openeth the matrix, being males; and all the first-born of my children I redeem.” We have here a three-fold act of God—first, the infliction of death on the first-born of man and beast in Egypt; then exemption from this judgment on the part of Israel in consideration of the paschal sacrifice; and finally, in commemoration of the exemption, the consecrating to the Lord of all the first-born in time to come. The fundamental element on which the whole proceeds, is evidently the representative character of the first-born; the first offspring of the producing parent stands for the entire fruit of the womb, being that in which the whole takes its beginning; so that the slaying of the first-born of Egypt was virtually the slaying of all—it implied that one and the same doom was suspended over all; and, consequently, that the saving of the first-born of Israel and their subsequent consecration to the Lord, was, in regard to divine intention and efficacious virtue, the saving and consecration of all. Hence Israel as a whole was designated God's first-born: "Thou shalt say unto Pharaoh, Thus saith the Lord, Israel is my son, my first-born; and I say unto thee, Let my son go, that he may serve me; and if thou refuse to let him go, behold I will slay thy son, thy first-born," Ex. iv. 22, 23. All Israel were in outward standing and covenant relationship the Lord's first-born, being the national representatives and actual beginning of a redeemed church, to be brought out of every kindred, and tongue, and people; and, as such, they were without distinction called to be a nation of priests, one and all holiness to the Lord, Ex. xix. 6. But for the purpose of giving this great truth a proper hold of their minds, and perpetually reinforcing the principle on which it was grounded, the Lord ordained the formal consecration of the first-born, from the time that the principle received its signal illustration in the exemption of Israel's first-born from the doom of Egypt. These henceforth were to be specially devoted to the Lord, in token of the devotion which all Israel were by calling and privilege bound to render to him.

In regard to the practical application of the principle thus established in the case of the first-born, a certain modification was afterwards introduced. The first-born of cattle, and all living creatures capable of being offered to the Lord, were still to be held sacred in the strictest sense; they were to be abstracted from a common use, and dedicated to the service of God; and those not fit for such a destination were to be redeemed at their proper value. But in respect to the first of human offspring, whose special consecration undoubtedly pointed to a separation for ministerial service, the tribe of Levi came to be substituted in their place. An express order was given to Moses for this substitution; the Lord said to him, "Number all the first-born of the males of the children of Israel, from a month old and upward, and take the number of their names. And thou shalt take the Levites for me (I am the Lord) instead of all the first-born among the children of Israel," Nu. iii. 40, 41. It was found that there were 273 more of the first-born among all the tribes than of males in the tribe of Levi, and these were redeemed for the Lord by a ransom-price of five shekels apiece. The numbers of that tribe, therefore, stepped into the place of the first-born, and, as the more select representative portion of the covenant-people, the Lord's peculiar lot, they were not only purified, but "offered as an offering before the Lord," and appointed to "do the service of the children of Israel in the congregation, and to make an atonement for the children of Israel, that there might be no plague among them, when the children of Israel draw near to the sanctuary," Nu. viii.

10, 21. In plain terms, the substitution of a separate tribe for the first-born of each family was made for the purpose of more effectually securing the course of special service to the Lord, in which the principle of consecration was to embody itself, and thereby present a better idea of the holiness which Israel as a people were called to maintain and manifest. But to keep alive the principle on which the consecration proceeded, and make every family in Israel conscious of the bond which in this connected it with the tribe of Levi, the redemption money was always to be exacted for the first-born son, Nu. xviii. 15; the Lord still claimed the first birth as peculiarly his own, and remitted the special service at the sanctuary, only in consideration of the selection he had himself made of the tribe of Levi for the work. (For the numbers mentioned, see LEVI.)

THE CHURCH OF THE FIRST-BORN, to which believers in Christ are represented as coming, the church or assembly with whose names it is their glory to have their own enrolled, Re. xii. 23, it will be readily understood from the preceding explanations, is but another expression for the church of the redeemed—those who have become peculiarly the Lord's, and through the blood of the everlasting covenant, applied to their consciences, are consecrated to him for evermore. Pre-eminently and emphatically the church of the first-born is Christ's, since he is himself in a sense altogether peculiar the first-born—not only as being the eldest offspring of Mary, her sole offspring as a virgin, but also as having, by virtue of his relation to Godhead, in his life and death perfectly realized the idea of personal consecration to the Father, and become the living head of the whole family of the redeemed. The name, however, may be applied to the church, and in the passage above referred to is applied, from respect to the place assigned in the old dispensation to the first-born, as the most direct partakers of the redemption of God, and in consequence the nearest to him in privilege, character, and glory.

The epithet FIRST-BORN, however, is applied distinctively to Christ; once in a quite general manner, and without anything to define more exactly the respect in which he was so called, except as implying his pre-eminence greatness, He. i. 6; again with reference to created being—"He is the first-born of all creation, for by him (or in him) were all things created that are in heaven and that are in earth," Col. i. 16; and still again with reference to the resurrection from the dead—"He is the first-born from (i. e. from among) the dead," Col. i. 18; Re. i. 5. The expression so applied manifestly denotes more than simply priority; it carries along with it the idea of origination—a causal first, or germinal beginning; such as involves the future existence of an entire series of dependent results. Thus he is the First-born from the dead, as being himself the resurrection and the life, in whom potentially the whole company of the redeemed were begotten to the hope of a blessed resurrection, 1 Pe. i. 3; so that as all Israel were at the redemption from Egypt saved in the first-born, in like manner all who shall ultimately attain to the resurrection from the dead may be said to have risen in Christ. In like manner he is the First-born of the creation; since all created being grows, as it were, out of him, and stands in him as the revealer of Godhead, the direct agent and administrator of its productive energies. Such appears to be the proper explanation of the term as applied personally to Christ—the only one indeed that fitly suits the connection in the several passages; and that also which quite naturally harmonizes with, and springs out of, the import of the term in its primary historical application. The other senses adopted by commentators, which it is needless to enumerate, are more or less fanciful.

FIRST-FRUITS. It was but an extension of the principle which gave the impress of sacredness to the first-born of men and beasts, to connect with God by a like bond of sacredness the first produce of the field. These accordingly were claimed for God; and that not merely in the general, but with a considerable fulness and variety of detail. A sheaf of the first-fruits of the barley crop had to be offered, in the name of the whole congregation, at the feast of the passover; and in like manner two loaves of wheaten bread at the feast of pentecost, Le. xiii. 10, 17. But lest the people should deem this a sufficient discharge of the obligation to consecrate the first-fruits of their increase to the Lord, it was enacted that what was thus done by the collective congregation should be done also by each of its families, out of the yearly produce which the Lord might give them. The first or best of the oil, of the wine, of the wheat, of the thrashing-floor generally, and whatsoever was first ripe in corn and fruit, were expressly set apart for offerings to the Lord, and were to be given to the priesthood, as the Lord's familiars and representatives, for their comfortable maintenance, Nu. xv. 19-21; xviii. 11-13. No specific quantity or proportion was fixed on as proper for this offering of first-fruits; that appears to have been left to the spiritual feeling and ability of each individual, and would no doubt vary in amount according as the principles of religion were in lively operation or the reverse. A stimulus was thus furnished to zeal and fidelity on the part of the priesthood, whose temporal well-being and comfort were inseparably bound up with the prosperity of the cause of God; they could not neglect their duty as the guides and instructors of the people, without reaping the fruit of their unfaithfulness in diminished supplies of first-fruit offerings. The Talmudists, however, reduced this, like all other things, to definite rules and measures; they held the sixtieth part the least that could be given; while a fortieth or a thirtieth was to be regarded as the proof of a willing and liberal spirit. In later times, the first-fruits were often turned into money by the more distant Jews, and this sent instead of them (Philo, ii. p. 678).

The offering of first-fruits was by no means peculiar to Israel; it prevailed among the leading nations of antiquity, of which ample proofs may be found in Spencer (De Leg. Heb. lib. iii. c. 9). From the quotations produced from ancient writers upon the subject, there would seem to have been at the bottom of the practice a feeling that the first-ripe portions were the best of the crop, and that these belonged to the gods primarily as a token of gratitude for the year's produce in each particular kind, and remotely as a ground or security for the fruitfulness of coming harvests. Such a mode of feeling and acting has its root in men's moral nature; it is in accordance with the common instincts of humanity; and could scarcely fail, wherever a symbolical and ritual religion prevailed, to find some appropriate form of manifestation. It is needless therefore to speak in such a case of the Hebrews borrowing from the heathen, or the heathen from the Hebrews. But with the Hebrews, the principle on which the offering of first-fruits proceeded reached further than elsewhere; for the offering was not a mere nature-gift, in acknowledgment of the goodness of the God of nature; it connected itself with the holiness of God. As in the case of the first-born, it brought the whole within the sphere of religion—stamped all with a certain measure of sacredness; so that it might seem an impiety afterwards to apply any portion of the produce to improper uses. For, in the words of the apostle, "if the first-fruits were holy, the lump was also holy," Ro. xi. 16; the entire crop partook to some extent of the character of that which, as the first and best, was presented to the Lord. Had this principle been rightly recognized and carried out in practice, it must have exercised a most salutary influence on the common life and operations of the Israelites.

In regard to the manner of conveying the first-fruits, and the forms used in presenting them, the Talmudists give the following account, though it may justly be taken with some qualifications:—"When they carried up the first-fruits [which, it will be understood, was usually done at the feast of tabernacles], all the cities that were in a station gathered together to the chief city of the station, to the end they might not go up alone; for it is said, 'In the multitude of people is the king's honour,' Pr. xiv. 28. And they came and lodged all night in the streets of the city, and went not into the houses for fear of pollution. And in the morning the governor said, 'Arise, and let us go up to Zion, the city of the Lord our God.' And before them went a bull which had his horns covered with gold, and an olive garland on his head, to signify the first-fruits of the seven kinds. And a pipe struck up before them, till they came near to Jerusalem; and all the way as they went, they sang, 'I rejoiced in them that said unto me, We will go into the house of the Lord,' &c. When they were come nigh to Jerusalem, they sent messengers before them to signify it; then the captains and governors went out of Jerusalem to meet them, &c. And they went in the midst of Jerusalem, and the pipes striking up before them, till they came near to the mount of the house (of God). When they were come thither, they took every man his basket on his shoulder, and said, 'Hallelujah, praise God in his sanctuary,' &c.; and they went thus and sang till they came to the court-yard; when they were come thither, the Levites sang, Pa. xxx., 'I will exalt thee, O Lord, for thou hast lifted me up,' &c. The owner of the basket, while it was still upon his shoulder, made the declaration in De. xxvi. 3, seq., 'I profess this day unto Jehovah thy God, that I am come into the land which Jehovah sware unto our fathers to give it to us.' Then he let down the basket from his shoulder, and the priest put his hand under it, and waved it, and he said, 'A Syrian ready to perish was my father,' &c.; and he left it at the altar's side, at the south-west horn, on the south side of the horn, and bowed himself down, and went out" (Alnsworth on De. xxvi. 1-6). This formal method of going about the matter may, no doubt, have been occasionally practised; but it is against all probability to suppose that such solemn pomp and routine attended the conveyance and presentation of all first-fruit offerings. The diversity of circumstances, and the indeterminateness of the law, would naturally lead to a good deal of variety.

FISH, FISHING דָּגָהּ, daag, דָּג, dag, דָּגָהּ, dagah; ἰχθύς, ἰχθυόδιον, a little fish, ὀψάριον, fish cooked or for cooking]. No kind of fish is indicated specifically in either the Old or New Testament: all the terms used, which are, however, with the exception of the last, modifications of two, דָּג (dag) and לֶחֱבִים, being as vague as the English word by which they are truly rendered. Yet a people like Israel, cradled on the banks of the Nile, educated between the forks of the Red Sea, and subsequently located along the Mediterranean coast, with such collections of fresh water as the Lakes of Merom and Chinnereth in their rear, could not but have had their attention largely directed to fish and fishing. No investigation of the ichthyology of Palestine has, so far as we know, been made by any competent naturalist. In the Physical History of Palestine, Dr. Kitto has collected what information on the subject his industry had been able to gather; but when we state that from all sources not more than about thirty kinds are attributed to the Mediterranean shores, and of these many are merely barbarous names with no clue to their identification, it will be seen how meagre was the amount of knowledge. Col. H. Smith has furnished to the Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature an able and interesting article on the fishes known to the Hebrews, evidently derived to a considerable extent from personal observation. In this, the number of species and genera recognized is greatly augmented, and much information concerning them is given.

By the law of Moses, all the tenants of the waters furnished with "fins and scales" were permitted for food, Le. xi. 9; De. xiv. 9. This characterization would loosely distinguish fishes from the aquatic mammalia, amphibia, reptiles, worms, and all the vast host of multiform invertebrate; but if it was understood as a test obvious to the senses, many fishes of wholesome flesh and delicate sapidity, and withal abundant and easily captured, would be prohibited. It is doubtful whether the Hebrews were allowed to taste the cod or the mackerel, several kinds of which are at certain seasons sufficiently abundant on their coasts. Of sea-fish, their chief supplies would doubtless be from the perches, Percadæ, gurnards, Trigladaæ, maigres, Sciænadaæ, sea-breams, Sparidaæ; mackerels, Scombridaæ, the larger species of which are generally covered in part with large scales; herrings, Clupeadaæ, and wrasses, Labridaæ; while of fresh-water kinds the immense family of carps, Cyprinidaæ, the salmons, Salmonidaæ, and the pikes, Esocidaæ, including that singular long-snouted fish the mormyrus, which is so abundant and so much esteemed in the Nile, and which so constantly figures in the old Egyptian representations of that "ancient river."

The Scriptures afford us abundant evidence that fish constituted no inconsiderable portion of human food from the earliest times. It was a great augmentation of one of the plagues which Jehovah inflicted on obdurate Egypt, that "he slew their fish," Ex. vii. 18, 21; Ps. cv. 29. Israel in the wilderness mourned over the loss of their fish-diet: "We remember the fish, which we did eat in Egypt freely," Nu. xi. 5; and Moses asks, when Jehovah proposes to give them flesh, "Shall all the fish of the sea be gathered together for them to suffice them?" Nu. xi. 22. Solomon alludes to "fishes taken in a net," Ec. ix. 13; in Nehemiah's days the Tyrians seem to have regularly supplied Jerusalem and Judah with fish, Ne. xiii. 16; and one of the gates of the city was named Fish-gate, probably from the fish-market being held at its entrance. The vast numbers of the fishes of the sea occasionally afford comparisons to the sacred writers. When Jacob blessed the sons of Joseph, he prayed that they might grow into a multitude, using a word which implied "multiply like fishes," Ge. xlviii. 16. And, in Ezekiel's prophecy of the healing of the Dead Sea, it is promised that "there shall be a very great multitude of fish, . . . the fishers shall stand upon it from En-gedi even unto En-eglaim; they shall be a place to spread forth nets; their fish shall be according to their kinds, as the fish of the Great [Mediterranean] Sea, exceeding many," Esa. xlvi. 9, 10.

In "the burden of Egypt," Is. xix., prominence is given among the elements of affliction to the cutting off of the resources of the people derived from the fisheries; and the various devices employed are detailed with some minuteness: "The fishers also shall mourn, and all they that cast angle into the brooks shall lament, and they that spread nets upon the waters shall languish. Moreover, they that work in fine flax, and they that weave net-works, shall be confounded. And they shall be broken in the purposes thereof, all that make sluices and ponds for fish."

Herodotus, Diodorus, and others, have spoken of the immense quantities of fish which were obtained from the Nile and its canals, showing the extent to which the fisheries of Egypt were prosecuted, and the importance which attached to them. The royal profits derived from the fishery of the Lake Mœris alone, which was assigned to the queen of the reigning Pharaoh for the purchase of jewellery, ornaments, and perfumery, amounted to a talent of silver per day, or £70,000 per annum. Even now, according to Michaud (Corr. de l'Or. v. 7, 156), the small lake Menzaleh yields an annual income of 800 purses, or upwards of £8000.

The amount of fish taken at once was often too great to allow of its consumption while fresh. Hence it was dried for future use, by splitting and spreading the bodies in the sun, sometimes without and sometimes with salt, as we learn not only from ancient writers, but also from the Egyptian monuments, which afford us most copious and clear records of all the processes connected with fishing. Salt-fish was much eaten, not only in Lower Egypt, but also in the Thebaid, as the common food of the people; and it was probably to commemorate the national value of this food, that every householder was commanded by a religious ordinance to eat a fried fish at his door on a certain festival. The priests, however, who abstained from fish, were permitted to burn theirs, instead of eating it.

The autographic delineations of the modes of fishing known in ancient Egypt are, as we have said, very ample; and prove that in the infancy of human society, as many and as ingenious devices were brought to bear upon the art as are known in our times. These pictures beautifully illustrate the biblical allusions.

Two modes of angling occur repeatedly. In one of these the peasant sits on his heels at the brink of the canal, holding a simple line in both hands, without the intervention of a rod, exactly as the art is still practised by the fellahs on the banks of the Nile. At other times the fisher wields a short rod of one piece, with a short stout line of twisted or platted material, perhaps hair, and whisks out the fish with a jerk. Sometimes a grave Egyptian gentleman, with much attention to comfort, having had a mat spread by the side of a fish-pond in his garden, and a handsome chair placed upon it, seats himself for an afternoon sport, and wields his rod and line with the patience and the grace of that prince of anglers, the "contemplative man" himself.

A favourite mode of fishing was with the bident or two-tongued fish-spear. This is frequently depicted. It was practised upon the Nile, in a flat-bottomed boat, which was pushed among the lotus-plants and papyrus-reeds that grew tall and dense along either margin of the river. The fisherman was often accompanied by his family; a daughter steadying his body as he made his forceful lunge at the fish, and a son carrying the prey already taken strung by the gills upon a cord. The action of spearing the fish is graphically represented, the implement being shot from the right hand through the left curved to form a groove. The spear was a slender rod some ten or twelve feet long, doubly feathered at the summit, like a modern arrow, and carrying a double point, one of which seems to be lashed on beside the other, yet so as to diverge a little;

the two points forming about one-fifth of the entire length. Beneath the boat we generally see large fishes of various kinds, among which the deformed Mormyrus is generally conspicuous, and a large species of Labrus, which seems a favourite object of pursuit.

More commonly still the net was employed; it was

rope at each end, answering to our seine. Sometimes this seems to have been cast out by hand, the men carried out the bight of the net by swimming or wading, and then the two parties dragged it up the bank. At other times a boat waited on the party, and the slack was cast overboard as she was rowed along. In this case the boat served as a drying stage; for the mast being supported by stays from the summit to the bow and stern, lines were fastened from one to the other in several tiers, on which the split and cleaned, and probably salted fish, were hung to dry (No. 264). In the sculptures of Nineveh, the Assyrian fisherman is represented with his rush-basket on his shoulder, fishing with a short line held in both hands without a rod (No. 265).

It has long been remarked that the fishes of the Lake of Gennesaret are to a certain extent identical with those found in the Nile, and otherwise peculiar to it. Josephus in ancient times, and Hasselquist in modern, have noticed this. An enhanced interest is thus given to the fish and fishing of the Nile, as represented in the Egyptian paintings, since it was in the midst of fishing scenes on this lake that our blessed Lord passed so much of his ministry.

It was from the fishing nets that he called his earliest disciples to "become fishers of men," Mar. 1. 16-20; it was from a fishing-boat that he rebuked the winds and the waves, Mat. viii. 26; it was from a fishing-boat that he delivered his wondrous series of prophetic parables of the kingdom of heaven, Mat. xiii.; it was to a fishing-boat that he walked on the sea, and from it that Peter walked to him, Mat. xiv. 24-32; it was with fish (doubtless dried) as well as with bread that he twice miraculously fed the multitude, Mat. xiv. 19; xv. 36; it was from the mouth of a fish, taken with a hook, that the tribute-stater was paid, Mat. xvii. 27; it was "a piece of broiled fish" that he ate before his disciples on the day that he rose from the dead, Lu. xxiv. 42, 43; and yet again, before he ascended, he filled their net with "great fishes, an hundred and fifty and three," while he himself prepared a "fire of coals," and "laid fish thereon," on which then he and they dined, Jn. xxi. 1-14.

The most remarkable mention of a fish in the holy Scriptures is that which occurs in connection with the rebellious prophet Jonah. The Lord prepared "a great fish" to swallow him up, and he remained "in the belly of the fish" three days and three nights, Jonah 1. 17. Mr. Taylor has laboured with much misplaced ingenuity to prove that there was no miracle in the case; that דָּג (dag) signifies a ship as well as a fish, and that the prophet was picked up by another vessel, which in due course landed him. Why the cabin of this second ship should have been to him "the belly of hell;" how "the weeds were wrapped about his head," and with what propriety the ordinary landing of a passenger could be spoken of in the words "The Lord spake unto the fish (dag), and it vomited out Jonah upon the dry land," this weaver of spiders' webs has not informed us.

The Lord Jesus, whose authority some will be willing to accept as final, distinctly tells us that "Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly (ἐν τῇ κοιλίᾳ τοῦ κήτους, Mat. xii. 40). This is enough for us. Those who reason that the whale's cesophagus is not large enough to admit a man, and therefore it could not have been a whale, as we understand the term, reason upon false premises. If the point at issue were the normal and ordinary habits of the animal spoken of, the objection would be valid; but the whole transaction was professedly a miracle, i.e. a controlling of the laws of nature by Him who imposed and sustains them; and therefore, unless we sceptically reject the narrative altogether, because of its miraculous character, one part of the miracle presents no more difficulty than another. We need not, however, limit κῆτος to the true mammalian whale: the term may have been loosely used for any vast marine animal.

FITCHES. In the authorized version of Isaiah, ch. xxviii. 25, we read, "When he hath made plain the face thereof, doth he not cast abroad the fitches?" And again, ver. 27, "The fitches are beaten out with a staff." The original is קֶצֶח (ketzach), which the Septuagint translates μελάνθιον. If this rendering be correct, then the ketzach of Isaiah is the fennel-flower, Nigella sativa, a ranunculaceous plant nearly allied to the hellebores. The whole family are characterized by an acrid principle, known to chemistry as aconitine, and the deadly powers of which are too well illustrated in our common monks-hood, Aconitum napellus. The seeds of the Nigella, however, although pungent, are not pernicious; and the plant is extensively cultivated in the East for their sake. They are aromatic and carminative, and answer much the same purpose as pepper. Indeed, it is said that they are extensively employed in the adulteration of this latter condiment, and in France this "poor man's pepper" is called poivrete. From the readiness with which the ripe capsules surrender their tiny black coloured seeds, no plant could be more suitable for the prophet's illustration; as any reader may satisfy himself by trying the experiment, in the absence of the Nigella, on the ripened seed-vessels of any kindred genus, such as the columbine, the larkspur, the monkshood. They shed their contents so freely, that nothing could be more absurd than to use for their thrashing instrument a "cart-wheel" or loaded sledge; a slender rod or staff would answer the purpose far better. Dr. E. Henderson translates by "dill;" which is so far congruous with the cummin of the context, dill and cummin being both plants of the same order. But from the authorities with which he supports his translation, it is evident that he intended not dill, but Nigella. The former has not, as he supposes, "a blue poppy-like flower," nor is it the melanthium of the ancients.

Of the bread which Ezekiel, ch. iv. 9, was directed to make, one ingredient was kussemeth (קִסְמֶת), which in the text of the authorized version is rendered "fitches;" but the probabilities greatly preponderate in favour of the marginal translation, "spelt"—a cereal closely allied to common wheat, and extensively cultivated in the East, both in ancient times and modern. [J. E.]

FLAG. In the English Bible the word "flag" occurs three times. In Exodus, ch. ii. 3, it is mentioned that the mother of Moses deposited the ark of bulrushes among the "flags" beside the river; and in proclaiming the divine sentence against Egypt, Isaiah says, ch. xix. 6, "The reeds and flags shall wither." In both these instances the Hebrew word is suph (סֹפֶה), and we might be apt to suppose that it is some sort of rush or sedge, if it were not that the Hebrew name for the Red Sea is the Suph Sea, pointing manifestly to some other sort of vegetation than sedges or rushes. Probably "water-weeds," or some such vague expression, is as near an equivalent as we can safely venture in a case where neither the context nor the analogies of language do much to help us. The third instance is Job viii. 11. "Can the flag grow without water?" where the original word is achu (אָחֻ). Here Dr. Mason Good pleads hard for the bulrush (Scirpus lacustris, or S. grossus), as being a plant eminently dependent on water; but certainly some value is to be attached to the testimony of Jerome, who tells us that the word is not Hebrew, but Egyptian; and that when he inquired at the Egyptians themselves what they denoted by it, was informed that they applied it to marshy vegetation in general: "omne quod in palude virens nascitur" (Hieronymus in Esai. xix.) To this large and indefinite use of the word our translators have adhered in Ge. xii. 2, 18, where the same word achu occurs in the Hebrew, and is simply rendered "meadow." [J. E.]

FLAGON, as used in the English Bible, conveys a mistaken idea of the meaning of the original. It stands for the Heb. ashia (אֲשִׁיאָה), rightly enough rendered by the Sept. ἀγάρον, a kind of thin cake, usually mingled with oil, but in Palestine more commonly made of grapes, dried and pressed into a certain form. They were regarded as dainties, and were eagerly partaken of by persons who had been fagged and wearied with a journey. Instead, therefore, of flagons (with the addition of wine understood) in such passages as 2 Sa. vi. 19; 1 Ch. xvi. 3; Ho. iii. 1; Ca. ii. 5, we should read grape-cakes or pressed cakes.

FLAX. Few plants are at once so lovely and so useful as the slender, upright herb, with taper leaves, and large blue-purple flowers, from which are fashioned alike the coarsest canvas and the most ethereal cambric or lawn—the sail of the ship and the fairy-looking scarf which can be packed into a filbert shell. It was of linen, in part at least, that the hangings of the tabernacle were constructed, white, blue, and crimson, with cherubim inwoven; and it was of linen that the vestments of Aaron were fashioned. When arrayed in all his glory, Solomon could put on nothing more costly than the finest linen of Egypt; and describing “the marriage of the Lamb,” the seer of Patmos represents the bride as “arrayed in fine linen, clean and white; for the fine linen is the righteousness of saints.”

As every one knows, the flax which is spun into thread and woven into linen cloth is obtained from a plant largely cultivated in many parts of these islands, supply the markets of the world, flax has lost much of its former pre-eminence; but for many fabrics its tough and tenacious fibre is still unequalled; and in the surgical wards of the hospital, as well as in the pulp-vats of the paper-mill, they have as yet been unable to find its equivalent.

For the culture of flax, “low grounds, and those which have received deposits left by the overflowing of rivers, are deemed the most favourable situations. To this last circumstance it is attributed that Zealand produces the finest flax grown in Holland” (Materials of Manufactures, Library of Entertaining Knowledge). And to this circumstance Egypt must have been indebted for the superiority of her flax, so famous in the ancient world, and which gave to her more elaborate manufactures the subtlety of the most exquisite muslin, well meriting the epithet “woven air.” Herodotus mentions, as laid up in a temple at Lindus, in Rhodes, a linen corslet which had belonged to Amasis king of Egypt, each thread of which was composed of 360 strands or filaments. In length and in fineness of fibre no country could compete with the flax which produced the “fine linen of Egypt,” and which made the Delta “the great linen market of the ancient world” (Kalisch). By annihilating this crop, the seventh plague inflicted a terrible calamity. It destroyed what, next to corn, formed the staple of the country, and would only find its modern parallel in the visitation which should cut off a cotton harvest in America.

From a picture preserved at Beni Hassan, it would seem that the Egyptian treatment of the flax-plant was essentially the same as that which was pursued till quite lately by ourselves, which even now is only modified by machinery, and which is thus described by Pliny:—“The stalks are immersed in water warmed by the heat of the sun, and are kept down by weights placed upon them; for nothing is lighter than flax. The membrane or rind becoming loose, is a sign of their being sufficiently macerated. They are then taken out, and repeatedly turned over in the sun until perfectly dried; and afterwards beaten by mallets on stone slabs. The tow which is nearest the rind is inferior to the inner fibres, and is fit only for the wicks of lamps. It is combed out with iron hooks, until all the rind is removed. The inner part is of a finer and whiter quality. After it is made into yarn, it is polished by striking it frequently on a hard stone, moistened with water; and when woven into cloth it is again beaten with clubs, being always improved in proportion as it is beaten” (Pliny, xix. 1, quoted in Wilkinson’s Ancient Egyptians, iii. 139).

The seventh plague of Egypt fixes its own chronology. It took place when “the barley was in the ear and the flax was” in the pod, or “bolloed,” Ex. ix. 31; which according to eastern travellers corresponds with the month of February. In our own country the same crop would not be equally advanced till nearly four months later.

It was a towmont auld when lint was in the bell.”

In Scotland the bell or blossom, which is very fugitive, appears at midsummer, and is followed by the pod or “boll” (= bowl or ball, the Dutch bol, and German bolle)—the name given to the globular cartilaginous capsule.

From the circumstance of Rahab hiding the spies “under the stalks of flax, which she had laid in order but still more abundantly imported from northern countries like Russia and Holland. The Linum usitatissimum, as it is appropriately called, has long been cultivated in England; and although probably introduced at first, it now occurs in corn-fields not unfrequently, and with the appearance of a native quite at home. Its pretty little congener, L. catharticum, with its small white flowers gracefully drooping, is not only indigenous, but is one of the most plentiful of our native flowers, occurring in pastures everywhere.

Now that the Phormium tenax of New Zealand, and the hemp of Europe and India (Cannabis sativa and C. indica) subserve many of the same purposes, and above all since the cotton manufacture has begun to upon the roof," Jos. II. 6, it is evident that flax was cultivated in the neighbourhood of Jericho before the Israelites obtained possession of the Promised Land. And there can be little doubt that the Jews would maintain a tillage so essential to domestic industry, Pr. xxxi. 13, although it is not unlikely that superior sorts were still imported. "Israel said, I will go after my lovers, who give me my bread and my water, my wool and my flax."

Describing the gentle, skilful perseverance of Mes-siah, says the prophet—

"A bruised reed shall he not break,
And a smoking flax shall he not quench:
He shall bring forth judgment unto truth,
He shall not fail nor be discouraged,
Till he hath established judgment in the earth:
And the isles shall wait for his law."—Isa. xlii. 3, 4.

In the old fire-kindling process there was something very interesting and exciting, from the red spark creeping round the edge of the dingy rag to the first feeble flickering; and then, after many apparent extinctions and revivals, and much smouldering, and struggling, and smoking, the grand outburst and conclusive ignition, when to the leeward of the rock the shepherd outstretched his palms—"Ha, ha! I am warm: I see the fire;" and the village boys raised a shout to the signal so welcome in the wintry weather. So, full of patience and far-seeing purpose, "the smoking flax he shall not quench." He shall not be discouraged nor leave off, till that feeble spark, that smoking flax, has after many vicissitudes blazed up a beacon on the mountain tops, announcing for truth and righteousness a world-wide victory. So is it in his dealing with individual souls; and if ours be the mind of the Master, we shall foster and cherish the "smoking flax;" we shall hail and encourage in others the dim and precarious commencement of piety.

To the devout moralizers of other times was suggested an emblem of tribulation in the various processes to which the flax-plant is subjected: torn up from its native soil, tied in sheaves, roasted in the sun, drawn through the long teeth of the rippling comb, drowned in water and loaded with stones; once more exposed to the heat, beaten with mallets or crushed in the break, stretched on a frame and belaboured with the scutching bat; and to crown the whole, passed to and fro between the sharp points of the heckle till all the fibres are split in sunder: "linum injuria fit melius, Christianus calamitate." As the venerable Bede illustrates Ro. viii. 28, "The flax springs from the earth green and flourishing; but through much rough usage, and with the loss of all its native sap and verdure, is at last transfigured into raiment white as snow:—thus the more that true holiness is tried and afflicted, the more brightly does its beauty come forth." [J. H.]

FLEA [פְּרָעָה, parosh], a well-known insect, proverbial for its minuteness and its agility. David modestly represents himself, 1 Sa. xxiv. 14; xxvi. 20, as being as contemptible and unworthy of the king's solicitude as a flea; that it would be as remunerative to hunt a flea, as to come out into the wilderness after him. Perhaps also there might be a latent hint conveyed, that the king would find him as difficult to catch. There is a delicacy in the original פְּרָעָה אֲדָרָה, which is preserved in the LXX. and in the Vulgate, but is neglected in the English version; "after whom dost thou pursue? after one flea!" All oriental travellers agree in denouncing the intolerable prevalence of personal vermin. The answer of the Arab sheik to the English traveller, who in approaching Tiberias hoped to escape their assaults: "The king of the fleas holds his court at Tiberias," has been often remembered and often repeated. "Fleas," says Kitto, "cannot by any means be excluded from the neatest houses and the most cleanly persons. The long eastern habit, affording shelter to them, is a favourite conveyance, and the streets and dusty bazaars so swarm with them, that it is impossible to walk about without collecting a colony. People of condition sometimes, for this reason, change their dress on their return home; but persons in humbler circumstances, who cannot use this precaution, are tormented to an extent which might be beyond any powers of endurance but those which habit gives. The fleas are particularly partial to the rich juices of Europeans fresh from the West, and their presence never fails to prove a great attraction to their countless hosts. Fleas make their appearance in the spring, and riot without stint until the hot weather sets in, when they lose their wonted agility, and their numbers gradually diminish" (Phys. Hist. of Palestine, II. 421). [P. H. G.]

FLESH is used in Scripture with a considerable latitude of meaning, and in senses not found in other ancient writings which are independent of Scripture; yet so as never altogether to lose a reference to its primary meaning as indicative of the corporeal part of our natures. (1.) It denotes generally the whole animal creation, as being in their visible shape and organism composed of flesh and blood, Ge. vi. 13; vii. 15. (2.) More specifically, but with the same reference to what constitutes the more cognizable part of man, it denotes the rational creation—the race of mankind, singly or collectively, Lu. III. 6; Jn. xvii. 2; Mat. xxiv. 22, &c. (3.) The carnal nature of man, also, is called flesh, in respect to the frailty, weakness, proneness to vanity and corruption, which is inherent in it, and which it derives most conspicuously from the tendencies and imperfections of the bodily frame, Ro. iv. 1; Mat. xvi. 17; xxvi. 41. (4.) With an intensifying of this view of the carnal nature of man, the principle of corruption in him sometimes bears the name of flesh, from the preponderating sway that fleshly appetite has in maintaining and feeding it; so that the flesh stands in direct antithesis to the spirit—the one signifying the simply human and corrupt, the other the divine and regenerative principle in the soul, Ro. viii. 1, 4, 5; Gal. v. 16, 17; vi. 8, &c. (5.) As the flesh is the outward part of man's nature, and forms in a manner the connecting link between him and all that is outward in his condition, so flesh sometimes stands for a brief designation of the merely external things belonging to him, what he is, or has, or feels in respect to his earthly state and condition, Jn. vi. 63; 1 Co. I. 29; vii. 29; 2 Co. v. 14.

FLUX, BLOODY, an old English term for dysentery, so used in the authorized version at Ac. xxviii. 8, where the Greek has δυσεντερίαν. It got the name of bloody flux from being usually accompanied by a certain discharge of blood.

FLY [זְבִיבָה, zevub; אַרֹב, arob]. The former of these words occurs twice; once indefinitely, or perhaps having a distinct reference to the common house-fly (Musca domestic), "dead flies," Ec. x. 1; the other to some particular and formidable species, not a native of Palestine, but to be brought thither as a special judgment. (See HORNET.)

The common house-flies swarm in immense numbers in the East, and though they inflict no physical injury, yet, from their continual settling on the face, they are inexpressibly annoying. In Egypt the peasants are so subject to a virulent kind of ophthalmia, that almost every second person is said to be affected with it, and multitudes are blind of either one or both eyes. The complaint is greatly augmented by the constant presence of the flies, which congregate around the diseased eyes, attracted by the moisture which exudes; and so useless is it to drive them away, that the miserable people submit to the infliction, and little children are seen with their eyes margined with rows of black flies, of whose presence they appear unconscious, though presenting a most painful sight to Europeans.

The "ointment of the apothecary," composed of substances perhaps peculiarly attractive to these impudent intruders, would be likely to become choked up with their entangled bodies, which corrupting would be the more offensive for their contrast with the expected odour. Thus would little follies render despicable him who had a reputation for wisdom. The man is the ointment, his reputation the perfume, his little folly the dead fly, his disgrace the stinking savour.

The word zebub, fly, enters as an element into the name originally appropriated to an idol worshipped at Ekron, Baalzebub, 2 Ki. i. 2; but, according to the English version and Vulgate, in the time of our Lord applied to the prince of demons, interchangeable with "Satan," Mat. xii. 24, 26, 27. This "lord of flies" corresponds to the Zeus árβυιος and the Ἡρακλῆς μυλαργος of the Greeks and Romans, as if a defender from flies. The Greek in the New Testament reads Beel-zebul (Beel-zeboul), which is said to mean "Lord of dung," instead of "Lord of flies," and has been considered as one of those contemptuous puns which the Jews were in the habit of making by slight changes of letters. There might be a peculiar sting in this particular case, from the circumstance that flies are chiefly bred in dunghills, and many species do greatly congregate thither; hence the deity in question being confessedly a "lord of flies," must ipso facto be a "dungy lord." One of the names by which "idols" are expressed in the Old Testament is גִּלְיֻלִים, gillulim, which has the closest affinity with גֵּל, gelel, dung. The margin of the English Bible, indeed, gives "dungy gods," as the rendering of this word in De. xxix. 17. (See BEELZEBUL.)

Having thus poured contempt on the Ekronite god, there was nothing unnatural in the Jews proceeding yet further—in the hatred of idolatry which succeeded the captivity—to make him, perhaps considered the chief of the pagan gods, identical with the devil. The Lord Jesus certainly sanctioned the application of the epithet, Mat. xii. 27; and the Holy Ghost, 1 Co. x. 20, has said that "the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to demons."

The word arob is not rendered "fly" or "flies" directly, but is considered to include the idea of "flies." It occurs only in connection with the fourth plague upon Egypt, Ex. viii. 21-31; Ps. lxxviii. 45; cv. 31; our translators having rendered it in the narration by "swarms (of flies)," and in the Psalms by "divers sorts of flies."

The LXX. have in all cases given ἡ κυνόβρυα, "the dog-fly," as the equivalent for the Hebrew phrase; but what species the Greeks designated by this epithet we do not know. It is uncertain whether the fly was considered to have some unamiable qualities of the dog, obscene, unclean, impudent, blood-thirsty, or whether some fly was intended which specially made the dog its prey. The former conclusion is supported by the circumstance that κυνόβρυα was a term of opprobrium applied to an impudent meddler (Hesiod, x. 1. 304). But the ancient naturalists describe it as a sort of whame-fly (Tabanus), which might include both senses, for this genus is most impudently pertinacious in its assaults,
